Hello everyone, from a snowy Michigan

I am looking for Bob Smith Jr. We are planning a conf and would like to get him as our main speaker. If anyone knows where he is living would you email me. Bob Smith Jr know as Smity.

Thanks

+++Message 758. The Principles
From: Higher Powered 1/7/2003 11:21:00 AM

I received a list of 12 Spiritual Principles: Honesty, Hope, Faith, etc. Does anyone know where they come from? Also I understand that there are several versions of them. Does anyone know what the various versions are?

The Honesty, Hope, Faith.....set of step principles has been hanging around for decades. Some people think it is "official", but to our knowledge it has never been published by AA or founders.

The Big Book Bunch did an in-depth study of principles of the steps. See <http://www.sober.org/Principl.html>

Based upon review of the Big Book, the 12&12 and prolonged discussion, their view of the principle of each step is:

- 1) Surrender
- 2) Hope
- 3) Commitment
- 4) Honesty
- 5) Truth
- 6) Willingness
- 7) Humility
- 8) Reflection
- 9) Amendment
- 10) Vigilance
- 11) Attunement
- 12) Service

Having participated in their study, I must admit that I think the BBB list makes better sense. <g>

However, as a gesture of true humility they suggest each individual try to come up with their own understanding of what the principle of each step is. This would best be done with others. It is even OK to argue (gently, of course). Such discussion will be very helpful to understanding how the steps work.

We have never documented an evaluation of the principles of the principles. It might go like 1. Unity, 2. Authority ...

Perhaps AAHistoryLovers would like to propose such a set. If so, I will submit it to the Big Book Bunch.

alcoholism is a disease. But actually they have given only lip service to that concept. Intellectually they have accepted it - intellectually only - and I would remind you as priests - you know this better than I - that human beings do not act on their intellectual beliefs. They act on their feelings; they act on the beliefs that are in their hearts rather than in their heads. And if they do not deeply believe that alcoholism is an illness, that these are sick people, in their hearts, then they are ineffective in dealing with alcoholics.

The sad part about this is that far too many people do not recognize this division within themselves. They are unaware that their disbelief runs deep, sometimes so deep that they can't put their finger on it. It is a conditioning that they probably received before they were six years old (and the psychiatrists tell us that is crucial) that they imbibed almost with their mother's milk, and at their mother's knee, and by osmosis, because of the society in which we all grew up, acquired the old attitudes that alcoholism is purely a sin, that this is a moral question, wholly and completely. You see, nobody in the field of alcoholism denies that there are tremendous moral implications in alcoholism, because of the behavior that it induces and also because of the thinking that develops from continued ingestion of alcohol. In AA we call it stinkin' thinkin'. It can be very far from any of our ideals about morals and virtues and faith. All of these things are true. But this is not what I am talking about.

I am talking about all the old-fashioned concepts with which all of us who are adults grew up, whether we remember them or not: that alcoholics were primarily some kind of moral delinquent, moral leper (excepting that they are trying to get that "leper" out of our thinking, too, and call it by its proper name); that these were people who, if they chose, could be different; that they were deliberately this way, that they had no regard for anyone but themselves. In fact, I have heard wives of alcoholics who said, "Oh, yes, I know he is sick and all that, but why does he do this to me? Why does he behave this way? Doesn't he love me? Doesn't he care about his family?"

Well, of course he does. He is in the grip of something that goes beyond his power to control. He has lost control over drinking, and because of this, he has lost control over his behavior.

Actually, non-alcoholics, if they get drunk, lose control over their behavior. They can behave just as badly as the alcoholic. The main difference is that they don't do it consistently over and over again with increasingly frequency over many years.

Who is an Alcoholic?

We have a definition at NCAA that we use, that we think is a pretty good working definition, and it developed right out of the experiences of AA, as to who is and who isn't an alcoholic.

We say the alcoholic is someone whose drinking causes a continuing problem in any department of his or her life. The assumption is that the person who drinks too much on occasions, if it develops into a problem, will not want the problem and will, therefore, take action about it because of the problem. They either cut down their drinking, or they will cut it out for a while. The alcoholic would like to do the same thing, but the alcoholic is totally unable; it is impossible for the alcoholic to cut down on his or her drinking. This is the nature of alcoholism.

In fact, it is the nature of the test that also grew out of AA's experiences, and which I incorporated in my book. I don't believe any true alcoholic can pass this test: the limiting of drinks to not more than three on any drinking occasion, even if it is daily, over a six-month period. Every alcoholic would love to be able to do this. I have never heard of a real alcoholic who could pass that test.

Actually, in my original Primer, I had three months, and there were a handful who managed to pass it. They didn't say how awful it was, and how uncomfortable it was. And in the book I point out that this should be a comfortable process. It should be comfortable to limit your drinks. You may not like it, you may be on many occasions with people who are drinking too much, and you would like to go on, but if you are taking this test, if you are attempting to find out whether you have alcoholism or not, you will be more comfortable not drinking more than your three because you want to pass the test.

In other words, it is a possible thing for a non-alcoholic to do. It is not a possible thing for an alcoholic to do. That is why it is a continuing problem that is caused by drinking.

We also make a point of that last half, "in any department of his or her life." You know AA has had a phrase which has proven very useful in AA, but has been widely misinterpreted outside of AA, and even within, by some people - hitting bottom.

The general picture in the non-alcoholic world in which we live, of alcoholics hitting bottom, is literally that they instantly conceive of somebody who is in the gutter, who has lost everything, lost everything materially, intellectually, morally, has just lost everything - this is hitting bottom.

Well, actually in the very early days of AA, that was about right. Certainly when I went in, and there were just a handful of us, nobody had a dime; we had all lost everything materially. Nobody had much of anything else. A few still had their wives, but most didn't. And only one had her husband, I being that one. The second woman did not have a husband. The third one still had her husband, and this was a miracle - we didn't believe it - because while wives sometimes stick to the alcoholic, husbands rarely do.

Younger People in AA

I firmly believe that with the increasing education about alcoholism, increasing understanding of it, increasing acceptance of it as the illness it is, people are coming for help at earlier and earlier stages of their problems. It is not unusual to go to an AA meeting, particularly in a big city, and find everybody there looking to me like infants. Now, I recognize that is partly because of my own increasing age, for people look younger every year, I find. But it is true that there are a very large number of people in AA, all across the country, who are in their 20's today. This was not true in the beginning. And these people have hit a kind of bottom that is certainly totally unlike this general picture.

I think we have to recognize this in counseling the alcoholic - that this bottom is a purely personal thing. A person may hit bottom because of his own thinking on the subject, because of what he has learned, because of the fact he has recognized what is ahead of him. Just enough has happened to make him see that the pattern fits, and he has read about it, or listened to someone who knows telling him about it. He sees what lies ahead, and he doesn't want to go that road. And nobody would, if he had a choice.

Today he has a choice. There are things he can do. There are places he can go; there are people that he can talk to, and he need not yield to, he is not bound hand and foot to the inevitable progress of alcoholism. He can break the chains. He can become free. It is very satisfying to me, to realize how many young people are preferring to be free once they learn what these chains are like.

Now "bottom" may not have shown on the outside at all. He may not have lost anything. He may never have lost a job. He may not have lost his family or even had the threat of losing his family. He may be materially well off, but inside, as he recognizes his condition, and what it means, and where it will lead, he hits a kind of emotional bottom. He hits bottom where it counts, in the feelings. Alcoholics aren't any different from anybody else.

I like to tell my fellow alcoholics, remind them, we are people just like anyone else. We have the same equipment that other people have. We have a mind, we have an intellect, we have feelings - sometimes I think that is the one area where we may be a little different - perhaps our feelings are more acute, but I am not certain whether that antedated the ingestion of alcohol or whether alcohol watered those feelings, like watering a garden. And they became more acute and bigger and more visible than other people's.

We have a soul. I firmly believe every human being does, no matter what his actions are, or what terrible things he may have done. We have all the equipment of everybody else. We are people and, therefore, we share a lot of the failings of the human race. I don't think alcoholics are unusually blind to alcoholism. Everybody is blind to alcoholism. They are sharing what everybody else has.

Remember, they were brought up the same way; they were also brought up under the myths and misconceptions and misapprehensions that we all had about alcoholism a quarter of a century ago. This is perhaps one reason why it is becoming easier to reach young people. They didn't grow up in that same atmosphere. Things had already begun to change somewhat.

The Skid Row Derelict

For instance, the stereotyped picture of the alcoholic that we who are adults, middle aged if you like, grew up with was that of the skid row bum.

Now, the National Council on Alcoholism is very much interested in the skid row derelict, but we have deliberately stayed away from getting too deeply involved in this area of alcoholism because we were so determined to break this stereotyped picture that this was the alcoholic, that there wasn't anything else. You see, it is easy for people to accept this, because if that is the alcoholic, it can't be me, or my wife, or my children, or my family, or my friends, because we are not skid row bums.

It lets people off. It is a lovely way to get involved and yet to exclude being involved in those who are close to you, in your own parishes if you are a pastor, in your own colleges, in your own group of friends.

Actually the skid row problem is a severe one in this country, and yet it represents only a tiny percentage of our total alcoholic population.

Over the last several years many of us have sat down together and worried about the matter of statistics for the field of alcoholism. And let's be honest, we don't have any. We just don't have any statistics that are really valid. We only have estimates, but all of us felt that it could not be the same number as had been arrived at for the year 1956. And that figure of 5 million was based on 1956 statistics, using the Jellinek formula to arrive at an estimate of the number of alcoholics.

We all recognized that 10 years later, for one thing, the population had increased enormously. This meant that the number of drinkers had increased, because the proportion of Americans who drink has been going up. Since 1956 it has risen perceptibly, and this meant that since there were more drinkers, there were undoubtedly more people with alcoholism. And so we worked out a formula and we arrived at a figure for 1965 of 6 million alcoholics. And I may say, that it is possible to arrive at that figure for 1965 in quite a large variety of ways. We tried a good many of them, and always came out with roughly the same answer. And so, it was decided that the National Council and its affiliates would adopt that figure. We also circulated the statement to all of the state programs on alcoholism. And they were delighted to have it, because they had been feeling just as uncomfortable as we had about using the same figure for ten years in the face of what everyone knew to be a difference in the number of people, and the number of drinkers, and, therefore, the number of alcoholics.

To return to this attitude business, I think it is crucial, if you are going to reach the alcoholic. I have often said that alcoholics are like children and dogs. They feel what you feel. They don't hear what you say. You can approach an alcoholic with an absolutely correct textbook speech. Everything you say will be exactly right, right down the line, but what the alcoholic is listening for is how you feel toward him. Is there a hint of hostility, a hint of contempt? Remember, most alcoholics have had considerable rejection in their lives, considerable misunderstanding around them. They feel rejected. Usually by the time they get to you who are counseling them, they feel rejected indeed. They are looking for more rejection in you, and you can't conceal it if it is there somewhere. You may not know it yourself, but the alcoholics will know it. They will pick it up every time, and they just won't be back. You will have lost them. This may set them back years, because if they have arrived at the point of going to see anyone, particularly their pastor, this is a big step forward. It can be a tremendously important thing that they should make such an effort, that they should make such a contact, that they should go to somebody, even though they may be bringing you a lot of lies.

The Alcoholic and Sanity

Here again I think we need a little correction of some of our thinking on this. In the first place, I don't think the alcoholic tells lies for anybody else. I think the alcoholic tells lies for his own sake. I think that deep in the heart of the person who has lost control over drinking, however early it is, there is a real terror that he has lost his mind, that he is truly insane. And I don't mean in the temporary sense that occurs with deep intoxication, which all of us who are alcoholics know all too well. No, I think here they are so terrified that they have really lost their minds that they try to explain to themselves why this keeps happening. They will go to incredible lengths to make an explanation.

I think that the lies are more of an explanation. I don't like the word "rationalization" because that implies a willful and deliberate thing, and I don't really believe that it is often that. It is a frantic effort to reassure themselves.

Obviously if they can get other people to believe it, this bolsters their own belief that they are all right, that this terrible thing is not happening to them, that it isn't that bad.

I also think that on certain occasions they tell lies because other people expect them to, and I believe most people do expect this.

We had our annual meeting in New York last week, and a research project was reported on. It was a follow-up study of alcoholics from the State Hospital in Maryland. They wanted to know, among other things, whether the histories the alcoholics gave of themselves when they came in - they weren't all voluntary; some were committed - bore any relation to the truth. And they found to their amazement that the alcoholics were highly reliable, that in most cases what they told about themselves and their past and what had happened to them, was right; they had told the truth.

I think we can get hung up on this lying bit, and I think, furthermore, that it affects the attitude of the person who is trying to help. And if it affects the attitude of the person who is trying to help, it affects the attitude of the person who is to be helped. This is another thing that we are apt to forget, and that I think is crucial in counseling. You know that most of us spend 90% of our time reacting to other people. Oh, we do a certain amount of initiation, a certain amount of acting which is entirely our own and bears no relation to other people, but a great deal of our time we are reacting to other people. Stop and think about it, and you will see what I mean. This is also true of the alcoholic, who after all is a human, remember. He is a member of the human race, even if he doesn't think he is, and even if some people in the human race don't think that he is or don't think he ought to be anyway. And he will react to everything that you say and do.

Your job, when you are counseling, is to see that his reactions are positive and constructive, that you do not frighten him to death, that you do not talk down to him from the mountaintop. And I think it is particularly hard for the clergyman. Remember that in everybody's mind, and certainly in our country, which is supposed to be a Godly country (we do have "In God we Trust" on all our coins, you know; it is a motto of these United States), the clergyman is somebody up there. The clergyman is the man of God; the clergyman is special; the clergyman is holy; the clergyman is good. And here is this individual who usually feels less than the dirt beneath anybody's feet. Filled with self-misgiving, self-hate, self-fear, he is going to the symbol of good and God. He expects to be talked down to from the mountaintop. He expects this person really to feel too good to want him around and, all too often, that is just what the clergyman feels.

Understanding is Important

Now the alcoholic is waiting for this; so even the tiniest tinge of preaching down from a mountain top to this poor little man down in the abyss is magnified in that individual's reactions into a real barrier that he can not overcome. He can't give, he can't talk, he can't feel free, he can't let himself be helped.

I am not saying, although I do think this plays a part, that it is necessary to be an alcoholic to have the right attitude towards another alcoholic, but it sure helps. The person who has been through it knows perfectly well he is not up on a mountain top, and can reassure the alcoholic pretty quickly that he was right down in that abyss too. And he knows just what it feels like, and he got just as dirty, and he can do it in a way that is believed, believed here in the heart, not just up here in the head.

I do not believe that only alcoholics can do this, because I have known professional people who could do it equally well. I myself am the product of one. I don't know whether this Conference ever heard Dr. Harry Tiebout speak. If you didn't, I am sorry, because he died two weeks ago, and I think he is one of the greatest losses to this field since Dr. E.M. Jellinek left us.

Dr. Tiebout happened to be my psychiatrist. He is the man who forced me into AA. He is the man who understood AA before I did, and brought me to a recognition and an understanding and an acceptance of it. And here was a man whom I had been looking down my nose at for a good year while I was under treatment, because he didn't like to drink. I didn't see how he could expect to talk to me.

In fact, I told him once that I just thought he was an old spoilsport. He didn't like it, so he didn't want anybody else to enjoy it. This man had a real understanding of the alcoholic. He could talk to the alcoholic in terms the alcoholic could hear and could accept. And he was not alone. There are many people across the country, and many of them are the clergy of many denominations.

Although I must say in my travels, which are extensive, and my knowledge of what is going on in many communities around the country, it is frequently a Catholic priest who is the one who is the warm wise counselor for many alcoholics in that area, and not necessarily, by any means, an alcoholic priest.

So, I do believe that this attitude is possible. And I personally think it should be possible for a Christian, for a man of God, who should have learned something about humility, about caring for others, his flock, and all mankind in his flock. So I feel very strongly that the clergy are a tremendously important group in dealing with alcoholism, because I think, very often, the family will go first to their pastor when there is trouble at home. It may not be the alcoholic himself or herself who goes first, but if the situation is handled right, and if the family can learn a little about what alcoholism is, and about this business of the alcoholic reacting to behavior, the thinking and words of others, then the situation can be changed to the point where the alcoholic himself or herself will go.

And this is when it becomes crucial how the counselor, be he clergyman or not, handles the situation. The matter of attitude is absolutely basic. If you don't have this, then it doesn't matter how many techniques you use, they aren't going to work. You have not been able to establish contact; you have not been able to communicate; you have not been able to establish rapport, and until those are established, it doesn't matter what else you do.

Let me tell you one thing that I think was a great contribution. A good many years ago at one of the refresher courses at Yale, I was spending a lot of time with Father Ray Kennedy. He was also there at the refresher course, and he was very much excited. "You know," he said, "I have discovered something that I think may be my major contribution to the field of alcoholism. And I want to tell you about it."

It seems that in Syracuse there was a very wealthy Catholic family where the wife and mother was an alcoholic, a pretty bad one. There was plenty of money there, and there was a great deal of recognition of the stigma, because this was a socially prominent family. So she was constantly being shipped away to high priced sanitariums, or high priced doctors somewhere else; she would come back and be all right for a while, and then she would go back to drinking.

She would never admit that drinking was her problem. She was always very nervous, having a nervous breakdown, or something else. In other words, she was doing this so-called lying that is so much talked about in alcoholics. Eventually, the husband and father went to Father Kennedy and he said, "You know, she has tremendous respect for you." He was a professor in LeMoyne College there and a man of considerable stature. "Would you come and talk to her."

So Father Kennedy went over to talk to this woman. And she launched into her usual series of denials that she had a problem with drinking, saying that that wasn't it, it was a lot of other things, and he got a little exasperated since he was getting nowhere fast. Then he said, "Why do you have so much difficulty in admitting that you have alcoholism?"

She said, "What did you say?"

He said, "Why do you have so much difficulty admitting that you have alcoholism?"

"I have alcoholism?" she said. "Why didn't somebody tell me?"

Father Kennedy is a Jesuit, as you all know, and they are pretty astute in the convolutions of the human mind, and he recognized something immediately. If you say to somebody you are an alcoholic, you are pointing the finger of blame, saying, "You did it." If you say to somebody, "You have alcoholism," this could have come up from behind and grabbed them when they weren't looking. They didn't necessarily do it to themselves.

And he felt that where you could remove that kind of guilt, you open the door to constructive help.

That is precisely what happened with this woman. She got well. She joined AA and recovered. And he said, "I believe this may be my contribution. I would like to suggest that the National Council, in speaking and writing, adopt this way of talking. Instead of saying there are so many alcoholics, say there are so many people with alcoholism, or so many Americans with alcoholism. Instead of saying someone is becoming an alcoholic, say someone is developing alcoholism. You say it is a disease, why don't you begin using the same terminology you use about other diseases?"

You don't automatically say one is a cardiac. You say one has heart disease. And this is true of all illnesses.

We have attempted to do this in the 10 years or so since Father Kennedy made this suggestion, and I believe that it has had an impact. I believe that it has enabled a lot of people to get to AA. As he said, "It lets them save face in their own minds." And I know perfectly well that one of the barriers to successful helping of the alcoholic is the load of guilt that the alcoholic is carrying.

This is even truer with some groups than others. It has been my experience, and I have talked with a lot of you, that the priest who develops alcoholism has a bigger load of guilt than anyone else. And it often can be an effective barrier against help.

I think that anything that we can do to lift the load of guilt, since it is a barrier to recovery, we should do, and I think that much can be done in the counseling session to lift it.

The Alcoholic Suffers

We don't have to say that everything you did while you were drunk is just dandy. It wasn't. And the alcoholic knows that really better than anyone else.

The alcoholic has suffered - and this is something that many people don't realize - more intensely from remorse and shame than anybody on the outside can ever imagine. We don't need to hammer them over the head with guilt. They can create more than outsiders ever dreamed of. Their burden of guilt is greater than any outsider will ever realize, and it is our job, if we are counseling, if we are trying to help, to remove any possible barriers to recovery.

The second thing that I want to talk about today is something that was brought to my attention a good many years ago, when I had a young man working for me whose name was Denis McGenty. I don't have to tell you he was a Catholic. And he was quite a guy. He was a member of AA, and he was a real artist with the words. He was a spellbinder. Denis was a sociologist. But his drinking had interfered and he never got his Ph.D. And he began talking about it, and thinking about it while he was working for me. One day he was discussing various subjects that he might take for his doctoral dissertation, and he said, "You know, I have got a wild idea that I would really like to try. I think most alcoholics are saints manqué. They are people who have all the qualities and qualifications for becoming saintly and somehow it gets misdirected. And it is one reason that they get caught in this toil, this vicious circle that they go around and around in. I believe that most alcoholics of whatever denomination have been seeking God in their own way through their drinking. In fact, though they have taken the path that is leading them away from Him, that isn't what they had in mind."

And, indeed, it is sometimes true that an episode of drunkenness can be a startling experience just like an experience with LSD, which can even resemble a spiritual experience.

As a matter of fact, many years ago, and this was after Denis and I had been discussing this idea, I read an issue of a magazine that a friend in California sent to me called "Vedanta." In it was an article by Aldous Huxley entitled "Transcending Down." He talked about mankind's efforts over the thousands of years to find outside means for transcending, for achieving a spiritual experience, for achieving a higher consciousness. We know of many tribes in many parts of the world that use various drugs for this purpose. And some have used alcohol for this purpose.

It is not impossible that the excessive use of alcohol has some kind of relationship to this deep-seated search for God, for a feeling of God, not just an intellectual acceptance of God.

Now I am saying this on purpose because I believe there is something true in this, and I want you all to realize something that most of you probably know. The alcoholic is frequently characterized as a dependent person, an individual who must have something to lean on. You have heard reference made to the glass crutch. That is one of the best descriptions of alcohol as something to lean on, a glass crutch that can shatter, that has no real strength, that is fragile. Alcoholics are using it as a crutch; they are leaning on it. And very often when they go to someone for help, they become extremely dependent on that individual for at least a period of time.

I heard a psychiatric social worker, who was a really good one and very effective with alcoholics, describe it when somebody complained to her at a professional meeting that she let her patients stay dependent too long. "We certainly do. We take their hands when they come in. We hold their hands, and when we let go, we let go finger by finger."

Give the Alcoholic Time

It takes time for the alcoholic to be independent again, to learn not to be dependent on anything that comes his way on which he or she can lean.

Now this dependence, this leaning toward dependence, if you like, (and I am not certain that it is confined to alcoholics, I think this is true perhaps of mankind) can be used constructively. The goal of therapy in my opinion, and it certainly is the goal in AA and it would be your goal as priests, is to make these people that come to you God-dependent. When the alcoholic comes to AA, the God business, as you frequently hear it referred to in AA meetings, is not crammed down his or her throat, at least not usually. Sometimes it is and in some places it is not. But very often the resistance is so great that it is again a hurdle to recovery which the alcoholic might not be able to get over. So the newcomer is asked merely to keep an open mind about spiritual matters, about God; to listen, to stay sober, to do such things as he can within the AA program. And if he keeps an open mind, we know full well that he will become God-dependent, because that is what AA is.

AA is a way of becoming God-dependent. Successful AA's are God-dependent.

If the clergyman who is counseling alcoholics can't see that this is indeed part of his business and can't borrow some of the techniques that have brought the active alcoholic into sober God-dependence, then he isn't a very good clergyman.

I do agree that not every one, merely because his collar is turned around, is automatically a good counselor for alcoholism, any more than a psychiatrist, because he has a degree in psychiatry is a good therapist for alcoholics. Some are, some aren't. Not every member of AA is equally good at 12th step work. Some people come into AA and they try awfully hard, but that is just not their work; it makes them unhappy and uncomfortable, and they don't do a good job. You often find them doing other things in AA, being active around the clubhouse, making talks, functioning as a member of AA, yet not spending too much time on 12th step work, because they learned they did not have the touch, they didn't have the real ability. They have all done it, they had to do it to find out, but I don't think people should persist in an area where they don't take to it naturally, and where they are notably ineffective. And I think this is just as true of the clergyman as it is of the AA member, or of psychiatrist, or social worker, or psychologist, or anyone else.

The Role of the Clergy

Just as some people are natural born leaders, some are natural born helpers; they seem to know instinctively what to do and what to say. They seem to have such right attitudes, they automatically establish a rapport without even thinking about it. They are just made that way. Not everybody is, unfortunately. Now, for the clergyman who is not a 100% successful therapist in this field, or counselor, he must learn how to refer and where to refer. He must accept his role in the team as, you might say, the front runner, the case finder.

I have often spoken of the clergy as our front line troops. They are leading the rest; they are out in front of the army, because they are more likely to divided into four classifications and one evening each week will be devoted to each of the four subdivisions. Thus, in one month, a new man can get the basis of our 12 suggested steps.

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol—that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God, as we understand Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. Continued to take personal inventory, and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God, as we understand Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.
12. Having had a spiritual experience as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

These steps are divided as follows:

Discussion No. 1---The admission, Step No. 1.

Discussion No. 2---The spiritual phase, Steps 2,3,5,6,7, and 11.

Discussion No. 3---The inventory and restitution, Steps No. 4, 8, 9 and 10.

Discussion No. 4---The active work, which is Step No. 12.

DISCUSSION NO. 1

THE ADMISSION

The material contained herein is merely an outline of the admission phase of the program and is not intended to replace or supplant-

- a. The careful reading and re-reading of the Big Book.
- b. Regular attendance at weekly group meetings.
- c. Study of the Program.
- d. Daily practice of the program.
- e. Reading of approved printed matter on Alcoholism.
- f. Informal discussion with other members.

This meeting covers Step No. 1. "We admitted we were powerless over alcohol-that our lives had become unmanageable."

This instruction is not a short-cut to A.A. It is an introduction-a help-a brief course in the fundamentals.

In order to determine whether or not a person has drifted from "social drinking" into pathological drinking it is well to check over a list of test questions, which each member may ask himself and answer for himself.

We must answer once and for all these three puzzling questions-

What is an Alcoholic?

Who is an Alcoholic?

Am I an Alcoholic?

To get the right answer the prospective member must start this course of instruction with-

1. A willingness to learn. We must not have the attitude that "you've got to show me."
2. An open mind. Forget any and all ideas or notions we already have. Set our opinions aside.

3. Complete honesty. It is possible-not at all probable-that we may fool somebody else. But we MUST be honest with ourselves, and it is a good time to start being honest with others.

SUGGESTED TEST QUESTIONS

1. Do you require a drink the next morning?
2. Do you prefer to drink alone?
3. Do you lose time from work due to drinking?
4. Is your drinking harming your family in any way?
5. Do you crave a drink at a definite time daily?
6. Do you get the inner shakes unless you continue drinking?
7. Has drinking made you irritable?
8. Does drinking make you careless of your family's welfare?
9. Have you harmed your husband or wife since drinking?
10. Has drinking changed your personality?
11. Does drinking cause you bodily complaints?
12. Does drinking make you restless?
13. Does drinking cause you to have difficulty in sleeping?
14. Has drinking made you more impulsive?
15. Have you less self-control since drinking?
16. Has your initiative decreased since drinking?
17. Has your ambition decreased since drinking?
18. Do you lack perseverance in pursuing a goal since drinking?
19. Do you drink to obtain social ease? (In shy, timid, self-conscious individuals.)
20. Do you drink for self-encouragement? (In persons with feelings of inferiority.)

21. Do you drink to relieve marked feeling of inadequacy?
22. Has your sexual potency suffered since drinking?
23. Do you show marked dislikes and hatreds since drinking?
24. Has your jealousy, in general, increased since drinking?
25. Do you show marked moodiness as a result of drinking?
26. Has your efficiency decreased since drinking?
27. Has your drinking made you more sensitive?
28. Are you harder to get along with since drinking?
29. Do you turn to an inferior environment since drinking?
30. Is drinking endangering your health?
31. Is drinking affecting your peace of mind?
32. Is drinking making your home life unhappy?
33. Is drinking jeopardizing your business?
34. Is drinking clouding your reputation?
35. Is drinking disturbing the harmony of your life?

If you have answered YES to any one of the Test Questions, there is a definite warning that you may be alcoholic. If you have answered YES to any two of the Test Questions the chances are that you are an alcoholic.

If you answered YES to three or more of the Test Questions you are definitely AN ALCOHOLIC.

NOTE: The Test Questions are not A.A. Questions but are the guide used by Johns Hopkins University Hospital in deciding whether a patient is alcoholic or not.

In addition to the Test Questions we in A.A. would ask even more questions. Here are a few-

36. Have you ever had a complete loss of memory while, or after drinking?

37. Have you ever felt, when or after drinking, an inability to concentrate?

38. Have you ever felt "remorse" after drinking?

39. Has a physician ever treated you for drinking?

40. Have you ever been hospitalized for drinking?

Many other questions could be asked but the foregoing are sufficient for the purpose of this instruction.

WHY DOES AN ALCOHOLIC DRINK?

Having decided that we are alcoholics, it is well to consider what competent mental doctors consider as the REASONS why an Alcoholic drinks.

1. As an escape from situations of life which he cannot face.
2. As evidence of a maladjusted personality (including sexual maladjustments)
3. As a development from social drinking to pathological drinking.
4. As a symptom of a major abnormal mental state.
5. As an escape from incurable physical pain.
6. As a symptom of constitutional inferiority—a psychopathic personality. For example, an individual who drinks because he likes alcohol, knows he cannot handle it, but does not care.
7. Many times one cannot determine any great and glaring mechanism as the basis of why the drinker drinks; but the revealing fact may be elicited that alcohol is taken to relieve a certain vague restlessness in the individual incident to friction between his biological and emotional make-up and the ordinary strains of life.

The above reasons are general reasons. Where the individuality or personality of the alcoholic is concerned these reasons may be divided as follows—

1. A self-pampering tendency which manifests itself in refusal to tolerate, even temporarily, unpleasant states of mind such as boredom, sorrow, anger, disappointment, worry, depression, dissatisfaction, and feelings of inferiority and inadequacy. "I want what I want when I want it" seems to express the attitude of many alcoholics toward life.

2. An instinctive urge for self-expression, unaccompanied by determination to translate the urge into creative action.
3. An abnormal craving for emotional experiences which calls for removal of intellectual restraint.
4. Powerful hidden ambitions, without the necessary resolve to take practical steps to attain them and with resultant discontent, irritability, depression, disgruntledness and general restlessness.
5. A tendency to flinch from the worries of life and to seek escape from reality by the easiest means available.
6. An unreasonable demand for continuous happiness or excitement.
7. An insistent craving for the feeling of self-confidence, calm and poise that some obtain temporarily from alcohol.

WE ADMIT

If, after carefully considering the foregoing, we ADMIT we are an alcoholic we must realize that-

Once a person becomes a pathological drinker, he can never again become a controlled drinker; and-from that point on, is limited to just two alternatives:

1. Total permanent abstinence.
2. Chronic alcoholism with all of the handicaps and penalties it implies. In other words-we have gone past the point where we HAD A CHOICE.

All we have left is a DECISION to make.

WE RESOLVE TO DO SOMETHING ABOUT IT

1. WE MUST CHANGE OUR WAY OF THINKING. (This is such an important matter that it will have to be discussed more fully in a later discussion.)
2. We must realize that each morning, when you wake, you are a potential drunkard for that day.
3. We resolve that we will practice A.A. for the 24 hours of that day.

4. We must study the other eleven Steps of the Program and practice each and every one.
5. Attend the regular Group Meeting each week without fail.
6. Firmly believe that by practicing A.A. faithfully each day, we will achieve sobriety.
7. Believe that we can be free from alcohol as a problem.
8. contact another member BEFORE taking a drink-not AFTER. Tell him what bothers you-talk it over with him freely.
9. Work the Program for ourselves alone-NOT for our wife, children, friends or for our job.
10. Be absolutely honest and sincere.
11. Be fully open minded-no mental reservations.
12. Be fully willing to work the Program. Nothing good in life comes without work.

CONCLUSION

1. Alcoholics are suffering from a MENTAL DISEASE-not a physical illness. Fortunately we in A.A. have learned how it may be controlled (this will be shown in the next eleven Steps of the Program.)
2. We can also learn to be FREE from alcohol as a problem.
3. We can achieve a full and happy life without recourse to alcohol.

ASK QUESTIONS

No question pertaining to drinking-or stopping drinking-is silly or irrelevant. The matter is TOO SERIOUS.

Any questions we ask may help some one else.

This is not a short-cut to A.A. It is an introduction-a help-a brief course in fundamentals.

In A.A. we learn by question and answer.

We learn by exchanging our thought and our experience with each other.

Any question you ask may help some one else. To cover as many questions as possible in the short time available all answers must be limited to three (3) minutes.

DISCUSSION NO. 2

THE SPIRITUAL PHASE

The material contained herein is merely an outline of the spiritual phase of the program and is not intended to replace or supplant

- a. The careful reading and re-reading of the Big Book.
- b. Regular attendance at weekly group meetings.
- c. Study of the Program.
- d. Daily practice of the program.
- e. Reading of approved printed matter on Alcoholism.
- f. Informal discussion with other members.

This instruction is not a short-cut to A.A. It is an introduction-a help-a brief course in the fundamentals.

This meeting covers Steps 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 11. We will take them in order.

STEP NO. 2-"Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity."

Our drinking experience has shown-

1. That as we strayed away from the normal SOCIAL side of life, our minds became confused and we strayed away from the normal MENTAL side of life.
2. An abnormal MENTAL condition is certainly not SANITY in the accepted sense of the word. We have acquired or developed a MENTAL DISEASE. Our study of A.A. shows that-
 - a. In the MENTAL or tangible side of life we have lost touch with, or ignored, or have forgotten the SPIRITUAL values that give us the dignity of MAN as differentiated from the ANIMAL. We have fallen back upon the MATERIAL things of life and these have failed us. We have been groping in the dark.

b. No HUMAN agency, no SCIENCE or ART has been able to solve the alcoholic problem, so we turn to the SPIRITUAL for guidance.

Therefore, we "Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity."

1. We must believe with a great FAITH.

STEP NO. 3- "Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of GOD as we understand Him." In the first step we learned that we had lost the power of CHOICE and had to make a DECISION.

1. What DECISION could we make better than to

a. Turn our very WILL over to GOD, realizing that our own use of our own will had resulted in trouble.

b. As in the Lord's Prayer you must believe and practice THY WILL BE DONE.

2. GOD as we understand Him.

3. RELIGION is a word we do not use in A.A. We refer to a member's relation to GOD as the SPIRITUAL. A religion is a FORM of worship-not the worship itself.

4. If a man cannot believe in GOD he can certainly believe in SOMETHING greater than himself. If he cannot believe in a POWER greater than himself he is a rather hopeless egoist.

STEP NO. 5- "Admitted to GOD, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs."

1. There is nothing new in this step. There are many sound reasons for "talking over our troubles out loud with others."

2. The Catholic already has this medium readily available to him in the Confessional.

But-the Catholic is at a disadvantage if he thinks his familiarity with confession permits him to think his part of A.A. is thereby automatically taken care of. He must, in confession, seriously consider his problems in relation to his alcoholic thinking.

3. The non-Catholic has the way open to work this step by going to his minister, his doctor, or his friend.

4. Under this step it is not even necessary to go to a priest or minister. Any understanding human being, friend or stranger will serve the purpose.

5. The purpose and intent of this step is so plain and definite that it needs little explanation. The point is that we MUST do EXACTLY what the Fifth Step says, sooner or later.

We must not be in a rush to get this step off our chest. Consider it carefully and calmly. Then get about it and do it.

6. "Wrongs" do not necessarily mean "crime. It can well be wrong thinking-selfishness-false pride-egotism-or any one of a hundred such negative faults.

STEP NO. 6-"We are entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character."

1. After admitting our wrong thinking and wrong actions in Step 5 we now do something more than "admit" or "confess."

2. We now become READY and WILLING to have God remove the defects in our CHARACTER.

3. Remember it is OUR character we are working on. Not the other fellow's. Here is a good place to drop the CRITICAL attitude toward others-the SUPERIOR attitude toward others.

4. We must clean our mind of wrong thinking-petty jealousy-envy-self pity-remorse, etc.

5. Here is the place to drop RESENTMENTS, one of the biggest hurdles the alcoholic has to get over.

6. What concerns us here is that we drop all thoughts of resentment-anger-hatred-revenge.

7. We turn our WILL over to God and let HIS WILL direct us how to patiently remove, one by one, all defects in our character.

STEP NO. 7-"Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings." The meaning of this step is clear. Prayer-Humility.

1. Prayer. No man can tell another HOW to pray. Each one has, or works out for himself, his own method.

If we cannot pray, we just talk to God and tell Him our troubles.

Meditate-think clearly and cleanly-and ask God to direct our thoughts. Christ said "ask and ye shall receive." What method is simpler-merely "ask."

If you cannot pray ask God to teach you to pray.

2. Humility. This, simply, is the virtue of being ourselves and realizing how small we are in a big world full of its own trouble.

Drop all pretense. We must not be Mr. Big Shot-bragging, boasting. Shed false pride. Tell the simple, plain, unvarnished truth. Act, walk and talk simply. See the little bit of good that exists in an evil man. Forget the little bit of evil that exists in the good man. We must not look down on the very lowest of GOD'S creatures or man's mistakes. Think clearly, honestly, fairly, generously.

3. The shortcomings we ask GOD to remove are the very defects in character that make us drink. The same defects we drink to hide or to get away from.

STEP NO. 11-"Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with GOD as we understood HIM praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out."

1. We pray each night-every night-a prayer of thanks.
2. We pray each morning-every morning-for help and guidance.
3. When we are lonely-confused-uncertain-we pray.

Most of us find it well to:

1. Choose, for each day, a "quite time" to meditate on the program, on your progress in it.
2. Keep conscious contact with GOD and pray to make that contact closer.
3. Pray that our will be laid aside and that God's will direct us.
4. Pray for calmness-quiet-relaxation-rest.
5. Pray for strength and courage to enable us to do today's work today.
6. Pray for forgiveness for yesterday's errors.
7. Ask for HOPE for better things tomorrow.
8. Pray for what we feel we need. We will not get what we "want." We will get what we "need"-what is good for us.

CONCLUSION

We find that no one need have difficulty with the spiritual side of the program. WILLINGNESS-HONESTY and OPEN MINDEDNESS are the ESSENTIALS OF RECOVERY. BUT THESE ARE INDISPENSABLE.

ASK QUESTIONS

No question pertaining to drinking-or stopping drinking-is silly or irrelevant. The matter is too SERIOUS. In A.A. we learn by question and answer.

We learn by exchanging our thought and our experience with each other.

Any question you ask may help someone else. To cover as many questions as possible in the short time available all answers must be limited to three (3) minutes.

GOD grant me the serenity to accept things I cannot change, courage to change things I can, and wisdom to know the difference.

DISCUSSION NO. 3

INVENTORY AND RESTITUTION

The material contained herein is merely an outline of the inventory and restitution steps and is not intended to replace or supplant-

- a. The careful reading and re-reading of the Big Book.
- b. Regular attendance at weekly group meetings.
- c. Study of the Program.
- d. Daily practice of the program.
- e. Reading of approved printed matter on Alcoholism.
- f. Informal discussion with other members.

This instruction is not a short-cut to A.A. It is an introduction-a help-a brief course in the fundamentals.

This meeting covers Steps 4-8-9-10-We will take them in order.

STEP 4-"Make a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves."
The intent and purpose of this step is plain. All alcoholics have a definite need for a good self-analysis—a sort of self-appraisal.

Other people have certainly analyzed us, appraised us, criticized us and even judged us. It might be a good idea to judge ourselves, calmly and honestly. We need inventory because—

1. Either our faults, weaknesses, defects of character—are the cause of our drinking OR
2. Our drinking has weakened our character and let us drift into all kinds of wrong action, wrong attitudes, wrong viewpoints. In either event we obviously need an inventory and the only kind of inventory to make is a GOOD one.

Moreover, the job is up to US. WE created or WE let develop all the anti-social actions that got US in wrong. So WE have got to work it out. WE must make out a list of our faults and then We must do something about it.

The inventory must be four things—

1. It must be HONEST. Why waste time fooling ourselves with a phoney list. We have fooled ourselves for years. We tried to fool others and now is a good time to look ourselves squarely in the eye.
2. It must be SEARCHING. Why skip over a vital matter lightly and quickly. Our trouble is a grave mental disease, confused by screwy thinking. Therefore, we must SEARCH diligently and fearlessly to get at the TRUTH of what is wrong with us—just dig in and SEARCH.
3. It must be FEARLESS. We must not be afraid we might find things in our heart, mind and soul that we will hate to discover. If we do find such things they may be the ROOT of our trouble.
4. It must be a MORAL inventory. Some, in error, think the inventory is a lot of unpaid debts, plus a list of unmade apologies. Our trouble goes much deeper. We will find the root of our trouble lies in—resentments—False Pride—Envy—Jealousy—Selfishness and many other things. Laziness is an important one. In other words we are making an inventory of our character—our attitude toward others—our very way of living. We are not preparing a financial statement. We will pay our bills all right, because we cannot even begin to practice A.A. without HONESTY.

STEP 8—"Made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all." Under this step we will make a list (mental or written) of those we have harmed.

We ask GOD to let His Will be done, not OUR will, and ask for the strength and courage to become willing to forget resentments and false pride and make amends to those we have harmed. We must not do this step grudgingly, or as an unpleasant task to be rid of quickly. We must do it WILLINGLY, fairly and humbly-without condescension.

STEP 9-"Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others."

Here is where we make peace with ourselves by making peace with those we have hurt.

The amends we make must be direct. We must pay in kind for the hurt we have done them.

If we have cheated them we must make restitution.

If we have hurt their feelings we must ask forgiveness from them.

The list of harms done may be long but the list of amends is equally long.

For every "wrong" we have done, there is a "right" we may do to compensate.

There is only one exception. we must develop a sense of justice, a spirit of fairness, an attitude of common sense. If our effort to make amends would create further harm or cause a scandal we will have to skip the "direct amends" and clean the matter up under STEP 5.

HUMILITY

A state of complete humility is very difficult to attain, but the goal is well worth the effort, considering the serenity that is achieved.

DISCUSSION NO. 4

ACTIVE WORK

The material contained herein is merely an outline of the inventory and restitution steps and is not intended to replace or supplant-

- a. The careful reading and re-reading of the Big Book.
- b. Regular attendance at weekly group meetings.
- c. Study of the Program.
- d. Daily practice of the program.

e. Reading of approved printed matter on Alcoholism.

f. Informal discussion with other members.

This instruction is not a short-cut to A.A. It is an introduction-a help-a brief course in the fundamentals.

THIS MEETING COVERS THE TWELFTH STEP

"Having had a spiritual experience as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to other alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs."

This STEP logically separates into 3 parts.

1. The SPIRITUAL EXPERIENCE.

The terms "spiritual experience" and "spiritual awakening" used here and in the book ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS, mean, upon careful reading, that the personality change sufficient to bring about recovery from alcoholism has manifested itself among us in many forms.

Do NOT get the impression that these personality changes, or spiritual experiences, must be in the nature of sudden and spectacular upheavals. Happily for everyone, this conclusion is erroneous.

Among our rapidly membership of thousands of alcoholics such transformations, though frequent, are by no means the rule. Most of our experiences are what the psychologist William James calls the "educational variety" because they develop slowly over a period of time. Quite often friends of the newcomer are aware of the difference long before he is himself.

The new man gradually realizes that he has undergone a profound alteration in his reaction to life; that such a change could hardly have been brought about by himself alone. What often takes place in a few months could seldom have been accomplished by years of self-discipline. With few exceptions our members find that they have tapped an unsuspected inner resource which they presently identify with their own conception of a Power greater than themselves.

Most emphatically we wish to say that any alcoholic capable of honestly facing his problem in the light of our experience can recover provided he does not close his mind to all spiritual concepts. He can only be defeated by an attitude of intolerance or belligerent denial.

We find that no one need have difficulty with the spiritual side of the program. Willingness, Honesty and Open Mindedness are the Essentials of Recovery. But these are indispensable.

2. CARRY THE MESSAGE TO OTHERS.

This means exactly what it says. Carry the message actively. Bring it to the man who needs it. We do it in many ways.

- a. By attending EVERY meeting of our own group
- b. By making calls when asked.
- c. By speaking at Group Meetings when asked.
- d. By supporting our Group financially to make group meetings possible.
- e. By assisting at Meetings when asked.
- f. By setting a good example of complete sobriety.
- g. By owning, and loaning to new men, our own copy of the big A.A. Book.
- h. By encouraging those who find the way difficult.
- i. By serving as an officer or on group committees or special assignment when asked.
- j. By doing all of the foregoing cheerfully and willingly.
- k. We do any or all of the foregoing at some sacrifice to OURSELVES WITH DEFINITE THOUGHT OF DEVELOPING unselfishness in our own character.

3. WE PRACTICE THESE PRINCIPLES IN ALL OUR AFFAIRS.

This last part of the TWELFTH STEP is the real purpose that all of the twelve steps lead to—a new "way of life"; a "design for living." It shows how to live rightly, think rightly and to achieve happiness.

HOW DO WE GO ABOUT IT?

- a. We resolve to live our life, one day at a time—just 24 hours.
- b. We pray each day for guidance that day.

++++Message 772. AA Timeline - MS Word Document
From: Arthur Sheehan 1/14/2003 6:53:00 PM

Hi AA History Lovers

For those of you who are familiar with Archie M.'s "Timelines in AA History (1864 - present)" - his basic research data has been used as a starting point to develop a Microsoft Word document that is a similar chronology, with expanded narrative and several more reference sources (e.g. Francis Hartigan, Mel B. and Action Items from the General Service Conferences). I did my best to validate each reference source and identify conflicts in the references.

As a courtesy, and respectful thank you, Archie M. has been sent the first do I, Bill. I don't have much serenity either." I was sober by this time maybe sixteen, seventeen years. He said, "Do me a favor. When you get over to Asia, see if you can investigate firsthand, the various religions in Asia. That means Hinduism, Buddhism, and Taoism, and Confucianism and ancestral worship and the whole shebang." And I said, "All right, I'll do it." And he said, "Stay in contact with me and maybe we can find something in those religions. After all, we've taken from William James, we've taken from all the Christian religions. Let's see what these others have."

So I hugged Bill and got on the plane and went to Asia. I had three or four rest and relaxation periods a year but I didn't rest and relax. I was determined to find something that would bring peace and serenity to me. I spent a lot of time in Nepal and in Indonesia. I spent time in India. I went into these places looking, looking, looking for serenity. I spent two or three years just driving to find out something. I tried meditation, I read the Bhagavad Gita, the Vedas-everything. I went to an ashram on the southeast coast of India, run by a very famous guru and saint. There were about a hundred and fifty East Indians there. I was the only Westerner and they welcomed me. I wore a dhoti-that's a white skirt that men wear-and I wore one like the rest of them did. We all ate on the ground on great big banana leaves over a yard long. There would be food on the banana leaves and you'd make it into a ball with your right hand and throw it into your mouth. There were no knives or forks at all, so I did what they did. I didn't like the taste very much but I did it.

I happened to be there at the time of the Feast of dewali. Dewali is like our time of Easter; It's the time of renewal. We were awakened on the early morning of Dewali around two o'clock. This ashram was located at the base of a mountain known as Arunachal. Now Arunachal in Hindi means sun, and the myth goes that one of the gods, Rama, lives inside of this mountain.

We were told we had to walk around the base of this mountain-which was a ten mile walk-and as we walked, we were yelling to Rama. If you do it in a very firm and believing way, it's said that Rama will come up and wave at you and bless you. I was there, and I did it. We walked around and we were yelling "Rama, Rama, Rama" hoping that Rama would come up and bless us all. They all walked in their bare feet. I didn't, I wore my shoes. Gosh, I was tired. But I walked all night long, the whole distance.

After that event, I came back to my little apartment in Saigon, ready to return to my medical work. I was so beaten because I'd been driving and searching and clenching my fists for almost three years(and I kept writing to Bill about all this, you know). And I came into my apartment and I suddenly collapsed down onto the floor. I lay there breathing kind of heavily and I said to myself, "Oh to hell with serenity, I don't care if it ever comes." And I meant it. And do you know what happened? All of a sudden the craving to find serenity utterly evaporated-and there it was. Serenity. The trouble was the search . . . looking out there for what was right here.

You know, we only have this given second. There's always now. Once I realized that, serenity became mine. Now-I'm speaking about emotions-I haven't sought one single thing since that day because it's all right here. I often say to people at meetings. "You're trying to find peace of mind out there. I don't blame you, but it isn't out there. It's here. Right here."

Now do I think there is a supreme being, a God? Sure I do. Of course. But do I have any religious beliefs? No. Religion demands that you do certain things and my life in AA isn't like that. AA is a very loose-Jointed organization. People say there is only one way to work the program. That's crazy. We talk about the "suggested" Steps, which are guides to recovery, not absolutes. Chapter five of the Big Book says "no one among us has been able to maintain anything like perfect adherence to these principles." If we had all the members of AA standing here, everyone would have a different idea what AA is all about. Bill's idea was different from Dr. Bob's, yours will be different from mine. And yet they're all based on one thing and that is: don't drink, and use the Twelve Steps in your own way.

dear HistoryLovers,
I haven't posted anything in a while. Worked this up to send to that collection of Group Histories at Silkworth.Net that was mentioned in a previous post. But thought I'd also post the information here.

["1170" Yonge Street]
Toronto's Early AA Refuge

Joe C., 55 years sober, remembers 1170 Yonge Street vividly, "across from Summerhill station liquor store." Formerly of the Willowdale Group, Joe now attends the Sunday Morning Men's Meeting. He remains active as a certified (Minnesota) Addiction Counselor.

"1170 was our only social gathering place and safety net between 1944 and 1949." Joe reports. "Alcoholics were totally ostracized: hated by police, the medical profession, and our families. We concentrated on our 12 Steps and Big Book, clinging together. 1170 brought us joy because we had a place to go.

"We clung to each other: 15 of Canada's 25 AAs. Every evening I went to 1170, afraid I'd drink. A greasy spoon nearby was friendly to us. Also, a MacPherson Avenue boarding house always saved a bed for someone desperate.

"The 1944 monthly rent was $50 - Bruce M. always paid the difference personally if our donations were insufficient.

"Today, speakers select spectacular drunkalogue anecdotes. Feelings are important, how one manages to overcome fears and anxieties. Once, I hadn't seen a show in six months. I reached the box office, bought my ticket, then returned to 1170, feeling in jeopardy - only 1170 was safe. Meetings were Thursday evening and Sunday afternoon. Otherwise, always open, permanent coffee."

Joe remembers that during 1944-49, 1170 was both office and social address. "In 1949 0 actually signaling AA's healthy expansion in society - some of us left 1170, called 'deserters', for meetings in St. James Cathedral parish hall. We'd played cards at 1170, then the office became York, Bay, Gerrard Street, and so on.

"My sponsor, Freddy A., the most God-loving atheist I ever met, was always there to greet, answer phones, sponsor, never thinking of payment for his limitless desire to serve.

"We men in 1946 felt we could get away with anything, even arrogance with our first woman AA, Dorothy P., as if her stigma could be worse than ours. How can new AAs imagine the climate of those early AA days?"

North Toronto Group To Move
After 55 Years...

I first came to the North Toronto Group Tuesday, May 2, 1972. I was twenty-five years old, three days sober, angry, depressed, unsure, shaking, bankrupt, friendless, unemployable, and very scared. That evening I was introduced to a host of kind drunks who were to impact on my life. I would never be the same again.

These were the people who taught me about alcoholism, its insidiousness, and a program of recovery from this life-threatening disease. Many I met that evening have long since passed on, but their legacy remains.

North Toronto's first meetings were in members' homes. Soon, the popularity of this north-end meeting forced the members to seek a permanent location. Some time in late 1946 and early 1947 the Relocation Committee made a verbal arrangement with the administration of St. George's United Church on Duplex Avenue, to hold their weekly Tuesday open and Friday closed meetings.

This arrangement has never been interrupted until now.

St. George's has embarked on a program of updating, renovating, and expanding their facility to create a space to meet the pastoral challenges of the Twenty-first Century. Heady stuff - but a sacrifice. All groups using the building must vacate by the end of June for a two-year construction period. For drunks, this is an eternity.

Informed in March, we formed the 2001 Relocation Committee.

Crisis usually brings out the best in people. For the first time in many years we at North Toronto felt our very existence threatened. The Traditions, though, assured us we had a path to follow if we were willing to use it. The group was determined to keep North Toronto open and alive for those alcoholics yet to come, just as it had been open for us.

We are happy to announce the North Toronto Group will be moving for the next couple of years to Grace Church on-the-Hill in the heart of Forest Hill (corner of Russell Hill and Lonsdale), commencing July 3. Our meetings will continue to be Tuesdays and Fridays at 8:00 pm.

Fifty-five years is a long time to live in one house. St. George's has served the North Toronto Group well. Moving is always emotional. However we've all learned that change is also good. As a group we are excited, encouraged, and grateful for this new lease on life. Thank you, Eglinton/St. George's and thank you, Grace Church on-the-Hill.

Glenview Group at 55

"While it has changed rooms...the same southeast stairs have been used for 55 years."

Shortly after the North Toronto Group was started, members felt a need for a formal discussion meeting. They found a church basement nearby and the Glenview Discussion Meeting was born in 1946. This was a closed discussion meeting to which an alcoholic had to be sponsored. In those days, only the open meetings were published.

Many a long-timer remembers their early days at the Glenview Discussion Meeting.

The meeting has always been an open topic discussion, based on the meetings described in the Big Book. Indeed, the preamble to the meeting is taken directly from the Big Book.

The meeting has always gathered in Glenview Presbyterian Church. While it has changed rooms occasionally, the same southeast stairs have been used for 55 years.

First-time visitors to Glenview are surprised to find tablecloths and the tradition of coffee being served to members. Fine china was used in the early days. These days the group has downgraded to mugs, but still serves the coffee - caf and de-caf - tea, and herbal tea. Being served is heartening to the down and out alcoholic.

Somewhere along the line, the meeting became a group - probably around the time Intergroup was born. The group/meeting has never had a historian, so while various stories have been passed along, many things have been lost in time - including the actual start-up date. Betty D. remembers that it was started in 1946 - ten years before she came to AA.

Historically, Glenview has few members, but has a large roster of regular attendees who gladly participate in the service needed to put on the meeting. It seems to be the tradition that someone takes on the job of opening up for long periods of time. Earl set the meeting up for 15 years - even at times when attendance was small, indeed. "Some nights," he told us recently, "I'd drive in from Brampton or somewhere, open and make the coffee, then sit and read my Big Book until it was time to pour the coffee out and go home." Others have taken on the job for five or more years at a stretch. Currently, Gregg H., Welcome Group, has opened up the meeting for three years. "It's an important part of my sobriety," says Gregg.

"Glenview was an important part of my getting sober in the sixties," says Dan McK., Half Century of AA Group. He remembers coming for the sandwiches at first. Today, cookies are served.

On Monday, September 17, the Glenview Discussion Group is celebrating 55 years of continuous service to the still suffering alcoholic. In keeping with 55 years of tradition, the meeting will be an open topic discussion meeting with a suggested topic of gratitude. Members and regular attendees are planning a big spread, hoping that all those who found sobriety at Glenview over the years will attend.

Glenview Discussion Group, 8:00 pm, Glenview Presbyterian Church, 1 Glenview Avenue, corner of Yonge and Glengrove, two lights south of Lawrence. Come and join the fun!

55 Years for The Beaches!

On December 10, the Beaches Group will be celebrating its 55th Anniversary.

In December 1947, two AAs, who lived in the Beach, held the first meeting in a Queen St. East church. Ten years later, the group moved down the street to Bellefair United Church, opposite Kew Gardens, and then stayed there.

Plans for the 55th Anniversary are underway for its regular open meeting, on Tuesday, December 10, 8:00 pm. All are welcome!

Green P. parking is available on Lee Avenue, east of the church and south of Queen St.

Leaside Celebrates 50 Years
50 Years of Service

The members of the Leaside Group have more than a Millennium celebration to think about in the year 2000. This January 11, the group will mark 50 years of continuous service and the gratitude is just spilling over. The anniversary celebration will be held January 13.

Gene M. has been a member of the group for 32 years. He remembers joining the meeting just before it moved in 1968 to its current location at 670 Eglinton Ave. East, at Hanna Road. Though nearly blind now, Gene travels every Thursday to the church, walks down the two small flights of stairs, and waits to greet his friends by the meeting's kitchen window.

Debbie B., a member of Leaside for the last 10 years, asks Gene if he wants some coffee. Yes and make it black.

Gene remembers his first sponsor, a man by the name of Rusty, who, along with his wife Alice, started the Leaside group on January 11, 1950. Back then it was one of the first few Alcoholics Anonymous meetings in Toronto, recalls Gene.

"I told him I'd be back if I could stay sober for 17 hours," says Gene.

Celebrating 33 years of continuous sobriety in March, Gene's one-year medallion was held at the Hanna Road location.

He remembers the church basement was new and everyone was excited because of the group's new location.

Since then Gene has seen it all. "We've had a lot of new ones (alcoholics). They come and go," he says, adding, "a lot of the old ones are also gone; either they moved away or died."

The Leaside Group members, four in total, are used to that, says Debbie. Though membership may be small at this group, the people who regularly frequent this meeting like the intimacy that is shared there.

Gene says. "I find that's what really keeps us going right now, people from other groups, such as Noreen F., and Jim, who really help us out."

At one point, before Debbie's time, the meeting had 22 members, recalls Gene. "We were never what you call a large group."

"That's my favourite part," says Debbie, "the intimacy."

Gene adds that he doesn't really like large groups. "It's too easy to get lost," he says, but adds quickly that he would never discourage anyone from wanting to join Leaside.

"We stay open because the newcomer keeps coming," Debbie says as she passes Gene his coffee.

That's all anyone can ask after 50 years of service.

Friendly Group Marks 50

On October 8, 1951, the first meeting of the Friendly Group was held in the United Church at the corner of King St. W. and Dunn Ave. On October 15, the group is celebrating 50 years of continuous service in the west end of Toronto.

Pat P., Sunnyside Group, first came to AA in 1951 and remembers going to those first meetings of the Friendly Group in her early sobriety. Nellie A., a founder of the group, "was an AA mother who lugged me to meetings," says Pat. She vividly remembers other founders - Phil B., Mal R., Red R. - all gone now.

The original church had a fire and the group moved to the fire hall at Cowan and Queen Sts., then back to the rebuilt church, then to the Queen Elizabeth Hospital cafeteria, then on to its current location at St. Vincent de Paul R.C. Church on Roncesvalles. There was a six-month period, when the current church was renovating, that the group moved to a school on Bloor St.W., but no one is sure of the exact dates of all these moves.

Agnes G. has belonged to the group all 28 years of her sobriety. "I never thought of another group. I love it," she says.

When she called AA, Stephanie G. was told to go to the Friendly Group. She arrived on her own. Norma, a long-time member, volunteered to be her sponsor and took her to meetings.

Told to stick with one group, "where he felt right at home," Terry H. loves the Friendly Group. He has been a member since January 2, 1977 - his dry date.

George M. had some trouble staying sober in the beginning but he says he has always been a member of this group. "I'm comfortable with the people here," he adds. "There's a very warm hospitality."

"Everyone is so genuine," notes Elinor K., another group member.

This warm and friendly group puts on quite a spread for a medallion, so imagine what they will be serving for their 50th anniversary!

Join them October 15, 8:30 pm, at St. Vincent de Paul Church, 263 Roncesvalles Ave. at High Park Blvd.

St. Clement's Turns 50!

They told me to find a group. They said it would provide me with a place full of people who would understand my problem. they will see beyond my, "FINE" (fouled-up, insecure, neurotic and enjoying it), and help me to stretch beyond my capacity. They will provide me a safe place in which to learn how to tell the truth, trust in my fellow man and know, "I am no longer alone."

What they didn't tell me was that when I joined the St. Clement's Group I would learn how to be part of a family, with its "faults and blunders, its aches and pains," to be a part of something that was neither my responsibility - not rithe - to control. I didn't now that in this group (in this family), I would learn to accept people and myself just as we are. I didn't realize that I would be given a place to celebrate our victories, mourn our defeats, and grieve our losses, such as the loss of our dear friends, Don and Arlene.

There are those giants, upon whose shoulders we rest - Jack H.s and Jim P.s - who built a place for us. The New Generation Group, amalgamated with the St. Clements Group 20 years ago to give birt to our Monday night discussion at Our Lady of Perpetual Help. To all those who have gone before us, we say, "Thank you."

We also say thank you for the foundation of acceptance, during a different kind of Toronto, when many of our members in the gay community were able to find a home at St. Clements's. We are grateful for a place that accepted us, beaten or ountiful, and as one long time member suggested, "...the happiest group in Toronto."

The St. Clements Group invites you to help us celebrate 50 years of service with gratitude for our wins, our losses, and YOU!

Wednesday, September 25, 8 pm, St. Clement's Anglican Church, 59 Briar Hill Avenue at Duplex Avenue off St. Clement's Avenue.

40 Years for Mount Royal

A guest at Harbourslight, Paul H. was mandated to attend AA meetings. Tuesdays and Thursdays he went to the nearby Mount Royal Group. Joan B., a long-time member of the group who died in January, explained the "do" things and told him, "do as you're told." So he did, and joined the group.

Now, 19 months sober, Paul is secretary of the group and a useful citizen - a social worker in the downtown c o r e , working with people just like he use to be.

The Mount Royal Group was founded in July, 1960, and will celebrate 40 years of service to the community on July 18. According to long-time AA member, Dan McK., who attended the group's first meeting, "at a church at Avenue Road and Bloor," one of the founders was Dave C., a Montreal businessman, who, says Jeff S., co-founder of the new Leslie Group and former Mount Royal member, "named it Mount Royal after Montreal." Jeff was a member of the group until 1988 and still has sponsees in the group.

Mount Royal soon moved to the Metropolitan United Church when the Rev. Dr. Little, who was a great friend of AA, was pastor. He was also part of the original AA meetings in the Little Denmark Restaurant back in the 1940's and he welcomed another AA group meeting in his church. The York Group meets there on Thursday nights.

Mount Royal has never kept an archive - an unconfirmed legend says its founding date was the 20th - but the group's tablecloth just says the month and year. Rod I., a 25-year member of the group, remembers this date being celebrated when he first came in as the youngest member at age 28.

Rod noted, "A lot of people start here and then move on to other groups." He stressed how delighted the current group members would be to see graduates of the Mount Royal Group at the 40th anniversary celebrations.

At some point, a discussion meeting was started on Thursday nights. No one today knows when. The site of this meeting has changed over the years, currently at St. Michael's Parish Hall, 66 Bond Street, across from the Cathedral. Like the open meeting, it starts at 6:00 pm.

Because of its location and early start time, the meeting attracts a wide variety of people: business people who work downtown, visitors - both business and tourists - staying in downtown hotels, people in treatment, and dedicated souls who got sober at the Mount Royal Group and have since moved away from the downtown core. The group usually has eight or nine formal members, but 30 to 40 people attend the Tuesday night meeting. A fair number are from treatment and are mandated to come. However, as Rod says, "It wears off on them," and they stay.

The group has a lot of one-year medallions and fewer longer-term ones as many newer AAs move away from the downtown core as they become established in sobriety.

To celebrate 40 years of dedicated group service, attend the Mount Royal Group, Metropolitan United Church Hall, 50 Queen St. E., at the corner of Bond (it's the building in the back of the church), on July 18, at 6:00 pm.

King City Group Celebrates 30 years

It all started in early March 1971, when a sober member of the Richmond Hill Group wouldn't give the key to the meeting place at their church to a chronic "slipper."

Chronic or not, Lincoln took matters into his own hands, went to King City, and started his own group. As the old saying goes, "...with a resentment and a coffeepot..."

With another "slipper" and a sober member by the name of Jack T., the King City Group took shape in a little meeting room at the top of the stairs in All Saint's Anglican Church on Keele Street.

Bill S., long time member of King City says: "I was just coming around at the end of '71 or '72. Keith S. and I were, as they say, kicking the tires and slamming the doors to see what it was all about. Jack and his friend Alex were the foundation. The rest of us took turns staying sober. There were only a few meetings in the area - Keswick, Newmarket, and Bolton. We needed a meeting and those first members, drunk or sober, kept the doors open for the rest of us."

The first woman to join the King City group was Marie B. who recently celebrated 20 years in AA.

Keith S., Danny C., and Bill S. are original members who are still active in carrying the message of Alcoholics Anonymous.

Today, King City Group is alive and thriving with about 75 members. All meetings are well attended and a Tradition meeting is held once a month to keep members abreast of why AA works.

In recognition of 30 years of AA in King City, the group would like to invite everyone to celebrate with us on Monday evening at 8 p.m. on March 19. The group has invited Father Leo B. to speak.

With God's help, we'll still be chugging along 30 years from now.

Breakaway Group Celebrates 30 years

At thirty year's old, you could say the Bayview Group is a long-timer in AA circles.

Started on March 26, 1970, the Bayview Group was a break away meeting started by three Willowdale members: Al B., Jeff S. (now Pine Hills Group) and Julian (now Sheppard Group).

It was the strength and courage of these three founders that has helped Bayview grow and develop its traditional AA values, said current member, Chris B.

"It was the first AA meeting I ever went to and the only group I've ever joined," Chris says.

"All these years I've never changed groups because it's the best group in Toronto," Chris adds with a small chuckle.

Chris, who joined three months after Bayview started, remembers Bayview's humble beginnings with only 10 or 12 people in the basement kitchen of a church.

Today, Bayview has blossomed with over 90 people on its member's list; many of them highly active within AA service.

Traditionally, that's the way Al B. would have liked it - members active in service work.

"Al was quite the AA man," Chris recalls. Always looking to get a person active in service work Al originally introduced the two-speaker system to Bayview.

"Al wanted to give the people that were younger in sobriety a chance to participate, to get active," explains Chris.

Though Chris remembers being shy he too was pressured to stand up in the front of the room and share his experience, strength and hope. "Al would sort of shame you into doing it."

Regardless of the tactics or location changes, the group that was founded on AA dedication and a commitment to service work will be celebrating 30 years of continual service on Sunday, March 26, 2000 at 8:30 pm.

East York Group Celebrates 30 Years

As I was travelling through the east end of the city to attend this particular meeting, I found that I had arrived a good hour early. Scanning the area for a coffee shop (a familiar refuge for any recovering alcoholic), I heard laughter coming from around the corner So I followed the sound and discovered that members of the East York Group were already there, with the doors open, ready to greet any newcomers or fellow AAs at their weekly speaker meeting. Needless to say I didn't need to go to that coffee shop.

A passage in the 'Grapevine' book, "The Home Group: Heartbeat of AA", says "The home group is where the AA member takes the first tiny step into making the support system of Alcoholics Anonymous work ... home groups become the spokes in the big wheel of Alcoholics Anonymous."

Since July 18, 1972, this group, originally called the New East York Group, has adhered to these sentiments by opening its doors to many members over the years. The group will be celebrating 30 years of service on Tuesday, July 23 at 8:00 pm at St. Columbia - All Hallows Church (just east of St. Clair and O'Conner).

Some members, like Milton B., joined the group after moving into the area. Milton joined about three years ago, and the first person to greet him was East York member, Jimmy H. "The first time I came to the East York Group," said Milton, "I was made to feel very welcome, and I've been here ever since. I love this group. There's a lot of love, laughter, and camaraderie."

Milton also tells of the commitment and joy in service that the group demonstrates by attending and supporting service meetings. Some members, like Milton, carry the message of AA into correctional facilities.

Bill L., who joined the group seven years ago, shared his feelings about the group and his understanding of the importance of sponsorship. "We have a real variety of sobriety," Bill says, adding, "When you find a solid group, you find solid sponsorship." In keeping with this idea, the group recently implemented a temporary sponsorship program.

There are more men than women in the East York Group group, but more women have joined recently. Joanne E. says having more male members doesn't bother her because, "We're all good friends and we are here to support each other." She also said that the women at the group have solid sobriety, and this has attracted more women.

Liz V., the group secretary, is relatively new at the group. Liz's enthusiasm for the group was immediate and she's happy doing service at the group level.

Harold M. one of the early members, has been with the group for 26 years. As unofficial group historian, he mentioned that the original location was, "down the street a piece." John M., who, sadly, has passed on, started the group. Harold is very grateful he still belongs to East York and can share his experience with new members.

Perhaps the most poignant comment made about the East York Group came from Gerry H., who had been a member for ten years. He said the program of Alcoholics Anonymous and past and present members of the East York Group, "... saved my life, and I have a lot of gratitude."

Don't miss the opportunity to attend the East York Group's 30th anniversary. They'll surely welcome you (as they did me) into their friendly fold. A sign posted on the podium says it all: "If you are new here, let us know - YOU ARE NO LONGER ALONE."

Parklawn Group: 30 Years and Still Going!!!!

We started life as The Young Peoples Group, and became the Parklawn Group in 1972. At that time there were only three members, Roy K, Gordie H. (deceased), and Brian R. (deceased). Meetings were held St. James Anglican Church on Parklawn.

Attendance was low and many times, in order to pay the rent, members had to dig into their own pockets. Business meetings were held in the members' homes. The Long Branch Group helped support Parklawn in those early days! It was nothing to see eight or ten members of Long Branch here, not just occasionally but every Friday. At times, we didn't know if people belonged to Parklawn or Long Branch.

In the 80.s, most members held at least one position, either in the Group or at Intergroup.

We also had a lot of women join this Group. We had as many as eight at one time. Our Group grew and, in the mid-80.s, we had 27 members.

Around that time we were having problems at St James Church and had to move to St. Mark's in Dec .86 until .94 when that church asked us to move, as they needed the space. Again we moved further north on Parklawn to the Presbyterian Church on a week-to-week basis .til we found a new location.

Finally that church could no longer accommodate us and we voted to close down the meeting until another church was found. Brian J. sent out many letters to churches. Dick. C and Doug R. talked with ministers trying to locate another church. Three months passed; then, in June 1994, we received a letter from the Humbercrest United Church reporting they had a meeting room available on Friday nights, and so here we are!!

We'd considered changing our meeting to another night, but Friday was very important to most of us at Parklawn and even members from other groups relied on our meeting to end their week or start the weekend!

Over the years this Group survived many problems of low membership and low funds, but we hung on. When we moved to Humbercrest United, we were down to four members, Dick C. Doug R. Erin B. & Brian J. All worked desperately to get this Group back up and running, and without the support from the members of Trial & Error and Long Branch Groups we would not have survived.

So many people have passed through our doors, and as I sit here, names and faces race through my mind. Though I know some have passed on, and some have gone out, I wonder how the rest are doing.

Although our Seventh Tradition is small compared to some Groups, we manage to pay the rent, buy cakes for anniversaries, support GTA Intergroup and General Service, and even have some for the church at Christmas. It is only the continued support by members from other groups that has kept us going...

They say in AA, if a group is needed it will last; if it's not it will fail!

I thank God it was needed, cause I, for one, needed it. This group changed my life . it gave me a life! And for that I.ll be eternally grateful. I only hope that 30 years from now this Group will still be going and that I will still be a member.

25 Years for Service Meeting

The Scarborough General Hospital Service Meeting started November 8, 1977.

Founders include Tony T., Duncan Donald M., Jack T., Joe S., all of whom continued coming to the meetings until their deaths from causes other than alcohol. Bill M, Unionville Group, was present at the first meeting and continues to attend today.

Roy St. C. came to the second meeting as a hospital patient. Soon, Murray D., now deceased after 44 years of sobriety, became a regular - coming early to set up and make coffee.

the legendary Tommy H., Unionville Group, was also there at the beginning continuing his support until his death in 1999. His wife, Betty, an employee of the hospital, supported and facilitated the meeting being there. She still attends and lends her support where needed. She helped get reduced-cost parking for those attending AA.

For ages, Bob, also of the Unionville Group, co-ordinated the weekly set-up with a number of faithful AAs, now mostly getting on in years. Recently the torch was passed to me, Terry G., Scarborough Group.

It is a true honour for me. It was the first AA meeting I attended when I started my journey in recovery and service. It has played a great part in carrying the message to the still suffering alcoholics on the 10th (Psychiatric) floor of the hospital.

Many fellow AAs started their journey at the Scarborough General Hospital Meeting. Over the past year, it has amazed me how many speakers attended their first meeting as a patient.

Part of the service offered by members includes escorting patients down from the 10th floor, as well as setting up, making coffee, and putting on the meeting.

The regular meeting at the hospital (located on the northwest corner of McCowan and Lawrence) is in the Crockford classroom on the main floor. No rent is charged but the meeting makes an annual donation to the Scarborough General Hospital Foundation.

Originally a discussion meeting, the format soon changed to its current style. Three readings, then a speaker shares his / her experience, strength and hope for 25 minutes, followed by a 15 minute question period. This format has been found very suitable for a hospital meeting.

Last year, the regular members adopted the policy of giving out desire chips to those new and just coming back. Also, a Big Book is given to someone attending their first meeting. Many Big Books have been given out to patients with the hope of planting the seed.

Over the last two years, attendance has dropped. The regulars are doing everything in their power to keep the meeting alive and well. Groups in the surrounding area have been asked to support the meeting - volunteering to set up, supply the Chairperson, and find the spaker. Pine Hills, As Bill Sees It, and Keep It Simple are some of the groups taking on a month at a time. More groups are needed to volunteer. There are still four months that need to be filled. This is a great way to get newcomers involved in service.

The Scarborough General Hospital Meeting is celebrating 25 years of continuous service on November 5, at 7:00 pm, in the Main Auditorium. The speaker is Mildred F., Rox Glen Traditional Group.

Please come and support the 25th Anniversary Meeting - and feel the spirit of the many that have passed on, but left the message to us.

Keep It Simple Group Celebrates 20 years

In my 15th month of sobriety, four members of my first home group - Doug T. (now deceased), Florence E., Wally, and Doris - asked me to join them in starting a discussion group because there weren't many discussions available in our area.

The name Keep It Simple was chosen to commemorate the last discussion between Dr. Bob and Bill W. We chose the Heron Park Community Centre as a central Scarborough location, starting with a Thursday night closed discussion group. However, as new members celebrated milestones, we added an open meeting on Sundays.

Our first meeting was November 6, 1981 and looking back today, I can't express my gratitude enough for the many miracles we've seen.

On August 5 of this year, we temporarily moved out of Heron Park Community Centre to make way for renovations. We've been meeting temporarily at the Port Union Community Centre, but we'll be back in our newly rebuilt old home, Heron Park, located off Manse Road, in time for our anniversary celebration - complete with cake and refreshments - on November 11, 2001.

My gratitude goes out to the four members who helped start the group. It's been a wonderful journey in my 21 years of sobriety. We all look forward to many more years of carrying the message.

[Scarborough Centenary Group]
Service is Key

Way back in the mid to late seventies, members of the Unionville Group were unsuccessfully trying to start AA service meetings at the three Scarborough hospitals. Co-operation on the part of the hospitals was not there. Then along came Tony T., Saturday Night Gratitude Group. He managed to talk his way into both Scarborough Centenary and Scarborough General.

Closed discussion meetings started at both hospitals in October and November 1978. For details about the Scarborough General Meeting, see the October 2002 BETTER TIMES. [see below] (For interest, the Scarborough Grace Hospital finally allowed an AA service meeting in the mid-nineties.)

Also a member of Saturday Night Gratitude Group, Lois F. joined Tony for the first meeting at Scarborough Centenary. She had just celebrated her two-year anniversary and was getting active in service. Local Scarborough groups supported the meeting in those early days.

By the early eighties the meeting was thriving. On January 5, 1983, it became a group, known as the Scarborough Centenary Group. Lois was there as a founding member with four others, and is still a member today.

There are lots of opportunities for service at this group. Patients are always brought down from the appropriate floors. The group has an archives and set guidelines for the running of the meeting. Participation in the wider AA community is encouraged. Len D., and other members of the Scarborough Centenary Group started the annual dance in support of the Regent Park Christmas Day dinner. See page 7.

Over the years, a Thursday open speaker meeting has been added. On Mondays, the open topic discussion meeting is now an open meeting. There is also a Beginner.s Room on Monday nights.

While there is a large turnover of faces due to being in a hospital, there are many long-term familiar faces as well. Notable are Reg P., who has made the coffee since he joined in .87, Julie L., who is very active with the Beginner.s Room . a member since .88, and too many others to mention here.

Many spouses also make regular attendance a must. In particular is the widow of Jack J. They started coming to the group in '83. He died seven years ago, but his wife continues to come, in her wheelchair, and to offer upbeat support.

On January 9, 2003, the Scarborough Centenary Group will be celebrating 20 years as a group and 25 years of service. All are invited to attend, especially people who came to the group in the early days of their sobriety,

The meeting will not be in the usual meeting place. It will be in the Education Theatre, Floor #1, Margaret Birch Wing, Rouge Valley Centenary Hospital. Use the main door. Take the north elevator down to floor 1 and follow the signs.

Following the meeting, there will be a buffet dinner in the usual meeting room on the 6th floor in the Occupational Therapy Room. The meeting starts at 7:00 pm.

Parking vouchers are available at the meeting for attendees. With voucher the parking is only $1.

Flourishing After Five Years

The Beginners Meeting takes place at three o'clock on Saturday afternoons at Our Lady of Lourdes R. C. Church on Sherbourne Street just north of Wellesley. Our first meeting, at the Church of St. Simon the Apostle on Bloor Street East, was held on November 7, 1997. At that first meeting there were three AA members: one beginner, who no longer lives in Toronto, Bob I., Rox Glen Traditional Group, and myself, St. Jamestown Group.

Together we waited.

Quite quickly others came to us. Today our attendance varies between ten and 25, usually around 20. Our talk is focused on what first brought me to AA. and what brought me to this meeting. We hear honest and

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Al-Anon Resolution of Gratitude

Hi, History Lovers:

I believe there have been at least three resolutions by the General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous acknowledging the contributions of the Al-Anon Family Groups. The one from 1969 by the 19th Conference is in "Guidelines - Relationship Between A.A. and Al-Anon." Could someone point me to the text of all three? Here is what is in the "Guidelines."

Thanks. Tom En2ger

A.A.'s Debt of Gratitude to Al-Anon

The following resolution of gratitude to the fellowship of the Al-Anon Family Groups was unanimously approved by the 1969 General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous.

The delegates of this 19th General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous, meeting in official session in New York City, this 25th day of April, 1969, do hereby declare:

WHEREAS, it is the desire it is the desire of this conference to the relationship between Alcoholics Anonymous and the Al-Anon Family Groups, and

WHEREAS, it is the further desire of this Conference to acknowledge A.A.'s debt of gratitude to the Al-Anon Family Groups, therefore

BE IT RESOLVED, that Alcoholics Anonymous recognizes the special relationship which it enjoys with the Al-Anon Family Groups, a separate but similar fellowship. And be it further resolved that Alcoholics Anonymous wishes to recognize, and hereby does recognize, the great contribution which the Al-Anon Family Groups have made and are making in assisting the families of alcoholics everywhere.

understand what her use of the term "by standing vote" signifies. Perhaps access to a 1952 Conference Report might shed some light on the matter.

The wording of the 1969 General Service Conference resolution in M-39 does not indicate a reaffirmation of any prior resolution.

3)

I could not find any mention of a resolution of gratitude to AFG in the Final Report of the 2001 General Service Conference (an Area web site speaks for the Area not the Conference).

There have probably been countless individual expressions of gratitude to AFG (mine among them).

But the count of General Service Conference resolutions of gratitude to AFG still seems to be one.

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] AI-Anon Resolution of Gratitude

Hi, History Lovers:

I have the text of the 1969 Resolution of Gratitude because it is in the "Guidelines." I remember an older edition of the "Guidelines" that said the 1969 Resolution of Gratitude "reaffirmed" one from one of the first General Service Conferences. Tony sent me this which confirmed the 1952 Resolution but I still don't have the text:

A real reference:

[from "Lois Remembers" pg 177]

The Second AA General Service Conference met in April 1952 and passed a resolution by standing vote, thanking those who had fostered the AI-Anon Family Groups. We were quite moved and very grateful.

One A.A. area website had a Resolution of Gratitude to AI-Anon on the occasion

Memo From The Editor: the name of the teller of this story is purposely omitted. He says his friends and former associates will recognize him. To others his name does not matter. But if your interest is not merely casual, if you or a friend or a member of your family need his help, write to The Alcoholic Foundation, P.O. Box 459, New York 17, New York You will be put in direct touch with him or with the nearest Alcoholics Anonymous group.

In the fall of 1938, I was working in a small radio station in Plattsburg, New York. On a cold night in November I had chills and fever. I sent for a doctor who told me I had incipient pneumonia.

Some time during the night, delirious, I fell down the stair well of my rooming house and smashed my hip. I was in the hospital for three-months and when I came out I knew I was crippled for life. But none of that annoyed me as much as the fact that some well-meaning ambulance attendant had given me a drink of whisky before my late-night arrival at the hospital. Because they could smell it on my breath, I was booked as drunk...

Now I'll tell you the real story of what happened. I had been sent to Plattsburg by some friends who wanted to get me out of New York City. I had been making a mess of myself in New York, cadging money for drinks. So my friends found a job for me in Plattsburg. At $25 a week.

I had been earning nearly ten times that much; $25 a week was pin money. So-you guessed it-I hit the bottle a little harder. On the night I fell down the stair well I wasn't delirious. I was drunk and I fell over the bannisters.

The ambulance attendant who gave me the drink was only doing the humanitarian thing. When you've got an alcoholic on your hands the first rule is to give him the alcohol he seems to need. You leave it to the doctors and nurses to sober him up.

But I fooled the doctors and nurses during the three months that I was confined in the hospital. At least I thought I did, which is the same thing to an alcoholic. The first day there I managed to get a quart of rye. There are usually people in hospitals who think they are being kind in smuggling booze to you.

When I was nearing the end of my stay my nurse came and sat on my bed. "Of course you won't admit it," she said, "But you're an alcoholic. Why don't you do something about it?"

"Of course I'm not an alcoholic," I said. "I've simply had a little bad luck."

She whipped out of the room with a crisping of her starched skirts. I reached under the covers of my bed. I took a long pull at a pint I had hidden there. Stupid fool! Me, an alcoholic!

Let's go back a little. I started what was then called social drinking a few years after college. I got married. I entered radio publicity. In 1927 I went with National Broadcasting Company and was soon promoted. I was going great guns.

At the same time I was doing more drinking. At home I drank only when we had guests, though I always found the need to have three or four extra snorts on the side. I was beginning to fall into a drinker's pattern, but I didn't know it.

Then my wife left me. She took my two sons with her. This startled me, because she said that she left me because I drank too much. Ridiculous! Why, I only drank as every other businessman did. But she left me nevertheless. Within two years I was married again. This time I was going to show the world, particularly my first wife.

I showed her all right. I was now living in a 14-room house in a swanky Connecticut suburb; sitting pretty. I left the National Broadcasting Company to go with a famous advertising firm. I did a lot of traveling and naturally I did a lot of drinking on my trips. How, otherwise, could you entertain the customers? Ah, how otherwise!

Eventually I was eased out of that firm and it never occurred to me why. They gave me a thousand reasons but not the real reason, which was that I couldn't hold my liquor. Other men could, but I couldn't

I was then elected president of an agency specializing in radio and I felt pretty good. But strangely enough, I was eased out of that company also. Then I went with another big advertising agency. It was about six months before I was eased out of there.

When I lost that job I had been married, the second time, about seven years. My job was gone but I was confident that on the following Monday I would start on a much better one; all I had to do was say the word. So I proceeded to go home and to announce to my wife that on this week end I was really going on a binge. I guess I did. I don't remember.

On Monday I woke up in a hospital. This was the Norwich State Hospital for the Insane, at Norwich, Connecticut. I explained to a nurse that I had been drinking a little too much and that my wife had sent me here for a couple of weeks to sober up.

"Two weeks!" said the nurse. "Do you know you've been in here for two years?"

I was, too. My wife apparently had been more fed up than I realized. She had signed the papers committing me. The first time she came she was sorry, but it was not until five months later that we were able to convince the State of Connecticut that I should be let out. One reason for the aplomb that got me out was that in this hospital, try as I might, I couldn't sneak a drink.

When at last I got out I found that my wife had gone to live with her parents and she had taken the children with her. She had disposed of practically everything we owned in our beautiful 14-room house. What did I do? You guessed it. You're going to guess it so often that I'll now try to give you a listing of the hospitals I was in - for excessive drinking - after that.

Plattsburg, with which I started this story. Broken hip.

Metropolitan Hospital, Welfare Island, New York. Delirium tremens.

Bellevue Hospital, New York, more than a dozen times. This was in the psychopathic or "drunk" ward, naturally.

And, oh yes, before any of this started there was a stretch at New York's Medical Center, where I paid $25 a day for room and keep for a so-called "nervous breakdown." I did not realize that it was alcohol that caused my "nervousness." I never had the guts to put the blame where it belonged.

But let's go back to the time I left Norwich. I crawled out of there with my tail between my legs and I found my wife had left and I went on a series of benders. No wife could tell me where to get off!

I left Connecticut. New York was better; there were more people to borrow from. I still had "friends" at NBC and other places. I used to hang around NBC at five in the afternoon, waiting for people to come out. I put the bee on all of them: five dollars today, two dollars tomorrow, three the next day.

I always tried to borrow at least two dollars. One dollar for my room in a cheap hotel, the other dollar for the half-pint that would put me to sleep. On at least one occasion I found myself sleeping on the grass with a 25-cent bottle of sherry in my hand. I say I found myself. Actually a policeman found me and told me to get going. Although it was late September I was well-dressed (so I thought) in a filthy white Palm Beach suit and a pair of white shoes that were mostly black.

"I'm no drunken bum," said I to the cop resentfully.

To myself I was still the important personage who for years had been a prominent executive. I knew that if people would stop picking on me I would be back on my feet tomorrow. Always tomorrow.

Then my friends ganged up and sent me to Plattsburg. When I got out of the Plattsburg Hospital, on crutches, I fondly expected my wife to feel sorry for me and let me come home. She didn't. She was done with me.

I thought my sister was done with me too. But my sister, bless her heart, wasn't done with me. She knew a man, the brother of a friend of hers. She sent him to see me.

He told me the story of his life, which was much like mine. He asked me to go to the home of a man in Brooklyn who had gathered around him a dozen other men and women who also had stories like mine. They came for me in a car; they practically carried me up the steps to my first meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous.

I walked in on a group of 30 or 40 who looked happy and sober. I thought they were a bunch of holier-than-thou's who would try to make me over into their own pattern. But these people offered me friendship without criticism. They came and got me each week, and I finally came to understand that they had a set of principles which, if I followed them, would enable me to lead a better life. But I still kept my tongue in my cheek. They could call themselves alcoholics. I never would, because I wasn't one.

This was just six years before I finally admitted in an Alcoholics Anonymous meeting, humbly and sincerely, that I too was an alcoholic.

The contact with these people did something to me. I got back into the National Broadcasting Company. I stayed cold sober for about two years. Then for a few years I drank, but very carefully. I managed to keep my job; as a matter of fact, I again went up the scale very rapidly. An advertising agency took me away from NBC and I thought that was a feather in my cap.

I married again, for the third time. I now felt so sure of myself that I went on a toot. My wife and I had some arguments about the fact that I was drinking again. I told her not to be silly, that I had the thing under complete control. She was a trained nurse. She knew all the symptoms. She simply moved faster than the others and saved herself a lot of grief. At the end of five weeks she left me. For good. That was my third strike.

I was very sorry for myself and-you've guessed it again. Presently I became unconscious with the D.T.'s for ten days. The advertising agency was swell to me, but eventually its patience wore out and I was fired again. Because I didn't have any money left I was sent to the public hospital on Welfare Island.

God knows how I came out of it, but I did. God knows how I got a job, but I did. I got a job with one of the biggest of all advertising agencies, and I thumbed my nose at all my critics. This time I would show them! I showed them by going on a bender. Needless to say I lost this job too.

I was then being sent to the psychopathic ward at Bellevue Hospital. The authorities finally got tired of seeing me there, where they would sober you up for five days and then turn you loose, only to have you reappear again. If you were a repeater long enough there was still another fate in store for you-the Rockland State Hospital, where if you were once elected to membership it might be good for life. The grapevine at Bellevue told me I was going to be sent to Rockland. That scared me stiff.

I needed a cigarette; I didn't have one; I didn't even have the money for one. There was a visitor sitting by the bed next to mine. He was smoking, so I put on my best smile and bummed a cigarette from him. Then I entered into small talk by way of talking to him. Was this his first visit to Bellevue?

He said, casually, "I'm just a member of A.A. This is my day to visit patients."

"You mean you're a member of Alcoholics Anonymous?"

"Sure." He grinned at me.

I was scared. Moreover, the truth had been beginning to dawn on me-the truth that I was an alcoholic. It had been coming very painfully-but it was coming.

I stammered, "I once-well, I wasn't exactly a member, but I went to a lot of meetings. I mean of A.A. Do you think-?"

The man smiled. "Take it easy, son-you can't do it all by yourself." Then he dumped a pack of cigarettes on my bed and walked out.

That same day five different members of Alcoholics Anonymous came to call on me. They talked. I listened. Eventually they got me out of Bellevue. I have never been back there-and I have never taken a drink since.

I started attending A.A. meetings again, but now, instead of being in a private house in Brooklyn, they were held in a big building in Manhattan, with bowling alleys and pool tables, a cafeteria and rooms for bridge and poker. Instead of three or four dozen people hanging around there now were hundreds.

But it wasn't this material progress of the A.A. movement that got me. It was literally a spiritual awakening. Maybe I can't explain it but I'll try.

I took an honest fearless inventory of myself-the first of my life. I became willing to have my faults removed, instead of trying, always futilely, to remove them myself. I became humble enough to ask help from a higher power. Yes, God, though you don't have to believe in God: just a higher power, the

We just returned a few hours ago from taking part in a magnificent event -- the 3-day celebration, in Holguin, Cuba, of the 10th anniversary of the founding of AA in Cuba. I went with my wife, Ruth, and Bruce K. from San Francisco, the guy who rounded up seven of us in the first place to go to Havana in Jan. 1993.

This visit was quite an eye-opener. From our first meeting on 1/18/93 with six Cuban alcoholics, all of whom subsequently went out and drank, there are now 160 groups throughout the country and an estimated 3,000 active AA members. Full general service structure with staffed office in Havana, trustees, districts, areas; central offices in all the larger cities, the works! 400 members attended the 3-day event in Holguin. Unbelievably moving experience.

During the all-day sessions at the 10th Anniversary event in Holguin, Cuba, last Saturday, a Cuban woman rounded up my wife, the other American woman with us, and around twenty other Cuban women, and said, "C'mon, let's have a meeting of just us women!" They went into a part of the big church where the conference was being held, and shooed out a bunch of guys, then they spent over 3 hours in what turned out to be Cuba's very first women's AA meeting!

Ruth tells me that during the meeting, two of those present came out as gay, saying that it was the first time in their lives they had felt comfortable talking about it in a group of any kind. One of them had mentioned it once in an AA meeting, and was pretty much scolded by the men present. Cuba is what Americans would consider quite "backward" when it comes to issues of gender and sexual orientation. Based on previous experience, I have a feeling that women-only AA meetings may take hold in Cuba.

Sort of on the same subject, we were invited to a private home that night by a friend of the oldest AA in Cuba (ten years), who said "We've killed a large pig and want you to come help us eat it." Who could turn down such an invitation <G>? When we arrived, said porker was duly spread-eagled on a large table, perfectly roasted and delicious, and we shared it with a couple of dozen Cuban AAs. One of them was Matica, the first woman to get sober in AA in Cuba, whom I had met in a hospital in Havana in June of 1993, and who claimed I was the first person she had ever met who was alcoholic and talked to her on an equal basis! Wow, what a feeling!

For those who erroneously think Cuba represses religion, the

Alcoholics Anonymous

No Booze But Plenty of Babes

Some AA's go to meetings to hear how to stay dry. The others-well, many have discovered their club is a faster spot for a pick-up than the best saloon in town!

An Ozarks mountain boy who had a hankering to write before he ever saw a typewriter, Homer H. Shannon graduated from the University of Missouri and set out on a newspapering, free-lance writing career interrupted only by service in both World Wars. Like many another excellent scribes before and after him, Shannon has occasionally looked at life too heartily from the bottom of a highball glass and recently gave AA a whirl, as a corrective measure. His disillusionment is told with wry (or rye) humor in this penetrating report.

By HOMER H. SHANNON

The twentieth Anniversary of the founding of Alcoholics Anonymous-most remarkable hoax of this generation-will be celebrated next December. Tens of thousands of cups of coffee will be downed by the membership of this noble order of sometime drunks in honor of the event. And, no doubt, a considerable number of the brothers and sisters will be so inspired by the historic occasion that they'll take off on a prolonged bender.

The AA hoax not only has proved its durability, but it is especially notable for the aura of sanctity it has assumed in the minds of do-gooders and otherwise level-headed citizens who have swallowed-with or without chaser-its brand of fairy tale. These include ministers of the gospel, social workers, municipal judges, personnel executives of great industrial enterprises and even a scattering of medical and scientific gents who know the bottle babies by reputation.

Love to Be Humbugged-by a Pious Fraud

Such good souls love to be humbugged-as long as it's a good, clean, pious fraud. They'd probably be horrified to know that many an AA still drops around to the club house for the sole purpose of picking up a date, rather than to boost his new-found and oh-so-temporary enmity towards John Barleycorn. It's true, though. I can give you some proof in my own experiences and a whole lot more from what other AA's have told me.

But we'll get into that later. First, let's take a look at AA's proud claim that it has accumulated a membership of 150,000 around the world. At least that's the figure put out by the zealous boys who run the show. No one has ever seen the membership books because there just aren't any. It's Alcoholics Anonymous remember.

But even if there are 150,000 who stay sober long enough to be called members, it's scarcely a drop in the family beer bucket. In this country alone there are about 4,000,000 alcoholics, periodics and problem drinkers. They are all fit subjects for AA, even though a real AA makes it important that he is an alcoholic, not a namby-pamby second or third-grade addict.

The AA version of the long series of cults dedicated to the salvation of over-eager tipplers was the brainchild of a fellow named Bill Wilson. It isn't quite cricket to use last names of alkys who affiliate. But Bill has been making speeches around the country for so many years, it can't be much of a secret his last name is Wilson. With that exception, I'll play the game according to rule and won't mention out loud the names of any other members I know. From here on it's Bill and Jane and Harry and Lucy.

While I was a member, I toured meetings of half a dozen groups scattered about the various boroughs of New York. That's regulation. It affords a greater variety of horror stories than if you stuck to home base. At every meeting three or four speakers—male and female—tell in sordid detail how low they had sunk while clutching the bottle and how high they've climbed since they relaxed their grip on the foul-smelling thing.

By visiting various groups, you not only get to hear more and better stories, you also meet more and sometimes better people of both sexes. If you are a man, it's especially nice to meet and better people of the female sex, since your wife probably isn't a member of AA.

My home group was in Brooklyn, a few blocks from where I live. Naturally, I know that gang a lot better than the others. The chapter boasts a club house over a garage—open every evening, plus afternoons on Saturday and Sunday. At one end of the long room is a "bar" where you can buy a good cup of coffee for a dime. Heavy drinkers are given to plenty of coffee when they are off the hard stuff, in or out of AA. There are comfortable chairs and divans scattered about. Also, old magazines and books. Even a radio, which is rarely turned on because it would mess up conversation which, next to romance, is the main business of the place.

Up close to the coffee bar are a couple of tables which we called "Lovers' Nook." Romance was all over the place, but that was where it really got organized. At ten cents a throw you could buy drink after drink and not be hurt too badly.

It must have gotten around the neighborhood that our romance corner was pretty good. A middle-aged gal', slightly off her rocker, began occupying a chair there every evening for several weeks. She had plenty of company until a male regular she had turned down got around to asking her if she were an alky. She didn't quite understand the significance of the question but pleaded not guilty. In a firm sort of way she was invited not to come back.

Genuine lady luses get all the loving treatment accorded the males, however, and sometimes extra-special care if they're good looking. Until recent years, it was commonly believed among non-members that AA was strictly for the boys and the general public still has a childish opinion that the only females who ever join a swearing-off society are wrinkled old trollops who spent their youth in second rate brothels.

I wish all those who have fallen for this idea could attend one of the many big parties tossed by the Manhattan-Uptown branch of AA. The first time I went, I met two girls who had been in the chorus of New York's famed Copacabana line only the year before. Later that same evening, I was introduced to a pair of top-flight models whose beautiful faces had graced the covers of leading fashion magazines.

There were some 250 persons at the party and the men outnumbered the girls slightly—a ratio of three-to-two, I'd say—but there was plenty of femininity there, much of it under 30, and many of the samples would have had to be very potted, indeed, for the average man to pass up.

One thing encouraging about a female AA is that it doesn't take much coaxing to make a date and then get even better acquainted.

Maybe they figure that after seeing so many spotted snakes and pink elephants they have nothing left to fear.

Have to Watch Lady AA's

AA's are like call girls in one way. As soon as two get together, one or the other always asks, "How did you ever get into this racket?" Swapping yarns with reformed binge babies. I discovered there's a deep maternal instinct in a female AA. If you say you were led down the primrose path by a heartless dame who's still lapping it up and still torturing other men, you've got your new sweetheart hooked. A Maybe it makes her mad to think of some other gal who can down a Martini without climbing right into the bottle; I don't know.

You have to watch them, though. The minute they feel they're in love, they get a deadly urge to celebrate. First thing you know, neither of you can find yourselves, much less the black-coffee-club where you met. I slipped off the wagon hard a couple of times before I learned not to toast a new

`WE COULDN'T WORK IF WE WERE KNOWN'

In 1953, More and More `People With Problems'

Banded Together Under The Title: The Anonymous

He stood on the platform and with a bang of the gavel opened the meeting. "If there are reporters here," he said, "you can write anything you want. But don't use names. You must respect us on this because some people are funny; they usen't to mind being seen in the Hotel Metropolis so drunk they couldn't stand up, but they're a little bit sensitive about being seen sitting down here cold sober"

So began a recent meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous, an association of men and women who share their experience, hopes and strength with each other in order to solve a common problem-alcoholism.

Conceived by a drunk as he lay in bed in a drunk's hospital in New York in 1934, this organization of nameless men and women was the first to bear the title ANONYMOUS. In the years that followed, and particularly in 1953, other individuals bearing their own peculiar sorrow have banded together for comfort and strength. They too are ANONYMOUS.

It was after twenty-five years of stealing, forgery and near-death that an ex-addict conceived of an organization for those who knew the hell of drug enslavement. Like the founders of AA, this man found his "way out" through association with those who knew the nightmare of drug addiction and who wanted, as much as he, to live normal lives. He first tried attending AA meetings, hoping they would provide him with the encouragement and strength to stay off drugs. But AA didn't work. "I felt lonely," he says, "because all they talked about was alcoholism and I was a drug addict." He drifted away; It was only after another bout with the "white death" that he began his own organization. He called it Narcotics Anonymous, and to it men and women who had experienced the humiliation and despair of drug enslavement were drawn.

Under the guidance of a leading New York psychologist, another group of people have been brought together. Their problem: homosexuality. Meeting in the office of Dr. Albert Ellis, these men discuss their problems in an effort to understand them, perhaps to overcome them. Their feelings are best summed up in the words of one of Dr. Ellis' patients: "First my problem was a sense of guilt and shame. Now it's having to live most of my life pretending to be what I'm not. We homosexuals live in constant fear. We are a persecuted minority.

In Their Search for Happiness, They Wish to Remain Nameless

"Thoughtful AAs, however, encourage these sponsors to bring addicts to open meetings, just as they would any other interested people. In the end, these addicts usually gravitate to other forms of therapy. They are not received on the platform in open meetings unless they have an alcohol problem, and closed meetings are, of course, denied them. We know that we cannot do everything for everybody with an addiction problem.

"There has also occurred lately a new development centering upon hippies who have LSD or marijuana troubles -- not so much stronger stuff. Many of these kids appear to be alcoholics also, and they are flocking into AA, often with excellent results.

"Some weeks ago, there was a young people's convention of AAs. Shortly thereafter, four of these kids visited the office. I saw one young gal prancing down the hall, hair flying, in a mini-skirt, wearing love beads and the works. I thought, 'Holy smoke, what now!' She told me she was the oldest member of the young people's group in her area -- age twenty-two! They had kids as young as sixteen. I was curious and took the whole party out to lunch.

"Well, they were absolutely wonderful. They talked (and acted) just about as good a kind of AA as I've seen anywhere. I think all of them said they had had some kind of drug problem, but had kicked that, too. When they first came around, they had insisted on their own ideas of AA, but in the end they found AA plenty good enough as it was. Though they needed their own meetings, they found interest and inspiration in the meetings of much older folks as well.

"Perhaps, as younger people come into AA, we shall have to put up with some unconventional nonsense -- with patience and good humor, let's hope. But it should be well worth the attempt. And also, if various hippie addicts want to form their own sort of fellowship along AA lines, by all means let us encourage them. We need deny them only the AA name, and assure them that the rest of our program is theirs for the taking and using -- any part or all of it.

"For these reasons, I feel hopeful and not a bit scared by this trend. Of course, I'm no prophet. I may be mistaken, so please keep me posted. This is a highly interesting and perhaps significant development. I certainly do not think it ought to be fought. Instead, it ought to be encouraged in what we already know to be workable channels.

In affection ... Bill"

alcoholics and non-alcoholic friends, who today number fifteen. When in the spring of 1938 our Foundation was born, A.A. was three years old. We had only 50 members. The book Alcoholics Anonymous was just an idea. None could then guess the magnificence of the gift which Providence had begun to bestow.

In the twelve years since, those 50 early members have spawned 120,000 more. A.A. stretches world-wide. Religion and medicine have approvingly raised us out of that No Man's Land where we once floundered between them. We have no enemies, our friends are beyond count. Like gleaming coral islands our thousands of Groups build themselves upward out of the alcohol sea. What a God-given, miraculous circumstance!

Through this glowing, feverish infancy, the Alcoholic Foundation Board, unseen by many, quietly played a great part in the formation and spread of our well-loved Society. Acting through our General Service Office, the book Alcoholics Anonymous, and latterly the Grapevine, the Foundation became directly responsible for half our growth and effectiveness--both in quality and quantity. There can be no question of that.

Suppose then, all these years, we had been without those fine services. Where would we be today minus the A.A. book and our standard literature which now pours out of Headquarters at the rate of three tons a month? Suppose our public relations had been left to thoughtless chance. Suppose no one had been assigned to encourage good publicity and kill the bad. Suppose no accurate information about A.A. had been available. Imagine our vital and delicate relations with medicine and religion left to pot luck. Then, too, where would thousands of A.A.'s be today if the General Office hadn't answered their frantic letters and referred them to help? (Our New York Office received and answered 28,000 letters of all kinds last year.) Or in what shape would hundreds of distant A.A. Groups now be if that Office hadn't started them by mail or directed travelers to them? How could we manage without a world Group Directory? What about those foreign Groups in 28 countries clamoring for translations, proved experience and encouragement? Would we be publishing the A.A. book at Oslo, Norway and London, England? What of those lone members on high seas or in far corners of the earth, those prisoners, those asylum inmates, those veterans in service or in hospitals? Where might we one day be if we never had the A.A. Grapevine, our mirror of A.A. life and principal forum of written expression? How grateful we are for those faithful Secretaries, those painstaking volunteer Editors and those able Trustees who have stood sentinel all these years over our principal affairs. Without all these things, where would we be? You must have guessed it. We'd be nowhere; that's sure.

So it is that by the "Steps" we have recovered, by the "Traditions" we have unified and by our Headquarters Services we have been able to function as a Society.

Yet some may still say - "Of course the Foundation should go on. Certainly the Foundation should go on. Certainly we'll pay that small expense. But why can't we leave its conduct to Dr. Bob and Bill and their friends the Trustees? We always have. Why do they now bother us with such business? Let's keep A. A. simple." Good questions, these. But today the answers are quite different than they once were.

Let's face these facts:

First -- Dr. Bob and Bill are perishable, they can't last forever.

Second - Their friends, the Trustees, are almost unknown to the A.A. Movement.

Third - In future years our Trustees couldn't possibly function without direct guidance from A.A. itself. Somebody must advise them. Somebody, or something must take the place of Dr. Bob and Bill.

Fourth - Alcoholics Anonymous is out of its infancy. Grown up, adult now, it has full right and the plain duty to take direct responsibility for its own Headquarters.

Fifth -- Clearly then, unless the Foundation is firmly anchored, through State and Provincial representatives, to the movement it serves, a Headquarters breakdown will someday be inevitable. When its old-timers vanish, an isolated Foundation couldn't survive one grave mistake or serious controversy. Any storm could blow it down. Its revival wouldn't be simple. Possibly it could never be revived. Still isolated, there would be no means of doing that. Like a fine car without gasoline, it would be helpless.

Sixth -- Another serious flaw: As a whole, the A.A. movement has never faced a grave crisis. But someday it will have to. Human affairs being what they are, we can't expect to remain untouched by the hour of serious trouble. With direct support unavailable, with no reliable cross-section of A.A. opinion, how could our remote Trustees handle a hazardous emergency? This gaping "open end" in our present set-up could positively guarantee a debacle.

Confidence in the Foundation would be lost. A. A. `s everywhere would say: "By whose authority do the Trustees speak for us? And how do they know they are right? " With A.A. Service life-lines tangled and severed, what then might happen to the "Million who don't know." Thousands would continue to suffer on or die because we had taken no forethought, because we had forgotten the virtue of Prudence. This must not come to pass.

That is why the Trustees, Dr. Bob and I now propose the "General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous." That is why we urgently need your direct help. Our principal Services must go on living. We think the General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous can be the agency to make that certain.

SECTION II Our Proposed Plan

Here is our over-all plan. To start the General Service Conference, the Foundation Trustees will invite one Delegate from each State of the Union and one from each Province of Canada. States and Provinces having large A.A. populations will be asked to send additional Delegates. (Subject, of course, to A.A. `s willingness to finance full representation.)

These Delegates will serve in two rotating panels. Panel No. 1 will be formed by inviting representatives from the 28 States and Provinces having, by our Group Directory, the largest A.A. populations. Panel No. 2 (which will start in the second year) will be created by inviting Delegates from the remaining 28 States and Provinces plus additional representation from densely populated regions.

Delegates to the General Service Conference at New York are to be selected by Group representatives who will usually meet in the largest A.A. center of each State or Province, on dates to be set every two years by the Alcoholic Foundation working with appropriate State or Provincial Committees.

A non-controversial method has been devised for the selection of State Committees and Conference Delegates. It will be seen that this method carefully avoids our usual political troubles. No Delegate so chosen could possibly consider himself a political victor. He will feel himself a servant, but not a senator. (Details in Section III)

Each Delegate will serve a two-year term, will always be available for mail or phone consultation with A.A. Headquarters, and will twice attend the General Service Conference which will ordinarily be held in New York City to coincide with the regular April meeting of the Foundation. At the Conference, these Delegates will sit with our Trustees, General Office Secretaries and Grapevine Staff Members. Thus, we shall constitute the "General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous."

Now what will our General Service Conference do?

A. It will here the Annual Reports of the Foundation, General Office, Grapevine, and Works Publishing (the A.A. Book Company); also the report of our C.P.A.

B. It will fully discuss these reports, offering needed suggestions or resolutions respecting them.

C. The Trustees will present to the Conference all serious problems of policy or finance confronting A.A. Headquarters, or A.A. as a whole. Following discussions of these, the Conference will offer the Trustees appropriate advice and resolutions.

D. Special attention will be given to all violations of our Tradition liable to seriously affect A.A. as a whole. The Conference will, if it be deemed wise, publish suitable resolutions deploring such deviations.

E. Because Conference activities will extend over a three-day weekend, Delegates will be able to exchange views on every conceivable problem. They will become closely acquainted with each other and with our Headquarters people. They will visit the premises of the Foundation, Grapevine and General Office. This should engender mutual confidence. Guesswork and rumor are to be replaced by first-hand knowledge.

F. Before the conclusion of each year's Conference, a Committee will be named to render all A.A. members a written report upon the condition of their Headquarters and the state of A.A. generally.

On a Conference Delegates return home, his State or Provincial Committee will, if practical, call a meeting of Group representatives and any others who wish to hear his personal report. The Delegate will get this meeting's reaction to his report, and its suggestions respecting problems to be considered at future Conference Sessions. The Delegate ought to visit as many of his constituent Groups as possible. They should have direct knowledge of their A.A. Headquarters.

How best to finance our Conference expenses is a moot question.

The General Service Conference will function for the benefit of A.A. as a whole. Its entire cost ought to be a charge against those "Group Contributions" now sent to New York for the support of the General Office. But this method is quite impossible now. Group Contributions are not meeting General Office expenses. Nor can the "Reserve" or the Foundation's A.A. "Book Income" carry the Conference.

We therefore propose that all A.A. Groups be asked for a gift of $5. each, yearly, at Christmas. The Foundation Trustees would deposit these sums in a special account marked "Conference Funds."

If even one-half the A.A. Groups made this annual $5. gift to the Foundation "for the benefit of the million who don't yet know," we estimate that the resulting income would absorb the total yearly Conference overhead, plus all Delegates' transportation to New York in excess of $100. each. (See Section IV for details)

One more word about money. A.A. Headquarters recently sent out its semiannual appeal for voluntary contributions, remarking that of late the Groups had donated much less than the traditional "$1.. per member a year." The present condition is only natural. The larger A.A. grows, the less the average Group is apt to know or care about the Foundation. It's not surprising that interest lags. But the General Service Conference should change all that. A brand new channel of participation and understanding will be wide open. No doubt hundreds of Groups not now giving to the Foundation will commence to do so. Meanwhile, our great thanks go out to all those who have supported Headquarters in past years, especially to Groups whose gifts have far exceeded the traditional "$1. per member" yardstick. Without them we'd never have got by; there would be no Foundation Office or Grapevine today. But it should be noted that foreign, institutional or quite new A.A. Groups need never feel obligated.

The A.A. General Service Conference will be an informal gathering. Resolutions passed by a simple majority will be advisory only. But the Trustees will traditionally favor all resolutions passed by a two-thirds vote. When Trustees of the Foundation retire, the remaining Board members will traditionally consult the Conference, or a committee thereof, before naming their successors. Above all, it ought to be understood that the General Service Conference will never become a government for Alcoholics Anonymous. Though it may publish resolutions respecting deviations from A.A. Tradition, it is agreed that such acts will never be personal, punitive or governmental in their character.

So concludes our general outline of the General Service Conference plan.

The Trustees, Dr. Bob and I rest in sure confidence that this--your third legacy--will never be lost; that your new responsibility will be carried without faltering. By its complete willingness to serve God in all weather, may the Society of Alcoholics Anonymous ever merit the worthiness to endure.

SECTION III

A.A. State And Provincial Assemblies:

Their Committees And Delegates, How Chosen

Without great expense or friction, how can States and Provinces select their General Service Conference Delegates and suitable State or Provincial Service Committees? This is the "$100." question. But we believe there is an answer. On one of Bill's western trips, experiments were tried which proved it possible to do these things. The following concrete plan is the result. At this stage we urge the need to be definite to avoid confusion. Later on you may wish to amend the plan to suit local needs or iron out flaws. Here we are:

A. With Foundation help, meetings of A.A. Group representatives will be organized in each State and Province, these to be called Assemblies.

B. Each assembly will cast separate written ballots for each of its State or Provincial Committeemen; three, five, seven or more of them.

C. Committeemen so selected will be automatically placed in nomination as candidates for the post of Delegate to the General Service Conference for a two--year term.

D. If, on a trial ballot, no one of these Committeemen can be elected Delegate by a two-thirds vote, they then draw lots between them to name the Delegate.

E. Each State or Provincial Assembly naming a Delegate pays his plane or railroad fare to New York. But not to exceed $100. yearly per Delegate. Money to defray this expense will be raised at the Assembly meeting where the Delegate is chosen. Two years, paid in advance, is preferable. For the benefit of distant regions, the Foundation "Conference Fund" will pay any yearly transportation expense in excess of $100. per Delegate (See Section IV)

For the clear guidance of those States and Provinces who send Delegates in 1951 and 1952, we urge this detailed procedure:

By January 1, 1951 the Foundation will ask the A.A. Group within each State and Province comprising Panel No. 1 how many of them wish to participate, as outlined above. Each Group expecting to help chose a Delegate will immediately select an experienced A.A. Representative. He (or she) will be ready to attend the State or Provincial Assembly. A date (not later than March 15th) will be announced. Much care ought to be given such selections. Any one of them may become Committeemen or the Delegate. Old-timers and former Group or Intergroup Officers ought to be considered possibilities.

Assuming that a minimum of 10 Groups in each State and Province of Panel No. 1 has volunteered to participate, the Foundation, in cooperation with the Groups, (or Intergroups) of the largest local centers, will arrange suitable State or Provincial meetings. The Foundation will then advise all participating Groups of the places and dates of their respective Assemblies. (In following years State and Provincial Committees will of course assume this duty.)

By this process we shall create a series of State and Provincial Assembly meetings, the Panel No. 1 Assemblies to gather in early 1951.

Now a very important question. Just how will State or Provincial Assemblies be conducted? For these key meetings we urge this procedure:

Let's assume that the Foundation, cooperating with a Temporary Committee* appointed at a typical "host city", has already named the date, hour and address of a given Assembly meeting. Group Representatives, "out of town" and "in town" have arrived. What happens then?

1. Registration: Each Group Representative registers his, and his Group's name and address in the Registration Book provided. He also has brought a copy of this pamphlet so he can follow the Assembly procedure.

2. Registration Completed: Chairman of the Temporary Committee opens the Assembly and reports the number present from the Registration Book. Those who have not registered do so.

3. Tellers Appointed. Local expenses covered: Temporary Chairman appoints one or more tellers. He names the sum spent by his Committee in arranging the Assembly meeting and asks the tellers to pass the hat to cover it.

4. First Business -- Determining size of State or Provincial Committee: The Temporary Chairman then determines the size of the Committee desired by asking whether Assembly will have three, five, seven, or more Committeemen. He requests a show of hands on these figures in succession, until a majority names the proper number.

* The temporary "host committee" will only be needed for the very first meeting, after which State or Provincial Committees will take over.

5. Election of State or Provincial Committee: Tellers pass blank ballots. The Temporary Chairman then points out that all Committeemen ought to be experienced A.A.'s well known in the area, who would be willing to give close attention to Conference affairs for a two-year period. Temporary Chairman then requests a written ballot for Committeeman No. 1. Tellers count the ballots and report the high man. Unless he declines to serve, he becomes State Chairman at once and takes over the meeting. Similarly the next ballot produces a Treasurer, the next a Secretary, and further ballots the remainder of the Committee. If there are declinations, the process continues until there is a full Committee elected for a two-year term. (Note that this method avoids personal nominations, hence personal controversy.)

6. Trial Attempt to Elect a Delegate by 2/3rds Vote: The Chairman reminds the Assembly, that according to plan, the election of the State (or Provincial) Committee has automatically placed all its members in nomination for the post of Delegate also explains why, to assure unanimity, the election should be by two-thirds vote. Therefore the Chairman asks for a show of hands on this question -- "Will this assembly, on a single written ballot, attempt the choice of its Delegate by a two-thirds vote?" Should more than two-thirds of the meeting indicate a desire to try this two--thirds method, a ballot is cast. If one of the Committeemen receives two-thirds or more, he becomes the Delegate for two years. Otherwise the method of election is discarded.

7. Delegate Chosen by Lot: The Tellers then place in a hat the names of each Committeeman willing to serve as Delegate. The first man (or lady!) out of the hat becomes State or Provincial Delegate for two years. The remaining Committeemen become alternates according to the order of their election. The State Secretary records the result together with the names and addresses of his Committee.

8. Duty of Treasurer: The Chairman then directs his Committee's Treasurer to name the sum required from each Group Representative present to cover the newly chosen Delegate's traveling expenses for two years. (This is determined by dividing the number present into the total estimated expense, or $200., whichever is lower.) The Chairman asks the Assembly for a show of hands whether it wishes to pay one year's traveling expense, or two, in advance. The Treasurer then receives the agreed payment from each Group Representative and issues such Representative a receipt by which he may reimburse himself from his Group's treasury.

9) Secretary's Report: The Chairman instructs the Secretary to prepare a brief written report of the meeting, listing the names and addresses of Committeemen and Delegate, copy to the Alcoholic Foundation.

10) Final Business: The Chairman then throws the meeting open to discussion. Questions respecting the Conference, or instructions to be given the new Delegate, may be brought to the floor. Finally, the Chairman announces the date of an Open Meeting to be held after the Delegates return from New York. There the Delegate is to make his personal report to all A.A. members who wish to hear it. Adjournment is then in order.

Such is our concept of the typical State or Provincial Assembly. We hope it proves a successful model for future years. We can only try and see.

Though it may prove desirable, it will not be absolutely necessary to hold Assembly meetings in "off-election years." But returning Delegates in those years ought to make their usual report to Open Meetings held in large centers and should visit as many of their constituent Groups as they can.

Should travel money be lacking for a Delegate in his second year, his State Chairman may circularize the constituent Groups, or his Committee may raise this sum as they deem wise.

When, in the judgment of a State or Provincial Committee, a Delegate becomes incapacitated through alcohol, or otherwise, the Chairman will attend the General Service Conference in his place. If the Chairman cannot attend, he will offer the post of Delegate to his fellow Committeemen in the order of their seniority as determined at the time of their election.

It is hoped, too, that State Chairmen will keep in close contact with the Alcoholic Foundation, addressing their correspondence to the A.A. General Office where one of its secretaries will be named to look after Conference matters.

A special word about Panel No. 2. To place the General Service Conference on a rotating basis, no Delegates can be invited from Panel No. 2 regions until 1952. These States and Provinces will then be approached in precisely the same manner as above described for Panel No. 1.

Since it is felt that Panel No. 2 may be more thinly represented, it seems right to invite additional delegates from those States or Provinces having an A.A. population of more than 2000 to round it out. On Panel List No. 2, attached, a number of cities which can act as "assembly" points for such additional representation are suggested. Provided "Conference Funds" prove adequate, additional cities in heavily populated regions may make application for representation.

Though no Panel No. 2 Delegates can be chosen until 1952, we hope that all States and Provinces will generously contribute to "Conference Funds" during 1951. For unless ample funds are in sight, we shall have to limit the total number of Delegates invited to the Conference. We much hope that won't happen as ultimate success for the Conference will depend upon wide-spread representation.

On the following list, each State, Province or special locality may discover the Panel in which it belongs. These selections were based upon the 1950 Group Directory. In suggesting cities for additional representation, we have been obliged to consider convenience as well as population.

Naturally these arrangements are tentative, experimental. Defects will show up. But we can mend these as we go. We shall begin thus.

IMPORTANT -- We hope and believe that we shall be able to invite Delegates from every locality listed, but it might not work out that way at first. Should there be a limited response from all the A.A. Groups when asked for the $5. Christmas contributions to the "Conference Fund," we would have to limit out invitations accordingly. We may have to start on a smaller basis than we anticipated. So please don't feel disturbed or disappointed should we have to limit representation at the start. We'll do the best we can.

NOTE - Where large centers are near State or national boundaries, there seems no good reason why Groups in adjoining areas may not cross these lines to elect Delegates. For example, at Detroit, Kansas City, Missouri, Buffalo, New York, etc.

SECTION IV Financing The General Service Conference

How to finance our General Service Conference is a plain guess. We'll have to make the best estimate we can and try it out. There's no other way.

First, some background. Lacking close contact, the Foundation has grown remote from the Groups. They have lost the feeling that our Foundation is really theirs. A.A. General Office expenses have soared because of inflation, even though that office isn't half as big, in relation to A.A.'s size, as it used to be. For these reasons the A.A. Groups haven't been meeting their current Headquarters expenses; 2000 Groups who could well give a hand, still abstain. The entire burden falls on the remaining 1500 Groups; they carry the load. Nobody is specially to blame for this, it's simply a condition. One important Conference purpose is to stabilize and correct this very situation. When the A.A. Groups are given direct participation and know the score, they will handle the matter. We are sure of that. Then Conference expenses can be deducted from routine contributions; the difference will scarcely be felt. But that time hasn't arrived.

Therefore Groups who already contribute, plus those who may soon be interested, are the ones who will make our Conference a success.

Naturally we can't place the entire financial responsibility upon those Groups who happen to take part in choosing Delegates, either. Many Groups at long distance from State or Provincial "Assembly" points might not be able to help choose a Delegate. Nevertheless we're positive that hundreds of them, considering this new set-up, would like to make a direct contribution to its success.

Bearing these facts in mind, our tentative financial plan is this:

1. That we ask every A.A. Group in the United States and Canada to contribute $5. annually, this special gift to be made to the Foundation at Christmas for the benefit of "the millions who don't know." Since the Conference would insure the continuance of A.A. Headquarters, which is our principal lifeline to all those yet to come, this would be the thought.

Such a Christmas-time appeal would create an annual income somewhere between $5,000. and $10,000. for Conference purposes. If interest is small, we can invite but few Delegates. If interest is large, we can invite all those who are listed in Panels Nos. 1 and 2. This income will be deposited in a special Foundation account devoted to Conference purposes only and titled "Conference Funds."

- Just how would these $5. Christmas--time contributions be used? Save one exception the Foundation would pay the total expenses of the General Service Conference, the year round. This would include:

(a) Full hotel bills and meals for as many as 60 Delegates for three days.

(b) The cost of a suitable meeting place.

(c) The printing of an annual Conference report to be sent to all A.A. members.

(d) The cost of secretarial help, correspondence and special mailings.

(e) All round--trip plane and railroad fares exceeding $100. in any one year to assist distant Groups with transport of their Delegates.

(f) Organization expense-- distribution of 100,000 copies of this plan, possible travel by Bill, etc.

2) Each Group Assembly sending a Delegate would pay his round-trip fare to New York not exceeding $100. per year. Any excess would be chargeable to the Foundation "Conference Fund." Eastern Groups would seemingly have an advantage but it's not great. Because of their numbers, the Easterners would be the principal $5. Contributors to the "General Funds." Hence their's would be the lion's share of paying all Western fares over $100. Therefore approximate justice would be done.

Quite obviously, full representation at our General Service Conference is going to depend squarely upon the generosity of some 2000 Groups Contributing $5. each a year for this very special Conference purpose. It is a responsibility which you--the members of A.A.--will need to take if you are to receive and guard well your Third Legacy, The General Services of Alcoholics Anonymous.

Dr. Bob and I have the deepest faith that you are going to accept that responsibility.

SECTION V Temporary Charter for the General Service Conference
"12 Suggested Principles"

We here present a precise statement of "12 Principles" upon which the General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous can be founded; principles upon which it may be experimentally assembled, financed and operated during a four-year trial period beginning, if possible, in April 1951.

If in four years the Conference proves its usefulness and has gained wide A.A. acceptance, it may then amend these principles according to the dictates of actual experience. But any such changes in the Conference Principles should, of course, conform to the Tradition of Alcoholics Anonymous. Meanwhile, we only commit ourselves to giving the Conference - a thorough trial.

On this basis the Trustees, Dr. Bob and I offer you - the members of A.A. -this temporary "Charter" for your General Service Conference:

The General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous
(North American Section)

1. Purpose: The General Service Conference of Alcoholics Anonymous is expected to become the basic guardian of our A.A. Tradition and World Services. It is especially hoped the Conference will lend guidance to, and perpetuate the Alcoholic Foundation and the A.A. General Headquarters at New York City. The Conference will be a service body only; never a government.

2. Composition: - The Conference will be composed of A.A. State and Provincial Delegates, Trustees of the Alcoholic Foundation, and Staff members of the General Service Office and Grapevine.

3. Conference Relation to A.A.: The Conference will serve as a vehicle through which the A.A. Movement can effectively express its views upon all matter of vital A.A. policy and all hazardous deviations from A.A. Tradition, thus providing Alcoholics Anonymous with a reliable guide to right thought and wise action upon these serious subjects.

4. Conference Relations to A.A. General Headquarters: The Conference will also be expected to serve as a dependable guide for The Alcoholic Foundation, whose Trustees are the Custodians of A.A. general funds, the book "Alcoholics Anonymous," the General Service Office and the Grapevine. As such, the Trustees can be expected with favor upon any Conference resolution relating to vital A.A. policy passed by a two-thirds vote of the Conference. In filling vacancies on the Foundation Board the Trustees should be empowered to consult the Conference or a Committee thereof. It must be remembered, however, that the Conference will be informal and unincorporated and that the Alcoholic Foundation is alone authorized to make contracts, conduct public relations in the name of Alcoholics Anonymous, and insure the financial and managerial integrity of the A.A. General Headquarters. But if the Conference, following a reasonable trial period, becomes a vital and accepted Service of the A.A. movement it should then be entitled to shape and mould its own final form.

5. State and Provincial Delegates -- Term of Office: State and Provincial Delegates will be chosen for terms of two years each.

6. Conference Rotation: This will be effected by two panels of State and Provincial Delegates. First Year, Panel No. 1: To be composed by inviting one Delegate from each of those 27 States or Provinces having the largest A.A. population. Second Year, Panel No. 2: To be composed by inviting one Delegate each from the 28 remaining States and Provinces. Panel No. 2 will also invite extra representatives from those States and Provinces having an A.A. population of more than 2000. (See Section III)

7. Conference Delegates - Points at Which Selected: Conference Delegates will be selected at the largest centers of A.A. population within their respective States and Provinces. But Panel No. 2 will ordinarily include Delegates from the next larger centers of each State and Province having more than 2000 A.A. population (See Section III)

8. State and Provincial Delegates - Method of Selection: State and Provincial Conference Delegates will be chosen by Assemblies of A.A. Group Representatives meeting at such dates and places as may be jointly arranged by The Alcoholic Foundation and suitable State and Provincial Committee according to the principles of Point No. 7.

Delegates and alternates will be chosen by election or by lot, or by a combination of these methods. But if elected, a Delegate ought to be chosen by a majority of two-thirds because all Delegates should feel themselves servants of world A.A. rather than marginal victors of troublesome political contests. (See Section III for method of choosing Conference Delegates and State or Provincial Committees.)

9. - The General Service Conference -- How Financed: General Service Conference total costs will be apportioned as follows:

(a) Once yearly, each A.A. Group interested will be asked to make a $5.00 contribution to the Alcoholic Foundation "Conference Fun"

(b) Those Groups within each State or Province who actually participate in naming Delegates will pay their Delegates traveling expenses to and from New York City, not to exceed, however, $100.00 a year each. It is estimated that any excess above this figure can be absorbed by the "Conference Fund." (See Section IV for detail.)

10. Conference Meetings: The Conference ought to meet yearly at New York, or specially if there be an emergency. And two-thirds of the State, Provincial and A.A. Headquarters Delegates registered should constitute a quorum.

11. Ordinary Procedure: The Conference will hear the reports of The Foundation and its related Headquarters Services. The Conference will then advise with the Trustees and Headquarters Staff concerning pending and important matters of finance or general policy affecting the Headquarters or A.A. as a whole, making such suggestions or passing such resolutions as it may deem desirable. The Conference may also discuss and recommend appropriate action concerning serious deviations from A.A. Tradition, or harmful misuse of the name "Alcoholics Anonymous." The Conference will elect its own officers and pass suitable by-laws. Before adjournment the Conference will authorize a Committee to draft a full report on its proceedings and the state of A.A. generally, which will be furnished the Alcoholics Anonymous Groups throughout the world.

12. General Warranties of the Conference: In all its proceedings the General Service Conference ought to observe the spirit of our A.A. Tradition, taking great care: that the Conference never becomes the seat of perilous wealth or power; that sufficient operating funds plus ample reserves be its prudent financial principle; that none of the Conference members ever be placed in a position of unqualified authority over the others; that all important decisions be reached by discussion and vote; that no Conference resolution ever be punitive in character or an incitement to public controversy; that the Conference never attempts to govern Alcoholics Anonymous, and that, like the Society of Alcoholics Anonymous which it serves, the Conference ought always remain democratic in thought and action. Perhaps, now, certain questions are coming to mind. For instance:

Q. Why should our Trustees and Headquarters Staff be voting members of the Conference.

A. As the ones most experienced in the conduct of our overall Services, they are obviously entitled to full Conference participation.

Q. Why is a "cross-section of A.A. opinion" so necessary?

A. Future Trustees must have sound advice and vigorous backing. Without that they never could speak for A.A. in years to come. A.A., too, must have a definite means of knowing its own mind. Otherwise serious issues of the future will certainly bring us endless controversy and confusion. A Society such as ours cannot permanently function on emotion, rumor or guesswork; it cannot be well advised by the clamors of small or self-appointed minorities.

Q. Why, on important matters, should a two-thirds vote of the Conference be needed?

A. Since the Conference will meet briefly, and but once a year, our Headquarters Staffs must be given some latitude for independent judgment. Hence they ought not be too firmly bound by a bare majority. To be binding, a Conference resolution ought to be reasonably unanimous.

Q. Why shouldn't the Conference elect the Foundation Trustees?

A. This would introduce a difficult and unnecessary political problem. It seems better that the Trustees continue to name their own successors, subject to consultation with the Conference or a Committee thereof. Should circumstances warrant, the Trustees would unquestionably look with favor on any advice offered by two-thirds of the Conference respecting the composition of the Foundation Board.

Q. What is meant by "two year rotating panels?"

A. This means that only the Delegates described in Panel No. 1 will attend the 1951 Conference. In 1953 the original Panel No. 1 will be replaced by a new Panel No. 1 chosen from the same area. And so on, ad infinitum. This will make for continuity because only one-half of our out-of-town Delegates will have to be replaced each year. (See Part III, Selection of Delegates.)

Q. Why shouldn't our Conference be a government for Alcoholics Anonymous?

A. Each A.A. Group is autonomous; our only "authority" is a Higher Power. Practically speaking, no A.A. Group will stand for a personal government anyhow; we're built that way. Though the Conference will guide A.A. Headquarters, it must never assume to govern A.A. as a whole. While it can publicly deplore misuse of the A.A. name or departures from Tradition, it ought never attempt punishment or legal restraint of non-conformists--in A.A. or out. That is the road to public controversy and internal disruption. The Conference will give us an example and a guide, but not a government. A personal government is something, God willing, that Alcoholics Anonymous will never have. We shall authorize servants to act for us, but not rulers.

This is the basic structure of our Conference to be. Its framework has long been under study and consultation. We trust that it will commence to meet our evident need; that it will be regarded by all A.A.'s as a safe and suitable beginning.

Hi Lee

You seem to be getting answers that don't address your question on Third Legacy Procedures in elections.

The procedure is spelled out in Chapter 1 of the A.A. Service Manual (on pages S20-21 in the 2002-2003 version).

Areas use it to elect the Delegate, Chairperson, Treasurer, Secretary and their Alternates (some may include other officers on the slate). The procedure is also used in other venues as well (e.g. for Trustees). Third Legacy elections are decided by substantial unanimity of a 2/3 majority vote and can take up to 5 ballots. As the ballots progress a vote count threshold is defined to winnow out minority vote holders. The 5th ballot is optional (based on a motion to have a 5th ballot and carried by simple majority). If no candidate gets a 2/3 majority then it "goes to the hat" (i.e. the winner is chosen by lot).

The Area Delegate and Officer election cycle is every 2 years (called a Panel). Members elected for 2003-2004 are Panel 53 (numbering started with 1 in 1951, the 1st Conference, 2 in 1952, etc.) Areas are divided into odd/even year Panels so that about 1/2 the Delegates rotate each year (that helps the Conference run smoother). The procedure should also be used at District elections (perhaps less stringently). District elections may or may not correspond with the Area. Some Areas like to have half their DCMs rotate each year rather than all of them every two years. Groups might use a much less stringent, and informal, procedure before "going to the hat" (e.g. a simple majority rather than 2/3 majority). It will vary by group (some groups will elect you if you leave the room to go to the bathroom).

If you haven't been to an election Assembly it's really well worth the experience. It can be a bit agonizing though (both in time and outcome). It can be a heart breaker when a well qualified candidate is 1 or 2 votes shy of 2/3 majority and loses out of the hat. But that's the way it goes - and it really seems to go well all things considered.

Hope the above helps.

Cheers

p.s. thanks to Jim B. for sharing the entire October 1950 pamphlet "Your Third Legacy---Will You Accept It?"---the five ballots and the "hat" practice weren't in there but most likely that direction was taken on voting soon afterward. It's a particularly beautiful fact that the pamphlet, with Bill and Dr. Bob as its authors, showed our two co-founders' agreement on the venture of the annual Conference, not knowing if it would be successful. Bill later wrote that Dr. Bob finally agreed with Bill on the need for the General Service Conference--- the two men would never see each other again after that last autumn 1950 meeting, as Bob passed away and never had the opportunity to see another of our fellowship's miracles take place the next year...

The pamphlet was published at 50,000 copies and rushed to every AA address on file. The Alcoholic Foundation Trustees had been hearing the Conference proposal since 1947, mostly from Bill with firsthand experience and mounting frustration on the workings of the AF Board. The two years before our first General Service Conference in 1951 had brought some resistance from different Sections of the fellowship, even a high pressured letter writing campaign against the idea of a Conference that had mailings to many groups at the same time the proposal was gradually gaining approval---our "Orthodox Group" chapter of AA history did not break the momentum.

Does anyone have one of those "Orthodox Group" letters to share with us?

Alcoholics Anonymous Doing Great

Job in Its New Times Sq. Clubhouse

Alcoholics Anonymous has come to Broadway. The organization that has helped life 12,000 drunks onto the waterwagon, many of them straight from the gutter, is now established in a new clubhouse on West 41st street, a few minutes from Times Sq.

It's the old Knox Memorial, Collegiate Chapel, Reformed Church of America. Inside, church pews are lined up, and the Christ looks out over the audience benevolently from a stained glass window. But here the church similarity ends. Men and women sit around, waiting for the services to open, smoking. You look around and see the faces of people you know - some of them famous people, some of whom have been on Broadway, in the amusement world in general, for years.

The reporter's training urges taking notes, but you discard that notion, knowing that you must respect their anonymity. Here is a great actress. If you as much as hinted at the play in which she had been famous, almost everyone would know her as well as if you printed the name in boldface caps. A man behind you speaks in a voice you'd heard before. Sure enough, he is the famous - rather, once famous - radio personality. And that man who just walked in, the one in the Navy officer's uniform - you find out later that he is a lieutenant commander, just back from two years in the Pacific - he is an old friend, an old newspaper colleague: you had stood at the bar together many times in the "old days."

But here, they are all fellow members of AA. Among themselves, they sometimes drop their anonymity, as your newspaper friend did when he got up to address the audience a little later. You know the history of his drinking very well and wonder how much of it he'll tell. But he tells it all. And you say to yourself: if they're all as honest as he, they're honest indeed.

No Pulling Punches

Honesty is the quality that stands out among these people. For honesty is the approach to their method for curing themselves. They have a 12-step program. Boiled down, their program calls upon drunks to admit to themselves first of all that they are drunks, who can't handle their liquor. Then they are advised to analyze their personalities and find out what made them that way; adjust their personal relations to normal life; depend upon some power outside of themselves to help them stay sober; work with other alcoholics, to help cure the latter and to help stabilize themselves.

This matter of depending on some outside power - that gets some of them down; that sounds like religious evangelism. But it isn't anything of that kind. These are not religious fanatics or zealots. These are sensible men and women of the world for the greater part, some of whom had been much too blas. They know the score. They're hep. They don't try to tell you what God to worship, or how - they don't really care whether you worship any.

Proving the latter point is a guy from Bridgeport who gets up to tell his story. "I never knew anything about this God business," he says, "and I don't now." And in his own, quite ungrammatical way, he tells how he finally caught on to the waterwagon and how he's fought to stay on it.

There isn't anybody around the joint sprouting wings. The "testimonials" that are given are intended only to add point to the AA program, to show that it really works. And there is no doubt that it does.

Highly Endorsed

Social workers speak highly of the AA movement. The section on neurology and psychiatry of the New York State Medical Society has run articles in its official journal about the work of AA. Prominent psychiatrists have given it their endorsement. And of course religious leaders have blessed it. All have agreed that AA is the McCoy.

There are more than 300 branches all over the country, about 30 in the N.Y. metropolitan area alone, and a h.q. in Hollywood too. At the 41st street clubhouse there are billiard rooms and card rooms, a library and a writing room where members can relax, good fellowship and all the appurtenances of any good club - except a bar. For one thing is insisted upon by AA - don't come to the club drunk or with liquor on your breath. AA knows that some of the members slip some times; these are helped to get back to dryness again. But they can't come to the club until they had actually stopped drinking - no matter how recently. The steward of the new clubhouse, elected to office only last Sunday, is an engineer, a man well known in his profession, who had recently slipped back into drunkenness. But he has decided to give the AA program another trial; and the organization, in turn, accepted him for his deserved trial again.

The evening spent with the AA was exhilarating. You wonder: would these people care to have you talk about their work. You decide to ask the the persons I had harmed (Step 8), and worked out ways and means of slowly making restitution (Step 9)."

Also, whenever I read statements like "I have heard it said...", I think we may be dipping into "Step theory" instead of AA History. I do not believe that AA History Lovers is a forum for Step theory. I try to ask myself a question before I submit to this site - What do I base this on, opinion or some piece of written or oral AA history coming from a reliable source? I know that the term "reliable source" & "AA history" is sometimes almost a contradiction of terms but these are just some of my thoughts, meant with love. I definitely see the Big Book's directions on Step 6 & 7 as having much depth & weight. When understood & practiced as a way of life, on the same day immediately following the hour after a 5th Step (as it's outlined in the Big Book), there is a lot of moving in the direction of more ego deflation and a whole lot there to take in. Intellectually, it seems a little simple & almost insultingly vague. But when understood & deeply internalized through study & meditation line by line, these two paragraphs on page 76 are power-packed! I am sorry if I have stepped on any toes & God bless!

Just Love,

Barefoot Bill

Hi

The 12 Steps were drafted in Dec. 1938 only a few months prior to printing the Big Book in April 1939. Bill claimed that it took him about 30 minutes to draft the 12 Steps (while in the process of writing Chapter 5). Up to that point, a word-of-mouth program of 6 Steps was used in Akron and NY (see AA Comes of Age pg 160 and the Big Book story "He Sold Himself Short"). When Bill wrote "Into Action" there wasn't any genuine and explicit prior experience with Steps 6 and 7 as we know them today.

In drafting the 12 Steps, Bill wanted to be definitive and clear in describing our program and he also wanted to close loopholes. Our current 2nd, 3rd, 6th, 7th and 11th Steps were all derived from a single previous Step of the word-of-mouth program described by Bill as "We prayed to whatever God we thought there was for power to practice these precepts." According to Earl Treat, Akron had an even more concise version of this word-of-mouth Step as "Dependence and Guidance from a Higher Power."

Much argument ensued over the 12 Steps among early pioneer members. Some wanted more emphasis on God and some wanted less. Some were happy with 6 steps and didn't want 12. Since Bill was caught in the middle, this may have had an influence on him not being more expansive in the narrative. The first version of Step 7 had us getting on our knees and that didn't go over well either.

than Coke, he felt lit up. His hangover miraculously disappeared. And, for three hours, he forgot his troubles.

Today his worries are few. He's solved most of his alcohol-caused troubles; he's made his comeback on a television program. And on his way to and from the Twenty-Four-Hour Club, where he practically lives, he passes the hotel bar without batting an eye.

In Los Angeles, a judge who faced removal from the bench because of his repeated drunken behavior in court came to his A.A. helper with an excuse for his latest lapse: "I took up with nondrinkers," he said, "and they bored me right off the wagon. Got a bellyful of museums, concerts, and lectures. Wanted to be with human beings again."

"I know where you'll find them," said the spiritual guide. And he led the jurist to the 6,300 Club, at that number on Wilshire Boulevard. This club, too, was a fraternity for ex-drunks, so the judge joined it. And though he had a few off-bench slips, he's been riding the wagon hand-somely for a year and a half. And a higher court has forgotten his drunken escapades.

During the past twelve years, ex-drunks in 150 hangouts, all the way from San Francisco to Bangor, Maine, have been having similar experiences.

In 1940, a group of whisky-steeped A.A.'s in Akron, Ohio, organized the appropriately named Arid Club in the belief that, as fine as the A.A. philosophy was, the dozens of so-called clubhouses in which its Twelve Steps were taught, while coffee and sandwiches were served on the side, were no proper substitute for much needed club life.

Seven years later, in New York, an even more booze-wracked group of A.A.'s laid to rest forever an old drunk's tale to the effect that old sots inevitably die if they take the cold-turkey treatment. These men and women called their organization the Twenty-Four-Hour Club because they believed that going just twenty-four hours at a time without a helpful snort would be a monumentally ambitious program. It was, but they survived the grim ordeal and lost their own grimness.

Word of these two outstanding successes spread abroad. And clubs for alcoholics dedicated to hedonistic pleasures, as well as total abstinence, sprang up all over the country, until there are now 115 of them in the United States and one, the Alano Club, in Vancouver, British Columbia.

Club life for ex-drunks is A.A.'s second miracle. It speeds the cure and social readjustment of ordinary case-hardened alcoholics; and it transforms many of A.A.'s black sheep into shining examples of its evangelical philosophy.

The moment Lionel Sloane entered the Twenty-Four-Hour Club, the A.A.

strategists knew that the old actor was going to be a pushover for the miracle. His A.A. mentor had a whispered conversation with the orchestra leader and the music stopped. The leader announced that a star of silent film days would sing a few numbers. Lionel sang. He wowed 'em, and held the spotlight for the rest of the evening.

When the club closed at midnight, Lionel and his host went to a Third Avenue bar for stirrup cups of ginger ale. A red-faced exponent of the Fair Deal was offering to beat the daylights out of anyone who didn't love good old Harry Truman. A MacArthurite fell asleep at the bar. Two strangers found a bond in their admiration of the late F.D.R. and repeated, again, again, and again, vows of lasting friendship. And off-key singing came from three frustrated tenors and a bass.

"Now would you call this fun?" asked the A.A. man.

"All right you double-crossing so-and-so," said Lionel. "How do you get to be a member of that drunk trap of yours?"

After Lionel joined the club he discovered that its amenities, on a somewhat reduced scale, were comparable to those of The Players, to which he once belonged. The latest editions of newspapers lay within a handy reach on a long table. Best sellers were stacked on shelves in a reading nook. The bulletin board was a hodgepodge of club announcements, relayed telephone messages, and notices of items lost and found. The cuisine was not as good as The Players', but it was passable. And it could be enjoyed by guests. For all these conveniences, Lionel paid dues of only three dollars a month.

But it was the good company of 300 temperamental conviviais, who were facing and, most of the time, solving the problem of what they called their illness, that brought to Lionel an inner experience that most club members have to go through before they recover lost human dignity and have real fun.

One of these reformed Sybarites was an advertising man who'd been an alcoholic ever since his wife divorced him in 1942. One morning, after a prolonged drinking bout with a client, he'd seen snakes rise up from a grass island in the middle of Park Avenue and bow to him. He took the A.A. treatment with negative results. A year later, after joining the club, he took another stroll down the Avenue. He observed the snake phenomenon all over again. Upon investigation, the snakes turned out to be ivy vines. The island of green had a grillwork built over the New York Central's tracks, and every time a train whooshed by, the vines rose in the air.

"I'm probably the only member of the club who owes his cure to false delirium tremens," he said. "But false or real, they made me lay off the stuff. If my agency offered to make me vice-president on condition that I keep up with drinking clients, I'd tell them to go to hell. Incidentally, the agency seems pretty pleased with my work now. I'm chairman of the

Every year at this time the alcoholic resolves to quit drinking. The best resolve he could make this year would be to join Alcoholics Anonymous. Having all been alcoholics themselves, these men and women are the best possible ones to help anyone who wants to control his drinking but can't do it alone. They will send information to anyone free of charge. Address Alcoholics Anonymous, Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York 17, New York

Alcoholism is not a "failing" - it is a dread disease. The person branded an alcoholic is at grips with a killer as deadly as cancer or coronary thrombosis. He is not just a social menace; he is desperately ill.

The alcoholic can be turned into a sane and sober citizen, and often the best one to show him the way to reformation is not a relative, doctor, or clergyman - it is an ex-alcoholic!

In case you don't agree with any of these statements, perhaps you had better read them over again before going on to learn of Alcoholics Anonymous, the organization that knows how to lick the problem facing the drunkard. For the statements are true, if we are to believe the medical profession and the more than 12,000 members of Alcoholics Anonymous who are once more leading decent, self-respecting, useful lives in more than 365 cities. In fact, there is no sensible argument against them. Salvation, conversion, reclamation - call it whatever you like, the AA system gets results. There are no potions to be slipped into one's coffee, no electric shocks, no preaching, and likewise no bullying. It is a new departure, but its fundamentals are as old as man. It is beautifully simple, yet it has something of an eternal mystery. It works.

Alcoholics Anonymous got its start when a New York broker known as Bill met an Akron, Ohio physician we shall call Doc. The New Yorker's drinking habits had severely handicapped his career, but he had been firmly aboard the water wagon for five months when he visited Akron in an attempt to swing a deal that would put him back on his financial feet. The deal fell through and the frustrated Bill, alone and unhappy in a strange city, felt the need of a bracer. In other words, a stiff drink of liquor. But knowing that the first drink would only be the cornerstone of a prolonged debauch, Bill fought down the temptation. Back in New York he had found that his greatest help in keeping sober was to talk to other alcoholics under treatment in the hospital where he had been "de-fogged" during his last hangover. He felt that if he could give similar assistance in Akron, he would be safe. So, selecting the name of a clergyman from a church directory in the hotel lobby, he telephoned to ask whether the minister knew of an alcoholic who wanted help. The minister sent him to Doc, a confirmed alcoholic now shaken and remorseful after a terrific bender.

Bill worked earnestly on his new friend and won him over to his method of rehabilitation. Then Bill went to live at doc's home, and both men began to wrestle with other alcoholics. They had some success, some failure. The upshot was that Doc, aided by a faithful and heroic wife, turned his home into a small asylum for alcoholics who wanted to be straightened out but had lost the will power to do it themselves. Bill went back to New York, and as he was also married to a brave and patient woman, he was able to do the same thing with his house. In four years Bill and Doc between them guided about 100 alcoholics to dry ground, and soon afterward the subjects told the world about their recovery program and personal histories in a book called "Alcoholics Anonymous," a title that was passed on to the movement which, up to then, had not been christened. Today, five years later, the book has gone through five successively enlarged editions and is greatly responsible for the growth of membership both here and in Canada.

The AA program has 12 steps that may be summarized as follows:

- 1) The alcoholic must truly want to be delivered from his problem and admit that he has no control over his drinking.
- 2) He should believe that a power greater than himself could restore him to sanity.
- 3) He should decide to turn over his will and his life to God, as he understands Him. He should depend upon his concept of a higher power to strengthen and sustain him and, through prayer and meditation, improve his contact with God and the power to carry out His will.
- 4) 4. He should make a searching and fearless inventory of himself and admit to God, to himself, and to another human being the full extent of his shortcomings and the wrongs he has done. He should make a list of all persons he has harmed and be willing to make direct amends to them wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
- 5) He should use his newly found knowledge and power to help other alcoholics.

As you can imagine, this is simple in outline but not easy to fulfill without a struggle, for the alcoholic is a person of many illusions. One is that someday he will have the whip hand over his drinking - not stop it, mind you - but he will ration himself strictly and imbibe like a gentleman. Another is that by swearing off for a stated period he will be more self-controlled when he starts drinking again. Still another excuse is that he can drink only beer and thus stay away from hard liquor. None of these fallacies impress the particular AA's who have undertaken to help an alcoholic stop drinking, and they tell him so, giving their own experience as a basis.

"WE know how it is, say the Aas, and the alcoholic grows interested in these men who understand his problem. The alcoholic is nearly always callous to the pleas of family, friends, and minister because such appeals are voiced too emotionally, although he may have maudlin spells of vowing to reform. But he can be won over by plain talk from ex-alcoholics. "we know what it's like to wait in agony for a saloon to open," continued the AAs, "to hide liquor in half a dozen places in the house, to wake up in a strange room or even a strange town and wonder how you got there. We know what it means to steal money from your wife's purse, to haggle in pawnshops, to have your wife get herself a job in order to pay the rent. And we, too, have thought of jumping from a high window or blowing out our brains."

The alcoholic listens with amazement as his new friends describe some of their old escapades, and he realizes that his own adventures were trifling compared to the purple binges confessed to by the very men who are trying to help him. He is told that because he is allergic to alcohol he is poisoned by it, and that the way to stop drinking is to cut it off entirely - because once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic. The AAs know that their man's knowledge of his condition is never enough to make him stop drinking for good. "We know that you lack the proper means of defense against your enemy," they tell him, "so your help must come from a higher power. Why not try God?"

Here is the stumbling block that appalls many an alcoholic, for, as the secretary of the Alcoholic Foundation explained to me, more than 50% of their members professed to be agnostics, atheists, or backsliders from some church. "I don't believe there is a God," runs the familiar plaint, "or why would he let me get into such a mess?" The AAs are not affronted when they hear this; in fact, they expect it, because they are aware of two things. First, most alcoholics possess a defiant individuality, and second, they resent the idea of God because they themselves cherish a feeling of omnipotence. Therefore, the AAs do not laugh when some weak, drink-ridden soul protests that he is too sane and honest to believe all that old-fashioned stuff about God.

They counter by asking whether the alcoholic doesn't believe there is a greater power in the universe than himself. "Why of course," the patient says in substance. "I don't know what it is, but I believe there is some sort of great plan that directs the universe."

"All right then," say the AAs, "why not use your own conception of God?" To most of the alcoholics this seems to be an exceedingly brilliant proposal, and men who rebel at the word "God" put their faith in a Creative Intelligence, Supreme Being, Universal Mind, or Spirit of Nature. For some men and women God is the ocean and the stars, in a symphony or picture, on the mountains or in a book. And some believe they have found their conception of God in Alcoholics Anonymous. With no religious ax to grind, any conception that will bring results is all right with the AAs.

Remember..

A man who drinks now and then usually drinks more now than he did then.

Alcohol doesn't pick you up; it lets you down

Alcoholism is a disease - not a "failing." The alcoholic is a sick man and should be treated as one. Ignoring him, abusing him, or treating him with scorn, contempt, or ridicule will neither cure nor help him.

In some cases the new man ducks the idea of God or a substitute and tries to right himself by being honest, tolerant, and helpful toward other alcoholics. An AA member asked me to report that it is their experience everywhere that faith always comes to those who try this simple approach with an open mind - and in the meantime they stay sober. But those who actively deny the spiritual content in the program seldom remain dry. AA stresses the spiritual because thousands of its members have found they cannot succeed without it.

The achievement of a fresh understanding with friends, creditors, and even enemies is as severe a wrench to the alcoholic's pride as it would be to the rest of us. Yet the fact remains that when the patient goes through with this part of the program he feels like a new man. It may involve reconciliation with wife and children, often a slow process not gained by promises but by performance over a long pull. This is a matter for the alcoholic to struggle with alone, but when it comes to more prosaic adjustments with creditors, there have been cases where AAs gambled on their choice by advancing him the money to settle his debts. There was never an alcoholic who didn't manage to get his social and business relationships into hopeless confusion, and AAs claim the disentangling process can only be made possible and bearable through faith.

When the alcoholic is in the clear, confident and happy in his new strength, he is reminded that faith without works is dead. This mental nudge is scarcely needed, for the now ex-alcoholic is eager to do missionary work among those still trapped by the allure of liquor. He realizes that alcoholism has brought more sorrow to the human race than any other agency, for its destruction is neither merciful nor swift. He understands that liquor breaks down not only the physical man, but so relentlessly sabotages the will that a self-starting cure is almost impossible. He knows that no amount of adversity will permanently divert the alcoholic to sobriety. He understands that the patient will have to fight not only himself but many of his drinking companions whose tender hearts will impel them to smuggle a flask to their battling comrade.

He stands ready to answer the call of an alcoholic at any time, even at three o'clock in the morning, and often does just that. And being a recovered alcoholic, he will be free from the misguided passion of the nondrinker who tries to thrust abstinence on a sinner.

You can understand why this sort of co-operation has caused Alcoholics Anonymous to become known to more than 12,000 people in urgent need of rescue. Do they never fail? Being human, yes, they do. AA estimates that 50% of the patients stop drinking almost at once, many after reading "alcoholics Anonymous" and without requiring further aid; 25% win through after one or two relapses; the other 25% are frankly doubtful cases. Never do the AAs regard themselves as "cured" but they do become total abstainers from liquor. Some of them may shudder at being "saved," but that is, of course, what really happens. And with an estimated 300,000 alcoholics in the country, there is plenty of saving yet to be done. The term "alcoholic" does not apply to the millions of moderate drinkers or even to those who go on occasional benders; it relates only to the problem drinkers who are men overboard and about to go under.

Alcoholics Anonymous and its Foundation take no stand on the liquor question. They are neither wet nor dry, but their purpose for existence leaves no doubt. If you know of an alcoholic who might be helped by their recovery program, AA will tell you if there is a member in your town and where he can be reached. If an eligible person wants to start a chapter, AA will tell him how to go about establishing it, but after that the unit will be on its own. There are no dues, fees, or assessments in Alcoholics Anonymous, and the chief requisite for membership is an earnest desire to stop drinking. And should you want a copy of "Alcoholics Anonymous" which is packed with clearly worded helpfulness buttressed by dramatic case histories, either to give to a friend in despair or to read yourself for its impact as a human document, AA will send it to you direct for $3.50. For an answer to any question you may have about AA, write a letter to Alcoholics Anonymous, Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York 17, New York. In case you order the book, make your check or money order payable to Works Publishing, Inc., at the same address. Literature is sent free with answers to all inquiries.

Alcoholics Anonymous is not an aggregation of saints. Its members are people who have regained their footing in a precarious world hitherto unable to help them, and they have learned how to live happily, usefully, and without fear. No AA need ever be lonesome, for the members are friends held together by an unusual bond, and being largely gregarious, they on through difficulties. Yes, I would reply, and lot's of people don't. We have 18,000 suicides a year and 500,000 asylum inmates. Commitments to state mental hospitals have doubled since the end of World War II. Every day legally sane people swallow a number of tons of sedatives and wash them down with several million gallons of soothing alcoholic beverages, and we're still jittery. If anyone knows of what the ancients used to call "an ever-present help in trouble," it's a public duty, as I see it, to pass it along. Such a help came to me twelve years ago. I had cracked up under pressures which are not uncommon in our times. My wife had taken up with another man, my business was in ruins, and I was trying to get fished out of a morass created by twenty-five years of problem drinking. My mental state was such that I couldn't even ask for a job, much less hold one. I thought frequently of suicide. Then, half-doubting and half-hoping, I took up with some people who were supposed to know how to lay hold of a situation of this kind. They gave me a book called Alcoholics Anonymous, and my eye fell on a remarkable passage. Before I tell you what it said, let me assure the reader that he doesn't have to be an alcoholic to proceed with this article; everyone concerned with open-minded living may find something of interest. This is what the authors promised:

"We are going to know a new freedom and a new happiness. Feelings of uselessness and self-pity, fears of other people and of economic insecurity will leave us. We will intuitively know how to handle situations which used to baffle us. Our whole attitude and outlook on life will change."

I decided to try it—what could I lose? Twelve years later I may ask: Do I ever feel useless and sorry for myself? Has fear of people and poverty left me? Do I always know intuitively what to do? Such perfection has, alas, evaded me; but this I can say: the extravagant promise has come true to an astonishing degree. The seemingly impossible has, indeed, happened—to me and to many. Some 200,000 of us have known these benefits to some extent. The foundation on which we all build is a way of looking at life which, as previously observed, we call The 24-Hour Plan. In essence the plan is to become aware that, if you take on the job of living one day at a time, you'll make it. But there's a good deal more to it than this; it has subtlety and paradox, corollaries and derivatives. I suppose the best way to tell you about it is to look back over the past twelve years and tell about some of my days.

On a cold and rainy November night I went to my first meeting of people enrolled in the Plan. They met in a Y.M.C.A. meeting room, a basement cubicle with cracked plaster and a single unshaded bulb. That first evening I carried away little more than a vague impression that these people were trying to understand what life was mainly about and to live it by workable principles. As time went on I discovered that my first impression had been correct. I had enrolled in a school for living, high in its standards, stern beyond belief with backsliders. If you passed your exams you were marvelously rewarded; punishment for failure-alcoholic relapse-was self-administered and sometimes grim. There was Harry, the handsome state cop who came around off and on, but never seemed to grasp the main, big ideas. One day he pulled the state's car off the road and drew the state's automatic out of its holster and blew out his brains. There was Ed, guiding spirit of a good-sized sales organization, urbane and capable, but clumsy with the simple lessons taught at school. One day he took a train from New York to Philadelphia, rode an elevator up to the top of a tall hotel and jumped off. There was Jane, warned about the danger of brain edema, who pushed her luck too far in an alcoholic experiment, lost her mind and never got it all back. There were others, tragic, unforgettable, teaching vital lessons by their failures. And there were inspiring successes. These last, I gratefully report, were predominant.

In time, just by being around the people who were "on the program," I began to have some ideas about why we have emotional stresses and how The 24-Hour Plan sees us through. People break down, I am quite sure, for the same reason animals in laboratories do-too great expectations, followed by to severe disappointments, too often repeated. The 24-Hour Plan cushions such shocks by encouraging us to gear our hopes to what may reasonably be expected of the day in which we find ourselves.

This brings us directly to the question: What is a day, and what may one reasonably expect of it? Of course, our ordinary days vary according to our involvement. Now and then, however, it's rewarding to take a day, strip it of all its nonessentials and get acquainted with it in its pristine essence. A day, the dictionary says, is the period of the earth's revolution on its axis. One of the finest things that can happen to a person, say devotees of The 24-Hour Plan, is really to come to know a day.

You have to pick your time, though, and be in the mood. The best time for me is after a period when I have had a lot to do with people and am ready for a little solitude. It may sound strange at first, but this complete break from people, this getting by one's self and trying to know a day is, to many of us, one of the essential points of the plan, high in dividends.

I like to get up when it is still dark on the day I have chosen and watch for dawn-the beginning. The way dawn comes is always a special and fine excitement, too often missed. Things seem to know it's coming; the quiet of the night seems to deepen a little just before the first light. Then the light changes and the pre-dawn twilight is there, a filtered presence. I think of the great arc of light advancing over the earth and of all the things greeting it: a forest full of birds in song, a rooster crowing somewhere. Presently the sun breaks the horizon, rapidly clears the earth and begins its climb.

All day I keep track of the sun. If I can manage it, I walk on a wooded road or along a river or lake or the sea; or I drive to a distant place where nobody knows me. I have cleared my project with my family-who understand that apartness is as much of family life as togetherness-and have arranged that business demands be not pressing; then I can give myself to the day. Noon comes. At sea the navigators are watching through their sextants; they check their chronometers and know where they are.

Sunset, twilight, dark, the moon and stars-I begin to know a little where I am too. All the day I have not thought of people, but of earth and sun, daylight and dark. When thoughts of people intrude, I try to choose the people of whom I will think. I pick solitary, day-conscious people-the psalmist lifting his eyes to the hills, from whence came his help, the young prophet walking in the desert and encountering his destiny, the poet considering the lake country of England, the physicist perceiving that space is curved. All are people who have made The 24-Hour Plan's big discovery-that man's rational poise is related to his awareness of time and place, earth and sun.

Sometimes there is a great moment of full knowledge of being an earth creature and belonging, wholly content. This delicious instant is often reported by those who have known the plan-by any name-in depth. It may be described as a sudden intuition that the whole of creation is offered for you, that you are a part of a cosmic creative current, secure. One is not always so fortunate as to know this moment on the day one has chosen. But a moment comes when one knows it's time for the return to people and the hurly-burly, to see what contribution one can make, refreshed.

The 24-Hour Plan is wonderfully flexible. It encompasses whatever we may conclude, on taking inventory in the light of our best understanding, is the major need of that day. It provides for the rhythmic, pulsating quality of life, the thing that Arnold Toynbee, acknowledging that one day's need may not be the same as another's, called the principle of withdrawal and return. Sometimes the difficulty is not too great involvement with people but the opposite-too much of being by ourselves.

The plan divides life into livable, manageable, daily units. This, indeed, was what made it so admirably suited to alcoholics. We knew that swearing off forever was beyond us, but abstinence for a single day was something we could manage. The principle applies to a whole catalogue of trying situations, having nothing to do with alcoholism.

The thing most likely to ruin any 24-hour stretch, we found, are fear and resentment. To enjoy life we had to control these plagues. We acknowledged realistically that other people would sometimes make mistakes and wrong us, but we could not afford to let this make us afraid of them or chronically angry. When we tried daily to tidy up our own behavior, sweeping out the ashes of burned-out grudges and opening the doors to fresh opportunity, we found that perhaps they had not decisively harmed us after all. Resentments, replaced by new interests, died from lack of nourishment.

My twelve years on the plan have been full of emotional peaks and valleys. Because the plan has never let me down, I have come to trust it.

I crossed the first of the valleys after the refusal of my first wife to accept reconciliation. After my seemingly miraculous recovery from alcoholism it was a baffling reversal of everything I had learned to expect of her, and the justice of things. It seemed to me we had been through the worst, that happiness was at last ahead. I loved our children, our home and, despite our misunderstandings, I loved her. It took me a wretched year to accept her determination to carry through a divorce. The plan, as well as the famous A.A. prayer for serenity to accept things we can't change and for courage to change things we can, saw me through this valley.

Then quite unexpectedly, I rose to one of the peaks. A neighbor woman had a bent for matchmaking. She noted my dismal celibacy, recalled a young divorcee who lived with her three youngsters in a neighboring suburb, and wrote notes to both of us. I called on the young lady. It was a click from our first meeting over a Sunday-afternoon cup of hot chocolate. A year later we were married and ever since have known the great happiness of marital harmony and devotion.

Happy marriage, however, cannot ward off calamity, and presently I was to enter the deepest, blackest valley I have yet been called upon to cross. I was careful not to allow my friendship for the children of my first marriage, including a son, to lapse. A father's hopes and plans for his son-how long they incubate, even from his own boyhood, and how they hatch and soar! One night the phone rang, and I was summoned to the hospital to see my son after an accident. The next day he died. I cannot tell here what I felt during the following days and months, or say much about a lonely corridor that haunts my memory even now. But I can say that the plan saw me through.

Meanwhile, life, irrepressible, was bear-ing upward toward another peak. A baby was on the way. Carl Sandburg once said that a baby was God's idea that human life was worth while. Sandburg was right. When our little girl arrived, even in our grief we found it good to look after the needs of this small and charming, this needing, trusting, appreciative person.

After these heights and depths the business ups and downs seemed almost anti- climactic. True, I coddled a whopping rage for a while when a boss fired me because I could not share his views on local politics. I hit a giddy peak when a new product I had concocted began to find favor with customers. And I slumped into another valley, or at least a gully, when I misjudged demand and wound up $20,000 in the hole.

But nothing has yet happened in these twelve years that has found the plan wanting. If it can produce this wonder for an alcoholic type like myself-edgy, high-strung, mercurial, headstrong, conflict-prone and vain-what might it not do for a normal person, normally beset? It is the lesson of my deepest heart that lets me say truly that The 24-Hour Plan, the decision to bargain for this day alone, is an ever-present help in trouble.

Our experience suggests that nobody can work the plan alone. Some sort of affiliation with some human organization based on some sort of idea that is at least global in scope is essential. We alcoholics have weekly meetings devoted mainly to discussing ramifications of the plan. All churches offer this primary call to the transcendent. So do many fraternal orders. For those who mistrust creeds, organizations like the Unitarian Fellowship bring the challenge of cosmic thought without doctrinaire demands. Service and literary clubs often are bridges to a realm of thought beyond the commonplace. All these groups can provide the ingredient without which the plan cannot work-direct contact with thinking people.

Friends can be of enormous help. When I first undertook the plan I felt I didn't have any. But friends appeared, and two of them-named, by coincidence, Walter B. and Walter C.-contributed important thoughts. Walter C. helped me to understand the rewards of just being quiet, quoting the Chinese proverb: "Muddy water if permitted to remain still will gradually become clear of itself." The more practical Walter B. took me to task one time-when I was trying to bull through an impossible situation-with these words: "Relax; give events a chance to go to work on your side."

Some of my best friends in the plan have been books. Here, as with any other kind of friend, it is individual's choice. I have liked Conquest of fear by Basil King, from its opening line-"When I say that during most of my conscious life I have been prey to fears, I take it for granted that I am expressing the case of the majority of people"-to that memorable assertion-"The life principle is my principle; I cannot cut myself off from it, it cannot cut itself off from me." The New Testament has some fine statements of the Plan: "Give us this day sufficient unto the day" My wife likes Ann Lindbergh's Gift From the Sea, with its special word for mothers and its cry to her sex, "Why have we been seduced into abandoning the timeless inner strength of woman?" I have found things in John Cowper Powys' A Philosophy of Solitude worth remembering: "People find to their astonishment that when they drop their eternal striving and clutching, real happiness flows in upon them in a brimming flood-the art lies in the embrace of those elemental accompaniments of existence which as a rule are taken so stupidly for granted."

If my account of the plan seems to emphasize calamity it's only because bad times always seem so much harder to manage than good. Surely we must not end the narrative without mentioning that an important part of the plan is watching for those small delights-"those elemental accompaniments of existence"-which life is always tossing our way.

One morning last winter I awoke with a vague dread and discontent. The malaise persisted most of the day. During the afternoon the weather grew colder, and by the day's end the temperature had fallen thirty degrees. When I came home, my eight-year-old daughter danced and tugged at my coattails, shouting, "Daddy, daddy, the pond's frozen-take us skating!" I was about to plead too tired, but we were called to the table. After supper we all got our skates and went to the pond. The moon came up and made the big irregular oval and its surrounding woods a glistening, blue-black-and-white fairyland. It was a night of laughter, swift gliding and spills-one I will always remember, and it came unexpectedly out of nowhere.

There have been many such times. One day in late spring I heard the sound of a steam calliope. Now, playing a calliope is to me what being President is to some people. They are about as common where I live as yaks are in Iowa. My musical training never extended much beyond a few boyhood piano lessons; actually to command the instrument of the river boats was almost beyond my daydreams. Nevertheless, there came this haunting desire. I followed the sound a few blocks, and there at the curb sat a man playing the great machine, mounted on a wagon. I was sure that anyone owning such a thing would be selective about who played it. Just the same I asked-shouting, so grand was the din-if I might try.

He smiled and nodded and moved over on the bench, and waved an inviting hand toward the keyboard. I stepped aboard, approaching the big, hot pipes with awe. The quivering, powerful thing now sat waiting my touch, its tense boiler hissing. I played Farmer in the Dell over and over, the great steamboat sounds whistling, fooping, boop-aloooping over the landscape for miles in all directions and upward God knows how far. It was all part of the plan, and it contains a lesson-if a chance to play a steam calliope can come to me, any good thing can happen to anybody.

"Give events a chance to work on your side," Walter B. had said. This is no Pollyanna happy piece; some days we get nowhere, and when they're over, all you can say is that you've suffered through another day. But even that is an accomplishment when your passing through one of the valleys. Some things are healed only by time, administered in 24-hour lots. Its mere passage brings one closer to that restoration that makes it possible to begin living creatively again. Thus have people been living their daily stints for a million years, through an incredible variety of shifting circumstances.

Failure to hold fast to this truth has cost many a life, swept away in a fit of temporary disappointment. A neighbor of mine, a literary man, worked for four years on a novel, shipped it to market, then fell into despair during the weeks of waiting for a publisher to decide. One evening he drove his car into his garage, closed the door and started the engine. This widow and children are now living well on the royalties and movie rights-the book was an international success.

Myron Williams, 4/36, ("Hindsight")

Granted, this is more than "seven more," but that is because some of these folks drank again and came back (two dates next to their name)

Most, as you can see, were stories in the First Edition.

I have a list of the first 100 (more or less). I'll see if I can find it.

Hello, AA History Lovers, I am trying to find information on who the first 12 members to join Alcoholics Anonymous were and the order in which they joined? The source of information used to determine this is also helpful.

Thank you,
Keith M.

The list of attendance at [Alcoholic] OG "Parties" in the Dr Bob Papers at Brown University suggests that six of the next seven (after Bill W., Dr. Bob, Bill D.) were Phil S. (present from 1935), Walter B. (from Mar 1936), Tom L. (Jun 1936), Paul S. (Jun 1936), Joe D. (Jun 1936), and Bob O. (Jun 1936). Ernie G.'s name does not appear. -- JL

The National Committee is not concerned with beverage alcohol itself. We take no sides in that ancient tug of war. We state flatly, in fact, that this organization, the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism, and all its affiliated committees—twenty-two of them at this date—are neither "wet" nor "dry." We go further. We state that this organization shall not concern itself in any activities designed to promote or prevent the sale or consumption of alcoholic beverages.

Our concern is with a disease called alcoholism and its victims, those hapless, suffering human beings who are known as alcoholics.

We recognized, as did others concerned with the problem of alcoholism, that practically nothing was known by the general public of this disease. We realized that because of this lack of knowledge, the public attitude ranged from utter ignorance, through apathy and indifference, up to prejudice and active antagonism. The public attitude reflects not only a total lack of factual knowledge, but also the presence of a mass of misinformation and falsehoods. Out of this attitude has grown the type of treatment which the citizens of these United States have given and still give to that segment of the population who suffer from this illness. I think you know what that treatment is as well as I do. It is hostile, contemptuous, and punitive. It is completely without understanding and often without pity.

In most cities in this country there is no place to put the alcoholic who is in the throes of this deadly malady, except the local jail. We, as a nation, are not wont to treat our sick in that fashion. We are not cruel and barbarous. We are not medieval. We pride ourselves on being enlightened; and we are, on the whole, a kind people. Yet to a great body of sick human beings we offer only punishment for their illness. We behave as if we were still in the Middle Ages.

This attitude is shared by those who suffer from this illness. I can tell you from my own experience. I had never heard the word "alcoholic;" I had never heard the word "alcoholism." Of course, I had heard of drunkards; everyone has, I also knew, or thought I knew, what a drunkard was. He was that unfortunate person whom one saw in the less pretty part of town, shuffling about in rags, bearded, unwashed, sleeping in doorways, in gutters, sticking out filthy hands for a dime for a cup of coffee. You hoped he wouldn't touch you.

If I had given any thought to the subject, I would have described him as a person who had never had the opportunity to know a normal way of life. Or if by chance he had been born to better things, he had something missing, something that made him unable to take advantage of his opportunities. I would have said that there was nothing that could be done about it; and if there were, he wouldn't be worth salvaging as there wasn't anything there in the first place.

How can a man who still has a job or has recently lost his job through drinking come out openly and say: "I am a drunkard; I have no will power; I have no character; I am a bum"? He isn't and knows he isn't. He is faced with the same dilemma in which I found myself: Why is it that my will power is so strong on everything else and has no effect on drinking?

The wall of ignorance and prejudice nearly killed me, and it is killing other alcoholics every day. If we can break that wall down we can reach these people and help them. In every city where we have information centers they are coming and asking for information, and their families and friends and employers are coming. They are all asking: "What is this thing, alcoholism?" "What can we do about it?" "Where can we go in this city for help?" The centers that have been established have the answers. They know what hospital will take alcoholics and whether there are any such places in the community; whether others can be persuaded to admit alcoholics and what can be, at long last, provided for these desperately sick people. Can we provide medical treatment that will prevent their deaths? Yes, we can, and we must.

I know, by virtue of my own position as an alcoholic, thousands of men and women who have recovered from this illness. I can assure you from my personal experience that these people make better than average citizens. It is as if they felt they had to make up for lost time. They put themselves into things with twice the amount of energy of anyone else. They work harder at it and give more of themselves. These people are well worth saving, and yet today we are allowing them to die right and left.

This situation must be changed. It is our belief that it will be changed when the public is placed in possession of the facts. That is the challenging task which we have accepted. We wished to make these facts as simple as possible that they might be understood by every man, woman, and child in this country. In order to do this, we adopted three simple concepts which are printed on each piece of our literature, and which our speakers reiterate over and over again throughout the cities of this land. These concepts are simple, but they are revolutionary in content, for they embody an attitude which is exactly the opposite to that shown by our actions in the past. We believe that when these concepts are accepted into the thinking of the people of America, a change in their actions must result. The three concepts are as follows: 1) Alcoholism is a disease, and the alcoholic is a sick person.

2) The alcoholic can be helped and is worth helping.

3) Alcoholism is a public-health problem and therefore a public responsibility.

The fact that alcoholism is a disease has been known to science for more than a century and a half. Many great Americans of the last century recognized this fact, although it was an English doctor who, in 1778, wrote the first modern treatise on the diagnosis and treatment of the disease of alcoholism. The Connecticut Medical Society recognized alcoholism as a disease requiring special treatment and hospitals for that treatment in a resolution it presented to the Connecticut State Legislature in 1830.

I myself was ashamed when I learned these things. Yet I was not to blame for my ignorance, for I had never been taught any such facts. Just the same, it is curious, is it not, that scientific facts well known to science for such a long period should never have become common knowledge? The normal gap, they tell me, between a scientific discovery and its acceptance by the public is twenty years. Why in the case of alcoholism should this gap be so extended? We are late in starting, but we are trying desperately to bridge that gap as speedily and as effectively as possible now. This, in short, is our primary objective.

Our second concept, that the alcoholic can be helped and is worth helping, is a statement that could not have been made even ten years ago from a public platform, because it could not have been proved. Although there have always been alcoholics who got well by one means or another and walked among us as normal human beings, they dared not mention what the nature of their illness had been. The stigma attached to alcoholism was so great that, if people knew the truth, these recovered alcoholics might have jeopardized their whole future—their jobs, their family relationships, their place in society. Not until the creation of Alcoholics Anonymous twelve years ago was there any change in this situation.

Then for the first time alcoholics began to get well in numbers. Banded together in groups, they had the strength to face the hostile world and to talk of this illness from which they had recovered. They talked so that other alcoholics might learn the truth about their condition, and seek help. Their voices were heard. Today Alcoholics Anonymous numbers more than 35,000 active members. These are well and happy people, prosperous citizens who have returned to their places in their communities. They are assets—no longer liabilities. They make good citizens, these people who a few years ago were a stone around the neck of everyone who knew them; a care and a burden and a terrible cost to themselves, their families, their employers, and their communities. Liabilities in every sense, they represented not only appalling economic waste, but also the most terrible human waste, heartbreak, broken homes, and tragedies of every sort. Yet today they are assets. These people can be seen and they are known for their accomplishments. They are the living proof of our second concept.

Our last concept, that this is a public-health problem and therefore a public responsibility, follows inevitably upon acceptance of the other two. This is our job, yours and mine, as citizens and human beings. We, the people, create public attitudes and we can change them. The majority of the estimated three million alcoholics in this country fall into the category of what I call the hidden alcoholic. These are usually persons who have some family left, and that family will go to any length to hide the fact that alcoholism has struck in their midst. In their opinion the shame and degradation of publicity far outweighs the welfare of the alcoholic. The alcoholic is "protected," hidden from view, but actually he is being prevented from getting help. Not until the stigma is removed and alcoholism is discussed as freely and as openly as any other illness, will these people dare to seek help. We must remove this stigma if we are to save thousands from unnecessary deaths.

So our efforts cannot stop with a mere change in public opinion. We must see to it that there are other places than jails in which to put these sick people when they are in the delirium of their sickness-acute intoxication. We must set up information centers where individuals, families, friends, agencies, doctors, and ministers can go to get the facts on the disease itself, and on the facilities available in that area for its treatment. These centers must ceaselessly carry on an intensive campaign of education in their communities, aimed at uncovering hidden alcoholics and providing an environment of enlightened unstanding in which recovery will be possible.

Most communities will find that there are not many facilities other than the local group of Alcoholics Anonymous about which they can give information. Yet other facilities will be needed. Therefore, these organized groups must next undertake the difficult task of persuading general hospitals to open beds for the treatment of acute alcoholism. This is a matter of crisis, of extreme emergency, in which the lack of immediate medical treatment all too frequently causes death. Next they will need a clinic for diagnosis and treatment, and later they will need rest centers for those who require long-term care.

We can now say that we know this program of community action is a beginning toward the solution of the problem which is so appalling in its devastation and waste. We can say we know because we already have twenty-two such affiliated committees operating in eighteen cities throughout the country, and the progress they report is more than encouraging. It has convinced us that we can solve the problem of alcoholism in America, if we will.

Several have expressed question/concern over Bill D. AA#3. My post was referring to the statement on page 159, "A year and six months later these three [Bill W. Dr Bob, and Bill D.] had succeeded with seven more." Thus, Bill D is not included in the list I posted as he is one of the "three."

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS

Second of seven articles on alcoholIn personal and public health

We in Alcoholics Anonymous-more than 60,000 men and women-have found a way of life that for us has solved the problem of alcoholism.

To some of us the word "alcoholic" presented a problem almost as great as our abnormal drinking. Our picture of the alcoholic: The stumbling creature of the skid roads of our bigger cities; the town drunkard, half clown, half bogy man, of our smaller communities; or the hapless, hopeless, desperate "repeater" of the state and private hospitals, the "cures", the workhouses.

The majority of us weren't that kind of drinker. We maintained a home. We supported our families. We had a position in the community. True, we drank more than most people but that didn't make us fit our concept of the alcoholic.

For such of us Alcoholics Anonymous said: We believe that an alcoholic is simply an uncontrolled drinker. We believe that the alcoholic is one whose life has become unmanageable because of his drinking. We believe that, if a man's drinking is interfering seriously with a normal way of life in his domestic, social or business affairs, that the man might well examine himself honestly, objectively, to determine if he has passed the thin line that separates the uncontrolled drinker from the controlled drinker.

To others of us, the word "alcoholic" and the AA definition of an alcoholic, came as a blessed relief. The thought had nagged us that no sane man would continue to drink as we were drinking. We had drifted into the twilight zone of the mind where the real and the fancied were becoming tangled. We were beginning to fear that out-and-out insanity lay just around the bend.

To both groups bitter experience lent credence to the suggestion that certain human beings were allergic to alcohol; that certain persons were so constituted as to make them hypersensitive to the effects of alcohol; that alcohol was a disease or a symptom, perhaps, of a deeper disease.

This put a new light on alcoholism. We were not wrestling merely with a moral problem. We were not simply afflicted by darkness of intellect, weakness of will and sheer orneriness of personality.

The next step was the attack on the obsession common to alcoholics-that somehow, somewhere, sometime they will be able to drink in a controlled manner. Despite the alcoholic's past, despite the facts of the record, there is in the alcoholic this obsession that tomorrow, the next time he can drink in moderation.

The true nature of the obsession began to appear when a cold and analytic examination of the alcoholic's record was made in company with men and women whose own records presented a startling parallel. And what did the record show? That over no considerable period had the alcoholic been able to drink in a temperate manner; that despite the devices he had tried-some elaborate, some ingenious, some just plain silly-and despite the seeming safeguards he had set up, there was always but one ending to his experiments with alcohol-he had drunk to excess.

There was the further attack on the obsession in the testimony of the group experience of Alcoholics Anonymous and in the findings of the physician and the psychiatrist, that once a man had passed the line that separates the uncontrolled drinker from the controlled drinker, there was no returning; that never again could he hope to drink in a controlled manner.

Here is the stark factual picture for the alcoholic; That never can he hope to drink except to excess; that as the years go on the little enjoyment becomes less and, if he persists in drinking, the material suffering, the physical suffering, the mental anguish grow worse. If there is any semblance of sanity left in the alcoholic, he sees the need for a decision. With the help of men and women whom he recognizes as having been through the same meatgrinder he has experienced, the alcoholic is aided in arriving at the one proper decision—to put alcohol out of his life.

When a man embraces the way of life of Alcoholics Anonymous, he makes no promise, he takes no pledge that never again will he drink.

We say to him: "Can you quit drinking for twenty-four hours?"

"Certainly," he says. "Anybody can quit drinking for twenty-four hours."

"Well," we say, "that's all we want you to strive for—to quit drinking for twenty-four hours."

And then we add: "Twenty-four hours at a time."

To the alcoholic the prospect of living out his life with never another drink opens a dim and dubious vista. It seems an endless, difficult trail.

But the thought of staying dry just for today, that seems simple, comparatively easy. And it is.

This may strike some as a childish device, a playing with words, a paltering with a problem.

What we in Alcoholics Anonymous are interested in is the result. And what is the result of this twenty-four hour program and how does it work out?

It cuts down the problem of alcoholism from a huge complex, bewildering, life-long problem to the simple task of here and now.

It closes the door on the past with its sighs over what might have been, its dolorous regrets over lost opportunity, its rankling remorse.

It bars the door to the future with its daydreams of easy conquest, its castles in Spain, its substitution of the wish for the deed.

It introduces order into the life of the alcoholic. It demands an end to procrastination.

Because it is a chain of his own forging, a chain he is at liberty to toss aside if he will, the alcoholic finds the chain easy to bear. The days slip by. And the weeks. Then the months.

The alcoholic realizes of a sudden that he has achieved a term of sobriety.

Meanwhile his mind has cleared. He sees the benefits of a life without alcohol. His will to remain sober is strengthened by each day of dryness.

He has found a formula for cutting life to a size he can grapple with and he adopts it for all his affairs.

He has found new friends, close friends, friends who understand him better than those of years standing. As one alcoholic tells it: "The difference between being in Alcoholics Anonymous and trying to stay dry by myself is the difference between being at liberty and in solitary confinement." This group therapy is important, highly important.

But the driving force of Alcoholics Anonymous is spiritual, a belief in and a dependence on a Higher Power-God, as the alcoholic understands Him. No attempt will be made here at amplification of this statement because this phase of the Alcoholics Anonymous program is a highly individualistic one, a concept and a relationship that each alcoholic works out for himself.

Alcoholics Anonymous was founded 12 years ago in Akron, Ohio, in a providential meeting between an Akron surgeon and the New York investment counselor who had the thought of the program.

The New Yorker was bemoaning the fact that he couldn't persuade other alcoholics to accept the means by which he had achieved sobriety after a spectacular career in alcoholism.

The surgeon suggested maybe the New Yorker had been operating in the belief that in talking with other alcoholics, he was conferring the favor; that he was Lady Bountiful with the basket of groceries visiting the poor. Out of their discussion came the recognition that the sober alcoholic, in talking with the drinking alcoholic, is conferring the favor on himself.

This has become basic in AA procedure-that we seek to aid other alcoholics primarily to aid ourselves. This has proved out the adage that he who seeks to teach others convinces himself.

It has put our whole teaching program on a selfishly realistic basis. It has kept excesses of zeal to a minimum. It has forestalled smugness with its fatal dryrot. It has tempered the evangelistic spirit with humility and humor. It has restrained more than one well meaning sobered alcoholic from becoming a "reformer," a fanatic or a plain pest.

There is sound psychology in our work with other alcoholics. Seeing an alcoholic on his bed of pain, fresh from the horrors of a ringtailed, chandelier-hanging binge emphasizes sharply to the sober alcoholic the contrast between his present well-being and his chaotic past.

And with each new man or woman the sober alcoholic brings into Alcoholics Anonymous comes a heightened sense of responsibility, a deeper satisfaction and a buttressed resolve to continue living without alcohol.

Many a psychiatrist has suggested to the alcoholic that interest in a hobby be one to which the alcoholic can devote the rest of his life, a hobby in which his interest will never flag. The hobby? Building himself into the kind of personality he has always wanted to be. Seeking to live his own concept of the perfect life.

We have seen alcoholics tackle lesser hobbies. We have seen how, after the first flare of enthusiasm, there was a lessening interest, finally a positive distaste-and then, more drinking.

Not so with the hobby which is himself. Nor does Alcoholics Anonymous rest content with suggesting this hobby to the new member. It provides a series of exercises in self-discipline, the help and counsel of his new friends, experienced friends, and the incentives of regained self respect, the sense of achievement and of group approval by which this personality change may be effected.

Man being a social creature hungers for companionship, for fellowship. He reaches the fullness of his powers, the fullness of his content in that society which is a larger picture of himself. So it is for the alcoholic who comes into Alcoholics Anonymous. There is complete understand of the suffering he has undergone; there is sympathy, without condescension; pity, without the alloy of superiority; a fellow feeling which preaches most forcibly by example.

"All walks of life" is an ancient and hackneyed phrase. Yet in truth there is no phrase to describe the 60,000 men and women in Alcoholics Anonymous. Alcohol is no respecter of persons. Which is why we number in our ranks members from nearly every trade, every occupation, every profession, every station and every class.

In the early days of the movement most of the men who came to us were 40 and over, most of the women in their 30s. As word of our program spread, the average age of entrants began to drop. We started to attract men in their 30s, women in their late20s.

Since the end of the war there has been an influx of younger men and women, just two, three, four years past their majority. Confirmed alcoholics at that age? Certainly. These young folk have found they can not drink in a controlled manner. Rather than waste years in a vain struggle with alcohol, they have courageously accepted the fact of their alcoholism and are building lives in which alcohol will play no part.

The war didn't make alcoholics of them. It simply speeded up the process. Young men away from the restraints of home began their alcoholic careers at an earlier age. Young women, bored with a comparatively manless existence, turned to drinking at "hen parties," and the customary percentage found they were alcoholic.

How does one become a member of Alcoholics Anonymous? In most of the 1,200 communities where we have groups, there is a listing in the telephone book. If no telephone is listed in your community, a telephone call to the city editor or your local daily paper usually brings the information. Or interested persons may address the Alcoholic Foundation, P.O. Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York City.

For the relative or friend who wishes to help an alcoholic and who hesitates at bringing up the subject, we suggest the family physician or clergyman as an effective agent in directing the alcoholic to consult our group.

Sometimes desperate wives or parents have asked that members of our group call uninvited on the alcoholic, engage him with conversation about baseball, the high cost of living or the threat of the atomic bomb, and then, presto, switch the subject to alcoholism.

This subterfuge just does not work. We are not slight of hand performers nor high-pressure salesmen. Such a procedure, we have found, may well antagonize the alcoholic and set his mind against Alcoholics Anonymous as a band of meddling busybodies.

All that we ask of the alcoholic is that he know the reason for our coming, that he give us a few minutes that we may tell our story.

We know that most alcoholics have long since ceased to enjoy drinking. We know that most alcoholics are seeking a way out of their alcoholic trap.

The comic verse about the over-whelming love of "one drunken gent for another" has a deal of truth in it. There is a bond between alcoholics. Within minutes the alcoholic and the AA members are "talking turkey."

Often the prospect admits his alcoholism but is fearful it will become known he has joined Alcoholics Anonymous. We can assure him, and with honesty, his fears are groundless. It is accepted group practice that no member divulges the membership of another member unless he has definite and specific permission to do so, and then only under unusual circumstances. Anonymity is observed and preserved.

Many times the first visit brings the alcoholic into our group. Again it may be the alcoholic's obsession persuades him that he can handle the problem. Or it may be that he is not ready to make a decision to quit drinking. But the seed has been planted, and usually we hear from him later-if he doesn't die meanwhile.

If the alcoholic is not yet ready, he is not badgered to join us. We have learned that the man who joins under duress has small chances of success. We are content to wait until he makes up his mind. When that comes, we know he is well on his way to victory.

Alcoholics Anonymous is a group of people bound together by their interest in solving a problem common to them. It is a fellowship rather than an organization in the formal sense of that word. It has no officers, no initiation fees, no dues. It is open to anyone who has an alcoholic problem and a sincere desire to solve it.

It is a matter of record that our program can solve the alcoholic's problem. As a footnote, we'd like to add that it's fun, too.

If no telephone is listed in your community, a telephone call to the city editor or your local daily paper usually brings the information. Or interested persons may address the Alcoholic Foundation, P.O. Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York City.

For the relative or friend who wishes to help an alcoholic and who hesitates at bringing up the subject, we suggest the family physician or clergyman as an effective agent in directing the alcoholic to consult our group.

Sometimes desperate wives or parents have asked that members of our group call uninvited on the alcoholic, engage him with conversation about baseball, the high cost of living or the threat of the atomic bomb, and then, presto, switch the subject to alcoholism.

This subterfuge just does not work. We are not slight of hand performers nor high-pressure salesmen. Such a procedure, we have found, may well antagonize the alcoholic and set his mind against Alcoholics Anonymous as a band of meddling busybodies.

All that we ask of the alcoholic is that he know the reason for our coming, that he give us a few minutes that we may tell our story.

We know that most alcoholics have long since ceased to enjoy drinking. We know that most alcoholics are seeking a way out of their alcoholic trap.

The comic verse about the over-whelming love of "one drunken gent for another" has a deal of truth in it. There is a bond between alcoholics. Within minutes the alcoholic and the AA members are "talking turkey."

Often the prospect admits his alcoholism but is fearful it will become known he has joined Alcoholics Anonymous. We can assure him, and with honesty, his fears are groundless. It is accepted group practice that no member divulges the membership of another member unless he has definite and specific permission to do so, and then only under unusual circumstances. Anonymity is observed and preserved.

Many times the first visit brings the alcoholic into our group. Again it may be the alcoholic's obsession persuades him that he can handle the problem. Or it may be that he is not ready to make a decision to quit drinking. But the seed has been planted, and usually we hear from him later-if he doesn't die meanwhile.

If the alcoholic is not yet ready, he is not badgered to join us. We have learned that the man who joins under duress has small chances of success. We are content to wait until he makes up his mind. When that comes, we know he is well on his way to victory.

Alcoholics Anonymous is a group of people bound together by their interest in solving a problem common to them. It is a fellowship rather than an organization in the formal sense of that word. It has no officers, no initiation fees, no dues. It is open to anyone who has an alcoholic problem and a sincere desire to solve it.

It is a matter of record that our program can solve the alcoholic's problem. As a footnote, we'd like to add that it's fun, too.

The ambulance attendant who gave me the drink was only doing the humanitarian thing. When you've got an alcoholic on your hands the first rule is to give him the alcohol he seems to need. You leave it to the doctors and nurses to sober him up.

But I fooled the doctors and nurses during the three months that I was confined in the hospital. At least I thought I did, which is the same thing to an alcoholic. The first day there I managed to get a quart of rye. There are usually people in hospitals who think they are being kind in smuggling booze to you.

When I was nearing the end of my stay my nurse came and sat on my bed. "Of course you won't admit it," she said, "But you're an alcoholic. Why don't you do something about it?"

"Of course I'm not an alcoholic," I said. "I've simply had a little bad luck."

She whipped out of the room with a cringing of her starched skirts. I reached under the covers of my bed. I took a long pull at a pint I had hidden there. Stupid fool! Me, an alcoholic.

Let's go back a little. I started what was then called social drinking a few years after college. I got married. I entered radio publicity. In 1927 I went with National Broadcasting Company and was soon promoted. I was going great guns.

At the same time I was doing more drinking. At home I drank only when we had guests, though I always found the need to have three or four extra snorts on the side. I was beginning to fall into a drinker's pattern, but I didn't know it.

Then my wife left me. She took my two sons with her. This startled me, because she said that she left me because I drank too much. Ridiculous! Why, I only drank as every other businessman did. But she left me nevertheless. Within two years I was married again. This time I was going to show the world, particularly my first wife.

I showed her all right. I was now living in a 14-room house in a swanky Connecticut suburb; sitting pretty. I left the National Broadcasting Company to go with a famous advertising firm. I did a lot of traveling and naturally I did a lot of drinking on my trips. How, otherwise, could you entertain the customers? Ah, how otherwise!

Eventually I was eased out of that firm and it never occurred to me why. They gave me a thousand reasons but not the real reason, which was that I couldn't hold my liquor. Other men could, but I couldn't

I was then elected president of an agency specializing in radio and I felt pretty good. But strangely enough, I was eased out of that company also. Then I went with another big advertising agency. It was about six months before I was eased out of there.

When I lost that job I had been married, the second time, about seven years. My job was gone but I was confident that on the following Monday I would start on a much better one; all I had to do was say the word. So I proceeded to go home and to announce to my wife that on this week end I was really going on a binge. I guess I did. I don't remember.

On Monday I woke up in a hospital. This was the Norwich State Hospital for the Insane, at Norwich, Connecticut. I explained to a nurse that I had been drinking a little too much and that my wife had sent me here for a couple of weeks to sober up.

"Two weeks!" said the nurse. "Do you know you've been in here for two years?"

I was, too. My wife apparently had been more fed up than I realized. She had signed the papers committing me. The first time she came she was sorry, but it was not until five months later that we were able to convince the State of Connecticut that I should be let out. One reason for the aplomb that got me out was that in this hospital, try as I might, I couldn't sneak a drink.

When at last I got out I found that my wife had gone to live with her parents and she had taken the children with her. She had disposed of practically everything we owned in our beautiful 14-room house. What did I do? You guessed it. You're going to guess it so often that I'll now try to give you a listing of the hospitals I was in - for excessive drinking - after that.

Plattsburg, with which I started this story. Broken hip.

Metropolitan Hospital, Welfare Island, New York. Delirium tremens.

Bellevue Hospital, New York, more than a dozen times. This was in the psychopathic or "drunk" ward, naturally.

And, oh yes, before any of this started there was a stretch at New York's Medical Center, where I paid $25 a day for room and keep for a so-called "nervous breakdown." I did not realize that it was alcohol that caused my "nervousness." I never had the guts to put the blame where it belonged.

But let's go back to the time I left Norwich. I crawled out of there with my tail between my legs and I found my wife had left and I went on a series of benders. No wife could tell me where to get off!

I left Connecticut. New York was better; there were more people to borrow from. I still had "friends" at NBC and other places. I used to hang around NBC at five in the afternoon, waiting for people to come out. I put the bee on all of them: five dollars today, two dollars tomorrow, three the next day.

I always tried to borrow at least two dollars. One dollar for my room in a cheap hotel, the other dollar for the half-pint that would put me to sleep. On at least one occasion I found myself sleeping on the grass with a 25-cent bottle of sherry in my hand. I say I found myself. Actually a policeman found me and told me to get going. Although it was late September I was well-dressed (so I thought) in a filthy white Palm Beach suit and a pair of white shoes that were mostly black.

"I'm no drunken bum," said I to the cop resentfully.

To myself I was still the important personage who for years had been a prominent executive. I knew that if people would stop picking on me I would be back on my feet tomorrow. Always tomorrow.

Then my friends ganged up and sent me to Plattsburg. When I got out of the Plattsburg Hospital, on crutches, I fondly expected my wife to feel sorry for me and let me come home. She didn't. She was done with me.

I thought my sister was done with me too. But my sister, bless her heart, wasn't done with me. She knew a man, the brother of a friend of hers. She sent him to see me.

He told me the story of his life, which was much like mine. He asked me to go to the home of a man in Brooklyn who had gathered around him a dozen other men and women who also had stories like mine. They came for me in a car; they practically carried me up the steps to my first meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous.

I walked in on a group of 30 or 40 who looked happy and sober. I thought they were a bunch of holier-than-thou's who would try to make me over into their own pattern. But these people offered me friendship without criticism. They came and got me each week, and I finally came to understand that they had a set of principles which, if I followed them, would enable me to lead a better life. But I still kept my tongue in my cheek. They could call themselves alcoholics. I never would, because I wasn't one.

This was just six years before I finally admitted in an Alcoholics Anonymous meeting, humbly and sincerely, that I too was an alcoholic.

The contact with these people did something to me. I got back into the National Broadcasting Company. I stayed cold sober for about two years. Then for a few years I drank, but very carefully. I managed to keep my job; as a matter of fact, I again went up the scale very rapidly. An advertising agency took me away from NBC and I thought that was a feather in my cap.

I married again, for the third time. I now felt so sure of myself that I went on a toot. My wife and I had some arguments about the fact that I was drinking again. I told her not to be silly, that I had the thing under complete control. She was a trained nurse. She knew all the symptoms. She simply moved faster than the others and saved herself a lot of grief. At the end of five weeks she left me. For good. That was my third strike.

I was very sorry for myself and-you've guessed it again. Presently I became unconscious with the D.T.'s for ten days. The advertising agency was swell to me, but eventually its patience wore out and I was fired again. Because I didn't have any money left I was sent to the public hospital on Welfare Island.

God knows how I came out of it, but I did. God knows how I got a job, but I did. I got a job with one of the biggest of all advertising agencies, and I thumbed my nose at all my critics. This time I would show them! I showed them by going on a bender. Needless to say I lost this job too.

I was then being sent to the psychopathic ward at Bellevue Hospital. The authorities finally got tired of seeing me there, where they would sober you up for five days and then turn you loose, only to have you reappear again. If you were a repeater long enough there was still another fate in store for you-the Rockland State Hospital, where if you were once elected to membership it might be good for life. The grapevine at Bellevue told me I was going to be sent to Rockland. That scared me stiff.

I needed a cigarette; I didn't have one; I didn't even have the money for one. There was a visitor sitting by the bed next to mine. He was smoking, so I put on my best smile and bummed a cigarette from him. Then I entered into small talk by way of talking to him. Was this his first visit to Bellevue?

He said, casually, "I'm just a member of A.A. This is my day to visit patients."

"You mean you're a member of Alcoholics Anonymous?"

"Sure." He grinned at me.

I was scared. Moreover, the truth had been beginning to dawn on me-the truth that I was an alcoholic. It had been coming very painfully-but it was coming.

I stammered, "I once-well, I wasn't exactly a member, but I went to a lot of meetings. I mean of A.A. Do you think-?"

The man smiled. "Take it easy, son-you can't do it all by yourself." Then he dumped a pack of cigarets on my bed and walked out.

That same day five different members of Alcoholics Anonymous came to call on me. They talked. I listened. Eventually they got me out of Bellevue. I have never been back there-and I have never taken a drink since.

I started attending A.A. meetings again, but now, instead of being in a private house in Brooklyn, they were held in a big building in Manhattan, with bowling alleys and pool tables, a cafeteria and rooms for bridge and poker. Instead of three or four dozen people hanging around there now were hundreds.

But it wasn't this material progress of the A.A. movement that got me. It was literally a spiritual awakening. Maybe I can't explain it but I'll try.

I took an honest fearless inventory of myself-the first of my life. I became willing to have my faults removed, instead of trying, always futilely, to remove them myself. I became humble enough to ask help from a higher power. Yes, God, though you don't have to believe in God: just a higher power, the power that makes the world go around, or any other conception of a power greater than yourself.

Since then I have tried through meditation and prayer to increase my conscious contact with that higher power. I have tried to make amends for the wrongs I have done, and I have tried to pass my experiences along to those who are having similar troubles. I have tried to practice the principles of A.A. in my daily contact with my fellow men. This article is an example of what I mean. It isn't any fun to bare my past as a souse. But I do it gladly in the hope that the telling may help some other souse not to be one.

I speak of the principles of A.A. They are all written. Anyone can read them all in 20 seconds. But the basis of the program is not in learning something by rote. The success of the program is simply in living for others instead of for yourself.

And the program works. I find that I am finding genuine happiness in helping other people. I believe that I have gained the respect of my former employers. I know I have regained the love of members of my family with whom I still have contact.

Certain things are gone. My three attempts at marriage-they are gone, of course. My children have been taken from me-but if I ever meet them, I will at least be the kind of person they won't be ashamed of.

We can't retrace our steps. All we can do is to live every day as it is dealt out to us. We do what we can today to make up for our yesterdays; that is all we can do. While we may have dreams for tomorrow, we don't live tomorrow today-but living today, really living today, we find our tomorrows are never like yesterday.

This is the story of a brilliant man who very nearly sacrificed his whole life to liquor. It makes shocking reading, but every word of it is true

I WAS AN ALCOHOLIC

As told to Gerald Mygatt

Memo From The Editor: the name of the teller of this story is purposely omitted. He says his friends and former associates will recognize him. To others his name does not matter. But if your interest is not merely casual, if you or a friend or a member of your family need his help, write to The Alcoholic Foundation, P.O. In the fall of 1938, I was working in a small radio station in Plattsburg, New York. On a cold night in November I had chills and fever. I sent for a doctor who told me I had incipient pneumonia.

Some time during the night, delirious, I fell down the stair well of my rooming house and smashed my hip. I was in the hospital for three-months and when I came out I knew I was crippled for life. But none of that annoyed me as much as the fact that some well-meaning ambulance attendant had given me a drink of whisky before my late-night arrival at the hospital. Because they could smell it on my breath, I was booked as drunk...

Now I'll tell you the real story of what happened. I had been sent to Plattsburg by some friends who wanted to get me out of New York City. I had been making a mess of myself in New York, cadging money for drinks. So my friends found a job for me in Plattsburg. At $25 a week.

I had been earning nearly ten times that much; $25 a week was pin money. So-you guessed it-I hit the bottle a little harder. On the night I fell down the stair well I wasn't delirious. I was drunk and I fell over the bannisters.

The ambulance attendant who gave me the drink was only doing the humanitarian thing. When you've got an alcoholic on your hands the first rule is to give him the alcohol he seems to need. You leave it to the doctors and nurses to sober him up.

We can't retrace our steps. All we can do is to live every day as it is dealt out to us. We do what we can today to make up for our yesterdays; that is all we can do. While we may have dreams for tomorrow, we don't live abandon.

Now we think you can take it! Here are the steps we took, which are suggested as your Program of Recovery:

1. Admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care and direction of God as we understood Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. Were entirely willing that God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly, on our knees, asked Him to remove our shortcomings - holding nothing back.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make complete amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our contact with God, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.
12. Having had a spiritual experience as the result of this course of action, we tried to carry this message to others, especially alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

You may exclaim, "What an order! I can't go through with it." Do not be discouraged. No one among us has been able to maintain anything like perfect adherence to these principles. We are not saints. The point is, that we are willing to grow along spiritual lines. The principles we have set down are guides to progress. We claim spiritual progress rather than spiritual perfection.

Our description of the alcoholic, the chapter to the agnostic, and our personal adventures before and after, have been designed to sell you three pertinent ideas:

- (a) That you are alcoholic and cannot manage your own life.
- (b) That probably no human power can relieve your alcoholism.
- (c) That God can and will.

If you are not convinced on these vital issues, you ought to re-read the book to this point or else throw it away!

If you are convinced, you are now at step three, which is that you make a decision to turn your will and your life over to God as you understand Him. Just what do we mean by that, and just what do we do?

The first requirement is that you see that any life run on self-will can hardly be a success. On that basis we are almost always in collision with something or somebody, even though our motives may be good. Most people try to live by self-propulsion. Each person is like an actor who wants to run the whole show: is forever trying to arrange the lights, the ballet, the scenery and the rest of the players in his own way. If his arrangements would only stay put, if only people would do as he wishes, the show would be great. Everybody, including himself, would be pleased. Life would be wonderful. In trying to make these arrangements our actor may sometimes be quite virtuous. He may be kind, considerate, patient, generous; even modest and self-sacrificing. On the other hand, he may be mean, egotistical, selfish and dishonest. But, as with most humans, he is more likely to have varied traits.

What usually happens? The show doesn't come off very well. He begins to think life doesn't treat him right. He decides to exert himself some more. He becomes, on the next occasion, still more demanding or gracious, as the case may be. Still the play does not suit him. Admitting he may be somewhat at fault, he is sure that other people are more to blame. He becomes angry, indignant, self-pitying. What is his basic trouble? Is he not really a self-seeker even when trying to be kind? Is he not a victim of the delusion that he can wrest satisfaction and happiness out of this world if he only manages well? Is it not evident to all the rest of the players that these are the things he wants? And do not his actions make each of them wish to retaliate, snatching all they can get out of the show? Is he not, even in his best moments, a producer of confusion rather than harmony?

Our actor is self-centered - ego-centric, as people like to call it nowadays. He is like the retired business man who lolls in the Florida sunshine in the winter complaining of the sad state of the nation; the preacher who sighs over the sins of the twentieth century; politicians and reformers who are sure all would be Utopia if the rest of the world would only behave; the outlaw safe cracker who thinks society has wronged him; and the alcoholic who has lost all and is locked up. Whatever their protestations, are not these people mostly concerned with themselves, their resentments, or their self-pity?

Selfishness - self-centeredness! That, we think, is the root of our troubles. Driven by a hundred forms of fear, self-delusion, self-seeking, and self-pity, we step on the toes of our fellows and they retaliate. Sometimes they hurt us, seemingly, without provocation, but we invariably find that at some time in the past we have made decisions based on self, which later placed us in a position to be hurt. So our troubles, we think, are basically of our own making. They arise out of ourselves, and the alcoholic is almost the most extreme example that could be found of self-will run riot, though he usually doesn't think so. Above everything, we alcoholics must be rid of this selfishness. We must, or it kills us! God makes that possible. And there is no way of entirely getting rid of self without Him. You may have moral and philosophical convictions galore, but you can't live up to them even though you would like to. Neither can you reduce your self-centeredness much by wishing or trying on your own power. You must have God's help.

This is the how and why of it. First of all, quit playing God yourself. It doesn't work. Next, decide that hereafter in this drama of life, God is going to be your Director. He is the Principal; you are to be His agent. He is the Father, and you are His child. Get that simple relationship straight. Most good ideas are simple and this concept is to be the keystone of the new and triumphant arch through which you will pass to freedom.

When you sincerely take such a position, all sorts of remarkable things follow. You have a new Employer. Being all powerful, He must necessarily provide what you need, if you keep close to Him and perform His work well. Established on such a footing you become less and less interested in yourself, your little plans and designs. More and more you become interested in seeing what you can contribute to life. As you feel new power flow in, as you enjoy peace of mind, as you discover you can face life successfully, as you become conscious of His presence, you begin to lose your fear of today, tomorrow, or the hereafter. You will have been reborn.

Get down upon your knees and say to your Maker, as you understand Him: "God, I offer myself to Thee - to build with me and to do with me as Thou wilt. Relieve me of the bondage of self, that I may better do Thy will. Take away my difficulties, that victory over them may bear witness to those I would help of Thy Power, Thy Love, and Thy Way of life. May I do Thy will always!" Think well before taking this step. Be sure you are ready; that you can at last abandon yourself utterly to Him.

It is very desirable that you make your decision with an understanding person. It may be your wife, your best friend, your spiritual adviser, but remember it is better to meet God alone than with one who might misunderstand. You must decide this for yourself. The wording of your decision is, of course, quite optional so long as you express the idea, voicing it without reservation. This decision is only a beginning, though if honestly and humbly made, an effect, sometimes a very great one, will be felt at once.

Next we launch out on a course of vigorous action, the first step of which is a personal housecleaning, which you have never in all probability attempted. Though your decision is a vital and crucial step, it can have little permanent effect unless at once followed by a strenuous effort to face, and to be rid of, the things in yourself which have been blocking you. Your liquor is but a symptom. Let's now get down to basic causes and conditions.

Therefore, you start upon a personal inventory. This is step four. A business which takes no regular inventory usually goes broke. Taking a commercial inventory is a fact-finding and a fact-facing process. It is an effort to discover the truth about the stock-in-trade. Its object is to disclose damaged or unsalable goods, to get rid of them promptly and without regret. If the owner of the business is to be successful, he cannot fool himself about values.

We do exactly the same thing with our lives. We take stock honestly. First, we search out the flaws in our make-up which have caused our failure. Being convinced that self, manifested in various ways, is what has defeated us, we consider its common manifestations.

Resentment is the "number one" offender. It destroys more alcoholics than anything else. From it stem all forms of spiritual disease, for we have been not only mentally and physically ill, we have been spiritually sick. When the spiritual malady is overcome, we straighten out mentally and physically. In dealing with resentments, we set them on paper. List people, institutions or principles with whom you are angry. Ask yourself why you are angry. In most cases it will be found that your self-esteem, your pocketbook, your ambitions, your personal relationships, (including sex) are hurt or threatened. So you are sore. You are "burned up."

On your grudge list set opposite each name your injuries. Is it your self-esteem, your security, your ambitions, your personal, or your sex relations, which have been interfered with?

Be as definite as this example:

I'm resentful at: The Cause Affects my:

Mr. Brown His attention to my wife. Sex relations.

Self-esteem (fear)

Told my wife of my mistress. Sex relations.

Self-esteem (fear)

Brown may get my job at the office. Security.

Self-esteem (fear)

Mrs. Jones She's a nut-she snubbed me.

She committed her husband for Personal relation-drinking.He's my friend.She's ship.Self-esteem

a gossip. (fear)

My employer Unreasonable - Unjust - Overbearing - Threatens to fire me for Self-esteem (fear) drinking and padding my expense Security account.

My wife Misunderstands and nags.Likes Pride - Personal

Brown. Wants house put in her name. and sex relations-

Security (fear)

Go on through the list back through your lifetime. Nothing counts but thoroughness and honesty. When you are finished consider it carefully. The first thing apparent to you is that this world and its people are often quite wrong. To conclude that others are wrong is as far as most of us ever get. The usual outcome is that people continue to wrong you and you stay sore. Sometimes it is remorse and then you are sore at yourself. But the more you fight and try to have your way, the worse matters get. Isn't that so? As in war, victors only seem to win. Your moments of triumph are short-lived.

It is plain that a way of life which includes deep resentment leads only to futility and unhappiness. To the precise extent that we permit these, do we squander the hours that might have been worth while. But with the alcoholic whose only hope is the maintenance and growth of a spiritual experience, this business of resentment is infinitely grave. We find that it is fatal. For when harboring such feelings we shut ourselves off from the sunlight of the Spirit. The insanity of alcohol returns and we drink again. And with us, to drink is to die.

If we are to live, we must be free of anger. The grouch and the brainstorm are not for us. They may be the dubious luxury of normal men, but for alcoholics these things are poison.

Turn back to your list, for it holds the key to your future. You must be prepared to look at it from an entirely different angle. You will begin to see that the world and its people really dominate you. In your present state, the wrongdoing of others, fancied or real, has power to actually kill you. How shall you escape? You see that these resentments must be mastered, but how? You cannot wish them away any more than alcohol.

This is our course: realize at once that the people who wrong you are spiritually sick. Though you don't like their symptoms and the way these disturb you, they, like yourself, are sick, too. Ask God to help you show them the same tolerance, pity, and patience that you would cheerfully grant a friend who has cancer. When a person next offends, say to yourself "This is a sick man. How can I be helpful to him? God save me from being angry. Thy will be done."

Never argue. Never retaliate. You wouldn't treat sick people that way. If you do, you destroy your chance of being helpful. You cannot be helpful to all people, but at least God will show you how to take a kindly and tolerant view of each and everyone.

Take up your list again. Putting out of your mind the wrongs others have done, resolutely look for your own mistakes. Where have you been selfish, dishonest, self-seeking and frightened? Though a situation may not be entirely your fault, disregard the other person involved entirely. See where you have been to blame. This is your inventory, not the other man's. When you see your fault write it down on the list. See it before you in black and white. Admit your wrongs honestly and be willing to set these matters straight.

You will notice that the word fear is bracketed alongside the difficulties with Mr. Brown, Mrs. Jones, your employer, and your wife. This short word somehow touches about every aspect of our lives. It is an evil and corroding thread; the fabric of our existence is shot through with it. It sets in motion trains of circumstances which bring us misfortune we feel we don't deserve. But did not we, ourselves, set the ball rolling? Sometimes we think fear ought to be classed with stealing as a sin. It seems to cause more trouble.

Review your fears thoroughly. Put them on paper, even though you have no resentment in connection with them. Ask yourself why you have them. Isn't it because self-reliance has failed you? Self-reliance was good as far as it went, but it didn't go far enough. Some of us once had great self-confidence, but it didn't fully solve the fear problem, or any other. When it made us cocky, it was worse.

Perhaps there is a better way - we think so. For you are now to go on a different basis; the basis of trusting and relying upon God. You are to trust infinite God rather than your finite self. You are in the world to play the role he assigns. Just to the extent that you do as you think He would have you, and humbly rely on Him, does He enable you to match calamity with serenity.

You must never apologize to anyone for depending upon your Creator. You can laugh at those who think spirituality the way of weakness. Paradoxically, it is the way of strength. The verdict of the ages is that faith means courage. All men of faith have courage. They trust their God. Never apologize for God. Instead let Him demonstrate, through you, what He can do. Ask Him to remove your fear and direct your attention to what He would have you be. At once, you will commence to outgrow fear.

Now about sex. You can probably stand an overhauling there. We needed it. But above all, let's be sensible on this question. It's so easy to get way off the track. Here we find human opinions running to extremes - absurd extremes, perhaps. One set of voices cry that sex is a lust of our lower nature, a base necessity of procreation. Then we have the voices who cry for sex and more sex; who bewail the institution of marriage; who think that most of the troubles of the race are traceable to sex causes. They think we do not have enough of it, or that it isn't the right kind. They see its significance everywhere. One school would allow man no flavor for his fare and the other would have us all on a straight pepper diet. We want to stay out of this controversy. We do not want to be the arbiter of anyone's sex conduct. We all have sex problems. We'd hardly be human if we didn't. What can we do about them?

Review your own conduct over the years past. Where have you been selfish, dishonest, or inconsiderate? Whom did you hurt? Did you unjustifiably arouse jealousy, suspicion or bitterness? Where you were at fault, what should you have done instead? Get this all down on paper and look at it.

In this way you can shape a sane and sound ideal for your future sex life. Subject each relation to this test - is it selfish or not? Ask God to mould your ideals and help you to live up to them. Remember always that your sex powers are God-given, and therefore good, neither to be used lightly or selfishly nor to be despised and loathed.

Whatever your ideal may be, you must be willing to grow toward it. You must be willing to make amends where you have done harm, provided that you will not bring about still more harm in so doing.

In other words, treat sex as you would any other problem. In meditation, ask God what you should do about each specific matter. The right answer will come, if you want it.

God alone can judge your sex situation. Counsel with persons is often desirable, but let God be the final judge. Remember that some people are as fanatical about sex as others are loose. Avoid hysterical thinking or advice.

Suppose you fall short of the chosen ideal and stumble. Does this mean you are going to get drunk? Some people will tell you so. If they do, it will be only a half-truth. It depends on you and your motive. If you are sorry for what you have done, and have the honest desire to let God take you to better things, you will be forgiven and will have learned your lesson. If you are not sorry, and your conduct continues to harm others, you are quite sure to drink. We are not theorizing. These are facts out of our experience.

To sum up about sex: earnestly pray for the right ideal, for guidance in each questionable situation, for sanity, and for the strength to do the right thing. If sex is very troublesome, throw yourself the harder into helping others. Think of their needs and work for them. This will take you out of yourself. It will quiet the imperious urge, when to yield would mean heartache.

If you have been thorough about your personal inventory, you have written down a lot by this time. You have listed and analyzed your resentments. You have begun to comprehend their futility and their fatality. You have commenced to see their terrible destructiveness. You have begun to learn tolerance, patience and good will toward all men, even your enemies, for you know them to be sick people. You have listed the people you have hurt by your conduct, and you are willing to straighten out the past if you can.

In this book you read again and again that God did for us what we could not do for ourselves. We hope you are convinced now that He can remove the self-will that has blocked you off from Him. You have made your decision. You have made an inventory of the grosser handicaps you have. You have made a good beginning, for you have swallowed and digested some big chunks of truth about yourself. Are you willing to go on?

We are gathered here because we are faced with the fact that we are powerless over alcohol and unable to do anything about it without the help of a Power greater than ourselves.

We feel that each person's religious views, if any, are his own affair. The simple purpose of the program of Alcoholics Anonymous is to show what may be done to enlist the aid of a Power greater than ourselves regardless of what our individual conception of that Power may be.

In order to form a habit of depending upon and referring all we do to that Power, we must at first apply ourselves with some diligence. By often repeating these acts, they become habitual and the help rendered becomes natural to us.

We have all come to know that as alcoholics we are suffering from a serious illness for which medicine has no cure.

Our condition may be the result of an allergy which makes us different from other people. It has never been by any treatment with which we are familiar, permanently cured. The only relief we have to offer is absolute abstinence, the second meaning of A.A.

There are no dues or fees. The only requirement for membership is a desire to stop drinking. Each member squares his debt by helping others to recover.

An Alcoholics Anonymous is an alcoholic who through application and adherence to the A.A. program has forsworn the use of any and all alcoholic beverage in any form.

The moment he takes so much as one drop of beer, wine, spirits or any other alcoholic beverage he automatically loses all status as a member of Alcoholics Anonymous.

A.A. is not interested in sobering up drunks who are not sincere in their desire to remain sober for all time. Not being reformers, we offer our experience only to those who want it.

We have a way out on which we can absolutely agree and on which we can join in harmonious action. Rarely have we seen a person fail who has thoroughly followed our program. Those who do not recover are people who will not or simply cannot give themselves to this simple program. Now you may like this program or you may not, but the fact remains, it works. It is our only chance to recover.

There is a vast amount of fun in the A.A. fellowship. Some people might be shocked at our seeming worldliness and levity but just underneath there lies a deadly earnestness and a full realization that we must put first things first and with each of us the first thing is our alcoholic problem. To drink is to die. Faith must work twenty-four hours a day in and through us or we perish.

In order to set our tone for this meeting I ask that we bow our heads in a few moments of silent prayer and meditation. I wish to remind you that whatever is said at this meeting expresses our own individual opinion as of today and as of up to this moment.

We do not speak for A.A. as a whole and you are free to agree or disagree as you see fit, in fact, it is suggested that you pay no attention to anything which might not be reconciled with what is in the A.A. Big Book.

If you don't have a Big Book, it's time you bought you one. Read it, study it, live with it, loan it, scatter it, and then learn from it what it means to be an A.A.

This is know as the Texas Preamble.

Texas Preamble:

A few months after the Grapevine published the Preamble in June, 1947, Ollie L., Dick F., and Searcy W. decided to beef it up for the drunks in Texas. "We worked on it, passed it around, and agreed on this version," says Searcy W. "It's now read by groups throughout the state." It works for Searcy. He's been sober 54 years.

Hi Group,

I had this sent to me recently and I don't have a clue if it is true or not, but it makes for an interesting read.

Any of you oldtimers recognize this and give me a hint if it historically accurate or not

AA Old Preamble - 1940

We are gathered here because we are faced with the fact that we are powerless over alcohol and unable to do anything about it without the help of a Power greater than ourselves.

We feel that each person's religious views, if any, are his own affair. The simple purpose of the program of Alcoholics Anonymous is to show what may be done to enlist the aid of a Power greater than ourselves regardless of what our individual conception of that Power may be.

In order to form a habit of depending upon and referring all we do to that Power, we must at first apply ourselves with some diligence. By often repeating these acts, they become habitual and the help rendered becomes natural to us.

We have all come to know that as alcoholics we are suffering from a serious illness for which medicine has no cure.

Our condition may be the result of an allergy which makes us different from other people. It has never been by any treatment with which we are familiar, permanently cured. The only relief we have to offer is absolute abstinence, the second meaning of A.A.

There are no dues or fees. The only requirement for membership is a desire to stop drinking. Each member squares his debt by helping others to recover.

An Alcoholics Anonymous is an alcoholic who through application and adherence to the A.A. program has forsworn the use of any and all alcoholic beverage in any form.

The moment he takes so much as one drop of beer, wine, spirits or any other alcoholic beverage he automatically loses all status as a member of Alcoholics Anonymous.

A.A. is not interested in sobering up drunks who are not sincere in their desire to remain sober for all time. Not being reformers, we offer our experience only to those who want it.

We have a way out on which we can absolutely agree and on which we can join in harmonious action. Rarely have we seen a person fail who has thoroughly followed our program. Those who do not recover are people who will not or simply cannot give themselves to this simple program. Now you may like this program or you may not, but the fact remains, it works. It is our only chance to recover.

There is a vast amount of fun in the A.A. fellowship. Some people might be shocked at our seeming worldliness and levity but just underneath there lies a deadly earnestness and a full realization that we must put first things first and with each of us the first thing is our alcoholic problem. To drink is to die. Faith must work twenty-four hours a day in and through us or we perish.

Even "interested parties" had difficulty in tracing it. Then, in quick succession, members intervened in police court cases at Worthing and Hasting on behalf of people charged with being drunk and disorderly. Without revealing their names, they told the magistrates that, in their opinion, the accused could be cured.

The anonymous witness at Hastings Police Court was a man who had risen to a high position among his fellow-citizens, but had been on the brink of disaster through his addiction to alcohol. He succeeded in re-establishing himself as a useful member of society. Like all members of Alcoholics Anonymous, he frankly describes himself as an ex-alcoholic. He now reveals his identity as Mr. E.C.V. Symonds. "Less than a year ago," he says, "I was a three-bottle a day man, drinking pernod, vodka, calvados - anything to get strong drink."

Mr. Symonds conquered his craving, joined Alcoholics Anonymous, and does not now touch alcohol. Like all members, he is determined to help others overcome their handicap. An expert in "natural therapy" and "hypnotism," "Vernon" (members of Alcoholics Anonymous are only known by their Christian names) has gone further than the fellowship in his determination to combat alcoholism and to help individual drunkards.

While Alcoholics Anonymous concentrates on a spiritual cure, Vernon adds very practical measures which, strictly speaking, are outside the province of the organization. The basis for his curative efforts are the "twelve steps" which can be described as the constitution of Alcoholics Anonymous. First of these is "honest self-appraisal": We admitted that we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.

The next points consist of statements of belief in a greater power which can restore alcoholics to sanity: a "humble request to God" to remove shortcomings; a decision to make amends to all persons wronged.

The monthly journal: The A.A. Grapevine, published in the United States, puts it like this: "Alcoholics Anonymous is a fellowship of men and women who share their experience, strength and hope with each other that they may solve their common problem and help others to recover from alcoholism. The only requirement for membership is an honest desire to stop drinking. A.A. has no dues or fees. It is not allied with any sect, denomination, politics, organization or institution; does not wish to engage in any controversy, neither endorses nor opposes any causes. Our primary purpose is to stay sober and help other alcoholics to achieve sobriety."

That is the catechism of the "alkies" - as alcoholics call themselves in America. They hold meetings once or twice a week, discuss their experiences, exchange ideas, strengthen each other's beliefs and offer moral support to fellow-members. It has been like this since the movement began in Ohio in 1935, when a stockbroker and a doctor, both alcoholics, resolve to cure each other. Within a year, there were forty members. Today there are more than 100,000 in the United States. After the war, British groups began to function, chiefly in London, Manchester, Bolton and along the south coast.

At first it was chiefly hurried notes scribbled in a police cell by a drunken man, or calls from patients in mental homes which brought members of A.A. to the side of a new aspirant for membership. Now alcoholics Anonymous is open to a wider circle. Their telephone number is appearing in the new directory this month. Ring Bishopsgate 9657, and your call will be answered by Alcoholics Anonymous.

Medical authorities, in fact, are not quite agreed on what constitutes alcoholism. But my inquiries have produced a startling common denominator. All the self-confessed alcoholics I met hate alcohol in their sober moments. They know that it is the enemy, and that they are powerless once they begin to drink.

"For months I keep off it," said a successful doctor when I met him at the clinic. "Then by accident, or because of some upset, I have a couple of drinks. At once I get a craving for more and my capacity is great. When 'time' is called at a pub I move on in search of more liquor. Why, when ever the night clubs close I make my way to Covent Garden, where the pubs for the market people open early in the morning."

This man's latest debauch lasted a full fortnight until he was eventually picked up by Vernon, who took him to his clinic. Covered in mud, the doctor had literally dragged himself through a dozen gutters. His experience is typical. A well-known woman author and alcoholic told me that she disliked the taste of liquor but that she drank two bottles a day until her collapse. And an accountant who in his normal moments looks "as sober as a judge," confessed that after a domestic conflict he drank eau-de-Cologne and switched to lighter fuel before ending up with methylated spirits.

It is with such situations that Alcoholics Anonymous must cope. They insist that most doctors, clergymen, psychologists and probation officers who are called in to help an alcoholic, have the disadvantage of not really understanding his mind" "Only a habitual drunkard can understand his fellow-sufferer," is the view of A.A. The secretary of the British branches, who calls himself "Dick," is satisfied with the progress and success of the fellowship. "We now number around 500 members," he told me, "and meet regularly to discuss our problems. Yes, I was an alcoholic myself."

The small membership of Alcoholics Anonymous in Britain is a testimony to the sobriety of the people. Charges have been steadily declining for many decades.

A well-known publican said that drunkenness is today the least of his trade's worries. Only very occasionally does he have to deal with customers who have overstepped the mark, and long experience in observation across the bar enables him to discover a potential trouble-maker long before the man himself realizes that he is getting "under the influence."

Practically every one of these customers is outside the demoralization, pernicious real of real alcoholism. For the true alcoholic, many experts claim, there is no cure - except rigid teetotalism. Doctors in this country are now experimenting with a new drug, antabuse, and are reporting a fair average of success. This drug turns people against the taste of alcohol, but it is too early yet to say whether it can achieve a permanent cure. Such results, according to Alcoholics Anonymous, can only be obtained by an act of faith, as their fellowship suggests.

My investigations show that the most difficult aspect of such a spiritual cure is the "first step." It is extremely difficult for an alcoholic who has reached a low moral and physical standard after prolonged indulgence to "snap out of it." Even if his bout lands him in jail his cravings persists because he faces another personal crisis from which the only escape seems to be renewed alcoholic insensibility. As soon as the victim of alcohol is released he again begins to "drown his sorrows" to sink his shame and dishonour.

That is where a combination of spiritual approach and physical treatment comes in. "I have been through it all myself," Vernon explained, when I visited his clinic, where he treats no more than four patients at a time. "Therefore I am never amazed, never surprised by alcoholics; I am not unconcerned with their worries but I do not pander to their tendencies of egocentricity. Neither, frankly, will I stand any nonsense from the recalcitrant."

His view is that all appearances of an "institution" should be avoided. His own home is a pleasant country house standing in its own grounds. Here patients, distinguished, dignified-looking people, go for walks, spend their time gardening, exercise their bodies, take steam baths and electrical treatment, eat mostly fruit and vegetables, and enjoy the companionship of fellow-sufferers. In no circumstances are drugs administered. A drop of alcohol to calm down a "bad case" is the limit.

Emphasis is still laid on re-education, and hypnosis plays its part. But it is essential to develop in the alcoholics, a strong feeling for his fellow-alcoholic, and in this respect Vernon recalls some spectacular successes. "On one occasion," he told me, "A patient was in bed anxiously awaiting the visit of a business partner. The latter, alas, arrived very drunk. There being no other bed free, the patient got up to vacate his own to the greater sufferer."

Such reaction seems to show that the principles of Alcoholics Anonymous are sound. Alcoholism, it is said, is a mental defect which rigid application of RECURRENT trips to jail for the poverty-stricken inebriate, recriminations and preaching at the well-heeled drunkard will soon be replaced in New Haven and Hartford by a trip to the clinic.

In each city, a diagnostic and guidance clinic will be opened in the near future, to be known as the Yale Plan Clinic, under the sponsorship of the Laboratory of Applied Physiology of Yale University and the Connecticut State Prison Association, where alcoholics, rich and poor alike, will be offered scientific help.

No new "cure" for inebriety has been discovered; the clinics will approach the problem from the point of view that the alcoholic is a sick man and should be treated as such.

The alcoholic is either led to his excessive drinking by a sickness of his personality or his personality has become disordered in the course of many years of heavy drinking.

Unless the alcoholic realizes that he is sick, and unless his friends and relatives, and the general public, realize that excessive drinking is a disease and not just "weakness" or "pure meanness," there is little hope for the rehabilitation of the alcoholic.

Threats and punishment, scandal and divorce do not cure the alcoholic; they may even drive him deeper into his habit. What he needs is help - physical and mental help in solving the problems which have given him his disease.

Unfortunately, the popular belief that the alcoholic merely lacks strength of character is much the same as was the attitude toward the mentally ill a century ago, when the insane were put in prisons, or whipped.

From time to time the public hears that some "cure" has been found for excessive drinking. This is never true, for there is no specific remedy for helpless dependence upon alcohol, in the sense that there is a cure for diphtheria, or in the sense that there are definite means for controlling the consequences of diabetes.

There can be no cure for alcoholism. The treatment must be fitted to the cause.

There are however, various ways and means by which the problem drinker can be helped to overcome his habit, provided always that he wants to be helped.

The ways and means used are as many as there are kinds of problem drinkers; there is no "medicine" which will cure the craving for alcohol, nor is there some standard method which can be used in the treatment of any problem drinker.

Today there are probably 600,000 men and women in this country who need medical aid because of their excessive drinking.

While this seems like a large number, it is nevertheless true that only a small percent of those who drink become alcoholics, and there are some 45 million people in this country who use alcoholic beverages. Out of every 1,000 users about 13 eventually become problem drinkers -that is, no more than 1.3 percent.

Between one and a half and two million people drink heavily enough to be in danger of becoming problem drinkers. Wide dissemination of the scientific facts about the excessive use of alcohol and the reasons behind excessive drinking may help to prevent at least some of these people from continuing on their dangerous paths to alcoholic doom.

The 600,000 problem drinkers should not be thought of as a group of like people. They are no more alike in their temperaments and personalities than a group of people who contracted typhoid fever would be. And, unlike typhoid fever, in alcoholism it is not the "germ" which must be treated but the man himself.

Just as all kinds of personalities are represented among problem drinkers, so are all social, economic and educational levels. The fact that most of the "'common drunks" we see on the streets are from the lower economic levels does not mean that such people are more liable to become heavy drinkers; there are simply more people on this level.

The well-to-do produce an even greater proportion of inebriates, on a basis of population. We know, for instance, that about 20 percent of those admitted to hospitals and sanitariums for mental disorders are able to afford the relatively high costs of private institutions, which means that they come from the upper income brackets.

The most familiar alcoholic is the "bum" on the dreary treadmill: he gets drunk, is arrested, sentenced to a few days in jail, released, gets drunk, is arrested --and so it goes. After a time, the sentences may grow longer, perhaps a few months.

But no matter how long he is in jail, he resumes his career of drunkenness as soon as he is freed. The jail sentence is definitely not a remedy for inebriety.

The "bums" clog up the jails and are a burden on the courts, the police, and the taxpayers. A solution to their problem is imperative.

Less well known to the general public are the inebriate playboy and the glamour girl, who do their too heavy drinking in the comparative privacy of nightclubs, from which they are regularly carried home in taxis or in their own limousines, or their maids and valets may know of their disease.

Even less exposed to the public eye is the business executive who drinks either in his exclusive club or at his private bar. His associates anxiously guard his secret and squelch whatever rumors get out.

There is no single reason why people seek intoxication; alcohol can fulfill so many conditions that it can be taken for many reasons.

It may be baffled ambition, with consequence disgust for the world and a desire to escape from it. A man may be a square peg in a round hole - and drink to escape himself.

Drunkenness seems to be a rather coarse and bestial pastime, but there are many highly sensitive souls among the excessive drinkers - people whose ideals are so much in conflict with the hard necessities of life that they have to drink themselves into a stupor before they can tolerate existence.

The great Edgar Allan Poe was one of these. Such people, despite their genius, suffer from an inner lack of self-confidence which bars them from productive work. Only when the barrier is removed by alcohol can they shed the fetters of self-critique and, feeling "On top of the world," produce the literature or art or music which was locked up inside themselves.

Alcohol does not create this things; it merely releases them, possibly in a less perfect form than some means of release other than alcohol might have given them. Alcohol does not stimulate genius. It puts to sleep the forces which have held it down.

Most people are not geniuses; they are led to excessive drinking by boredom, by frustration, by social problems, by economic difficulties and family troubles. But all the excessive drinkers, sooner or later, develop a common characteristic - that of damaged physical and mental health.

Deficiency diseases develop from improper nutrition: and all excessive drinkers fall victims to other ills because their bodies have lost their normal resistance. Their moral stamina is undermined.

They become unreliable, an increasing burden to their friends and relatives and to the community. They disrupt their families and expose their children to misery as well as to the example of intemperance.

When the alcoholic finally realizes that he cannot continue his injurious course of life, he seeks for ways and means by which he can drink without doing harm, or by which he can drink less and still satisfy his longing.

There are no such ways and means. For the inebriate there is only one way out, and that is never to drink again.

As a rule, it takes him long to realize this. And it takes even longer before he will admit to himself that he can not achieve this without help from the outside.

When the inebriate enters the clinics (he must be sober, for these are not sobering up stations or hangover cures) he will be interviewed by a psychiatrist who will endeavor to discover those deeply hidden conflicts, disappointments, anxieties, disaffection's or boredom which led him to his craving for intoxication.

Then social workers will endeavor to reconstruct the life history of the patient from records and sources including the family.

Psychologists will determine the picture of his abilities and limitations. A physician will give him a thorough physical examination.

The psychiatrist will then combine the results of all these examinations, which would give him a picture of the type of man or woman he has before him, the influences which contributed toward the excessive drinking, and the psychological resources and liabilities of the patient.

According to the total picture thus presented, he will determine the kind of treatment which promises the best prospects and successful results.

The treatment, of course, will depend on the temperament, personality, family, and social situation of the patient. It will not be given by the clinics; the psychiatrist will recommend what treatment the patient should receive.

There may be some among those referred to the clinics who are found to have mental disorders in which heavy drinking is quite incidental. In such cases, treatment for the mental disorder in a state mental hospital is the only possible recommendation. They cannot be treated for drinking, since this is merely a symptom of the disease.

The psychiatrist may find in some individuals a certain readiness for religious experience. If such readiness is developed into its full possibilities the religious experience may offer a solution.

In a case of this sort, the patient may be referred to a minister.

Occasionally a patient with a readiness for religious experience may be referred to that courageous group of men and women known as Alcoholics Anonymous.

Those who have contracted the disease of inebriety through compliance with the customs of a hard drinking social set, rather than through inner difficulties, may be referred to a physician skilled in what is known as the "aversion" or conditioned reflex treatment.

In this type of treatment, an aversion to alcoholic beverages is created in the patient by means of certain drugs, and when the aversion is well established, psychological pressure is applied to reinforce the newly acquired habit of abstinence.

There may be cases in which it appears to the psychiatrist that all the patient needs is to be given a chance to use certain unemployment abilities or ambitions.

In such cases the patient will be put in touch with agencies which can offer the opportunities. In some cases the clinics may help to establish contact with an appropriate employer.

Yale to Rehabilitate Alcoholics alcoholic," you may remark-but smile when you say that! Intoxication is not proof of alcoholism. Plenty of grandmothers used to get potted on "female remedies," but they weren't compulsive drinkers. They wore their white ribbons in utter honesty.

On the other hand, a true alcoholic may never seem to be drunk at all. Bob, a young sales agency executive, was like that. He always had an edge on, but you had to know him very well to suspect it. A different kind of alcoholic was a 35-year-old architect whom we'll call Fred. For months at a time he would be on the wagon, doing good and brilliant work. Then he would disappear, to be eventually discovered helplessly drunk in the wreckage of his bottle-strewn apartment. Periodically, Fred lands a new job which always seems to pay a little less than the one he drank himself out of.

Clearly there are drinkers and drinkers; and the vast majority of person who take a nip do not arrive at the problem stage. But there are an estimated 800,000 compulsive drinkers in the country - a staggering public health problem, not helped by the fact that the realistic voices of scientists have an almost hopeless time making themselves heard. Indeed, basing this article solely upon the analytical findings of specialists who know alcoholism best, the risk is being run that violence almost certainly will be done to the popular fables, misconceptions, and irrelevant concepts of "morality" that have muddied a problem which is, essentially, one of human illness.

Not even that superb movie, The Lost Weekend, conveys an entirely accurate picture, in the opinions of researchers in alcoholism. The reasons why the Don Birnam of that enthralling production became an alcoholic are glossed over. Not all alcoholics are like him. More important, the spectator may draw the conclusion that alcoholics cannot be cured and that doctors and specialists are tough hearted hombres with little to offer the chronic drunk. The truth is that thousands of ex-alcoholics have been restored to positions of trust, responsibility and esteem in their communities. Strictly speaking, alcoholism cannot be "cured." Neither can tuberculosis. But doctors can arrest the disease's progress. And when the arrest endures for a lifetime, the practical results are the same as cure.

A popular attitude is that the alcoholic enjoys drinking and should be punished for overindulging his pleasure. No alcoholic ever drinks for fun. He drinks because he has to in order to feel normal. Neither the teetotaler nor the social drinker can understand the sometimes terrifying psychic pain that drives the alcoholic to bottled anesthesia. He is a sick man. If alcoholism is not a disease in itself, it is at least a symptom of a disease.

There are alcoholics who drink to ease pain. There are others, usually of low intelligence, without family or business responsibilities-bums-who have time on their hands, little to occupy them and no particular reason to stay sober. But the typical problem drinker is one whose personality is so maladjusted, so un-grownup, that there is continual agonizing friction between himself and the world of reality. The compulsive drinker, like everybody else, is a man with problems. The difference is that he uses alcohol to "solve" his problems. He tries to build up a 100-proof insulating wall between himself and the world of responsibilities.

No one has ever identified the drink that is "one too many," that pushes a man over the hazy borderline of controlled drinking into the danger zone of alcoholism.

But there are warning signs aplenty. Dr. Robert V. Seliger, assistant visiting psychiatrist of Johns Hopkins Hospital and an authority on problem drinking, has listed thirty-five red flags. Many other workers are agreed upon symptoms that ought to paralyze the elbows of potential chronic alcoholics. Here are some of the most important:

When you need a drink to quiet the "shakes."

When you become a morning drinker.

When you need "a hair of the dog that bit you." One specialist warns that "only a confirmed or potential alcoholic can tolerate the morning after, without nausea."

When you become a solitary drinker.

When despite loss of reputation, loss of working efficiency, loss of standing with family and friends, you can't give up or reduce drinking.

When nothing but a drink can make up feel at ease with the world.

Some of these symptoms indicate that the habit is pretty well advanced. Can a man tell before reaching that stage whether he is the kind in whom drinking is likely to become uncontrollable? In a general way, racial studies indicate that Mediterranean peoples are less likely to use liquor to excess than persons of northern European background. Too, your occupation has some bearing on your susceptibility. Salesmen, especially the high-pressure type, are at the top of the list. Jobs which require you to hoist one with prospects pretty frequently, and which involve considerable tension and nervous drive, seem to fertilize the soil in which alcoholism flourishes. Advertising men, brokers, and similar professionals bottle themselves up in comparatively high numbers.

But compulsive drinking is, above everything, an individual problem. Let us examine some of the personality factors commonly found in connection with it.

The typical alcoholic, according to statistics compiled by Dr. Merrill Moore, begins drinking in the last two years of high school or the first two years of college. At first it is ordinary social drinking. After a couple of years he advances to the occasional spree stage, which lasts for about a decade. There is a gradual trend towards solitary drinking. Finally, after some twenty years of imbibing, he arrives at the point where he must have medical care—on the average, at age 40.

Yet the roots of his trouble are in his childhood. Typically, the alcoholic has parent trouble, though neither he nor his parents may realize it. His father may be stern and exacting, or so upright and successful that the son feels it is hopeless to try to compete with him. Sometimes there is undue pampering; more often, rigid standards of unquestioning obedience. In either case, normal relations between him and his father or other men are handicapped. He may not be able to hold his own with his group in school, in athletics, in social life.

Altogether, he grows up with a terrible feeling of insecurity. In an emotional sense, in fact, he doesn't grow up. He shrinks from the give-and-take tests of the world, is so dreadfully fearful of failure that he won't try to succeed, and seeks desperately for some means of escape. Alcohol - anesthetizing, consoling, socially approved and convenient - becomes his way out.

An alcoholic is not necessarily a man with a hollow leg. The relation of constitution to temperament has been illuminated by Dr. W.H. Sheldon of Harvard University. In brief, he finds that the stoutish, heavy-set man of pleasant digestion and phlegmatic temperament relaxes and enjoys other people under alcohol. The more athletic fellow, bold, muscular, and adventurous, reacts assertively and aggressively to alcohol. The man for whom alcohol is practically poisonous is likely to be spare, lean, inhibited, crowd-hating, solitary, and mentally overintense.

Alcohol is always a depressant, never a stimulant. And it works from the top down. That is, it depresses higher functions—inhibition, speech, fine motor co-ordination—in descending order. From this, one can derive a rough yard-stick of drunkenness. The earliest stage (often thought of as stimulation, but really a depression of inhibitions) is the pleasurable, relaxed unself-consciousness that is also the last stage for normal drinkers to whom alcohol is a controlled social accessory. But as the depression descends to lower levels, triggers are released that give the shrewd observer considerable insight into the alcoholic personality.

For instance, the solitary drunk ordinarily is punishing his worst enemy, the one he fears most—himself. The drunk who beats his wife is giving vent to contempt, hatred, and yen to punish womanhood, perhaps to get even for a domineering mother. The weepy drunk is the regressing infant. The drunk who wants to fight has a frustrated, unconscious rage against the whole world of men outside himself. And the drunk who gets amorous has complex difficulties in the sexual sphere. Typically, the alcoholic's alleged love affairs rank high in quality. To hear him tell it, he is irresistible to women. Actually, he only rates about 10 proof, for underneath his manly protestations is a basic fear of women. Often what he craves is not a wife but a substitute mother. His marriage adjustments are notoriously poor.

The problem "to drink or not to drink" is so complex for any individual that no ready-made blanket therapy can be guaranteed. Families of compulsive drinkers are much more optimistic about "easy" cures than are specialists who know the problem. In considering possible treatments for alcoholism, it is advisable first to dispose of some popular "treatments" that have no value at all.

No secret potion dropped into Frank's coffee will cure him of drink. No alcoholic has ever been cured on the sly, without his knowledge. "Let's have his father or the doctor or his boss or the minister give him a good talking-to" is not very helpful unless such advisers are well-trained. The patient may brace up for a while; he may take the pledge, and mean from the bottom of his heart his promise never to touch another drop. He may think he knows why he drinks, but he never does-not until someone gives him insight. Sending him off to a farm or into confinement where he can't get alcohol will keep him sober as long as he stays there-but no longer, if confinement was his only treatment.

Fear is a goad, not a cure. The alcoholic whose world is tumbling about his ears knows fear all too well. It is brutally inhuman to expose him to pictures of cirrhotic livers and the like. It is doubly pointless because what impresses people in horror exhibits from the platform may have slight if any basis in scientific fact. Most doctors now believe that cirrhosis of the liver is nutritional rather than alcoholic in origin. Plenty of teetotalers have "alcoholic" livers.

Any general practitioner can help a patient recover from an attack of acute alcoholism with the use of sedative drugs, rest, forced nutrition and other well-understood methods. But this is an entirely different matter from curing him of compulsive drinking. The difference is important because many a doctor, after periodically assisting luses over the hump, becomes convinced that his patients are incurable, whereas the specialist takes a much more hopeful view. He knows that the patient's basic problem is not alcohol-that alcoholism doesn't come out of a bottle but out of the man. To focus treatment on removal or proscription of whisky is comparable to "curing" a brain tumor by prescribing aspirin. It is the compulsive drinker's psychological trouble that must be remedied.

It is fundamental to any successful treatment that the problem drinker must sincerely want to get well. Invariably he will say he wants to. And he may sincerely mean it, especially after recovering from a binge that may have cost him his job or his wife or his reputation. But since he does not know why he drinks, and since alcohol, at whatever cost, serves for him an inner purpose, he usually needs to be helped to self-insight that will make his desire for cure psychologically genuine.

Another basic if brutal truth is that for him there are only two choices: he can remain an alcoholic, or he can become a teetotaler. There is no middle road. Never again can he be a controlled social drinker-if he ever was one. Many a problem drinker, after apparent cure, has figured he could handle mild liquors-beer or wine-only to find out that a drink of ale was the first step to an epic spree that lost him all the ground he gained. When the boys order another round of the same, he is going to have to order plain ginger ale and like it. For him there is no such thing as a little alcohol.

How, then, are problem drinkers cured? The first step is to settle the practical question: "Is he really an alcoholic? And if so, what kind is he?"

A simple method of determining whether or not the patient is an addict is suggested by Dr. H.W. Haggard. He advises doctors to limit the patient's drinking, for an extended but reasonable time, to two drinks a day. If the patient stays within those limits, he is hardly a true alcoholic. The genuine addict may be able to cut out liquor completely, but he cannot be moderate.

Next, if the man fails that test, is he an alcoholic because of exposure, association, careless habit or other outside factors, or because of deep psychic maladjustments? If the latter is the case (and in Dr. Haggard's opinion the majority of alcoholics are reasonably normal), understanding, tolerance, and sympathetic treatment by a physician should be effective. The more deeply disturbed drinker, however, requires more intensive treatment. So does the rarer type whose troubles are symptomatic of underlying mental disorder-a psychosis.

It is the specialized, individual skill of the psychiatrist, plus sanitarium care, that seems best for the toughest cases. The job is to uproot the complexes that have unconsciously been driving the man to drink, and since these long-repressed triggers are different in every case, it is quite an assignment to locate the specific ones that explode the alcohol cartridge. It may take months, perhaps a year, but the patient is finally brought to genuine insight as to why he has been using alcohol as a false answer to his troubles, he's a good bet for release to the outside world.

All this is not so easy as it sounds. Relapses are always possible. But a fair guess is that about 35 per cent of addicts are cured, by any of several types of treatment.

A deep, sincere desire to be cured undoubtedly plays a part. The heartening side of the picture is that thousands of ex-drunks, once reviled, scorned, lambasted or recriminated, have become respected and productive citizens of their communities-their bibulous backgrounds often quite unsuspected.

Drugs play a role in some treatments, notably in "conditioned reflex" or aversion therapy. The patient is given an injection of a drug which, a definite number of minutes later, will tear him apart with violent vomiting. The doctor opens a bottle of his favorite bourbon, pours a drink, and with diabolical timing hands it to the patient. Down goes the snifter-up comes the viscera, or so it feels. Associating the drink with the hell breaking loose in his interior, the patient develops an aversion to said drink.

Oddly enough, it doesn't seem to matter whether the patient understands the trickery or not. The aversion sticks-his stomach knows best. Aversion treatment patients have gone to dinner parties too soon after a session with the doctor, observed the host approaching with a tray of highballs, and have heaped gastric insult upon hospitality. The method appears to be most effective where the addiction is one of simple habituation, without any deep personality factors.

Basically, the treatment of alcoholism seems essentially to be faith healing, whether through the help of a psychiatrist or by other means. Group therapy apparently is most effective in this respect, as indicated by the successes of such organizations as Alcoholics Anonymous and the Salvation Army. Their methods, based on religious conversion in the broadest sense of the world, produce as many cures, if not more, than other treatments.

Today there are some 17,000 members of Alcoholics Anonymous in some 500 groups throughout the country. Each member is a freely confessed ex-alcoholic who stands ready at any time of day or night to wrestle purple snakes with a fellow sufferer. Meetings are informal, soft drinks are served, life histories frankly recounted, and reliance is placed upon a higher power for help beyond the individual's ability.

Not the least value of such groups is that the alcoholic accepts their members as his kind of people. Everybody has been in the same boat. Nobody is going to bluenose him, wag fingers, or moralize.

The members are good fellows and fellowship is one of the deep needs of the problem drinker. That is one reason why he likes bars and taverns-the company ordinarily is friendly, uncritical, not given to harsh judgments from a level of superiority.

Few people are so sensitive, so likely to cringe in advance or to put up defenses against anticipated disapproval, as the alcoholic.

Most large cities and many small ones now have one or more Alcoholics Anonymous groups. Much of the organization work is done by correspondence. A central office of Alcoholics Anonymous (P.O. Box 459, Grand Central Annex, Sample studies recently conducted by Rutgers University at New Brunswick, N.J., indicate that 50 per cent of the American public erroneously believe that an alcoholic can stop drinking if he wants to; that only one in five properly views the alcoholic as a sick person.

This lack of public understanding is the chief obstacle in the way of an effective attack on alcoholism, which Dr. Lawrence Kolb, medical director of the U.S. Public Health Service, has ranked as America's fourth greatest public health problem.

This is not to say that science has found a miraculous new cure for alcoholism and that only prejudice and indifference keep it from being applied. There is no one new finding, or group of findings, which promises an easy solution. But there do exist today, as never before, plans of attack which utilize all that science knows about alcoholism in medicine, psychiatry, sociology, and allied fields. Comprehensive programs of treatment, prevention, and rehabilitation have been worked out and tested in clinical practice, which can reduce the casualties of alcoholism by one half or more wherever they are thoroughly applied. But these plans will not work anywhere unless groups of individuals in states, cities, and communities become aware of the seriousness of alcoholism, and raise funds and plan programs to deal with it as a major public health problem.

How Many Alcoholics?

The facts about alcoholism concern everyone as intimately as the facts about heart disease, cancer, tuberculosis, infantile paralysis. The number of persons in this country medically classified as chronic alcoholics, who have developed physical or mental disorders as a consequence of prolonged heavy drinking, is 50 per cent higher than the number of known sufferers from tuberculosis. And it is a fact of central importance that no one, whether at present a teetotaler, a moderate, or a "social" drinker, can be positive of a lifelong personal immunity to alcoholism.

Of 100,000,00 Americans of drinking age (15 years and older), an estimated 58,250,000 use some form of alcoholic beverage, to some extent. The great majority of these, some 54,500,000 keep themselves mainly within the category of safe and moderate drinkers, and as such are no part of the public health program. But a minority of all drinking Americans, about 3,750,000, are classified as excessive drinkers, or inebriates, and within this group 750,000 or 800,000 are known, on the basis of hospital and court records, to be chronic alcoholics. Of all excessive drinkers, one in six is a woman.

Alcoholism is also a social problem of incalculable magnitude. Experienced Salvation Army Workers estimate that 90 percent of the down-and-outers who come to them for help have been brought there by excessive drinking. In New York City, one third of the men and one tenth of the women who take their marital difficulties to Domestic Relations Court are alcoholics; so are 95 per cent of all those committed to the Workhouse and 15 percent of those given penitentiary sentences. Officials of an Industrial Conference on Alcoholism held in Chicago this March estimated that alcoholic employees cost industry $1,000,000,000 in pro-duction and 24,000,000 man-hours of work per year. Boards of education find that parental alcoholism is a frequent factor in absences and behavior problems of school children, as it is in juvenile delinquency. Estimates of traffic accidents involving drinking by drivers and pedestrians vary from 10 to 50 per cent of the total, cannot be summarized in nation-wide terms because of local variations and inaccuracies in the reporting of accidents.

The problem of alcoholism looms large not only in terms of the number of people it affects, but also because it is such a complicated matter, having so many intangible and unsolved elements. To scientists concerned with the problem, the alcoholic is a sick person, no more deserving of moral blame or ridicule than sufferers from any illness. But alcoholism is not a separate, clearly defined disease entity. No single cause or group of causes can be assigned to it. It is confined to no one group of people within our population. No single course of therapy can be applied universally to all alcoholics. Science is still unable to point with certainty to those individual traits of physical and psychological make-up, which combine to make a small percentage of all drinkers peculiarly susceptible to alcoholism.

Until quite recently, those concerned with the various aspects of alcoholism—sociologists, physiologists, psychiatrists, educators, religious leaders—tended to approach the problem as specialist in their separate fields. Within the past few years, a new point of view has been emerging among these people. It is that alcoholism is a medical, psychological, social, legal, and moral problem, but that it is none of these alone.

A dozen years ago, there was no important national organization that was utilizing the tools of science in a concerted attack on alcoholism. Today, there are two central agencies, the Yale Plan on Alcoholism, and the Research Council on Problems of Alcohol, which are carrying out intensive studies, clinical work, and campaigns of public education in all phases of problem drinking. In addition, there is the now well known "voluntary fellowship" of alcoholics Anonymous, which in its 12 years of existence has gathered a membership of 60,000 rehabilitated alcoholics and contributed to the understanding of excessive drinking.

The Scientific Approach

Scientific work in this field is divided into two main approaches. One is concerned with finding factors in the biological and psychological make-up of individuals which may give them a predisposition toward alcoholism. The second approach is that of working out methods of treating alcoholism in clinics which will utilize all the knowledge of scientific research. In the practical work of the two main groups in the field, these approaches are combined.

The Research Council, which is affiliated with the American Association for the Advancement of Science, is currently carrying on a campaign to raise $200,000 a year to set up a series of combined research and treatment centers in alcoholism in leading medical schools throughout the country. One such center, at New York Hospital-Cornell Medical College, has completed the first year of a five-year plan financed by a $150,000 grant from the council. Some of these funds have been contributed by the liquor industry. This project, under the direction of Dr. Oskar Diethelm, co-ordinates research in the varied fields of psychiatry, internal medicine, physiology, pharmacology, biochemistry, psychology, and anthropology.

In the first year, the staff worked with a selected test group of 25 patients whose normal productive way of life had been seriously disrupted by the use of alcohol. All were people who wanted to be helped and none was of the "derelict" type. Each spent an initial period of from a few weeks to several months in the hospital, undergoing thorough physical, psychiatric, and psychological studies, and following supervised programs of diet, rest, and occupational therapy. Most of the patients willingly kept to the prescribed course and graduated to a transitional stage, of from four to six weeks during which they spent nights and weekends in the hospital and resumed work outside.

After leaving the hospital, patients enter a follow-up period of three to five years, returning for check-ups at first weekly, and eventually monthly. Social workers help the patient find suitable work and recreation, and family and friends are instructed to respect the patient's "right not to drink."

Dr. Diethelm's primary aim is research. He has released no estimate of the success of his project in rehabilitating the first year's test group, and an estimate based on such a limited group and period of time would have little scientific standing. Clinicians in this field are reluctant to say that alcoholism has been arrested in any patient until he has gone without alcohol for a period of several years and gives evidence of having undergone a basic re-education that eliminates his need for alcohol. But Diethelm's staff has announced one promising finding: that certain unidentified substances in the blood are apparently associated with the craving for alcohol, as well as with the emotional states of tension, anxiety, and resentment.

Some other clues in the psychological field were reported at the most recent annual meeting of the Research Council, in Chicago last December. From the University of Texas, Dr. Roger J. Williams of the Biochemical Institute, announced that because of individual differences in body chemistry, a low concentration of alcohol in the blood is enough to produce signs of intoxication in many people, while others may have several times as high a percentage without becoming drunk.

Williams believes that differences in metabolic machinery, the way in which the body turns food into energy, make it possible for some people to drink heavily for many years without ever showing clinical symptoms of alcoholism, and impossible for others to drink even a little without developing an inordinate and disastrous craving for alcohol. He does not contend that the biochemical approach alone can conquer alcoholism; he hopes that it will eventually determine certain definite physiological characteristics which render some people vulnerable to the effects of alcohol.

Such metabolic idiosyncrasies, Williams believes, may be inherited. This does not mean that alcoholism is a hereditary disease - an old-fashioned bugaboo that has been thoroughly scouted by genetic science. The consumption of alcohol, even in excessive quantities over long periods, causes no damage to germ cells, and thus does not effect the genetic make-up of the children of excessive drinkers. Statistics show that only about one third of all alcoholics come from families showing a high incidence of alcoholism and mental illness. This is emphasized because in an appreciable number of alcoholic patients, alcoholism is merely incidental to their primary ailment. These are "symptomatic" drinkers, who are given to the excessive use of alcohol by a psychosis, serious neurosis, endocrine disturbance, organic illness, or epilepsy. Their drinking is a symptom of their underlying illness.

Small Hereditary Factor

Most authorities consider that there may be some hereditary factor in alcoholism, but that it is a small one and difficult to separate from the greater and less understood picture of heredity in mental illness of all types. They believe that when the children of alcoholics take to drink, the influence of environment is generally a far stronger factor than biological inheritance. What may be inherited is an unstable constitution which, if subjected to adverse influences, is likely to develop alcoholism or mental illness more readily than other not so predisposed.

Williams believes, as do other leading researchers, that both hereditary and environmental factors are highly significant and that "a one-sided approach to the problem is doomed to failure." As a biochemist, his special search is for some biochemical means of identifying potential alcoholics, and from that point, of developing preventive and remedial measures.

The search for a psychological basis for alcoholism is also being carried out in clinical studies at the New York University College of Medicine, under Dr. James J. Smith. He reports that many alcoholics show an insufficiency in the secretions of the adrenal gland (a small ductless gland sitting on the kidney) similar to that found in Addison's disease. Treatment with adrenal and sex-gland hormones has yielded clinical improvement in NYU ward patients.

From the University of Chicago, Professor Emeritus Anton J. Carlson, president and scientific director of the Research Council, reports that a nitrogen-chlorine gas, previously used to bleach flour for making white bread, has been found to make proteins act as a nerve poison. Animals have developed convulsions as a result of being fed large amounts of white bread containing the chemical. It may be a contributing factor, Carlson believes, in turning potentially unstable persons into alcoholics.

Ranging far beyond this particular theory, Carlson indicates that the will of the alcoholic patient appears to be important to his recovery and rehabilitation. "The hereditary, the biochemical, the nutritional, the neural, the educational and the social factors determining the strength and direction of the will of man are still obscure," he says, outlining the broad territory which present-day research in alcoholism is setting out to explore.

It is this broad, co-ordinated exploration, rather than individual new findings in separate fields, that constitutes the latest and most promising development in the study of alcoholism. The idea of this co-ordination arose at Yale University, and its practical applications are best seen today in the work of the Yale Plan, a many-faceted operation, which is formally known as the Section of Alcohol Studies of the Laboratory of Applied Physiology, Yale University.

Support from Liquor Industry

Some of the Yale Plan work is done under agreement with the Connecticut Commission on Alcoholism, a state agency of rehabilitation and public education established in 1945, the first of its kind in this country. The Commission currently derives funds of about $200,000 per year from higher licensing fees which representatives of the liquor industry have accepted voluntarily to pay for the program. The Commission is engaged in a broad, long-range program of education, research, treatment in public clinics and hospitals, community services, and, ultimately, prevention. Since 1945, Utah, Wisconsin, Oregon, and the District of Columbia have followed Connecticut's lead in tackling alcoholism as a specific public health problem, and other states are instituting similar legislation.

The Yale Plan conducts the Yale Summer School of Alcohol Studies, now in its sixth year, which gives an intensive course in all phases of alcoholism to educators, social workers, and other professionally concerned with the subject. It is the outgrowth of experiments in the physiology of alcohol, which Dr. Howard W. Haggard and his associates in the Laboratory of Applied Physiology began around 1930. They made important findings about the metabolism of alcohol and its absorption and oxidation in the body. But Dr. Haggard, who became director of the Laboratory in 1938, saw the important need for going beyond these researches and getting at the fundamental causes and the possible means of prevention of alcoholism. "We got plenty of leads that suggested a physiological basis for compulsive drinking," Haggard said recently. "But they were just leads. We couldn't find a way of applying them to the individual alcoholics. So we decided to study all aspects of alcoholism and the problems of alcohol. In addition to our physiologists we brought in a biometrician, an anthropologist, a psychologist, a sociologist, an economist, and workers in other fields." The Yale biometrician, Dr. E.M. Jellinek, is now director of the Summer School of Alcohol Studies, associate editor of the Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol, and an active collaborator in all of the work of the Yale Plan.

"We went after the larger questions of why people drink," Dr. Haggard said, "why a few become alcoholics while the great majority does not, what alcohol does to people psychologically as well as physically. When we started the summer school, we were a little afraid of attracting special pleaders for one point of view or another. But we found that when people of various persuasions got together and saw each other's point of view, they got a broader understanding of the picture. They had discussion sessions outside of lectures, and discovered just what we had found out—that the best way of dealing with the problems of alcohol is to tackle them as a total problem, uniting all approaches."

For the interested laymen, the most dramatic work being done by the Yale Plan is in its "pilot clinic" at New Haven. This clinic and the one at Hartford were set up in the spring of 1944 with the aid of the Connecticut Prison Association; the management of the Hartford clinic has since been taken over by the Connecticut Commission on Alcoholism. Both clinics were established not only to cope with the loss of industrial manpower through alcoholism in Connecticut, but with the longer aim of working out methods for dealing with two essential problems encountered all over the country: 1) Where can the individual in the community go for aid, advice and treatment? 2) By what method can the community restore the social usefulness of its alcoholically incapacitated members? By what methods can it best prevent alcoholism?

The Qualified Recoveries

"We're not concerned here with whether you should drink or not," Dr. Haggard says. "We're concerned with those people whose drinking interferes with their lives, who become social problems through excessive drinking. We wanted to know whether it was feasible to set up a free clinic where, at a cost to the community of about $100 per patient, we could get a reasonable recovery. We don't talk about curing alcoholics. We call our successful cases qualified recoveries. The qualification is that the patient will stay recovered only as long as he doesn't touch liquor again."

The Yale Plan Clinic is housed in an old-fashioned red brick building which bears no resemblance to a hospital. Patients are admitted without charge, regardless of their financial circumstances. Some are brought or sent in by members of their family, friends, doctors, or employers. Others, by arrangement with the Connecticut Commission on Alcoholism, are referred to the clinic by the courts. And a good many others, who turn out to be the most responsive to treatment, come in of their own accord, because they are greatly concerned by the extent to which drinking interferes with their leading normal lives.

The Three Categories

The medical director of the Yale Plan Clinic, Dr. Giorgio Lolli, heads a staff of ten. Besides himself, there are three other doctors (on part time), three social workers, a psychotherapist, a psychologist, and two secretaries. The clinic has no hospital facilities; all patients are ambulatory cases. The clinic admits all applicants for a least a preliminary interview, but because of its limited facilities and staff, because its function is that of an experimental model rather than a full-scale rehabilitation project, it cannot undertake to treat all applicants. For practical purposes, the New Haven Clinic divides applicants on the basis of diagnosis into three categories:

- 1) The symptomatic drinker, whose drinking is incidental to mental illness, severe endocrine disturbance, or epilepsy. Since these people do not respond to treatment for alcoholism as such, they are referred to psychiatrists, private physicians, mental-hygiene clinics, or hospitals, where their underlying illness can be treated. Perhaps 15 per cent of the total number of alcoholics are in this group.
- 2) The social misfit, "derelict" type of alcoholic, who is disqualified for family life, hasn't the emotional stability to hold a good job, is apt to be so physically deteriorated and psychologically disorganized that only long institutional care and social rehabilitation could redeem him. These make up 15-20 per cent of those seen. For this type, the Yale plan people would like to see custodial therapeutic institutions established that would utilize all elements of the co-ordinated approach. The danger in jails and "inebriate farms" as they have been constituted, is that they don't make proper diagnosis, that they merely keep derelict alcoholics in custody, finally releasing them without any basic improvement in condition.
- 3) The true alcoholic, with an impulsive drive to drink. People in this group show a variety of pattern in their drinking habits. Some go on periodical binges, every weekend, or irregularly. Some get drunk every night. Others are always moderately under the influence, have a constant concentration of alcohol in the blood but do not necessarily show obvious signs of drunkenness.

Handling of Applicants

Yale Plan doctors do not hold that all alcoholics necessarily fall into one of these arbitrary categories, which are principally useful in the handling of applicants. "Our distinction is made on the basis of whether we think we can or can't help," Dr. Lolli explains. "Our handling of a patient just coming to the clinic varies greatly according to his state. If he's just coming out of a binge, he may need help in overcoming the effects of his hangover. In all cases, we make an immediate attempt to give relief. Sedatives may be used when the patient is jittery and nervous. In the early days of treatment, we may administer crude liver plus Vitamin B1. When the physical condition improves, and Vitamin B1 can help bring this about, the need for alcohol diminishes, but nothing has been done to clear up the underlying condition. To tackle this, we use a variety of methods, depending on the individual.

"At an early point the patient is usually interviewed by a social worker with some psychiatric training. Without antagonizing the patient, we may make a start at getting his case history, his background, family circumstances, employment record, and some preliminary notes on his troubles with drinking. If we can't get this information at first, we postpone it to weeks or months later.

A Patient, Not a Sinner

"There are usually a lot of difficulties which require immediate attention—family troubles, loss of job, legal and financial problems. The social worker starts at once to try to solve the most pressing of these and relieve the tension they cause in the patient. We impress upon every applicant the fact that we consider him a patient, not a sinner. If the patient doesn't show an immediate psychosis or serious neurosis calling for deep therapy, even these preliminary steps, establishing the fact that he is a patient and that some relief is in sight, have some therapeutic effect. Our approach is a very factual one. We don't promise anything, and we don't want patients to promise us anything. We give them the evidence that we can relieve them of some pain, by psychological or medical means, and when they get even this much hope they are off to a good start."

The next step in the Yale Plan procedure is a thorough physical examination to find out if any illness is present, due or not to alcohol. Alcoholics show "organ-neurotic" symptoms—physical complaints which are apparently of psychological origin. Some of these can be relieved by medical treatment. Benzedrine and dexedrin can help to overcome depressed states. If medical laboratory tests are necessary, they are usually done elsewhere.

Although the Yale Plan Clinic has no official connection with Alcoholics Anonymous, it refers some of its applicants to the local group of that association, and in turn takes in patients referred to it by AA. Local groups hold regular meetings at which members tell of their own experiences as compulsive drinkers, and testify to their recovery through adherence to the AA plan. This plan consists of twelve formal steps, which may be reduced to these essentials: a) the alcoholic must admit that he is powerless over alcohol and seek help from outside; b) he must attempt to analyze his personality, acknowledge his wrongs, make amends when possible to people he has harmed; c) he must place his dependence upon a higher power, which at first may be merely the AA organization, but ultimately should be God as he understands the concept; d) he must work at rehabilitating other alcoholics.

Effective Rehabilitation

Alcoholics Anonymous claims a recovery rate of from 50 to 75 per cent of those who give its methods a sincere trial, and the majority of scientific researchers agree that it is the most effective single course of rehabilitation. Dr. Howard Haggard attributes the success of AA in part to the need of the alcoholic for treatment that is understanding, tolerant, patient, and serious.

"Recriminations are useless, for the alcoholic has deep within him the strongest feelings of guilt and responds to them with hostility," Haggard says. "They are only further proof that no one understands him. A high moral tone, preaching, drives him away. The gift of really understanding the alcoholic, winning his confidence and co-operation, is often held in high degree by ex-alcoholics who act as lay therapists or group therapists as in Alcoholics Anonymous. They have been through the same experience themselves; they know the feeling of tension, of discontent, of omnipotence, of guilt, and of resentment. They know, and forgive, the inevitable 'slips'; after the sprees, they are able to maintain their fully understanding attitude and an unabated confidence."

Religious Elements

But some problem drinkers, particularly those who are unable to accept the religious elements of the AA plan, prove unresponsive to it. With a small percentage of these, the Yale Plan Clinic uses the aversion therapy or conditioned reflex method as an initial step. This consists of giving the patient a drink in combination with a medicine which produces nausea; after several such treatments an association is built up which makes alcoholic beverages distasteful. The method is useful as a means of keeping a patient away from liquor for a period of weeks or months, when it may be renewed, but it does not clear up the basic maladjustment.

It is this basic maladjustment, a highly individual matter in each case, which the Yale Group attempts to cope with as soon as possible through a variety of psychotherapeutic approaches. After the diagnostic study has been carried out, the staff tries to fit the therapist to the individual. If he

There are no dues nor fees. The only requirement for A.A. membership is an honest desire to stop drinking. Each member squares his debt by helping other to recovery.

An Alcoholic Anonymous is an alcoholic who, through an application of an adherence to the A.A. program, has completely foresworn the use of any and all alcoholic beverages or narcotics in any form. The moment he drinks so much as one drop of beer, wine, spirits or any other alcoholic beverage, he automatically loses working status as a member of Alcoholics Anonymous. He cannot attend a meeting if he has had a drink on any meeting day. He is barred from making contact calls on any new or prospective member until he has had thirty days sobriety, unless accompanied by an eligible member or directed to do so by the dispatcher. He cannot hold office or be a candidate for office until he has had three months sobriety and must submit his resignation as an officer if a slip occurs during his tenure in office. A.A. is not interested in sobering up drunks who are not sincere in their desire to remain completely sober for all time. Not being reformers we offer our experience only to those who want it.[1]

We have a way out on which we can absolutely agree, and upon which we can join in harmonious action. Rarely have we seen a person fail who has thoroughly followed our path. Those who do not recover are people who will not completely give themselves to this simple program.

You may like this program or you may not. But the fact remains that it works and it is our only chance of recovery.

There is, however, a vast amount of fun about it all. Some people might be shocked at our seeming worldliness and levity. But just underneath there is a deadly earnestness and a full realization that we must put First Things First. With each of us the First Thing is our alcohol problem, to drink is to die. Faith has to work 24 hours a day in and through us - or we perish.

[1] From an early publication titled A Manual for Alcoholics Anonymous: "an alcoholic who, through application and adherence to rules laid down by the organization, has completely forsworn the use of any and all alcoholic beverages. The moment he wittingly drinks so much as a drop of beer, wine, spirits, or any other alcoholic drink he automatically loses all status as a member of Alcoholics Anonymous ..." (popular in Akron/Cleveland roots of AA).

This is know as the Texas Preamble.

Texas Preamble:

A few months after the Grapevine published the Preamble in June, 1947, Ollie L., Dick F., and Searcy W. decided to beef it up for the drunks in Texas. "We worked on it, passed it around, and agreed on this version," says Searcy W. "It's now read by groups throughout the state." It works for Searcy. He's been sober 54 years.

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] 1940 Preamble??

Hi Group,

I had this sent to me recently and I don't have a clue if it is true or not, but it makes for an interesting read.

Any of you oldtimers recognize this and give me a hint if it historically accurate or not

AA Old Preamble - 1940

We are gathered here because we are faced with the fact that we are powerless over alcohol and unable to do anything about it without the help of a Power greater than ourselves.

We feel that each person's religious views, if any, are his own affair. The simple purpose of the program of Alcoholics Anonymous is to show what may be done to enlist the aid of a Power greater than ourselves regardless of what our individual conception of that Power may be.

In order to form a habit of depending upon and referring all we do to that Power, we must at first apply ourselves with some diligence. By often repeating these acts, they become habitual and the help rendered becomes natural to us.

We have all come to know that as alcoholics we are suffering from a serious illness for which medicine has no cure.

Our condition may be the result of an allergy which makes us different from other people. It has never been by any treatment with which we are familiar, permanently cured. The only relief we have to offer is absolute abstinence, the second meaning of A.A.

There are no dues or fees. The only requirement for membership is a desire to stop drinking. Each member squares his debt by helping others to recover.

An Alcoholics Anonymous is an alcoholic who through application and adherence to the A.A. program has forsworn the use of any and all alcoholic beverage in any form.

The moment he takes so much as one drop of beer, wine, spirits or any other alcoholic beverage he automatically loses all status as a member of Alcoholics Anonymous.

A.A. is not interested in sobering up drunks who are not sincere in their desire to remain sober for all time. Not being reformers, we offer our experience only to those who want it.

We have a way out on which we can absolutely agree and on which we can join in harmonious action. Rarely have we seen a person fail who has thoroughly followed our program. Those who do not recover are people who will not or simply cannot give themselves to this simple program. Now you may like this program or you may not, but the fact remains, it works. It is our only chance to recover.

There is a vast amount of fun in the A.A. fellowship. Some people might be shocked at our seeming worldliness and levity but just underneath there lies a deadly earnestness and a full realization that we must put first things first and with each of us the first thing is our alcoholic problem. To drink is to die. Faith must work twenty-four hours a day in and through us or we perish.

In order to set our tone for this meeting I ask that we bow our heads in a few moments of silent prayer and meditation. I wish to remind you that whatever is said at this meeting expresses our own individual opinion as of today and as of up to this moment.

We do not speak for A.A. as a whole and you are free to agree or disagree as you see fit, in fact, it is suggested that you pay no attention to anything which might not be reconciled with what is in the A.A. Big Book.

If you don't have a Big Book, it's time you bought you one. Read it, study it, live with it, loan it, scatter it, and then learn from it what it means to be an A.A.

refused bed-space to alcoholics, to admit them as the do other sufferers from serious illnesses.

Latest example of newly-developed cooperation between medical institutions and A.A. was the establishment of a 16-bed ward in Brooklyn, New York's St. John's Episcopal Hospital, where habitual inebriates are admitted, if sponsored by A.A. members, upon payment of a $75 fee. Patients undergo a five-day "drying out" process under the watchful eyes of especially trained nurses, physicians and psychiatrists. The treatment is not intended as a "cure." No cure for alcoholism exists other than total abstinence.

But hospitalization is often an indispensable first step on the road to lasting sobriety. When the befuddling fog is lifted from a hapless victim's body, blood and brain, he is able for the first time to think clearly and recognize the gravity of his plight.

A.A. volunteers are on hand 24 hours a day. Former alcoholics who have forsworn alcohol, they try to win the newcomer's confidence, swap details of fabulous benders, prove by own experience that no soul is so lost that he cannot gain his self-respect.

Physically fit on the sixth day, the patient is released. His A.A. friend calls for him at the hospital and sees him home safely home. Thereafter, he is visited at home frequently, introduced at a neighborhood A.A. group meeting. The samaritan is available for advice and assistance if the urge to drink returns.

As yet the dawn is in its early shell-pink, but its light has already touched 12 U.S. cities and nine states.

In Boston, the chronic drunkard is regarded as a sick man, whose disease is a involuntary and consuming as infantile paralysis or malaria.

In New Haven, Dallas, Des Moines, Daytona Beach and Rochester, N.Y., the alcoholic is treated with the same dignity as any invalid.

In Fort Worth, Austin, Pittsburgh, Youngstown, Washington, D.C., and Charleston, addicts are sympathetically screened through social and medical centers and helped back to normal.

As yet the light is a candle flicker in the century-old gloom of prejudice. But it is still growing brighter. The Yale Plan was its kindling point. Charles Jackson's memorable book, "The Lost Weekend," and the movie made from it, made a tremendous impact on national consciousness. The expansion of Alcoholics Anonymous has been a profound educational factor. The American press has given the subject more attention since 1940 than during the entire preceding century.

The Yale Clinic Plan was conceived ten years ago by a New Haven scientist, who approached alcoholism not as a temperance zealot, but as a skilled specialist seeking a preventive formula.

It works as many thousands of "ex-incurables" can attest.

Rehabilitated "drunkards" once deemed hopeless have become the Yale Plan's most enthusiastic workers in redeeming other members of the ancient fellowship of the uptilted bottle.

Ten years ago Dr. Howard W. Haggard was investigating the effects of noxious gases on the human system in his laboratory at Yale. He was familiar with the reaction of such poison vapors as diphosgene, which clogs the respiratory glands. He knew that Lewisite corrodes the mucous membranes and sears the flesh. Chlorpicrin swells the eyeballs and causes nausea.

So he came to pure grain alcohol, which in repeated dosages over a long period also reacts as a noxious gas, and after years of excessive drinking causes vitamin deficiency, mild paranoia, hallucinosis and depressive psychosis.

A Yale biometrician, Dr. E.M. Jellinek, was already engaged in alcohol research, and together they attacked the mystery. They wanted answers to such riddles as: "When does the use of alcohol become excessive?" "What does it do to the human system?" "Why are some drinkers more allergic than others?"

For five years they assembled their data from across the nation, and by 1940 they found that of an estimated 50,000,000 drinkers, all but a small percentage of them used alcohol moderately and only for the purpose of social relaxation.

Three million people were "excessive" drinkers, who like to go out on fraternal binges periodically, and get out of control, but at other times took their drams temperately or not at all. But of this number approximately 2,000,000 were potential threats, in danger of crossing the thin, wavering line of self abandon.

Lastly there were about 900,000 liquor addicts, or habitual alcoholics who drink for various reasons and in different ways, but to whom alcohol is a principal reason for living. They were folk who could not adjust themselves to a world of reality and used drink to escape into a shadowy twilight. They had crossed the borderline of normality and had become diseased.

Thus the Yale Clinic found that a ratio of nearly one in every 40 adult Americans were either confirmed addicts or potentials, at appalling cost to the nation's economy. Male alcoholics vastly outnumbered women. Of the total arrested drunkards, 97 percent were men between the ages of 30 and 60 - the age peak of production. Racially, the Irish, English and Scandinavian were more susceptible than Jews and Latins.

The clinic found that, contrary to accepted opinion, alcohol does not act as a stimulant, but actually is a depressant to the higher brain centers, as reason yields to emotion.

At what stage does a man become drunk?

A third New Haven doctor had the answer to that. Dr. Leon A. Greenberg invented a machine which resembles a large portable radio, with a nozzle in one side, into which the patient breathes and reveals the alcoholic content in his bloodstream. A dial like an automobile speedometer registers the percentage - a .05 saturation being reasonably sober, .15 being genuinely intoxicated. The amount of alcohol that the average size man can absorb depends on how much food he has in his stomach, how long he took to drink the amount, and what his natural allergy is.

The Yale Plan is no sawdust trail to salvation. It dovetails realistically with the local police, the district courts, social agencies, medical centers and Alcoholics Anonymous. Thus a sample case in New Haven today is any chronic drunkard brought before a court.

From long experience the judge knows that it does no good to throw the inebriate into jail. Fines and terms to the county farm fail to reform.

Tongue lashings and threats are futile.

"You've been here many times," she says. "you tell me you want to quit, but don't know how. I'll give you the chance. Your sentence is suspended, if you agree to keep your regular appointments at the Alcoholic Clinic, and do as they say."

The alcoholic at first is fearful lest he be made an experimental guinea pig for some strange purpose. But rather than go to jail, he consents, and is taken to 434 Temple Street, where he finds a brick building and a neat, well lighted interior. He is greeted by a cheerful girl receptionist, who ushers him into an inner office where an alert, calm mannered man in a white coat begins to chat quietly.

The alcoholic is put at ease and encouraged to talk. Like most of his kind he has known years of loneliness, bitter self-reproach, despair and self-condemnation. He has developed a persecution complex and drinks in proportion as his troubles mount. His wife has left him. He cannot hold a job. He is out of control.

But now for the first time he finds himself treated sympathetically as a sick man instead of sharp rebuke and rough handling. He responds and begins to talk.

The Clinic learns that he is in need of high vitamin therapy due to prolonged dependency on alcohol instead of food. Pure alcohol contains 210 calories per ounce by weight, but provides no vitamins and even impedes absorption of vitamins from food. A further checkup shows intestinal inflammations. He needs a balanced diet, rest and security. So he is hospitalized, the cost being paid out of the 9 per cent which Connecticut takes from its liquor taxes and earmarks for treating alcoholism.

The Yale Clinic finds that the man also has several deep-seated fears. A psychiatrist helps him to get rid of these. He requires counsel, supervision and encouragement from trusted friends. The Clinic calls the local chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous and finds him sympathetic, helpful fellowship from folk who thoroughly understand his problem. As he is now, so they were. He gets a job, however significant, and begins to feel a new pride in his capabilities.

It works! Not always, but he has a 60-40 chance of recovery!

Some backslide and try again. Some fail utterly. But the majority win back to total health, are reconciled with their families and become successful citizens again. It works!

Though the Yale Plan is now operative in 11 other cities and nine states, Connecticut is the only state which has modern, intelligent alcohol legislation. It earmarks a percentage of its liquor taxes for rehabilitation.

Elsewhere in the above mentioned cities, the Clinic Plan operates under the Committee for Education on Alcoholism or the CEA, and depends on public spirited citizens who solicit aid and needed funds and distribute printed matter.

In Boston, among the most energetic cities in the campaign, the CEA has headquarters at 419 Boylston Street, a few doors above the offices of Alcoholics Anonymous, and functions through public subscription and a large list of judges, doctors, psychiatrists, clergymen, educators, social workers, law enforcement officers and business folk. For more than a year the old brownstone building has received a steady stream of alcoholics. Some come voluntary. Some are sent by the courts, some by clergymen.

By sifting through the index files of the Boston, CEA, one finds entries such as these:

"Mr. H.Y. Married, 2 children, owner small business, quiet, slightly morbid type. Expressed great fear of inherited nervousness from neurotic mother. Wife too inclined to neurosis. Became periodic "binge" drinker with binges running closer together till they merged.

"Was given short period hospitalization, and after treatment from psychiatrists, fears dissolved. Faithful visitor. Has been totally abstinent since first appearance at CEA. Has adjusted home life and accepted allergy to alcohol."

Here is another index card:

"Miss R.M. Factory worker, arrested 7 times for drunkenness. Referred to CEA by courts. Placed in contact with Alcoholics Anonymous and met regularly with members. First three months had trouble with adjusting self to A.A. program, but persistence of members finally convinced her of practical value of such help. Now has been totally abstinent for two months."

Next to unenlightened public opinion, say the Yale Planners, the most serious barrier to intelligent treatment of alcoholism is the prejudice in many hospitals, which don't welcome alcoholics and regard them as pernicious nuisances.

Alcoholic hospitals are needed, the Yale Planners say, and should be provided from taxpayers' funds in the assumption that the taxpayers are the most immediate beneficiaries.

Yet oddly, rehabilitated alcoholics, such as are found in Alcoholics Anonymous, rarely advocate national return to prohibition. They frankly acknowledge that they are among the unfortunate minority who cannot handle drink in moderation.

The solution is public enlighten-ment, intelligent control, and sympathetic regard for the alcoholic as a sick man, instead of a minor criminal and social renegade. The same light has been kindled and its beam is spreading.

Heightened Hope for Alcoholics

America's Chronic Drunkards, Once Shunned as Social

Outcasts, Are Being Redeemed by New, Humane Treatment

That Restores Them to Health and Respectability

By Austen Lake

A new sun is dawning for America's estimated 900,000 alcoholics—a sun of public intelligence which radiates from the Yale Clinic Plan. The American Weekly printed the first comprehensive, authoritative report on the Yale Plan in February 1945, and since that time use of the new method has been spreading.

As yet the dawn is in its early shell-pink, but its light has already touched 12 U.S. cities and nine states.

In Boston, the chronic drunkard is regarded as a sick man, whose disease is a involuntary and consuming as infantile paralysis or malaria.

In New Haven, Dallas, Des Moines, Daytona Beach and Rochester, N.Y., the alcoholic is treated with the same dignity as any invalid.

In Fort Worth, Austin, Pittsburgh, Youngstown, Washington, D.C., and Charleston, addicts are sympathetically screened through social and medical centers and helped back to normal.

As yet the light is a candle flicker in the century-old gloom of prejudice. But it is still growing brighter. The Yale Plan was its kindling point. Charles Jackson's memorable book, "The Lost Weekend," and the movie made from it, made a tremendous impact on national consciousness. The expansion of Alcoholics Anonymous has been a profound educational factor. The American press has given the subject more attention since 1940 than during the entire preceding century.

The Yale Clinic Plan was conceived ten years ago by a New Haven scientist, who approached alcoholism not as a temperance zealot, but as a skilled specialist seeking a preventive formula.

It works as many thousands of "ex-incurables" can attest.

Rehabilitated "drunkards" once deemed hopeless have become the Yale Plan's most enthusiastic workers in redeeming other members of the ancient fellowship of the uptilted bottle.

Ten years ago Dr. Howard W. Haggard was investigating the effects of noxious gases on the human system in his laboratory at Yale. In Boston, among the most energetic cities in the campaign, the CEA has headquarters at 419 Boylston Street, a few doors above the offices of Alcoholics Anonymous, and functions through public subscription and a large list of judges, doctors, psychiatrists, clergymen, educators, social workers, law enforcement officers and business folk. For more than a year the old brownstone building has received a steady stream of alcoholics. Some come voluntary. Some are sent by the courts, some by clergymen.

By sifting through the index files of the Boston, CEA, one finds entries such as these:

"Mr. H.Y. Married, 2 children, owner small business, quiet, slightly morbid type. Expressed great fear of inherited nervousness from neurotic mother. Wife too inclined to neurosis. Became periodic "binge" drinker with binges running closer together till they merged.

"Was given short period hospitalization, and after treatment from their horrible habit - as in the case of the mining engineer, the hot musician, the minister and the movie actor.

Tom, a young musician just out of a job on a big-name dance band, was pouring out the story of his heroin addiction to a small gathering in a New York City Y.M.C.A. He told how he started three years ago, "fooling around for thrills, never dreaming to get a habit." His band went on the road. One night in Philadelphia he ran out of his drug and became so shaky he couldn't play. It was the first time the band management knew of his habit. He was promptly sent home.

"Music business is getting tough with junkies," Tom said.

His audience was sympathetic. It was composed of former drug addicts who had found freedom from addiction. They met twice weekly to make this freedom secure, and worked to help other addicts achieve it. The New York group, founded in 1950 and called Narcotics Anonymous, is one of several which have been piling up evidence that the methods of Alcoholics Anonymous can help release people from other drugs than alcohol - drugs such as opium, heroin, morphine and the barbiturates.

The groups enter a field where patients are many and cures few. The population addicted to opiates has been placed by competent but incompatible authorities at 60,000 and at 180,000. The Federal Bureau of Narcotics estimates that the traffic in illegal opium derivatives grosses $275,000,000 a year. About 1000 people a month are arrested for violation of Federal, state or local laws regulating the opiates. Addiction to the barbiturates, it is believed, involves more people. There are some 1500 known compounds of barbituric acid, some of them having pharmaceutical names and others street names such as yellow jacket, red devil and goofball.

Addicts work up to doses sufficient to kill a non-addicted person or an addict with a lesser tolerance. In New York recently, three young addicts met and took equal portions of heroin. Two felt no unusual reactions; the third went into convulsions and in a few hours was dead. Many barbiturate users daily consume quantities, which would be lethal to a normal person. Others have demonstrated an ability to use barbiturates for years, under medical supervision, without raising their consumption to dangerous levels.

The drug addict, like the alcoholic, has long been an enigma to those who want to help him. Real contact is most likely to be made, on a principle demonstrated with phenomenal success by Alcoholics Anonymous, by another addict. Does the prospect, writhing with shame, confess to pilfering from his wife's purse to buy drugs? His sponsor once took his children's lunch money. Did he steal the black bag of a loyal family doctor? As a ruse to flimflam druggists, his new friend once impersonated a doctor for several months. The N.A. member first shares his shame with the newcomer. Then he shares his hope and finally, sometimes, his recovery.

To date, the A.A. type of group therapy has been an effective ingredient of "cures" - the word as used here means no drugs for a year or more and an intent of permanent abstinence. - in at least 200 cases. Some of these, including Dan, the founder of the New York group, had been pronounced medically hopeless. The "Narco" Group in the United States Public Health Service Hospital at Lexington, Kentucky, has a transient membership of about eighty men and women patients. The group mails a monthly newsletter, The Key, free to those who want it, currently a list of 500 names. Many of these are interested but nonaddicted friends. Most are "mail-order members" of the group-addicts who have left the hospital and been without drugs for periods ranging from a few weeks to several years. The H.F.D. (Habit Forming Drug) Group is a loosely affiliated fellowship of California ex-addicts who keep "clean" - the addicts term for a state of abstinence- by attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings with volunteer A.A. sponsors. The Federal prison at Lorton, Virginia, has a prisoner group which attracts thirty men to its weekly meetings. Narcotics Anonymous in New York is the sole "free world"-outside of institution-group which conducts its own weekly open-to-the-public meetings in the A.A. tradition.

Today's groups of former addicts mark the convergence of two historic narratives, one having to do with alcohol, the other with opium. References to the drug of the poppies go back to 4000 B.C. According to Homer, Helen of Troy used it in a beverage guaranteed to abolish care. Opium was employed to quiet noisy children as early as 1552 B.C. De Quincy and Coleridge are among the famous men to whom it brought disaster. In its dual role it appears today, through its derivatives, as the friend of man in surgery and his enemy in addiction.

The alcoholic strand of the story may be taken up in the Zurich office of the Swiss psychologist Carl Jung, one day late in 1933. At that time the eminent doctor was obliged to impart an unpleasant bit of news to one of his patients, an American businessman who had come for help with a desperate drinking problem. After months of effort and repeated relapses, the doctor admitted that his treatment had been a failure.

"Is there, then," the patient asked, "no hope?" Only if a profound religious experience were undergone, he was told. How, he wanted to know, could such an experience be had? It could not be obtained on order, the doctor said, but if one associated with religious-minded people for a while _____

Narcotics Anonymous - A.A.'s Young Brother

The American interested himself in Frank Buchman's Oxford Group, found sobriety, and told an inebriate friend of his experience. The friend sobered up and took the message to a former drinking partner, a New York stockbroker named Bill. Though he was an agnostic who had never had much use for religion, Bill sobered up. Late in 1935, while on a business trip to Akron, Ohio, he was struck by the thought that he wouldn't be able to keep his sobriety unless he passed on the message. He sought out a heavy drinking local surgeon named Bob and told him the story to date. They sat down and formulated a program for staying sober—a program featuring twelve Suggested Steps and called Alcoholics Anonymous. Bill devoted full time to carrying the A.A. message, and the news spread. The now-famous article by Jack Alexander in The Saturday Evening Post of March 1, 1941, made it nationally known, and by 1944 there were A.A. groups in the major cities.

In June of that year an inebriate mining engineer whom we'll call Houston "hit bottom" with his drinking in Montgomery, Alabama, and the local A.A.'s dried him up. Houston gobbled the A.A. program and began helping other alcoholics. One of the drunks he worked with—a sales executive who can be called Harry—was involved not only with alcohol but also morphine. A.A. took care of the alcoholic factor, but left Harry's drug habit unchanged. Interested and baffled, Houston watched his new friend struggle in his strange self-constructed trap.

The opiate theme of the narrative now reappears. Harry's pattern had been to get roaring drunk, take morphine to avoid a hang-over, get drunk again and take morphine again. Thus he became "hooked"—addicted. He drove through a red light one day and was stopped by a policeman. The officer found morphine and turned him over to Federal jurisdiction, with the result that Harry spent twenty-seven months at Lexington, where both voluntary and involuntary patients are accommodated, as a prisoner. After his discharge he met Houston and, through A.A., found relief from the booze issue. The drug problem continued to plague him.

During this period, Houston, through one of those coincidences which A.A.'s like to attribute to a Higher Power, was transferred by his employers to Frankfort, Kentucky, just a few miles from Lexington. "Harry's troubles kept jumping through my brain," Houston says. "I was convinced that the twelve Suggested Steps would work as well for drugs as for alcohol if conscientiously applied. One day I called on Dr. V.H. Vogel, the medical officer then in charge at Lexington. I told him of our work with Harry and offered to assist in starting a group in the hospital. Doctor Vogel accepted the offer and on Feb. 16, 1947, the first meeting was held. Weekly meetings have been going on ever since."

The Phenomenon of "Physical Dependence"

Some months later, in a strangely woven web of coincidence, Harry reappeared at "Narco" as a voluntary patient and began attending meetings. He was discharged, relapsed, and in short time was back again. "This time," he says, "it clicked." He has now been free from both alcohol and drugs for more than five years. Twice he has returned to tell his story at meetings, in the A.A. tradition of passing on the good word.

In the fall of 1948 there arrived at Lexington an addict named Dan who had been there before. It was, in fact, his seventh trip; the doctors assumed that he'd continue his periodic visits until he died. This same Dan later founded the small but significant Narcotics Anonymous group in New York. Dan's personal history is the story of an apparently incurable addict apparently cured.

An emotionally unsettled childhood is the rule among addicts, and Dan's childhood follows the pattern. His mother died when he was three years old, his father when he was four. He was adopted by a spinster physician and spent his boyhood with his foster mother, a resident doctor in a Kansas City hospital, and with her relatives in Missouri and Illinois. When he was sixteen he developed an ear ailment and was given opiates to relieve the pain. During and after an operation to correct the condition he received frequent morphine injections. Enjoying the mood of easy, floating forgetfulness they induced, he malingered.

Living in a large hospital gave Dan opportunities to pilfer drugs, and for six months he managed keep himself regularly supplied. An addict at the hospital taught him how to inject himself, so for a time he was able to recapture the mood at will. He was embarrassing his foster mother professionally, however, and though not yet acknowledging the fact to himself, was becoming known locally as an addict. Sources of drugs began to close up, and one day there was no morphine to be had. He went into an uncontrollable panic which grew worse each hour.

There followed muscular cramps, diarrhea, a freely running nose, tears gushing from his eyes, and two sleepless, terror-filled days and nights. It was Dan's first experience with the mysterious withdrawal sickness which is experienced sooner or later by every addict.

In one of the strangest phenomena known to medicine, the body adjusts to the invasion of certain drugs, altering its chemistry in a few weeks to a basis-called "physical dependence"-on which it can no longer function properly without the drug. How physical dependence differs from habit may be illustrated by imagining a habitual gum chewer deprived of gum. His unease would be due to the denial of habit. If he were denied gum and also water, on which he is physically dependent, he'd feel an increasingly painful craving called thirst. The drug addict's craving is called the "abstinence syndrome," or withdrawal sickness. In extreme cases it includes everything Dan experienced, plus hallucinations and convulsions. Withdrawal of opiates rarely causes the death of a healthy person; sudden cessation of barbiturates has been known to. The violent phase, which is usually over in two to three days, may under expert care be largely avoided. Physical dependence gradually diminishes and ordinary habit, of the gum-chewing type, asserts itself.

This is the interval of greatest vulner-ability, N.A. members say, to the addict's inevitable good resolutions. He has formed the habit of using his drugs when he feels low. If he breaks off medical supervision before he is physically and medically back to par, the temptation to relapse may be overwhelming. It is in this period, Dan says, that the addict most needs the kind of understanding he finds in N.A. If he yields to the call of habit, physical dependence is quickly reestablished and his body calls for ever greater doses as the price of peace.

Dan went through the cycle dozens of times. Besides the half dozen withdrawals at Lexington, there were several at city and state institutions, and numerous attempts at self-withdrawal. He tried sudden and complete abstinence, the "cold-turkey" method. He tried relieving the withdrawal pangs with alcohol, and found it only cancelled out his ability to think, so he automatically returned to drugs. When he attempted withdrawal with barbiturates he "just about went goofy."

All this, however, was to come later; in his early twenties he had no intention of giving up the use of drugs. Having been spotted as an addict in the Kansas City area, he sought fresh fields. He found a job as a salesman and traveled several Midwest states. The demands of his habit and his scrapes with the law made it hard to hold a job long. Drifting from one employment to another, he found himself, in the early 1930's in Brooklyn.

His attempts at withdrawal resulted in several extended periods of abstinence, the longest of which was three years. When off drugs Dan was an able sales executive and a good provider. He married a Staten Island girl. They had a son. Dan continued to have short relapses, however. Each new one put a further strain on the family tie. For a time, to save money for drugs, he used slugs in the subway turnstiles going to and from work. He was spotted by a subway detective and spent two days in jail. A month later he was caught passing a forged morphine prescription. As a result, he was among the first prisoner patients at the new United States Public Health Service Hospital for addicts at Lexington, when it was opened on May 28, 1935.

After a year there, he made a supreme effort to be rid of drugs for good. To keep away from the temptations offered by New York drug pushers he found a job with a large Midwest dairy. He worked hard, saved his money and sent for his family. By this time, however, it was too late; his wife refused to come, and a divorce action was begun. "Her rebuff gave me what I thought was a good excuse to go back on drugs," Dan reports. After that, his deterioration accelerated. On his seventh trip to Lexington, in 1948, he was in a profound depression.

After a month of sullen silence, he began attending the group meetings, which were a new feature at the hospital since his last trip. "I still wouldn't talk," he reports, "But I did some listening. I was impressed by what Houston had to say. Harry came back one time and told us his story. For the first time, I began to pray. I was only praying that I would die, but at least it was a prayer," He did not die, nor did he recover. Within six months of his discharge he was found in possession of drugs and sent back to Lexington for a year-his eighth and, as it turned out, final trip.

"This time things were different," he says. "Everything Houston and Harry had been saying suddenly made sense. There was a lawyer from a Southern city there at the time, and a Midwestern surgeon. They were in the same mood I was-disgusted with themselves and really ready to change. The three of us used to have long talks with Houston every Saturday morning, besides the regular meetings." All three recently celebrated the fifth anniversary of their emancipation from the drug habit.

Dan, conscious of what seemed to him a miraculous change of attitude, returned to New York full of enthusiasm and hope. The twelfth of the Suggested Steps was to pass on the message to others who needed help. He proposed to form the first outside-of-institution group and call it Narcotics Anonymous-N.A. He contacted other Lexington alumni and suggested they start weekly meetings.

There were certain difficulties. Addicts are not outstandingly gregarious, and when all the excuses were in only three-a house painter named Charlie, a barber named Henry and a waiter we'll call George-were on hand for the first meeting. There was uncertainty about where this would be; nobody it seemed wanted the addicts around. Besides, missionary, or "twelfth step," work of the new group would be hampered by the law. When the A.A. member is on an errand of mercy he can, if occasion warrants, administer appropriate "medicine" to stave off shakes or delirium long enough to talk a little sense into the prospect. If the N.A. member did so, he'd risk a long term in jail. Drug peddlers were not enthusiastic about the new venture. Rumors were circulating discrediting the group.

Out of the gloom, however, came unexpected rays of friendliness and help. The Salvation Army made room for meetings at its 46th Street cafeteria. Later the McBurney Y.M.C.A., on 23rd Street, offered a meeting room. Two doctors backed their oral support by sending patients to meetings. Two other doctors agreed to serve on an advisory board.

There were slips and backslidings. Meetings were sometimes marred by obstinacy and temper. But three of the original four remained faithful and the group slowly grew. Difficult matters of policy were worked out by trial and error. Some members once thought that a satisfactory withdrawal could be made at home. Some hard nights were endured and it was concluded that the doctors were right-for a proper drug withdrawal institutional care is necessary. Addicts are not admitted to meetings while using drugs. Newcomers are advised to make their withdrawal first, then come to N.A. to learn to live successfully without drugs.

Group statisticians estimate that 5000 inquiries have been answered, constituting a heavy drain on the group's treasury. Some 600 addicts have attended one or more meetings, 90 have attained effective living without drugs. One of these is a motion picture celebrity, now doing well on his own. One relapse after the first exposure to N.A. principles seems to have been about par, though a number have not found this necessary. "A key fact of which few addicts are aware," Dan says, "is that once he's been addicted, a person can never again take even one dose of any habit-forming drug, including alcohol and the barbiturates, without running into trouble."

The weekly "open"-to the public-meetings are attended by ten to thirty persons-addicts, their friends and families and concerned outsiders. The room is small and, on Friday evenings when more than twenty-five turn up, crowded.

There is an interval of chitchat and visiting, and then, about nine o'clock, the secretary, a Brooklyn housewife, mother and department -store cashier, opens the meeting. In this ceremony all repeat the well-known prayer: "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference." The secretary then introduces a leader-a member who presents the speakers and renders interlocutor's comments from his own experience with a drugless life. The speakers-traditionally two in an evening-describe their adventures with drugs and with N.A. In two months of meetings I heard a score of these case histories. I also charted the progress of a newcomer, the young musician named Tom, whose first N.A. meeting coincided with my own first reportorial visit.

Within the undeviating certainties of addiction, individual histories reveal a wide assortment of personal variations. Harold, an optometrist, is a "medical" addict; he got his habit from the prescription pad of a doctor who was treating him for osteomyelitis. An outspoken advocate of psychotherapy for all, Harold absorbs a certain amount of ribbing as the groups "psychiatric salesman." Florence, the housewife-cashier-secretary, recently celebrated her first anniversary of freedom from morphine, which she first received twenty-five years ago in a prescription for the relief of menstrual cramps. Carl, an electrician, became interested in the effects of opium smoke thirty years ago, and reached a point where he could not function without his daily pipe. He eventually switched to heroin and his troubles multiplied.

Manny, an executive in a high-pressure advertising agency, and Marian, a registered nurse with heavy administrative responsibilities began using morphine to relieve fatigue. Don, Marian's husband, regards alcohol as his main addictive drug, but had a bad brush with self-prescribed barbiturates before he came to A.A. and then, with Marian, to N.A. Pat, another young advertising man, nearly died of poisoning from the barbiturates to which he had become heavily addicted. Harold and Carl have now been four years without drugs; Manny, three; Marian, Don and Pat, one.

Perhaps a third of the membership are graduates of the teen-age heroin fad which swept our larger cities a few years ago, and which still enjoys as much of a vogue as dope peddlers can promote among the present teen-age population. Rita, an attractive daughter of Spanish-American Harlem, was one of the group's first members. Along with a number of her classmates, she began by smoking marihuana cigarettes—a typical introduction to drugs—then took heroin "for thrills." She used the drug four years, became desperately ill, went to Lexington and has now been free of the habit four years. Fred, a war hero, became a heroin addict because he wanted friends. In the teen-age gang to which he aspired, being hooked was a badge of distinction. He sought out the pusher who frequented the vicinity of his high school and got hooked. There followed seven miserable and dangerous years, two of them in combat and one in a veteran's hospital. In December of 1953 he came to N.A. and, he says, "really found friends."

Lawrence's story is the happiest of all. He came to N.A. early in his first addiction, just out of high school, just married, thoroughly alarmed at discovering he was addicted, and desperately seeking a way out. N.A. friends recommended that he get "blue-grassed," an arrangement by which a patient may commit himself under a local statute to remain at Lexington 135 days for what the doctors consider a really adequate treatment. He attended meetings in the hospital and more meetings when he got home. Now happy and grateful, he thanks N.A. His boss recently presented him with a promotion; his wife recently presented him with a son.

Besides the Friday open meeting there is a Tuesday closed meeting at the Y for addicts only. As a special dispensation I was permitted to attend a closed meeting, the purpose of which is to discuss the daily application of the twelve steps.

The step under discussion the night I was there was No.4:"Make a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves." The point was raised as to whether this step might degenerate into self-recrimination and do more harm than good. Old-timers asserted that this was not the proper application. A life of drug addiction, they said, often built up an abnormal load of guilt and fear, which could become so oppressive as to threaten a relapse unless dealt with. When the addict used step 4 honestly to face up to his past, guilt and fear diminished and he could make constructive plans for his future.

The Narco meetings at Lexington have borne other fruit. There was Charlie, the young GI from Washington, D.C., who once looted first-aid kits in the gun tubs of a Navy transport en route to the Philippines and took his first morphine out of sheer curiosity. After his Army discharge his curiosity led him to heroin and several bad years; then to Lexington, where the Narco Group struck a spark. He heard about Dan's work, went to New York to see him, and on his return to Washington looked around to see what he could do.

He discovered that there was a concentration of addicts in the Federal penitentiary at Lorton, Virginia. Working with Alcoholics Anonymous, which already had meetings in the prison, he obtained permission to start a group like the one at Lexington. Now a year old, these meetings, called the Notrol Group- Lorton backward-attract the regular attendance of about thirty addicts. Washington has no free-world group, but Charlie helps a lot of addicts on an individual basis, steering them to A.A. meetings for doctrine.

Friendliness of ex-drug addicts with former devotees of alcohol sometimes occurs, though Bill, the same who figured so prominently in A.A.'s founding, says a fraternal attitude cannot be depended upon. The average A.A., he says, would merely look blank if asked about drug addiction, and rightly reply that this specialty is outside his understanding. There are, however, a few A.A.'s who have been addicted both to alcohol and drugs, and these sometimes function as "bridge members."

"If the addict substitutes the word `drugs' whenever he hears `alcohol' in the A.A. program, he'll be helped," Houston says. Many ex-addicts, in the larger population centers where meetings run to attendances of hundreds, attend A.A. meetings. The H.F.D. (Habit-Forming Drug) Group, which is activated by an energetic ex-addict and ex-alcoholic of the Los Angeles area named Betty, has dozens of members, but no meeting of its own. Individual ex-addicts who are "making it" the A.A. way include a minister in a South-eastern state, a politician in the deep South, a motion-picture mogul in California and an eminent surgeon of an Eastern city. The role call of ex-addict groups is small. There is the parent Narco Group, Addicts Anonymous, P.O. Box 2000, Lexington, KY; Narcotics Anonymous, P.O. Box 3, Village Station, New York 14, N.Y.; Notrol Group, c/o U.S. Penitentiary, Lorton, Va.; H.D.F. Group, c/o Secretary, Bay Area Rehabilitation Center, 1458 26th St., Santa Monica, Calif.

A frequent and relevant question asked by the casually interested is, "But I thought habit-forming drugs were illegal-where do they get the stuff?" The answer involves an interesting bit of history explaining how opiates come to be illegal. In the early 1800's doctors used them freely to treat the innumerable ills then lumped under the heading, "nervousness." Hypodermic injection of morphine was introduced in 1856. By 1880, opium and morphine preparations were common drugstore items. An 1882 survey estimated that 1 per cent of the population was addicted, and the public became alarmed. A wave of legislation swept the country, beginning in 1885 with an Ohio statute and culminating in the Federal Harrison Narcotic Law of 1914. Immediately after the passage of this prohibitory law, prices of opium, morphine and heroin soared. A fantastically profitable black market developed. Today, $3000 worth of heroin purchased abroad brings $300,000 when finally cut, packaged and sold in America.

Among the judges, social workers and doctors with whom I talked there is a growing feeling that the Harrison Act needs to be re-examined. Dr. Hubert S.

out of their horrible habit - as in the case of the mining engineer, the hot musician, the minister and the movie actor.

Tom, a young musician just out of a job on a big-name dance band, was pouring out the story of his heroin addiction to a small gathering in a New York City Y.M.C.A. He told how he started three years ago, "fooling around for thrills, never dreaming to get a habit." His band went on the road. One night in Philadelphia he ran out of his drug and became so shaky he couldn't play. It was the first time the band management knew of his habit. He was promptly sent home.

"Music business is getting tough with junkies," Tom said.

His audience was sympathetic. It was composed of former drug addicts who had found freedom from addiction. They met twice weekly to make this freedom secure, and worked to help other addicts achieve it. The New York group, founded in 1950 and called Narcotics Anonymous, is one of several which have been piling up evidence that the methods of Alcoholics Anonymous can help release people from other drugs than alcohol - drugs such as opium, heroin, morphine and the barbiturates.

The groups enter a field where patients are many and cures few. The population addicted to opiates has been placed by competent but incompatible authorities at 60,000 and at 180,000. The Federal Bureau of Narcotics estimates that the traffic in illegal opium derivatives grosses $275,000,000 a year. About 1000 people a month are arrested for violation of Federal, state or local laws regulating the opiates. Addiction to the barbiturates, it is believed, involves more people. There are some 1500 known compounds of barbituric acid, some of them having pharmaceutical names and others street names such as yellow jacket, red devil and goofball.

Addicts work up to doses sufficient to kill a non-addicted person or an addict with a lesser tolerance. In New York recently, three young addicts met and took equal portions of heroin. Two felt no unusual reactions; the third went into convulsions and in a few hours was dead. Many barbiturate users daily consume quantities, which would be lethal to a normal person. Others have demonstrated an ability to use barbiturates for years, under medical supervision, without raising their consumption to dangerous levels.

The drug addict, like the alcoholic, has long been an enigma to those who want to help him. Real contact is most likely to be made, on a principle demonstrated with phenomenal success by Alcoholics Anonymous, by another addict. Does the prospect, writhing with shame, confess to pilfering from his wife's purse to buy drugs? His sponsor once took his children's lunch money. Did he steal the black bag of a loyal family doctor? As a ruse to flimflam druggists, his new friend once impersonated a doctor for several months. The N.A. member first shares his shame with the newcomer. Then he shares his hope and finally, sometimes, his recovery.

To date, the A.A. type of group therapy has been an effective ingredient of "cures" - the word as used here means no drugs for a year or more and an intent of permanent abstinence. - in at least 200 cases. Some of these, including Dan, the founder of the New York group, had been pronounced medically hopeless. The "Narco" Group in the United States Public Health Service Hospital at Lexington, Kentucky, has a transient membership of about eighty men and women patients. The group mails a monthly newsletter, The Key, free to those who want it, currently a list of 500 names. Many of these are interested but nonaddicted friends. Most are "mail-order members" of the group-addicts who have left the hospital and been without drugs for periods ranging from a few weeks to several years. The H.F.D. (Habit Forming Drug) Group is a loosely affiliated fellowship of California ex-addicts who keep "clean" - the addicts term for a state of abstinence- by attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings with volunteer A.A. sponsors. The Federal prison at Lorton, Virginia, has a prisoner group which attracts thirty men to its weekly meetings. Narcotics Anonymous in New York is the sole "free world"-outside of institution-group which conducts its own weekly open-to-the-public meetings in the A.A. tradition.

Today's groups of former addicts mark the convergence of two historic narratives, one having to do with alcohol, the other with opium. References to the drug of the poppies go back to 4000 B.C. According to Homer, Helen of Troy used it in a beverage guaranteed to abolish care. Opium was employed to quiet noisy children as early as 1552 B.C. De Quincy and Coleridge are among the famous men to whom it brought disaster. In its dual role it appears today, through its derivatives, as the friend of man in surgery and his enemy in addiction.

The alcoholic strand of the story may be taken up in the Zurich office of the Swiss psychologist Carl Jung, one day late in 1933. At that time the eminent doctor was obliged to impart an unpleasant bit of news to one of his patients, an American businessman who had come for help with a desperate drinking problem. After months of effort and repeated relapses, the doctor admitted that his treatment had been a failure.

"Is there, then," the patient asked, "no hope?" Only if a profound religious experience were undergone, he was told. How, he wanted to know, could such an experience be had? It could not be obtained on order, the doctor said, but if one associated with religious-minded people for a while _____ sobered up and took the message to a former drinking partner, a New York stockbroker named Bill. Though he was an agnostic who had never had much use for religion, Bill sobered up. Late in 1935, while on a business trip to Akron, Ohio, he was struck by the thought that he wouldn't be able to keep his sobriety unless he passed on the message. He sought out a heavy drinking local surgeon named Bob and told him the story to date. They sat down and formulated a program for staying sober—a program featuring twelve Suggested Steps and called Alcoholics Anonymous. Bill devoted full time to carrying the A.A. message, and the news spread. The now-famous article by Jack Alexander in The Saturday Evening Post of March 1, 1941, made it nationally known, and by 1944 there were A.A. groups in the major cities.

In June of that year an inebriate mining engineer whom we'll call Houston "hit bottom" with his drinking in Montgomery, Alabama, and the local A.A.'s dried him up. Houston gobbled the A.A. program and began helping other alcoholics. One of the drunks he worked with—a sales executive who can be called Harry—was involved not only with alcohol but also morphine. A.A. took care of the alcoholic factor, but left Harry's drug habit unchanged. Interested and baffled, Houston watched his new friend struggle in his strange self-constructed trap.

The opiate theme of the narrative now reappears. Harry's pattern had been to get roaring drunk, take morphine to avoid a hang-over, get drunk again and take morphine again. Thus he became "hooked"—addicted. He drove through a red light one day and was stopped by a policeman. The officer found morphine and turned him over to Federal jurisdiction, with the result that Harry spent twenty-seven months at Lexington, where both voluntary and involuntary patients are accommodated, as a prisoner. After his discharge he met Houston and, through A.A., found relief from the booze issue. The drug problem continued to plague him.

During this period, Houston, through one of those coincidences which A.A.'s like to attribute to a Higher Power, was transferred by his employers to Frankfort, Kentucky, just a few miles from Lexington. "Harry's troubles kept jumping through my brain," Houston says. "I was convinced that the twelve Suggested Steps would work as well for drugs as for alcohol if conscientiously applied. One day I called on Dr. V.H. Vogel, the medical officer then in charge at Lexington. I told him of our work with Harry and offered to assist in starting a group in the hospital. Doctor Vogel accepted the offer and on Feb. 16, 1947, the first meeting was held. Weekly meetings have been going on ever since."

The Phenomenon of "Physical Dependence"

Some months later, in a strangely woven web of coincidence, Harry reappeared at "Narco" as a voluntary patient and began attending meetings. He was discharged, relapsed, and in short time was back again. "This time," he says, "it clicked." He has now been free from both alcohol and drugs for more than five years. Twice he has returned to tell his story at meetings, in the A.A. tradition of passing on the good word.

In the fall of 1948 there arrived at Lexington an addict named Dan who had been there before. It was, in fact, his seventh trip; the doctors assumed that he'd continue his periodic visits until he died. This same Dan later founded the small but significant Narcotics Anonymous group in New York. Dan's personal history is the story of an apparently incurable addict apparently cured.

An emotionally unsettled childhood is the rule among addicts, and Dan's childhood follows the pattern. His mother died when he was three years old, his father when he was four. He was adopted by a spinster physician and spent his boyhood with his foster mother, a resident doctor in a Kansas City hospital, and with her relatives in Missouri and Illinois. When he was sixteen he developed an ear ailment and was given opiates to relieve the pain. During and after an operation to correct the condition he received frequent morphine injections. Enjoying the mood of easy, floating forgetfulness they induced, he malingered.

Living in a large hospital gave Dan opportunities to pilfer drugs, and for six months he managed keep himself regularly supplied. An addict at the hospital taught him how to inject himself, so for a time he was able to recapture the mood at will. He was embarrassing his foster mother professionally, however, and though not yet acknowledging the fact to himself, was becoming known locally as an addict. Sources of drugs began to close up, and one day there was no morphine to be had. He went into an uncontrollable panic which grew worse each hour.

There followed muscular cramps, diarrhea, a freely running nose, tears gushing from his eyes, and two sleepless, terror-filled days and nights. It was Dan's first experience with the mysterious withdrawal sickness which is experienced sooner or later by every addict.

In one of the strangest phenomena known to medicine, the body adjusts to the invasion of certain drugs, altering its chemistry in a few weeks to a basis-called "physical dependence"-on which it can no longer function properly without the drug. How physical dependence differs from habit may be illustrated by imagining a habitual gum chewer deprived of gum. His unease would be due to the denial of habit. If he were denied gum and also water, on which he is physically dependent, he'd feel an increasingly painful craving called thirst. The drug addict's craving is called the "abstinence syndrome," or withdrawal sickness. In extreme cases it includes everything Dan experienced, plus hallucinations and convulsions. Withdrawal of opiates rarely causes the death of a healthy person; sudden cessation of barbiturates has been known to. The violent phase, which is usually over in two to three days, may under expert care be largely avoided. Physical dependence gradually diminishes and ordinary habit, of the gum-chewing type, asserts itself.

This is the interval of greatest vulnerability, N.A. members say, to the addict's inevitable good resolutions. He has formed the habit of using his drugs when he feels low. If he breaks off medical supervision before he is physically and medically back to par, the temptation to relapse may be overwhelming. It is in this period, Dan says, that the addict most needs the kind of understanding he finds in N.A. If he yields to the call of habit, physical dependence is quickly reestablished and his body calls for ever greater doses as the price of peace.

Dan went through the cycle dozens of times. Besides the half dozen withdrawals at Lexington, there were several at city and state institutions, and numerous attempts at self-withdrawal. He tried sudden and complete abstinence, the "cold-turkey" method. He tried relieving the withdrawal pangs with alcohol, and found it only cancelled out his ability to think, so he automatically returned to drugs. When he attempted withdrawal with barbiturates he "just about went goofy."

All this, however, was to come later; in his early twenties he had no intention of giving up the use of drugs. Having been spotted as an addict in the Kansas City area, he sought fresh fields. He found a job as a salesman and traveled several Midwest states. The demands of his habit and his scrapes with the law made it hard to hold a job long. Drifting from one employment to another, he found himself, in the early 1930's in Brooklyn.

His attempts at withdrawal resulted in several extended periods of abstinence, the longest of which was three years. When off drugs Dan was an able sales executive and a good provider. He married a Staten Island girl. They had a son. Dan continued to have short relapses, however. Each new one put a further strain on the family tie. For a time, to save money for drugs, he used slugs in the subway turnstiles going to and from work. He was spotted by a subway detective and spent two days in jail. A month later he was caught passing a forged morphine prescription. As a result, he was among the first prisoner patients at the new United States Public Health Service Hospital for addicts at Lexington, when it was opened on May 28, 1935.

After a year there, he made a supreme effort to be rid of drugs for good. To keep away from the temptations offered by New York drug pushers he found a job with a large Midwest dairy. He worked hard, saved his money and sent for his family. By this time, however, it was too late; his wife refused to come, and a divorce action was begun. "Her rebuff gave me what I thought was a good excuse to go back on drugs," Dan reports. After that, his deterioration accelerated. On his seventh trip to Lexington, in 1948, he was in a profound depression.

After a month of sullen silence, he began attending the group meetings, which were a new feature at the hospital since his last trip. "I still wouldn't talk," he reports, "But I did some listening. I was impressed by what Houston had to say. Harry came back one time and told us his story. For the first time, I began to pray. I was only praying that I would die, but at least it was a prayer," He did not die, nor did he recover. Within six months of his discharge he was found in possession of drugs and sent back to Lexington for a year-his eighth and, as it turned out, final trip.

"This time things were different," he says. "Everything Houston and Harry had been saying suddenly made sense. There was a lawyer from a Southern city there at the time, and a Midwestern surgeon. They were in the same mood I was-disgusted with themselves and really ready to change. The three of us used to have long talks with Houston every Saturday morning, besides the regular meetings." All three recently celebrated the fifth anniversary of their emancipation from the drug habit.

Dan, conscious of what seemed to him a miraculous change of attitude, returned to New York full of enthusiasm and hope. The twelfth of the Suggested Steps was to pass on the message to others who needed help. He proposed to form the first outside-of-institution group and call it Narcotics Anonymous-N.A. He contacted other Lexington alumni and suggested they start weekly meetings.

There were certain difficulties. Addicts are not outstandingly gregarious, and when all the excuses were in only three—a house painter named Charlie, a barber named Henry and a waiter we'll call George—were on hand for the first meeting. There was uncertainty about where this would be; nobody it seemed wanted the addicts around. Besides, missionary, or "twelfth step," work of the new group would be hampered by the law. When the A.A. member is on an errand of mercy he can, if occasion warrants, administer appropriate "medicine" to stave off shakes or delirium long enough to talk a little sense into the prospect. If the N.A. member did so, he'd risk a long term in jail. Drug peddlers were not enthusiastic about the new venture. Rumors were circulating discrediting the group.

Out of the gloom, however, came unexpected rays of friendliness and help. The Salvation Army made room for meetings at its 46th Street cafeteria. Later the McBurney Y.M.C.A., on 23rd Street, offered a meeting room. Two doctors backed their oral support by sending patients to meetings. Two other doctors agreed to serve on an advisory board.

There were slips and backslidings. Meetings were sometimes marred by obstinacy and temper. But three of the original four remained faithful and the group slowly grew. Difficult matters of policy were worked out by trial and error. Some members once thought that a satisfactory withdrawal could be made at home. Some hard nights were endured and it was concluded that the doctors were right—for a proper drug withdrawal institutional care is necessary. Addicts are not admitted to meetings while using drugs. Newcomers are advised to make their withdrawal first, then come to N.A. to learn to live successfully without drugs.

Group statisticians estimate that 5000 inquiries have been answered, constituting a heavy drain on the group's treasury. Some 600 addicts have attended one or more meetings, 90 have attained effective living without drugs. One of these is a motion picture celebrity, now doing well on his own. One relapse after the first exposure to N.A. principles seems to have been about par, though a number have not found this necessary. "A key fact of which few addicts are aware," Dan says, "is that once he's been addicted, a person can never again take even one dose of any habit-forming drug, including alcohol and the barbiturates, without running into trouble."

By 1880, opium and morphine preparations were common drugstore items. An 1882 survey estimated that 1 per cent of the population was addicted, and the public became alarmed. A wave of legislation swept the country, beginning in 1885 with an Ohio statute and culminating in the Federal Harrison Narcotic Law parents of a family now become responsible, declare you to be of age and on your own.

Now lets start on our story.

First of all, there was the kitchen table which stood in a brownstone house which still bears the number 182, Clinton Street, Brooklyn. There, Lois saw me go into the depths. There, over the kitchen table, Ebby brought me these simple principles now enshrined in our Twelve Steps.

In those days, there were but six steps: We admitted we couldn't run our lives; we got honest with ourselves; we made a self-survey; we made restitution to the people we had harmed; we tried to carry this story one to the next; and we asked God to help us to do those things. That was the essence of the message over the kitchen table. In those days, we were associated with the Oxford Group. One of its founders was Sam Shoemaker, and this Group has just left Calvary House to come over to these larger quarters, I understand.

Our debt to the Oxford Group is simply immense. We might have found these principles elsewhere, but they did give them to us, and I want to again record our undying gratitude. We also learned from them, so far as alcoholics are concerned, what not to do -- something equally important.

Father Ed Dowling, a great Jesuit friend of ours, once said to me, "Bill, it isn't what you people put into AA that makes it so good -- it's what you left out."

We got both sets of notions from our Oxford Group friends, and it was through them that Ebby had sobered up and became my sponsor, the carrier of this message to me.

We began to go to Oxford Group meetings right over in Calvary House, where you've just been gathering, and it was there, fresh out of Towns Hospital, that I made my first pitch, telling about my strange experience, which did not impress the alcoholic who was listening. But something else did impress him. When I began to talk about the nature of this sickness, this malady, he pricked up his ears. He was a professor of chemistry, an agnostic, and he came up and talked afterward. Soon, he was invited over to Clinton Street - our very first customer.

We worked very hard with Freddy for three years, but alas, he remained drunk for eleven years afterward.

Other people came to us out of those Oxford Group audiences. We began to go down to Calvary Mission, an adjunct of the church in those days, and there we found a bountiful supply of real tough nuts to crack. We began to invite them to Clinton Street, and at this point the Groupers felt that we were overdoing the drunk business. It seemed they had the idea of saving the world; besides, they'd had a bad time with us. Sam and his associates he now laughingly tells me, were very much put out that they had gathered a big batch of drunks in Calvary House, hoping for a miracle. They'd put them upstairs in those nice apartments and had completely surrounded them with sweetness and light. But the drunks soon imported a flock of bottles, and one of them pitched a shoe out the apartment window right through one of those stained glass affairs of the church. So the drunks weren't exactly popular when the Wilson's showed up.

At any rate we began to be with alcoholics all the time, but nothing happened for six months. Like the Groupers, we nursed them. In fact, over in Clinton Street, we developed in the next two or three years something like a boiler factory, a sort of clinic, a hospital, and a free boardinghouse, from which practically no one issued sober, but we had a pile of experience.

We began to learn the game, and after our withdrawing from the Oxford Group-- oh, a year and a half from the time I sobered, in '34 -- we began to hold meetings of the few who had sobered up. I suppose that was really the first AA meeting. The book hadn't yet been written. We didn't even call it Alcoholics Anonymous; people asked us who we were, and we said, "Well, we're a nameless bunch of alcoholics." I suppose the use of that word "nameless" sort of led us to the idea of anonymity, which was later clapped on the book at the time it was titled.

There were great doings in Clinton Street. I remember those meetings down in the parlor so well. Our eager discussion, our hopes, our fears -- and our fears were very great. When anyone in those days had been sober a few months and slipped, it was a terrific calamity. I'll never forget the day, a year and a half after he came to stay with us, that Ebby fell over, and we all said, "Perhaps this is going to happen to all of us." Then, we began to ask ourselves why it was, and some of us pushed on.

At Clinton Street, I did most of the talking, but Lois did most of the work, and the cooking, and the loving of those early folks. Oh my! The episodes that there were! I was away once on a business trip. (I'd briefly got back to business.) One of the drunks was sleeping on the lounge in the parlor. Lois woke up in the middle of the night, hearing a great commotion. He'd got a bottle; he'd also got into the kitchen and had drunk a bottle of maple syrup. And he had fallen naked into the coal hod. When Lois opened the door, he asked for a towel to cover up his nakedness. She once led this same gentleman through the streets late at night looking for a doctor, and not finding a doctor, then looking for a drink, because, as he said, he could not fly on one wing! On one occasion, a pair of them were drunk. We had five, and on another occasion, they were all drunk at the same time!

There was the time that two of them began to belabor each other with two-by-fours down in the basement. And then, poor Ebby, after repeated trials and failures, was finally locked out one night. But low and behold, he appeared anyway. He had come through the coal chute and up the stairs, very much begrimed.

So you see, Clinton Street was a kind of blacksmith shop, in which we were hammering away at these principles. For Lois and me, all roads lead back to Clinton Street.

In 1937, while we were still there, we got an idea that to spread AA we would have to have some sort of literature, guide rails for it to run on so it couldn't get garbled. We were still toying with the idea that we had to have paid workers who would be sent to other communities. We thought we'd have to go into the hospital business. Out in Akron, where we had started the first group, they had a meeting and nominated me to come to New York and do all these things. We solicited Mr. [John D.] Rockefeller [Jr.] and some of his friends, who gave us their friendship but, luckily, not much of their money. They gave Smithy [Dr. Bob] and me a little boost during the year of 1938, and that was all; they forced us to stand on our own.

In 1938, Clinton Street saw the beginning of the preparation of the book Alcoholics Anonymous. The early chapters were written -- oh, I should think -- about May 1938. Then, we tried to raise money to get the thing published, and we actually sold stock to the local drunks in this book, not yet written. An all-time high for promotions!

Clinton Street also saw, on its second floor, in the bedroom, the writing of the Twelve Steps. We had got to Chapter Five in the book, and it looked like we would have to say at some point what the book was all about. So I remember lying there on the bed one night, and I was in one of my typical depressive snits, and I had an imaginary ulcer attack. The drunks who were supposed to be contributing, so that we could eat while the book was being written, were slow on the contributions, and I was in a damn bad frame of mind.

I lay there with a pad and pencil, and I began to think over these six steps that I've just recited to you, and said I to myself, "Well, if we put down these six steps, the chunks are too big. They'll have to digest too much all at once. Besides, they can wiggle out from in between, and if we're going to do a book, we ought to break those up into smaller pieces."

So I began to write, and in about a half an hour, I think, I had busted them up into smaller pieces. I was rather pleasantly surprised that, when numbered, they added up to twelve -- that's significant. Very nice. At that point, a couple of drunks sailed in. I showed them the proposed Twelve Steps, and I caught fits. Why did we need them when six were doing fine? And what did I mean by dragging God from the bottom of the list up to the top?

Meanwhile the meetings in the front parlor had largely turned into hassles over the chapters of the book. The roughs were submitted and read at every meeting, so that when the Twelve Steps were proposed, there was a still greater hassle.

Because I'd had this very sudden experience and was on the pious side, I'd lauded these Steps very heavily with the word "God." Other people began to say, "This won't do at all. The reader at a distance is just going to get scared off. And what about agnostic folks like us?" There was another terrific hassle, which resulted in this terrific ten-strike we had: calling God (as you understand Him) "the Higher Power," making a hoop big enough so that the whole world of alcoholics can walk through it.

So, actually, those people who suppose that the elders of AA were going around in white robes surrounded by a blue light, full of virtue, are quite mistaken. I merely became the umpire of the immense amount of hassling that went into the preparation of the AA book, and that took place at Clinton Street.

Well, of course, the book was the summit of all our hopes at the time; along with the hassling, there was an immense enthusiasm. We tried to envision distant readers picking it up and perhaps writing in, perhaps getting sober. Could they do it on the book?

All of those things we speculated on very happily. Finally, in the spring of 1939, the book was ready. We'd made a prepublication copy of it; it had got by the Catholic Committee on Publications; we'd shown it to all sorts of people; we had made corrections. We had 5,000 copies printed, thinking that would be just a mere trifle -- that the book would soon be selling millions of copies.

Oh, we were very enthusiastic, us promoters. The Reader's Digest had promised to print a piece about the book, and we just saw those books going out in carloads.

Nothing of the sort happened. The Digest turned us down flat; the drunks had thrown their money into all this; there were hardly a hundred members in AA. And here the thing had utterly collapsed.

At this juncture, the meeting -- the first meeting of the Manhattan Group, which really took place in Brooklyn -- stopped, and it stopped for a very good reason.

That was that the landlord set Lois and me out into the street, and we didn't even have money to move our stuff into storage. Even that and the moving van -- that was done on the cuff.

Well, it was then the spring of 1939. Temporarily, the Manhattan Group moved to Jersey. It hadn't got to Manhattan yet. A great friend, Horace C., let Lois and me have a camp belonging to himself and his mother, out at Green Pond. My partner in the book enterprise, old Hank P., now gone, lived at Upper Montclair.

We used to come down to 75 William Street, where we had the little office in which a good deal of the book was actually done. Sundays that summer, we'd come down to Hank's house, where we had meetings which old-timers -- just a handful now in Jersey -- can remember.

The Alcoholic Foundation, still completely empty of money, did have one small account called the "Lois B. Wilson Improvement Fund." This improvement fund was fortified every month by a passing of the hat, so that we had the summer camp, we had fifty bucks a month, and someone else lent us a car to try to revive the book Alcoholics Anonymous and the flagging movement.

In the fall of that year, when it got cold up there at the summer camp, we moved down to Bob V.'s. Many of you remember him and Mag. We were close by the Rockland asylum. Bob and I and others went in there, and we started the first institutional group, and several wonderful characters were pried out of there.

I hope old Tom M. is here tonight -- Tom came over to the V's, where he had holed up with Lois and me, then put in a room called Siberia, because it was so cold. We bought a coal stove for four dollars and kept ourselves warm there during the winter.

So did a wonderful alcoholic by the name of Jimmy. He never made good. Jimmy was one of the devious types, and one of our first remarkable experiences with Jimmy was this. When we moved from Green Pond, we brought Marty with us, who had been visiting, and she suddenly developed terrible pains in her stomach.

This gentleman, Jimmy, called himself a doctor. In fact, he had persuaded the authorities at Rockland that he was a wonderful physician. They gave him full access to the place. He had keys to all the surgical instruments and incidentally, I think he had keys to all the pill closets over there.

Marty was suffering awful agonies, and he said, "Well, there's nothing to it, my dear. You've got gallstones." So he goes over to Rockland. He gets himself some kind of fishing gadget that they put down gullets to fish around in there, and he fishes around and yanks up a flock of gallstones, and she hasn't had a bit of trouble since. And, dear people, it was only years later that we learned the guy wasn't a doctor at all.

Meanwhile, the Manhattan Group moved to Manhattan for the first time. The folks over here started a meeting in Bert T.'s tailor shop. Good old Bert is the guy who hocked his then-failing business to save the book Alcoholics Anonymous in 1939.

In the fall, he still had the shop, and we began to hold meetings there. Little by little, things began to grow. We went from there to a room in Steinway Hall, and we felt we were in very classic and good company that gave us an aura of respectability.

Finally, some of the boys -- notably Bert and Horace -- said, "A.A. should have a home. We really ought to have a club." And so the old 24th Street Club, which had belonged to the artists and illustrators and before that was a barn going back to Revolutionary times, was taken over. I think Bert and Horace signed the first lease.

They soon incorporated it, though, lest somebody slip on a banana peel outside. Lois and I, who had moved from the V's to live with another A.A., then decided we wanted a home for ourselves, and we found a single room down in a basement on Barrow Street in Greenwich Village.

I remember Lois and me going through Grand Central wondering where we'd light next, just before the Greenwich Village move. We were very tired that day, and we walked off the main floor there and sat on one of those gorgeous marble stairways leading up to the balcony, and we both began to cry and say, "Where will we ever light? Will we ever have a home?"

Well, we had one for a while in Barrow Street. And when the club was opened up, we moved into one of those rooms there. Tom M. came over from the V's, and right then and there a Tradition of Alcoholics Anonymous was generated. It seemed that volunteers had been sweeping the club; it seemed that many of the alcoholics had keys to the club; and they came and went and sometimes stayed; and sometimes they got very drunk and acted very badly -- doing we know not what. There had to be somebody there to really look after the place. So we thought we'd approach old Tom, who had a pension as a fireman. We said, "Tom, how would you like to come and live at the club?"

Tom says, "What's on your mind?"

"Well," we said, "we really need somebody here all the time, you know, to make the coffee and see that the place is heated and throw some coal on that furnace over there and lead the drunks outside if they're too bad."

"Ain't ya gonna pay me?" Tom says.

"Oh, no," we said. "This is Alcoholics Anonymous. We can't have any professionals."

Tom says, "I do my Twelfth Step work, I don't charge 'em nothing. But what you guys want is a janitor, and if you're going to get me, you're going to pay, see?"

Well, we were very much disturbed about our own situation. We weren't exactly paid -- they were just passing the hat for us, you understand. I think that we went for seven years of the history of this Society with an average income of seventeen hundred bucks a year, which, for a former stockbroker, is not too big.

So this question of who is a professional and who isn't bore very heavily at the time on Tom and me. And Tom began to get it settled. He began to show that if a special service was asked from anybody full-time, we'd have to pay or not get it.

So, finally, we haggled Tom down on the theory that he already had a pension, and he came to live there, and meetings began in that old club.

That old club saw many a terrific development, and from that club sprang all the groups in this area. The club saw the passage of the Rockefeller dinner, when we thought we'd all be rich as a movement, and Mr. Rockefeller saved us by not giving us money.

That club saw the Saturday Evening Post article published. In fact, the Post at that time said, "No pictures, no article." If you will look up the March 1, 1941, issue of the Saturday Post, you will see a picture of the interior of the club, and a flock of us sitting before the fire. They didn't use our names, but they insisted on pictures.

Anonymity wasn't then quite what it is today. And with the advent of that piece, there was a prodigious rush of inquiries -- about 6,000 of them.

By this time, we'd moved the little office from Newark, New Jersey, over to Vesey Street. You will find in the old edition of the book [Alcoholics Anonymous] "Box 58, Church Street Annex." And that was the box into which the first inquiries came. We picked out that location because Lois and I were drifters, and we picked it because it was the center of the geographical area here. We didn't know whether we'd light in Long Island, New Jersey, or Westchester, so the first A.A. post office box was down there with a little office alongside of it.

The volunteers couldn't cope with this tremendous flock of inquiries -- heartbreakers, but 6,000 of them! We simply had to hire some help. At that point, we asked you people if you'd send the foundation a buck apiece a year, so we wouldn't have to throw that stuff in the wastebasket. And that was the beginning of the service office and the book company.

That club saw all those things transpire. But there was a beginning in that club at that time that none of us noticed very much. It was just a germ of an idea. It often looked, in after years, as though it might die out. Yet within the last three years, it has become what I think is one of the greatest developments that we shall ever know, and here I'm going to break into my little tale to introduce my partner in all this, who stayed with me when things were bad and when things have been good, and she'll tell you what began upstairs in that club, and what has eventuated from it. Lois."

(Lois then spoke about the formation and the early days of Al-Anon Family Groups.)

So, you see, it was in the confines of the Manhattan Group of those very, very early days that this germ of an idea came to life. Lois might have added that since the St. Louis conference, one new family group has started every single day of the week since, someplace in the world.

I think the deeper meaning of all this is that AA is something more than a quest for sobriety, because we cannot have sobriety unless we solve the problem of life, which is essentially the problem of living and working together. And the family groups are straightening out the enormous twist that has been put on our domestic relations by our drinking. I think it's one of the greatest things that's happened in years.

Well, let's cut back to old 24th Street. One more thing happened there:

Another Tradition was generated. It had to do with money. You know how slow I was on coming up with that dollar bill tonight? I suppose I was thinking back -- some sort of unconscious reflex.

We had a deuce of a time getting that club supported, just passing the hat, no fees, no dues, just the way it should be. But the no fee and dues business was construed into no money at all -- let George do it.

I'd been, on this particular day, down to the foundation office, and we'd just put out this dollar-a-year measuring stick for the alcoholics to send us some money if they felt like it. Not too many were feeling like it, and I remember that I was walking up and down the office damning these drunks.

That evening, still feeling sore about the stinginess of the drunks, I sat on the stairs at the old 24th Street Club, talking to some would-be convert. Tom B. was leading the meeting that night, and at the intermission he put on a real plug for money, the first one that I'd ever heard. At that time, money and spirituality couldn't mix, even in the hat. I mean, you mustn't talk about money! Very reluctantly, we'd gone into the subject with Tom M. and the landlord. We were behind in the rent.

Well, Tom put on that heavy pitch, and I went on talking to my prospect, and as the hat came along, I fished in my pocket and pulled out half a buck.

That very day, I think, Ebby had come in the office a little the worse for wear, and with a very big heart, I had handed him five dollars. Our total income at that time was thirty bucks a week, which had come out of the Rockefeller dinner affair; so I'd given him five bucks of the thirty and felt very generous, you see.

But now comes the hat to pay for the light and heat and so forth -- rent -- and I pull out this half dollar and I look absent-mindedly at it, and I put my hand in the other pocket and pull out a dime and put it in the hat.

So I have never once railed at alcoholics for not getting up the money. There, you see, was the beginning of two A.A. Traditions -- things that had to do with professionalism and money.

Following 1941, this thing just mushroomed. Groups began to break off out into the suburbs. But a lot of us still wanted a club, and the 24th Street Club just couldn't do the trick. We got an offer from Norman Vincent Peale to take over a church at 41st Street. The church was in a neighborhood that had deteriorated badly -- over around Ninth Avenue and 41st. In fact, it was said to be a rather sinful neighborhood, if you gather what I mean. The last young preacher that Peale had sent there seemed very much against drinking and smoking and other even more popular forms of sin; therefore, he had no parishioners.

Here was this tremendous church, and all that we could see was a bigger and bigger club in New York City. So we moved in. The body of the church would hold 1,000 people, and we had a hall upstairs that would hold another 800, and we visioned this as soon full. Then there were bowling alleys downstairs, and we figured the drunks would soon be getting a lot of exercise. After they warmed up down there, they could go upstairs in the gymnasium.

Then, we had cooking apparatus for a restaurant. This was to be our home, and we moved in. Well, sure enough, the place filled up just like mad! Then, questions of administration, questions of morals, questions of meetings, questions of which was the Manhattan Group and which was the club and which was the Intergroup (the secretary of the club was also the Intergroup

"You don't know. I've gone through a thousand hells tonight."

The suicide of this woman was the most spectacular of several similar incidents in the San Francisco Bay area in which persons confined for the night to various drunk tanks, as they are called, ended their lives in fits of alcoholic depression.

News of the woman's death stirred San Francisco, and at long last caused to burst into flame a plan for a revolutionary treatment of alcoholics - a plan that had been smoldering for several months.

And as this is written, San Francisco, the city with the unhappy distinction of having the highest percentage of arrests for drunkenness of any large municipality in the nation, is well on the road toward the establishment of a unique clinic to help those whose proximity to the bottle has deprived them of the power to help themselves. The label; of "alcoholic" will be intentionally omitted from the clinic. It will be known simply as the Adult Guidance Center.

The plan involves more than the mere elimination of the drunk tank. There will be provided everything from psychiatry and vitamins, to lessons in what an alcoholic should eat to calm his stomach nerves, and how he can get past the swinging doors, provided, of course, he wants help and has not extended his drinking career to the point to no return. If he is not readily salvageable, he will be sent either to a state hospital, where he can do a minimum of harm and may still recover; or to a custodial farm, where he will be safe from crime and accident.

As part of this modernized procedure, the alcoholic will be able to receive treatment at cost and with the protection of anonymity. The plan is no bluenosed formula for reducing drinking, but a healthy arrangement for helping the person who wants to stop and can't. A city as robust as San Francisco would accept nothing less. Its residents always like to boast that San Francisco is the "city that knows how," and under this program it is being geared to do more to solve the problem of alcoholism than any of its sister municipalities.

The man behind this crusade is the city's district attorney, Edmund G. Brown, a 43-year-old prosecutor and family man who always appears to be on his way to or from a gymnasium locker room and has a habit of jumping out of bed at 6 A.M. and exclaiming, "Boy! I feel great!" The description suggests an overexuberant bore who rattles the ribs of less hardy souls by slapping them on the back and damaging their eardrums with sonorous greetings. Such is not the case. Brown's vitality springs from a hardy constitution.

"Pat" Brown, as he is popularly known, can take a drink or leave it alone. Actually, two circumstances, neither connected with the idea of reform for reform's sake, started him on the road at the end of which San Francisco's Adult Guidance Center will rise. The first involves a two-block route which Brown must follow daily from his office to the Hall of Justice.

The district attorney's offices are in a building in a less expensive block of San Francisco's financial center, Montgomery Street. One block over and one block up, on Kearny Street, is the Hall. In between, the neighborhood degenerates rapidly into a series of taverns and tenements outside of which drunks sprawl despite the nearness of the drunk tank and the law.

The other circumstance was a more personal one. Liquor got the better of a capable lawyer on whom Brown depended for legal assistance. Another of Brown's friends, also a professional man, teetered on the edge of ruin because he couldn't stop drinking. Two others, one a newspaperman, were in the same predicament.

Brown, of necessity, had to walk around the drunks who lay in his path as he went from his office to the Hall. With his friends, he tried tactful advice. When that failed, he decided something had to be done, both for the street drunk and for the alcoholic who is coming apart in a less public but equally fatal manner.

He began by persuading a friend, Emmet Daly, a former F.B.I. agent and recently released Naval Intelligence officer, to become a special assistant to the district attorney, with the job of finding out how drunk San Franciscans get, how they are treated, and what should be done about it. Daly, in his oldest suit, headed for Skid Row, a stretch of several bottle-clustered blocks south of San Francisco's broad Market Street.

Even the most cloistered clubman on plushy Nob Hill is vaguely familiar with what happens to the men on the wrong side of the Market Street trolley tracks when they panhandle 30 cents for a pint of wine and proceed to gulp it down, But a district attorney needs more than a notion to win a case. Daly went out after the equivalent of the corpus delicti.

He had no trouble finding drunks in Skid Row. They were sprawled in doorways and some lay in the gutters. He stood near one who had collapsed in a doorway and waited until the paddy wagon arrived to haul the man to the precinct station. He followed to see what would happen. He learned that the custom is to lock up drunks at the station house until another wagon arrives from downtown to take them to the drunk tank.

If the drunk can pull himself together in the interval between his arrival and that of the wagon from headquarters, he goes free. Otherwise he faces a night in the tank. At times there have been alternate results, as happened one night when two drunks, collected at separate places, were lodged in a single station-house cell. The jailer observed they were too stupefied to engage in the jail-house chatter. He expected no trouble. But later, one of the two made a noose out of his shirt and hung himself while the other stared glassily at the proceeding.

But the drunk whom Daly followed to the station had no suicidal intentions. Neither could he pull himself together. The wagon from the Hall arrived and the drunk tank automatically became his destination.

The tank is not a single enclosure, as its name suggests. It consists of a block of 14 cells, each six by seven feet. Frequently seven or eight men are put into a single cell, for the average drunk catch a night is more than 100. There are no cots for the reason that a drunk might roll off and fracture his skull on the hard floor. The men flop on mats, some of them sitting up against the walls of the cell, their legs overlapping their neighbor's in a spectacle of Dickensian bleakness.

The morning after Daly had watched his particular drunk from the Row placed in a cell in the tank, he went to court to see what would happen next.

"The drunk tank was bad enough, but what I saw in court the next morning was even worse," he remembered. "I took one look at what was going on and called the district attorney, telling him to come over and see for himself."

Tank occupants are herded into a corner of the courtroom and their cases disposed of ahead of the day's regular calendar. The clerk of the court rattles off half a dozen names, and their owners shuffle inside the railing and stand before the bench. There is a low-voiced mumbo-jumbo during which pleas of guilty are entered and the panel is dismissed with a brief admonition not to return. The second panel is called, and so on until the last drunk has been disposed of.

"Drunks are not fingerprinted," said Daly, "so there is no way to keep track of how often they come back. After talking to several hundred of them, I'm satisfied nine-tenths of those sent to the drunk tank are repeaters. The average drunk can be in and out of court two or three times a week and still nothing is done for or against him."

But it was the handling of the drunks in panels instead of singly that so disturbed Daly that he sent for Brown. Because of subsequent publicity, this feature of the system has been eliminated, but the revolving-door nature of the process-arrested today, dismissed tomorrow, back next day-persists.

After their morning in court, Daly and Brown decided to follow one of those who had been freed, to see what he did. They selected a man about 60 who bore unmistakable evidence of having been in a scuffle before he reached the tank the night before. After walking several blocks, the man sagged and fell into the gutter. Brown called an ambulance

"Of course, the point of all this is that nothing is being done about the alcoholic, and we are still spending $500,000 a year in police man-hours alone, with no return," said Brown. "The number of alcoholics in the streets has increased to the point where they can" be ignored, even though there might be those who would attempt it.

"Here is all this money being wasted on a worthless system when for half the amount, say $250,000, we can operate a first-class clinic for a year. And the $500,000 a year in police man-hours now being spent for handling alcoholics obviously doesn't include the cost of crime or family poverty stemming from our present arrangement for getting the drunks off the streets."

On a national basis, the latest figures on arrests for drunkenness cover the year 1947. San Francisco led with 6,230 arrests per 100,000 population. Thirteen of the larger cities were included in the count. There is scant local pride in the fact that Los Angeles is second, with 5,103 arrests per 100,000. The others, in order of descendancy, are Washington, D.C., New Orleans, Boston, Minneapolis, Cleveland, Milwaukee, Philadelphia, Detroit, Buffalo, Baltimore, and New York.

With the full picture before them, Brown and Daly began a furious search for the right pieces to put together to make a plan to correct the situation. They interviewed doctors and psychiatrists from the neighborhood to the state level. Members of the clergy were called on and asked for suggestions. The leaders of Alcoholics Anonymous were sought out for their views. Business men who take an occasional drink and drunks who hit the bottle all the time, police who are plagued with alcoholics and want to be rid of them, teachers who find an increasing number of their older students red-eyed at morning roll call, everyone who had any reasonable notion about what to do about the alcoholic was given a chance to speak his piece.

Daly, entering the lobby of his club on day, was accosted by a member. "So, you're becoming a prohibitionist," he said. "A fine thing!" Daly, who expected that sort of reaction when he took over the job with Brown, replied, "Let's go get a drink and talk it over." Daly convinced the man the surest way to prevent the return of prohibition is to solve the problem of the chronic alcoholic, and another San Franciscan was jogged out of his lethargy and prejudice. He told his friends and a chain reaction began. Brown and Daly kept it going with speaking engagements before clubs of housewives and industrial leaders and educators and city planners.

While all of this was in progress, Daly was sending letters to every city in the country which had made any attempt to treat the alcoholic as a medical problem. The replies to the letters and data gathered at the interviews were distilled into a procedure for an alcoholic clinic.

Under the San Francisco plan the alcoholic who is arrested will not be classified as a misdemeanor offender. The California legislature is making such a change in the law. The drunk will be held for quarantine. He will be in the same relative position as a person roaming the streets with a communicable disease, a hazard to himself and to others. The purpose of this change in classification is to give legal recognition to the theory that a drunk is a sick person, not a lawbreaker.

"No person will be given employment at the clinic, from the psychiatrists to the elevator operators, who does not first give proof that he believes a drunk is a sick person and not a moral leper," said Brown. "This proposition is the cornerstone of the whole plan.

When a drunk is arrested, he will be taken directly to the clinic. Once there, he will be fingerprinted so that a record of his case may be kept. The clinic will have no cells or bars, but wards. The fact that the drunk is in custody will not be emphasized. After he has been logged in, he will be given whatever immediate medical attention is necessary. If he is lucid, the doctors will talk to him. If not, that part of the procedure will come later.

Within twenty-four hours a preliminary appraisal of his case will have been made. If he is a one-night drunk, he will be shooed out, but advised to return for consultations and help if liquor is becoming a problem. If he has been on a two-week binge and hasn't eaten much, he will be given five days in bed and fed a diet high in vitamins.

The one-nighter who is released in the morning, or the man who is hospitalized for five days, will have his fate determined by a judge who will sit at the center-not on a bench, but at a conference table. The patient and the doctors will be the witnesses. The judge will be guided by what they have to say.

The clinic will concentrate on those who accept help and are salvageable. During the five-day period of hospitalization there will be simple lessons in dietetics: The course will be elementary. A drunk, the experts emphasize, is a man trying to learn to walk again after having been bedridden for a long time. In the case of the alcoholic, it is his thinking processes which have to be retaught.

In between lessons and baths and wholesome meals, the psychiatrists will attempt to sell the patient on the idea it is not only possible but very pleasant to live without drinking, if a man is an alcoholic. They will tell him very emphatically that an alcoholic cannot drink so much as a jigger; that it isn't the last drink that is important but the first one.

"I may be an optimist, but I'm satisfied a lot of cases that now look hopeless will make some progress when the problem is put to them as a medical one," say Pat Brown. "Alcoholics Anonymous has proven that. Of course, Alcoholics Anonymous doesn't pretend to help everyone. For those

Roy Sutherland and Ted Thieda, plain-clothes cops on the skid-row detail of the First Precinct Detroit police, are known to vagrants throughout the Midwest as "The Ragpickers." Their job is to keep depravity in their precinct from becoming too assertively public. A tour of duty with them adds color to a national embarrassment city council calls "The Skid-Row Problem."

Sutherland is a short roly-poly man in his fifties, with a shock of curly white hair, a full, ruddy face and amiable blue eyes behind steel-rimmed spectacles. He wears a brown business suit on the job and is always chewing an unlit cigar. Thieda, a tall, muscular man in his forties, is the athlete of the pair. They work from a worn, unmarked city car. Sutherland, as senior, does most of the talking.

"There's one." We were hardly five minutes out of headquarters, cruising Michigan Avenue. We pulled over to the curb and parked. A man was prone in an alley. Sutherland and I went over to him. Thieda went to have a look up the street.

The unconscious man was around fifty, with sandy brown hair, a blotchy red skin and a beard of many days. His face was streaked with clotted blood from a gash on his forehead. An unlabeled pint bottle containing a pinkish fluid lay at his side. He wore work shoes without socks, soiled khaki trousers and a soot-blackened shirt. A blended stench of bodily excretions rose from him.

"Well," Sutherland said, "darn if it isn't Danny. I'll tell you later about Danny. Come on, fella." He pointed to the man's hands. "See the pink stains between the fingers? Canned heat."

Thieda returned. "Three more around the corner. Call the wagon?"

Sutherland nodded, and told me what he knew about Danny. Since June 17, 1828, Danny had been arrested for drunkenness and vagrancy 128 times. He'd spent 4020 days in the Detroit House of Correction. In arrests, court appearances, jail keep, medical and hospital care he had cost the community $18,500. "You see what I mean?" Sutherland said. "How discouraging?"

In a few minutes the wagon came. Two uniformed policemen from the wagon roused the four men, loaded them and drove off - for Danny, it was the 129th time. We resumed our tour.

"Funny thing," Sutherland said. "I've been on this job twelve years, without anybody paying much attention. And now just lately there's been an awful lot of interest."

That "awful lot of interest" goes for many other cities. By sheer pressure of horror, civic embarrassment and community expense, skid row has pushed itself to the forefront among our major municipal problems. In the past three years, mayor's skid-row committees have been formed in New York, Chicago, Detroit and half a dozen smaller cities. Under the label "homeless man," the human derelict is now receiving scholarly attention, to find out what made him homeless, and what can be done.

By the best estimates I can come up with, at least 400,000 men are leading a skid-row life. They cost taxpayers at least $40,000,000 a year. If all were working, their tax contributions would be at least $165,000,000, a year, so the economic stakes are large. The humanitarian stakes are larger. There are things a citizen cannot allow to pass without protest and still retain his self-respect. These things occur daily along skid-row. My tour with the Detroit plain-clothes men revealed the kind of slum-within-slums that shakes the claim to civilization of even the most civilized American cities.

It also revealed that men can come back from skid-row. Eddie Rohan, a pleasant-faced fifty-four-year-old Irish-American who lives in Detroit, is a case in point. Statistically speaking, Eddie has returned from the dead. For a quarter century he lived either on the Avenue or in the Detroit House of Correction, a guest of the city because of drunkenness. The normal end of the likes of Eddie used to be either the Wayne County Hospital-for the insane-or the Wayne County Morgue. He is one of the 250 exhibits cited to prove the Motor City's contention that skid row can be abolished.

This view is not universally held, and a session at a big-city magistrate's bench helps explain why. I recently followed a batch of a dozen derelicts from their pass-out points, through the city jail, to the courtroom and sentence. Lined up in an unsteady row at the bar of justice, they highlighted the whole tragedy of skid row. Even the judge was moved. He shook his head. "Why do they do it?"

The Promise of Detroit's Program

The judge had cards on each man, listing previous terms served on the same charge, drunkenness. Twenty-five to fifty terms were not unusual; none had fewer than eight. He ruled, "Thirty days for all." Many, he knew, would be passed out in some filthy alley within a few days after serving their terms. That's why so many experienced public officials say, "Skid row is hopeless."

Others are not so sure, and on economic grounds alone, their cases deserve a hearing. It costs about $1000 a year to keep a man in jail. Detroit's Mayor's Rehabilitation Committee costs $25,000 a year. By spending a third of their time in jail, the 250 men so far salvaged would have cost Detroit $83,000. Their taxes return to the public coffers $100,000 a year, putting the community $158,000 ahead on the twelve-month. Minneapolis, New York and Alameda County, California, are among the metropolitan areas where tax-supported rehabilitation programs are being tried. Detroit, in this reporter's view, is especially sparkling with new slants on a scandal many generations old.

The most noxious of several skid-row areas in the Michigan metropolis is a nineteen block section bounded by Cass, Howard, Fifth and Jones streets. For five roaring blocks this municipal cancer lies athwart Michigan Avenue, the main stem from the Michigan Central Railroad Terminal to the glittering downtown hotel district. Skid row spills over for several blocks on each side of this main stem. The adjacent areas are vacant lots, junk yards, tenements, warehouses, abandoned factories and dwellings and the close-packed, unpainted little houses of the very poor. This single neighborhood, the beat of Sutherland and Thieda, produces 10,000 arrests a year for drunkenness and associated offenses.

A day on skid row begins at seven A.A., when the bars open. From six o'clock on, men are stirring in the flophouses and alleys, crawling from under newspapers or lean-tos in vacant lots and dumps, emerging from abandoned basements and from beneath parked trailer trucks, to be on the Avenue at the stroke. Once there, what happens depends upon a man's economic status.

The man at the top of the social ladder sleeps in a flophouse and drinks in a bar. Just below him in prestige is the man who sleeps in a mission and drinks out of a bottle purchased at a package-liquor store. Next in order are the men who sleep in dark places and drink nonbeverage alcohol. Bay rum, several brands of hair tonic and shaving lotion, vanilla and lemon extracts, isopropyl rubbing alcohol - nineteen cents a half pint - lacquer thinner and canned heat are widely consumed. Canned heat is a solution of pink wax in alcohol. The alcohol may be partially reclaimed by placing the waxy paste in a cloth and squeezing - hence the telltale pink stains between the fingers of those who favor the "Pink Lady," the drink which results from mixing this with an equal part of water.

Promptly at seven o'clock each morning the elite begin going into the bars. The rest remain outside, hoping for a flush crony who'll invite a man in for a drink, or the owner of a bottle, possibly in his debt from yesterday, who'll give him a pull. Failing this, a man will turn to his neighbor and say, "I have seven cents." The proper reply is "I have eleven," or whatever the amount may be. The chain continues until a sum is reached which equals the price of one of the fluids previously mentioned. With the drink aboard, a man is ready for his day's panhandling.

"If all panhandling could be stopped," says William C. Sterling, director of the Mayor's Rehabilitation Committee in Detroit, "the worst aspects of skid row would disappear. Its foulest horrors are maintained by the thoughtlessly given nickles, dimes and quarters of well-intentioned citizens."

Mid-afternoon usually finds the pan-handler back on the Avenue with cash in his pocket. By this time the revelry in the bars is in full swing. The elite are all at the tables, stupefied or asleep. Now and then, one will rouse himself, wait till his glass is filled, drain it and go to sleep again.

Others are drinking at the bar, playing the juke box, talking.

The conversation has to do mostly with the character and deeds of this or that jerk of recent or remote memory - resentments on skid row are deep and abiding. Occasionally the theme changes. Once I overheard a panel discussion on the topic, "If a man was born in 1876, how old is he now?" Estimates ranged from fifty-nine to eighty-six, with each disputant defending his own arithmetic. If the juke box is playing, somebody will get up from time to time and make random flapping motions, smiling a nearly toothless smile - falls take a widespread toll of front teeth. The performer is dancing, cutting the rug. He doesn't last long; he has little energy. Even the fights of skid row are mostly slapstick affairs of short duration; neither contestant has the strength for a really damaging blow.

So the day wears on, drink and talk, wake and doze, until a man reaches his objective - oblivion. This has to be timed so he makes his flop before passing out - to pass out on the street is to risk being run in. Skid row starts going to bed at dusk. All through the early evening you see men making their uncertain way back to the flophouses, the abandoned shacks, the vacant lots. The shabby figures fade into the weeds and disappear. In a 100-by-100-foot lot near the Avenue there may be thirty men asleep, none of them visible to the passer-by. In one place, long sections of forty-eight-inch-diameter concrete sewer pipe were left at the curb for a construction project. At ten o'clock one night I found one or two sleeping men in each section of pipe. By midnight it's another day.

Money on skid row is for liquor; other things can be had without payment or be gone without. How a man obtains his drinking money depends upon how advanced he is in the mores of the Avenue. If he's relatively a beginner, he hits the streets around Labor Day, after a summer with a railroad construction gang or with the fruit pickers, his pay in his pocket. He invests part of it in new finery, part in advance rent at a flophouse, and part with a bartender, against future needs. For weeks or months he fraternizes on the street and in the bars. The day arrives when his cash is gone and his deposits used up. His new suit, hat and shoes are exchanged for "relievers" - shirt, dungarees and sneakers. He begins patronizing the package liquor stores, where a brand of wine can be had for forty-nine cents a fifth. As money grows tighter, he'll resort to more economical beverages, through the lotions down to rubbing alcohol and canned heat.

Food and shelter can be obtained for a while without cost. There are several missions where a man can get a meal without answering questions, being preached at, singing hymns or working. At other places he can have board, work and indefinite keep if he'll "take a nose dive" - profess a religious conviction. This, by skid row standards, is contemptible, and only a small percentage ever do it.

Sooner or later, our man must decide whether to work or beg for his drinking money. If he works, as many do before the skid-row neurosis lays too firm a hold, he hedges his employment about with qualifications. Employment must be on a day or half-day basis and must yield a dollar an hour, which must be paid promptly and without deductions. Work teams of five men are often organized, with each man working one day a week and contributing his earnings to the common liquor kitty. Income is boosted by occasional sales of blood to private-hospital blood banks at eight dollars a pint. By this time our man is probably sleeping in the open, taking his meals at missions, supplemented by traditional skid-row cuisine.

At one point in our tour Sutherland asked me, "Did you ever hear of mulligan stew? They had one over there last night; let's take a look." In a vacant lot was a fire-blackened five gallon tin. To make mulligan, Sutherland explained, you start by bringing a tin of water to a boil. Then you add wilted vegetables thrown out by stores, old fish heads from the back of restaurants and chicken entrails from the dressed fowl market.

Aggressive crime by derelict men is negligible, Sutherland says. Too tired for crime, they're more preyed upon than preying. Once he pointed out a wiry, athletic young man in his twenties, dressed in a natty polo shirt, suede shoes and knife-edged slacks. "We're pretty sure that fellow's a jack roller, only we haven't got the goods on him - yet." A jack roller is a man who specializes in beating and robbing drunks.

Though women are seen in the bars in the proportion of about one to thirty, sex on skid row is pretty much a dead issue. "They just don't have the energy," Sutherland says.

Death on skid row is often sudden, and always ugly. "Had a bad one last winter," Sutherland said. "Five of them holed up one cold night in a junked trailer in an auto graveyard. Had a stew, let the fire go out for the night. Canned heat went up, I guess. Anyway, the trailer blazed like a torch; all five burned to death."

Casualties of skid row are taken to Detroit Receiving Hospital. There are "wine sores" - foul smelling skin eruptions brought on by prolonged deficiencies of diet. There are broken bones and hideous head and eye wounds - from falls and beatings by jack rollers. There are alcoholic convulsions and delirium tremens. These are taken to the psychopathic section and placed in the violent ward in restraint. There is total physical exhaustion, and there is death. Now and then, a derelict strays off and is lost. One old man was found in an abandoned basement, indescribably filthy, crawling with lice, and near death. He was bathed and put to bed; shortly thereafter he died.

The Wayne County Morgue is the end of the line. Corpses arriving there from the Avenue are nearly always John Doe or Mary Roe, unidentified. The afternoon I visited the morgue there was John Doe No.1, male, white, age 46, 5 feet, 8 inches, 180 pounds. Fell down the stairs of a Michigan Avenue flophouse and broke his skull. John Doe No.2, age 51, died of a broken neck "due to fall in alley." Mary Roe, female, white, 45, fell off the stool of an East Jefferson Street bar at 9:30 P.M. and died of a fractured skull.

Such is the rhythm of life and death on skid row, Detroit, and a hundred other cities. There are, in the crazy symphony of the Avenue, other rhythms. Not all are willfully destructive alcoholics, and not all are adverse to work. Old-age pensioners and handicapped persons sometime drift there because it's the only place where they can live on what they have. But the chronic alcoholic is the hard core of the problem. Such men load our city jails and hospitals, turn city streets into daytime nightmares. They misuse charity, exploit mercy, degrade and finally destroy themselves.

What's the matter with such men? Employment conditions do not explain their despair - steady jobs were going begging when I was in Detroit. And one can't brush away the problem by saying they're "just alcoholics." Mr. Yvelin Gardner, director of the National Committee on Alcoholism, says: "The problem of the typical alcoholic is quite distinct from that of the skid row derelict. The usual alcoholic has a home, job and family, and a desire to maintain his community status. The homeless alcoholic has little ambition and less hope; his rehabilitation presents an entirely different equation."

On skid row, the homeless man's distress produces profit. I have neither observed nor heard of any act of a derelict that compares in degradation with the act, committed daily by sober and "respectable" merchants, of deliberately selling sick, addled and helpless men chemicals that are poisoning them to slow death.

"Can our cities come up with a really effective answer to skid row?"

This is question Mayor Albert E. Cobo placed before a committee of Detroit citizens in 1949, when a series of articles in the Detroit Free Press exposed skid-row conditions. The committee reported in the affirmative and recommended specific steps. State laws governing the sale of liquor were to be enforced. A state rehabilitation camp was to be established for chronic alcoholics who failed to respond to therapy. A section of skid row was to be condemned, and rebuilt as an attractive municipal parking lot. A counseling and employment service, staffed by men possessing a sympathetic grasp of alcoholic problems, was to be set up in the heart of skid row.

So far, only the last of these proposals has materialized. The counseling service has for two years occupied an unlabeled store front at 339 W. Jefferson - and here I found the first gleam of real hope in many weeks among the men of skid row.

Nobody enters the committee's head-quarters unless he wants to. There's nothing to eat, no place to sleep, and nobody gets anything free except advice. Yet in the two years since it opened, 1670 men have sought it out. It has shown, on a pilot scale, that men can be returned in quantity from the half death of skid row.

After talking with some of the men who drop in at 339, the judge's question - "Why do they do it?" - doesn't seem to pose such a mystery. Indeed, it is claimed by Bill Sterling, director at 339, that you can't make any progress until you answer it - until you find out what's eating away at the heart of each individual man. Take the case of Eddie Rohan. It took weeks to find out what was really bothering Eddie. But once it was talked through and settled, Eddie straightened out, apparently for good. Eddie is nearly two years sober now, and doesn't mind yarning about his skid-row days. It explains a lot about Eddie and about skid row.

Eddie was born in a small Ohio city in 1898, the youngest of three sons of a stern father who worked in a brickyard. Life at home was not happy. "The old man always seemed to go out of his way to make it clear he didn't have no damn use for me." His brother took the father's cue. The oldest brother "beat up on" the next youngest, they both beat up on Eddie, and the father beat up on them all. The only solace was Eddie's mother, who favored him when she could. Her presence in the home made life endurable.

When Eddie was fourteen his mother died of pneumonia, and for a while Eddie didn't care whether he lived or not. The old man "got more cantankerous than ever; you just couldn't live with him." After two more years, none of the boys even tried. Jim, the oldest, finished high school and was staked to a law-school education by an uncle. Today he's a district judge in the old hometown. A year later, Art, the middle one, went to work in a steel plant in Youngstown. That left Eddie, by then a sophomore in high school, alone with his father. In 1914, when Eddie was sixteen, he joined the Army, with his father's permission.

For the first time in his short life Eddie was "something like happy." He joined a cavalry unit, got on well with the men, loved the animals and within a year was promoted to corporal. By late 1916 it was beginning to look as if America might become a belligerent in World War I. Eddie was filled with dreams of glory in the service of his country.

One night in the winter of 1916-17, Eddie went on a party. His unit was then stationed in a New England state. It was a fairly wild party, held in a hotel of dim repute locally on a night when the local police raided it. Because women were present, the court was able to give Eddie the maximum sentence - two years in the penitentiary. Eddie was then eighteen.

He couldn't believe it at first. "How could they give a guy two years for doin' what everybody else does?" Surely the Army would do something, the Army understood these things. But the Army washed its hands of the matter. His uncle, the big lawyer back home? The uncle wrote that Eddie had got himself into this; Eddie could get himself out. Eddie went to the state penitentiary for two years of hard labor.

Hard labor, in the down-East penitentiary of those days, meant polishing marble table tops ten hours a day, six days a week. You worked with a paste made of acid and pumice, rubbing it on the marble with a piece of carpet. The acid got under your fingernails and burned. If you complained, you got a week in solitary. Two years.

Meanwhile, America had begun and ended a war. Eddie's unit was back from France, covered with glory, medals and promotions. Hardly anybody even remembered Eddy. "The first thing I did when I got out was give that warden a piece of my mind. Then I got out of the state. Then I got drunk." In the course of the spree, Eddie made his way back to his home town.

He asked his father for a bed and a place to clean up, and was thrown out of the house. His uncle gave him a bed until he slept it off, then bought him a suit, gave him ten dollars and ordered him to leave town. "We've got a good name in this town so far; we don't want it jeopardized."

They didn't have a good name with Eddie. To put as much distance between himself and Ohio as he could, he rode freight trains to California.

The mental twist common to the men of skid row was now set in Eddie's mind. He had lost faith in the good will of men. Except for this tragic quirk, he might have taken steady work and established himself. But a steady job brought to mind unrelieved drudgery on hard stone; responsibility meant an unmerciful Yankee jurist, a father who "had no damn use" for him, and a stuffed-shirt uncle. At twenty-one Eddie felt permanently frustrated, and knew the nervous tension such a state of mind induces. Drinking relieved this tension. He gravitated to skid row, where potables were cheap, and where the companionship of the despairing could always be found.

The first twelve years weren't too bad, Eddie recalls. He picked fruit in the California valleys, worked in the Washington lumber camps, was a gandy-dancer - the section hand who used to tamp stone between the ties with his feet - on a dozen railroads, returning to skid row after each spell of work. Eddie's last eight years on skid row were more rugged. He always hankered to get back to Ohio, and every couple of years would head that way. He'd get as far as Detroit, then lose heart. Finally, Detroit became headquarters. He stopped working and lived by panhandling. "My drinkin' seemed to go out of control." The rubbing alcohol and canned heat he once spurned became the basis of his diet. He'd made jails before, but never as now - in and out, in and out, until it totaled sixty-seven terms in the Detroit House of Correction alone.

Eddie's case has elements common to almost all the skid-row case histories which have been taken. There's the early loss of a beloved parent. A study in New Haven revealed that 49 per cent of homeless men lost one or both parents by death alone before they were twenty, to say nothing of loss of parent by divorce, separation and desertion. There's the shattering reversal of fortune in early-adult or late-adolescent experience. And there's the set disbelief in the kindness and decency of man.

During his sixty-seventh term in the House of Correction Eddie heard about the city's new experiment at 339 W. Jefferson. He decided, "God knows why," to drop in there when he got out.

Eddie didn't know it, but the men in charge at 339 were still pretty much at sea. Their first step had been to interview 250 homeless men on the Avenue. Eighty per cent showed good prospects for rehabilitation. Three quarters were between forty and fifty-nine, with an increasing percentage of younger men, veterans of World War II. Three quarters had eight grades or more of education, a better-than-average IQ - there was one Ph.D.-and had been regularly employed within the past five years.

None was happy with his lot, and nearly half had specific suggestions for their own reclamation. They wanted clinical help, stricter regulation of flophouses and bars, and, of all things, chance to work their way out of their difficulties. This willingness to work was a new note in skid-row literature. My own belief is that it was induced by the usually sympathetic attitude of the Detroit interviewers. In any event, the voice of skid row was at last heard in its own behalf. It turned out to be a voice full of agonized awareness of its own misery, with a note of hope for better days.

Local members of Alcoholics Anonymous were consulted, and literature of the Yale School of Alcohol Studies was examined. Only about 5 per cent of AA's have ever been on skid row. Still, stories like Eddie's had been heard before in AA, so there was assurance that recovery was possible. But AA success, even an AA beginning required hope and initiative, which were so lacking along skid row. Could there be some sort of boost over the hump from the Avenue to the AA group? The committee decided it would be worth the city's effort to help these men find sober friends, jobs, medical treatment and advice. The city council voted funds, and 339 West Jefferson was opened.

Aware of the contempt of the drinking man for the teetotaler, the committee recruited men, as counselors, who'd had personal knowledge of alcoholism. Two of the staff's four men had themselves experience, and recovered from, serious drinking problems. The staff consisted of an administrative officer, an employment counselor, a personal counselor and a clinical psychologist. There were, besides the small offices, a place to sit down and wait, a few magazines and a bathroom where a man could borrow soap and a razor. Clients began to appear, tentatively at first, then in a steady stream. All sorts of men arrived, in all stages of disrepair, and a special program had to be devised for each individual.

There was Fred C., who went out one evening two years ago to get a jar of olives and a quart of milk, and didn't come back. Fred is a thirty-year-old veteran with a wife, two children and a car. Until the night of the olives, he worked on an assembly line in one of the automobile plants. Fred's expenditures for liquor and his sprees set him at odds with his wife. After going for the olives, he took up residence on skid row. Six months later he was in bad shape, and he knew it. He heard about 339, and one hot day, staggered in to see about it. The committee can draw on the services of other agencies as needed. Fred was shaky, incoherent, dirty and many weeks unshaved. Before anything more was attempted, he was sent to the Receiving Hospital for five days of rest and vitamins.

Eddie Rohan, whose prognosis, on the basis of his record, was most unfavorable, turned out to be one of the committee's pleasant surprises. He's one of the ten-in-one who get the idea immediately and progress toward firm recovery without a relapse.

The first step, with Eddy, was to let him get some resentments off his chest. The counselor, who had himself wielded a mean bottle in his day, agreed that Eddie's father was no ideal parent and the prison sentence had been cruelly unjust. Still, he said, it was no reason for destroying oneself. Other men had survived worse deals and were now sober, working and happy. Perhaps Eddy would like to meet some of them. He went to AA and found congenial friends. For a couple of weeks he took temporary jobs, dishwashing. Then he got a permanent job in a hotel, which he still holds.

The pattern of Fred's recovery is less smooth - and more typical. In the beginning, Fred called twice a week at 339 for conferences, began attending AA meetings and got a job in a factory. His wife came down to talk about reconciliation. In six months debts were paid off and Fred was back with his family. He took a night job as a waiter, in addition to his factory job. The counselors at 339 suggested that he ease up; one job was enough. But Fred drove on. One night dead tired, he took another drink - then another, and another. He lost both jobs and his family, and stayed drunk on skid row two months. He returned to 339, asking if he might try again. "I wasn't really listening to AA the first time. This time I know I'll make good." He's been back on the job four months now, the debts are paid off again, and his wife is pondering.

Of the committee's 1670 clients, about 250 are, like Eddie, very probably in the clear. Another 500 are, like Fred, still troubled by relapses. The committee has bright hopes for their recovery. "The thing we watch for," Bill Sterling told me, "is the significant change in attitude. When hostility and resentment begin to make way for a little humility and trust, a man's chances sharply improve." Of the remainder, 520 never came back, and 400 the committee does not think it can help at this time.

The influx of new men off the Avenue has affected nearby AA groups. The prophecy surely-and it rang true, because that is the sort of girl I was, fifteen years ago-likeable, attractive, and an extraordinary nice little thing.

My parents were what is known as "comfortably off." They sent me to boarding school, bought me beautiful clothes, and gave me a car and the biggest allowance of any girl in college.

Five years later I was an alcoholic, drinking like a crazy woman. You may wonder how a woman can call herself an alcoholic, particularly a woman as genteel and delicately reared as myself. The reason is that I have joined AA and become a realist. I know what I am, and am not afraid to admit it. Alcoholics are people who are unable to drink normally. With us one drink is too many-a hundred too few. We can never succeed in becoming controlled drinkers-and we know it. Our only answer is to stop, and that, as every alcoholic knows, is a torturously difficult thing to do.

In some ways this is going to be a hard story to write. In other ways it will not be as difficult as you might imagine, because to tell you the truth, I like to talk about myself. All alcoholics, drunk or sober, are communicative. We are the most social-minded people in the world, and born good-doers. Alcoholics Anonymous brought me back to sanity and decency, and now I want to tell what AA does, how it works, and why. In order to do this, I must confess to a congenital weakness and a life of many shameful things. But in order to help others, I am glad to write this intensely personal true confession.

Because AA pledges its members to anonymity, I cannot tell my name. I am thirty-four years old, married to a successful professional man, and live on Long Island. My father is the salt of the earth and a pillar of respectability, and my mother one of the best women God ever made.

When I was a girl we had wine at our house only on Sunday mornings when the cook served a bit of sherry on top of the grapefruit. Mother was a teetotaler except for the grapefruit, and Father never drank anything stronger than beer. I attended a convent outside of Chicago, and was graduated at nineteen from a leading women's college. The family moved from the Midwest to New England when I entered college. They wanted to cushion life for me, to make everything as soft and pleasant as possible.

During senior year I fell in love with a boy from Tech and became engaged. Getting married seemed like fun, and the family raised no objections. Tom is four years older than I am, and for all he has been through, a good person, I guess. At least he tried to help me. And if, in the process, he was pretty badly hurt himself, that is my fault. I will tell you more about Tom later.

We were married in August in Trinity Church, and had a reception afterward at the Copley Plaza Hotel, where the guests toasted us in grape juice. We went to Bermuda on our honeymoon, and although there were a dozen brides on the boat, my clothes were the prettiest, my bathing suits the smartest, and my evening dresses the most stunning. Our wedding trip was a gift from the family. Dad had cabled that every attention be paid us, and our suite was fragrant with roses and lilies. The orchestra played our favorite tunes. The wine steward brought champagne to our table.

"I suppose," said Tom, "we should drink it. But you know Ann, I think the stuff is terribly over-rated."

"So do I," I said. "It tickles my nose." And we told the steward not to bring any more.

Tom had a chemist's job with an engineering firm in the Midwest. He had wanted to take an apartment in the city, but my family was moving back to the suburb in which I had grown up, and I persuaded Tom to commute. He had enough money (a tiny legacy) to furnish the little flat of his dreams. But I wanted a house. I argued that Tom should spend what he could, and let my family do the rest-and, as usual, I had my way.

We lived fourteen blocks from the family, and every day Mother and I had luncheon together. Her bridge group took me up, and I joined the Woman's Club. They thought I was "cute," and called me the Child Bride. Looking back I know how thoroughly they spoiled me- Mother and Dad and their friends-and how tragic it was. For nearly two years I lived in this over-protective, loving atmosphere.

Then Tom was transferred. Our next home was in a fashionable suburb of New York. Mother helped us get settled, and at first I thought New York was going to be fun. But when Mother went back to Illinois and I had the whole day to myself, I soon changed my mind. In the mornings I dove Tom to the station. Then there was nothing to do until he came home.

Nobody came to call, and I did not know how to make friends. Sometimes at the Shopping Center women nodded and smiled, but the ability to respond seemed frozen within me, and I turned stiffly away.

"If people don't want to be friendly, so what? I demanded. "I can get along all right."

"But maybe they do. All you do is mope," complained Tom. "Why don't you get interested in something?"

"Because I don't want to. For goodness sake leave me alone!"

It was my fault and we began to grow apart. When I continued to rebuff him, Tom literally left me alone.

Loneliness is the root of most misery, and salvation lies in work and service. Years later I was to pray, "For work to do and strength to do the work, I thank Thee, Lord." But in those days I was too filled with self-pity to get a good look at myself. My husband did not understand me, I thought, my parents neglected me. Life was horrible, and it was everybody's fault but mine.

Reviewing my life, I realize now how completely I have always conformed to the alcoholic pattern. Medical studies tell us that most alcoholics are emotionally immature, and that many are spoiled, touchy by nature, and tormented by loneliness.

Tom had been drinking for about eighteen months before I got started, but Tom is no alcoholic. He can "take it or leave it." Competition at the plant was terrific, and he had to make good or be fired. He was frightened, he felt bad about being transplanted, and he was lonely, too.

He joined a golf club and did most of his drinking at the nineteenth hole. Once in a while he brought someone home. If I had one or two drinks with them-swell, as Tom would say. If I didn't-okay.

Then one night two of the men had their wives with them, and for the first time in months Tom seemed glad to have me around. After a few drinks we made some sandwiches, and before long the boys were harmonizing. Our guests stayed until midnight, and we all agreed that it was a wonderful evening.

"Honey," said Tom as we were going to bed, "you took to those high balls like a duck to water."

"It was the first good time I've had out here," I defended myself. "You've been drinking for ages, Tom, and now I'm going to catch up."

I didn't though-not that summer. Tom's laboratory moved to Long Island, and I never saw those women again.

We rented a house halfway between a church and a golf club. This time, I thought, we'll join the church and I'll also take up golf. On several consecutive Sundays we attended service. A number of people said how-do-you-do, and a few tried to make conversation, but Tom was uncommonly uncommunicative, and I was too shy to respond. Although I love having people around me, I cannot reach out for them. Soon I was to discover that liquor bolstered my opinion of myself and made it easier for me to respond to friendly overtures.

It was the woman across the street who taught me how to drink. May Eldredge was a complete extrovert, energetic and capable-and with true kind-heartedness she took us under her wing. On Fridays, she told us, the crowd usually had a party. They were meeting at her house for cocktails, then going to Smith's for dinner. If we'd like to go, maybe I would give her a hand with hors'd oeuvre?

Would I! I went over in mid-afternoon, and May and I made dozens of canaps of cheese and chicken paste. We also slipped bits of lobster into squares of puff pastry, and rolled ripe olives in strips of bacon. While I buttered rounds of toast, May mixed martinis.

"We might as well get off to a good start," she said.

By the time the guests came, May and I were pretty high. It was a happy crowd, and by the time I had downed my sixth or seventh cocktail I thought they were the nicest people I had ever known. The party lasted until almost dawn, and the next night we were at it again.

May telephoned Saturday afternoon.

"There's a pint left from last night," she said. "Come over and we'll have a `pick-me-up.'"

I was feeling pretty rocky, but a couple of whisky sours made me feel better and by the time the gang had assembled, May and I were on top of the world. When the party broke up, Tom and I asked everyone to our house for Sunday supper.

After that, life was just one party after another. On Monday I would awake with a throbbing head and a horrible taste in my mouth, but a "hair of the dog that bit me," provided the stimulant I needed. In the afternoon May and I usually had cocktails, or a quickie or two before the boys came home.

May was a robust soul, and when there were community parties she did more than her share. In the beginning I did, too. I'd roast a chicken or make a bowl of salad. But liquor was beginning to get me, and before long I began renegeing. When I was supposed to make spaghetti, I would show up with a few cans of Spam. Once when I promised hamburgers, I went empty-handed.

It was rather amusing the first few times, but soon my irresponsibility became plain stupidity, and I got to be a nuisance.

"I don't know why you want to go to parties," Tom said. "You're always getting sick, or going home to sleep."

Other people must have wondered the same thing, because we were not invited around as much as we used to be. Having a guest addicted to passing out is no fun, and even May grew tired of taking care of me. Then I started drinking nights at home. When Tom complained that I was ruining my health, I told him to mind his own business. Father had continued giving me my allowance and that made me unbearably cocky.

"It's my health, isn't it? And my money, too." I added maliciously.

Finally Tom wrote to my parents. But before they had a chance to answer I wrote, too. Tom did not love me anymore, I said. Everything I did was wrong. He nagged me because I was not strong enough to do the housework. I was sick and tired, and he hated me because I was losing my looks. Poor Tom

"It's tough," he'd said, "for a man to see the girl he loves looking like the devil because she won't stop drinking. Everything I've loved about you you're losing. For heavens sake, pull yourself together, Ann. Get your hair and nails done. Buy some new clothes. Get the house straightened out, and see if we can't have some fun being normal for a change."

When I became unmanageable, Tom poured all the liquor in the house down the sink. When I ordered more, he smashed the bottles.

Finally the family came to take me home. Father blamed everything on Tom.

"The poor child is sick," Mother said. "What she needs is a nice little holiday."

They took me to Canada, and-because I was not crossed or annoyed or bored, because everything was taken care of, and I had nothing to do but enjoy myself-I stopped drinking for awhile. But when I went home I started again, I spent three whole days, that first week, in a movie house, trying to stave off temptation. The old discontent and loneliness had returned. I was irritable and touchy, and Tom was not helping matters.

If I was going to drink, he would take charge of things he said. Then he began doling out a meager allowance to me-a single drink before dinner, for an appetizer. Another at bedtime, to make me sleep. Liquor that I had bought and paid for! I was furious. That was when I began hiding bottles around the house-under the mattress, behind pictures, in with the potatoes. Tom guessed what I was up to, and the night he caught me sneaking a drink he dashed the bottle out of my hand.

The next day I went home to the family. That time they took me to the Coast. And again I stopped drinking. They were both convinced then that everything was Tom's fault.

"Don't let him get anything on you, Honey," Dad would say. "Just watch your step. We'll get you a quiet divorce, and you'll come and live with us."

I had decency enough to protest occasionally that it wasn't Tom's fault, and by the time the trip was over I really wanted to go back to him.

Dad's attitude illustrates a point I would like to make. It isn't people who drive us to drink, and it isn't situations. Alcoholism is a disease, not a weakness. And it is not brought on by incompatibility any more than cancer is, or heart trouble. As a matter of fact, I really loved Tom. It was loneliness that was my bete noire.

I have known men who abandoned their families because they thought their wives drove them to drink, and women who divorced their husbands because they imagined that divorce and a nice juicy alimony would solve their troubles, and they would stop drinking. Boys have left home to escape tyrannical parents, and girls have quit jobs they disliked, because they fancied these were the things that made me drink. For a while the escapists might go on the wagon. But in the long run, for a true alcoholic, there is no reformation.

An alcoholic will always find an excuse to drink, and if it isn't one thing it's another. Changing situations is not the only way out. The only way for an alcoholic to stop drinking is to STOP-period.

Many AA's who previously blamed their drinking on family circumstances or unsupportable jobs are now living in exactly the same situations in which they lived when they were drinking themselves to death. The only answer to the alcoholic's problem is to change himself.

All alcoholics are maladjusted and unpleasant situations undoubtedly contribute to their maladjustment. But alibis won't mend matters, and when dad sought to place the blame for my drinking on Tom, I knew that he was being unfair. It wasn't Tom's fault-and it wasn't mine. I was the victim of a dread disease, but at the time none of us knew that.

I realize now that my loving parents pampered me beyond reason. I was dependent upon them, upon my husband, and upon what friends I could make. I had no inner resources and no interests. Loneliness was the beginning, and because in my loneliness I had nothing to fall back upon, I was bereft. I had always been hypersensitive and shy. Because of my inability to accept life, or remold it, I needed a prop to brace me up and keep me going.

Alcohol was that prop, and although I could go on the wagon for a while, I didn't see how-day in and day out-I could live without liquor. Only an alcoholic can understand the prison of loneliness and fear into which we lonely people retreat over a fancied slight or hurt.

In the midst of a crowd we are pitifully lonely. Sometimes, lying beside Tom at night, I seemed to drown in a black abyss of desolation. Then I would slip out of the bed and tiptoe across the room to the closet, to pour the drink that would bring oblivion.

Finally relations between us reached a breaking point. Tom never brought people home anymore, and I had become a solitary drinker. One night when he had destroyed all the liquor he could find, I remembered a quart I had cached in the coal bin. In the morning as soon as he left the house I crept down to the cellar, retrieved my precious bottle, and was clambering out of the bin when I stumbled. As I fell I hit my head and knocked myself out.

Tom telephoned at noon. When I didn't answer he became alarmed and hurried home. He found me in the coal bin, carried me upstairs, bathed me, and put me to bed. When I came to and wept in maudlin fashion, Tom struck me in the face. Then he telephoned Mother. She arrived during the night.

"Poor baby," she murmured, as she bathed my discolored face and slipped bits of ice between my swollen lips. "What can I do for you, darling?"

"Leave me alone," I moaned. "I want to die."

There was a family conference, and the next day Mother and I flew home to Dad. For several days I was desperately ill.

"Ann," said Mother one morning, "Aren't you sorry you and Tom didn't have a baby?"

I was too sick to speculate. "Oh, I don't know. It's too late now. I'll never live with Tom again."

A few days later a big box came from Marshall Field's. In it was a complete layette-little shirts and booties and tinny dresses with wee tucks, sweaters and bonnets, and baby blankets. Why I cried I don't know-weakness perhaps.

"Dad and I have arranged to take a baby from the Foundling Home," announced Mother. "We're just borrowing her, really. We thought you'd help us take care of her-a little girl, Ann."

I didn't want a baby any more than I wanted wings.

"That's fine," I said. "I'd love to, Mother."

Mother patted my hand hopefully. "Then you be a good girl," she said, "and hurry up and get well."

My nerves were completely shot. I had the shakes so bad that I could not life a glass to my lips. I took fruit juice through a tube, and even fruit juice nauseated me.

Before I was up, the baby arrived. Mother brought her to my bed, and when that baby held out her little arms, I felt for the first time that I had something to live for.

I tried to give up drinking for Christine's sake, and for Mother's sake I tried to go to church on Sundays. But it wasn't any use. I had neither the moral nor the physical strength to do what I wanted to do. Every morning I would crawl into the bathroom and pour myself half a glass of whiskey from a bottle I kept hidden in the hamper, after which I would brush my teeth, gargle, chew a piece of gum, and smoke a cigarette.

An alcoholic can almost always get liquor. I bullied Tom into bringing me a quart, and bribed the cook for another. The doctor had ordered some for medicinal purposes. I hid it and pretended the bottle had broken. I was seldom, during my career as an alcoholic, without liquor. To get it, I wept, lied, and threw mad tantrums-but I got it.

Finally I became better. An alcoholic usually does after illness. For a while I even went on the wagon. That was when Mother, in an effort to save my marriage, suggested that I take Christine and go back to Tom.

For six weeks after I went home I didn't take a drink (this is usual after illness), and everything was fine. Tom fell in love with Christine as soon as he saw her. If she had been our own little girl, it would have been impossible for either of us to love her more. Everybody loved the child including the Eldredges-and May took to coming to the house again. While Christine was having her afternoon nap, we would have a few drinks. And before long I was up to my old tricks.

For years Tom had tried to make me stop drinking, and succeed only in rubbing me the wrong way. He did not know that alcoholism is a disease; that an alcoholic is a very sick person who cannot be reasoned with. Nagging, of course, is worse than useless. Indeed the first tenet of AA is that no one can make an alcoholic stop drinking.

When I was first told that I was an alcoholic I was horrified. It was a woman from the adoption agency who told me. Mother realized that if anyone could straighten me out it was Christine. She suggested we adopt the child but adoption is a long drawn-out process.

When the woman assigned to investigate us came to the house, I went through the customary routine of gargle, gum and cigarette-and imagined that I had acquitted myself satisfactorily. Tom and I were college graduates. Our joint income was more than $15,000 a year. We had an attractive home, and were obviously devoted to the baby we wished to adopt. That, it seemed to me was enough to make us good parents. But the adoption agency thought otherwise.

"Mrs. C-----" the report read, "although an intelligent and somewhat charming person is unfit to be awarded legal custody of a child."

Outraged, we appealed to the courts. A stern judge heard our story.

"The social worker," I told him earnestly, "came to my house in the afternoon after I'd had a few cocktails. Another time she came in the evening. I admit, Your Honor, that I had been drinking—a highball or two. Sometimes she came in the morning. She saw me bath and feed the baby. She knows that the child is well-cared for—that my husband and I adore her. But that woman has accused me of being an alcoholic. Why, Your Honor, I hate the taste of liquor! I drink because I am lonely and miserable, because it is the only way I can keep going. When we adopt Christine, things will be different. When she is my own"

The judge rustled the papers of a voluminous report. "Adoption denied," he said.

Tom says I fainted. All I remember is a feeling of desolation-of utter, terrible loneliness—a feeling of being caged. When I came to, I was in a hospital and all around me was loneliness.

Tom had taken me home and called a doctor. Then he went to a drugstore for medicine. While he was gone, I partially recovered my senses, and found a bottle of liquor. Before he came back I had finished it and passed out. They took me to the hospital in an ambulance. For days I was horribly sick, and underneath and on top of the nausea were waves of loneliness that washed over me like the sea.

One day a woman came and sat by my bed. If I really wanted to stop drinking I could, she said. There was an answer to my problem. There was a remedy that really worked. She was a graduate nurse, she said. Awhile ago she had married and had children. Then she started to drink. For fifteen years she drank. She lost her husband, her children and her home. They put her in an institution, and there, at last, she found the remedy. I could find it too, she said. And if I wished, she would help me. Day after day she came and sat by my bed.

Later I was to learn that my doctor had sent for her. At many hospitals where alcoholics are taken to "dry out" a physician or clergyman contacts a member of AA to talk to remorseful patients.

At first I only listened half-heartedly. By and by, I talked a little to her. God had forsaken me, I wept. He had taken away my baby.

"But you are completely out of touch with God," she said. "You have done things of your own weakness opposed to God's holy will."

She said that I must submit my weak will to God, and let Him handle my difficulties. God's law was the Law of Love, she explained, and all my resentful feelings were unconscious disobedience to that law. As I grew stronger, she brought a lawyer who had been a heavy drinker, and he, too, sat by my bed and talked. And the things he said made sense.

"Drinking never solves a problem-it only makes matters worse." I thought of Christine, and tears rolled down my cheeks. "Alcoholics are allergic to drink as other people are allergic to certain foods, to dust, or flowers. There isn't any cure for an alcoholic, except just stopping."

When I was stronger I went, for a little while, to live with the nurse. She had several friends who were alcoholics, and they came often to call. After I went home, feeling much stronger, she asked if I would go to the hospital to visit other alcoholics as she had visited me. The first time I went, I was filled with the old shyness that furnished the "reason" for my first drinking. But the sight of every new alcoholic was an object lesson, and I soon enjoyed going. My visits served a dual purpose-by helping others I was helping myself.

I soon found that by placing my life in God's hands every day, and asking Him to help me to be a sober woman for twenty-four hours, I was able to do His will. God is all-loving and all-forgiving, and I know that he will not let me down. I know that I cannot cure myself, and that doctors cannot cure me, that my strength must come from God, and that without Him, I am helpless and alone.

There are no secrets about AA, and we are not an overly religious group. We are happy because we have found friends who understand us. No one but an alcoholic can really understand an alcoholic. Clergymen are often censorious, loving women weep and nag, men curse their brothers out-but we who have been through the mill understand one another.

A member of AA wrote a little verse called "About Love" that was read at one of our recent meetings. AA's laughed when they heard it-but it's the truth:

The wonderful love of a beautiful maid,

The love of a staunch true man,

And the love of a baby afraid

Have existed since life began.

But the greatest love-the love of loves-

Even greater than that of a mother,

Is he tender, passionate, infinite love

Of one drunken bum for another.

On August 14th I will be 35 years old, and on that day Tom has promised to go with me to the Judge who said we could not have Christine. I want to tell him how my honest attempt to practice a law of love has cleansed me.

I will say, "Your Honor, I am no longer weak and lonely, but fit now to be a mother to the baby I love." And the Judge, I hope, we give me Christine for my own.

If you know someone who honestly wants to conquer the liquor habit, tell him-or her-about Alcoholics Anonymous, P.O. Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York, N.Y.

MAYBE YOU KNOW US ONLY AS ALCOHOLICS. YOU SCORN US
YOU SHUN US. BUT PERHAPS AFTER YOU HAVE READ MY STORY, YOU WILL PITY US INSTEAD, AND UNDERSTAND A LITTLE BETTER-WE ARE LONELY PEOPLE

as told to Eleanor Early

When I was graduated from college the class prophet predicted that I would marry a prominent citizen, become president of the Women's Club, and be known as the richest, prettiest and most popular woman in town. A wholesome prophecy surely-and it rang true, because that is the sort of girl I was, fifteen years ago-likeable, attractive, and an extraordinary nice little thing.

My parents were what is known as "comfortably off." They sent me to boarding school, bought me beautiful clothes, and gave me a car and the biggest allowance of any girl in college.

Five years later I was an alcoholic, drinking like a crazy woman. You may wonder how a woman can call herself an alcoholic, particularly a woman as genteel and delicately reared as myself. The reason is that I have joined AA and become a realist. I know what I am, and am not afraid to admit it. Alcoholics are people who are unable to drink normally. With us one drink is too many-a hundred too few. We can never succeed in becoming controlled drinkers-and we know it. Our only answer is to stop, and that, as every alcoholic knows, is a torturously difficult thing to do.

In some ways this is going to be a hard story to write. IN other ways it will not be as difficult as you might imagine, because to tell you the truth, I like to talk about myself. All alcoholics, drunk or sober, are communicative. We are the most social-minded people in the world, and born good-doers. Alcoholics Anonymous brought me back to sanity and decency, and now I want to tell what AA does, how it works, and why. In order to do this, I must confess to a congenital weakness and a life of many shameful things. But in order to help others, I am glad to write this intensely personal true confession.

"There's a pint left from last night," she said. "Come over and we'll have a `pick-me-up.'"

I was feeling pretty rocky, but a couple of whisky sours made me feel better and by the time the gang had assembled, May and I were on top of the world. When the party broke up, Tom and I asked everyone to our house for Sunday supper.

After that, life was just one party after another. On Monday I would awake with a throbbing head and a horrible taste in my mouth, but a "hair of the dog that bit me," provided the stimulant I needed. In the afternoon May and I usually had cocktails, or a quickie or two before the boys came home.

May was a robust soul, and when there were community parties she did more than her share. In the beginning I did, too. I'd roast a chicken or make a bowl of salad. But liquor was beginning to get me, and before long I began renegeing. When I was supposed to make spaghetti, I would show up with a few cans of Spam. Once when I promised hamburgers, I went empty-handed.

It was rather amusing the first few times, but soon my irresponsibility became plain stupidity, and I got to be a nuisance.

"I don't know why you want to go to parties," Tom said. "You're always getting sick, or going home to sleep."

Other people must have wondered the same thing, because we were not invited around as much as we used to be. Having a guest addicted to passing out is no fun, and even May grew tired of taking care of me. Then I started drinking nights at home. When Tom complained that I was ruining my health, I told him to mind his own business. Father had continued giving me my allowance and that made me unbearably cocky.

"It's my health, isn't it? And my money, too." I added maliciously.

Finally Tom wrote to my parents. But before they had a chance to answer I wrote, too. Tom did not love me anymore, I said. Everything I did was wrong. He nagged me because I was not strong enough to do the housework. I was sick and tired, and he hated me because I was losing my looks. Poor Tom

"It's tough," he'd said, "for a man to see the girl he loves looking like the devil because she won't stop drinking. Everything I've loved about you you're losing. For heavens sake, pull yourself together, Ann. Get your hair and nails done. Buy some new clothes. Get the house straightened out, and see if we can't have some fun being normal for a change."

When I became unmanageable, Tom poured all the liquor in the house down the sink. When I ordered more, he smashed the bottles.

Finally the family came to take me home. Father blamed everything on Tom.

"The poor child is sick," Mother said. "What she needs is a nice little holiday."

They took me to Canada, and-because I was not crossed or annoyed or bored, because everything was taken care of, and I had nothing to do but enjoy myself-I stopped drinking for awhile. But when I went home I started again, I spent three whole days, that first week, in a movie house, trying to stave off temptation. The old discontent and loneliness had returned. I was irritable and touchy, and Tom was not helping matters.

If I was going to drink, he would take charge of things he said. Then he began doling out a meager allowance to me-a single drink before dinner, for an appetizer. Another at bedtime, to make me sleep. Liquor that I had bought and paid for! I was furious. That was when I began hiding bottles around the house-under the mattress, behind pictures, in with the potatoes. Tom guessed what I was up to, and the night he caught me sneaking a drink he dashed the bottle out of my hand.

The next day I went home to the family. That time they took me to the Coast. And again I stopped drinking. They were both convinced then that everything was Tom's fault.

"Don't let him get anything on you, Honey," Dad would say. "Just watch your step. We'll get you a quiet divorce, and you'll come and live with us."

I had decency enough to protest occasionally that it wasn't Tom's fault, and by the time the trip was over I really wanted to go back to him.

Dad's attitude illustrates a point I would like to make. It isn't people who drive us to drink, and it isn't situations. Alcoholism is a disease, not a weakness. And it is not brought on by incompatibility any more than cancer is, or heart trouble. As a matter of fact, I really loved Tom. It was loneliness that was my bete noire.

I have known men who abandoned their families because they thought their wives drove them to drink, and women who divorced their husbands because they imagined that divorce and a nice juicy alimony would solve their troubles, and they would stop drinking. Boys have left home to escape tyrannical parents, and girls have quit jobs they disliked, because they fancied these were the things that made me drink. For a while the escapists might go on the wagon. But in the long run, for a true alcoholic, there is no reformation.

An alcoholic will always find an excuse to drink, and if it isn't one thing it's another. Changing situations is not the only way out. The only way for an alcoholic to stop drinking is to STOP-period.

Many AA's who previously blamed their drinking on family circumstances or unsupportable jobs are now living in exactly the same situations in which they lived when they were drinking themselves to death. The only answer to the alcoholic's problem is to change himself.

All alcoholics are maladjusted and unpleasant situations undoubtedly contribute to their maladjustment. But alibis won't mend matters, and when dad sought to place the blame for my drinking on Tom, I knew that he was being unfair. It wasn't Tom's fault-and it wasn't mine. I was the victim of a dread disease, but at the time none of us knew that.

I realize now that my loving parents pampered me beyond reason. I was dependent upon them, upon my husband, and upon what friends I could make. I had no inner resources and no interests. Loneliness was the beginning, and because in my loneliness I had nothing to fall back upon, I was bereft. I had always been hypersensitive and shy. Because of my inability to accept life, or remold it, I needed a prop to brace me up and keep me going.

Alcohol was that prop, and although I could go on the wagon for a while, I didn't see how-day in and day out-I could live without liquor. Only an alcoholic can understand the prison of loneliness and fear into which we lonely people retreat over a fancied slight or hurt.

In the midst of a crowd we are pitifully lonely. Sometimes, lying beside Tom at night, I seemed to drown in a black abyss of desolation. Then I would slip out of the bed and tiptoe across the room to the closet, to pour the drink that would bring oblivion.

Finally relations between us reached a breaking point. Tom never brought people home anymore, and I had become a solitary drinker. One night when he had destroyed all the liquor he could find, I remembered a quart I had cached in the coal bin. In the morning as soon as he left the house I crept down to the cellar, retrieved my precious bottle, and was clambering out of the bin when I stumbled. As I fell I hit my head and knocked myself out.

Tom telephoned at noon. When I didn't answer he became alarmed and hurried home. He found me in the coal bin, carried me upstairs, bathed me, and put me to bed. When I came to and wept in maudlin fashion, Tom struck me in the face. Then he telephoned Mother. She arrived during the night.

"Poor baby," she murmured, as she bathed my discolored face and slipped bits of ice between my swollen lips. "What can I do for you, darling?"

"Leave me alone," I moaned. "I want to die."

There was a family conference, and the next day Mother and I flew home to Dad. For several days I was desperately ill.

"Ann," said Mother one morning, "Aren't you sorry you and Tom didn't have a baby?"

I was too sick to speculate. "Oh, I don't know. It's too late now. I'll never live with Tom again."

A few days later a big box came from Marshall Field's. In it was a complete layette-little shirts and booties and tinny dresses with wee tucks, sweaters and bonnets, and baby blankets. Why I cried I don't know-weakness perhaps.

"Dad and I have arranged to take a baby from the Foundling Home," announced Mother. "We're just borrowing her, really. We thought you'd help us take care of her-a little girl, Ann."

I didn't want a baby any more than I wanted wings.

"That's fine," I said. "I'd love to, Mother."

Mother patted my hand hopefully. "Then you be a good girl," she said, "and hurry up and get well."

My nerves were completely shot. I had the shakes so bad that I could not life a glass to my lips. I took fruit juice through a tube, and even fruit juice nauseated me.

Before I was up, the baby arrived. Mother brought her to my bed, and when that baby held out her little arms, I felt for the first time that I had something to live for.

I tried to give up drinking for Christine's sake, and for Mother's sake I tried to go to church on Sundays. But it wasn't any use. I had neither the moral nor the physical strength to do what I wanted to do. Every morning I would crawl into the bathroom and pour myself half a glass of whiskey from a bottle I kept hidden in the hamper, after which I would brush my teeth, gargle, chew a piece of gum, and smoke a cigarette.

An alcoholic can almost always get liquor. I bullied Tom into bringing me a quart, and bribed the cook for another. The doctor had ordered some for medicinal purposes. I hid it and pretended the bottle had broken. I was seldom, during my career as an alcoholic, without liquor. To get it, I wept, lied, and threw mad tantrums-but I got it.

Finally I became better. An alcoholic usually does after illness. For a while I even went on the wagon. That was when Mother, in an effort to save my marriage, suggested that I take Christine and go back to Tom.

For six weeks after I went home I didn't take a drink (this is usual after illness), and everything was fine. Tom fell in love with Christine as soon as he saw her. If she had been our own little girl, it would have been impossible for either of us to love her more. Everybody loved the child including the Eldredges-and May took to coming to the house again. While Christine was having her afternoon nap, we would have a few drinks. And before long I was up to my old tricks.

For years Tom had tried to make me stop drinking, and succeed only in rubbing me the wrong way. He did not know that alcoholism is a disease; that an alcoholic is a very sick person who cannot be reasoned with. Nagging, of course, is worse than useless. Indeed the first tenet of AA is that no one can make an alcoholic stop drinking.

When I was first told that I was an alcoholic I was horrified. It was a woman from the adoption agency who told me. Mother realized that if anyone could straighten me out it was Christine. She suggested we adopt the child but adoption is a long drawn-out process.

When the woman assigned to investigate us came to the house, I went through the customary routine of gargle, gum and cigarette-and imagined that I had acquitted myself satisfactorily. Tom and I were college graduates. Our joint income was more than $15,000 a year. We had an attractive home, and were obviously devoted to the baby we wished to adopt. That, it seemed to me was enough to make us good parents. But the adoption agency thought otherwise.

"Mrs. C-----" the report read, "although an intelligent and somewhat charming person is unfit to be awarded legal custody of a child."

Outraged, we appealed to the courts. A stern judge heard our story.

"The social worker," I told him earnestly, "came to my house in the afternoon after I'd had a few cocktails. Another time she came in the evening. I admit, Your Honor, that I had been drinking-a highball or two. Sometimes she came in the morning. She saw me bath and feed the baby. She knows that the child is well-cared for-that my husband and I adore her. But that woman has accused me of being an alcoholic. Why, Your Honor, I hate the taste of liquor! I drink because I am lonely and miserable, because it is the only way I can keep going. When we adopt Christine, things will be different. When she is my own"

The judge rustled the papers of a voluminous report. "Adoption denied," he said.

Tom says I fainted. All I remember is a feeling of desolation-of utter, terrible loneliness-a feeling of being caged. When I came to, I was in a hospital and all around me was loneliness.

Tom had taken me home and called a doctor. Then he went to a drugstore for medicine. While he was gone, I partially recovered my senses, and found a bottle of liquor. Before he came back I had finished it and passed out. They took me to the hospital in an ambulance. For days I was horribly sick, and underneath and on top of the nausea were waves of loneliness that washed over me like the sea.

One day a woman came and sat by my bed. If I really wanted to stop drinking I could, she said. There was an answer to my problem. There was a remedy that really worked. She was a graduate nurse, she said. Awhile ago she had married and had children. Then she started to drink. For fifteen years she drank. She lost her husband, her children and her home. They put her in an institution, and there, at last, she found the remedy. I could find it too, she said. And if I wished, she would help me. Day after day she came and sat by my bed.

Later I was to learn that my doctor had sent for her. At many hospitals where alcoholics are taken to "dry out" a physician or clergyman contacts a member of AA to talk to remorseful patients.

At first I only listened half-heartedly. By and by, I talked a little to her. God had forsaken me, I wept. He had taken away my baby.

"But you are completely out of touch with God," she said. "You have done things of your own weakness opposed to God's holy will."

She said that I must submit my weak will to God, and let Him handle my difficulties. God's law was the Law of Love, she explained, and all my resentful feelings were unconscious disobedience to that law. As I grew stronger, she brought a lawyer who had been a heavy drinker, and he, too, sat by my bed and talked. And the things he said made sense.

"Drinking never solves a problem-it only makes matters worse." I thought of Christine, and tears rolled down my cheeks. "Alcoholics are allergic to drink as other people are allergic to certain foods, to dust, or flowers. There isn't any cure for an alcoholic, except just stopping."

When I was stronger I went, for a little while, to live with the nurse. She had several friends who were alcoholics, and they came often to call. After I went home, feeling much stronger, she asked if I would go to the hospital to visit other alcoholics as she had visited me. The first time I went, I was filled with the old shyness that furnished the "reason" for my first drinking. But the sight of every new alcoholic was an object lesson, and I soon enjoyed going. My visits served a dual purpose-by helping others I was helping myself.

I soon found that by placing my life in God's hands every day, and asking Him to help me to be a sober woman for twenty-four hours, I was able to do His will. God is all-loving and all-forgiving, and I know that he will not let me down. I know that I cannot cure myself, and that doctors cannot cure me, that my strength must come from God, and that without Him, I am helpless and alone.

There are no secrets about AA, and we are not an overly religious group. We are happy because we have found friends who understand us. No one but an alcoholic can really understand an alcoholic. Clergymen are often censorious, loving women weep and nag, men curse their brothers out-but we who have been through the mill understand one another.

A member of AA wrote a little verse called "About Love" that was read at one of our recent meetings. AA's laughed when they heard it-but it's the truth:

The wonderful love of a beautiful maid,

The love of a staunch true man,

And the love of a baby afraid

Have existed since life began.

But the greatest love-the love of loves-

Even greater than that of a mother,

Is he tender, passionate, infinite love

Of one drunken bum for another.

On August 14th I will be 35 years old, and on that day Tom has promised to go with me to the Judge who said we could not have Christine. I want to tell him how my honest attempt to practice a law of love has cleansed me.

I will say, "Your Honor, I am no longer weak and lonely, but fit now to be a mother to the baby I love." And the Judge, I hope, we give me Christine for my own.

literature that might show how this particular slogan developed into part of AA wisdom.

p.s. By the way, one of my most hated AA lines spoken by some members is the put down on thinking that goes something like, "some of my best thinking got me here...." meaning that somehow thinking (maybe in the form of denial or rationalization...) got them to become an alcoholic. Can't think of anything further from the truth for me: I was an alcoholic because I had a disease, an allergy if you like, which combined with my actual drinking eventually developed into a compulsion. I came into AA because I realized (by means of thought and feeling and grace....) that I didn't have to do that anymore, that there was an option. If I hadn't been able to think, I'd still be out there.

A new contact from London sent me the following query. Can anyone help?

He writes:

"I got this book recently. It is smaller than the normal, hardback no dustcover, it is yellow with a thin red line at top and broader one at bottom. Do you have any info on this or could you make enquiries???"

If anyone has any information which could help identify this book, please let us know.

Hello Mike, welcome to AAhistorylovers, and your request for background on the AA Grapevine's placard of "Think, Think, Think." From previous postings in the egroup, the advertising headline "think" was well-known in the 1940s and 1950s from IBM.

Alanon Publications. After the foreword there is the following statement

In arranging for the re-printing of this book for distribution in the Sterling Area, we acknowledge with extreme gratitude the tremendous help we have received from the American Co-founders, the Alcoholic Foundation and the General Service Head Quarters of New York; firstly in giving us permission to re-print and then for their cheerfully given encouragement and generous material help. In making this work available more freely within the Sterling Area it is our earnest hope that many thousands more will find, as we have found, recovery from alcoholism and a new and happy way of living

Page one then starts with "The Doctors Opinion"

There are a few library stamps on the inside

Any help about this book would be appreciated

Dear AA History Lovers:

I have just discovered that this post was not transferred to the new list. It was originally posted on the anniversary of Fr. Pfau's death, February 19.

Subject: Fr. Ralph Pfau, AKA Fr. John Doe

Today is the anniversary of Fr. Ralph Pfau's death. He is believed to have been the first Roman Catholic priest to enter Alcoholics Anonymous.

Fr. Pfau was born on November 10, 1904, and died on February 19, 1967.

He was a priest in the Archdiocese of Indianapolis, ordained at St. Meinrad Seminary, and received an MA in Education at Fordham University.

In the opening paragraph of his autobiography, "Prodigal Shepherd," Father Pfau wrote: "All my life, I will carry three indelible marks. I am a Roman Catholic priest. I am an alcoholic. And I am a neurotic."

I will address these in reverse order:

HE WAS A NEUROTIC

He admits to having "nervous breakdowns," and spending time in sanitariums. He was twice relieved of his parish. Even after achieving sobriety, he continued to be plagued by depressions, which were sometimes severe and long-lasting.

HE WAS AN ALCOHOLIC

He never had a drink until about a year after his ordination. But by 1943 he was sufficiently worried about his drinking to investigate A.A. While responding to a call from a woman who said her husband was dying, he learned from the doctor that the man was not dying by merely passed out from a combination of alcohol and barbitol. As Fr. Pfau was leaving the house he noticed a book on a shelf and asked if he could borrow it. It was "Alcoholics Anonymous."

When he arrived home it was past 3 a.m., and he was longing for a drink. But he could not take a drink. He had to say Mass at 6 a.m., so could neither eat nor drink. But he knew he couldn't sleep, so he sat down in a chair and started reading the book. And he couldn't take his hands off that book.

Day after day for three or four weeks, whenever he had a spare hour or two he would sit in his room reading, studying and thinking. He didn't miss a day reading the book through at least once. It became seared in his brain, "word for word, comma for comma, question mark for question mark." He knew it from cover to cover. And to his amazement, during that entire period he did not take a drink.

One evening he noticed some AA pamphlets on a side table in the vestibule of the rectory. At supper he asked who had left the pamphlets and learned that they were left by Doherty "Dohr" Sheerin, described by the pastor as "the president or something of A.A. here in Indianapolis."

Fr. Pfau studied the pamphlets as thoroughly as he had studied the Big Book, but he couldn't believe they applied to him. He was not an alcoholic, or so he thought.

During this period of not drinking he stepped up the medication the doctor had prescribed, a combination of barbitol and Dexedrine.

He was frightened and he needed help. So one night he telephoned Dohr Sheerin and asked "I was just wondering -- could I possibly see you some time? I'd like to talk to you about -- something. There's no hurry."

"I'll be right over," was the reply, and Dohr Sheerin hung up the phone before Fr. Pfau could reply. Sheerin invited him to attend the meeting the following Thursday. He agreed to attend "just as a spectator." They talked for a few minutes more and Dohr left. That was November 10, 1941, Fr. Pfau's 39th birthday.

For the next 25 years, despite severe problems with depressions, he never took another drink. For a short time he continued to take medications prescribed by his doctor and by Mayo Clinic. But after seeing a friend who had overdosed on seconal he hurried to a doctor in charge of the local "drying out" facility and told him that he was frightened. "I just got back from Mayo, where they gave me a couple hundred pills to take for my nervousness. But now I don't know what to do with them."

"Well," said the doctor, "those people know what they're doing up there. Did you tell them you are an alcoholic?" He then explained that if the doctors at Mayo Clinic had known he was an alcoholic they would never have given him the pills. So he went home and threw away the pills.

With the approval of his Archbishop, he devoted himself to helping other alcoholics, particularly alcoholic priests. He traveled more than 50,000 miles a year to address meetings, conduct retreats and help individuals.

His retreats were attended by thousands of Catholics and by many more thousands who were not Catholics. His retreat talks were eventually published in a series of "Golden Books." They were so named because when he held the second annual retreat in June of 1947, at the request of some of the people who had attended the first retreat his talks were printed in a fifty-six page booklet with a gold cover, and distributed as a souvenir, through the generosity of the owner of the archdiocesan newspaper in Indianapolis. People began requesting copies of "the golden book of your retreat."

His books "Sobriety Without End," and "Sobriety and Beyond," have been read by thousands.

In 1948 he founded the National Clergy Conference on Alcoholism, an organization devoted to the problems of priests, and directed it for many years. Its publications, especially "Alcoholism Source Book for Priests," and the annual "Blue Book," made a deep impact on the American Catholic Hierarchy.

Fr. John C. Ford, S. J., in an Epilogue to a new edition of Pfau's autobiography, published after his death but planned by him, says that "the whole career of Father Pfau can only be understood in the light of the fact that he was a pioneer. He broke new ground. ... Like any pioneer he met opposition and had to have fortitude. Like any Christian innovator he had to have deep faith. It was faith and fortitude that sustained his zeal for the salvation of the countless souls he helped."

Bill Wilson had warned Fr, Pfau that he would receive opposition:

"Bill, a fine gentleman, taught me something I've never forgotten. 'Father,' he said, 'you will do a great deal of good in a great many places. As a Catholic priest and an alcoholic, you can be instrumental in helping alcoholics wherever you go. But remember this -- no matter how well you do, no matter how much you help others or how many you help, no matter what you say or how you say it, no matter what happens -- you can't and won't please everyone. Wherever you go and whatever you do, someone will find a way to criticize you.

"You must take the criticism, no matter how unjustified, with tolerance and forbearance. Remember that resentments can lead to trouble, so you must work doubly hard not to harbor them. Don't ever let anything bother you. I have taken criticism from unexpected sources many times since we began this program, and so will you. Just let it roll off your back like water off a duck's, and you'll be all right."

While Father Pfau obviously had great affection for Bill Wilson, he apparently did not always agree with him. Four o'clock on Sunday afternoon July 3, 1955, at the International A.A. Convention in St. Louis, was a watershed moment in the history of Alcoholics Anonymous. The fifth General Service Conference met during the Convention. This marked the end of the five-year trial period for the Conference.

Bill Wilson had campaigned for the Conference vigorously.

But Father Pfau, who was influential, though controversial, had announced he was going to rise and speak against it. When Bill presented his resolution and a vote of approval was requested, reported Nell Wing, "We from the office sat with baited breath." But Father Pfau did not object and the resolution passed.

Tex Brown, who died October 5, 2000, told me this story at the International Convention in Minneapolis a few months before his death. I asked him to write it for the AA History Buffs.

Tex attended the first International A.A. Convention in Cleveland in 1950. He told me "At the 'Spiritual Meeting' on Sunday morning the main speaker's topic dealt with the idea that the alcoholic was to be the instrument that God would use to regenerate and save the world. He expounded the idea that alcoholics were God's Chosen People and he was starting to talk about AA being 'The Third Covenant,' when he was interrupted by shouted objections from the back of the room. The objector, who turned out to be a small Catholic priest, would not be hushed up. There was chaos and embarrassment as the meeting was quickly adjourned. I was upset and in full sympathy with the poor speaker. I did not realize it at the time, but I had seen Father Pfau in action and Father Pfau was right. I had heard the group conscience and I rejected it."

Bill told the story like this:

"On Sunday morning we listened to a panel of four A.A.s who portrayed the spiritual side of Alcoholics Anonymous -- as they understood it. ... A hush fell upon the crowd as we paused for a moment of silence. Then came the speakers, earnest and carefully prepared, all of them. I cannot recall an A.A. gathering where the attention was more complete, or the devotion deeper.

"Yet some thought that those truly excellent speakers had, in their enthusiasm, unintentionally created a bit of a problem. It was felt the meeting had gone over far in the direction of religious comparison, philosophy and interpretation, when by firm long standing tradition we A.A.'s had always left such questions strictly to the chosen faith of each individual.

"One member rose with a word of caution. [Apparently he was referring to Fr. Pfau.] As I heard him, I thought, 'What a fortunate occurrence.' How well we shall always remember that A.A. is never to be thought of as a religion. How firmly we shall insist that A.A. membership cannot depend upon any particular belief whatever; that our twelve steps contain no article of religious faith except faith in God -- as each of us understands Him. How carefully we shall henceforth avoid any situation which could possibly lead us to debate matters of personal religious belief."

HE WAS A ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIEST

For many years he doubted the validity of his priesthood. He had not chosen it. His mother wanted him to be a priest from the day he was born and would frequently introduce her little boy by saying "This is Ralph. He's going to be a priest." He was unsure he wanted to be a priest, and for many years, especially during his periods in sanitariums, and during the worst periods of his alcoholism, he continued to doubt the validity of his ordination. But he eventually came to believe that, though he had not chosen the priesthood, he was chosen for it.

Father Ford wrote at this end of his Epilogue: "Those who knew Father Ralph best, those who knew him when he was sick and when he was well, those who saw at first hand the evidence of his devotion to the cause of Christ, and to the sick alcoholic in whom he always saw Christ -- and this despite the severest trials that depression can inflict -- are the only ones who have a right to estimate the accomplishments of his life's work. Fortunately these accomplishments live on in the organization he founded and in the countless lives of those who found sobriety and peace, under God, through Ralph Pfau.

"May his courageous soul rest in peace."

At our AA History Conference, held here in Phoenix, Feb 21 - 23, "Smitty" was one of our speakers.

And, yes, he did mention that royalties had been paid to him as a member of Dr.Bob's family.

Hope that answers at least a part of your question. :-)

The royalty agreements for proceeds from the Big Book were negotiated by the Alcoholic Foundation Board through Works Publishing, Inc. in the early 1940s and were subsequently re-confirmed by the future General Service Boards and the acceptance of General Service Conferences.

Dr. Bob declined any royalties, period. The Rockefeller dinner contribution of 1941 paid off his mortgage, his proctology practice did regain clients in the 1940s, and he and his family (by then, just he and Anne) were able to live comfortably in Akron.

Bill, on the other hand, while being the major author of the Big Book and the most active traveler for the A.F. Board and AA as a whole, rightly received royalties that he could survive on...That survival was not made of riches, either.

I recall a story of his visit to Seattle in the mid-1940s where the AA members there took up a collection to get him a decent suit, so much was threadbare. Even the many furnishings in the home at Stepping Stones were handed down from Lois' family---while picking up and looking at a few of the silver-plate items there today, I noticed price tags that could have come from garage sales!

The Wilsons did not live extravagantly, even as the Bedford Hills region is now an enclave of well-to-do Americans.

Bill provided full disclosure of his finances whenever or not they were in question, including reports to each Conference after 1951.

Ironically, it was only after his death that larger amounts of royalty proceeds went to Lois. The royalty agreements included a percentage from all of Bill's books (including the initial agreement with the Big Book). I don't know the percentage, but it may have been 10% at maximum. That means that 35 cents came from Big Book sales, 25 cents from 12 & 12 sales, etc.

The royalty agreement was negotiated only with Bill.

What's called a "Codicil" to a Will, a revision, further distributed whatever sub-percentage of royalty amounts, specified by Bill, to his relatives and others: Lois, his mother, his sister, any nieces and nephews, his secretary Nell Wing, and so on. Nell Wing may have gotten the last small percentage of the original Codicil amount from Bill's estate, along with a very few distant nieces or nephews that received an even smaller amount.

Lois outlived Bill by seventeen years and was provided royalties to her own estate for ten years past her death, subject to the original royalty agreements, and by 1998 all the royalty commitments were basically fulfilled. Nell Wing is still alive and in a nursing home, and there may be a distant niece or nephew that might receive a very small stipend today, and that's all the royalties that are distributed today---they most likely come from Lois' estate and Will.

Interestingly enough, Lois once offered to decline all royalties for contribution back into the AAWS General Fund and it was declined by the Conference. The major amounts of Lois' royalties were placed in the Stepping Stones Foundation as an endowment for the property---again, their receipt ended in 1998, ten years after her death.

There are no royalties from the Big Book or any other AA literature distributed today, in accordance with Bill's estate and Will and its Codicil changes.

All monies from AA literature, over expenses, go directly into the AAWS General Fund.

Dr. Bob's own personal First Printing First Edition Big Book was offered by his son, Smitty, to the AAWS Archives (GSO Archives) for a certain amount of money, and perhaps it assisted putting his own children through school, helped buy a house, etc.

Sue Windows, his daughter, sold family items (golf clubs, letters, house items) to the Chester Kirk Foundation at Brown University in Rhode Island a few years before her death, and the amount she received would have allowed her to live comfortably.

Unfortunately, Bill, the speaker you heard is promoting a half-truth and is contributing to a mythology that those of us in AA Archives service attempt to dispel. Today, there's almost no one living to receive any royalties, and the royalties actually ceased in their distribution five years ago.

Yours in the Fellowship,

p.s. there was once a folder on an AA website that printed an "edited" version of Bill's Royalty Agreement with Works Publishing, A.A. Publishing, and A.A. World Services, Inc. The same site had another folder with an "edited" version of his Last Will & Testament (along with the Codicil to the Will). Many AAs contacted the webmasters of the site and requested that it got removed, and it's no longer posted on the World Wide Web anymore.

Perhaps it's personal family business that none of us will ever need to know---I certainly view that as true.

A.A. Archives and A.A. History anonymity surely includes confidentiality and a certain sensitivity that is a part of our ethics. Just like the phrase in Step Nine, "except when to do so would injure them or others." And as in Tradition Ten, of issues outside of A.A..

Hope this helps answer your question. ---R.T.

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Royalties

The Speaker at a meeting I attended last week said, Dr. Bob's and Bill W.'s families still receive royalties for the 'Big Book' . . . Does anyone know if this is true and if so, how much they get ? . . . Thanks in advance . . .

voice gasps, "I can't walk." We try to help the man to his feet but he collapses. Delahanty goes to the call box.

The ambulance arrives quickly, and within 11 minutes the man is in the accident ward of Boston City Hospital, one of the three largest municipal hospitals in the country. Dr. Maurice Constantin, an intern, gives the man a quick examination. He has to decide whether this is just an ordinary drinker who has been celebrating, or a man suffering from one of the serious mental and physical illnesses which result from alcoholism. If he has one of these illnesses, he will be treated with the same consideration and expert care that he would get if he had heart trouble or double pneumonia. For alcoholism, is a disease, and it is sternly regarded as such by everyone at Boston City, from Dr. John F. Conlin, superintendent, down to the newest intern.

The warmth of the accident room revives the man; he is more responsive now; he says that his name is Dennis O'Toole. (the names of all patients in this article are disguised) Dr. Constantin applies a stethoscope to the patient's chest, takes his pulse and strips his trousers off. He frowns when he sees that both legs are badly swollen up to the thighs. He feels the soft flesh just below the right rib cage, finds that the edge of the man's liver can be felt three finger-breaths below the last rib. This enlargement is strongly suggestive of a fatty or badly scarred liver. Obviously, Dennis O'Toole is not an occasional drinker; he is a really sick man.

Constantin learns that this is O'Toole's eight visit to Boston City, that he had been drinking hard for months, has eaten little during this period. O'Toole answers all questions rationally enough, but his out-stretched hands are tremulous, and his breath comes in labored gasps. Constantin notes particularly his eyes: they can be made to deviate only slightly from center. He suspects at once that, no matter what else is wrong with O'Toole, he is suffering from Wernicke's disease, a disorder of the nervous system.

Carl Wernicke brought this disease to the attention of the medical profession in 1881. Today it is routine for a receiving intern to examine a possible alcoholic patient for its presence. Wernick's disease is caused chiefly by a lack of thiamine (vitamin B1). If not caught early, irreparable damage to the brain may occur; if not treated adequately, death may result. Two other things about O'Toole indicate vitamin deficiency: his tongue is smooth and red; his skin is dry and hangs loosely.

The intern rapidly records his preliminary diagnosis to guide the doctors on the wards: "Chronic alcoholic; possible Laennec's cirrhosis; rales, lower right lung field; peripheral edema; Wernicke's disease."

"Get him up to Medical Three," he tells an orderly. "Stop on the way for chest X ray."

There is no alcoholic ward at Boston City. Dr. Conlin and his staff feel that confinement in such a ward puts a psychological burden on a sensitive patient. So Dennis O'Toole is wheeled into Medical Three.

Dr. Brendan M. Fox, the intern on duty, takes blood, urine and sputum specimens, and verifies Dr. Constantin's findings. Now he tests O'Toole for the serious and tragically common mental component of Wernicke's disease: Korsakoff's psychosis, named for Sergei Korsakoff, one of Russia's most brilliant psychiatrists, who discovered it in 1889.

The disease takes the form, mainly, of loss of memory, particularly for recent events. Seen almost exclusively in alcoholics, its primary cause is likewise nutritional deficiency. Often, by the time it manifests itself, damage to the brain is so great that the patient is committed to a mental institution as incurable.

O'Toole is fortunate. Unlike nine out of ten patients with Wernicke's disease, he is lucid.

Now Dr. Fox helps O'Toole to his feet and asks him to walk across the room. O'Toole walks like a man on stilts, his feet far apart. Fox notes the word "ataxia" - inability to coordinate voluntary muscular movements - on the chart. Then he gives his patient an injection of chlorpromazine, a tranquilizing drug, and puts him to bed.

O'Toole falls into a deep sleep. Fox orders intravenous feeding of thiamine, plus liquids low in salt content (in case of any serious heart ailment).

Dennis O'Toole, 42, unemployed, was getting the kind of attention that many could not afford. To the staff of Boston City he was not a drunken derelict but a very ill patient whom it was their duty to help.

Eight days later I sat with Dennis O'Toole in a ten-bed ward. He proudly showed me his completely normal legs. I told him how a number of doctors had studied his case, and of the various (and expensive) drugs which had kept him alive.

"They take pretty good care of you at that," he said complacently.

I asked O'Toole how much he drank. He evaded the question by saying he was just a social drinker - which is the stock answer I received from dozens of alcoholics. Sure, he drank every day, he said, but you couldn't really call him an alcoholic.

How much whiskey did he drink each day? A pint?

"A pint!" he exploded. "Mister, when I'm drinkin', I spill more than a pint a day."

Now that O'Toole is in fairly good physical condition, the staff concerns itself with his rehabilitation. A psychiatrist visits him daily and tries to gain his confidence. But O'Toole has talked with psychiatrists before; he listens with apparent sympathy but with little understanding.

Father Laurence M. Brock, S.J., for ten years chaplain of Boston City, visits O'Toole every day, and the patient obviously likes the big, rugged priest. O'Toole even drops in to the beautiful little chapel on the ground floor to hear Mass. But when you ask the priest if he has made any progress, he shakes his head sadly.

"I never ask a man to sign the pledge that he will never drink or even that he won't take a drink for six months or a year," he says. "I find that the pledge works only when the patient asks to take it. Very, very few of the Dennis O'Tooles ever make it. I phoned Alcoholics Anonymous and they sent a man to see him. He promised to attend a few of their meetings. I doubt he will. The rehabilitation of an alcoholic has to come from within.

"We have about 2000 beds here at the hospital. If it weren't for alcohol, we could get along with a lot fewer. Go over the accident cases; a great many are the result of drinking. And far too many other patients are here because alcohol made them susceptible to disease."

Before Dennis O'Toole is discharged, Resident Dr. Stanley M. Silverberg has a long talk with him. He pleads with him to return to visit Dr. Iver Ravin's out-patient clinic for alcoholics. He tells O'Toole of the drug called Antabuse, designed to help him overcome his alcoholic habits. A pill is taken each morning, and if the patient then takes a drink, he is overcome by violent nausea.

"Doc, I don't need any of them gimmicks to stay sober," O'Toole says earnestly. "I don't need no head doctor nor no priest or A.A. guy holding my hand. I got will power!"

And so Dennis O'Toole leaves Boston City Hospital. The institution has done everything humanly possible to help him. But it can't make him help himself. Even the most skilled experts in medical, psychiatric and spiritual counseling cannot make O'Toole admit that he has no control over alcohol. He is a chronic alcoholic who refuses to believe that he is slowly committing suicide.

One cannot say that Dennis O'Toole is a typical alcoholic, for there is no typical victim of this disease. Nor does the scourge stalk only the Skid Rows of the big cities. Less than 15 per cent of our four and a half million alcoholics dwell in the Dover Streets and Boweries of the land.

If nature exacts its usual inexorable toll, a tall, good-looking man of about 50 who is registered at Boston City under the name of Peter Slocum will be either dead or buried alive in a mental hospital within a short time. Slocum was found stumbling across Boston Common talking incoherently. Reasonably well-dressed with money in his pocket, he might just have had one too many. But the intern on duty at Boston City needed only a few minutes to make the diagnosis: Korsakoff's psychosis, in an advanced stage.

A few days after Slocum was admitted, a man came to the hospital in search of a missing brother. He found that the man registered as Peter Slocum was indeed his brother. He told me his alcoholic history and allowed me to visit with him.

Slocum had been an alcoholic for 20 years, and had taken a dozen "cures" at private institutions. During most of this time he had held a good job as a sales director, but now he had come to the end of the road. I spent considerable time with him but he never remembered me from one visit to the next. One time the doctor with me asked, "Do you know where you are Peter?"

"At my sister's home in Malden," Slocum said in a soft, gentle voice. (Contrary to general opinion, few alcoholics are violent. Chaplain Brock refers to them as "the gentle people.")

"He has no sister, nor any relatives in Malden," the doctor said to me. We talked with Slocum for an hour, but it was impossible to establish any real communication.

Dr. Kermit H. Katz, visiting physician who is chief of the 5th and 6th Medical Services at the hospital, had investigated Slocum's history thoroughly. "He was always good at his job," Dr. Katz explained. "He was the man who took clients out when they came to Boston. He'd drink with them at lunch and then drink with another group at dinner. He did this for years, until finally there came a time when he didn't merely want a drink - he needed a drink. He never really liked the taste of alcohol, but to keep going he had to have a few eye-openers in the morning. Then came the final step: he had to drink constantly.

"He'd go away and get straightened out temporarily, but he always had to return to the bottle. Now? We've tried everything science has taught us. But I can't see any hope. There is too much organic damage. I wish that those who could still rehabilitate themselves could see Peter Slocum today."

Certainly the example of Slocum is a sobering one. Even more sobering is the experience of listening to a patient in the grip of delirium tremens, the final stage of prolonged alcoholism. Come with me to a private room in the 5th Medical Service at Boston City.

Mrs. Rogers, age 36, once an attractive brunette, is the patient. When I saw her she had been in delirium tremens for five days. Usually the symptoms abate within 72 hours. She lay in bed "in restraint" - her wrists and legs attached by cuffs to the side of the bed, but loosely enough to permit some movement.

Her husband had brought her to the hospital in a state of coma after she had suffered an alcoholic epileptic seizure. She made a partial recovery from the seizure and then had slipped into delirium tremens. She had been a heavy drinker for 12 years. Her husband said that she drank beer steadily each morning and then shifted to wine in the afternoon. He himself was a moderate drinker. Their home? The husband had finally sent their two children to relatives. He had only a deep and gentle pity for the woman who had been his wife for 17 years. She was being given oxygen through a nasal tube. Glucose, water and vitamins were being injected intravenously.

Her eyes were wide open, and she was carrying on an animated conversation, all of it meaningless. When the doctor pointed to me and asked, "Mrs. Rogers, do you know this man?" she said in what appeared to be a normal voice, "Yes, that's my brother Steve. Where is Anne? Oh, here she is"-a white clad nurse had entered the room. "I like your brown hat, Anne, but it doesn't go with that plaid skirt Steve, the water is running. Turn it off, Steve. Make him turn it off, Anne - it's up to your ankles. Now it's up to your waist. You stay here if you want - I'm going to the kitchen."

The doctor said, "I've turned it off, Mrs. Rogers. It's all right." The patient seemed reassured. But in a few moments she was babbling something equally fantastic. When we left, she was talking animatedly about a little dog she believed to be in bed with her. Twenty-four hours later Mrs. Rogers stopped talking forever.

SOMEWHERE in Boston today there is a girl named Therese, working as a waitress. She came to Boston City in an alcoholic coma, more dead than alive; the whole resources of the hospital were regimented in an effort to save her. She was in such grave condition that she was given a private room, and during her first two weeks a nurse was with her 24 hours a day.

Some of the drugs given Therese during the three months of her hospitalization were: penicillin, paraldehyde, chloral hydrate, an extract of rauwolfia, chlorpromazine, thiamine, codeine, sulfisoxazole (a sulfa drug) and tetracycline (an antibiotic). She had two electro-cardiograms, two chest and kidney X- rays, ten urinalyses, 11 blood counts, a Papanicolaou smear test (for vaginal cancer) and several blood cultures.

She was taken to the operating room on two occasions, at which time she received the most modern (and expensive) anesthesia, and had a complete gynecological survey. A sternal puncture was done, and the marrow was cultured for bacteria. The state of her liver was assessed by performing a liver biopsy (removal of a small portion of the organ for microscopic examination). Visiting physicians held half a dozen conferences to determine the best way to treat her various physical and mental ills.

I studied the complete medical and surgical record of Therese's three-month stay in the hospital. Included were reports from eight internists, one gynecologist, two pathologists, one general surgeon, five laboratory and X-ray technicians, one heart specialist, two neurolog-ists and a specialist in lung disease. Therese finally walked out of the hospital in fairly good health.

What did her treatment cost the taxpayers of Boston?

Dr. Katz looked puzzled when I asked him that question, for at Boston City great importance is placed upon the life of a patient but much less on the cost of preserving that life. However, Dr. Katz went through the file and estimated that the cost to a paying patient in a private hospital for the drugs, laboratory tests, medical, surgical and nursing attention that Therese had received would have been at least $5000. (It might be noted that Katz and 500 other visiting doctors and psychiatrists give their skill and time to Boston City patients with no recompense at all.)

The budget at Boston City is 16 million dollars a year. When you ask Dr. Conlin how much of that is consumed in the care of alcoholics, he smiles, "Does it matter? They are just as sick as men and women who come here with meningitis or cancer and, as you've seen, they are treated the same. Happily, both the profession and the public are finally beginning to realize that alcoholism is a disease and not a form of adult delinquency."

What can be done for the advanced alcoholic?

Alcoholics Anonymous, which has an active membership of about 150,000, is still, doctors believe, the most impotent of all forces for rehabilitating the alcoholic. But Boston keeps trying to find other, even better answers. It is an uphill fight.

Far out in Boston Harbor is a small island connected with the mainland by a causeway. This is the home of the Long Island Hospital (part of Boston City), an institution for sufferers of chronic diseases. Chronic alcoholics, of course, make up only a portion of the hospital's patients, but it is a discouraging portion. For despite the heroic efforts being put forth, the number who can be classified as "cured" is so low as to be frightening.

Dr. David Myerson, the hospital's psychiatrist, recently completed a three-year study of 101 alcoholics here. Fifty percent had attended high school. And some of these had once held good jobs in business or industry. Virtually all had lost all family relationships, and for them had substituted the illusionary companionship found in local taverns.

Each patient had entered Long Island voluntarily, with an avowed desire to

for Love

Five million Americans—many of them once sober-responsible citizens—are today confirmed alcoholics. Why have they sacrificed happiness for the tragic life of a compulsive drinker? Here, in a remarkably frank report, are some reasons that may surprise you.

BY FARRELL AND WILBUR CROSS

"I don't remember the exact time or place that I finally admitted to myself that I was a problem drinker, an alcoholic, a drunk. The realization just grew and grew until, finally, it overwhelmed me—like a big breaker that rolls in relentlessly when your swimming at an ocean beach."

Arthur Johnson (all names used in this article are fictitious; the situations are real) was thirty-seven. He'd been drinking since college days, like most of his friends, in a social way. Occasionally, he had really "tied one on" and become high, if not outright drunk, at a big party or a sales convention. Only in the last two years had the drinking started to follow a recognizable pattern.

"It got so that I would look forward to weekends, not because my wife and I had anything special planned or because I would be with my two sons, eight and ten, but because there would be some excuse for having drinks. WE could always invite some neighbors in for highballs. Or, if my wife didn't feel sociable, I'd go off bowling—just so I could have drinks with the boys afterwards. It wasn't that I liked whisky or even the glow of warmth that most people feel after a cocktail. It was that there was something missing if I didn't start injecting my system with alcohol."

Johnson soon found that his alcoholic hunger was extending over into weekdays too. As a sales executive, he had many opportunities for taking customers out to lunch. Soon he was doing this every day, along with frequent stop-offs for drinks at bars in the late afternoons, after leaving the office.

"Most of the time, I wouldn't get home until two or three in the morning. My relationships with my wife and kids got pretty rough. I kept making promises. And sometimes I'd keep them for several weeks. I found that I could resist that inner compulsion as long as I stayed on the wagon. No drinks at all. But then I'd get annoyed at myself and almost deliberately set out to prove to myself I could have two drinks—no more."

Triggering a Chain Reaction

Johnson found that it did not work. Once he downed a single drink, something in his system was triggered off, and he had to keep right on until he was drunk. He began to have blackouts, waking up with piercing hang-overs, and not being able to remember where he had been the night before.

"It really hit me when my wife packed up and left with the two boys. I arrived home in an alcoholic haze, long after dawn one day. I had no idea where I'd been. My clothing was all wrinkled and stinking of whisky. I had a big bruise on my cheekbone. The house was empty. There wasn't even a note."

Arthur Johnson tried to do something in the face of this new crisis. He cried. He made deep resolutions. He decided to call his wife-not to plead with her to come home again, but to tell her she was right in leaving. To tell her that he was going to straighten out now, to get a new job, to give up drinking, to become a proper husband and father. He started to reach for the phone again and again, the message composed on his lips. But it was too hard. One drink would help him get over the shakes. He remembered where he had part of a pint hidden down in the cellar. As he stumbled down the back stairs he walked right back into the problem, with no end in sight but another blackout, and another.

Jane Byers took the same kind of downhill slide, But on a different route. A housewife, thirty-five, with a six-year-old daughter and an eight year old son, she had never done any drinking at all until after the birth of the second child. Then, for two or three years, her drinking was extremely light. She disliked the taste of liquor, in fact, and was often kidded because she "ruined" good whisky by mixing it with fruit juice or other concoctions to hide the taste.

Driven by Domestic Tensions

"My drinking problems really started just after my husband was transferred and we moved into a brand-new community," she later recalled. "I had always been a very careful housekeeper, but now I wanted everything just right, to let the neighbors see us in our best light. It got so that I was forever screaming at the children or nagging my husband. Whenever neighbors stopped by, it was sure to be at a time when the children had just tracked mud into the hall or had let the dog get hairs all over the new couch, or there would be clothes strewn all over the place."

Jane found, however, that there was one escape from this burning fear that the neighbors would get a bad impression: A big gulp of sherry would calm her nerves. "Then I found that a second gulp would give me a kind of rosy feeling that my visitors were very impressed with my home. It wasn't long before the 'sherry treatment' was solving all my problems. Within a year or so, I had reached the stage where I was drunk several days a week. I had switched to vodka, so that my husband would smell no liquor on my breath. And if I was too tipsy to get dinner, I'd just crawl into bed before he came home and say that I had a terrible headache. By this time, however, he knew what was going on. I had to hide bottles all over the house. I was using up all the money I could get-part of the food money, refunds on clothing I sent back to department stores, things I could sell at a local secondhand store."

By this time, Jane and her husband were having bitter arguments, night after night, sometimes until almost dawn. "He wanted me to join A.A. But I kept promising, pleading, saying that I'd come around and I wasn't 'that far gone' that I had to join a group of alcoholics.

Jane is still on the way down. Not long ago, she almost set fire to the house. Her husband is afraid to leave her alone with the children when he goes to work. He talked her into going to a psychiatrist, but she stubbornly clings to the idea that she isn't "far enough gone to join AA" or any other group. For her, as with most alcoholics, there is a "rock bottom," a point at which she will give up and admit defeat. How far down her own low point lies is impossible to predict.

More Than a Social Problem

Why should it be that two people like Arthur Johnson and Jane Byers, apparently intelligent people, both with good families and from well-educated back grounds, would seek escape through alcohol? Their cases are neither new nor uncommon. Of the 75,000,000 people in the United States who are "social drinkers," some 5,000,000 are alcoholics. Each year, about 200,000 more are added to the growing list of those who cannot handle alcohol in any form: cocktails, highballs, wine, beer-or even cough medicine. Alcoholism is holding fourth place in the list of top health problems in the country. It ranks only behind mental health, heart disease, and cancer as a destroyer of mankind.

"Alcoholism," says Dr. Marvin Block, Chairman of the American Medical Association's Committee on Alcoholism, "is an attempt to escape reality by the use of a socially accepted drug."

The word "escape" is important. We all need some form of escape from daily living, from time to time. We take our escapes in the forms of vacation, travel, dining out, music, or sleep-to name a few methods. For some people, escape becomes compulsive and may end up in extreme forms, such as gorging on candy, taking dope, having incessant sexual cravings. This is what happens to the problem drinker. "The one trait that potential alcoholics have in common," says Dwight Anderson in his book, Other Side of the Bottle, "is a maladjustment towards life. Usually they have let one element of their personality get so out of hand that it is distorted out of all proportion to reality.

He Drank to Fight Hunger

Arthur Johnson's maladjustment was an incessant, though unrecognized, hunger for love. His mother had died when he was quite young; his father had been a brilliant, but dispassionate, professor who never evidenced much affection;

he had disliked his only brother; and when he was married, he selected a girl more because he was "impressed" with her looks and background than because he felt any urgent love for her. Sociologists William and Joan McCord stated, last year, in a report on origins of alcoholism, that "the typical alcoholic is unsure of receiving love from other people; he may also be very unsure of how to give love. The result might often be hesitation to make affectionate overtures to his family."

When this hunger becomes too much to bear, the alcoholic turns, progressively, to alcohol. When alcoholism has taken over fully, it completely blocks out all other forces—love, sex, success drive, desire for food.

Jane Byers, married to a man whom she felt did not understand her, had this same love hunger, though it was revealed in a different form. At first, Jane was what has been called a "dry alcoholic." Her form of excess was her perfectionism. She had to see everything right in its place in her home. When the children were young, this had been easy. But as they became older, she could no longer confine them to the nursery. They were constantly scratching furniture, moving carefully placed ash trays, rumpling up the beds, streaking her new carpeting with dirt. At that point, Jane began her new era—"wet alcoholism."

Is the alcoholic then a type? Not exactly. Since the causes of alcoholism are not fully known, experts do not always agree on who is, or is not, a potential problem drinker. It is only after the drinking has started to follow a pattern (the pattern itself is similar and recognizable) that the finger points to the alcoholic. But alcoholics do seem to have many tendencies in common. Most authorities seem to agree that they have in their make-up some deep-seated need (such as "love-hunger"), some compulsive trait (such as acute perfectionism), or some deficiency (such as extreme sensitivity or shyness). Escape to the bottle neutralizes the problem for them, at least temporarily.

Of all the methods of escape from life—from problems, hardships, labors, personality conflicts, environment, personal fears and inadequacies—alcohol ranks among the oldest. It is referred to in various forms in the earliest historical records. Anthropologists have found evidence that some kind of intoxicating drink was known as far back as the Stone Age. Ancient stills have been found in such widely separated lands as Peru, Tibet, Tahiti, and India. Some three thousand years ago, the inhabitants of Ceylon were drinking toddy and arrack, and before that the Chinese were happily escaping the toils of life via alcoholic beverages known as tchoo and sautchoo. Japanese sake goes far back in that country's history. Mesopotamian history contains accounts of drunkenness, as does many a detailed hieroglyphic from ancient Egypt.

In the United States, the history of alcohol is erratic. It was banned by many of the early settlers, but used by others for trading with the Indians. The first real distillery in America was set up around 1640 by one William Kieft, a Dutchman, on Staten Island, New York. A rum distillery was established in Boston in the 1650's. Before this, rum was imported from the West Indies.

The attitude towards drunkenness has always been that it represents outwardly in inward disintegration of spirit, morals, and intellect. Around 300 B.C., Diogenes referred to drunkenness as "an expression identical with ruin." The Old Testament states that "the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty." The pages of literature of all nations are well salted with inebriated characters who represent varying degrees of social and mental decay—all the way from utter fools to wicked monsters who tortured their wives and beat their children.

Danger Noted.and Ignored

Few men, however, looked with any sympathy at all on the drunkard. When Edinburgh physician Thomas Trotter wrote about alcoholism in 1778, he was way ahead of his time in stating, "In medical language, I consider drunkenness, strictly speaking, to be a disease produced by a remote causeA disease of the mind." Although Dr. Trotter's book received considerable acclaim, its message did not gain wide public acceptance.

By the middle of the nineteenth century, alcohol itself was becoming the target of various groups, ranging from mild dissenters to angry fanatics. One of the most dramatic evidences of the attitude towards alcohol in the United States was the antisaloon war waged by a group of determined women in Ohio in January 1874. The crusaders paraded through the streets, blocked the entrances to saloons (which they referred to by such names as "Hell's Half Acre," "Certain Death," and "Devils Den), and smashed bottles and kegs in the gutter. One group commandeered a locomotive and stationed it so that the brilliant headlight shone on a saloon near the tracks, where any patron who dared to enter was caught like a moth in a flame. Another group organized 40 little girls from a private school into a platoon. Each afternoon, the girls were led to selected positions in front of the town's saloons, where they repeated a shrill and dismal chorus which began, "Say, Mr. Barkeeper, has father been here?"

The result of this publicity was that saloonkeepers closed shop and quit by the dozens. Spurred on by these methods, and their success, other women rallied together to form the famed WCTU (Woman's Christian Temperance Union) and the various Antisaloon Leagues. Many of the women were fanatical to the point where they were a more disruptive force than the so-called drunkards they were attacking. In his book, Other Side of the Bottle, Dwight Anderson wrote that one of the most noted temperance leaders "had the temperament that would have led inevitably to alcoholism if she had drank at all."

"Dry Drunkenness"

This kind of excess (sometimes referred to as "dry drunkenness") is seldom seen today. Many religious faiths either disapprove of, or forbid, the drinking of any form of alcoholic beverage—notably Christian Scientists, Quakers, Mormons, Seventh-Day Adventists, and Jehovah's Witnesses. However, they do not try to force their viewpoint on others. We seldom see any devastating crusades against liquor like those waged during the late nineteenth century, and again right after World War I, when the era of Prohibition was launched. But, the kind of warfare waged against the alcoholic today is more long lasting in its effect than any hatchet ever wielded by a member of the Antisaloon League.

Public opinion and the shocked attitude of misinformed people sometimes make it impossible for spouses and families of alcoholics to do anything except try to cover up the drinking problem and hide it from the neighbors. It is the reason why the wife and husband, respectively, of Arthur Johnson and Jane Byers went through their own personal hells while trying to find a solution for the alcoholics they had married. It is the reason why many an alcoholic goes down and down to absolute rock bottom in his drinking before he can finally face his problem squarely.

Mrs. Marty Mann, whose New Primer on Alcoholism is one of the most widely recognized books on the subject, says that when the National Council on Alcoholism was founded in 1944, it began "in an atmosphere of almost total darkness. The word `alcoholism' was a taboo word. The public attitude was compounded of ignorance, fear, prejudice, and hostility; and the public attitude included many professional attitudes as well. The `drunkard' was considered hopeless, and wholly to blame for his condition."

That was only seventeen years ago. More advances have taken place since then than during the previous one hundred years, in the study and treatment of alcoholism, but there are still vast areas to cover. Mrs. Mann, executive director of NCA, says that even though alcoholism is recognized as the fourth major health problem in the United States, the funds devoted to the study and towards educating the public are still less than one one-hundredth the amount devoted to cancer or heart disease.

"One of our most important jobs," she says, "is orientation-telling people exactly what alcoholism is, why it should be accepted as a serious illness rather than as an evidence of immorality or weakness of character."

NCA and its affiliates have conducted some interesting tests, which prove the value of educating the public. Though these are not comprehensive or conclusive, they do point up some important facts. During Alcoholism Information Week, NCA affiliates throughout the country interview people-on the street, in stores, or wherever feasible-to see what a town's attitude seems to be about alcoholism. There are frequent references to drinkers as

"bums" or "degenerates" or "people with no sense of responsibility."

After a week or so of intensive educational work with local civic, health, and church groups, interviews are again conducted. The change in attitude has, in most cases, been astonishing. "Almost overnight, people in the community come to realize," Mrs. Mann says, "that the problem drinkers needed as much sympathy and help as a patient with heart trouble or cancer or any one of the other major diseases."

"No Group Is Immune"

Because problem drinking has been veiled for so long in secrecy and shame, certain myths have developed. One is that some occupations breed inebriates ("He always has three Martinis for lunch—that's because he's in advertising."). Another myth is that alcoholism hits certain income groups more heavily than others, such as rich playboys or common laborers.

Jack "Stewart," a long time member of Alcoholics Anonymous, who daily comes into contact with active and recovered alcoholics, told us that alcohol is no respecter of race, class, or occupational group. No group is immune. "Among the alcoholics I know," he said, "Are a religious leader, a truck driver, a college professor, a banker, an old maid, an Army officer, a housewife with four children, a carpenter, a millionaire—almost any kind of person you want to mention."

"Many different types of personalities are capable of becoming addicted to alcohol," says Dr. Ruth Fox, Medical Director of the National Council on Alcoholism. "When tested after their addiction, however, they show a surprising similarity of character traits. Some of these are: an extremely low frustration tolerance, inability to endure anxiety or tension, feelings of isolation, devalued self-esteem, a tendency to act impulsively, a repetitive 'acting out' of conflicts, often an extreme narcissism and exhibitionism, a tendency towards self-punitive behavior, sometimes somatic preoccupation and hypochondriasis. In addition, there is usually, consciously or unconsciously, marked hostility and rebellion."

Although it would be impossible for an observer to recognize an alcoholic before his drinking becomes a problem, there are certain well-marked steps. These have been listed by the Yale Center of Alcohol Studies as follows:

Early Stage:

- 1) Abnormal drinking behavior, not always in regard to quantity, but typified by attitude or actions.
- 2) Blackouts—losses of memory about events of the night before.
- 3) Sneaking and gulping drinks.

4) Chronic hang-overs, increasingly severe and painful.

Middle Stages:

5) Loss of control. Unable to "take it or leave it alone."

6) Alibis, with plenty of excuses for why a drink is needed.

7) "Eye openers"-drinks in the morning as hang-over cures.

8) Changing the pattern-trying beer or wine instead of whisky, but not for long.

9) Solitary drinking, and other antisocial behavior.

10) Loss of Job and friends.

11) Seeking medical aid for drinking.

Late Stage:

12) Benders-drunks lasting several days.

13) Shakes and tremors.

14) The bottle-hiding stage, protecting the needed supply.

15) Resentments and other unreasonable dislikes.

16) Nameless fears and anxieties.

17) Complete collapse of the alibi system. No more excuses are possible.

18) The surrender process-giving self over to someone else for help.

As the alcoholic progresses, his family-frantically trying to halt his downward slide-often takes completely wrong steps. Threats, pleas, pouring drinks down the drain are of no use and frequently serve to complicate the problem. Alcoholics need great love and understanding-even though, paradoxically, their drinking is known as a "strangler of love." Wives and husbands of alcoholics can learn best what to do about their problem by getting in touch with the nearest branch of a group called Al-Anon, made up of nonalcoholic relatives or friends of problem drinkers.

It is usually a long, difficult pull. The alcoholic cannot expect recovery until he faces one fact: the only cure for alcoholism is to give up drinking entirely!

This represents a complete cure, in the sense that the alcoholic can return to a normal life. But it is not a cure in the sense of destroying whatever the unknown element is that causes alcoholism. Periodically, claims are made that some new scientific method or drug has been developed that will permit alcoholics to become normal, social drinkers. So far, these claims have not been valid. There are, it is true, drugs like Antabuse which are used in the treatment of alcoholism. But these are only to help a drinker stay away from alcohol while undergoing treatment. And they should be taken only on the advice of a medical doctor.

For the past few years, the fight against alcoholism has received a tremendous boost from a few large companies which have been willing to stick their necks out and say, "We recognize that from 3 to 6 per cent of our employees have serious drinking problems, and we are doing something about it."

Recognition by Industry

Several notable examples are DuPont, Allis-Chalmers, General Motors, Eastman Kodak, Con Edison, Standard Oil, and the New York Telephone Company. Other companies are reluctant to face the problem—particularly some in the transportation field, who blanch at the idea of having the public know that there could be such a thing as an alcoholic pilot or railroad engineer or bus driver. (The New York Transit Authority, which does have such a program, is one of the notable exceptions.)

By and large, companies have found that there are three types of plans feasible for rehabilitating problem drinkers:

1) The community-oriented plan.

The problem drinker, after reporting to the company medical department, is referred to the local Alcoholism Information Center or clinic. These facilities are completely separated from—though may be partly supported by—the company. He then receives counseling and referral to AA, medical or psychiatric treatment, as indicated.

2) The Alcoholics Anonymous plan. Here the problem drinker is first referred to the medical department for a complete physical checkup. After hospitalization, if necessary, he is turned over to members of AA, who urge attendance at several meetings. The man's participation is purely voluntary, but since he has his company behind him, he is more likely to take action than if the suggestion came from either an outsider or a relative whose urgings might strike "too close to home."

3) The company-integrated plan. This works best with a large organization having many facilities at its disposal, not only medical, but recreational, legal, counseling, ties with community hospitals, loan services, rest homes, and other resources. Had Arthur Johnson belonged to such an organization, his drinking problem would have been recognized earlier; he would then have realized that others had the same troubles, that it was an illness that he could not fight alone. He could have been helped more easily.

The "False Bottom"

Not all problem drinkers can be rehabilitated, but most companies with active programs report success in well over 50 per cent. Company plans have one strong advantage over family efforts to help a drinker. Many alcoholics are not ready to admit their problem until they have hit absolute rock bottom, when they find themselves in the gutter (literally), in danger of losing homes and family, or in such poor physical condition that the next real bout may kill him. Companies, however, can provide a "false bottom"-usually the threat of firing the drinker from his job. This has proved effective in a countless number of cases-particularly when the alcoholic is detected early, and when the chances for his recovery are best.

If you are concerned about your own drinking habits, check yourself by taking the test which appears on page 49. If a friend or a member of your family is a problem drinker, do not wait until the situation gets out of control. Visit, or write to, any one of the agencies listed above, right.

Even the children of an alcoholic parent can receive help, particularly through Alateen, a fast-mushrooming organization founded in 1957 by the teen-aged son of an alcoholic. Remember, above all, that love and understanding are needed in generous quantities. Though the alcoholic may be so gripped by his illness that his desire for the bottle has seemingly shoved aside all affection, responsibility, ambition, remember that, even more than ever, he needs the devotion and the help of his family-despite the many injuries and humiliations and hardships he may have inflicted on them.

Alcoholics Anonymous has a prayer, which is appropriate not only for problem drinkers but for families who have to share the problems:

"God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can and the wisdom to know the difference."

If you have no drinking problems whatsoever, the agencies that deal with alcoholics still have some sensible advice for you: enjoy your drink-whether it be beer, wine, or liquor-in moderation. Recognize that alcoholism is a disease, not a disgrace.

Barriers Still to Be Broken

"Since no problem will be solved until it is recognized," says Dr. Selden D. Bacon, one of the country's outstanding authorities on alcoholism, "It is essential to view the barriers of irritation and mistrust commonly met in introducing the problem. The first barrier is that of traditional concepts That alcoholics are weak-willed, morally disgraceful, and disgusting characters."

Above all, remember that there is just as much need for good taste and etiquette in serving alcoholic drinks to others as there is with any other social activity engaged in. "Don't force your guests to drink," pleads the American Medical Association. "It is important for a host or hostess to realize that a certain unknown percentage of guests face the problem of alcoholism, and these people should be able to mingle with other guests , without self-consciousness or embarrassment."

Passport to Nowhere

If you are fortunate enough to be numbered among the 70,000,000 or so "social drinkers" in the United States who have no drinking problems, then alcohol can be a socially acceptable means of escape from normal tensions. In small quantities, such as a daily highball or cocktail, it is occasionally even recommended for healthy, nonalcoholic people by their doctors.

"But you, as a nonalcoholic, have to remember," says AA member Jack "Stewart," that we problem drinkers cannot touch the stuff at all. Some of us are struggling heroically-particularly at the very start of abstinence-to avoid taking that first drink. Just one cocktail will set us off again, no matter how many years we have been on the wagon. For you, a drink is an escape to a world where we can never follow. For us, it's a passport to nowhere."

A Thorough, Practical Test

If you are worried about becoming a problem drinker, here is a test recommended by the National Council on Alcoholism, which will all but prove whether or not you are an alcoholic: For six months, stick to a certain number of drinks a day, not less than one and not more than three (standard, one-ounce size). If you are not a daily drinker, then confine the test to the days when you do drink (such as Friday, Saturday and Sunday). Under no conditions should you exceed the stated number, regardless of what kinds of special occasion arise. The NCA says that even a heavy drinker should have no trouble passing the test, but that "The chances are a hundred to one, however, against a true alcoholic's being either willing or able to undertake the test."

Are You a Potential Alcoholic?

Over the years, Alcoholics Anonymous, the National Council on Alcoholism, Inc., and other interested groups have prepared questionnaires to help a person decide whether he or she is a problem drinker. Here are some of the most important questions asked. How do you rate? ***

- 1) Is drinking making your home life unhappy?
- 2) Does drinking make you careless about family responsibilities?
- 3) Do you drink to escape from worries or troubles?
- 4) Do you drink because you are shy with other people?
- 5) Is drinking affecting your reputation in the community?
- 6) Is drinking lowering your efficiency in your daily work?
- 7) Do you crave a drink at definite times?
- 8) Do you want a drink "the morning after?"
- 9) Have you ever felt remorseful about drinking?
- 10) Do you have financial problems at home because of drinking?
- 11) Does drinking cause you to have difficulty sleeping?
- 12) Have you ever had a complete loss of memory because of drinking?
- 13) Do you drink alone?
- 14) Have your ambitions decreased because of drinking?
- 15) Do you have to make up excuses about drinking too much?

 If you answered just one or two questions yes, watch yourself carefully. If you answered three or more yes (or if you found and in the interest of propagating history, it shouldn't be slanted in one direction or the other (pejorative or idyllic).

The information that follows was gleaned from the following:

1. Grateful To Have Been There, Nell Wing (pg 92).
2. Pass It On, AAWS (pgs 235-236 and 393).
3. Dr. Bob and the God Oldtimers, AAWS (pgs 267-269).
4. Bill W., Francis Hartigan (pgs 118-120 and 153-154).
5. Lois Remembers, Lois Wilson (pg 199).
6. Advisory Actions of the General Service Conference of AA, publication # M-39

1938: Feb., prior to publication of the Big Book, Bill and Bob received a $30 weekly stipend from a $5,000 fund set up by J. D. Rockefeller, Jr. The bulk of the fund was used to pay off Dr. Bob's mortgage. Bill and Bob were in very severe financial straits.

1940: May, Dr. Bob and Anne were granted 10% royalties on Big Book sales for life. This was initiated by Bill as a condition of he and Hank P. turning over their 2/3 controlling interest of stock to Works Publishing Inc. (and the Alcoholic Foundation Board). Hank, who was drinking at the time, received a $200 payment for office furniture he claimed he owned. Bill was later granted 10% royalties. I can't find the specific date it started other than "shortly after" Dr. Bob received them.

1942: Oct., Cleveland's Clarence S. raised a controversy when he found out both Bill and Bob were receiving royalties from Big Book sales and he had a confrontation with Dr. Bob over it. Dr. Bob and the Good Oldtimers says "Dr. Bob's reluctance to accept the money faded under the impact of reality."

1947-1950 Dr. Bob had to cope with cancer and his wife's death. The circumstances would not be conducive to his earning a living. His son Smitty is quoted as saying that Dr. Bob's medical practice improved over World War II. However, between Anne's later infirmities and his own, there was likely substantial expenses as well.

Beginning in 1940, both founders were assigned 10% royalties on Big Book sales and they accepted them. It should not be viewed as a pejorative. Dr Bob's royalty assignment would have lapsed at his death (Nov. 16, 1950). Royalty payments to Bill later increased over time and were subsequently defined in a manner that automatically adjusted them to prevent against "cheap books", inflation and reduction of purchasing power. The matter of transferable royalties did not emerge until 1961 even though Bill negotiated a formal arrangement in 1958. Advisory actions of the General Service Conference show the progression of the royalty agreement:

a. The 1958 General Service Conference "approved the action of the General Service Board in re-assigning to Bill royalty rights in his three books [the Big Book, 12&12 and AA Comes of Age] and in books that he would write in the future, for the duration of the copyrights involved. [Note: later it came to also include As Bill Sees It - formerly The AA Way of Life].

b. The 1961 General Service Conference unanimously adopted a motion that "The Conference recognizes that the publication of cheap editions of AA Big Books would probably reduce the income to World Services, and Bill W's personal income. This Conference unanimously suggests the following to the Trustees: to add a rider to Bill's royalty contract to the effect that, if cheaper books are ever published, Bill's royalties be increased by an amount sufficient to keep the royalty income at the same average level it had been for the five years before cheaper books were published; (further, that) as time goes on, if inflation erodes the purchasing power of this income, the Trustees will adjust the royalties to produce the same approximate purchasing power; this to be effective during the lifetime of Bill and Lois and Bill's legatees."

c. The 1964 General Service Conference recommended that: "An agreement between Bill W., co-founder, and AAWS, Inc. covering royalties derived from Bill's writings be approved. - Under terms of the contract, a royalty of 15% is paid to Bill, except that no royalties are paid on "overseas editions." Royalties are to be paid to Bill and Lois, his wife, during their lifetimes; following the deaths of Bill and Lois, royalties revert in shares of royalties to living heirs. These shares revert to AAWS upon the deaths of the beneficiaries. Not more than 20% may be bequeathed to any heir under the age of 40 years as of the date of the agreement (April 29, 1963). The contract provides protection of royalties against "cheap books" and protection of AAWS and Bill against fluctuations in general economic conditions. AAWS retains the right of "first refusal" on any future literary works of Bill's."

In Bill W. (pg 120), Francis Hartigan states that the main beneficiary of the royalties was Lois (when she was in her 90's). She was prevented from returning any funds based on the AA Tradition of declining outside contributions. Given Hartigan's relationship to Lois, his reporting would seem authoritative and is substantiated by the probate records. Pass it On (pg 236) states "While this royalty was at first very modest, it eventually became substantial and provided both Bill and Lois a lifetime income." Again, this is not a pejorative. While there was a time when Bill and Lois were unable to purchase clothing and depended on others for a place to live, they eventually came to have a comfortable living and deservedly so.

Lois Wilson's' estate was probated. Records can be found on the web as images of the original probate court documents. They also include many of Bill's probate records as well. The following information is not considered "edited":

1. When Bill passed away (1971) his gross estate was nearly $219,000. His will originally specified legatees to whom he would pass life-interests if Lois did not survive him. The codicil extended authority to Lois to pass life-interests in royalties to her legatees (with age restrictions).

Regrettably (and somewhat awkwardly) the codicil also reduced Lois' overall royalty interests to 90% with the remaining 10% assigned to Bill's mistress, Helen W. [Harigan is rather open about this as are other authors].

2. When Lois passed away (1988) her gross estate was nearly 4 million dollars. Nell Wing was bequeathed Lois' jewelry and personal effects. All other tangible property was bequeathed to the Stepping Stones Foundation. Of the living legatees, Nell Wing was assigned a rather large share. Again, this is not a pejorative. She was dearly loved by both Lois and Bill.

3. For the 90% of royalties she could assign, Lois' legatees had to be living at the time of her death (Oct. 5, 1988). No more than 20% could be assigned to legatees under the age of 40 on April 29, 1963. Two legatees fell into this category - one born June 8, 1923 the other September 18, 1923. I do not know if they survive today. If living, they would be 79.

4. In a 1989 IRS ruling, the 80% portion that Lois had to assign to legatees over age 40 was excluded from the value of her estate. Two legatees in her probate documents were indicated as predeceased. The Stepping Stones Foundation received a rather large assignment of royalties for 10 years after Lois' death.

5. The 1972 General Service Conference voted unanimously that AA not accept the "Stepping Stones" property (the home of Bill and Lois) for any purpose. This is also noted in Not God (pg 267). No published advisory action could be found that declined an attempt by Lois to donate royalty revenues back to AA. This would appear to be a function of Tradition Seven.

Expiration of Royalties

Below is the expiration clause of the royalty arrangement between Bill and AAWS Inc. A significant item states that royalties expire if copyrights expire. I cannot decipher how the expiration of the copyrights on the 1st and 2nd editions of the Big Book affected this or whether it had any effect at all. In other parts of the document Bill and his heirs share legal responsibility for copyright renewal. The agreement is not supposed to extend beyond the lifetimes of legatees named by Lois. This matter is not without its complications in terms of wading through the tortuous legalese:

While a covered work is included within the terms of this agreement, A.A. shall pay to WILSON a royalty of fifteen (15%) percent of the retail price for each copy thereof sold and paid for. No royalties shall be paid on copies furnished gratis by A.A. nor on foreign language editions of a covered work. The obligation of A.A. to pay royalties to WILSON with respect to any covered work included within the terms of this agreement shall expire upon the happening of any one of the following events whichever shall first occur:

The expiration of the United States copyright of such work and any renewals thereof whether such copyright is in the name of A.A. or WILSON; or

a. Upon WILSON's death, all royalties provided for herein shall lapse either wholly or to the extent that such royalties are not validly disposed of by the Last Will and Testament of WILSON (herein referred to as "WILSON'S Will") as hereinafter provided in sub-paragraph "6 c)" infra, or validly assigned under Section "13" infra.

b. WILSON shall have the right in WILSON'S Will to bequeath to his wife LOIS WILSON (herein referred to as "WILSON'S wife") and any other person or persons selected by him who are then living at the time of his death (herein referred to as "approved beneficiaries") a life interest in all or any part of the royalties payable to him hereunder. Upon the death of any approved beneficiary other than WILSON'S wife, the life interest in the royalties payable to such approved beneficiary shall lapse and revert to A.A. With respect to any life interest in the royalties payable hereunder bequeathed to WILSON'S wife, WILSON shall have the right to provide in WILSON'S Will that such life interest shall, upon the death of WILSON'S wife, be divided among any persons selected by WILSON who are living at the time of his death in such proportions as he may designate. WILSON shall also have the right in WILSON'S will to grant to WILSON'S wife the right to designate in her Last Will and Testament duly admitted to probate (herein referred to as "WILSON'S wife's Will") persons selected by her who are then living at the time of her death who shall be entitled to receive a life interest after her death in all or part of the royalties payable to her during her life as provided in WILSON'S Will, and any such beneficiary designated by WILSON'S wife's will shall be deemed an approved beneficiary designated in WILSON'S will with the same force and effect as if specially listed therein. On the death of any approved beneficiary, other than WILSON'S wife, as hereinbefore provided, the percentage or proportion of royalties in which such person was entitled to participate during his lifetime shall be deemed to lapse and revert to A.A. To the extent that WILSON or WILSON'S wife (if WILSON grants to her by WILSON'S Will the power of appointment herein provided for) fail to dispose of royalties in WILSON'S will or WILSON'S wife's Will in the manner hereinbefore provided, the percentage or proportion of royalties not so disposed of shall be deemed to lapse and revert to A.A. Anything contained in this Section "6" to the contrary notwithstanding, not more than twenty (20%) per cent of the royalties payable hereunder computed on an annual basis shall be bequeathed either under WILSON'S Will and/or WILSON'S wife's Will and/or assigned pursuant to the provisions of "13" infra to persons who are under the age of forty years as of the date of this agreement.

The short form of the expiration clause is in Pass it On, pg 393 and the 1964 advisory action.

Cheers

Arthur

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] Royalties

The royalty agreements for proceeds from the Big Book were negotiated by the Alcoholic Foundation Board through Works Publishing, Inc. in the early 1940s and were subsequently re-confirmed by the future General Service Boards and the acceptance of General Service Conferences.

Dr. Bob declined any royalties, period. The Rockefeller dinner contribution of 1941 paid off his mortgage, his proctology practice did regain clients in the 1940s, and he and his family (by then, just he and Anne) were able to live comfortably in Akron.

Bill, on the other hand, while being the major author of the Big Book and the most active traveler for the A.F. Board and AA as a whole, rightly received royalties that he could survive on...That survival was not made of riches, either.

I recall a story of his visit to Seattle in the mid-1940s where the AA members there took up a collection to get him a decent suit, so much was threadbare. Even the many furnishings in the home at Stepping Stones were handed down from Lois' family---while picking up and looking at a few of the silver-plate items there today, I noticed price tags that could have come from garage sales!

The Wilsons did not live extravagantly, even as the Bedford Hills region is now an enclave of well-to-do Americans.

Bill provided full disclosure of his finances whenever or not they were in question, including reports to each Conference after 1951.

Ironically, it was only after his death that larger amounts of royalty proceeds went to Lois. The royalty agreements included a percentage from all of Bill's books (including the initial agreement with the Big Book). I don't know the percentage, but it may have been 10% at maximum. That means that 35 cents came from Big Book sales, 25 cents from 12 & 12 sales, etc.

The royalty agreement was negotiated only with Bill.

What's called a "Codicil" to a Will, a revision, further distributed whatever sub-percentage of royalty amounts, specified by Bill, to his relatives and others: Lois, his mother, his sister, any nieces and nephews, his secretary Nell Wing, and so on. Nell Wing may have gotten the last small percentage of the original Codicil amount from Bill's estate, along with a very few distant nieces or nephews that received an even smaller amount.

Lois outlived Bill by seventeen years and was provided royalties to her own estate for ten years past her death, subject to the original royalty agreements, and by 1998 all the royalty commitments were basically fulfilled. Nell Wing is still alive and in a nursing home, and there may be a distant niece or nephew that might receive a very small stipend today, and that's all the royalties that are distributed today---they most likely come from Lois' estate and Will.

Interestingly enough, Lois once offered to decline all royalties for contribution back into the AAWS General Fund and it was declined by the Conference. The major amounts of Lois' royalties were placed in the Stepping Stones Foundation as an endowment for the property---again, their receipt ended in 1998, ten years after her death.

There are no royalties from the Big Book or any other AA literature distributed today, in accordance with Bill's estate and Will and its Codicil changes.

All monies from AA literature, over expenses, go directly into the AAWS General Fund.

Dr. Bob's own personal First Printing First Edition Big Book was offered by his son, Smitty, to the AAWS Archives (GSO Archives) for a certain amount of money, and perhaps it assisted putting his own children through school, helped buy a house, etc.

Sue Windows, his daughter, sold family items (golf clubs, letters, house items) to the Chester Kirk Foundation at Brown University in Rhode Island a few years before her death, and the amount she received would have allowed her to live comfortably.

Unfortunately, Bill, the speaker you heard is promoting a half-truth and is contributing to a mythology that those of us in AA Archives service attempt to dispel. Today, there's almost no one living to receive any royalties, and the royalties actually ceased in their distribution five years ago.

Yours in the Fellowship,

Rick T.

p.s. there was once a folder on an AA website that printed an "edited" version of Bill's Royalty Agreement with Works Publishing, A.A. Publishing, and A.A. World Services, Inc. The same site had another folder with an "edited" version of his Last Will & Testament (along with the Codicil to the Will). Many AAs contacted the webmasters of the site and requested that it be removed, and it's no longer posted on the World Wide Web anymore.

Perhaps it's personal family business that none of us will ever need to know---I certainly view that as true.

A.A. Archives and A.A. History anonymity surely includes confidentiality and a certain sensitivity that is a part of our ethics. Just like the phrase in Step Nine, "except when to do so would injure them or others." And as in Tradition Ten, of issues outside of A.A..

Hope this helps answer your question. ---R.T.

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Royalties

The Speaker at a meeting I attended last week said, Dr. Bob's and Bill W.'s families still receive royalties for the 'Big Book' . . . Does anyone know if this is true and if so, how much they get ? . . . Thanks in advance . . .

vaingloriously, "I will never take another drink as long as I live!" but instead, and humbly, "I have not had a drink today-please God I will not take one tomorrow."

I am trying to help this young lad I have mentioned, as I am trying to help others, by helping him to help himself. I tell him, as I tell each and everyone, that alcoholism is no respecter of persons-the truck driver and the movie star, the chorus girl and the school-teacher, they have all come to me with their problems and I am glad they came to me, for these contacts are very potent reminders that I am an alcoholic and that the meager measure between their stagnant hopelessness and my joyous activity is-just one drink.

Why they come to me may be difficult to understand-unless you realize that alcoholism is a disease of body and mind which fact, for years, has brought it beyond the ken of the purely physical or purely mental healers. The pleadings of wives and sweethearts, the terrifying threats of physicians and psychiatrists, the sincere well intended help of spiritual advisers makes no lasting impression on the alcoholic for the simple reason that the understanding is not there and the consequent approach is always wrong.

It seems that only an alcoholic really understands an alcoholic. When this teen-age boy tried to justify himself by saying, "My father is an alcoholic, my mother a drinking woman so what but alcoholism should be expected of me?" He knew that I could talk his language when I promptly punctured his alibi by telling him, "I am the son, the grandson of ministers and missionaries. My home atmosphere and teaching were of the very best-so what but total abstinence should have been expected of me?" I added that just as no man and no woman can be held responsible for causing the disease of alcoholism in another, so no man and no woman can be expected to cure it.

"Then to what, or to whom," the lad asked me, "can I turn for help?"

"To your own desire for a full and happy life," I answered him, "and to faith in a power greater than yourself."

"What is this power greater than myself?" he asked quietly.

I said, "I choose to call it-God."

The story of how I tried every human agency before I found the Truth that made me whole is the story I now wish to tell the readers of RADIO MIRROR-the story of my lost seven years. Not merely a lost "week-end," mind you, but a story of seven lost years at a time when I should normally have been at my best and how a meeting with others like myself made the difference between the outcast that I was and the happy man that I am.

Friends have said of me, "In the beginning, it was just innocent social drinking with Broke-just going the usual rounds of social and business parties, being one of the boys."

Nonsense. Kindly and well-meant rationalizing but-nonsense. It was never just "innocent social drinking" with me. Mt drinking right from the start, was secret drinking.

Since it was considered a sin at home to take a drink, I "snuck" my first one when I was a senior in high school. Nothing particularly ominous in this, mark you. A fairly routine gesture of boyish bravado, nothing more. The evidence that I was an alcoholic was handed down when, long after maturity had removed the necessity for secret drinking, I found myself avoiding the bars where my pals drank, preferring to go off by myself and drink solo, or with complete strangers. To me, drinking was a sin. This, had I but known it, was the first symptom of alcoholism.

I didn't know it. No man knows, no boy, girl or woman knows whether pr not he, or she, is a potential alcoholic. Like other dread diseases, alcoholism attacks in the dark. It is gradual and by the time it can be diagnosed, it is mighty serious and the victim is in a bad way. But, also like most diseases, there are symptoms-and a sense of guilt in your drinking is one of them.

The "social drinker" indulges in alcohol as a beverage, to stimulate fellowship or to loosen his inhibitions. The alcoholic drinks for an anodyne and for the escape it gives him. The social drinker never thinks of drinking as anything but a social pastime-he wants to relax and have fun openly, and does. The alcoholic soon finds himself alone and unhappy in his drinking. It is as though each drink was added to the last drink in an effort to keep reality at a distance, an effort to stay in an alcoholic suspension where Conscience cannot reach. In my seven years of alcoholism, I can't remember one happy moment, drunk or sober.

There are other warning symptoms, too, and I had them all. It took ever increasing amounts to give me the lift others got with one or two drinks. I always wanted to be the last one at a party and when the festivities were over and the social drinkers went home, I went on, and on..

Let's flash back, momentarily, to those years before the symptoms in my case became apparent. From school days through high school and college I had worked at some forty different jobs-printer, mechanic, the "repertoire"-such as the average boy undertakes. After World War I activity in the Students Training Corps, there followed several years of welfare work. From YMCA "hut" secretary, I went on to campaign work and lay preaching for the Near East Relief. The transition to radio took place in 1924, at which time I became staff announcer for station WJZ. Among my earliest assignments were the now historic broadcasts of the National Democratic Convention held in the old Madison Square Garden, the inauguration of President Coolidge, the Zev-Epinard race, the first two-way conversation between a plane in flight and myself on the ground, the first air interviews with movie, radio and the theatrical stars, the funeral of William Jennings Bryan, the Lindbergh "Welcome Home" reception and many others.

Yes, as early as 1926 mine was one of the best know voices on the air-the other being that of the late Graham McNamee. When, as the result of a popularity contest, New York's Mayor, the beloved Jimmy Walker, crowned me "King of Announcers," I was earning five hundred a week and no ceiling on potential. My fan-mail was phenomenal.

This brief brochure on the early Brokenshire is not to boast, but simply to make the point that, from the very beginning, I was a potential success in this new medium of radio-and I was scared! I found myself in a job that I felt was too big for me. Each day, each program was a fearful thing. I was afraid I couldn't do the wonderful things expected of me. I wanted to hide, I wanted to get in a hole and pull it in after me. I did. I drank. I drank to find courage to work and I drank in relief when the work was done. When I had enough alcohol, I wasn't the simple lad born in an Ontario backwoods cabin, son of an unknown circuit minister. I wasn't the misunderstood youngster being "let go" from job after job. When I was drinking I wasn't tired or worried, I wasn't afraid. In my cups, I could keep pace with the glamorous life I was living, could rub elbows casually with the name men I was meeting. When I was drinking I had, in short, escaped reality altogether.

The habit-patterns of alcoholics are all the same. Every alcoholic has a "reason," an excuse for his excessive drinking. Some alcoholics drink to "steady their nerves," some because they're so happy, others because they're so sad. Each individual thinks his, or her case is different from every other case in the annals of alcoholism, but this, too, is a common denominator of the disease. Basically, these are all attempts to rationalize a behavior we inwardly know is wrong.

Flashing back once more to my early days in radio, I got through the first year without manifest mishap. But by 1925, I began to be late for appointments. I drank at rehearsals and before broadcasts. I had an over-abundance of jubilation. During one such moment I smashed the window of the control room. When my escapades became such that they could no longer be overlooked, I was punished by being sent to a local station in Washington, D.C.

Not long afterward, as a reward for good behavior, I was recalled to New York and made Chief Announcer, of the super-power station-for WJZ had been given a license to operate at 80,000 watts. However, restlessness was soon to overcome me, for I was under very restraining rules as a staff announcer. I was offered the job of heading up the Beauty Pageant in Atlantic City by the municipal radio station there. This and other offers prompted me to go free-lance. Broadcasting from all the gay nightspots and the atmosphere of the "world's playground" added fuel to the fire, and I soon hit the skids again.

Others could see it, if I could not. My bosses for instance, and a wonderful girl-the girl I married.

My wife married me because she loved me. Since she had worked in the publicity department of Station WJZ and, later, in charge of the station's announcers, she married me in the knowledge that I had a problem. She also married me, I have no doubt, with the idea of helping me and straightening out my faults. This, believe me, seldom works out.

I took, in the course of my seven lost years, many so-called "cures" and when I left the last "cure," I was waved off with cheery, "Bye, now, but you'll be back old man-all our friends come back!" So they do. All but those who have been blessed, as I have been, by the revelation that the cure for alcoholism is not entirely in human hands.

For two years, I worked with a psychiatrist and during those two years I dried up. My habit pattern improved. I hung up my clothes. I thought a little straighter but became very egotistical about the fact that I was "dry." I boasted that I could now eat in bars without drinking in them, could look at other unfortunate drinkers and pity them-and this very attitude proved that I was not on the right track. Done with no recognition of, or reliance upon God, there was nothing to sustain the habit-patterns the psychiatrist had given me. This being so, the patterns fell apart-and so did I. But this comes later.

Meantime, I was still wearing the crown of "King of Announcers," still getting by with it. In the earlier stages, the alcoholic usually manages to pull the wool over the eyes he wants to blind. Or he thinks he does. And so did I. But although my assignments continued to be king-size, so did my lapses and I was warned that if I ever again came to work with so much as a suspicion of liquor on my breath, "You're through." It happened one day at a rehearsal. The word that I was through spread over the entire field of radio like a flash of lightning.

Unable to get work in New York, I made a tour of the West Indies and the Canal Zone as narrator for a travelogue of which, it soon developed the director, like myself, was an alcoholic. The tour turned out a complete dud.

Still persons non grata in New York City, I went to the West Coast but an alcoholic knows better than anyone else that you cannot run away from yourself.

During the next year, a few independent stations gave me work but not for long. IN between the spot engagements that became spottier and spottier, I worked as a carpenter, an odd-jobs man, anything I could get in order to keep going. IN my sober moments, I worked on completing my own house.

In my better days of the early Thirties, I bought a piece of land, a little acre among the birches of Long Island's Lake Ronkonkoma and there, with the understanding help and love of a few relatives and friends evolved the house which I believe, I do believe, was the basic interest that kept me fighting all through these years-fighting to hold on to it. It is curious, but no matter how discouraged I might be, that dream of a home-to-be stayed with me and, in some far reach of my sick spirit, sustained me.

When I dried up in 1943 that house, the now finished home we call Trianglen, was the only thing that was left me from the lost years.

But busy as I was in those early Thirties, together with trying to "dry up," the struggle was like the losing fight. By the end of 1937, I "retired."

The days, the weeks, the months and years that followed are, mercifully, almost oblivionuntil, one day, walking down Broadway, I met a man I'd known in radio. He, too, had been an alcoholic. Now, he was clear-eyed, had a spring in his step, a happy smile. He told me he was in Alcoholics Anonymous. He asked me to come to a meeting with him. I went. This was in 1943. I haven't had a drink from that day to this day-and God give me the strength and the courage to hope that I won't have a drink tomorrow. That I say this, say it every day of my life, tells the story of what AA did for me.

"Dry" AA's have learned there is a power greater than ourselves and that in the recognition and use of this power lies our healing and our hope.

My spiritual experience was, as great experiences are, very simple.

There in a quiet room were men and women, who, until these meetings, were completely alone, but here they came to the knowledge that many others had the same fears, and had gone through the same dark abyss. Now they seemed secure in the knowledge that they were no longer alone, for the Power that had aided these others was around them, too. Each new meeting one lent strength to the conviction that this was the way to normalcy and to freedom. So many alcoholics, including myself, resist for years the simple message of AA, for in them is the fear that in giving up their bottle, they are giving up their freedom-when, in truth, there is no greater slave than an alcoholic. Only when he is enabled by right thinking to drop forever the chains of habitual fear that drink is to the alcoholic, is he truly free.

There lay ahead of me now the challenge of the "come-back." It wasn't going to be easy. "You can get a job, Broke," friends told me, "But you'll never get one in New York."

In every American town, on almost every green, shaded street, live housewives who are desperately ill but who do not seek the treatments which are available. They remain prisoners in their homes, isolated by their own guilt and hidden by their families' shame. These lonely, terrified women all suffer the same secret sickness: Alcoholism.

The woman alcoholic is rarely seen intoxicated by her neighbors, but she exists just the same. "There are just as many woman drunks in the suburbs as men, perhaps even more," says Mrs. Thomas Delaney, founder and director of CHR-ILL ("chronically Ill") Service, and its alcoholism information center in East Orange, New Jersey, which is operated under the auspices of the Essex County Medical Association.

Her experience is supported by Dr. Marvin Block of Buffalo, New York, chairman of the American Medical Association's committee on alcoholism. Says Doctor Block: "In my own practice, alcoholism is as common among women as among men. And I have found that the same thing is true with other private physicians who treat alcoholic patients."

Statistics on alcoholism in the United States - 80,000,000 drinkers; 5,000,000 male alcoholics; 850,000 female alcoholics - do not yet reflect the facts as they are known by workers in the field, and for good reason. Such estimates are based on public records, and most women alcoholics remain hidden.

"The stigma of being a woman alcoholic is so great that women with a drinking problem hide it," according to Mrs. Marty Mann, who is founder and head of the National Council on Alcoholism. Most women alcoholics are secret drinkers who satisfy their compulsion with primitive cunning.

"The neighbors never knew," one recovered alcoholic woman told me, "that my bedroom floor was skid row." The Fairfield County (Connecticut) Council on Alcoholism has estimated that there are nine hidden alcoholics for each one who is known.

The woman drunk is protected by their husband, her parents, her children, her family physician. In a good neighborhood there is a conspiracy of discreet silence. The woman alcoholic is treated for "female troubles" by her family doctor and admitted to the private hospital for "a nervous disorder." Her name does not appear on the police blotter and, when the woman alcoholic dies, there is rarely an autopsy. The cause of death is listed delicately as "heart failure."

Despite this protective conspiracy, the woman alcoholic is beginning to reveal herself and to seek treatment. I have attended meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous - once a predominantly male organization - where there were as many women as men. The number of women coming for help to the sixty-one alcoholism information centers affiliated with the National Council on Alcoholism is increasing steadily.

The problem of the woman drunk is as old as the grape, and there is no evidence that the percentage of women drinkers who become alcoholics is increasing. What is startling is the fact that today most young women drink in college, in bars on the way home from work, in the suburbs after they are married. The woman who has never had the first drink cannot become an alcoholic. Since World War II the number of woman drinkers has multiplied dramatically and so, inevitably, has the number of women who cannot control their drinking.

Take a drive through a pleasant New Jersey suburb with Mrs. Delaney, as I did, and you'll begin to see the dimensions of the problem of alcoholism in women.

"She has five children, and she's been sober five months this time," Mrs. Delaney told me grimly. "She's a lovely girl when she isn't drunk. She was married in her teens, and she was an alcoholic as a teen-ager too. Meet her and you'd like to have her for a neighbor, yet she's been in and out of half a dozen mental institutions and tried about every cure there is. Last time she hit bottom, and she may make it now. Some have to go all the way down before they can start up."

As we drove off, I thought of what a member of the Fairfield County Council told me. She said, "We have 12,000 alcoholics, but the alcoholics have 60,000 people in their immediate families. We think they are all involved in the problem of alcoholism."

"This isn't the Bowery, is it?" Mrs. Delaney brought me back to New Jersey and pointed to an English manor house set high on a double lot. "The woman who owns that home is in the hospital now. She's a physical wreck who looks at least twenty years older than her real age, fifty-eight. You'd never think she was a lush if you met her. She's a lady - genteel, soft-spoken, gracious.

Mrs. Delaney nodded sadly. "It's an old story. By the time her children grew up and left home, her husband was a success. He traveled a great deal, and she was left alone. She never drank in front of anyone, but she started to drink alone; and after he died, she rarely left the house, didn't even get dressed for weeks. Time turned upside down, until night was day and day was night. She drank until she passed out and drank herself into oblivion again. We never would have found her if she hadn't gone to doctor for another ailment."

"Why didn't her children do something?" I asked.

"They didn't know," Mrs. Delaney smiled. "Women alcoholics are the most convincing liars in the world. She wrote them about her busy life. When they wanted to visit, she'd tell them she was going to Europe, or something. Only once in a while did she make a heroic effort to dress up and face them."

We drove on until Mrs. Delaney parked in front of a group of expensive garden apartments. "Career women come to us too. They take care of their parents or seek a career in a man's world, sacrificing everything for success, and then something happens. In one of those apartments over there is a young woman with a Ph.D., but she's a drunk.

"She's been in to see us, but she isn't ready for help yet." Mrs. Delaney pulled away from the curb. "Her employees don't know, although they may be wondering why she's sick so many Monday mornings. She's a falling down drunk, but her booze is delivered, and you never see her on the street. If you met her, you wouldn't suspect it. She's charming, graceful, intelligent - and very sick."

When we arrived at her office, Mrs. Delaney summed up our trip, "People think of the woman drunk as an old hag, a blowzy creature who would never live in a nice neighborhood. They won't believe that people they know are alcoholics, and therefore they won't help them get treatment. That's the trouble. They won't admit alcoholism is a disease and that the woman who has a serious drinking problem could be their next-door neighbor, their best friend, even a member of their own family."

Information from authorities on alcoholism across the country confirms Mrs. Delaney's picture of the woman alcoholic. "The large majority of the women alcoholics I know are best described by the word 'dainty'" writes Mary C. Clark, executive director of the Monterey Peninsula Council on Alcoholism in Carmel, California. "Their portrait is in pastel tones, the skin delicate, the voice gentle, the manner feminine." Sarah A. Boyd, director of the Berks County Committee on Alcoholism in Reading, Pennsylvania, has found that the average woman alcoholic is of superior intelligence, has a better-than-average income, is usually between thirty-six and fifty years old and has two or three children. Mrs. Boyd's experience confirms the National Council on Alcoholism estimate that less than 3 percent of all confirmed alcoholics are derelicts.

Reports from alcoholism information centers in Houston, Honolulu, Cleveland, Detroit, Greensboro, North Carolina, and other cities - as well as conversations I have had with physicians, psychiatrists and recovered alcoholics - all indicate that the woman alcoholic may be shy or vivacious, young or old, too busy or too idle, married or single, but they all have one thing in common: There is a vacuum in their lonely lives that they desperately try to fill with a bottle.

The woman alcoholic has lost her way in life, and drinking has become a way of living. "Instead of facing reality, they try to change it with a drink," one psychiatrist told me. Mrs. Delaney adds, "They all need a crutch to get through life. They try alcohol, then they find they can't get along without it."

For years alcohol seemed an efficient crutch. With a drink in her hand the too-busy mother finds the momentary stimulation to face another chore or a moment of calm in the confusion of children's demands, errands and social obligations. The bored woman finds a warming hour of fulfillment, another hour of fuzzy contentment and, finally, a night of oblivion.

According to a studies at the Yale Center of Alcohol Studies in New Haven, Connecticut, and elsewhere, women alcoholics tend to start drinking later in life than men, and then progress faster through the final stages of alcoholism than males. Yet there are usually long years while they are clear-headed drinkers, while they have no hang-overs, while they still drink heavily by choice. But somewhere they cross over the line. They take a drink as a stimulant before a party and another as a sedative afterward. Insidiously the drink becomes all things at all times. Social affairs are planned as an excuse to drink, the five-o'clock cocktail becomes a reward - and a daylong goal. Getting the first drink - and the dozens which inevitably follow - becomes a way of life.

Alcoholism is a progressive disease, with permanent danger signals for the woman who will allow herself to see them. The National Council on Alcoholism, the members of Alcoholics Anonymous, physicians and psychiatrists and other experts recognize the same warning signs along the road which leads from the drink which is chosen to the one which can not be refused.

If a woman has become "a slow cooker," delaying dinner so there will be time for an extra Martini, if she insists on mixing the drinks so she can "earn" the dividend, if she needs a drink before going to a party and another after she comes home, if she drinks alone, if she plans social occasions which will give her an excuse to drink, if she "sweetens" her own drinks, if she "needs" a drink to face a crisis, she'd better watch out.

If she blacks out, lies to herself and others about the number and the strength of drinks she has had, drinks "the hair of the dog" in the morning and hides a reserve supply, then she is in trouble and should seek help immediately. Doctor Block adds some advice of his own: "Pay attention to valid criticism from those in your family who care about you. If they are worried about your drinking, don't pass it off - consider it. They may have something to worry about."

Too often the woman speeds past all warning signs and becomes an alcoholic. Then liquor controls her life, then the next drink is more important than anything else - the care of a child, the love of a man, her health, her home, her reputation, her God. As her thirst begins to rule her life, a woman runs head on into a double standard. Among men, heavy drinking is often taken as a sign of virility, and the phrase, "Drunk as a lord," is a tribute. No one ever said approvingly, "She was drunk as a lady." The woman with an unquenchable thirst must lead a life of unrelenting deception.

One recovered alcoholic told me she used to slither down the side of her bed and crawl to the bathroom to make sure she wouldn't fall and develop revealing bruises. A woman alcoholic will hide a jug in the diaper pail, fill the hot-water bottle with Scotch, stash a fifth in the vacuum cleaner, spike the vinegar bottle. A career woman with perfect eyesight wore spectacles with thick, uncorrected lenses to hide her bloodshot eyes. One woman fooled her husband by keeping gin in the water carafe by her bed; another buried half-pints in cereal boxes.

Many women keep changing doctors so one won't catch on to the true nature of their disorders. Mrs. Elizabeth D. Whitney, executive director of the Boston Committee on Alcoholism, has known several women who drank perfume for its alcoholic content, so their breath wouldn't smell of whiskey. Vanilla extract has been a staple of women alcoholics for generations, as have many patent medicines with high alcoholic content. Many of these tonics and elixirs are still popular in rural areas and among elderly women.

A woman with a drinking problem develops an extraordinary ability to rationalize. She needs a drink because she is tense, and she needs another to perk her up; she drinks because her husband is away on a business trip, and she drinks to celebrate his return home. Women alcoholics may not always fool others, but they almost always deceive themselves, and that self-deception is the most dangerous of all, for it keeps them from seeking and accepting treatment.

The ability of a woman with a drinking problem to delude herself is astonishing. "I only drink sherry," is a popular, self-righteous refrain that may hide the fact she drinks half a gallon or more a day. A Connecticut mother, who is now a member of A.A., knew she didn't have a drinking problem because she never touched a drop until the children were in bed. Of course, she kept putting them to bed earlier and earlier in the afternoon and then drinking until she passed out. Another A.A. member told me she convinced herself she was not an alcoholic, because she always hung her clothes up neatly before she blacked out.

Richard Silver, executive director of the Seattle Committee on Alcoholism, has found that husbands often encourage such dangerous self-delusion by denying their wives' alcoholism. False pride prevents many a man from admitting his wife could be an alcoholic. Worse still, he prevents his wife from facing her problem, the first step in any successful treatment of the alcoholic.

The woman alcoholic has particular difficulties because she is a woman. As a wife and a mother her erratic behavior has a devastating effect on her family. Mrs. Delaney has found that the woman alcoholic is usually a perfectionist who swings wildly from one emotional extreme to the other. She cleans the entire house at once, or doesn't wash a single dish. She refuses to allow her husband near her, or smothers him with aggressive affection. She will have no guests in the house and then invites twenty to a formal dinner. Her son goes uncorrected for major offenses and then has his bike taken away for a month for trivial misbehavior. One daughter does not have a birthday party, but her sisters and friends are treated to birthday lunch in the private dining room of a fancy restaurant.

The road of the woman alcoholic is not an easy one. A.A. experience has shown that a mother who is a drunk loses the respect of her children earlier than a drinking father does and is less likely to win it back. Husbands are more apt to divorce an alcoholic mate than a woman is. A woman usually has economic reasons to stick with her husband. He is a feeble reed, but he may be her only support.

When a woman "blacks out," an experience shared by all alcoholics and a universal danger signal, she suffers a special horror at the thought of what might have happened while she was unconscious. It is biologically and psychologically impossible for a woman to be casual about blackouts. There are promiscuous women drunks, of course, but the infidelities of a woman alcoholic are more often imaginary than real. Much of the scorn heaped on the woman alcoholic implies that she has been sexually uninhibited. Mrs. Mann of the National Council on Alcoholism has a blunt answer to that supposition. "Who wants a drunken woman?" she asks. "When men are interested in her, she's only interested in the next drink. When she passes out, she's vulnerable, of course, but it isn't likely that anyone will take advantage of her. She's hardly an attractive woman by then, and her virtue is usually quite safe."

According to such authorities as John T. Crane, executive director of the Flint (Michigan) Committee on Alcoholism, the woman alcoholic is likely to be a plateau drinker who keeps herself on an even keel, although she is consistently sodden and awash like a bashed-in dory floating just under the surface of the water. Many experts feel the compulsive woman drinker usually has more serious emotional ills, in addition to her alcoholism, than the male - and of course, no treatment can be given until she is sober. Her nervous system sometimes triggers heavy drinking in the premenstrual periods, or during the menopause. Mrs. Delaney, who also runs a rest home for alcoholics, finds that women drinkers are likely to suffer extreme physical damage in a short time. She believes that the physical ravages of heavy drinking cut deeper in the female than in the male.

Most alcoholics suffer extreme malnutrition from drinking without eating. Cirrhosis of the liver, the fifth highest killer of men and an increasing disease of women, is not caused by the amount of liquor drunk but by the lack of proper food. Women alcoholics often confuse their loss of appetite sense that she was an objective one (particularly when it involved Bill W).

The probate records show real estate holdings assessed at 1.4 million. Over time, Bill and Lois had purchased 5 lots for Stepping Stones. In 1985 (our 50th anniversary) Stepping Stones was declared a NY State Historical Site. Also please be aware that about 1/4 to 1/3 of the estate valuation consisted of future royalties projected to be awarded to Steppingstones (over 10 years) and legatees not excluded by the IRS ruling (over their estimated remaining life times).

I wish the genie could be put back in the bottle regarding Big Book copyrights but I don't believe it can.

My understanding is that U.S. rights are irretrievably lost but international rights are protected by treaty in those countries that are signatories.

Cheers

Arthur

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] Royalties, and a new "gotcha" question

I stand corrected about Dr. Bob and Works Publishing royalties. Sue Windows had made a legal deposition at one time that AAWS had never paid royalties, and it appears now that as a survivor past Dr. Bob's death, she didn't (perhaps one reason she accepted the offer from Brown University, late in her life).

Thanks for setting the record straight. I seriously doubt that Bob and Anne enjoyed a substantial amount of moneyed returns, though.

Bill and Lois did live comfortably but not extravagantly. The four million dollar value of the estate your referred to must include a large chunk of the property value for their Katonah property at Stepping Stones (over twelve acres?).

I am very glad that the Stepping Stones Foundation has maintained the Wilson estate---the roof, second floor ceiling collapse, the mildew problem at Wit's End, and climate control for the house have all been

Is there hope for habitual drunkards? A cure that borders on the miraculous--and it works!

For twenty-five or thirty cents we buy a glass of fluid which is pleasant to the taste, and which contains within its small measure a store of warmth and good-fellowship and stimulation, of release from momentary cares and anxieties.

That would be a drink of whisky, of course--whisky, which is one of Nature's most generous gifts to man, and at the same time one of his most elusive problems. It is a problem because, like many of his greatest benefits, man does not quite know how to control it.

Many experiments have been made, the most spectacular being the queer nightmare prohibition, which left such deep scars upon the morals and the manners of our nation. Millions of dollars have been spent by philanthropists and crusaders to spread the doctrine of temperance. In our time, the most responsible of the distillers are urging us to use their wares sensibly, without excess.

But to a certain limited number of our countrymen neither prohibition nor wise admonishments have any meaning, because they are helpless when it comes to obeying them. I speak of the true alcoholics, and before going any further I had best explain what the term means.

For a medical definition of the term, I quote an eminent doctor who has spent twenty-five years treating such people in a highly regarded private hospital:

"We believe . . . that the action of alcohol in chronic alcoholics is a manifestation of an allergy--that the phenomenon of craving is limited to this class and never occurs in the average temperate drinker. These allergic types can never safely use alcohol in any form at all."

They are, he goes on, touched with physical and mental quirks which prevent them from controlling their own actions. They suffer from what some doctors call a "compulsion neurosis." They know liquor is bad for them, but periodically, they are driven by a violent and totally uncontrollable desire for a drink. And after that first drink, for deluge.

Now these people are genuinely sick. The liquor habit with them is not a vice. It is a specific illness of body and mind, and should be treated as such.

By far the most successful cure is that used by the hospital whose head doctor I quoted. There is nothing secret about it. It has the endorsement of the medical profession. It is, fundamentally, a process of dehydration: of removing harmful toxins from all parts of the body faster than Nature could accomplish it. Within five or six days, two weeks at the maximum, the patient's body is utterly free from alcoholic poisons. Which means that the physical craving is completely cured, because the body cries out for alcohol only when alcohol is already there. The patient has no feeling of revulsion toward whisky. He simply is not interested in it. He has recovered. But wait. How permanent is his recovery?

Our doctor says this: "Though the aggregate of full recoveries through physical and psychiatric effort is considerable, we doctors must admit that we have made little impression upon the problem as a whole. For there are many types which do not respond to the psychological approach.

"I do not believe that true alcoholism is entirely a matter of individual mental control. I have had many men who had, for example, worked for a period of months on some business deal which was to be settled on a certain date. . . . For reasons they could not afterward explain, they took a drink a day or two prior to the date . . . and the important engagement was not even kept. These men were not drinking to escape. They were drinking to overcome a craving beyond their mental control.

"The classification of alcoholics is most difficult. There are, of course, the psychopaths who are emotionally unstable. . . . They are over-remorseful and make many resolutions--but never a decision.

"There is the type who is unwilling to admit that he cannot take a drink just like the rest of the boys. He does tricks with his drinking--changing his brand, or drinking only after meals, or changing his companions. None of this helps him strengthen his control and be like other people. Then there are types entirely normal in every respect except in the effect which alcohol has upon them. . . .

"All these, and many others, have one symptom in common: They cannot start drinking without developing the phenomenon of craving. . . . The only relief we have to suggest is complete abstinence from alcohol."

But are these unfortunate people really capable, mentally, of abstaining completely? Their bodies may be cured of craving. Can their minds be cured? Can they be rid of the deadly "compulsion neurosis"?

Among physicians the general opinion seems to be that chronic alcoholics are doomed.

But wait!

Within the last four years, evidence has appeared which has startled hard-boiled medical men by proving that the compulsion neurosis can be entirely eliminated. Perhaps you are one of those cynical people who will turn away when I say that the root of this new discovery is religion. But be patient for a moment.

About three years ago a man appeared at the hospital in New York of which our doctor is head physician. It was his third "cure." Since his first visit he had lost his job, his friends, his health, and his self-respect. He was now living on the earnings of his wife.

He had tried every method he could find to cure his disease: had read all the great philosophers and psychologists. He had tried religion but he simply could not accept it. It could not seem real and personal to him.

He went through the cure as usual, and came out of it in very low spirits. He was lying in bed, emptied of vitality and thought, when suddenly, a strange and totally unexpected thrill went through his body and mind. He called out for the doctor. When the doctor came in, the man looked up at him and grinned.

"Well, doc," he said, "my troubles are all over. I've got religion." "Why, you're the last man . . ." "Sure. I know all that. But I've got it. And I know I'm cured of this drinking business for good."

He talked with great intensity for a while and then said, "Listen, doc. I've got to see some other patient--one that is about to be dismissed."

The doctor demurred. It all sounded a trifle fanatical. But finally he consented. And thus was born the movement which is now flourishing with almost sensational success as "Alcoholics Anonymous."

Here is how it works: Every member of the group--which is to say every person who has been saved--is under obligation to carry on the work, to save other men. That, indeed, is a fundamental part of his own mental cure. He gains strength and confidence by active work with other victims.

He finds his subject among acquaintances, at a "cure" institution, or perhaps by making inquiry of a preacher, a priest, or a doctor. He begins his talk with his new acquaintance by telling him the true nature of his disease and how remote are his chances for permanent cure.

When he has convinced the man that he is a true alcoholic and must never drink again, he continues: "You had better admit that this thing is beyond your own control. You've tried to solve it by yourself, and you have failed. All right. Why not put the whole thing into the hands of Somebody Else?"

Even though the man might be an atheist or agnostic, he will almost always admit that there is some sort of force operating in the world--some cosmic power weaving a design.

And his new friend will say:

"I don't care what you call this Somebody Else. We call it God. But whatever you want to call it, you had better put yourself into its hands. Just admit you're licked, and say, `Here I am, Somebody Else. Take care of this thing for me.'"

The new subject will generally consent to attend one of the weekly meetings of the movement.

He will find twenty-five or thirty ex-drunks gathered in somebody's home for a pleasant evening. There are no sermons. The talk is gay or serious as the mood strikes.

The new candidate cannot avoid saying to himself, "These birds are ex-drunks. And look at them! They must have something. It sounds kind of screwy, but whatever it is I wish to heaven I could get it too."

One or another of the members keeps working on him from day to day. And presently the miracle--But let me give you an example: I sat down in a quiet room with Mr. B., a stockily built man of fifty with a rather stem, intelligent face.

"I'll tell you what happened a year ago," he said. "I was completely washed up. Financially I was all right, because my money is in a trust fund. But I was a drunken bum of the worst sort. My family was almost crazy with my incessant sprees.

"I took the cure in New York." (At the hospital we have mentioned.) "When I came out of it, the doctor suggested I go to one of these meetings the boys were holding. I just laughed. My father was an atheist and had taught me to be one. But the doctor kept saying it wouldn't do me any harm, and I went.

"I sat around listening to the jabber. It didn't register with me at all. I went home. But the next week I found myself drawn to the meeting. And again they worked on me while I shook my head. I said, `It seems O.K. with you, boys, but I don't even know your language. Count me out.'

"Somebody said the Lord's Prayer, and the meeting broke up. I walked three blocks to the subway station. Just as I was about to go down `the stairs--bang!" He snapped his fingers hard. "It happened! I don't like that word miracle, but that's all I can call it. The lights in the street seemed to flare up. My feet seemed to leave the pavement. A kind of shiver went over me, and I burst out crying.

"I went back to the house where we had met, and rang the bell, and Bill let me in. We talked until two o'clock in the morning. I haven't touched a drop since, and I've set four other fellows on the same road."

Alcoholics Anonymous

Science Column

Medicine usually claims to cure only about 2 per cent of the cases of acute alcoholism it treats. Last week a non-medical group appeared which made the unusual claim that 25 per cent of its cases were cured. Called Alcoholics Anonymous, the group was a club composed of ex-drunkards and men trying to overcome the liquor habit who, for obvious reasons, prefer their names to remain unknown. Not particularly anxious for publicity, it nevertheless came into the limelight last Thursday evening when John D. Rockefeller Jr. gave a dinner party for educators and others interested in the club's work.

The organization has existed for more than four years; yet it has spread its gospel only by word-of-mouth advertising and a free book. It started with two members; today it has some- thing around 500. It has no dues, but it does have a strict membership requirement: an honest desire to stop drinking.

The founder was a commercial traveler who found himself obsessed with liquor and was unable to get cured at any of the sanitariums he tried. Finally, though he was an agnostic, he turned to what for want of a better name might be called faith. Immediately he got help in the form of his own determination to stop drinking; almost as soon, he was impelled to help another drinker cure himself in the same manner.

From these two men sprang the society and its three principles of (1) telling another person--a friend, a member of the group, perhaps even a priest, in the case of a Roman Catholic--of the trouble that has turned him to drink, (2) resolving to abstain henceforth; (3) helping others to abstain. In short, members subordinate a desire for liquor for something higher--call it God, Buddha, faith, self-determination, or what you will.

Today the society has branches in Akron, Cleveland, Chicago, and the New York metropolitan area. It meets in small groups at various members' houses and keeps the address of its headquarters as secret as its -members' names--giving out only two post-office box numbers in New York, one for general inquiries and the other for requests for its book. Through the generosity of men who have conquered alcoholism and of onlookers like Rockefeller, who does not drink but is interested in movements to eradicate drunkenness, it raises a budget for salaries of its directors and stenographers, rent, and stationery.

Alcoholics Anonymous

Medicine Column

Last week one of the best-known teetotalers in the U.S., John D. Rockefeller, had 60 people to dinner. No cocktails were served, for several of Mr. Rockefeller's guests were members of "Alcoholics Anonymous," a widespread, publicity-shy group of one-time guzzlers who have cured themselves.

Psychiatrists now generally consider alcoholism a disease, specifically a psychoneurosis. Alcoholics generally drink, not just because they like liquor, but to escape from something--a mother fixation, inferiority feelings, an intolerable domestic situation, social or economic maladjustment. They may suffer the torments of the damned, even while drinking themselves into a stupor, and especially in the brief period between waking up with a remorseful, clattering hangover and getting down the first drink of the day. Psychiatrists try to help them by discovering the hidden reason for drinking and showing how it can be removed. But cynics in sanatoriums, watching a sober man walk out the door full of good intentions, often bet on how many days or weeks will elapse before he is back. Nagging by families usually makes things worse.

About five years ago a traveling sales-man named Bill, after repeated alcoholic relapses, was pronounced hopeless by his doctors. Bill was an agnostic, but someone asked him if he couldn't believe that there was some power bigger than himself--call it God or whatever he liked--that would help him not to drink. The idea was that though Bill was always willing to let himself down, he might be more reluctant to let God down. Bill tried it, found that he had no trouble resisting the desire to drink. He was cured. He told his discovery to others, and the cure spread. These reformed drunkards called themselves "Alcoholics Anonymous," now number over 400 in towns all over the U.S. - They do their missionary work on their own time, as an avocation.

Aware of this interest in liquor control, some of the group wrote to John D. Rockefeller two years ago--asking not for money but for advice. Mr. Rockefeller asked a representative to look into their doings, grew so interested that he helped to publish a book, Alcoholics Anonymous (Works Publishing Co.; $3.50), in which some members described their battles with the demon and how they won.

dissemination. Alcoholics Anonymous is unlike any other book ever before published. No reviewer can say how many have contributed to its pages. But the list of writers should include addicts and doctors, psychiatrists and clergymen. Yet it is not a book of personal experience, except in a limited sense, any more than it is a book of rules and precepts. Whether the author of any given chapter can be physician or addict, the argument comes back to a single fundamental; and that is that the patient is unable to master the situation solely through what is termed "will power," or volition. One contributor, who thought he had "got by" on a diet of milk, one day said to himself that he could safely add a little whiskey to his lacteal nourishment. He did. And then a little more, and then a little more. In the end, he was back to the Sanitarium. His "will" was operating one hundred Per cent; yet there was a fallacy somewhere. It is to root out this fallacy and supplant it that this book has been compiled. The present reviewer, since this is no ordinary publication, believes it only fair that he should state that at one time he advanced fairly deeply into the field of psychology and he is free to state that the entire superstructure of "Alcoholics Anonymous" is based on a psychology of volition that he himself once advanced but which was never universally acceded to. And that is what we glibly call "will," and usefully so in general practice, should for scientific accuracy be reduced to more elemental terms. And, such an effort made, what results? Just this. That volition, "will power," tracked to its source, is the automatic and irrefutable working of a dominating idea. Consider Napoleon, the man of indomitable will. What does it, in this final psychological analysis, come down to? It comes down to the fact that so exclusively did Napoleon's mind contain the idea that he was the man of destiny that there was no room for any other idea, so that every act, every "willed" action, was the unconscious result of, flowed from, that idea. Here, then, is the key to "Alcoholics Anonymous," the great and indisputable lesson this extraordinary book would convey. The alcoholic addict, and why not change, should it seem we have become too intense, to "the drug addict," cannot, by any effort of what he calls his "will," insure himself against taking his "first dose." We saw how the chap with his whiskey in milk missed out. There is one way for our authors, and but one way. The utter suffusion of the mind by an idea, which shall exclude any idea of alcohol or of drugs. Better, let us say the usurpation of the entire ideational tract by this idea. The idea itself may be, perhaps, fairly trivial. Such as: I do not like alcoholic drinks. In fact, my stomach revolts at their mention. Those who appear to dominate these pages apparently would not subscribe to so simple a formula as I have proposed. But my point is that it might be sufficient; and I base this on the book itself, provided only that their thesis flood, so to speak, the entire ideational tract. Yet would that be possible? Or possible for long? That is the question. And, as a matter of fact, those several authors give it short shrift. I have advanced it solely to exhibit the stark psychological trail on which we have walked. The thesis of the book is, as we read it aright, that his all-embracing and all-commanding idea must be religious. Yet here again should the reader pause, for the writers are talking of what William James celled "Varieties of Religious Experience" rather than matters of individual faith. There is no suggestion advanced in the book that an addict should embrace one faith rather than another. He may fall back upon an "absolute," or "A Power which makes for righteousness" if he chooses. The point of the book is that he is unlikely to win through unless he floods his mind with the idea of a force outside himself. So doing, his individual problem resolves into thin air. In last analysis, it is the resigning word: Not my will, but Thine, he done, said in the full knowledge of the fact that the decision will be against further addiction. Most readers will pass this book by. Yet of such a majority many might not be amiss in turning its pages. There but for the grace of God, goes _____. A few will reach for it furtively. It is a strange book. The argument, as we have said, has a deep psychological foundation.

A NEW APPROACH TO PSYCHOTHERAPY IN CHRONIC ALCOHOLISM

By W.D. Silkworth, M.D. New York, New York

The beginning and subsequent development of a new approach to the problem of permanent recovery for the chronic alcoholic has already produced remarkable results and promises much for the future this statement is based upon four years of close observation. As this development is one, which has sprung up among alcoholic patients themselves and has been largely conceived and promoted by them, it is felt that this new treatment can be reported freely and objectively.

The central idea is that of a fellowship of ex-alcoholic men and women banded together for mutual help. Each member feels duty bound to assist alcoholic newcomers to get upon their feet. These in turn work with still others, in an endless chain. Hence there is a large growth possibility. In one locality, for example, the fellowship had but three members in September, 1935, eighteen months later the three had succeeded with seven more These ten have since expanded to ninety.

It is much more than a sense of duty, however, which provides the requisite driving power and harmony so necessary for success. One powerful factor is that of self-preservation. These ex-alcoholics frequently find that unless they spend time helping others to health they cannot stay sober themselves. Strenuous, almost sacrificial work for other sufferers is often imperative in the early days of their recovery. This effort proceeds entirely on a good will basis It is an avocation. There are no fees or dues of any kind, nor do these people organize in the ordinary sense of the word.

These ex-alcoholic men and women number about one hundred and fifty. One group is scattered along the Atlantic seaboard with New York as a center. Another, and somewhat larger body, is located in the Middle West. Many walks of life are represented, though business and professional types predominate. The unselfishness, the extremes to which these men and women go to help each other, the spirit of democracy, tolerance and sanity which prevails, are astonishing to those who know something of the alcoholic personality. But these observations do not adequately explain why so many gravely involved people are able to remain sober and face life again.

The principle answer is each ex-alcoholic has had, and is able to maintain, a vital spiritual or "religious" experience. This so-called "experience" is accompanied, by marked changes in personality. There is always, in a successful case, a radical change in outlook, attitude and habits of thought, which sometimes occur with amazing rapidity, and in nearly all cases these changes are evident within a few months, often less.

That the chronic alcoholic has sometimes recovered by religious means is a fact centuries old. But these recoveries have been sporadic, insufficient in numbers or impressiveness to make headway with the alcoholic problem as a whole.

The conscious search of these ex-alcoholics for the right answer has enabled them to find an approach, which has been effectual in something like half of all the cases upon which it has been tried. This is a truly remarkable record when it is remembered that most of them were undoubtedly beyond the reach of other remedial measures.

The essential features of this new approach, without psychological embellishment are:

1. The ex-alcoholics capitalize upon a fact, which they have so well demonstrated, namely: that one alcoholic can secure the confidence of another in a way and to a degree almost impossible of attainment by a non-alcoholic outsider.
2. After having fully identified themselves with their "prospect" by a recital of symptoms, behavior, anecdotes, etc., these men allow the patient to draw the inference that if he is seriously alcoholic, there may be no hope for him save a spiritual experience. They cite their own cases and quote medical opinion to prove their point. If the patient insists he is not alcoholic to that degree, they recommend he try to stay sober in his own way. Usually, however, the patient agrees at once.

If he does not, a few more painful relapses often convince him.

3. Once the patient agrees that he is powerless, he finds himself in a serious dilemma. He sees clearly that he must have a spiritual experience or be destroyed by alcohol.

4. This dilemma brings about a crisis in the patient's life. He finds himself in a position, which, he believes, cannot be untangled by human means. He has been placed in this position by another alcoholic who has recovered through a spiritual experience. This peculiar ability, which an alcoholic who has recovered exercises upon one who has not recovered, is the main secret of the unprecedented success, which these men and women are having. They can penetrate and carry conviction where the physician or the clergyman cannot. Under these conditions, the patient turns to religion with an entire willingness and readily accepts, without reservation, a simple religious proposal. He is then able to acquire much more than a set of religious beliefs; he undergoes the profound mental and emotional change common to religious "experience" (See William James' Varieties of Religious Experience). Then too, the patient's hope is renewed and his imagination is fired by the idea of membership in a group of ex-alcoholics where he will be enabled to save the lives and homes of those who have suffered as he has suffered.

5. The fellowship is entirely indifferent concerning the individual manner of spiritual approach so long as the patient is willing to turn his life and his problems over to the care and direction of his Creator. The patient may picture the Deity in any way he likes. No effort whatever is made to convert him to some particular faith or creed. Many creeds are represented among the group and the greatest harmony prevails. It is emphasized that the fellowship is non-sectarian and that the patient is entirely free to follow his own inclination. Not a trace of aggressive evangelism is exhibited.

6. If the patient indicates a willingness to go on, a suggestion is made that he do certain things which are obviously good psychology, good morals and good religion, regardless of creed.

a. That he make a moral appraisal of himself, and confidentially discuss his findings with a competent person whom he trusts.

b. That he try to adjust bad personal relationships, setting right, so far as possible, such wrongs as he may have done in the past.

c. That he recommit himself daily, or hourly if need be, to God's care and direction, asking for strength.

d. That, if possible, he attend weekly meetings of the fellowship and actively lend a hand with alcoholic newcomers.

This is the procedure in brief. The manner of presentation may vary considerably, depending upon the individual approached, but the essential ingredients of the process are always much the same. When presented by an ex-alcoholic, the power of this approach is remarkable. For a full appreciation one must have known these patients before and after their change.

Considering the presence of the religious factor, one might expect to find unhealthy emotionalism and prejudice. This is not the case however; on the contrary, there is an instant readiness to discard old methods for new ones, which produce better results. For instance, it was early found that usually the weakest approach to an alcoholic is directly through his family or friends, especially if the patient is drinking heavily at the time. The ex-alcoholics frequently insist, therefore, that a physician first take the patient in hand, placing him in a hospital whenever possible. If proper hospitalization and medical care is not carried out, this patient faces the danger of delirium tremens, "wet brain" or other complications. After a few days' stay, during which time the patient has been thoroughly detoxicated, the physician brings up the question of permanent sobriety and, if the patient is interested, tactfully introduces a member of the ex-alcoholics group. By this time the prospect has self-control, can think straight, and the approach to him can be made casually, with no intervention by family or friends. More than half of this fellowship has been so treated. The group is unanimous in its belief that hospitalization is desirable, even imperative, in most cases.

What has happened to these men and women? For years, physicians have pursued methods, which bear some similarity to those outlined above. An effort is being made to procure a frank discussion with the patient, leading to self-understanding. It is indicated that he must make the necessary re-adjustment to his environment. His cooperation and confidence must be secured. The objectives are to bring about extraversion and to provide someone to whom the alcoholic can transfer his dilemma.

In a large number of cases, this alcoholic group is now attaining these very objectives because their simple but powerful devices appear to cut deeper than do other methods of treatment because of the following reasons:

1. Because of their alcoholic experiences and successful recoveries they secure a high degree of confidence from the prospects.
2. Because of this initial confidence, identical experience, and the fact that the discussion is pitched on moral and religious grounds, the patient tells his story and makes his self-appraisal with extreme thoroughness and honesty. He stops living alone and finds himself within reach of a fellowship with whom he can discuss his problems as they arise.

3. Because of the ex-alcoholic brotherhood, the patient, too, is able to save other alcoholics from destruction. At one and the same time, the patient acquires an ideal, a hobby, a strenuous avocation, and a social life, which he enjoys among other ex-alcoholics and their families. These factors make powerfully for his extraversion.

4. Because of objects aplenty in whom to vest his confidence, the patient can turn to the individuals to whom he first gave his confidence, the ex-alcoholic group as a whole, or the Deity. It is paramount to note that the religious factor is all-important even from the beginning. Newcomers have been unable to stay sober when they have tried the program minus the Deity.

The mental attitude of the people toward alcohol is interesting. Most of them report that they are seldom tempted to drink. If tempted, their defense against the first drink is emphatic and adequate. To quote from one of their number, once a serious case at this hospital, but who has had no relapse since his "experience" four and one-half years ago: "Soon after I had my experience, I realized I had the answer to my problem. For about three years prior to December 1934 I had been taking two and sometimes three bottles of gin a day. Even in my brief periods of sobriety, my mind was much on liquor, especially if my thoughts turned toward home, where I had bottles hidden on every floor of the house. Soon after leaving the hospital, I commenced to work with other alcoholics. With reference to them, I thought much about alcohol, even to the point of carrying a bottle in my pocket to help them through the severe hangovers. But from the first moment of my experience, the thought of taking a drink myself hardly ever occurred. I had the feeling of being in a position of neutrality. I was not fighting to stay on the water wagon. The problem was removed; it simply ceased to exist for me. This new state of mind came about in my case at once and automatically. About six weeks after leaving the hospital my wife asked me to fetch a small utensil, which stood on a shelf in our kitchen. As I fumbled for it, my hand grasped a bottle, still partly full. With a start of surprise and gratitude, it flashed upon me that not once during the past weeks had the thought of liquor being in my home occurred to me. Considering the extent to which alcohol had dominated my thinking, I call this no less than a miracle. During the past your years of sobriety I have seriously considered drinking only a few times. On each occasion, my reaction was one of fear, followed by the reassurance, which came with my new found ability to think the matter through, to work with another alcoholic, or to enter upon a brief period of prayer and meditation. I now have a defense against alcoholism which is positive so long as I keep myself spiritually fit and active, which t am only too glad to do."

Another interesting example of reaction to temptation comes from a former patient; now sober three and one-half years. Like most of these people, he was beyond the reach of psychiatric methods. He relates the following incident:

"Though sober now for several years, I am still bothered by periods of deep depression and resentment. I live on a farm, and weeks sometimes pass in which I have no contact with the ex-alcoholic group. During one of my spells I became violently angry over a trifling domestic matter. I deliberately decided to get drunk, going so far as to stock my guesthouse with food, thinking to lock myself in when I had returned from town with a case of liquor. I got in my car and started down the drive; still furious. As I reached the gate I stopped the car, suddenly feeling unable to carry out my plan. I said to myself, at least I have to be honest with my wife. I returned to the house and announced I was on my way to town to get drunk. She looked at me calmly, never saying a word. The absurdity of the whole thing burst upon me and I laughed and so the matter passed. Yes, I now have a defense that works. Prior to my spiritual experience I would never have reacted that way."

The testimony of the membership as a whole sums up to this: For the most part, these men and women are now indifferent to alcohol, but when the thought of taking a drink does come, they react sanely and vigorously.

This alcoholic fellowship hopes to extend its work to all parts of the country and to make its methods and answers known to every alcoholic who wishes to recover as a first step, they have prepared a book called *Alcoholics Anonymous. A large volume of 400 pages, it sets forth their methods and experience exhaustively, and with much clarity and force. The first half of the book is a text aimed to show an alcoholic the attitude he ought to take and precisely the steps he may follow to affect his own recovery. He then finds full directions for approaching and working with other alcoholics. Two chapters are devoted to working with family relations and one to employers for the guidance of those who surround the sick man. There is a powerful chapter addressed to the agnostic, as the majority of the present members were of that description. Of particular interest to the physician is the chapter on alcoholism dealing mostly with its mental phenomena, as these men see it.

By contacting personally those who are getting results from the book, these ex-alcoholics expect to establish new centers. Experience has shown that as soon as any community contains three or four active members, growth is inevitable, for the good reason that each member feels he must work with other alcoholics or perhaps perish himself.

Will the movement spread? Will all of these recoveries be permanent? No one can say. Yet, we at this hospital, from our observation of many cases, are willing to record our present opinion as a strong "Yes" to both questions.

This extraordinary book deserves the careful attention of anyone interested in the problem of alcoholism. Whether as victims, friends of victims, physicians, clergymen, psychiatrists or social workers there are many such, and this book will give them, as no other treatise known to this reviewer will, an inside view of the problem which the alcoholic faces. Gothic cathedral windows are not the only things, which can be truly seen only from within. Alcoholism is another. All outside views are clouded and unsure. Only one who has been an alcoholic and who has escaped the thralldom can interpret the experience.

This book represents the pooled experience of one hundred men and women who have been victims of alcoholism -- many of them declared hopeless by the experts -- and who have won their freedom and recovered their sanity and self-control. Their stories are detailed and circumstantial, packed with human interest. In America today the disease of alcoholism is increasing. Liquor has been an easy escape from depression. As an English officer in India, reproved for his excessive drinking, lifting his glass and said, "This is the swiftest road out of India," so many Americans have been using hard liquor as a means of flight from their troubles until to their dismay they discover that, free to begin, they are not free to stop. One hundred men and women in this volume, report their experience of enslavement and then of liberation.

The book is not in the least sensational. It is notable for its sanity, restraint, and freedom from over-emphasis and fanaticism. It is a sober, Careful, tolerant, sympathetic treatment of the alcoholic's problem and of the successful techniques by which its co-authors have won their freedom. The group sponsoring the book began with two or three ex-alcoholics, who discovered one another through a kindred experience. From this personal kinship a movement started, ex-alcoholic working for alcoholic without fanfare or advertisement, and the movement has spread from one city to another. This book presents the practical experience of this group and describes the methods they employ.

The core of their whole procedure is religious. They are convinced that for the hopeless alcoholic there is only one way out - the expulsion of his obsession by a Power greater than himself. Let it be said at once that there is nothing partisan or sectarian about this religious experience. Agnostics and atheists, along with Catholics, Jews and Protestants, tell their story of discovering the Power Greater Than Themselves. "WHO ARE YOU TO SAY THAT THERE IS NO GOD," one atheist in this group heard a voice say when, hospitalized for alcoholism, he faced the utter hopelessness of his condition. Nowhere is the tolerance and open-mindedness of the book more evident than in its treatment of this central matter on which the cure of all these men and women has depended.

They are not partisans of and particular form of organized religion, although they strongly recommend that some religious fellowship be found by their participants. By religion they mean an experience which they personally know and which has saved them from their slavery, when psychiatry and medicine had failed. They agree that each man must have his own way of conceiving God, but of God Himself they are utterly sure, and their stories of victory in consequence are a notable addition to William James' "Varieties of Religious Experience."

Although the book has the accent of reality and is written with unusual intelligence and skill, humor and modesty mitigating what could easily have been a strident and harrowing tale. - Harry Emerson Fosdick

BREAKING THE DRINK HABIT

In view of the extent of liquor consumption in the United States since the repeal of national Prohibition, a book recently published on the subject of liquor addiction and its remedy seems designed for a wide usefulness. This volume is entitled "Alcoholics Anonymous," issued by the Works Publishing Company in New York and contributed to by authors with experience in the overcoming of the drink habit.

The thesis of this book, as summarized by one reviewer, is that will power is not enough to enable the patient to break the hold of alcoholism, that he is more likely to win through if he suffuses his consciousness completely with some commanding idea which excludes the thought of alcohol or stimulants, and that for the surest prospect of success this overwhelming interest should be religion - "the idea of a force outside of himself."

It has indeed been proved true in case after case that something more than individual will power - or "won't" power - is necessary in order to heal what at least one special sanitarium recognizes in its advertising as "a disease." What indeed could be more effective than an absorbing conviction that, in the words of David, "God is my strength and power and he maketh my way perfect." Fortunately thousands are finding this knowledge a sure and gratifying defense.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS: By various writers. Cloth price $3.50. Works Publishing Co., 17 William St., Newark, N.J.

Over one hundred men and women who have recovered from a seemingly hopeless state of mind and body have contributed to this book. The stories of these individuals in their struggles physically and mentally to overcome alcoholic addiction are gripping. A physician writes in the introduction that the action of alcohol in chronic alcoholism is a manifestation of allergy. Therefore, hospitalization and proper treatment is often necessary to free the patient from his craving for liquor. When the mind is clear he is a candidate for psychological measures. This book deals principally with such measures as exemplified in the stories of alcoholics.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS: The story of how more than one hundred men have recovered from alcoholism. 400 pp. New York Works Publishing Co., 1939, $3.50.

The psychological aspect of alcoholism taxes the entire skill and intuition of the therapist, and the authors of this book claim that in the long run the ex-alcoholic patient who is properly trained in psychological method is an extremely effective person to bring about the cure of the neurotic alcoholic individual.

The first part of the book discusses methods, with particular stress on twelve steps in the recovery program. This program includes the general principles of psychotherapy found in such books as those by Durfee and Peabody. There is, however, an essentially new note, namely, that the alcoholic individual should be helped to admit to God, to himself and to another human being (preferably an ex-alcoholic patient) the exact nature of his personality deficit. Some will perhaps shy from the emphasis on God and religion until it is realized that the alcoholic patient is asked in this relation to believe sincerely in a power greater than himself. He then sees that his life is really unmanageable without this power.

The second part contains the stories of twenty-nine individuals who were cured by the method of working out their character problems in relation to God, themselves and another human being. All these individuals were "convinced by an ex-alcoholic therapist." Those who at some time must deal with the problem of alcoholism are urged to read this stimulating account.

The authors have presented their case well, in fact, in such good style that it may be of considerable influence when read by alcoholic patients.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS. The story of how more than one hundred men have recovered from alcoholism. Cloth. Price $3.50. 400 pp.. New York: Works Publishing Company. 1939.

The seriousness of the psychiatric and social problem represented by addiction to alcohol is generally underestimated by those not immediately familiar with the tragedies in the families of victims or the resistance addicts offer to any effective treatment. Many psychiatrists regard addiction to alcohol as having a more pessimistic prognosis than schizophrenia. For many years the public was beguiled into believing that short courses of enforced abstinence and catharsis in "institutes" and "rest homes" would do the trick, and now that the failure of such temporizing has become common knowledge, a considerable number of other forms of quack treatment have sprung up. The book under review is a curious combination of organizing propaganda and religious exhortation. It is in no sense a scientific book, although it is introduced by a letter from a physician who claims to know some of the anonymous contributors who have been "cured" of addiction to alcohol and have joined together in an organization, which would save other addicts by a kind of religious conversion. The book contains instructions as to how to intrigue the alcoholic addict into the acceptance of divine guidance in place of alcohol in terms strongly reminiscent of Dale Carnegie and the adherents of the Buchman ("Oxford") movement. The one valid thing in the book is the recognition of the seriousness of addiction to alcohol Other than this; the book has no scientific merit or interest.

ILLINOIS MEDICAL JOURNAL

TO THE EDITOR: Of great interest to the medical profession is the new approach to a cure for chronic alcoholism developed by alcoholics themselves.

Every physician has been confronted with the problem of the incurable alcoholic. He who although sobered and apparently sane as a result of medical aid suffers the usual and expected relapse and returns to the physician or to the sanitarium for another round of treatment. In his remorse he solemnly rejects alcohol in any form. He then endures a short period of sobriety and again returns to drunkenness.

Alcoholics are the last to admit their ability to "drink like gentlemen," and therefore are prone to devise ways and means, or systems for indulgence, which although inaugurated with sincere intent at the time seem never to serve their purpose. They act only as the forerunners to bigger and better sprees.

The chronic alcoholic seldom can be cured until he reaches a point at which he admits his inability to cope with his problem and has in addition a sincere desire to achieve complete and lasting sobriety.

The chronic alcoholic resents the efforts made by his relatives and friends to help him. He feels they do not understand him nor his problem. But when he talks to people who themselves have been drunkards he realizes that these people do understand for they have had the same personal experiences.

WITNESS: There is a book on alcohol you should read. It is published by The Alcoholic Foundation of New York (P.O. Box 658, Church Street Annex, New York). It's title: "Alcoholics Anonymous "The unnamed alcoholics write their own stories, and those stories are dynamite.

Two-thirds of them, they claim, have laid the foundation for permanent recovery. "More than half of us have had no relapse at all (after treatment) despite the fact that we have often been pronounced incurable "How were they cured? The method is simple: first of all they admitted they were powerless to overcome alcohol by themselves; second, they came to believe that "a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity;" third, they made a decision to "turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him"

There is more to the cure, but that's the heart of it. There may be some confirmed drinkers who will sneer at the method and the procedures, but they can't laugh off the fact that it has worked where other methods and procedures have failed.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS: How more than one hundred men have recovered from alcoholism. (New York: Works Publishing Company, Church St. Annex P.C., $3.50.)

As a youth we attended many "experience" meetings more as an onlooker than as a participant. We never could work ourselves up into a lather and burst forth in soapy bubbly phrases about our intimate states of feeling. That was our own business rather than something to brag about to the neighbors. Neither then nor now do we lean to the autobiographical, save occasionally by allusion to point a moral or adorn a tale, as the ancient adage put it.

This big book, i.e. big in words, is a rambling sort of camp meeting confession of experiences, told in the form of biographies of various alcoholics who had been to a certain institution and have provisionally recovered, chiefly under the influence of the "big brothers get together spirit." Of the inner meaning of alcoholism there is hardly a word. It is all on the surface material.

Inasmuch as the alcoholic, speaking generally, lives a wish-fulfilling infantile regression to the omnipotent delusional state, perhaps he is best handled for the time being at least by regressive mass psychological methods, in which, as is realized, religious fervors belong, hence the religious trend of the book. Billy Sunday and similar orators had their successes but we think the methods of Forel and of Bleuler infinitely superior.

ALCOHOLIC ANONYMOUS

(The story of how more than one hundred men have recovered from alcoholism.)

Publishing Company; 400 pages

This review covers the book, a discussion with the authors, and attendance at the meetings of the New York City group of Alcoholics Anonymous. Contact with this group increases one's respect for their work. To the layman, the book is very clear. To the professional person it is at first a bit misleading in that the spiritual aspect gives the impression that this is another revival movement. The book is simply and clearly written. It gives a vivid picture of the emotional predicament of the person suffering from serious alcoholism. It presents the disorder as a disease; a fatal disease in the social and physical sense. People who have benefited from the treatment tell their story in simple, compelling language. There are excellent descriptions of what happens to the family of an alcoholic. There is a sincerity and enthusiasm about the writing of this work that commands attention.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS seems to have succeeded in cases where the physician, the clergyman, the psychiatrist, or the social worker have failed. The method works only with the patient who really wants to get well; who is willing to face the truth about himself - his prejudices, his infantilism, his evasions. It effects its most phenomenal results with the patient who has gone so far that unless he does something drastic he will either become insane, kill himself in drink, or commit suicide. The patient must be willing to admit that he has failed, that he has no power over his drinking, that the "wet-nursing" of his family only makes him worse, that he must do this thing alone. In this frame of mind he selects someone to listen to his story but for the first time in his life he is being really honest with himself and admitting that he is responsible for the mess he has made of his life. When he must prove that he is willing to face reality by trying to patch up some of the antagonisms he has created around him. Then he is ready for some deeper reorganization of patterns. It is a sink or swim psychology; there is no pampering by the group and no protection. The group accepts the newcomer as an adult who really wants to get well; they will show him how but they won't do it for him. Having admitted he has no power over his drinking, he must be willing to allow a higher power to help him. This is no ready-made spiritual formula; it is not a church religion. It is a spiritual experience that somehow even extreme atheists seem to have been able to achieve. (One can watch the process of this change at the meetings of the group). The last step in the cure, the part that keeps the patient from slipping back into drink, is that he devotes himself to helping other alcoholics. The movement is kept alive by this type of work.

It is more impressive to the professional person to watch the technique in action than to read the book. The New York City group is made up of intelligent people, many college graduates, and many professional people. There is no holier-than-thou spirit prevailing, there is good fellowship, gaiety, fun, and a real desire to stay sober.

The work is organized under an Alcoholic Foundation, which prevents and alcoholic from obtaining a salary for doing the work. One or two of the group tried using the approach on a fee basis, but the spiritual aspect which keeps these people sober seemed to have died when the patient tried earning money this way; these few people found themselves drinking again and so returned to the volunteer relationship.

This new resource is developing groups all over the country. Social workers will find them of great help with the extreme cases of alcoholism. The book describes the method in detail - it is a layman's approach, a layman's book. It needs no explanation for the patient and should certainly be read by every alcoholic.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS: Works Publishing Company. 1939. $3.50.

Here is an impressive story of the achievement of more than one hundred men in gaining freedom from alcoholism. Evidence in this volume seems to indicate that medicine and psychiatry are powerless to cure many cases of alcoholism: heretofore there was no end in sight except death or insanity. But here is factual evidence that the worst alcoholic can gain mastery over this temptation if he admits that he is powerless and turns himself completely over to God. This spiritual technique demands genuine humility, sincere efforts to make amends for all wrongs done, continued fellowship with God through prayer and meditation, and efforts to help other alcoholics who are ready to relinquish the belief that they can resist alcohol through their own will power. The experience of these men seems to offer real hope that an effective technique has been discovered for conquering an enemy that has baffled doctors, psychiatrists, pastors and thousands of distressed families.

SOCIAL PROGRESS

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS: Works Publishing Company, New York, $3.50

Here is an unusual book. It is the dramatic recital of the experience of more than a hundred men and women in their fight against alcoholism, their victory, and their desire and determination to pass on to others the secret of their release. The group who has contributed to this book began with two or three alcoholics whose similar experiences drew them together. "To show other alcoholics precisely how we have recovered from a seemingly hopeless state of mind and body," says the introduction, "is the main purpose of this book."

Let it be said at the outset that there is nothing sensational in these stories, although they are filled with the drama of conflict, failure and final release. These writers believe that there is but one cure for the alcoholic. That is the realization of his own inability to cope with his repeated failures and the recognition of the reality of that Power greater than himself, whom we call God, to drive out his obsession. The head of one of the nation's great hospitals for the treatment of alcoholism and drug addiction contributes a statement to the introductory pages declaring that here is the working out of the principles of a sound "moral psychology."

The discussion of these principles is free of emotionalism. It is neither sectarian nor partisan, for men and women of all religions and of none, have contributed to the book "In our personal stories," says one writer, "you will find wide variation in the way in which each teller approaches and conceives of the Power greater than himself. One proposition, however, these men and women are strikingly agreed. Every one of them has gained access to, and believes in, a power greater than himself. This power has in each case accomplished the miraculous, the humanly impossible."

The movement has grown and spread without formal organization and groups are widely scattered over the country. Its members, mostly business and professional folk, go about their usual work, their avocation being to help others through their friendship and moral concern to find release.

For ministers, social workers, psychiatrists, and all others who are concerned with the rescue of those sick in mind and body, from the possession of the liquor habit, this book is a source of suggestion and inspiration.

TWELVE AGAINST ALCOHOL: By Herbert Ludwig Nossen, M.D, New York:

Harrison-Hilton Books, 1940. 246pp.

These two books are similar in that both present in great detail case histories of patients who are suffering from alcoholism. In this way many old established facts about alcoholism are brought again to our attention, such as the individual's early resort to alcohol as a means of solving his problems or temporizing his major adjustments in life, and the tragic and dramatic way in which the alcoholic drags down his entire family with him, to say nothing of the other social and economic repercussions. Reading these case histories, one becomes more than ever convinced that the excessive drinking of alcohol is one of the relatively minor phases of the individual's whole problem, particularly when one considers the faulty psychosexual adjustments and general immaturity and infantile characteristic of the alcoholic

For the successful treatment of a person who has become addicted to alcohol, there must of necessity be a revolutionary change in the patient's personality. The achievement of more adult attitudes and the marked turning away from older selfish, infantile patterns of behavior must involve an emotional upheaval. We are all aware that this inner emotional change is more necessary than a merely intellectual appreciation of one's difficulty, or what is called intellectual insight.

It will be interesting to see how the religious program set forth by Alcoholics Anonymous will work. It is not entirely new; it has been tried before.

WORLD CALL

June 1941

One of the most significant redemptive movements of our time is expressed in a large book of testimonies called Alcoholics Anonymous. It is written with the enthusiastic flair of discovery though its main thesis is as old as the history of Christian redemption.

Alcoholism is a disease. Physicians and psychiatrists have been working on it for years. It is a disease with an increasing prevalence. Many practicing physicians write it off as incurable. The present movement began with an individual who had been given up by the practitioners as hopeless. He was converted to religion and began to work out the practical effects of his conversion by trying to help other alcoholics. This method was found amazingly successful and has some of the professional physicians mystified. These alcoholics find that they need spiritual support and that their own cures are best secured by helping others with like affliction. They are forming an informal group of the saved. It is a movement worth encouraging.

SOME FACTS ABOUT THE BIG BOOK

THE A.A. GRAPEVINE

July 1955

The new edition has 612 pages, as against 400 pages in the old. In terms of cost it is the best non-fiction buy in the country. No other commercial publisher in America could match the book, in size and format alone, at its retail price.

The first edition runs to 100,000 words, the edition just off the press is 168,869.

The old edition contained 29 stories, about 1,800 words each, the new edition has 37 -- 24 of them brand new -- and all of them running to twice the length (or about 3,300 words) of the earlier work. The new stories are more detailed and more explicit, more revealing, and of more useful contrast and variety.

The geographical spread, in the new book, is far greater: 15 cities, 10 states, and two foreign countries.

The vocational range is immense: buyer, industrial executive, surgeon, banker, writer, educator, soldier, insurance agent, advertising executive, furniture dealer, stock farmer, beautician, charwoman, truck driver, insurance investigator, salesman, real estate agent, promoter, accountant, sculptor, journalist, upholsterer, organizational executive, patent expert, lawyer, doctor, and housewife. The most numerous in this list is the housewife -- with six stories.

There are 110,000 words of absolutely new material, yet the practical, therapeutical, and expository first 175 pages of the original work are here intact. These pages have already gone into the American legend as the "greatest redemptive force of the twentieth century." And these pages will remain there, through the full history of man's pursuit of maturity.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS (Second Edition)

Alcoholics Anonymous Publishing Co., July 16, 1955.

This book is a revision of the first edition originally published in 1939, which has gone through 300,000 copies. Not only does it tell the appalling story of alcoholism, but it also serves to give a deep insight into the philosophy and functioning of A.A.

Five chapters devoted to the relationship of the alcoholic to his wife and family contain many instances of marital and domestic difficulties, their meaning and methods of handling them. Spouses and families that have been spared the presence of an alcoholic can never fully appreciate what it means to have a family member a victim. These chapters dispel many of the misconceptions and false notions of how the alcoholic should be treated, and they offer many sound suggestions in this area.

The second part of the book contains thirty-seven case histories of alcoholics. Twelve of these relate to pioneers of A. A.; twelve tell about people who stopped drinking in time. The remainder are inspirational in nature.

At the present time A.A. numbers more than 150,000 members. In view of its short history, less than twenty years, this is a phenomenal growth. Since we have over 800,000 problem drinkers in the U.S. it is immediately obvious that hospitalization is impossible even if it were feasible. Because of this fact, efforts like A.A. take on a practical urgency. As the book well indicates, A.A. does not seek to supplant the psychiatrist or medical man. However, the group experiences of A.A. have evidently been sufficiently strong to help chronic alcoholics take the steps necessary for their rehabilitation.

This book is a welcome addition to the literature on alcoholism. It has value for the alcoholic who is seeking help, his family and friends and even the persons professionally concerned with his treatment and recovery.

"THE BIG BOOK" BIBLE FOR ALCOHOLICS

There was a time when the organization known as Alcoholics Anonymous, which has become one of the greatest boons to the drunkards of the world, had a membership, which was a little lopsided. On its rolls the Bowery was better represented than Park Avenue, a fact deplored by the organization's leaders. So, recognizing that the rich can become just as alcoholic as the poor, the organization decided to do something about it. Acting on its long-held tenet that only a sober ex-drunk can cure a down-and-out drunk, the A.A. leaders looked around for an ex-drunk with glamour and the ability to speak the Park Avenue language. They found it in an ex-drunk countess. The result: Park Avenue became as well represented as the Bowery on the rolls of A.A.

Now, in the past few years, another change has taken place in the membership of A.A. -- a change that has proved even more important than that accomplished by the countess, but which was comparatively unnoticed by the public-at-large until last month. At that time A.A. held its was chairman with the remark that "Physicians in general are admitting that the lay healers are doing remarkable work." Asked at the end of the conference to expand his comment, he said, "We know that if we are going to make any real advance we must tap every source of knowledge and healing there is. Not only lay therapists, but lawyers, clergymen, and social workers are successfully helping and treating the alcoholic. . . This means treating someone who is emotionally sick or hurt or down or sometimes weak. Certainly physicians have no corner on it. There is no magic to it. And no royal road."

Again at the Council's three-day symposium held in Philadelphia last December, under the auspices of the Association for the advancement of Science, the achievements of lay healers were touched upon. Some of the healers read papers, and at the informal luncheon and dinner conversations they were listened to and even deferred to by the medical scientists.

To learn the consensus of opinion I questioned forty of the leading medical authorities who attended the symposium either as participants or audience. Thirty-four of them admitted that, in face of the evidence, the lay therapists were getting the best results. Some of them went so far as to say that the laymen were curing cases which the physicians had pronounced incurable.

The six who held back were not complete dissidents. Their difference was a difference in their school of thought. Unlike their colleagues who believe that alcoholism is caused by some deep mental and emotional disturbance of which drinking is only a symptom, and that its cure must therefore be mental, they contend that its cause lies in some fundamental chemical derangement and that its cure must therefore be chemical.

"We grant you," said one of them, "that a drunkard may be cured of the drinking habit, but that does not mean he is cured of alcoholism. For the fact remains that alcohol is a poison to him. And if at any time he takes to drinking again, no matter how moderately he may begin, he will again end up as a drunkard. The alcoholic may be said to be completely healed only when he can drink without disaster. Some day some bright young chemist will emerge from his laboratory with some chemical which will do away with the allergy which makes the systems of some people intolerant to alcohol. Then the cure for alcoholism will have been found.

"In the meantime," he concluded, "I'll gladly give credit to the laymen who are doing so much to arrest the disease by curing the drunkards of drinking."

I am not of course presuming to decide which of the two schools is right. Since it is the excessive drinking which causes all the havoc in alcoholism, what really matters is the apparent agreement on both sides that drunkenness can be healed and that the lay therapists are breaking all past records in the number of their healings.

Now when I use the terms "alcoholic" and "drinker" I am not referring to the casual convivialist nor to the extreme cases in which the patients' minds have lost all touch with reality. They are the physicians' private enigma. I mean the man or woman whose abilities, health, and social graces have been dissipated by constant drinking and who is not able to stop it without help from the outside.

And when in this instance I speak of the layman I do not include the charlatans who make false claims for their patent nostrums. I am thinking only of those therapists whose accomplishments are acknowledged by the physicians and who work along with them in their diagnoses, consulting them as the individual cases may warrant.

Specifically, these fall into three groups:

the trained psychologists with whom treating alcoholism is a profession; religious healers; and former alcoholics with whom healing is an avocation.

The professional psychologists are not many. They are exclusive, accepting only a few patients at a time. And they are expensive. As I have already gone into their methods of work in a previous number of this magazine I shall now say only that they are skilled, painstaking, and highly successful, and it is a pity that there are not more of them and at a price which the middle class could more easily afford. The religious healers are doing some excellent salvage work, particularly among the poor. To go into their technic would involve a discussion of articles of faith for which I am not prepared. So I shall confine myself to the third group, the men who have been alcoholics themselves and who, having been cured, are now spreading out like a network and with an efficacy that is convincing to the most conservative medical men.

That they are meeting with success should not, however, be either astounding or extraordinary. For the truth is that while all along the doctors--and I am only echoing them when I say so--have been trying to find out what alcohol does to the alcoholic, nobody has tried to find out what it does for him. But these men know the whole bitter story. They know the drive of drink, its satisfactions and elations. They know the sting of its broken resolutions, as they are drawn back to it again and again. They know its jubilations and deep despairs. They know the things, so infinitesimal to the balanced temperament, which set the drinker on edge and send him into his cups as a way of escape. They know his whims and his disinclinations. How he thinks, how he feels, how he rationalizes are well-worn pages to them.

This is not to say that every alcoholic who has been straightened out is qualified to heal others. But among them there are many whose highly sensitive and intelligent natures, added to a capacity for making friends, fit them peculiarly for this highly specialized curative art. As a further aid there is that strong bond between drinkers which makes it easy for the man who has been down and is up again to reach those who are still down or groping.

II

In order to keep their record straight, before going into their processes, it must be noted that their therapeutic definitions and principles coincide with those of the medical specialists. They recognize alcoholism as a "fugal" disease, meaning that it is made up of several strains, each one of which is involved in the others. There is the first cause which is usually some circumstance or event in early environment which sets up an "imbalance" in the personality, making it difficult or even impossible for those who are thus afflicted to face the realities of life. Or it may be some inherent tendency, such as a highly strung nervous system, which is aggravated by some such circumstance as I have mentioned. As a second or remote cause, there are the problems which arise in every life and which the unbalanced temperament is not able to cope with. Third, there is the drinking, which is the means of escape and a symptom of the disease at the same time.

If the disease is to be cured every one of its elements must be taken into consideration. The first cause must be detected and explained away. The patient must be taught how to face his problems as they come to him. And he must be given new interests to take the place of his former interest in drinking.

Two further points should be borne in mind. To be healed of alcoholism the drinker must have the desire to stop drinking and he must be willing to face a future in which he will never again be able to take a drink. For in the annals of medical science there is no record of a man's having been healed of alcoholism unless he had taken the cure of his own volition. Nor is there any record of a reformed drunkard who was ever able to drink moderately without going the whole way down hill again.

With the perspective clear, let us look into the process of this new lay therapy through the story of one of its practitioners.

Mr. Ex, as we shall know him, began to drink when he was a student at college during the prohibition era. By the time he was thirty-five he had been arrested for drunken and disorderly conduct in a chain of ports around the world. More to please his parents than himself he had taken the "cure" in five expensive alcoholic retreats, only to drink more on coming out of them than he had before going in. Outstanding psychiatrists had told his father that his type of alcoholism was rarely curable.

Then something he does not speak of happened to make him want to stop drinking. With all that he had learned about drinking and the drinker in his fifteen years' carousal he was able to stop by himself. During the months when he was striving for equilibrium he found peace through helping one of his former companions at the bar. Five years have passed during which he has devoted his leisure to this curative work, and he has a number of difficult cases to his credit.

His technic is simple. He employs no formidable terminology, as his experience has been that the ominous vocabulary of some practitioners is confusing and repellant to the sick and jittery mind. Since no two cases are alike, his approach comes by intuition, and the discipline and text emerge out of each case as it moves along.

According to Mr. Ex, ninety-five out of every hundred drunkards have the deep desire to stop drinking. Only a few will admit it. They think it is a confession of weakness; or they are afraid of becoming unpopular in their social group; or they cannot face the knowledge that liquor has got the best of them. And any direct suggestion from their family that they see the doctor or take a cure drives them farther into their cups.

Therefore Mr. Ex's approach is the more subtle one of man to man. He goes out where drinkers congregate. The man he is looking for may be someone he knows or whose family has asked him to step in and take hold. He never talks shop until he is sure he is on firm ground. A glass of tomato juice may evoke a question or the lift of an eyebrow, to which his answer implies that he has had more than his share of gin. A comparison of symptoms and an exchange of reminiscences may follow. By degrees the drinker may be led to unload his troubles and the friendship is established.

From there it is a short step to his admission that he wants to stop his drinking--a cue for Mr. Ex to ask him why he doesn't stop. He may say that it will make a sap out of him. The response to that is that only a strong man can give it up. Or he may say that he is thinking of going to an institution--then when he comes out he can take a few drinks without wanting to get drunk.

"At this point," Mr. Ex says, "I tell him what happened to me not once, but five different times when I thought I had been cured and could take a drink. What I am doing all this time is leading him to a mood where I can ask him to play ball with me. Just how I do so depends of course on the personality I am trying to reach."

The most difficult alcoholics to approach are those who take alcohol as a narcotic to avoid the pains and the realities of living. Most often they have to go through some devastating experience before they are ready to give it up. However it comes, it is only when the patient expresses a real desire to be cured that the cure begins. Somewhere at the outset when a diplomatic moment presents itself he is persuaded to see the doctor for a general going-over. Regular meals and exercise for those who can take it are prescribed. And work. If the patient still has his job so much the better. If not something absorbing is found to keep his mind employed at some spot away from himself and his former rendezvous.

Some alcoholics cannot stand the strain of giving up liquor all at once; they can be led to taper off. When they find they are able to go any length of time without a drink their morale shoots upward. Curiously enough, the first few weeks of abstinence are not always the hardest. For the old urgency has a way of turning up at the end of the second or third month, trying to beat them down again. Mr. Ex's prescription for such hours is immediate action--a brisk walk, a bus ride, the movies, or even a telephone call--any interlude that will bring about a change of thought. As such temptations are resisted they recur less frequently until finally they are gone never to return. A good exercise in resistance is to walk past bars until one is able to ignore one's own favorite bar in the same way. A patient who can do this half a dozen times is ready to enter a bar or go where drinking is without taking a drink. When he has gone successfully through this ordeal he is well fortified for complete recovery.

Mr. Ex is devoting the gratuities he receives for his treatments to a fund with which he is establishing an Alcoholic Consultation Bureau in the city where he lives. It is to be a county center where those with drinking problems of their own or those who have a drinker in the family may go for treatment or advice, safe in the knowledge that their confidence and identity will be respected. If it proves effective he hopes that it will become a model for other communities to follow.

III

At the time the previous article on this subject was published I received hundreds of letters from Harper readers in many parts of the country. They came from men and women in many walks who laid bare their most intimate personal sorrows as they asked me to advise them about some member of the family who was drinking to excess. There was little I could tell them. Psychiatric treatments were beyond what most of them could afford or there were no psychiatrists in their localities. In some instances psychiatry had been tried and had failed. The few reliable private institutions I knew of were too remote or too costly. Most of the public hospitals, if there were any in the communities, had no alcoholic ward. The public mental hospitals, generally speaking, were insane asylums from which the discharged alcoholic patients were known to be worse off than when they had entered.

It is to such people as these, people who do not know where to turn for help that Alcoholics Anonymous, the group of men I mentioned in the first part of this article, are hoping to have something to say.

This organization, which now has a membership of over two thousand and centers in fifty localities that embrace all of our States except a few in the Middle West between the Rocky Mountains and the Mississippi River, had its beginning in the healing of one man, a Wall Street broker whom we shall speak of as Mr. Jones. After a drinking career of fifteen years in which he had built his ration of gin up to two quarts a day, he was pronounced a hopeless alcoholic. Some time before this verdict a friend who had been cured of dipsomania with the help of a religious group had told of his experience with such simple precision that Mr. Jones had been challenged by it. Thinking now of what the doctors had said, his mind reverted to his friend, and he sought the same aid. "In a week," says Mr. Jones, "I had taken my last drink. In a month my appetite for liquor was completely gone."

Shortly after this a business trip took him to Akron, Ohio, where he remained to help a former crony who had lost his job and was without the prospect of another, as the title of "confirmed drunkard" had been conferred upon him by the townspeople. This friend healed one of his own friends. Mr. Jones did likewise. By the time he was ready to return to New York he and his patients had made plans for a full-time avocation of healing alcoholism and for starting a healing movement across the country.

Mr. Jones realized that, while drinkers may have their similarities, no two of them are ever alike in nature. If he were to reach out toward all those who needed help he saw that he would have to broaden his therapy, which up to this time had been wholly religious. Back in New York, he and his wife took five non-paying alcoholics into their home for study and experimentation. In healing them he was able to formulate a set of elastic principles capable of spanning a wide area of cases.

In 1936--two years after it had been started--the movement had spread with such rapidity that money was needed for office purposes. Two or three of the members felt -that if they could take the time to collaborate on a book about their experiences they would be able to raise the necessary amount. Someone told Mr. John D. Rockefeller of the recoveries they had effected. After he had looked into their activities he made it possible for them to take the time to write the book. When it was ready to be published a group of Mr. Rockefeller's associates consented to form a Board of Trustees to handle the royalties as they accrued.

Last year, with the work speeding forward, Mr. Rockefeller felt that what it now needed was "not money but standing." At a dinner given by him to two hundred of the country's most prominent men he invited Mr. Jones to speak. What he had to say was verified and approved by medical scientists and clergymen through such spokesmen as Dr. Foster Kennedy and the Reverend Harry Emerson Fosdick. The honorarium of three thousand dollars raised that evening, together with royalties from the book, maintain a small office in downtown New York. Mr. Jones's salary is thirty dollars a week. "I have a strong feeling," he explains, "that if I were to commercialize my services within the group by accepting money I should impair my effectiveness."

Among the members of Alcoholics Anonymous are lawyers, doctors, clerks, chauffeurs, stenographers, and housewives, and they are of all ages between the early twenties and the late sixties. Out of two thousand current cases, ninety-five per cent of whom are employed, one thousand have not tasted liquor since they attended their first meeting. For some this means three months. For others, six years. Five hundred have -slipped a bit now and then, but they are out of the quicksands. The other five hundred are not yet quite sure that they want to be cured, or they are suffering from the more doubtful forms of the disease; but they are being helped.

It has been said that the technic has the mark of Buchmanism. It probably has, and of other religious groups and healing methods. For it is a synthesis of everything that has proved useful in the whole field of alcoholic diagnosis and treatment. A movement that has for its purpose a crusade of mutual assistance in which one drinker becomes therapist for another, it is open to anyone who drinks too much and cannot stop of himself. Two exactions only are demanded of him. He must be sincere in his wish to be healed. He must have the desire to help his fellow drinkers. Anonymity is maintained because of the extreme sensitiveness of the alcoholic to prejudice or ridicule. And it prevents giving offense to relatives or to doctors and spiritual advisers, all of whom have their redemptive parts to play.

The actual phases of the treatment are not fundamentally different from other mental therapies. But the instruments are not the same and the terminology is non-existent. The "mental catharsis" of the psychologists becomes here the simple business of talking out loud to an audience made up of those who are taking the cure themselves. These open meetings are practical forums in which the members exchange points of view and offer suggestions under the leadership of the more experienced therapists such as Mr. Jones. Once a week the families of the patients are invited to special meetings where the care of convalescents is the main topic of conversation.

Another important step is the mental inventory in which the patient lists his virtues and his faults as an aid to self-appraisal. It is from this evaluation that the pattern of adjustment, the vital core of rehabilitation, is drawn. (It is what the psychiatrists call "personality change.") For instance, if a member has mistreated his wife, neglected his family, or been dishonest in his business dealings, or quarreled with his neighbor, he must not only change his ways, but he must try somehow to repair the damage he has caused. Whatever his troubles, he is given ample opportunity to talk about them; for it is through such disclosures that the real cause of his malady reveals itself. Instead of evading his problems, as he has in the past, he is taught how to solve them. And if he strikes a snag he knows where to go for help--and it will be to someone who has been through the same experience and will therefore be able to give him a sympathetic and helpful hearing.

As the treatments progress he is directed toward some interest absorbing enough to take his mind away from liquor. Sometimes he may find his release in the recognition of a Supreme Being, a Power outside of himself who is greater than himself. There have been a number of cases in which this religious awakening has broken the spell of the exaggerated egotism which was one of the persistent causes of his illness. However, no compulsion is put upon the patient. He makes his own choice. About sixty per cent of the members of Alcoholics Anonymous are deists. Many who have not been to church since they were children have returned to their faiths. And there are not a few atheists among them. For most of them the great hobby that holds their enthusiasm is the help they are giving to one another. "It is a great satisfaction," said one of them who was in the advanced stages of the disease when he was enrolled, "to know that you are marking the difference between life and death for someone."

The processes employed in the course of treatment are not allowed to become stagnant. "We are always experimenting," Mr. Jones explained. "We try something and if it doesn't work we throw it out. What we are striving for is a progressive and ever more flexible system of healing which will cover more and more of the peculiar effects of alcoholism on the many diverse human personalities."

IV

The layman's burden I have indicated is not for the shoulders of the therapist alone. The family of the alcoholic--parents, sisters and brothers, sons and daughters, husbands and wives--may very well be the deciding factor in the success or failure of his cure, just as they are often the chief contributors to the disturbance which causes the illness. Because of this possibility some physicians will not treat certain patients unless they are removed from their homes until recovery is pretty well assured. And all healers make every effort to gain the co-operation of relatives as a precaution against relapse. When families fail it is not as a rule because they are contrary or apathetic, but because they do not know the rules.

For their benefit I am setting down a list of things to be remembered which I have gleaned from these specialists:

The convalescent needs care and sympathy, not nagging and recrimination. He must, until you are sure that his recovery is complete, be handled with silken gloves. For he has been through a devastating purgatory. Invalid though he is, he wants to be treated like a man and not a child. Yet, paradoxically, he must in some things be looked after as if he were a child. Great care must be given to his diet. Some medical scientists are now thinking that alcoholism may be due to lack of sufficient vitamins in the drinker's system. Tomato and orange juice, carrots, beets, celery, wild rice, milk, eggs, good red meat (if his blood pressure is normal), and some chocolate and sweets (if he is not diabetic), are some of the foods that

Dan Anderson, addiction treatment pioneer and former Hazelden president, dies at age 81

Dan Anderson, former Hazelden president and a founder and primary architect of the Minnesota Model, the preeminent method of addiction treatment for the past 40 years, died February 19, 2003 at St. Croix Regional Medical Center in St. Croix Falls, Wis.

Anderson, of Taylors Falls, Minn., was 81. "Dr. Anderson was a pioneering father of Hazelden whose wisdom, curiosity and great integrity are a cornerstone of our model of care," said Ellen L. Breyer, president and CEO of the Hazelden Foundation. "His work has literally touched the lives of millions of people." Anderson is best known for his revolutionary ideas on treating alcoholism and for developing, expanding and sharing the Minnesota Model [35] during his 30 years at the Hazelden Foundation in Center City, Minn. Many addiction treatment centers in the United States and worldwide, including the Mayo Clinic and the Betty Ford Center, emulated the Hazelden model of care. In Anderson's biography, [36] John Schwarzlose, president of the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif., recounts how in 1980 Anderson was extremely helpful in the planning of the Betty Ford Center. Schwarzlose refers to Anderson as his mentor, one who "always had the best interests of patients at heart in his work. Some in Dan's position would have seen the Betty Ford Center as a potential threat to Hazelden's preeminence. Dan's reaction, however, was not only to graciously agree to help, but to encourage our center to improve on what Hazelden had done." "The Minnesota Model represented a social reform movement that humanized the treatment of people addicted to alcohol and other drugs," said Jerry Spicer, former Hazelden president and author of The Minnesota Model: The Evolution of the Multidisciplinary Approach to Addiction Recovery. [37] "Dan played a major role in transforming treatment wards from 'snake pits' into places where alcoholics and addicts could retain their dignity." "Dan showed tremendous care and compassion for people suffering from alcoholism, especially during a time when it wasn't popular to do so," said Gordy Grimm, a long-time friend, associate, and fellow pioneer of the model. "He did as much as anyone to raise awareness that alcoholism is a treatable chronic disease. His work touched the lives of millions of people and greatly reduced the stigma of this disease." As a psychologist at Willmar State Hospital in the 1950s, Anderson and Nelson Bradley, superintendent of the hospital, were dedicated to finding an effective way to address "inebriates," a group that was considered "at the bottom of the patient pecking order" at that time, Anderson said in a 1998 interview. "Everyone looked down on them, including the community, hospital staff, and even our mentally ill patients. The inebriates had a lower status than the schizophrenics and the manic depressives, or even the kleptomaniacs or pedophiles." The prevailing view during the 1940s and '50s was that alcoholics were weak on willpower, and if they ended up on the streets, they probably deserved to be there. But Anderson was intent on helping this population. He saw the tremendous value of Alcoholics Anonymous and made the Twelve Steps of AA the foundation of the model. Anderson and Bradley viewed alcoholism as a primary disease, a disease of the body, mind and spirit. Their theory was that alcoholism is a multiphasic illness that needs to be addressed by a multidisciplinary team of professionals (counselors, spiritual care specialists, psychologists, psychiatrists, physicians, recreational therapists, and more). The Twelve Step multidisciplinary approach to addiction treatment is an idea that was introduced at Willmar State Hospital and more fully evolved under Anderson's direction at Hazelden. Some thought Anderson was "giving away the store," but he was simply passing on knowledge that would help as many addicted people and their loved ones as possible. After he retired from Hazelden, Anderson said, "We probably did more good at Hazelden through the people we've trained than through the work we've done to treat people." The idea for sharing the Minnesota Model was a big part of the Hazelden mission under Anderson's leadership. Anderson was a huge proponent of passing on Hazelden's knowledge through consultation, training and education. He was a popular lecturer, both nationally and internationally, and wrote numerous essays, articles and books on addiction topics. Two essays still regarded as classics include "The Psychopathology of Denial" and "Behavioral Management of Chronic Illness." He taught for more than 30 years at the Rutgers Summer School of Alcohol Studies and lectured frequently at the University of Minnesota's Chemical Dependency Counselor Certificate Program. He was active as a member or consultant for many professional associations. His honors and achievements were numerous and included the Rutgers Summer School of Alcohol Studies 1982 Outstanding Achievement Award; the 1984 Nelson J. Bradley Outstanding Service Award from the National Association of Alcoholism Treatment Programs; the First Annual President's Award from the Minnesota Chemical Dependency Association; an honorary Doctor of Science degree from the University of Minnesota in 1987; and the Distinguished Alumni Award for 2000 from the University of St. Thomas. Anderson was born in Minneapolis on March 30, 1921. He earned his bachelor of arts degree from the College of St. Thomas in 1950, his master of arts in clinical psychology from Loyola University in Chicago in 1956, and his Ph.D. in clinical psychology from the University of Ottawa in 1966. Anderson served as a clinical psychologist at Willmar State Hospital from 1952 to 1961 and was a consultant and lecturer for Hazelden from 1957 to 1961. He joined Hazelden full time in 1961 and was executive vice president and director there until 1971. He served as president of Hazelden from 1971 until his retirement in 1986. He remained active in the field as president emeritus of Hazelden in the following years. Anderson, who lived in Taylors Falls, Minn., for the past 38 years, is survived by his wife Marie; two sisters, Dawn Birra and Colleen Hammerlund; 10 children, sons Dennis, David, Dean and Doug and daughters Monica LaVigne, Colleen Anderson, Cheryl Anderson, Patti Anderson, Corinne Anderson and Cindi Foster; 15 grandchildren and one great grandchild. The family requested that memorial's in Dan's honor be given to the Hazelden recognize him. He gets $4 a pint for his blood, a sum which is immediately translatable into a couple of gallons of muscatel.

Are you a member in good standing of the Officers' Club? Then, try Congress Avenue in Houston. You may recognize the man I saw there. He was a lieutenant colonel, up from the ranks, sir. Or check Clark Street in Chicago for a West Pointer, or Howard Street in San Francisco for an Annapolis man.

Did you know a linguist? Scout the Madison Street jungle in Chicago. Because a derelict there surprised a cop by speaking to him in Gaelic. An assistant state's attorney got Italian from him. Later he lapsed into Chinese. A Greek lawyer, called in, said his Greek was good. "Sure, he could get by," the lawyer explained. "You see, he doesn't speak modern Greek much. Just classical Greek."

This man won't be hard to find. He's a Negro.

I traveled 8,000 miles before I met somebody I knew myself. I ran into a schoolmate on the corner of Stanton Street and the Bowery in New York at seven fifty one morning. (A saloon on Stanton Street hands out "coffee and " each morning when the doors are opened at 8:00 A.M.) My old schoolmate was waiting. He laughed when he saw me and said, "you're getting fat. You drink too much beer." Meeting him cost $5.

I started this tour of Skid Row in Chicago where I met Captain Joseph Graney of the Desplaines Street Police Station. The captain made me a little bet.

"If you're going all over the country to look at Skid Row I'll lay you 15 to 5 you meet an old friend," he predicted. "And I'll tell you something else. You'll meet guys who talk better than you, think better than you, and dress better than you. But you just won't meet anybody as lucky as you."

The captain was right on all counts.

Alcohol: the Cause or the Result?

Skid Row is the end of the road for thousands of Americans. It is a jungle of crumbling tenements, twisted shacks and filthy alleys. It is an open jail for men who are guilty of no greater crime than being poor, or not getting along with their wives, or just being lonesome. Sure, many drink, but no man can honestly say whether alcohol is the cause or the result of their hopelessness.

Skid Rows are at their gaudiest in big cities, but if there are 5,000 or more people in your town, chances are you have a Skid Row of sorts. You think not? How about that part of the city where the ne'er-do-wells gather—a couple of drunks, the old panhandler, the shiftless handy man, the fellow who never amounted to much after the war (pick your own war) and the village idiot? That's Skid Row.

If you live in a big city you know the place. In New York it's the Bowery, biggest and cruelest of them all. Chicago has two small Rows plus bloodstained Madison Street. There is also Howard Street in gracious San Francisco, the dirtiest, drinkingest and most depressing thoroughfare in the land. In Los Angeles it's Fifth Street off South Main where the bartenders direct you to the nearest blood bank when you run out of money and need some quick cash.

Proud and booming Houston has its Congress Avenue where the bums try to talk like Gene Autry, try to look like him, and never spill a grain of tobacco as they roll their own with quivering hands. In Kansas City, the flophouses on Main Street and the tin-can shacks on the banks of the Missouri have at one time or another housed a great Middle Western brain surgeon, a millionaire" son, a farm equipment engineer who was the best man in his business, and wonder of wonders, Missouri's leading madam.

Dungarees or blue jeans are the traditional uniform of Skid Row, but a neatly dressed man excites no interest. He can be a sightseer, a businessman off on a bender, or one of the highly prosperous gentlemen who run the saloons, flophouses, barber colleges, pawnshops or two-bit movie houses that infest the jungle.

The saloons sell 10-cent gin at a profit. Barber colleges are numerous because there are always plenty of men in the neighborhood who are willing to shed a few drops of blood in return for a free shave. The two-bit movie houses provide a comfortable place to sleep despite the endless gunfire exploding from the sound tracks of the old Westerns that are Skid Row's customary cinema fare.

I spent a month on the Skid Rows of the nation and visited all these exotic hangouts of the unlucky and the unwary. I also visited a quiet old building on Hillhouse Avenue in New Haven, Connecticut. In it work some of the brilliant and consecrated men who are devoting their lives to studying alcoholism. If anything is to be done for Skid Row bums, the whys and wherefores of drunkenness must first be understood. The men at the Yale Clinic are trying.

To the vast majority of people liquor is refreshment, a part of good and congenial living. And wine, always more exotic than the hard stuff, recalls the warmth, the richness and the good taste suggested by its historic use in religious ceremony.

That's what alcohol generally means to most of us. But to the 90 per cent of the Skid Row population who are chronic drunks, alcohol-in any form-is the be-all and end-all of their sordid existence. It is pursued as other men seek fame, fortune or the third blonde from the end.

The other 10 per cent live there for financial reasons, usually because their earnings or their pensions permit nothing better. Some are ducking alimony payments or more serious complications. Others simply are misers. Many old-timers eke out their last days in fleabags because they can find companionship there without the regimentation to be faced in the Old Folks Home.

But the typical Skid Row bum will drink anything. Three Chicago policemen, planted inside a stolen automobile in a garage, watched one bum tap an engine and then lie on his back to catch the spouting antifreeze alcohol. Rubbing alcohol and other forms distilled from wood are diluted or "cut" to make "smoke," a universal Skid Row drink.

Bay rum, hair tonic and canned heat are also widely used. The solid canned heat is reduced to liquid by putting it in a piece of thin cloth and then squeezing it. The resulting poison is known among the cognoscenti as a "Pink Lady."

Death or blindness is the frequent end result of this kind of drinking. As a minor note in a major tragedy, "smoke," "Pink Ladies" and the like do not produce the sense of well-being common to accepted alcoholic drinks. They merely numb, render unconscious and perhaps bring on death.

An oft-used drink along Skid Row, however, is wine. Fortified wines. They run slightly over 20 per cent alcohol and are therefore about half the strength of a shot of whisky.

There is a popular police theory across the nation that the "winos" (or "wineos" as some Chicagoans call them) will drink fortified wines because they keep a man drunk longer. The winos disagree. I was told at least a hundred times in response to my question, "I drink wine because I can't afford whisky." When a Skid Row bum does have a stake he drinks hard liquor.

The business of getting drunk starts with the dawn. The haggard man walks around with one hand outstretched. In that hand is a nickel or a dime. He hails each passing comrade with "I got a dime." The other in turn sings back how much he has. They join forces and continue the search for a third and fourth, or until they have among them enough to get a bottle.

There are certain customs and etiquettes observed. The largest contributor usually gets the first drink, but after that it is rotation drinking without regard to contribution. If two men have enough to buy a pint they will do so, but not three. Three will wait until they have a fourth, and perhaps even a fifth man, in order to get a larger bottle. A non-contributor often can get a drink. However, custom limits him to just one, unless he has spent the night in jail. He may then join the rotation. These gentle rules apply everywhere except in New York. There, Bowery protocol is: No money, no drink.

Shelter is a distant second need to alcohol in the Skid Row pattern. Food is a bad third. Even in the mildest of weather the bum wants a bed or, as he calls it, a "flop." He knows he must sleep and his need for a bed is one per cent comfort and 99 per cent sheer survival. If he sleeps in a park or an alley he can reasonably expect to have his shoes stolen and his pockets sliced out of his pants. He will be too drunk either to know or to resist.

Many Names for Flophouses

The commonest of Skid Row shelters are the flophouses. The entrepreneurs of these substandard stables prefer to call their hostelries "lodginghouses." The clients of the "lodging-houses" prefer such basic descriptive terminology as "fleabag," "scratch house," "flop-house" and a long series of accurate, but unprintable names. Prices vary slightly the country over, but the difference is not great. In general a dormitory cot costs a quarter and a private room usually sets a guest back about a half dollar.

The private rooms, called "bird cages," are six feet by four feet and contain a bed and locker. The walls are built at least two feet short of the ceiling, and wire netting stretches across the top of each cell. This netting is a ventilating device, and as the evening wears on, ventilation progressively becomes less of a blessing.

Each floor of a flophouse has a few "suites." These are rooms which have windows. They rent for 15 or 20 cents more than the regular rooms. They also have electric lights, a rarity in the majority of lodginghouses.

Many flophouses are patent firetraps. New York and Chicago recently cracked down on the proprietors. But they remain firetraps, nevertheless.

Anybody (male) gets into a flophouse by plopping down the necessary fee and muttering a name to the clerk. The clerk tosses the guest a key and scribbles down his interpretation of the name.

All you get for your money is a flop. If you smoke you get tossed out. If you have a visitor in your room you both get thrown out. If you make any noise (Not uncommon when you go to bed with a jug) you get the heave-ho. Seldom does anybody get his money back when evicted.

Credit regulations are basic the country over. There is no credit except for the steadiest customers and pensioners. A steady customer is defined as a man in residence for more than six years. He can expect two nights' lodging on credit, then out he goes. The pensioner gets a better break simply because his check comes to the hotel, and the management forces him to endorse it on the spot. These rare courtesies are likely to be withdrawn immediately if the recipient forgets to tip the clerk. Strangely, the itinerant guests invariably tip the clerk a nickel or a dime.

Some Skid Row bums, usually pensioners, live in the same flophouse 15 and 20 years. Two of the Four Horsemen gallop the corridors of the nation's fleabags 24 hours a day. The ambulance and the hearse are almost as common as the patrol wagon which makes regular rounds picking up drunks out of the gutters.

It is impossible to get statistics on the Skid Row death rate but Chicago, whose Skid Row population varies seasonably between 7,000 (spring and summer) and 15,000 (winter), reported last winter that 50 corpses a month are found in the Skid Row area. Another 50 persons are removed from Skid Row to die in hospitals.

Missions sometimes have dormitories and "bird cages." The missions are cleaner and invariably more expensive than a hotel flop. They are not popular with Skid Row bums because their admittance requirements are higher than the flophouses.

In many cities there are also dilapidated rooming houses which usually cater to a reasonably permanent clientele. A lady in Kansas City runs one which has eight pensioners. None of the guests has seen his check in months. She handles everything.

When a Skid Row bum is without a flop for the night he "is carrying the banner." When he is tormented with a hang-over that screams for a nerve placating drink he is "sick." A bum who says he is "sick" or "carrying the banner" can be certain of relief from his fellow bums if among them they can dig up the necessary funds.

Soup and coffee are the staple items of a Skid Row diet. Where prices are high (40 to 50 cents for a portion of meat scraps, potatoes and all the bread without butter you can eat) a regular meal comes close to costing as much as it would in a modest restaurant located in a poor section of town.

Chicago and New York fit this category. But wherever a man can get meat and potatoes for about a quarter, as he can in Kansas City and Los Angeles, it sometimes seems to me that he could do better to get his nourishment from wine. Such restaurants are called "horse markets" by their suspicious customers.

Chef Earns All He Gets

A restaurant on Madison Street in Chicago pays its Skid Row chef $150 a week and he is worth it. A strange characteristic of Skid Row restaurants everywhere is their attitude on cleanliness. They are either unspeakably filthy or as spotless as a hospital operating room. They all specialize in the cheapest and most obscure cuts of meat, and their prices vary in each city.

Missions hand out doughnuts and coffee in the morning and soup and coffee at night. But when a man eats in a mission he has been broke and hungry a long, long time. A few saloons give their regular customers coffee and cake in the morning. And soup is occasionally doled out in the afternoon. But the saloon usually uses only three or four bowls at a time, so the bums must wait while the early comers empty and clean a dish.

Free soup and coffee are always a miracle in alchemy. Somehow the cooks manage to water down the water.

The citizen of Skid Row has the same need-if not the same lust-for money that distinguishes his more normal brother. And he gets it precisely the same way. He works for it, has it given to him or he steals it. Skid Row seems to be evenly divided among those who won't work and those who can't work.

Panhandling is a prime source of revenue in any jungle. Sometimes it's plain begging, but more often the price of a pint is earned through devices such as peddling pencils, shoelaces, and the like. The "lumbermen" or crutch carrying cripples can beg $30 a day with ease. However, when one has made a $5 stake he simply calls it a day and heads for a package store. The bums have learned that, for some reason, a young man on crutches does better financially than an older person. All begging is risky business because the police are wont to discourage it with controlled violence, but they dare not touch a cripple.

Beggars hang together in groups of four or five. Frequently only one of the gang will work a full day while the others loaf. Each man simply takes his turn.

Meet Trampdom's Upper Crust

The gandy-dancers are the Skid Row aristocracy. They work for the railroads, laying track, grading roadbeds and digging drainage ditches. Their name is derived from the rhythmical movement they once made as they tamped gravel and cinders tightly around railroad ties. They worked in pairs, bobbing up and down. Modern machinery has made this type particular type of work extinct, but there is other heavy labor easily worth the standard $1.06 to $1.09 per-hour rate. That shoots up two cents per hour when the gandy-dancer has a year or more of continuous service, a most unlikely eventuality.

The gandy-dancer usually works from May 1st to November 30th. During this period he frequently leaves Skid Row and lives in work camps where he must pay for inferior food and bad lodging. At the typical camp the tab varies from 65 cents per meal to $2.93 a day. He works six, but pays room and board for seven days. Many railroads maintain labor offices on Skid Row. Others contract for help through commissary agents who supply the men and feed and board them. The agents' profits comes out of the food and lodging bill.

A gandy-dancer is entitled to unemployment benefits from the railroads based upon how much money he makes. These benefits, plus local unemployment relief, help see him through the winter, or as he says, "Keep me safe to Paddy's Day." A few gandy-dancers, as soon as they hit town, will pay their flophouse rent in advance for December 1st to St. Patrick's Day. Most of them are lucky if they have a nickel left a week after they come in from the camps. Agents say 70 per cent of the men stay at work throughout the season.

From my own observations, I doubt it by 70 per cent of their estimated 70 per cent.

Many go out to pick fruits or vegetables. This is piecework and those who have the strength and the necessary manual agility can make as much as $12 a day. The food is always better than the railroad camps provide and is frequently excellent by any standards. Labor agencies are numerous in Skid Row and help supply agricultural workers.

It is an accepted custom for a man to sign on as a gandy-dancer so he will be shipped close to the Connecticut tobacco fields or the California vegetable crops. Then he jumps the railroad and justifies it, if he bothers, because of the bad food and dirty living quarters that seem to be part of the railroad camps.

When a man comes back from a period of gandy-dancing or an agricultural job with a couple of hundred dollars in his pockets, he wants a shoeshine. A bootblack on Kansas City's Skid Row told me, "I've shined shoes that didn't have any soles on `em. They always throw you a half buck. If they have any money, they'll get a shine three or four times a day. I don't know why but they all love to get their shoes shined."

The shoes may be polished in a bar- room and often a man who is flush will leave his wad with the bartender. He may or may not drink it all up in a night. Obviously no man can drink $200 worth of two-for-a-quarter whisky in a single evening but there are repeated rounds of drinks for the house. And the bartender usually keeps tab with equal abandon.

Men who want a day's work will gather at a rendezvous point in Skid Row to be picked up each morning by independent truckers. The pay is usually a dollar an hour and no Skid Row laborer will accept hire from an employer who insists upon withholding taxes. He wants $8 for eight hours and the trucker can pay the government anything Uncle Sam has coming. This work is as unpopular as it is arduous, so four or five men will band together to take daily turns at working and each day's $8 is divided among the group that night.

Most of the handbills distributed in any town are set out by Skid Row workers. To get around minimum-wage laws, an hour is not used as a unit of time in this industry. An hour is the duration it takes to distribute a specified number of handbills. In crowded areas an hour is equivalent to 125 deliveries; medium crowded it's 100; and sparsely settled suburbs are 75. Payment in this field seems to work out to around 35 cents an hour for a day" work. But it can be a lot less.

The lowest form of Skid Row labor is bottle collecting. Men trudge around picking up empties which, by a custom which is nation-wide except in New York, are carefully lined up along the curbs for the convenience of the bottle-man. He gets a cent and a half for gallon jugs, a cent for quart bottles and a half cent for pints. And they must be wine bottles, because whisky bottles by law cannot be refilled.

Brisk Trade with Blood Banks

If you have ever been given plasma or serum you are closer to Skid Row than you think. Thousands of bums peddle their blood to legitimate banks, many of which are located in, or reasonably adjacent to, Skid Row. The price for a pint which is to be reduced to plasma is $4 in California and a little more in the East.

A blood donor is generally limited to five bleedings a year, but a man can go broke a lot more than five times during 12 long months. Records are kept, but identification is a haphazard thing on Skid Row. Arms are examined for recent punctures and in Los Angeles each donor has the fingers of his left hand painted with a compound which is not visible unless the hand is placed under a blue fluorescent lamp. It takes about eight weeks for this solution to disappear completely. I watched one bank turn away 32 men within two hours when the lamp showed telltale blue on their fingers. Recently, however, a Skid Row chemist discovered a solution that erases the stain within minutes.

Clear-blooded alcoholics from Skid Row make up the largest part of the nation's donor population. But their contributions mix easily with those from church groups giving blood for charity, or from young men who need the price of a few gallons of gas for an evening date, and from other young men who need money to buy mike for their babies. The blood banks in Los Angeles normally hit peak production just before Income Tax Day.

Pensions account for a large, if not the largest, portion of income. Most pensioners do not draw enough to allow better living standards.

The steel and concrete jungle is heavily populated with remittance men drawing small monthly checks from relatives and with Army and Navy pensioners. The retired servicemen are usually as drunk as anybody in the bar-room, but they are invariably immaculate.

One of the most extraordinary seminars I ever heard started in a Bowery saloon when one old gentleman complained of his rheumatism and said, "I can go up to the Old Soldiers Home. But I don't want to do that yet." He went on to say, "There's a law you know. No soldier of Uncle Sam can be a public charge."

General agreement was voiced and then a bleary old gent said, "You know, America is the greatest country in the world." This was immediately acknowledged as gospel by all and sundry and there began a round-table discussion among a half-dozen down-and-out hulks, each vying to add further vocal tribute to the land of opportunity.

There are a few women on Skid Row, for a variety of reasons. Perhaps one explanation is that the weaker sex is made of sterner stuff. Another more obvious argument is that society just won't allow a woman to sleep in the gutter. I saw a cripple fall and split his face wide open in front of Chicago's Haymarket Theater and the box-office lady didn't pause a second in the job of applying her lipstick. But let a woman doze off in a hallway and the police station switchboard lights up like a Christmas tree. Almost invariably the calls are from indignant females.

The female Skid Row consists, obviously, of the bordellos of the land. But the inmates therein rarely wind up in the gutters. The mortality rate among prostitutes is high. But so, too, is the marriage rate. And when a girl finds she has to call quits to such a career she can always go home.

Few Women Among the "Down"

Traveling from New York to California and back, I saw four out-and-out Skid Row drunks of the opposite sex. I don't know how many thousands of alcoholic men I saw. The professional phrase for a bum who has dropped to the sidewalk is "down." I saw at least 500 males who were down during a month in the jungle, but just two females.

I did see perhaps 50 women who obviously lived on Skid Row. There are no flophouses available to them, so they live in tiny rooms. They are pensioners or beggars. A few shelters for women do exist, but they are expensive and the tenants are subject to expulsion if, after a 12-hour day of selling pencils, they so befoul themselves as to have a couple of glasses of beer.

Although Skid Row is almost completely free of sex, and few females are ever seen on it, women are a perpetual topic of conversation at the bars and over the tables in the flophouse lobbies. Almost all Skid Row bums insist that women put them where they are. At first I shrugged off that theory as an alibi. After a month of closer listening, however, I would suggest that any error is in the direction of understatement. In addition to the bums who are certain that women put them on Skid Row, there are others who unmistakably were driven there by women and don't realize it.

To clear up that last statement first: Policemen all over the country told me to look for the derelict who had been the "youngest son." He was not hard to find. He was, in fact, everywhere. He was the boy who had stayed home with Mother while the older brothers went out and got themselves set in business. When Mother died, the youngest was finally forced into a competitive world. Perhaps he started at the age of forty-about 22 years too late.

He stands alone, bereft of his mother's comfort and with a tight silver cord still tied around his hands and his brains. Whisky, he soon discovers, erases his fear, his confusion, and his humiliation. Soon he is on Skid Row. Quite frequently he is supported by checks from his older brothers who ask only that he stay to hell away from them.

He himself believes that he's on Skid Row because he couldn't get along with his family back in Des Moines. He's there, of course, because his mother didn't give him the same break she gave his brothers.

"Too Much Mama" May Harm Son

A slight variation of the youngest son who stayed home with Mama is the case of the only son who did the same thing.

The Yale Plan Clinic is in the throes of conducting a survey which is not yet nearly complete. But the figures which have so far been compiled carry a tremendous impact. Mark Keller of the Yale Group has made the following statement on the basis of what has been learned so far:

"We are making a study on the subject. It is not yet complete but we now have statistics indicating that 40 per cent of alcoholics are either 'only children' or 'youngest.' Also, the more siblings older than the subject, the more likely he is to appear as an alcoholic." Siblings are brothers or sisters.

So much for Mama who is, after all, a woman. The most frequently recurring episode in the Skid Row story goes like this. The Hotel McCoy is the Grand Hotel of Chicago's foul Madison Street Skid Row. It has 800 rooms divided among three floors, each cubicle measuring roughly four feet by six feet. Rates are 60 cents a day except for the rare rooms with windows. With ventilation the price jumps to 75 cents.

A handsome automobile halted before the McCoy and one of the two ladies in it daintily hailed a policeman.

"Officer," she said, "we're afraid to go in there but we would like to see

SKID ROW - U.S.A.

By WILLIAM J. SLOCUM

Within our cities there is a world of living dead where Lonely, despairing
Americans seek escape from themselves

The author of this two part article traveled 8,000 miles to get a close-up of Skid Row, U.S.A. Every city and town with a population of 5,000 or more has its own human jungle. Crumbling tenements and filthy alleys mark the end of the road for thousands of Americans. Part 1 dealt with the way vagrants go about getting a drink, a flop or an occasional stake. But what is society doing to rehabilitate these men?

CONCLUSION

A weird little tale was recently unfolded in Chicago that somehow managed to encompass everything that goes to make up Skid Row, U.S.A. A bum was found dead in the Madison Street jungle and they carted his body off to the morgue. His pockets were crammed with identification, so officials were able to notify a Wisconsin family that their father had departed this world. The wife and a couple of daughters came on and identified the remains.

The body was taken back to Wisconsin and buried with full American Legion honors. A $1500 insurance policy was settled and all went well for two weeks. Then the family received a peremptory note from the morgue giving them 48 hours to claim Father or he would go to potter's field. The family, baffled by this development, came running to the Desplaines Street police station, which has jurisdiction over the Madison Street Skid Row.

Captain Joseph Graney quieted the woman and told them the morgue had originally made a mistake in concluding the body was that of their father, and the family had compounded the error by identifying the strange corpse. While the Captain was talking to the ladies, however, they showed him a picture of their father, taken a decade before. Captain Graney looked at the picture and bellowed, "I saw this same guy last night in front of the Star and Garter. He was plastered. Wait here a minute."

Graney hopped into a squad car. In five minutes he was back, dragging behind him a very live and reasonably sober gentleman. It was, indeed, Father himself. As soon as the initial shock had worn off Father spoke. "Fooled you, didn't I?" he gloated. "You thought I was dead, eh? Sorry to disappoint you." With that he made a vulgar noise in the direction of his wife and requested the captain's permission to return to the peace and quiet of his flophouse.

The possibility of intended fraud is remote and unimportant to this grisly anecdote which capsules so much of the Skid Row story. Father did not merely dislike Mother. He hated her. Father's respectable family and his war record suggest he had not long been an anonymous alcoholic. Father had recently been "jack-rolled" while drunk and it is reasonable to suspect that the man who later died was the one who had picked his pockets. That would explain how Father's identification papers were found on the corpse.

One drunken derelict preying on another, sudden death and the completely broken family, these are Skid Row-the American jungle.

In New York, a Bowery tavern owner named Sammy Fuchs made an effort to do something to help the bums who wanted their relatives to be notified in case of death. From them he accepted envelopes which the bums numbered and sealed. Inside they put the names of their next of kin. Sometimes papers to be forwarded were included. The bums in turn carried little notes on their person reading: "In case of death tell Sammy Fuchs to open Envelope 17." Or Envelope 11, or whatever the identifying number would be.

"I sent off dozens of telegrams," Sammy told me. "I never looked at anything except the address. I know one envelope contained papers which were supposed to secure a big estate for a Skid Row woman's illegitimate son. She told me about it before she died and I hope the kid got it. I sent one telegram to a rich Pennsylvania banker to tell him his son rolled off an East River pier and drowned."

Early this year burglars broke into Sammy's saloon and carted off the safe which held the envelopes.

Sammy runs a Bowery saloon that has a dual personality. From 8:00 A.M. to 8:00 P.M. it is just another Skid Row dive. From 9:00 P.M. to 4:00 A.M. it becomes a sight-seeing mecca for thrill-hungry out-of-towners. The hour between eight and nine is used to clean the place up and create atmosphere by lining up prop Bowery characters. After nine o'clock ancient entertainers sing with great gusto, and a benevolent old man, well into his sixties, plays the meanest piano I've heard in a long time.

Experiments in Rehabilitation

Sammy has made an interesting experiment in rehabilitating Skid Row characters the country over. He straightens them out, buys them clothes, pays a month's rent and gets them a job. He estimates it costs him about $350 per man to do a complete job. He has experimented thusly 18 times and claims four of his rehabilitation projects are still off Skid Row.

"You can't let `em live on Skid Row and expect `em to stay sober when they see all their friends drunk," says Fuchs.

Another Fuchs theory-"The only ones who have a chance to straighten out are the young ones"- is an opinion universally shared by policemen and judges all over the country. The scientists at the Yale Plan Clinic, where the problem is being studied carefully, confirm that they young are not beyond redemption, but in measured academic tones Yale suggests that Sammy, the cops and the judges are nuts. "A young alcoholic has very little reason to want to sober up," they point out. "He has never experienced the rewards of a normal life-family, children and a job."

According to Dr. Robert V. Seliger, first-rate psychiatrist and executive director of the National Committee on Alcohol Hygiene, Inc., 30 to 40 out of every 100 alcoholics may be helped back to health by modern psychiatric treatment. They are sick in the same way that a man may fall ill of pneumonia, or smallpox, or diabetes.

As Dr. Seliger points out, alcohol itself does not cause alcoholism. To the millions of Americans who drink regularly or occasionally without letting alcohol interfere with their lives, liquor is a refreshment, a part and a symbol of gracious living. But most alcoholics drink to excess seeking escape from emotional ills.

Missions do what they can to help the sick and despondent on Skid Row. They are everywhere there, beckoning all with signs of gold and blinking neon. But to the men on the rows, they represent only a place a man can get a soup, coffee and bread.

I entered a mission on Sunday afternoon. Services had started, but I was greeted by a preacher. "Welcome, brother," he said. "Get yourself a book."

I got a hymnal and took my place among 20 other men. Fifteen were Skid Row bums, clean, hung-over, shaking and miserable. The other five were well-dressed by any standards. Four were businessmen who had been saved from Skid Row. One was a visiting clergyman who had come to listen to the sermon.

We sang three hymns. Then the businessmen rose in turn to tell their stories. A sermon followed this, and when it was ended, the preacher asked whether anyone felt called upon to speak up. The room was redolent with the aroma of hot soup and coffee, and the hungry men were concentrating on that. There was no thought of talk.

We sang three more hymns and then it was time for grace. The minister said it, trying not to look self-conscious as he gazed down at the bowed and frowsy heads of his sick and hungry congregation.

After that the men rose and formed a line for a tin cup of soup, a half cup of coffee and a slice of bread. They gulped the food and left hurriedly.

Alcoholics Anonymous Gives Aid

Hard-working members of Alcoholics Anonymous are another force for good along Skid Row. Faith is especially mentioned in six of the 12 steps of the program for recovery the organization uses.

Alcoholics Anonymous is everywhere, in the jails, the courtrooms and the hospitals. Sometimes A.A. members are received with open arms by officials, sometimes they are brushed off as tiresome nuisances. They keep insisting that a drunk doesn't belong in jail, and that, when he does get to a hospital, he should receive the same care he might expect if he were a well-to-do citizen.

New York City is a case in perfect point, illustrating the conflict in official attitudes. At Bellevue Hospital A.A. are sometimes brushed off by some busy and impatient doctor. "I didn't spend half my life studying medicine merely to take care of weak-willed drunks," he will complain. But at Kings County Hospital in Brooklyn, run by the same City of New York, A.A.'s are welcomed. Its members and interested doctors sit in joint committee to see how they can better cooperate in helping the penniless alcoholic.

The district attorney of San Francisco bows a reverent head in the direction of the "South of Market" chapter of A.A. which works in Skid Row. In Los Angeles, A.A. teams of two patrol the Lincoln Heights court 24 hours a day and any Skid Row bum who needs a cup of coffee or a double-header of rye to stave off the d.t.'s gets them and no questions. The "Alinon Club" in Newark is fighting the good fight in a rough part of the country. "Alinon" has to its credit the rare case of a woman who spent 16 years on Skid Row and has been "dry" two years now.

In New York City the Twelfth Step House at 53 Barrow Street has turned an apartment house basement into a refuge for any man or woman who is willing to walk the short distance from Skid Row. He can get anything that a group of human beings who are themselves pretty poor can give him: food, a suit of clothes, a job and that precious thing, an understanding ear.

Twelfth Step House was started by an A.A. who wanted to do something for what his group calls "low-bottom drinkers." A "high-bottom drinker" is an alcoholic who has a little money, a home and some friends to help him through his travail. A "low-bottom" is one who has nothing. Last January this man, who is not rich, paid $50 to cover a month's rent on a basement which had been unoccupied since prohibition.

Other A.A.'s pledged one, two, or five dollars a month to keep it going. It is open from noon to midnight. A Skid Row drunk walks in and he is soon talking to an A.A. who can truthfully top any story of degradation or misfortune the bum can tell about himself. He is given coffee and food, and, if he volunteers a request for help in sobering up, a silk-smooth operation begins.

First he has to "sweat it out." That's a three or four day process during which a man gets sobered up first and then goes through the agonies of the damned, fighting against a nervous system which screams for a drink. While he is "sweating it out," A.A. veterans of the same sort of personal hell talk to him, listen to him, walk with him through the night and even buy him a double-header if their expert eyes tell them his system must have a little alcohol. When sleep comes at last he is taken to a flophouse and his new friends buy him a night's lodging.

When the "sweating out" period is finished, the man gets a suit of clothes and a job. Twelfth Street House has an arrangement with a half-dozen hospitals to hire men it recommends. Since January more than 150 Skid Row drunks have been straightened out and returned to work through its efforts.

A.A. flatly refuses to compile statistics about cures it has effected because its axiom is, "An alcoholic is cured only when he is buried."

Every night 35 to 50 former Skid Row bums can be seen at Twelfth Step House. They sit around talking or listening to impromptu speeches-academic discussions of the problems involved in fighting alcohol. Talk and companionship are the very heart of the A.A. technique.

Everybody helps everybody else. I saw an old man hustle in and survey the room. He spotted a young fellow who was with a group which was heatedly discussing the effects of "sneaky-pete," a generic term for fortified wines. He nodded the boy away from the group and excitedly whispered, "there's a dishwashing job open up on Twenty-third Street. I couldn't take it on account of my bum arm. But I told them you'd be right up. Six bucks." The boy got his cap and was gone in half a minute.

Employed Make Contributions

No working member of Twelve Step ever enters the place without a couple of loaves of bread and perhaps a half bologna under his arm. They all try to contribute to the kitty, but one of the few rules of the place is "No contributions from men working one-night stands. Okay from those steadily employed."

The policeman is the Skid Row bum's mortal enemy; he is as frequently his only friend. My own experience with policemen in the Skid Rows of America ran along the same line. In Chicago, Captain Graney told me, "We don't want you writing about Chicago's Skid Row. But you're going to write about it anyway, so we'll answer every question you ask us. Of course we're ashamed of our Skid Row, but if you can figure out an answer, you're smarter than I think you are. We give the bums all the protection we can. It's not enough, I guess. Still, if you assigned a cop to every bum on Skid Row, the bums would still get in trouble."

In San Francisco, Captain Leo Tackney of the Southern Station glowered at me and said, "I'm not going to tell you anything and neither is any of my men. It's bad for San Francisco. If you go into Skid Row, you go at your own risk. If you take any pictures, you'll do it at your own peril." I told the captain that the pictures would be taken. I also assured him I was going through his Skid Row.

Three separate times I walked all over San Francisco, rated by many as America's most charming city, always with the feeling I was being followed. I lost that feeling only after I dropped in for a chat with District Attorney Pat Brown. The D.A. agreed that Skid Row was bad for San Francisco but he also felt it would be much worse if people stopped trying to do something about it.

I later learned why Captain Tackney was so irate. It seems they are making a movie about Skid Row-U.S.A. and the producer of the film has chosen Captain Tackney's precinct as the locale of the epic. It is a choice with which no man would quarrel.

I tried one more police department. That was in New Orleans. When I had finished my conducted tour in that city, I was stumped.

The first day in town I had asked kind and expert friends to tell me where New Orleans' Skid Row or rows were. They told me and I made arrangements to visit the jungle the next day in the company of a police department expert. However, there was not a bum to be seen anywhere, not even in the jails. Later I visited the same areas unaccompanied and found all the bums I ever wanted to see. I asked them where they had been all afternoon. They said it had been real hot, so they stayed off the streets.

No young man ever took up police work in anticipation of a career that would be spent chaperoning Skid Row bums. It is not surprising, therefore, that those assigned the task sometimes go about their duties with a maximum of muscle and a minimum of persuasion. But for every cop who makes enemies of the men he is supposed to help, there are two like Chicago's Steve Wilson and Los Angeles' William Shurley. And there is the immortal "Book-Him" John McGinnis, also of Chicago. "Book-Him" John is now relieved of his arduous Skid Row chores and works with children, but his name is still revered on the nation's Skid Rows.

When a bum put in a hitch as a gandy-dancer with the railroad-the name traces back to the jiglike step used in tamping down the track beds-and quit, got fired, or finished his unwelcome job, he headed back to Chicago. He might have a couple of hundred dollars in his pocket and the unhappy knowledge that he would blow it all in a night if left to his own customs and habits. So he would seek out McGinnis and turn over the major part of his money to him. "Book-Him" John doled it out until it was gone, and after that John was always good for a touch.

The officer never lost a nickel through these loans. Usually the debtor paid off at the first opportunity. But if he went off on the railroad again or took to the hobo jungles, John would pass the word along that he was in default. The debtor would hear about it from every Chicago resident who crossed his trail. And if he found himself overlong in arrears, he also found himself barred from the mulligan stew, the bottle and the companionship of his fellow hobos or gandy-dancers.

McGinnis was a one-man warrant squad on Skid Row. If any flop resident was wanted, John only had to pass the word. "Tell McCarthy to get over to the station house. Somebody is looking for him." "Somebody" could be a relative, a friend, an insurance adjuster or even a warrant. It didn't matter. If McGinnis sent out the word, McCarthy came ambling into the police station within an hour.

Every morning, when the unhappy contents of a jail's drunk tank were lined up before a judge, McGinnis would stand at the court's elbow. Theoretically he was there to identify the bums, but in practice he would make recommendations. "Ah now, this is a nice lad, Judge," John would say as a shivering hang-over stood before the bench. "A nice lad. He's been working and only been on Skid Row a couple of days. Let him go, Judge."

The next might hear, "Judge, this fellow's a nice lad but he's been laying around six months. He needs a doctor, Judge. Send him away for a while."

But John's favorite expression and the basis for his nickname was, "Now here's a lad been laying about drunk for six months. But a nice lad. Let me take care of him, Judge. I'll book him." John would wave the man aside until the court recessed. Then the man, along with several colleagues, would be shepherded to a group of railroad labor representatives and John would persuade them to book the derelicts for gandy-dancing jobs.

Chicago's Steve Watson is in the McGinnis mold. He's in court every morning with his advice. 90 per cent of it compassionate. I did hear him say to Judge Edward Pluczak, as one man came up for sentencing, "Judge, this is one of the best thieves this side of the Mississippi." The man got the equivalent of 30 days when he sullenly refused an offer to rebut Watson's estimate.

Steve walks his beat amid an endless salvo of greetings. When his charges attempt to shake hands, as they frequently do, Steve shows them his gloved hands and begs off with some excuse about a skin ailment.

I saw a young man laid out cold on Madison Street. He looked dead to me. Steve bent over him, applied some pressure behind his ears, and bloodshot eyes opened in an ashen face. The man managed a pathetic smile, "Hello Steve," he said. "Please help me up, will you?"

In Los Angeles, William Shurley has earned the confidence of his charges. He will say to a man, "You're pretty bad off. I want go to go in. Stand over by that lamppost until the wagon comes by." The man will stagger to the lamppost and wait until the patrol wagon, making its endless rounds, appears.

Out-of-Bounds for Bums

Most cities have off-limits areas for bums. The Skid Row resident who crosses Texas Avenue in Houston does so at his own peril; or he can expect a good clout if found panhandling around New York's Times Square. He is supposed to stay "south of the slot" in San Francisco; and in Kansas City he passes the Kay Hotel at his own risk. Boston cleans out its Skid Rows by making periodic promises of a year in Bridgewater for vagrants and drunks who are apprehended.

Some police departments attempt to enforce a "keep-moving" policy. I heard a crippled beggar, of extraordinarily handsome features and cleanliness, plead with a judge to let him off. "I've got relatives in Detroit and I'm going back to see them."

The judge said, "You're not going back to Detroit and you know it. If you do, Hitler and Mussolini will get you." The men who were lined up behind the cripple smiled. The cripple himself grinned one of those "you-ain't-just-talking-judge" grins. "Hitler and Mussolini" are a couple of Detroit policemen who have dedicated themselves to keeping Detroit's Skid Row population as fluid as possible.

No city overpatrols its Skid Row. Most municipalities seem to ignore their jungles. There is a universal theory among law-enforcement men that there is little or no crime on Skid Row. They couldn't possibly be more wrong.

The major criminal is the "roller," "jack-roller" or "mugger." He is the same man operating under a different name in different parts of the country. He steals shoes, shirts, pants, and even the underwear of his victims. Usually prey is too drunk to know, but sometimes he attempts to resist and is hurt. I staked a battered old wreck in Kansas City, but when he saw me go to my pocket he said, "I'll meet you around the corner. If those guys see you give me anything, I'll get jack-rolled."

Almost any man found dead in Skid Row without a bullet or a knife in him died of "natural causes" so far as the cops are concerned. Public statistics keep tab on murders and since police efficiency is judged by those statistics, the cops try to avoid any additional unsolved homicides among the nonentities of Skid Row.

Before going into the details of how murder is committed on Skid Row, it is necessary to understand that the resistance and physical condition of most alcoholics is tremendously substandard. They hurt easily, they cure slowly and assistance comes tardily if at all. Nobody knows whether a man curled up in the hallway is suffering from too much sherry or a cracked skull.

Fist fights are common on Skid Row. Bottles make excellent weapons and they are everywhere. Bartenders and flophouse bouncers are busy men who frequently have only enough time to practice a bit of rudimentary jujitsu to invoke order and then "leave `em lay." And of course the "jack-roller" takes many a life for a pair of shoes or the nickel and three pennies to be found in a bum's pocket.

Police Keep Watchful Eye

In most cities a patrol wagon, manned by policemen called "ragpickers," makes regular rounds collecting the pugnacious and the man so drunk he may stagger into a moving trolley car or truck. Bums who are sleeping it off are rarely bothered, unless they have bedded down in front of the chamber of commerce. New Orleans sends out the wagon on call. The Second Precinct there, covering the beloved French Quarter, speaks proudly of an elderly client who regularly telephones and says, "Sergeant, send the wagon for me. The usual corner."

New Orleans and Los Angeles give the pick-up bum a chance to sleep it off before subjecting him to formal arrest. He gets a flat six hours. If he can make the 5:00 A.M. "kick-out" line and sign a false-arrest waiver, he is freed. In most other cities he must face the judge.

The police, the magistrates and the victims all agree that this is an expensive and useless procedure excused only by the fact that a man in the drunk tank is less likely to be injured.

Drunk tanks are the same the country over and they are shameful. Most of them have no facilities beyond bare, cold floors. The police claim they would be delighted to install cots and rudimentary plumbing, but the condition of the prisoners makes such sharp and unyielding objects a serious menace.

When court convenes, the night's haul is herded into a special corner of the room. The non-Skid Row citizens who seek justice are separated and their cases, usually domestic quarrels and landlord-tenant disagreements, are heard first. Then the Skid Row group is lined up before the bar.

The air of frustration that hangs over the courtroom defies description. The long weaving line of hang-overs is wrapped in hopelessness; the judge is baffled; so too are the prosecuting attorneys and the police. Everybody is licked and knows it.

Names are called and men answer. The old-timers—a history of 200 arrests calls for no undue interest—are resigned; the youngsters are frightened; and the rare gentleman from the proper side of the railroad tracks is confident he can talk himself free, even though he looks about apprehensively in fear that he may see an old acquaintance, such as his wife.

A few of the old-timers shrug, plead guilty and hope for the best. Most of them give it a bit of battle: "I've got a job waiting for me, Judge," or, "I'm getting out of town tonight, Your Honor," or "I'm a hard working man, Judge. I just slipped a little last night." If the judge has enough interest, he will ask the hard worker to show him the palms of his hands. Calluses will support his story.

Frequently a man says, "Please, Judge, give me 30 days." Invariably it is to get hospital treatment for wounds or infections. Occasionally it's a desperate effort to get sober or something to eat. But generally the men are frantic to avoid jail.

It's a dreary procession spotted occasionally with high drama. I heard the father of a young newspaperman plead with a judge, "We have $15,000 to assure my boy complete medical and psychiatric treatment, Your Honor."

Before the Judge could answer, the boy spoke, "Father, please. You know and I know it's just a waste of money." His father left, weeping, as the boy took another 30-day sentence.

A twenty-one-year-old ex-G.I., hungover and petrified, answered all questions in a quavering voice, his head hanging. He was asked what kind of a discharge he possessed. His head came up, he straightened and his voice was firm as he answered, "An honorable discharge, sir."

In Los Angeles the court told a young woman who had been picked up several times, "I'm going to send you to jail to sober up."

"No, Judge, please don't do that," she begged. "I'm in Sister Essie's show tonight. I've got a big part. I'm a very important angel." The important angel was freed to take her place in the religious pageant at Sister Essie's Skid Row mission.

Judge Edward Pluczak, of the Desplaines Street Municipal Court in Chicago, looks like a tough Army sergeant, but he is surprisingly gentle. He told me, "I'm sick and tired of meeting boyhood friends, college pals and members of the Chicago bar whom I once idolized. Sending these people to jail doesn't do any good. What I need is a non-prison farm where they could go to sober up. Nobody ever gave up liquor in a cell block."

San Francisco's realistic district attorney, Pat Brown, is in complete agreement with Judge Pluczak. Brown's theories are particularly apropos because his bailiwick is the drinkingest city in the United States, according to surveys published by Brown's own office. "I want a half million dollars to set up a rehabilitation center that is not a jail," Brown told me. "I want to stop the practice of tossing alcoholics in jail or freeing them to get stiff all over again. We won't straighten out very many, but if we can rehabilitate 10 per cent, the experiment will be cheap." All four of San Francisco's newspapers support Brown. Alcoholics Anonymous, Stanford and California universities are behind him, too.

Brown laughed and said, "I'll probably never be elected dogcatcher after saying this, but they're doing a magnificent job across the bay in Oakland."

Brown isn't the only one with an eye on the Oakland project. They are watching it at Yale, too. And they are watching it wherever municipal officials do not feel that Skid Row is something that should be kicked under the rug and ruled out of public discussions.

California Experiment Promising

Alameda County, which is Oakland, has rented an unused military installation for $1 a year. It is called the Santa Rita Rehabilitation Center and covers 3,300 acres. Alcoholics are given a choice of jail, or the Center. It is not as obvious a choice as you might think, because at Santa Rita there are 550 acres of vegetables under cultivation and that means hard work for the physically fit.

Most of the inmates are sent there for 90 days but it is not a jail. When a man gets himself straightened out and healthy he can leave in less than 90 days. Alameda County Sheriff Jack Gleason says, "We give them psychiatric assistance, work and an opportunity to build up their health. I won't say how well the plan is working because it's too new. Give me two years. But it looks pretty good, so far."

To spare their sensibilities, the Skid Row patients at Santa Rita were separated from other inmates. The Skid Row group complained against this discrimination. "We're as good as they are," they argued. Now all mix together, and psychiatrists and policemen agree it is better that way.

Raymond McCarthy, executive director of the Yale Plan Clinic, thinks Oakland is on the right path. He told me, "The punitive approach to the Skid Row problem accomplishes nothing beyond making a city look neater.

"But," he added, "the majority cannot be helped by treatment on an out-patient level. They must be isolated for medical and psychiatric study. Jail is no good. Prison farms are just as bad. The Skid Row bum, to be saved, must have supervised freedom." McCarthy admitted "supervised freedom" is a top-notch contradiction in terms. "The sad fact seems to be," he said, "that these men and women must be institutionalized in an institution that

I have discovered more history since posting this question. Please add this memo to the question. On page 315 - 318 of Pass It On, written by Bill W. as the documented history of Alcoholic's Anonymous there is more information related to the history of African Americans in Alcoholic's Anonymous. The indication, especially the last paragraph on pg. 317-318, is that Barry was doing desk duty at the club house on 41st St. The (black) man came to the door...He was an ex-convict, a vagrant, his hair was bleached blond and he had on make up; and he told us he was a dope fiend (heroin addict)...Apparently, it was Bill W. that was consulted by the group conscience, because Barry and the elders did not know what to do.

Bill W. apparently questioned, "did you say he was a drunk?" "Oh yes," Barry replied. "There's no question about that. He's certainly a drunk." "Well, I think that's all we can ask," said Bill.

Additionally, it appears from page 142 in the Twelve and Twelve that Bill W. responded, at some point, "What would the Master do?"

"The prospect was invited into the meetings." Additionally, in the Twelve and Twelve, there is the allusion, "Overjoyed, the newcomer plunged into Twelfth Step work. Tirelessly he laid AA's message before scores of people... Those scores have since multiplied themselves into thousands."

The appearance when you look at Pass It On and Tradition Three, combined, is that this gentlemen, assisted Jim, the founder of the first predominately black AA group in his work of spreading A. A. There is a reference to Jim's Story from Page 483 in the 3rd edition of the Big Book of Alcoholic's Anonymous. On page 317 in Pass It On, "...Jim S. a physician, was called the originator of A. A.'s first black group. ("Jim's Story" appears in the second and third editions of the Big Book).

The indication is that the predominately white A. A. groups used Jim S. (who was assisted by "the man with the other addiction" to spread A. A. into the black community.

Additional understanding and historical documentation is solicited. Please post this inquiry and allow the fellowship to educate itself regarding the history of black outreach from Alcoholic's Anonymous.

a small restaurant on Bay Street in Toronto. Other diners noticed nothing extraordinary about these men. They included a lawyer, doctor, insurance man, flier and a broker.

However, there was something unusual about this group, each man was a confessed alcoholic. The dinner meeting was help for the purpose of founding the first Canadian branch of Alcoholics Anonymous, an organization which has over 200 branches or "clubs" in the states with over 8,000 members.

If there is anything less anonymous than the average alcoholic we would like to know it. But the reason for anonymity of members of Alcoholics Anonymous appears to stem from the delusion of every alcoholic that very few people know that he drinks to excess. He would not be induced to join a club that flamboyantly proclaimed itself to be a band of alcoholic for fear of the effect this might have upon his business connections if he has any left.

Alcoholics Anonymous are ex- alcoholics who ally themselves for mutual support in remaining "ex's" and to aid helpless alcoholics who desire their aid, to overcome their uncontrolled thirst.

In no sense a temperance society, crusaders against liquor or backers of anti-alcohol campaigns. Alcoholics Anonymous have nothing to offer the controlled drinker nor the slightest desire to influence these to abandon their drinking.

Prominent doctors and psychiatrists state that while there are many kinds of alcoholics, they all have one symptom in common; an allergy to liquor which after the first drink or two, places the overcoming of desire for additional drinks entirely beyond their mental control. This does not mean that in every instance, the alcoholic, having taken the first drink is going to end up in drunken stupefaction, but that, having taken the first drink he cannot control the length of time he continues drinking. It might be ten minutes or ten days.

Many doctors believe that the alcoholic craving is limited to this class. These allergic types can never safely take even one drink. At a party, the alcoholic, no matter how good his abstemious intentions is not at ease until he gets hold of one of those drinks, drinks he sees his friends taking with impunity and then he is off to the races.

Many alcoholics, look at the one's you know, are keen and competent with strong wills and sound judgement in other spheres. But parallel with their ordinary sound reasoning will be so insanely trivial excuse for taking the first drink. And their allergy to drink, once they take the first one, entirely eliminates their will power, responsibility and standards of value. This allergy is a disease. Condemnation, haranguing and arguing had so far failed to cure any known disease. Treatment of an alcoholic along these lines by relatives, holier-than-thou or controlled drinkers who do not understand the alcoholic's problem, not only fails to help him but in many cases sets up a resentment, probably due to his sense of frustration in his own attempts, which frequently leads to additional indulgence.

But there is one kind of person to whom an alcoholic, with a desire to stop, usually will listen to, another alcoholic. The other speaks his language, he has been through the mill.

Members of Alcoholics Anonymous are thus in a highly strategic position to help the alcoholic who desperately wants to stop drinking, but has found after many futile efforts on his own part, that he is unable to do so. They help him with non-moral, straight, practical advice. Their system works. Many of the worst cases, men who have been in and out of hospitals and institutions for alcoholics for years have proven them successful. Thousands of so called hopeless cases have been completely cured.

Alcoholics Anonymous is not an organization in the strict sense of the word. Rather it is composed of autonomous groups in various cities and towns, over two hundred at this writing. There are no dues or fees of any kind. There is no alliance with any religion or creed. The passkey to become a member is the recognition and admission on the part of the prospective member that he is an alcoholic and possession of an honest desire to stop drinking.

Besides the club in Toronto, which has about 100 members, there are branches of Alcoholics Anonymous operating in Victoria and Montreal. As in the states, each club is autonomous. Additional clubs are now in the process of formation in Winnipeg, London, Hamilton and Ottawa.

Alcoholics Anonymous appear to have developed a form of applied psychology somewhat similar to the theme expounded in Lloyd Douglas' "Magnificent Obsession." To a degree, their good deeds are anonymous, but instead of operating singly they have adopted the convoy system. An explanation of this appears in a brochure entitled "Impressions of A.A."

"Finally it became manifest to us that as a part of our regeneration, assistance to other alcoholics who sincerely wished to be rid of their affliction was necessary. We have found group association to be of inestimable assistance. Only the alcoholic can understand and sympathize with the other alcoholic's problem. Especially in the beginning do we lean heavily on each other."

"Probably the most emotionally satisfying part of our program is the aid which we have been able to give to others. Much of this program is not easy for all. But the feeling of elation each of us has enjoyed in the knowledge that we, and in most cases only we alcoholics, can aid other alcoholics is deeply gratifying. Everyone of us who has had the experience of assisting a fellow alcoholic in the solution of his problem has been definitely strengthened in the conquest of his own problem. The gratitude and

As far as "black outreach" is concerned, some in the Fellowship retrospectively (and much too idealistically) view AA as being elevated above the social problems of the times. Prejudice seems to have been as much a challenge within AA as outside it. Pass It On (pgs 315-317) speaks openly about the challenge (prior to the info you cite). On pg 316, Bill states, "In all the South and in most of the North, whites refuse to mingle with blacks socially."

Blacks predominantly had to start out with black groups or were invited to groups as "observers." Later Bill states, "As I long since learned that no man can dictate to an AA group, I tell each fellowship to abide by the wishes of the majority of its members. And if a group refuses Negroes socially, it ought to make a superhuman effort to help every single colored case to start a group of his own and permit him access to a few open meetings as an observer."

Blacks started their own groups principally due to prejudice not preference. That might raise a howl or two within AA as being inconceivable. There certainly would be exceptions but there would be no compelling reason to presume members of AA were any different from the society of which they were a part (other than with booze). I'm still uncertain on how much the racial divide has been breached. There clearly has been progress but demographics are difficult to come by other than the membership surveys. They don't seem to probe very far into the matter.

Cheers

Arthur

I have discovered more history since posting this question. Please add this memo to the question. On page 315 - 318 of Pass It On, written by Bill W. as the documented history of Alcoholic's Anonymous there is more information related to the history of African Americans in Alcoholic's Anonymous. The indication, especially the last paragraph on pg. 317-318, is that Barry was doing desk duty at the club house on 41st St. The (black) man came to the door...He was an ex-convict, a vagrant, his hair was bleached blond and he had on make up; and he told us he was a dope fiend (heroin addict)...Apparently, it was Bill W. that was consulted by the group conscience, because Barry and the elders did not know what to do.

Bill W. apparently questioned, "did you say he was a drunk?" "Oh yes," Barry replied. "There's no question about that. He's certainly a drunk." "Well, I think that's all we can ask," said Bill.

Additionally, it appears from page 142 in the Twelve and Twelve that Bill W. responded, at some point, "What would the Master do?"

the field. The nation's 44,000,000 persons who use alcoholic beverages include 2,500,000 termed "intemperate," and a "chronic alcoholic" fringe of 600,000. Considering the comparative recency of the group's origin, it is the nucleus of a force which may eventually set 600,000 addicts free.

Alcoholics Anonymous was pioneered less than ten years ago by a once wealthy stockbroker who had been ruined by rum, a friendly, gangling man, now known to thousands of reclaimed drinkers as "Bill." At the end of 1934 he found himself homeless and penniless, deserted by all but his family.

"Alcohol was my master. Ahead loomed asylum or cemetery," said Bill. Strangely enough, that admission proved an astounding ally, and started him on the road to recovery, for simultaneously he recognized the need of help from a power greater than himself. Bill turned to God.

"God comes to most men gradually," wrote Bill later in his memoirs, Alcoholics Anonymous, a history of the movement. "But his impact on me was sudden and profound."

The experience was so startling that Bill promptly visioned "hallucinations" and rushed to his doctor for a sanity test. The physician was equally mystified but urged Bill to "hang on to it. Anything is better than the way you were." The same doctor, Bill reports, has since seen many men who have had similar experiences. He knows they are real.

Acknowledgment of alcohol's mastery over the victim, and recognition of need for spiritual aid, regardless of the individual's personal concept of God, are the first steps in reclaiming a chronic alcoholic, in the Alcoholics Anonymous "twelve steps" to recovery. Correspondingly important is "helping others similarly afflicted," as Bill explains.

"The average alcoholic is a bankrupt idealist," Bill wrote. "He has been frustrated in reaching for something high and has fallen back on liquor to forget about it. Reforming someone else, making a man useful again, suits his idealism. He won't drop back into his old habits."

Bill had occasion to test his axiom during the early stages of his own come-back campaign. While on an important business mission in Akron, Ohio, he found himself almost succumbing to an impulse to take "just one drink." A single drink, experience warned, would undo the good accomplished by months of abstinence. Bill set out to find another alcoholic.

Inquiries led him to a prominent Akron physician who was losing a lucrative practice through unrestrained drinking. Bill found him in the throes of a periodic bender and related his own lurid record. The doctor was responsive. They worked together; each helped the other. Bill's desire for "one drink" passed, and Alcoholics Anonymous had its second member. The movement was on.

Early progress was slow. Members of Alcoholics Anonymous are neither evangelists nor crusaders. They do not solicit "salvagees" or thrust themselves on likely candidates for redemption. They have nothing against drink because of their own unfortunate allergy. Many, as a matter of fact, maintain well-stocked "bars" for their guests who can drink in moderation.

Consequently, over a period of many months following the meeting of Bill and the drinking doctor in Akron, Alcoholics Anonymous comprised the few men and women who came in personal contact with one of them.

But the disciples, in turn, spread their influence, and membership expanded. Eventually, Bill penned his memoirs, and reviews of the book accelerated interest in the movement. Many Alcoholics Anonymous testify to recovery induced by merely reading the book Alcoholics Anonymous itself.

Then, in March, 1941, an inspiring tribute to Alcoholics Anonymous by Jack Alexander appeared in The Saturday Evening Post. Membership skyrocketed. Now, three years later, inquiries occasionally dribble in, in response to The Post piece.

Alcoholics Anonymous is unique, not only because of its phenomenal job of saving human beings from alcoholic misery, but also because it is not a formally "founded" organization. Bill began it as a one-man reclamation project to save himself. From there, it just grew. Bill now devotes virtually all of his time to the cause, but Alcoholics Anonymous continues without constitution, charter, by-laws and dues.

The movement is still in its infancy, but its influence spreads rapidly, even invading the prisons. In California's San Quentin some time ago, a group of inmates who had held alcoholism responsible for their incarceration obtained permission from the warden to organize a unit. Soon, other alert penologists were following San Quentin's lead.

Because the Alcoholics Anonymous thoroughly understand their allergy which makes the first drink "fatal," they refer to their redemption as "recovery" and not "cure." A "cure" pre-supposes ability to drink again.

Recovery in itself follows no predictable course or period. For some men and women it is joyously sudden and lasting. Others find it a slower, harder path, beset by discouraging lapses. But it is a tribute to the sincerity and determination of these men and women that the majority eventually come out on top.

The chief stumbling blocks to a chronic alcoholic's recovery, it is said, are the victim's reluctance to admit that "liquor is boss," and corresponding reluctance to ask for spiritual aid. Invariably, an alcoholic employs every possible subterfuge of self-deception before admitting that "booze cannot be beaten without help of one greater than myself." Finally,

Among problem drinkers these qualities have been described as "defiant individuality" and "grandiosity." Inwardly the alcoholic books no control from man or God. He, the alcoholic, is and must be master of his destiny.

It is easy to see how the person possessing the more or less constant presence of these character traits, has difficulty in accepting God and religion. Religion demands that the individual acknowledge the presence of a God and so challenges the very nature of the alcoholic.

But if the alcoholic can truly accept the presence of a Power greater than himself, he modifies at least temporarily and possibly permanently his deepest inner structure and when he does so without resentment or struggle, then he is no longer typically alcoholic.

Wilson states that the success of the group with any alcoholic depends upon the degree to which the individual undergoes a conversion. His own experience was of the sweeping, cataclysmic type which lifted him out of a slough of despond and transported him to heights of ecstatic joy and happiness where he stayed for some hours. This state was then succeeded by a feeling of peace, serenity and the profound conviction that he was freed from the bondage of liquor.

He states that roughly 10 percent enter Alcoholics Anonymous on the strength of such an experience. The remaining 90 percent who stay dry achieve the same result by developing slowly and much more gradually the spiritual side of their nature through following the various steps in the program already outlined.

What then is a spiritual awakening? Here the personal experience of Mr. Wilson is again informative. A man of energy, drive and great ability, in his thirties, he found himself completely bogged down by drink. For at least five years he fought without success the downhill process that was going on in him.

He was desperate, depressed, with all the fight knocked out of him. He was willing to try anything because he knew that the alternative facing him was a state hospital and a life of permanent insanity.

Suddenly in this agony of spirit, he cried aloud, "If there is a God, let Him show himself now." And with this plea his religious experience started. He points out, and I think rightfully, that it was not until he became utterly humble that he could and did turn to God for the help that was there.

In other words, in the light of Mr. Wilson's own experience, a religious or spiritual awakening is the act of giving up one's reliance on one's omnipotence. The defiant individuality no longer defies but accepts help, guidance and control from the outside. And as the individual relinquishes his negative, aggressive feelings toward himself and toward life, he finds himself overwhelmed by strongly positive ones such as love, friendliness, peacefulness and pervading contentment, which state is the exact antithesis of the former restlessness and irritability. And the significant fact is that with this new mental state the individual is no longer "driven to drink.

Further insight into the phenomenon of spiritual change came from a patient whose case I now wish to cite. He is a man in his early forties. From a family of wealth and the youngest of several children, he was the pampered darling of a neurotic, hypochondriacal mother.

Drinking began in late adolescence. Almost at once he learned to rely on liquor to help him meet social situations, and as the years rolled on, this reliance became more pronounced.

He proved to be an exceedingly responsive patient, readily acknowledging his alcoholic tendency, and quickly becoming interested in Alcoholics Anonymous. After about a month, he was convinced that he had the problem in hand. Within a short time, however, nipping set in and four months later he returned after some weeks of steady drinking.

Again he showed himself responsive to interviews, but it now became apparent that there was a real battle ahead. The traits already described reared themselves as insuperable barriers to therapy.

During the weeks that we were discussing these obstacles the patient began to nip on the sly and finally went off on a full-fledged spree. As is usual with all alcoholics, as he sobered up he was filled with remorse, guilt and a tremendous sense of humility.

The defiant personality was licked by the very excesses of its own behavior and, in that mood, he was utterly sure he would never take another drop. On the third day of his recuperation, however, he informed me during an interview that I had better do something about it, and when I asked him what "it" referred to, he replied, "My old feeling is coming back over me; I just feel myself closing in from you and all that has just happened."

The indifference to his problem, the aggressive sureness, the utter lack of any real sense of humility and guilt, all the character traits which he had come to identify with the frame of mind that led to drinking were returning and crowding out the feelings, the thoughts, almost the sensations which filled him as he came out of his drinking bout. He knew that if these returning feelings again took hold of him sooner or later he would go on another alcoholic spree. He realized that somehow he must cling to the attitudes at the end of the bout.

The next day he began his interview with the statement, "Doc, I've got it."

He then went on to report his experience of the previous night. This experience I label for want of a better term, "a psychological awakening." What happened was a sudden flash of understanding about himself as a person. This occurred around eleven o'clock, and he lay in bed, wide awake until four o'clock in the morning fitting his new insights and understanding to his knowledge of himself.

It is not easy to reconstruct the events of that five hour period, yet those events constitute a major experience in the life of that patient which gave him a basic appreciation of himself as an alcoholic. Moreover, for the first time, he could see himself as he had always been, and in addition he could sense the sort of person he must become if he were to remain sober. Without being aware of it at the time, he had switched from a completely egocentric, subjective point of view to an objective, mature understanding of himself and life.

In retrospect, it is apparent that the patient became aware of his basic egocentricity. For the first time he was able to penetrate behind the facade of his rationalizations and defense reactions and to see that always hitherto he had put himself first.

He was literally unaware that other souls existed except insofar as they affected him. That they, too, might have separate existences, similar yet different from his, just never had taken on the aspect of reality.

Now he no longer felt himself the omnipotent being who viewed the world only in relation to himself. Instead, he could see himself in relation to the world and could realize that he was but a small fraction of a universe peopled by many other individuals. He could share life with others. He had no further need to dominate and to fight to maintain that domination. He could relax and take things easy.

His new orientation can best be described in the patient's own words. As he put it, "Why, Doc, do you know I've been a fraud all my life, and I never knew it. I used to think I was interested in people, but that wasn't really so. I wasn't interested in my mother as a person who was sick. I didn't realize that she as a person might be suffering; I only thought what will happen to me when she is gone. People used to point me out as a dutiful son and an example, and I believed it. But there wasn't anything to it. I was just anxious to keep her near, because she made me feel better. She never criticized me and always made me feel that whatever I did, I was O.K."

New insights illuminated his previous relationships with people. With respect to this point, he remarked, "Do you know, I'm beginning to feel closer to people. I can think of them sometimes. And I feel easier with them, too. Maybe that's because I don't think they're fighting me, since I don't feel I'm fighting them. I now think maybe they can really like me."

FIRST ARCHIVES ROAD SHOW

Archivists' Workshop - Shire Hall, Hereford,

Third Workshop

Collections and Classification of Archives

Paper presented by Peter J.H.

Avon South Intergroup

and South Midlands Regional Archivist (Alternate)

The collecting of AA archives was started by our co-founder Bill W. less than twenty years after the founding of our Fellowship. Bill had the foresight and the vision to see we needed to preserve an historical record of our movement's origins so that "myth does not predominate over fact."

It is possible to trace this back to June 1949 and chart correspondence between Bill and Jack Alexander, the author of the famous 1941 Saturday Evening Post article. Bill wanted Jack Alexander to do a follow-up article in order for him to record the rapid changes then happening in the Fellowship. Jack was unwilling to do this so soon; only nine years since his last look at AA. Jack thought not much had changed to justify another look: that the psychology of drinkers was the same, and AA's method of dealing with alcoholics was also unchanged. Bill disagreed and told him that with the introduction of the 12 Traditions, Alcoholics Anonymous was like no other society on earth; that there was much new material for him to consider, albeit most of it was still in Bill's head, but that there was enough new material there to form the basis for a new article.

But even before this time Bill was aware of the need to record events as he encouraged Lois to keep a journal and a copy of all their correspondence. However, it was from 1950 that Bill and Nell Wing (his secretary) really concerned themselves with obtaining and preserving historical records. While from 1950 to 1954 Bill was writing the 12&12 he was also collecting oral histories from old-timers in Akron and Cleveland. Bill would travel out West specifically to record these people something which shows how much importance he gave to archival work. He also set about recording the recollections of the Trustees, the members of staff at the office like Ruth Hock and the non-alcoholic clergymen who had played such a vital part in establishing AA.

As an example on the 23rd of February 1955, Bill wrote to Clarence S. in Cleveland asking him to record his recollections, and this gives an accurate insight into the methods and purpose of archives.

"I would like to have you make a tape recording about your recollections of the old days. There isn't any rush about this as the preparation of a history will have to be done carefully and gradually over the next 2 or 3 years. I have though made a couple of trips to Akron and Cleveland and have already interviewed quite a lot of the old folks, so as to be sure and get the record straight. You can get a good running start at the history by retelling your own personal story how AA came to your attention; what your first impressions were and how it developed in the first few years in Cleveland. I hope you can dwell at length on the difficulties as well as the humour of those years, relating as many anecdotes as possible. You can say anything you like being assured that nothing will be published without your consent. The preliminary investigation shows that it isn't hard to prepare a fact, what happened, that is dates when people came in, groups started and so forth. The hard thing is to lay hold of the atmosphere of the whole proceedings and the anecdotal material that will make the early experience live. When I first set out to gather material I ran into a little resistance. I pointed out to them that if the old-timers in Akron and Cleveland wouldn't go on record as to what happened, how in God's name could I or anyone else tell an accurate story for the future. Clarence, I feel that you should be one of those very best sources. So think it over. Make an outline of topics that you want to talk about and go to it at any length at all -- recording tapes are cheap. So ransack your memory if you will."

In 1955 Bill appointed Nell Wing as Archivist and as the oral histories began to pour into the office between 1955 and 1960 Nell found herself with just one of many ongoing projects she had to do. In 1965 she did manage to make a small beginning on classification but it was not until after Bill's death in 1971 that Nell really got down to serious archival activity. In particular, she received encouragement from a member down in Florida, Tom S., who kept encouraging her to keep going when others thought she was creating a monster. It seemed now the time for archives had finally come and an Archive Committee was formed in 1973. In 1975 an archive office at GSO was officially opened by Lois and it is worth remembering that even archivists are not perfect as nobody that day thought to record Lois's words.

In 1980 at the World Convention in New Orleans two English members came away from Nell's early morning workshop on archives determined to start something similar in England. On return they obtained a copy of the guidelines and contacted the General Secretary in London and their local Intergroup inviting them to join with them in this new form of service but there is no record of a reply being received. So they set up a small archive committee within their own group. Its remit was simple: to see what was out there, and if anything, was it worth recording?

What happened next was amazing! They were given Press cuttings and photographs of AA in the West Country from the early days. A member loaned the committee over a 1000 letters written by Sackville detailing many of the important events and of people in England's history. For instance, did you know Sackville convened an AA public meeting in Cardiff in 1950 after first refereeing an International sports match?

The little committee then received an audio tape from probably the first Al-Anon member in Europe who's husband had been an early AA member in the West of England. The tape charted the first AA meetings at Mickleton, Evesham, Cheltenham and Bath during the first 15 years. They then received a tape of the founder of AA in Bristol which led to even more valuable research being done in that City. It is worth remembering that two of the oldest and most active members in the West Country both got sober in the same group in Washington, DC.

In 1985 Nell Wing came to the Bristol Reunion and convened an archives meeting. Staff from service offices in Britain and Ireland attended, something which became the launch pad for them to display their own national archives. One last thing about Nell; she was a great one for encouraging oral histories and she said: "as archivists we should never go anywhere without tape recorders..." .

Bristol is fortunate to have had an exceptional member in its groups who had the foresight to record what was happening in the Fellowship at home and abroad, particularly from 1968 onwards through the unofficial AA journal, Bristol Fashion: dates of events, conventions, workshops, gatherings etc., the opening of new groups, recording the deaths of old-timers, articles and observations on our AA life, all written by members themselves and with plenty of anecdotes to liven things up. It also makes up something of a "spiritual soap opera" due to its length of publication and the fact that it became a means for keeping members in touch with each other from around the world. Bristol Fashion is as yet an untapped primary source of information on the growth and depth of our Fellowship.

It was through an idea given by one of the readers of Bristol Fashion that led to the First European Convention of Alcoholics Anonymous in Bristol in 1971 and convened by the South West Intergroup, SWIG for short! Most of the earliest members in Britain and Europe attended this event as did a whole host of GSO staff and Trustees from New York and London. It also brought AA to the attention of the Vatican through the attendance of Archbishop Enricci as a guest and who was afforded a full diplomatic welcome to the City for the express purpose of attending the European Convention. Another often overlooked fact in England is the role of clergymen in helping to establish AA. This is an area that needs much more research.

The exceptional Bristol member had the foresight also to keep all his correspondence with the early members in England and some in North America. The archive contains something like 15000 items of correspondence worth preserving: something approaching 500 tapes, on which all the talks have actually been heard in person: there is information on the formation and work of the service structure in England over the last four decades. Also in the archive is a library of AA books: all Alcoholics Anonymous hard back books known as "the family books," mostly first editions, many subsequent editions inscribed by a few authors/editors, AA friends and AA archivists past and present. There are early printings of four first editions of the Big Book, Alcoholics Anonymous, which the archive has either inherited from the owner or has had donated. There is regret in our Region that the 2nd edition Big Book inscribed by Bill himself to Frank of Calne could not somehow have stayed in the Regional Archives. Yet on further consideration, having this particular treasure securely housed in the National Archives is the very safest place for it.

There is also a huge contribution of alcoholism-related books written on psychology, medicine and spirituality. The library contains in all approximately 560 books as well as numerous booklets and early pamphlets.

You may ask the question, should we as AA archivists collect anything other than AA documents? Bill answers this question in a letter to Milton Maxwell who first drew Bill's attention to the story of the Washingtonians. "I am extremely glad that such a thorough going study as yours has been made available. Here and there I have noted other attempts but nothing at all comparable to what you have done. I wish every AA could indelibly burn the history of the Washingtonians in his memory. It is an outstanding example of how and how not we ought to conduct ourselves. In a sense AA has never had a problem seriously threatening our overall unity. Yet I notice some AAs are complacent enough we never shall. You have certainly done your bit to rectify that condition."

In the archive is an original Hansard copy of an Act of Parliament, put through from a Private Member's Bill in 1986 by Sir Bernard Braine, M.P. who was a good friend of Alcoholics Anonymous. This Act was needed to keep AA within the law of the land, because at the time it found itself in breach of a new Charities Act, by adhering to our Tradition of self support, through not accepting nor soliciting outside contributions, which, with its charitable status, it was obliged to do. So rather than change Alcoholics Anonymous in any way, AA had the wisdom and the courage to have the law changed instead. This all provided our Fellowship with lots of good and incredulous attention from the media.

A part of the archive includes extensive records and much memorabilia of a particular group which has been in continuous existence for over thirty years and many of the items on our National Committee Chairman's list of collectables are in fact already in this group archive. This is because although the founder died some twelve years ago, the first secretary of the group -- a veritable magpie -- is still alive and attending meetings in the very same venue and apparently has never thrown anything away! One of the ways this group has chosen to carry the message is to reconvene in 1981 the annual convention, known as the AA Reunion in Bristol. Here again there is a detailed record of speakers and the organization and of each Reunion and especially of how much fun they always have. In their files is a balance sheet of each event, a copy of which was always lodged at GSO right up until the current era began in the early nineties. This is very impressive and was very much in line with the openness and availability of the Reunion records and accounts.

As regards ownership of the Archive which has been in the possession of the archivist for many years, it is considered that all straightforward and factual items, such as the original material covering the start of Alcoholics Anonymous in the West Country, including the diary of Bristol's founding member, together with a copy of an original 24-hour meditation book which has notes at the back on the formation of Bristol's second group, "belong to AA" as we say. Some of the "family books" and three of the four first editions of the Big Book would fall into this category as well, two printed in the States and one in England! Reunion files and much else besides would also "belong to AA." Three current members of the original archives committee have been invited to act as trustees and custodians of the Archive to fulfill the role of AA in the event of the archivist's death. All other items, that would never ever be displayed would become the property of the Archivist's grown-up children but would remain in the archive and under the custodianship of the trustees. Two stipulations have been made, however. Firstly, that the Archive is never to be broken up and, secondly, that whatever happens to it and whatever the custodians wish to do with it (for example, whether to close the archive or continue working on it) all five trustees must be in unanimous agreement.

The current work on the Archive has been to build on what has already been there for over twenty years and the hope and expectation is that others will come along to help continue the work. My job over the last three years has been to fulfill the late Barbara T's request that the archive be indexed and to classify what there was. This was not difficult as the nature of the material makes for its own classification. The way ahead is having to scan everything onto disc in order to preserve it. Over time pages are fading especially Jim H's diary entries of the first couple of years or so of the start of AA in Bristol. The archivist's home group also helps out on a regular basis and the Intergroup has voted a nominal sum per month for archive work, it is hoped shortly to be received.

Though very rewarding, it is time consuming work and not many people as yet

By Father Ralph S. Pfau

and Al Hirshberg

I woke up in a room completely devoid of furniture except for a chair, a table and the cot I was lying on.

"Do you want some breakfast, Father?"

I blinked my eyes. Standing in front of me, with a breakfast tray in his hand, was a brother.

"Where am I?" I asked.

"You're at the Alexian Brothers Sanitarium, in Oshkosh, Wisconsin."

"How did I get here?"

"You drove."

"What day is this?"

"Friday."

The brother set the tray down and left, closing the door behind him. He didn't lock it.

What happened? Where have I been? I was headed west. How did I end up here?

I remember a letter from the bishop, removing me as pastor of St. Ann's parish and ordering me to the sanitarium at Oshkosh. I remember a drinking session with a friend in the parish house. I remember loading my car and leaving Indianapolis and drinking along the way.

Only, I was going to drive to the West Coast.

I never found out the whole story to my strange odyssey. A nephew of mine, who was stationed at an Army base in Milwaukee, later gave me a fragment of information.

It seems that I phoned him from Chicago and told him I'd be in Milwaukee the next day. And the next evening, we had dinner and a few drinks together. He said he knew I'd been drinking, but had no idea that I'd blacked out. I had seemed perfectly rational in everything I said. I had told him nothing about myself except that I was on a trip.

The rest of the trip is an absolute blank to this day.

As I lay on my cot in the sanitarium, I tried to recall what had made me change my mind about going to the West Coast.

I didn't want to come here. And I don't intend to stay. This solitude is oppressive. I've got to get out of here.

I dressed and went into the administration office, and told the brother that I wasn't going to stay.

"Of course, legally, we can't hold you," he said. "You're free to go. Naturally, that would result in your suspension."

If I stay, I may never get out. If I leave, I'll be suspended.

"Do I say Mass?" I asked.

"Oh, no. You don't say Mass. The rule of the sanitarium is you do not say Mass until our bishop gives you permission."

"Will I be allowed to go out?" I asked pettishly.

"With permission," he said. "You may go into town once a month if one of the brothers is with you."

"What about my car?"

"You are not to use it. Your bishop has given orders that you are never again to drive a car without his permission. We can sell it for you," he said, "or if you prefer, you may designate a friend to sell it."

The rest of the day is a blank, but I remember the night. Somewhere along the latter part of the evening, my mind cleared considerably. I was deeply resentful, and almost all of my resentment was directed at the bishop of Indianapolis.

He's the cause of everything. He sent me here. He'll keep me here. He won't let me say Mass. He won't let me drive my car. He won't let me live a normal life. He won't even let me be free. I've lost my parish, my friends, my car, my liberty, my self-respect-everything. And it's all the bishop's fault.

I paced and sat and lay down and looked out a darkened window and smoked and stewed and worried. And, gradually, as the night progressed, my resentment turned to self-pity.

It's my own fault. I knew I wasn't worthy of being a priest when I was a seminarian. And I've proved it a thousand times ever since.

I blamed everything in the world for my troubles-everything but alcohol-with the resentment aimed, in the last analysis, at myself.

By dawn, I was hopelessly convinced that there was nothing anyone, anywhere, could do to straighten me out.

Later that morning, a doctor came to visit me. Once again, I recited the long unhappy story of my career. All I had to do was say aloud everything that I had been repeating to myself only a few hours earlier. The longer I talked, the more I seemed to break with reality.

This is not me. This is somebody else-some other Ralph Pfau. It is he-not I -who needs help. I feel very sorry for him. He has lost everything. I wish I could do something for him.

I kept on saying one thing and thinking another. The words were automatic, coming from the mouth of a stranger; the thoughts were the real me.

When I came to the end, the doctor said, "Father, there were 12 full bottles of liquor in your bag. Do you drink much?"

Twelve full bottles? That other Ralph Pfau left Indianapolis with 12 bottles. How much more liquor did he have to buy to fill the bag with fresh bottles?

"Not much," I said.

"I'm telling the truth. It's the other Ralph Pfau who does all the drinking.

"Did you ever drink to excess, Father-ever in your life?"

No, Doctor. Not ever.

It was somebody else who sat all morning, waiting for 12 o'clock to come so he could have his first drink, somebody else who headed for the West Coast with a case of whisky in his bag, somebody else who blacked out from drinking on the way.

I was detached from everything. I had nothing to do with this man who was asking me questions.

"Father," the doctor said, "I think you're a schizophrenic."

"Is that so?"

I had never heard the term and I didn't want to know what it meant. I was afraid that it meant something very bad.

"Yes," the doctor said, "but I think we can help you. We're going to try shock treatments."

And I said, "Fine, Doctor."

The following day, I was taken to another hospital-the Winnebago State Hospital for the mentally ill.

After I had been admitted, a big male nurse handed me a shapeless white garment and said, "Take off your clothes, Father, and put this on. I'll be back for you in a few minutes.

He returned shortly and took me to another room. This one was small -about 10 feet by 12-and, because of the equipment and all the people in it, it looked smaller.

There was a table in the center, similar to an operating-room table, but wider and heavier. Within easy reach, with wires sticking out of them, were two attachments that looked a bit like earphones. They swayed gently back and forth. A doctor stood at the head of the table, with a woman nurse beside him. Halfway down the table were two of the biggest, most powerful-looking men I ever saw. I was petrified.

This story was written for publication with the permission of Father Pfau's ecclesiastical superiors.

"Father, lie down on the table, please," the doctor said.

I stretched out, putting my head on an uncovered pillow. Somebody rubbed grease on my temples, and somebody else reached for the attachments that hung from a box on the table. They were fitted over my head, one on each side.

They're going to electrocute me. Oh, God, get me out of here.

I tried to get up on one elbow, but I couldn't move. One arm was pinioned by each of the burly attendants. I tried to move my feet, but they wouldn't budge either. The male nurse was leaning on them.

Terrified, I looked up into the eyes of the woman nurse. I tried to say something, but the words stuck in my throat. She was coming at me with something big and wide and white. It moved closer and closer to my face; I tried to pull away from it, but there was nowhere to go.

"Open your mouth!" The nurse spoke sharply, as she poked the white apparition at me. "Now bite!" I clamped by teeth together. I felt engulfed in a blinding white flash that seemed to consume me, inside and out, from head to foot. That was the last thing I knew.

I was sitting on a cot in a darkened room when I came to my senses. I shook my head for a few minutes, then looked around. The woman nurse was standing beside me.

"How do you feel, Father?" the nurse asked.

"I guess I'm all right. Only, I don't remember anything."

"It will all come back," she assured me.

Gradually, in the next few days, practically everything came back into focus except the shock treatment itself and the events immediately leading up to it. I didn't recall those details for months.

After about three weeks, when the shock treatments were over, I was given permission to say Mass again. But it was many more weeks until my nerves quieted down to a point where I could look on life objectively. I realize now that I had had a narrow escape from what amounted to complete oblivion. This was my fourth nervous breakdown.

For the rest of the summer and early fall of 1943, I lived a quiet, relaxed life at the sanitarium. And in October, I was released, with an order from the bishop to report to Indianapolis directly to the chancery office to see him.

"How are you, Ralph?" the bishop asked, quietly.

"Fine."

He sighed. "I wonder how long you'll stay that way. Well, I'm going to give you one more chance. You can go to St. Joan of Arc parish and live there a while." "Frankly," he added. "I think you're hopeless."

It was not until years later that I realized that the bishop was trying to shock me into positive action. But at the time.

Hopeless. I can't win. What's the use of trying. So I didn't try. One week later, I blacked out again—from drinking.

For the first time in my conscious thinking, it slowly began to dawn on me that maybe alcohol was my primary problem. I knew that I had other problems too, and I felt they were more important. However, I now began to think that perhaps I should try to get the alcohol problem straightened out first.

I forced myself to carry out my parish duties. I longed for a drink, yet did not dare to take one.

If I take a drink now, I might blackout again. But I've got to have a drink.
How long can I keep this up?

I couldn't sleep at all one night. Finally, I got up, went over to the window and stared out at the sleeping city. I was standing there when the rectory phone rang. It was two o'clock.

"My husband is dying, Father. Can you come right over? My son will pick you up in a few minutes."

I went back to my room, dressed, got the Holy Oils and went out the front door. As I closed it behind me, a car pulled up. A young man pushed the door open. I got in, and we drove off.

"What happened?" I asked.

"My dad-I'm afraid he dropped dead. The doctor's on the way."

As we got out of the car in front of his house, another automobile pulled up behind us. The boy led me to the front door.

"Please go in, Father. I'll hold the door open for the doctor."

When I walked into the bedroom, a woman was weeping. Her husband, fully dressed, was stretched out flat on the floor. I thought he was dead.

"Excuse me, Father."

Behind me, the doctor already had his bag open and was filling a needle from a bottle. I moved aside to give him room. He felt the man's pulse, rolled up his sleeve, splashed on some alcohol and shoved the needle into an arm.

For a minute nothing happened. Then, to my amazement, the man sat up and looked around.

"Just as I thought, Father," the doctor said. He's had too much liquor and barbitals. He'll be all right.

"I-thought he was dead."

"He will be if he doesn't change his habits."

Without a word, the man got up, went to the bed and began to undress. His wife, badly shaken, thanked us both, and the doctor left.

My head was spinning. I wasn't listening to the woman. In spite of what I had just witnessed, I wanted a drink.

"--called you at this hour, Father. We appreciate your kindness in coming."

I followed the woman. As I walked through the living room, a book on the mantel caught my eye. I picked it up and riffled the pages.

"May I borrow this?" I asked.

"Certainly."

The name of the book was Alcoholics Anonymous.

I had never heard of Alcoholics Anonymous. I didn't know there was such an organization. The book, which expanded its principles, its aims and the significance of its 12 steps to sobriety, intrigued me. I finished reading it before dawn.

The following day, I read the book again, and, almost unconsciously, I memorized the 12 steps:

"1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol—that our lives had become unmanageable.

"2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.

"3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.

"4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.

"5. Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.

"6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.

"7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.

"8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.

"9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.

"10. Continued to take personal inventory, and when we were wrong, promptly admitted it.

"11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.

"12. Having had a spiritual awakening as a result of those steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics and to practice these principles in all our affairs."

It's the kind of thing that can be applied to anyone, no matter what his religion. I'll bet it helps a lot of people—particularly those who may have lost their awareness of God. It's a good program, for alcoholism.

But I'm not an alcoholic. I'm a priest. I haven't lost my awareness of God. This program is not for me.

But I couldn't keep my hands off that book. Day after day, I picked it up and read it. After three or four weeks, I knew it from cover to cover. And during that entire period, I didn't take a drink.

One evening, several weeks after I began reading the book. I noticed some pamphlets on a side table in the vestibule of the rectory. On the top pamphlet were printed the words "Alcoholics Anonymous." I asked the pastor who had left them.

"Doherty Sheerin," he said. "He's a fine man. I think he's the president of A.A. here in Indianapolis."

I read the pamphlets. They told stark, simple stories of despair and hopelessness and terror and defeat, and suddenly I came to a decision.

I looked up Doherty Sheerin's phone number and called him. He was at the rectory 15 minutes later. I liked him on sight. There was strength of character and leadership in his rather square face, and I felt almost a compulsion to put myself in his hands and let him steer me any way he wanted to.

This man will help me.

"What's on your mind, Father?"

"Well, I understand you're president of Alcoholics Anonymous here in town."

"I'm not president. We don't have any such thing as president. Alcoholics Anonymous is just a group of individuals all faced with the same problem. We only recently began the Indianapolis group, and I happened to be the first member of it."

"I see," I said. "I wonder if you can help me. I have some personal problems. Of course, mine isn't really an alcoholic problem. I never drank very much. I'm not an alcoholic."

His smile never left his face.

"I know what you mean, Father," he said gently. "All I can do is pass along a few ideas; then perhaps you can help yourself. We don't teach anything in A.A. We don't lecture anyone, or tell anybody whether he is or isn't an alcoholic. All we do is suggest. Take another look at yourself and form your own conclusions."

Why don't you go to a meeting with me?

"Nobody will ever know," he continued. "We don't tell who attended meetings. We only tell about ourselves. We can get up and shout about ourselves from the rooftops for all the world to hear if we want to. But anonymity respects the other members' names. So nobody will know that you are attending the meetings unless you tell them."

I'll just look in as a spectator. These people will think I'm there in my capacity as a priest to help them out. I'll go to one meeting, and if I don't like it, I won't go anymore.

"Our next meeting is Thursday night, Father," Dohr was saying. "I'll pick you up at 7:15."

By Thursday, I had changed my mind a dozen times about going to the A.A. meeting. But promptly at 7:15, Dohr arrived, and I drove off with him.

It was a small meeting—only seven people altogether. None of these men appeared to be in financial difficulties, nor did they look like drunks, or even ex-drunks. From all appearances, this could have been a meeting of the board of directors of a library.

For the next hour, a discussion of various problems of the alcoholic moved back and forth between Dohr and the members. I noticed that, before anyone spoke during the next meeting, he always said, "I'm an alcoholic," and I wondered if I would ever be able to do that—if, that is, I really were an alcoholic. I was still far from ready to admit that.

But I felt better than I had felt in several weeks as we rode back to the rectory. Dohr asked me how I liked the meeting.

"Fine," I said, with real enthusiasm

"That's good," Dohr said. "Now, keep coming back. Some day, everything will fall into focus."

But, later, as I lay in bed, the seeds of discouragement began to grow.

This A.A. is great for laymen. It gives them a new awareness of God, and that helps to keep them away from drinking. But I have always had a strong awareness of and faith in God, and that didn't keep me from drinking. They talked about honesty tonight-honesty with themselves and honesty with other people. I know all about honesty. Honesty is one of the virtues that any priest adheres to as a matter of course. So there are two things-awareness of God and honesty-which are keystones of success in A.A., and I have both, but neither stopped me from drinking. So what can A.A. do for me?

Day after day, I went through the motions of carrying out my duties at the parish. I didn't drink, but I was never free of the vague urge to do so.

Doer called me every day. About all he ever said was, "How do you feel, Father?" and about all I ever replied was, "All right-I guess." But after a few days, I began to look forward to his calls, and our conversations lengthened. My jitters always died down a little after I had talked with him, but it was never long before they returned.

As the weeks and months passed, I continued to go to Alcoholics Anonymous meetings, largely because of Doer. He never asked me if I wanted to go. He simply took it as a matter of course that I was going, and he always called for me.

In general, the other priests in the rectory approved of my interest in A.A.. But they knew me and knew my problem. Whenever I mentioned A.A. to priests outside the parish, I almost invariably ran into opposition.

"No priests should join that sort of an organization," a priest said to me one day. "You should be able to get what you need from your Church."

He expressed the thoughts of the majority. I wondered if he was right. I could derive the strength to stop drinking from my Church. I asked Doer about it later.

"You can, But you won't," he said. "It would be wonderful if you could find the strength to stop drinking from the Church. But the average alcoholic personality just won't. I didn't-and I've always been devoted to my Church. You've not only been devoted to your Church; you've given your life to it. But you still didn't get from it alone a solution for your drinking problem."

"But I must have the Church."

"Of course, you must have the Church. Any good Catholic must have the Church. A.A. without the Church would be less effective for us than the Church without A.A. But, in order to stop drinking, people like you and I must have both. We need something to help us remove the natural obstacles to grace, something to keep us convinced we can't drink-that we're still alcoholics."

Gradually, I became convinced. It took almost a year for the program to take shape. I began to see how a key principle of A.A. applied to me, reluctant as I was to admit it.

To the alcoholic, the first thing in his life is that he cannot drink. This is basic. It may not be his most important problem. Certainly, my neurotic tendencies, which first manifested themselves at St. Meinrad's Seminary, before I had ever taken a drink, were more important. If an alcoholic has a deadly disease, the disease is more important.

But, regardless of his other problems, the first thing an alcoholic must do is stop drinking. Once he has done that, he can tackle the other problems. But if he doesn't do it, the other problems not only will remain unsolved, but will become intensified.

In August of 1945, I got a letter from the bishop, telling me that my friend, Father Ambrose Sullivan, who had been appointed pastor of Holy Cross parish in Indianapolis, had asked for me as his assistant.

This was first direct contact with the bishop since I had returned from the sanitarium at Oshkosh a year and a half earlier. I had studiously avoided the chancery, for I didn't know how the bishop would feel about my being in A.A. The letter encouraged me. Obviously, the bishop must have heard about it and didn't object, or he would have said something. I was delighted to join Father Sullivan.

At just about that time, I had begun to make Twelfth Step calls. These are visits to people who, faced with the alcoholic problem, called Alcoholics Anonymous for help. As far as I knew, the only purpose in making Twelfth Step calls was to help somebody else try to stay sober. I made half a dozen calls in about three months, but I might as well have stayed homes. I couldn't get anyone to stay sober.

When I pointed out my lack of success to Dohr, he said, "You've stayed sober yourself, haven't you? Insurance against a slip-that's really the primary reason for Twelfth Step calls. When I make one, I say, `Now, look, fella, I don't care if you die drunk. I'm not interested in that. But I do care if I die drunk, and that's the reason I'm here. Now if you want what I've got, I'll take all the time in the world to give it to you. Just give me a call when you're ready."

Dohr Sheerin must have sponsored several hundred alcoholics during the years I knew him in Indianapolis, and most of them made the grade.

"But, Dohr," I said, "as a priest, I've got something to offer that the others haven't. Only, when I go out on calls, people won't accept me as anything but a priest, no matter what I tell them. As far as they're concerned, I'm moralizing."

"That's right, Father," he said. "You can do a lot more good in other ways than any of us. The only question is how to go about it."

The answer was so obvious that I felt foolish because I hadn't thought of it sooner. In the seminary and as priests, we annually made a retreat. A retreat is a period of discussion and meditation that normally lasts from a day to a week end. In a Catholic retreat, there is a retreat master who gives talks on the dogma and practices of Catholicism. There is also a regular period for questions and open discussion. People in all walks of life attend retreats and gain great peace and solace from them.

"How about having a retreat for alcoholics?" I suggested. "After all, the whole idea of a retreat is just to pause and think things over in company with other people having the same idea in mind. We could make it exclusively on A.A. We wouldn't go into the question of religion at all. And we wouldn't confine it to Catholics."

Dohr was enthusiastic about the idea, and so was the bishop when I wrote for his permission. Since I had once served as chaplain for the Little Sisters of the Poor, I asked them for use of their facilities. They told me they'd be delighted. The retreat was a success in all aspects. We had 67 men there, only about 20 of whom were Catholics. The talks were all strictly about A.A. and were well received by Protestants and Catholics.

The one-day retreat was so helpful that the members urged me to arrange a longer one. Our first full week-end retreat was held at St. Joseph" College near Rensselaer, Ind. There were about 90 people there, about 89 per cent of whom were non Catholics.

To this day, we have a men's retreat at St. Joseph's every year. We have retreats for women as well as for men; they are held separately in various places throughout the country. Our average attendance, which varies in different parts of the country, still runs about 65 to 70 per cent non-Catholics.

By late 1945, I had not had a drink in two years. When I arose every morning, I asked divine help in remaining sober for the next 24 hours (as I do today), and every day I remain sober. My nerves were behaving, and my jitters were gone. I was in good physical condition and enjoying more peace of mind and satisfaction in my work than I had ever known.

I had full confidence in the A.A. program, but there was one fact I still couldn't accept completely. That was the theory that alcoholism is a disease. I suspected it was a moral weakness that had caused me to drink.

I had learned that there are sharply defined differences between an alcoholic and a drunk. I knew that alcoholism had the element of compulsion and drunkenness did not. The quantity of liquor consumed and resulting intoxication might be exactly the same, but the motive is different. The alcoholic drinks because he has to. The drunkard drinks because he wants to. Once the alcoholic starts drinking, he can't stop. The drunkard can stop whenever he feels like it. When the alcoholic drinks, all he can think about is where he will get his next drink. When the drunkard drinks, he wants only to get high and enjoy himself. The alcoholic can't get liquor out of his mind. The drunkard can forget about it at will, if, indeed, he ever gives it much thought to begin with.

When the alcoholic wakes up in the morning, he's got the jitters and an uncontrollable craving for a drink to relieve them. When the drunkard wakes up in the morning, he feels terrible, but the only craving he has is for something to get his mind off his hang-over. The last thing he wants is a drink. If the alcoholic doesn't have his drink, he can't work or do anything else. The drunkard might take something to settle his stomach, but he can always manage to drag himself off to work. He won't have a happy day, but he won't have a craving for liquor, either.

Of course, a drunkard can develop into an alcoholic. Most alcoholics started out as social drinkers. But who knows where the responsibility for his becoming an alcoholic lies? I had been taught that it's his own responsibility. It is the normal reaction of any clergyman to accept this theory.

This was why I, as a priest, found it so hard to accept any other theory. As far as I could see, I became an alcoholic because I drank too much; it was not that I drank too much because I was an alcoholic. It was as simple as that. And, no matter how often Dohr tried to tell me otherwise, I refused to believe him.

I told alcoholics every day that they were sick, but I didn't, I couldn't, believe that this was true.

Not until the day I nearly slipped myself.

When saying Mass, a priest uses wine in the chalice. This, in our belief becomes the Blood of Christ at the moment of Consecration. Although the substance of the wine is changed, the action of alcohol can have the same effect on the human system after the Consecration as before.

I learned early after I joined A.A. that, as a priest-alcoholic, I must take a minimum of wine at Mass. The minimum for validity is about two teaspoonfuls. Medically, an alcoholic would be disturbed if he took enough alcohol to penetrate his blood stream or brain cells. Two teaspoonfuls of ordinary Mass wine would not bother the worst alcoholic. While, contrary to public opinion, it is a fermented drink, it usually has a very low alcohol content, because the Church does not permit Mass wine to be fortified.

Commercial wine, on the other hand, is well fortified with grape alcohol. It is usually heavier than Mass wine, and can cause a definite reaction if taken by an alcoholic. A few of the heavier-type Mass wines approach this commercial content.

I had always been careful about the amount of wine at Mass, and I never had a reaction from it after I joined A.A. But one morning, at Holy Cross, I knew the moment I consumed the Holy Species that this was not average Mass wine. I felt a sudden urge to keep on drinking, a compulsive craving that blocked out all reason.

When Mass was over, I hurried to the kitchen.

"Was there anything different about the Mass wine we used this morning?" I asked the housekeeper.

"Yes, Father," she said. "A salesman left this sample bottle, and I used it in the cruet."

I looked at the label. The wine, although Mass wine, had an alcoholic content of 22 per cent.

I wanted a drink. I shuddered as I left the kitchen. I wanted a drink.

I was scared-as scared as I had ever been in my life. This was not just a casual desire. This was a terrible, compulsive craving that overwhelmed me.

If I don't have a drink, I'll go crazy. I forced myself to the telephone. With shaking hands, I picked it up and called Dohr Sheerin.

"Hello?"

"Dohr, I want a drink."

"Well, Father," he drawled, "I'm glad you called. What happened?"

I told him. I guess I wasn't very coherent, but he didn't interrupt me. Then, I said, "Dohr, I'm frightened. I've got to have a drink. I can't understand how this happened. It's never happened before. I've been dry two years, and now I feel as though I'd never been dry. A little wine at the Mass-that's all it took."

"A little wine has set off a lot of benders, Father," Dohr said. He was still drawling, talking in a slow casual manner. "You know," he went on, "You were very wise in calling me. I know just how you feel. You've had a reaction because the wine was too heavy. But you know you're really all right, and you know you'll get over this craving. You've been in A.A. a couple of years now. You know the questions, and you know the answers. And you know you can't take another drink, because if you do, there'll be no stopping. You'll get the jitters and you'll fall apart, and you'll have to get dried out all over again. And you know what that means."

"Dohr, I've got to hang up now. I'm going to get a drink."

"Wait a minute, Father." Dohr's voice was softly, gently persuasive. "Before you hang up, I want to tell you something. I've got a couple of tickets to the Notre Dame game at South Bend Saturday. I want you to come and see it with me. They've got a great team this year, Father-"

"I want a drink."

"Do you remember the shock treatments, Father? Do you remember all the sanitariums? Do you remember Snake Run? Do you remember what you were like two years ago, before you came into A.A.? Do you realize how far you've come in those two years? Do you realize how far you're going? You don't really want a drink, Father-"

"Yes, I do-I do, Dohr. I must have a drink-now."

"NO, you don't, not really, Father. You're too experienced in A.A. to want a drink. You've seen too many people sweating out a living death while they wait for the alcohol to leave their systems. You've been through that yourself a dozen times. You know what it's like. You don't ever intend to go through it again. You're too intelligent for that, Father. Do you remember how you used to insist to me that, even though you told others that alcoholism was a disease, you really thought it was a moral fault that could be controlled? Now what do you think, Father?"

"Keep taking," I said. My throat was dry and my voice cracked and little rivulets of sweat were gushing out of every pore in my body.

Dohr kept talking. HE jumped from one subject to another, stalling me off from leaving the phone. And I listened. Then he said, "Father, it's been 10 minutes since you've said you wanted a drink."

"Keep talking, Dohr."

So he talked for 10 minutes more.

"Now it's 20 minutes, Father. Do you want to talk?"

"Twenty minutes-yes-yes, Dohr, I want to talk." I could feel the saliva in my mouth and throat, and I wasn't perspiring so much.

"What about the next retreat, Father? Is everything all arranged?"

Now I talked for 10 or 15 minutes. Dohr asked me all sorts of questions, and I answered them.

Then, I said, "I'm all right now, Dohr."

"You don't want a drink anymore?"

"No, Dohr, I don't want a drink."

"All right, Father. Call me if you need me."

We both hung up. I looked at my watch. We had been talking nearly two solid hours. And now I knew that alcoholism was not exclusively a moral problem. Now I knew it was a disease. If I could stick to this conviction without ever rationalizing the "need" for the first drink. I knew my alcoholic troubles would be over.

In 1946, I was asked to give the talk at an A.A. meeting in Cincinnati, by a man who had attended one of our retreats. There were more than a hundred people present, filling the little meeting hall to the doors. I gave a talk on the spiritual side of Alcoholics Anonymous. There was nothing personal in my talk. When it was over, the chairman opened the floor for questions.

A little fellow in the back of the room got up and said, "Father, that was a fine talk. But, Father, what do you know about this problem? Are you an alcoholic?"

I swallowed. This was the moment I dreaded. Then, in a voice I hoped was steady, I said, "Yes, I'm an alcoholic."

"Well," the man said, "tell us about it."

So, for the first time, I told the story of my alcoholic life in an open meeting. I told of my first nervous breakdown, my first drink, my subsequent breakdowns, the fluctuations of my alcoholic appetite, my experiences in various hospitals and sanitariums, my frequent troubles with the bishop-everything, in fact, that I could think of. I talked for about half an hour.

After I sat down, I felt a deep relief, a relief from all the doubts that had assailed me ever since I first joined A.A., as though, with the first full admission before other alcoholics, I had removed the last of the blocks that seemed to separate me from them. There was nothing more for me to hide, either from them or from myself. Now, at last, I was one of them.

The next time I was asked to speak at a meeting, I stood squarely on my feet, looked around at the expectant faces in front of me and said firmly, "My name is Father Pfau. I am a member of the Indianapolis group of Alcoholics Anonymous, and I am an alcoholic.

I have been telling my story to alcoholics all over America ever since. I will venture to say I have delivered it 500 times.

In 1947, the new archbishop of Indianapolis sent for me. "I have heard about you work," he said. "How would you like to be relieved of your pastoral duties so that you can devote full time to Alcoholics Anonymous? Of course," he continued, "the big factor here is the financing of your own living."

"That might be a problem, because A.A. is not really an organization," I said. "It specifies that it has no dues or fees. It is not allied with any sect, faith or denomination. It has no interest in politics, and it neither opposes nor endorses any causes. The only requirement for membership is an honest desire to stop drinking. Our primary purpose is to stay sober and to help other alcoholics achieve and maintain sobriety. If I were to give full time to A.A., I would have to do so as an alcoholic, as just another member of A.A."

"But, as a priest, you would have the respect of others," the archbishop said. "And I feel that your retreat work is important enough to people of all faiths throughout the country to warrant your giving full time to it. When you have thought it over, let me know."

Dohr was delighted when I told him about it. "Don't worry, Father," he said. "We'll find a way to finance you."

The next day, Dohr and I went to see A. Keifer Mayer, a close friend of Dohr's. He was then vice-president (he is now president) of the Kiefer-Stewart Drug Company, a large wholesale house in Indianapolis. Mr. Mayer is neither a Catholic nor an alcoholic. But he was a friend of both the archbishop and his predecessor and had always had great admiration for what Alcoholics Anonymous had done for Doherty Sheerin. Dohr explained the situation.

"You came to the right person," Mr. Mayer said. "This is the finest idea I've heard for a long time. I'm all for it." He reached for his checkbook and wrote a check to cover my expenses for the first year.

The archbishop released me from my parish duties on Christmas Day, 1947, and I started mapping out plans for retreats beginning in June. Dohr urged me to take a vacation before they started. The more I thought about the idea, the better I liked it.

In April, I decided to go to Los Angeles. The night before I left, Dohr gave me a copy of the A.A. directory, a book that lists groups in various parts of the country. I packed it in my bag.

It was a beautiful spring day when I left Indianapolis, but by the time I got to Texarkana, on the second day, the weather was hot and sticky. It was even hotter driving on to Fort Worth. Texas was in the throes of a dust storm. Driving was uncomfortable, and to make it worse, I discovered that, miles back, I had taken the wrong road.

I drove on to a place called Wichita Falls, Texas, and checked into a hotel. The room was flecked with dust, and the bellboy advised me to keep the window closed.

What a day! What a miserable day! Here I am more than a thousand miles from home. I'm tired, dusty, uncomfortable, hungry-and thirsty. I "need" a drink. I'll have a cocktail before dinner. I haven't had a drink in nearly four years. I know I'm O.K. now I'll have just one, and I won't tell a soul about it, not even Dohr.

I took a cold shower, and all the while, I thought of the drink I would soon have.

One drink-one drink-one drink.

I opened my bag for clean linen, and the first thing I saw was the A.A. directory. There was a Wichita Falls group listed. I called the number and a man answered.

"I'm a stranger in town," I explained. "Do you have A.A. meetings here?"

"Yes, indeed," the voice said. "We're having one tonight, and you are welcome."

I'll go over and meet a new group of people. I'll see how A.A. works here, and if they want to know, I'll tell them how A.A. works in Indianapolis.

I forgot all about the drink. It was my last near slip. From that day to this, I never again had a desire for a drink.

A speaking tour in 1948-49 took me to California, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Louisiana, North and South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi and Tennessee. I dovetailed the talks so that no one group would have to bear a heavy burden of expense. There are no fees in A.A., and I have never accepted any. Each group has always been free to give whatever it could afford toward my over-all expenses. No minimum is ever set. I accepted support from Mr. Mayer for two years. After that, I usually managed to balance out, although I have returned to Indianapolis in the red several times.

My travels have brought me many friends. They have also brought me many adventures: some of them amusing, some sad and many deeply satisfying.

One night in Los Angeles, I called the A.A. number that was listed in the directory. The man who answered invited me over to the clubhouse. I did not identify myself as a priest. When I arrived, he was ice cold.

"I'm an Orangeman," he said. The Orangemen, who come from the North of Ireland, oppose Catholics.

"That's all right," I said. "You are a member of A.A., too, aren't you? Well, so am I."

"You mean you're an alcoholic?"

"I'm an alcoholic."

That night, at the meeting, he stood up and said, "If my folks in Ireland knew what I am about to do, they'd blacklist me forever. But that doesn't bother me. I think maybe this is one of the wonderful things about A.A. Denominations mean nothing as far as the program is concerned. We aren't Catholics or Protestants or Jews - we're all just alcoholics. So, it is with real pleasure that this Orangeman introduces a Catholic priest, to give us a talk."

While my work consumed most of my energy, it did not resolve an old problem. For years, I had had deep-seated doubts about the validity of my ordination into the priesthood. I had never consulted anyone. I was afraid to seek an expert opinion, for fear that my priesthood might really be invalid. One day, I mentioned the matter to Dohr.

"I've always doubted it," I told him. "I'm not sure I wanted to become a priest in the first place. And I was under tremendous pressure when I received the diaconate. I don't think anyone can validly receive major orders when he is under pressure."

A canonist is a priest well-versed in cannon law—a sort of ecclesiastical lawyer. When Dohr and I went to see Father Donovan, I told him the whole story of my doubts and fears at the time of my diaconate.

"I'm really concerned about two things," I told Father Donovan, "whether these pressures caused invalidity of my diaconate, and-if this is so-whether my priesthood is invalid too."

"Did you have pressure and anxiety before your ordination to the priesthood, or only before the diaconate?" Father Donovan asked.

"Only before the diaconate."

"You have nothing to worry about, Father," he said, smiling. "Even if the diaconate was not valid, the ordination to the priesthood was. This is the law of the Church. You are perfectly all right."

I may never be sure whether I wanted to be a priest, but now I can be sure God wanted me to be a priest.

I took up residence at the Good Shepherd Convent in Indianapolis in 1950. Little did the good sisters there dream what the next few years would bring. Today, the convent is a beehive of activity. Typing, printing, filing and answering telephones are now part of the daily routine for three of the Magdalen nuns. They do their work in a large office and a printing room.

My one room living quarters serve as my private office by day and my bedroom by night. Two private telephone lines lead into this room, and both can also be switched to the Sister Magdalen's office. Calls come from all parts of the world-and at any hour of the day or night-from alcoholics, people interested in alcoholics, and friends. Some of the callers are sober, some are sobering up and some are not sober. A few years back. A lady not quite sober called me from Paris. She just wanted to talk-at $12 for three minutes. It took her three-quarters of an hour to tell me what was on her mind.

When I am away from Indianapolis, a nun. My secretary, answers the phone. She is acquiring a postgraduate education and is adding many words to her vocabulary, some good, some not so good. At night, she turns the phone on automatic answering.

Each day brings an average of 50 pieces of mail. Each year, the demands on my time at the office have grown to such an extent that I have been forced to gradually cut down on the number of speaking engagements. There are hundreds of invitations from groups I do not have the time to visit. I plan to continue my retreats as long as I am physically able to do so. However, I also want to give more and more time to my writing and to my own people in and around Indianapolis.

In 1953, Doherty Sheerin died. I think about him often, and have said Mass for him many times. I seldom give a talk that I do not mention my debt to him.

I have traveled nearly 750,000 miles in 10 years of working with alcoholics. I have spoken before nearly 200,000 members of Alcoholics Anonymous at retreats, meetings and conventions, and personally discussed their problems with more than 10,000 alcoholics. Many ask me if A.A. is the only avenue of recovery open to alcoholics.

This is what my experience has taught me: The approach of the Twelve Steps, used in an appropriate group, constitutes the best means available today to give sobriety to the alcoholic. However, I feel that the present structural setup of Alcoholics Anonymous is very imperfect. It tends far too much to organization, and this, in dealing with spiritual entities, could prove disastrous. To me, the greatest security for A.A. is in the preservation of its autonomy down to each member. Authority in A.A. would be fatal.

Many people have asked me how they can tell if they will develop into alcoholics. That's not an easy question to answer because so many factors are involved. The person who drinks for pleasure today may be drinking tomorrow because he must. The person who wakes up with a hang-over and wants no part of alcohol this year may wake up with a craving for liquor a year or two from now. But, by the same token, the person who drinks for pleasure now may be drinking for pleasure for the rest of his life. He may wake up with a hang-over every morning, but never become an alcoholic, because he can stop drinking whenever he feels like it and can also moderate his drinking when he chooses to.

My experience, dealing with alcoholics both in passing and under intimate circumstances, is that the only static factor is the element of increase. If a person who has been drinking at least three years (a shorter period cannot give a conclusive result) finds that he is drinking increasingly more alcohol increasingly more often, he is probably on the road to alcoholism. On the other hand, if a person got drunk three times a week ten, five or three years ago, and he still gets drunk three times a week, the chances are he's not, and never will be, an alcoholic.

If you are an alcoholic, you cannot discipline yourself into moderate drinking. This is why we in A.A. avoid the first drink. When we succeed in doing that, we stay dry.

Why did I ever drink? I don't really know. I don't believe any alcoholic knows.

Will I ever take another drink? Again, I don't really know. Only God knows the future. I don't think I will ever drink again, and, at present, I have no desire for a drink.

There is a saying among some Alcoholics Anonymous groups that "A.A. brings about an expulsion of a compulsion by a Higher Power-by Almighty God."

I am sure of only one thing—all that I am, and all that I have achieved, is from God. I had nothing to do with it. God did it all. So, too, my future is entirely in His Hands; mine is only the footwork.

Garrity smiled softly. "Just one little drink."

"I got my orders," the bartender said.

"For old times' sake," Garrity begged. "I'm a good customer here."

"You owe $400 here," the bartender said.

Garrity took his foot off the rail and straightened up with a poised dignity, "I happen to be the attorney for this establishment," he said. "And the trifling sum of $400 would certainly be considered a modest retainer for a man of my legal talents."

The bartender smiled coldly. "Yeah, that reminds me. The boss said he didn't want to have no lush for a lawyer anymore."

"I'm not a lush!" Garrity said angrily.

"Then what the hell are you?" The bartender turned away.

Garrity followed him down the bar. "Please Jack," he whined, "you've got to give me a drink."

"No," the bartender snapped. "No."

Garrity stood there limply, his hands extended palms upward. He was a pathetic-looking figure, and the image of himself in the mirror showed it. Suddenly, with great violence, he hurled his whiskey glass against the mirror, cracking it in a zigzag pattern.

"You'll have to pay for that, Mr. Garrity," the bartender said calmly.

"Sue me!" Garrity roared, and with great haughtiness he pushed out into the street.

The stranger looked up. "What's wrong with him?"

"Just another drunken bum," the bartender said.

That night Garrity paced through the streets restlessly. The bars were all closed, but he still craved a drink. He had no money, so he could not go to an after-hours club. Suddenly, he paused at a street corner and his face lit up in happy thought: perhaps he had left some money back in his hotel room; perhaps he had hidden it for just such an occasion as this; perhaps he had even hidden a bottle. There's no telling, he decided how clever Gregory Garrity was when he put his mind to it. As he hurried toward his hotel room, he began to chant: When Gregory Garrity entered the bar.

But his song stopped as he frantically rummaged his room. He opened drawers, shook out pillows and emptied pockets. But he could not find any cash. He looked on the top shelf of the closet, under the bed and outside the window ledge. But he could not find a bottle.

Garrity slumped down on the edge of his bed, holding his head in his hands. His throat was dry, his body quivering. He needed a drink now, he felt, more desperately than he had ever needed one before in his life. He had to have a drink or he'd die. But how? Where could he get money at this hour of the night? "Of course!" He snapped his fingers. "The office." He reached into his pocket and felt for the key. It was there.

Momentarily, his conscience rebelled. The office wasn't his. His own office, like most of his practice, had long since slipped away. The office belonged to an old friend, who allowed him to use it on the rare occasion when he was meeting prospective clients. But whose office it was, he decided, was not important. The important thing was to get the money for a drink-immediately. He ran from his room, scampered down two flights of stairs, and hailed a taxi in the street. "Hurry!" he told the cab driver, "Hurry!"

It was after four o'clock when he pulled up in front of the downtown office building. He told the cab driver to wait.

The night watchman took him up on the elevator.

"Working overtime?" the watchman asked.

"Yes," Garrity said. He mumbled something about an "important case" and walked away from the elevator, across the marble-topped floor.

The key slid into the office door easily and the lock snapped back. Garrity flipped the lights on. He rifled through the drawers of the secretary's desk until he found what he was looking for—the petty cash box. Thirty-four dollars were in it. He took the money and stuffed it into his pocket. He signed a voucher for it, adding the notation, "entertainment expenses." Then he replaced the box in the desk, locked the door, and walked from the building to the waiting cab.

In the gray half-dawn, he entered an after-hours club and, with a sigh of relief, ordered three whiskey sours. He gulped them down quickly. This is more like it, he thought, settling down to some steady, serious drinking.

By morning, when he finally staggered out of the club, he was loaded. But he still had enough money left to pick up a bottle of brandy in a liquor store, to have around as "a pick me up." Then, when most people were heading toward work, he returned to his hotel room.

Now he tried to sleep. But when he got into bed, sweat began to roll off his body. He kicked off the blanket. Soon his feet became cold, and he began to shiver. Then he thought he heard voices outside the door. He could not distinguish what they were saying, but he knew they were talking about him. He rushed to the door and opened it. There was no one there. In terror, he slammed the door and stood with his back to it, his heart pounding. He was convinced that someone wanted to break into his room and kill him. Frantically he barricaded the door, piling up every piece of furniture in the room before it. Then he downed half a tumbler of brandy to steady himself.

When he returned to bed, he still could not relax. His head ached terribly and he was nauseated. He held out his hand and watched its tremblings. Then the room began to spin. It whirled about him in a dizzy confusion. "Stop! Stop!" he cried out. But the room only spun faster. The furniture seemed to be coming straight at him. He held up his hands as a shield before his face. It was unbearable. Abruptly, the spinning stopped, and he began to sob, his teeth dug into the pillow, his big body shaking like a baby's.

He was full of remorse over his petty cash theft; it went against all his concepts of morality. Never before had he sunk so low. He hated himself with a bitter loathing. He cursed himself vehemently for drinking. He did not really enjoy alcohol, yet he could not stop drinking. If only he could stop. Tonight, I'll go on the wagon, he promised himself. Then he laughed sardonically. How many times had he tried to stop? How many times had he told himself that he had the will to do it all by himself, taking the pledge, only to slip again? His life was just a steady downhill roll. Because of drink, he had lost his family, his home, his career. Above all, he had lost his self-respect. And there seemed to be no way out.

Gregory Garrity was a very sick man. He was one of the estimated 4,000,000 potential sufferers of alcoholism in America. Alcoholism is both a physical and mental disease. The victim suffers from a physical susceptibility to alcohol and, at the same time, he has a compulsion to drink. Whereas, most of us, when it comes to drinking, can take it or leave it, an alcoholic can't. For him, one drink is too many and a thousand aren't enough. He is like a diabetic who must constantly eat sweets.

However, on that day, April 17th, 1952, Gregory Garriety, by the commission of a simple act, found a way out for himself. He picked up the telephone and dialed an old law school buddy who, he knew, had once faced a similar drinking problem. This friend, somehow, had managed to stay on the wagon for over three years.

"Hello, John," Garrity said into the phone, "I want you to tell me something."

"Sure thing," John replied.

"How in the world did you stop drinking?"

"I joined Alcoholics Anonymous."

"Oh, I see," Garrity said slowly. "I'd like to stop drinking. But I don't think I'm really an alcoholic, so I don't see what good that outfit would do for me."

"Well, look in at a meeting anyway," John suggested. "In fact, I'm going to one tonight. Can I drop by and pick you up on the way?"

Garrity looked about his disordered room. "No, don't bother," he said. "Well, let me give you the address and you can come along by yourself if you want to."

Garrity copied down the address and hung up. Hell, he decided, I have nothing to lose. I might as well go to that meeting. He also decided that he might as well have the last drink for the road. He poured a stiff one and gulped it down-before he left his hotel room he had six more.

That evening he showed up at the designated Alcoholics Anonymous meeting place; it was a church basement. He expected to find a bunch of Skid Row derelicts assembled there. Instead, he found a group of sober, clear-eyed citizens. A pert young blonde approached him. "Is this your first meeting? She asked.

Yes, she nodded.

"Then perhaps you'd like to see some of our literature." She handed him several pamphlets.

"Thank you," Garrity said and took a seat in the back of the room.

A vivid sign, in ornate lettering, hung from the speaker's lectern:

"God grant me the Serenity to accept the things I cannot change,

"Courage to change the things I can,

"And the wisdom to know the difference."

Garrity noticed that most of the people present were about his age, in the late 30s. They all seemed to be chain-smokers.

His friend John slid in beside him. "Didn't think you'd make it Greg," he said.

"I'm just curious," Garrity told him.

"Sure," John said. "I understand."

"After all," Garrity said, "I'm not an alcoholic."

"If you say you're not an alcoholic, then A.A. can't do much for you," John explained. "But if you admit that you are one, A.A. can do a great deal for you." He picked up one of the pamphlets that lay in Garrity's lap. "Ask yourself these ten questions. If the answers are yes that's a good indication that you are an alcoholic."

Garrity felt uncomfortable when he heard the word "alcoholic" used in reference to himself. It had a repulsive sound, and he did not like being identified with it. But he read the questions:

- 1) Do you crave a drink at a definite time daily?
- 2) Do you gulp your drinks, and sneak extras?
- 3) Do you drink to relieve feelings of inadequacy?
- 4) Do you drink to escape worry and dispel the blues?
- 5) Do you drink when overtired to brace up?
- 6) Is drinking affecting your peace of mind?
- 7) Is drinking making your home life unhappy?
- 8) Do you prefer to drink alone?
- 9) Do you require a drink the next morning?
- 10) Do you lose time from work due to drinking?

When Garrity tallied up the score, he almost choked. It was a perfect 100 per cent. He felt like leaving the meeting, but at that moment, a tall muscular man, stood up at the lectern and pounded away with a gavel. As chairman of the group, he called the meeting to order.

"Welcome to our weekly open meeting," he began. "I see some newcomers here, as well as many familiar old-timers. Let's all get to know each other because misery loves company. Would you each please shake hands with the person sitting next to you.

"For the benefit of the newcomers, I'll explain that in A.A. we hold two types of meetings-open and closed. The closed meetings are for alcoholics only. There we sit around a table and discuss our own individual alcoholic problems. Those are private. But at an open meeting everyone is welcome, and, of course, your anonymity is protected. It's a funny thing about alcoholics. We never used to mind staggering around town obnoxiously drunk. But when we're cold sober we're a little uneasy about our alcoholism. Because, you see, we're no further away from our next drunk than our next drink.

"I used the expression 'oldtimer' before. But there really isn't such an animal in A.A. All of us are just drunks-that is if we drink."

"Our disease is alcoholism. It's a progressive illness and there's no in between. Unless we curb it, most of us will wind up in a mental home or in the city morgue.

"I myself, like most A.A.ers, just try to get by from one day to the next, 24 hours at a time. Every morning when I get up, I say to myself: 'Tomorrow I may go off on one of the damnedest benders you ever saw, but today, with God's help, I'm going to stay sober.' So far, for eight years, I've avoided that tomorrow.

"Tonight we're going to hear from three speakers, each with a different story to tell. Listen carefully to these stories. Because if you keep coming to A.A. meetings, sooner or later, you'll hear your own. It may not happen tonight. But eventually you'll recognize your own pattern of drinking. And sometimes it's only that-hearing your own story from someone else's lips-that can make you acknowledge to yourself that you are really an alcoholic. That's the first step toward recovery.

"One more word for the benefit of newcomers. Here, at A.A., we don't care what your religion is, or if you don't have one at all. But we do like to end each meeting by reciting the Lord's Prayer. It's up to you if you want to join in or not.

"Now for our first speaker"

Each speaker began with a pat introduction: "My name is _____, and I'm an alcoholic." He then recounted his battles with John Barleycorn. Garrity expected to be bored, but he wasn't. He often found himself laughing up-roariously. Those gin mill graduates really knew how to spin a yarn. Listening to their speeches, Garrity was also touched by their honesty. They spoke openly about what he had long considered to be deep dark drinking secrets. They spoke completely without shame, yet with a sure-footed understanding. And they all seemed to be happy individuals. A sense of challenge began to well up within Garrity. If they can stop drinking, he thought, then I can too. I'm no less a man than they are.

After the meeting, when coffee and cake were being served, Garrity told

John: "I'd like to give this A.A. stuff a try."

"It won't be easy," John warned.

"Drinking isn't easy either," Garrity said.

"Then I'll be your sponsor' if you'd like," John volunteered. "I'll explain the A.A. program to you. I'll try and help you get over the rough spots; any time that craving for a drink becomes too much, call me, night or day, and we'll talk it over. Don't forget, I'm a drunk myself and I understand."

"Oh, I don't want to put you out any," Garrity said.

"You won't." John grinned. "You'll just be helping me keep sober too. That's the way A.A. works."

As he walked home from the A.A. meeting, Garrity was convinced that he had an earnest desire to stop drinking. But almost automatically, he found his way into a saloon. Before he knew it he had ordered a whiskey and was raising it to his lips. One drink won't kill me, he thought. But then he reconsidered: If I'm going to give this A.A. stuff a try, I might as well go about it whole hog. He placed the whiskey down on the bar and walked out. He was mighty pleased with himself.

However, the feeling of self-satisfaction soon wore off. Later that night, as he tried to sleep, the old urge for a drink became overpowering. He reached for the brandy bottle. Then he recalled John's suggestion. And instead of taking a drink dialed his number.

"Hold the fort," John begged him. "I'll be right over."

Garrity was miserable as he writhed on his bed. The sweat rolled off him and he had the shakes.

Within a half-hour John, and a fellow A.Aer, whom Garrity recognized as one of the speakers he had seen at the meeting, were at his bedside.

"Here, have some coffee," John said, handing him a container. "By the way, Greg. This is Jim Carroll."

"I don't envy you any," Jim sympathized. "these first few days are rough. But I'll tell you something, Greg. You have more sense than I had. I was too ashamed to even call my sponsor. So I went out on a four-day bender, and it took me two months before I had the nerve to show up at an A.A. meeting again."

The two men stayed with Garrity for over an hour, until the crisis passed. Then Garrity went to sleep, for the first time in years, without the benefit of a night-cap.

During the next few months Garrity attended numerous A.A. meetings. There, he found enjoyable companionship and comradeship. Sometimes his old gin mill cronies rebuked him for not drinking, but Garrity didn't care. Staying sober, he discovered, made his life a happier one. It wasn't always easy though. The craving for a drink still remained. But his sponsor, John, was always at hand to help him.

Then Garrity became cocky. He hadn't touched a drink for over six months, and his law practice had begun to boom. One day as he was leaving court, after winning a $15,000 judgment, his client insisted on a little celebration.

"All right," Garrity broke down. "Just one."

He forgot that as an alcoholic, he was powerless to limit his intake of alcohol. The one drink became several drinks. And before he knew it he was off on a bender.

He woke up two days later, twisting and squirming in a bed. He had no idea where he was or how he got there. He sniffed the air and smelled paraldehyde. Then he realized that he was in the alcoholic ward of a hospital. He called over an orderly and gave him John's phone number.

When John arrived Garrity apologized for his pitiful condition. "I'm sorry I let you down."

"You didn't let me down," John said. "You let yourself down. But don't take it too hard. Many of us have a slip or two and backslide. We try and stand on our own two feet and fall flat on our face instead. It's not easy to admit to yourself that you're simply helpless when it comes to alcohol. But it's the truth. I'm that way. You're that way. And it's nothing to be ashamed of."

Several days later, Garrity left the hospital. He hasn't touched a drop of alcohol since. "In that hospital," he recalls, "I finally realized deep inside of me, that I was an alcoholic-but there was nothing morally wrong about being one either. I faced the facts about myself squarely. I couldn't stop drinking by myself. But through A.A. I could. And, with God's help, I would.

Garrity is typical of the 200,000 alcoholics who find a mutual strength in their common weakness. Fifty per cent of the men and women who join A.A. achieve sobriety at once. Another 25 per cent become sober after some slips similar to Garrity's. The remaining 25 per cent show, at least, some form of improvement. These statistics are not rigged. For no one is denied membership simply because he or she is a "hopeless case."

In the strange confraternity of Alcoholics Anonymous are state supreme court justices, well know major league ball players, celebrated night club comedians and distinguished college professors. There is even one group composed entirely of clergymen. They all try to help themselves by helping each other.

It was this principle that resulted in the founding of A.A. back in 1934, in Akron, Ohio. Bill W., an engineer, and Dr. Bob S., a surgeon, were in the last stages of alcoholic disintegration when they first met. Happily, they discovered that, as two long-suffering and desperate drunks, they understood each other implicitly-both knew every trick and alibi in the alcoholic's book-and were able to help each other get "on the wagon."

By the end of that year, they had recruited a third convert. The following year the membership increased to 15. And by 1938, there were 60 members, all anonymous alcoholics, living in Akron, Cleveland and New York.

Then the spotlight of national publicity fell upon the idea and it spread like wild fire. Today, A.A. has 6,300 groups in 60 countries throughout the world. Two hundred groups meet in hospitals, 300 within prisons, and over 200 different groups meet in large cities such as New York and Chicago.

The organization is completely self-sufficient. Every penny of its finances comes from alcoholics themselves. (Outside individual contributions as high as $10,000 have been declined.)

Far from a quack outfit-A.A. does not concern itself with prohibition or the outlawing of drink-A.A. works hand in hand with both church and psychiatric groups in relieving the plight of alcoholics. In 1949, Bill W., it's co-founder, addressed the American Psychiatric Association. "There seems safety in numbers," he said in describing A.A. "Enough sandbags muffle any dynamite. We think we are a pretty secure, happy family."

A look in at any A.A. meeting is proof of this point. In fact, at one recent meeting, an athletic man with a winning smile was introduced as a highly successful trial advocate "in the very thirsty business" of law. "My name is Gregory Garrity," the speaker began in the traditional A.A. manner, "and I'm an alcoholic.

"Five years ago I became sick and tired of being sick and tired. It began one night when I was standing in a gin mill feeling sorry for myself. And there was this little refrain I used to sing:

When Gregory Garrity joined the bar

At that point a newcomer, who had slunk into the back of the room, looked up and craned his neck forward.

BY GRETTA PALMER

Alcoholism has been called out No.4 public health problem by a medical director of the U.S. Public Health Service-and the postwar years, in which drinking always increases, have scarcely begun. In the U.S. there are 750,000 known alcoholics, or one and one half times the number of victims of tuberculosis. In addition to these, there are 3,000,000 "excessive drinkers," many of them approaching the stage of true alcoholism, in which they will require expert help.

Yet alcoholism-which touches almost every family in the country-is not recognized as a disease at all by millions of Americans! Even many wives of alcoholics confuse the malady with "lack of will power" of "failure to face facts" when they discuss their husbands' problem. The medical world itself is remiss in dealing with the disease: only 110 institutions listed by the American Medical Association accept alcoholic patients, and most of these are content to restore the patient to sobriety and "dry him out," with no fundamental attack on alcoholism itself. The public is indifferent; there are no widespread, publicly supported drives to raise funds for an attack on this disease. In our large cities there is almost never a clinic to which the alcoholic can go for such impersonal, scientific help as would be extended if he were suffering from polio or cancer.

Yet the inebriate is as little capable of recovery, without help, as the victim of any other disease. With help, the alcoholic who wishes to get well can be restored to normal living in about six cases out of ten.

Why are we so lax in dealing with the alcoholic?

There are several reasons, according to doctors, psychiatrists and recovered alcoholics who are trying to bring about a change. One reason why the alcoholic is neglected is that he was, until very recently, considered incurable; doctors rejected such patients because they did not know how to help them. Of the four methods of therapy now in wide use, three have been developed in the past fifteen or twenty years. Before them, recoveries were rare and not thoroughly understood even by the practitioners who brought them about.

The fact that the alcoholic can be saved in six cases out of ten is news, and important news, to millions of Americans. But in order to understand the hopeful, recent advances in the field they must first digest the fact, familiar to several generations of physicians, that the alcoholic is a sick man or woman. Knowing this, they can attack the problem realistically.

He is sick. But with a malady whose seat is even now unknown to science. Alcoholism is a complex disease, which may have both physical and psychological aspects. The methods of treatment which are successful are all timed at changing the patient's way of looking at life and liquor; they are, primarily, psychological forms of treatment. But no matter how successful the treatments may be, the recovered alcoholic can never again, with safety, take a single drink. (alcoholics have tried, after five years or fifteen years of strict sobriety, and have found themselves as badly off as ever in a few month's time.) Some students of alcoholism therefore believe that there is a bodily idiosyncrasy present among all alcoholics; what it is they still do not know.

There are about 50,000,000 Americans who "take a drink." Of every 1000 of these, 45 are "excessive drinkers," whose health suffers from their habits; 30 of them seem still able to stop drinking. The true alcoholic is not one of these; he is one of the 15 drinkers out of every 1000 to whom alcohol has indeed become a drug, a psychological necessity so precious that he will cling to it in spite of every appeal to reason and self-interest and his "better self." He has an uncontrollable urge to drink, never experienced at any time by nine out of 10 of our 50,000,000 drinkers.

Over twenty million of the Americans who drink are women: a recent Gallop pole showed that 59 per cent of all our women take a drink at least occasionally, although the percentage is much lower among women older than fifty years. Women's increased drinking may explain why our national consumption of liquor, which was going down before the war, has now increased, so that the 1943 consumption of alcohol in this country was 30 per cent higher than it was in 1940. Americans now drink 1.17 gallons of alcohol a year, on the average, compared with the 4.6 of France, the .93 of Great Britain, Norway's .55 and Holland's .4. Within our own country, the state that consumes the smallest amount is North Carolina (.32 gallon a year per capita); the hardest drinking areas are the District of Columbia (4.09), followed by Nevada and Connecticut. Three of our states-Kansas, Oklahoma and Mississippi are dry by state law, and one third of the whole country is dry by local option.

Much of the dry propaganda has centered around the problems raised by the alcoholic; prohibitionists would attempt to prevent alcoholism by making liquor impossible to obtain except by breaking a law. The political wets, on the other hand, say that such a law is unfair to the 90 per cent of all drinkers who are in no danger of becoming alcoholics and that it is, in any case, an experiment that has already failed. Sixty-six million American voters are neither wet nor dry; they are the "on-the-fence" spectators, who have an open mind on the problem and who wish to help the alcoholic by whatever method the experts find to be the best.

Women are playing a large part in organizing the new attack on alcoholism as a health problem-as women volunteers have been the spearhead of drives on cancer, tuberculosis and infantile paralysis. The new National Committee for education on Alcoholism has a woman organizer, Marty Mann. She believes women have a special interest in alcoholism; wives and mothers of alcoholics suffer from the social stigma which now attaches to the disease and which would be avoided if it were as matter-of-factly viewed as deafness or rheumatism in the family. And besides that, a large and growing proportion of alcoholics today are women. Before the war the Yale School of Alcohol Studies estimated that one of every six alcoholics was a woman; many students of the subject now believe the figure has changed to one out of four. In Chicago's Municipal Court arrests for drunkenness used to be six men to one woman; the ratio is now one woman out of three. FBI reports on arrests for drunken driving show that women are offenders five times as often today as in 1932. So woman's interest in alcoholism is no longer limited to the puzzled and unhappy curiosity of the alcoholic's family; women nowadays may share the life-and-death interest in alcoholism of the victim himself.

That victim of alcoholism; who is he? How did he get that way? Why is he incapable of drinking like a gentleman? Why do his good resolutions, his promises of moderation inevitably fail? Why is he-reasonable enough in other matters-incapable of seeing the clear fact that his drinking brings him much more misery than happiness, and of sensibly stopping it?

The answer to some of these questions is still a mystery, locked in the dark recesses of the alcoholic's hidden personality. But some facts are known.

The alcoholic does not have a basic personality which varies significantly from that of the average man. Detailed studies of normal drinkers, alcoholics and recovered alcoholics were recently carried out by the Research Council on Problems of Alcohol, of New York. No important differences in fundamental attitudes were found.

But after some years of drinking the alcoholic is set apart from other men; he is especially apt to avoid the responsibilities of married life.

A study made by Dr. Selden Bacon, of Yale, on arrested inebriates showed that less than half of them had ever married-although four fifths of the men of their age and geographical groups were married. Only 23 per cent of the alcoholics were living with wives, compared with 73 per cent of the population as a whole. Of those who had married, 25 per cent were separated and 16 per cent were divorced. Other differences appeared which must make living with the inebriate a trial for any wife: alcoholics hold their jobs for shorter periods and are more poorly paid than other men of similar background; they amuse themselves either alone or with casual acquaintances, instead of belonging to any group; they do their drinking alone or with members of the same sex, instead of indulging in normal, social drinking.

Such reports give valuable clues to those who would help the alcoholic. But our best guidance comes from the life stories of the alcoholics themselves.

Take the case of Bill, representative of the very large group on "introverted" drunks. Bill was a shy and studious boy, sheltered by a devoted mother. At high-school dances he was often too bashful to ask the prettiest girls to dance; in "bull sessions" he rarely had the confidence to speak out and express his views. Between him and the others in his group their loomed an invisible wall of self-consciousness.

Then Bill discovered beer; he found that if he took three or four glasses of it, he was able to join in the fun. His shyness disappeared. His sense of well-being increased. He began to see himself as a very witty, admirable fellow. The process has been described by Prof. William McDougall:

"Of all the intellectual functions, that of self-criticism is the highest and latest developed, for in it are combined the functions of critical judgment and of self-consciousness. It is the blunting of this critical side of self-awareness by alcohol and the consequent setting free of the emotions and their instinctive impulses from its habitual control, that give to the convivial drinker the aspect and the reality of a general excitement.

Many shy men have discovered, in alcohol, the same welcome release that Bill found, and have still been able to keep its attraction under control. Bill, however, could not do this. Perhaps his longing to be accepted as one of the group was deeper than that of other boys; his sense of his own gawkishness may have been abnormally acute. Perhaps for most of his years on earth Bill had been ill-at-ease, so that his only memories of complete well-being were associated with pre-kindergarten days. Such a boy - if his physical constitution allows him to drink a great deal without becoming sick at his stomach-may use alcohol to put to sleep all his mature, self-critical faculties. He may return, through the various stages of drunkenness, to the state of the young child-the last state in which he found happiness."

So it was with Bill: he drank enough, every time, to make him as helpless as a child. Alcohol, even to a normal drinker, offers a release from grown-up responsibilities. The authors of Alcohol: One Man's Meat-Dr. Edward A. Strecker and Francis T. Chambers, Jr.-say "To view the panorama of the various states of intoxication is to witness a progressive psychological descent or repression. Most individuals seem satisfied to regress to some phase of the teen age, which was probably an enjoyable and carefree time, deeply imprinted on the unconscious. Others seem satisfied with a very slight descent, and still others are never satisfied until they have reached an infantile level in intoxication." Of these is Bill.

Bill's case was typical enough of the average alcoholic; looking back to his college years, long afterward, he decided that there had never been a time when he drank "normally." Like many alcoholics—perhaps most—he used his very first drinking bout as an escape, rather than a means of sharpening experience. When Bill had once discovered that drink was a drug, which would make him forget his shyness, it was not long before he used it to help him escape other worries too. Within a few years he had worked his way into the typically alcoholic pattern of behavior: whenever life became painful, he took enough drinks to be carried back to the state of mind and body appropriate to a carefree four-year-old child. He was now a serious "problem drinker."

Bill passed through the usual steps: expulsion from college with the promise that he could return if he would "brace up"; a job, precariously held for a few years; marriage to a charming girl who believed that he would stop drinking as soon as he had "responsibilities to straighten him up." There were periods when her beliefs seemed justified; Bill obtained jobs and did well, for a time. But sooner or later there came a day when some discouragement made him long for the carefree days when he was a little boy. A few steps to the nearest saloon, a dozen "quick snorts" and Bill was off on another bender.

Now, the vicious and difficult thing about Bill's drinking was this: he did not know that he had a disease. Neither did his wife or his employers or his friends. They thought that will power was what he needed; they imagined that "a good talking to" would help. When Bill promised, in all sincerity, that he would never get drunk again, they believed it. Why not? He believed it himself. Bill was as puzzled as anyone else over why he got drunk; he thought, every hang-over morning, that from now on he would be content to take one or two drinks, as other men did. Even a visit to a sanitarium failed to prove to Bill that he was incapable of moderate drinking, that he was a sick man.

(Eventually Bill found out and admitted to himself that liquor had him bested; this was the beginning of his recovery, but that's another story.)

Bill had started drinking to get rid of his self-consciousness. But Mary, who never had a self-conscious minute in her beau-filled days, also arrived in an alcoholic ward in a big city hospital. Mary belonged to the flapper age. She was a "prom-trotter," in the company of young men who carried hip flasks inside their coonskin coats and who believe that a speak-easy card was a proof of great sophistication. Mary had a lovely time her debutante year: she was the girl with the "hollow leg," the good scout who was always able to drive a car home from a party when the owner was tight. Mary may have been a normal drinker at this period; no one can be quite sure of whether alcoholism, in its very early stages, has subtle symptoms which some future scientists will be able to detect. But it isn't essential for us to know: for after eight years of apparently normal hard drinking Mary showed symptoms of alcoholism which nobody could doubt.

She became the girl who always managed to have lunch with someone who liked a cocktail first. She was the woman who would say, "why don't we have a second? That one was so small?" She was the girl who found that straight whisky "cured" insomnia and headaches and "braced her up" for any disagreeable chore—from arguing with the butcher over his bill to making a boring visit to her in-laws. For quite a while, Mary's daytime drinking went undetected by her family (she was a great girl for cloves and mouthwash). But every month she increased the size of the nips a little more, until evening found her half intoxicated on several days a week.

Like many alcoholics, Mary scorned the term. "I can stop any time I want," she insisted. And, "Drinking is a part of normal gracious living to my generation. We may overdo it once in a while, but what of it? An occasional bender lets off steam.

This stage of bravura didn't last long; after Mary had been arrested twice for driving while intoxicated, and had waked up with her third black eye, she began to wonder whether she shouldn't "cut down." But it was only after several more years of painful experimentation that she became convinced, in all humility, that liquor was something she could never handle again. Her recovery dated from that admission to herself.

Jake was a self-made man, who had come up the hard way from a childhood in the slums. Self-educated, he had attained success as a trial lawyer with no backing, no encouragement but his own determination to get to the top. His will power was his strongest quality; his ability to win out over every discouragement had been proved through the years. Jake, after several of his greatest triumphs, went on long, expensive benders that ended up in a bleak hotel room filled with empty bottles, in a town he couldn't name. Jake never drank when there were hard problems to be faced: it was only success that sent him off on these strange, frantic bouts.

So Jake stopped drinking; just like that. He did not say to himself. "I am incapable of handling liquor." He said, "I'll stop drinking until I make a million dollars." After ten years, the million dollars was safe in a brokerage account, and Jake reached for the bottle. Inside of a month he was drunk; inside of a year he had lost all his money and was a patient in a hospital alcoholic ward.

Jake-like Bill, like Mary, like the public at large—did not know that alcoholism is a disease and that he had it during all his "dry" years. The man who grits his teeth and fights the desire for drink, as Jake did, has not recovered from the craving (which is the malady). He still looks on liquor, and the escape it offers as a reward which he can someday win. To Jake, success brought with it the fear of losing it of sliding back into the poverty and misery of his-childhood; liquor helped him to run away from this fear-to run all the way back to the state of helpless infancy, before his baby mind had discovered that such things as failure and success existed. Jake drank to escape from ambition. Until he had learned to view alcohol as a drug (so far as he was concerned) and until he had learned to live without the prospect of ever drugging himself, there was no hope of recovery for him.

Now, doctors and psychiatrists knew many things about the life stories of such alcoholics twenty years ago. But their knowledge did not help them to effect many cures. Psychiatrists helped some alcoholic patients to recover then, as they do today; but psychiatry nowadays has the benefit of the past fifteen years of intensive study of alcoholism on the part of scientists. It has also learned much from Alcoholics Anonymous, the group of men and women who, disgusted with the failure of the known medical and religious approaches, made a daring experiment of pulling themselves up by their own boot-straps- and were successful. It is because of the collaboration of realistic, laboratory-minded scientists with the patients themselves that alcoholism is today a disease from which almost any alcoholic who wants re-covery can attain it.

It was in the early '30's that Dr. Howard Haggard, head of the Laboratory of Applied Physiology, began an intensified program of research on alcoholism at Yale University. His experiments verified the fact that this disease has no apparent physical cause, and that almost no lasting effect of alcoholism can be blamed on drinking alone. Vitamin deficiency occurs among 50 per cent of chronic alcoholics, but only because liquor has crowded out of their diet other food essential to health; 8 per cent of all alcoholics have cirrhosis of the liver, compared with less than 1 per cent of the population at large-but cirrhosis of the liver does appear in teetotalers. Delirium tremens afflicts about 4 per cent of heavy drinkers, but it is only a temporary effect.

Alcohol, of course, has its temporary effects on the nervous system, as its percent: age mounts in the blood stream. Even such small amounts of alcohol as are contained in two cocktails affect the drinker's ability to distinguish pitch and color, to memorize poetry to react to light signals. But these effects are shared by the alcoholic and the normal drinker as well. Physiology alone can give no answer to the question: Why do 15 drinkers out of 1000 become the victims of alcoholism?

Doctor Haggard began casting around among the sister sciences, to see what enlightenment their studies might give. He and his colleagues founded a scholarly publication- the Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol-and assembled on the Yale campus a number of scientists to work in various fields. Here, in the Yale Section on Alcohol Studies, neurologists, psychiatrists, statisticians, sociologists, anthropologists, lawyers under Dr. E. M. Jellinek tried to crack the age-old questions: What makes an alcoholic? How can he be helped?

By the summer of 1943 the scientists thought they knew enough about the second problem to share their findings with the public. They had studied many alcoholics who had learned how not to drink; they believed that knowledge of this sort should be shared with leaders of the community, who might use the information to attack the social evil that alcoholism has always been. For from 25 to 28 per cent of all crime is associated with alcohol; the costs to society of merely confining and punishing the alcoholic run to a billion dollars a year (and none of that money is used to treat the alcoholic). Our prisons and hospitals and mental asylums would be relieved of a heavy load if alcoholism could be wiped out, as smallpox has been.

To help bring this about, the Summer School of Alcohol Studies was held at Yale in 1943 and every summer since. Men and women representing twenty-five professions have attended in a single season; there were a college dean and a "reformed drunk," a judge and several ministers, a distiller and an officer of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. The course of lectures covers the significant findings of the scientists at the laboratory; they also bring in data from the two Yale Plan Clinics set up to help alcoholics who are sent in by the courts or who come, voluntarily, to seek treatment there.

What are the facts spread before the students at a summer session by this group—which has learned more about alcoholism than any other in the history of the world?

1. Why one man becomes an alcoholic and another doesn't is still a mystery. We know that alcoholism is not hereditary: only 35 per cent of alcoholics come from alcoholic homes, and the children of excessive drinkers, brought up in another environment, have no significant drinking difficulties. Nor can environment be blamed: the men who started to drink with the alcoholic are usually moderate drinkers twenty years later. A longing to escape from reality, and a desire to return to the security of an earlier period of life, is common to alcoholics; but the same desire is shared by thousands of other men and women. Some of these misfits become psychoneurotics or invalids, but never feel attracted to drink; others, for an unknown reason, turn to alcohol.

2. Against these negative results of fifteen years of study, the Yale group can say that there are now four recognized methods of treatment available to the alcoholic who wishes to get well and that, if he is sincere, he has a slightly better than 60 per cent chance of recovery. His alcoholism will not, however, be cured—it can only be arrested. Nothing now known will make it possible for the alcoholic to drink moderately, on any terms, in any foreseeable future. He must be willing to abandon all forms of liquor, as long as he lives.

3. But the alcoholic can be taught to live happily without drinking; recovered alcoholics rarely feel deprived or resentful of their inability to take a drink. They look upon their disability much as a diabetic resigns himself to doing without sugar.

4. The greatest problem facing those interested in alcoholism now is to reach the alcoholic and his family with the news that help is available - provided that they will look upon alcoholism as a disease. If the public at large once recognized this fact, alcoholism could be almost wiped out in a few years, and at very small expense. The Yale Plan Clinics, for instance, have reclaimed a high percentage of their patients, at a cost of only $100 per recovery. All the known alcoholics in the country could be given such help for $75,000,000, or one thirteenth of what we now pay merely to lock up such patients, and punish them, every year.

Now, how did all this progress come about? Was it through the research scientists, the diligent doctors that the problem of helping the alcoholic was primarily solved? No, it was not. The scientists have done much toward re-educating the alcoholic into the ways of happiness and health; but of the four forms of treatment, which have proved successful only one-psychiatry-can help a patient without the help of other alcoholics.

1. Psychiatrists pointed the way- their painstaking, heartbreaking efforts to reclaim alcoholics broke the trail. They discovered the compulsive element in alcoholism and taught us to expect that the man who says, "I only want three drinks," at noon may be reaching for his twentieth at cocktail time. Psychiatrists uncovered the reluctance to grow up which lurks in the breast of every alcoholic. But psychiatry, working alone, had only a very limited success-2 per cent, according to some estimates.

(Psychoanalysis, one form of psychiatric cure, has been carried out on very few alcoholics. The Institute of Psychoanalysis in Chicago, of 1593 patients interviewed, had only 36 classified as alcoholics or drug addicts; only 4 of these were analyzed).

Psychiatrists who have the highest percentage of success with alcoholics today draw heavily on the experience of the three other forms of treatment. By combining their own valuable, specialized approach with one of the other therapies, they have had great success in recent years. In co-operating with the three other forms of treatment, they are accepting the help of recovered alcoholics themselves, who have given tremendous help to the scientists studying the disease in recent years. It was only when the desperate inebriates started pulling themselves up by their bootstraps that things began to hum.

Take a look at the alcoholic, this medical pioneer: he is no "man in white," no winner of Nobel prizes. He is just the village drunk; the stumblebum on the Bowery; the man who broke his mother's heart; the figure of comedy; the improvident father; the helpless recipient of more useless good advice than any other man in history. Take a look at him. It was he who helped the Drys to clinch their argument and legislate 50,000,000 indignant normal drinkers into national Prohibition. It was he whom many sanitariums and private hospitals will still not receive for treatment. This is the alcoholic, half crazed with the shakes, eaten with remorse, up to his ears in debts and disgraceful episodes, the prey of quacks who give him "cures" for just the amount of his family's bank account, and leave him worse than ever—the man weeping wives and ministers and judges brand as "worthless." This was the man who decided something had to be done about himself—and did it.

2. The most popular of the four therapies for alcoholism did not exist when Doctor Haggard began his experiments. It was in 1935 that the founding fathers of Alcoholics Anonymous got together and began to cure themselves. They were extreme cases; even today 80% of A.A.'s have been locked up for drunkenness. These men were desperate in their weariness of being told the wrong things by outsiders who didn't understand. In despair, and fumblingly, they worked out their own form of self-help—a kind of composite of what religion and science could give the drunk that would keep him from wanting to drink. This treatment—the patient's own personal creation—is Alcoholics Anonymous. And it works.

A.A. has spread, with the speed of a chain letter, among the "hopeless" alcoholics of the country. In 1935 there were three members; in 1959, when the book, Alcoholics Anonymous, was published, there were 100, most of them in Akron and New York. Today there are 752 A.A. branches, 24,000 members. Some of the chapters have clubrooms, open most days and evenings, where the members can play games, drink soft drinks and exchange experiences—they provide the sociability of the barroom to men still a little unsteady about trusting themselves in the old surroundings. Best of all, they have meetings where recovered alcoholics tell their stories to encourage new members.

Each man or woman begins the talk with the humbling words, "I'm an alcoholic." He tells the funny things he did when he was drunk, as well as the dangerous and cruel things—for he knows that he was the victim of a sickness, and he feels no shame over its manifestations. He tells of the difficulties in making the first, painful surrender of self to some "greater force," and the whole reorientation of values that that entailed—for there is a strong reliance on God in the A.A. program. If the speaker had an early relapse—as some A.A. do—he admits that this came from careless or self-centered thinking. A.A.'s tell the audience that the place to lick the temptation to drink is in the mind, as soon as the self-excusing mechanism begins to work. It is at this moment that the A.A. pleads "Give me the name of an alcoholic who needs help." For it is by showing the way out to other men, in more desperate need than himself, that an A.A. keeps himself "dry."

There is always an alcoholic, somewhere, to be helped; with 750,000 in the country, the supply is never low. A.A.'s in strange cities, when they feel themselves slipping, call hospitals and ask, "Have you a drunk I can come up and talk to?" Others appeal to ministers whose names they pluck from the telephone directory. The first chapter, that of Akron, Ohio, sprang from just such a need on the part of the original A.A., who had to find another alcoholic whom he could help, to save himself from drinking.

The A.A. way is brought to the alcoholic by a former sufferer, and at the right moment-when he is still filled with self-reproach and misery and has a hang-over to humble him. In this period of self-abasement, the drunk is willing enough to take the first step: to admit-as a mere possibility, mind you-that there may be some force in the universe bigger than himself. That admission-combined with a sincere desire to stop drinking-is enough for the A.A. to build on.

"Atheists and agnostics, who stumble over using the word `God', are still able to admit that the universe contains laws and forces broader than themselves," say the A.A.'s One half of their members, indeed, used to scoff at all religion.

Doctors now take the A.A. technique seriously. Philadelphia General Hospital, among others, allows A.A.'s the privileges of staff members, so that they may work with fellow alcoholics outside of visiting hours. Some psychiatrists urge their patients to combine A.A. membership with psychiatric treatment; Dr. H.M. Tiebout, of Blythewood Sanitarium in Connecticut, was one of the first of these.

Of the alcoholics who are contacted by Alcoholics Anonymous, about one half immediately catch on and remain dry. Another 25 per cent are flat failures-they either do not want to stop drinking or are so confused and psychopathic that they cannot be reached. The last 25 per cent go off, after a meeting or two, and try drinking; but they usually return. One of the early founders had no apparent converts at all among the first 75 men with whom he worked; ten years later he found that three had died but that 67 of the rest were members of different A.A. groups throughout the country. When he first talked to them, they were not yet ready to stop. They only "wanted to want to quit," in A.A. parlance.

But there are some men and women who entirely reject the religious approach. To them, two other routes are open.

3. There is the very successful record of the "lay therapists"; these are men who used to be alcoholics themselves, but who have reconditioned their minds, by psychological methods, so that the desire for the first drink can be dealt with before it becomes a real temptation. There are only a few lay therapists in the country. Most of them are graduates of Richard R. Peabody, of Boston, who wrote The Common Sense of Drinking and who taught other men the technique by which he had cured himself of alcoholism. The lay therapists work closely with hospitals and doctors, who help them screen their patients and choose only those for whom this method seems a promising one. Office consultations, once or twice a week for a year, are supplemented by daily psychological exercises. Francis T. Chambers, Jr., of Philadelphia, Raymond McCarthy, of the Yale Plan Clinic at New Haven; and Donaldson Clark, of New York City, are well-known therapists.

The lay therapist accepts only the alcoholic who is honestly willing to recover. One of them tests the sincerity of the patient by asking him, "Do you recognize your drinking as the central problem of your life and the one that must be solved first?" A surprising number of alcoholics who have been fired, divorced and jailed for excessive drinking refuse to admit that they are alcoholics: they drank, they will tell the doctor, only because the conditions of their lives were insupportable. If they were given "the breaks" they could still drink moderately. Alcoholics in this frame of mind are not ready to be helped by the lay therapist. Such patients, when they hint that they can now drink moderately, are usually advised to, by all means, try. A few months or years later the majority of them return, finally convinced that "moderation" is only a mirage.

The patient who once admits that alcoholism is his largest problem, and that he will work toward recovery, has already made a big step forward: for the first time in his life, he has accepted the responsibility for his misfortunes and can set about correcting them. This is a first step out of the old, alcoholic way of retreating from painful experiences. But it is only the first step.

No alcoholic, even after he has begun a course of treatment, is really convinced that he will ever reach a stage of not wanting to drink: only months of mental discipline and suggestion can bring about such a radical change. "perhaps you can make me grit my teeth and determine never to take a drink," the patient will say, "But I'll always want one." He is wrong: when he has recovered, his antipathy to alcohol is so great that, in the words of one recovered alcoholic, "If doctors tomorrow discovered a pill that would enable me to drink moderately, I'd say, 'That's fine-give it to someone else. I don't want to drink.'" Another states the case this way: "NO alcoholic is safe until he can honestly say that if he had only twelve hours to live, with nobody watching him and the certainty that nobody could learn about it later, he still would pass his last day on earth without a drink."

How do lay therapists bring this transformation about? Under their guidance the patient orders every hour of the day, according to a schedule he himself has worked out in advance-and he never departs from this, except in a case of real necessity. In this way he learns to direct his own destiny. He spends a part of every day tracking down his hidden mental reservations about future drinking, or trying to figure out the reason for his benders in the past. This teaches him to look at alcoholism realistically, without shame or fear.

Most important of all: he trains his mind to associate the first thought of a drink with the painful episodes to which it would inevitably lead him. He learns, like the A.A., to deal with the temptation to take a drink when it is first forming in the mind, and to destroy it there. During a period of at least a year the patient has several sessions a week with the therapist, who helps him over the rough spots and compares experiences from his own past.

Dr. Foster Kennedy, head neurologist of Bellevue Hospital, New York, has said, "I have no doubt that a man who has cured himself of the lust for alcohol has a far greater power of curing alcoholism than a doctor who has never been afflicted with the same curse." Dwight Anderson, director of public relations of the Medical Society of New York, says, "The recovered alcoholic will never give up hope. He cannot forget the numberless times that his friends and relatives gave up all hope for him, to say nothing of the occasions when he had no hope for himself. But when the time was right and he himself was ready, he became accessible."

4) Alcoholics themselves are very skeptical of

they remember how often they said so themselves, with no real intention of taking the step. That is one reason why recovered alcoholics are used as interviewers who greet all patients arriving at the hospitals which give the "aversion treatment"-the fourth method which claims recoveries today.

Arriving patients are warned, by recovered alcoholics on the staff, that this treatment is painful, disagreeable and no good to them unless they are desperate enough to welcome a future in which the mere sight or smell of any drink will sicken them. If they face this prospect without flinching, they are considered for one of the hospitals specializing in this technique; only about one man out of eight who applies is admitted.

This patient is taken, several times a day into the hospital barroom, where various kinds of drinks are mixed in a setting that has the familiar associations of his pet saloon. A spotlight plays upon the bar; ice clinks pleasantly as the attendant, in a white coat, mixes his favorite "poison." It is poison, too; for the patient has been given injections of drugs which make him deathly ill at the exact moment when he swallows the drink. Combined with psychotherapy, and repeated several times in the first year, this method has had success with 65 per cent of cases accepted. It is used at the two Shadel Sanitariums in Seattle and Portland, and at the University of Wisconsin Medical School.

Three of these approaches are new-three of them lean heavily on the sympathetic skill of the recovered alcoholic for their success. All of them claim a record which is twenty to thirty times as high as that claimed by any method twenty years ago. For in that brief period, alcoholism has become recognized as a disease from which even the most despaired-of cases can usually recover.

But the alcoholics and the doctors cannot do the whole job of helping our 750,000 cases alone; they need the force of public opinion behind them. They need, in every city, a demand for the kinds of clinics which, at Yale, have blazed the trail. They need public recognition of the fact that alcoholism is not a reflection on the patient's character, but is a misfortune for which society is partially to blame. When these facts are widely known, many alcoholics—who have no idea they can be helped—will be restored to lives of health and usefulness. Many families, whose present fumbling efforts are actually driving their sons to drink, will change their ways.

Ignorance among members of the alcoholic's family is very widespread, indeed. Alcoholics anonymous found that they were spending most of their time educating the relatives of prospects, instead of concentrating on the problems of the alcoholic himself. Two years ago a group of them devised a plan for public education on the subject. Marty Mann, an A.A. secured the backing of the Yale University group and launched the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism to teach the known facts to the public. The essential teaching of the committee is three simple facts, as all their literature states: "Alcoholism is a disease and the alcoholic is a sick person. The alcoholic can be helped and is worth helping. Alcoholism is a public-health problem and therefore a public responsibility."

Since the committee was formed, information centers have been established in four cities and permanent committees formed in nine. Clinics will eventually be set up, it is hoped, in every large town in the country; when that is done, the alcoholic will at last have a place where he can go to find his problem discussed without moral indignation, sentimentality or reproach.

Of the need for such a viewpoint, Dr. Selden Bacon recently wrote, "Apathy, secret shame or attacks on scapegoats can be the response of the public to a problem. During the past 200 years the public in this country has reacted in these unrealistic ways when faced with the problems of mental ills, political corruption, venereal diseases. People have reacted the same ways to alcoholism. Stimulation of the public is essential to bring about a new adjustment."

What good can education do? Well, if the public understands that alcoholism is a disease, it will no longer urge the alcoholic to "Drink like a gentleman"; or "Take two cocktails and stop, as I do"; or "Learn your capacity": it will be common knowledge that alcoholics cannot do these things and that moderation is impossible for them. When the public has learned more of this disease, hostesses will not urge "Just a little one" on guests who have refused a drink—they will understand that some people cannot drink at all.

Families would give the alcoholic a better chance to recover early if they realized that alcohol, to the patient, is the only thing which makes his muddled, miserable life at all supportable. The threat that it may be withdrawn appalls him and he will face the horrors of a "dry" future only if he has convinced himself that this present life is even more unendurable. Families who protect the alcoholic from painful experiences may be doing him a great disservice; sometimes it is only the loss of a job or the horror of a serious accident which jolts the alcoholic into a state of mind in which he admits that the barren, frightening prospect of a life without liquor may be better than going on as he is. At that moment he has, as the alcoholics say, "hit bottom"; he is ready to begin.

When the public is better informed, employers, employers and parents will not scold the alcoholic for behavior he cannot yet control; as one of the committee pamphlets says, "The alcoholic knows well enough that he is not fair to his family, that he is losing his friends and endangering his future. He reproaches himself more bitterly than anyone else does." With greater understanding of the subject, no friend will suggest, "Just stick to wine and beer," or "Try drinking only over week ends." The committee says, "If the alcoholic could, he would do all this. He has tried over and over again and has failed. But with expert guidance he can learn to deal with his problems in a normal way and without any alcohol at all."

No man or woman becomes an alcoholic through choice; all authorities agree on that. No alcoholic deliberately and perversely chooses a life that will bring misery on his family. No alcoholic sets out, on purpose, to become a problem to society. His sufferings are real and grim and he is very eager to escape from them, if society will give him the chance.

And if society doubts whether the alcoholic deserves much help or sympathy, it is well to remember this: this is the first malady in history which has been licked by its own victims, when science, without their help, had failed. If Bill, the stumblebum, and Mary and Jake were able to perform some thousands of miraculous changes in their own lives and those of other sufferers, then they have perhaps earned the right to ask society to adopt the only attitude which can ever help the alcoholic back to sanity: to look on him as a very sick man who-now or later-will reach the stage where guidance can help him to recover.

living cheerfully to a useful old age. Not only have I cured myself but I have helped many other alcoholics back to permanent sobriety.

Alcoholics Anonymous is responsible for the change.

This 10 year old organization of 18,000 men and women in 425 groups in several score United States and Canadian communities proves anew every day that the age of miracles is not past. BY a combination of common sense, applied psychology, co-operative effort and practical Christianity, Alcoholics Anonymous has transformed 18,000 hopeless drunkards into happy, useful citizens. Its members practice one of the greatest examples of mass therapy in the history of mankind. And their numbers multiply daily. Canada now has organized groups of Alcoholics Anonymous in Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, London, Windsor, Vancouver and Victoria. Canadian A.A.'s (that's what we call ourselves) number in hundreds, where five years ago there were none.

Medicine, the Church and the state have struggled with the problem of alcoholism for thousands of years. Medicine can't cure an alcoholic. The church can seldom reform a drunkard. The state can't legislate him back to sanity. But Alcoholics Anonymous cures 75% of all alcoholics exposed to it. Two per cent was the best ever attained by any other combination of agencies.

My own introduction to A.A. was entirely unexpected. On release from hospital, my last remaining friend staked me to the railroad fare to another city, where in wartime I easily got another job. The armed services would have no part of me. I had "signed the pledge again." "I'd never take another drink so long as I lived. But the same gruesome pattern began repeating. I got drunk for one night, then for two days, then for a week on end. This went on with briefer periods of sobriety and longer periods of drunkenness. I lost that job, got another, and met a fellow to whom I took an instinctive liking. He saw me at lunch one day when I had made it to work, although every muscle and nerve in my body twitched in the agony of a hang-over. He noticed my shaking hands.

"Would you like to stop drinking?" he asked, casually. "I want to more than anything else in the world," I replied, "But I've tried everything, and nothing works."

"I've suffered from your illness for ten years," he replied. "I believe I can show you a way out."

So I went to my first A.A. meeting. I was amazed to find cheerful, animated, well-groomed men and women in a clublike atmosphere. I listened to a visiting speaker tell simply his spectacular story of release from alcohol by following the TWELVE STEPS as laid down in the A.A. program.

I was introduced to many people and many of them told me briefly how they had successfully come back. There was something immeasurably consoling in realizing that I was a sick man and not a bad man; that I had a disease, not a vice; that I suffered from an allergy just as another man has an allergy to strawberries. I was comforted most of all because here was proof that there was a cure. If others could do it, I could.

The first requisite of an A.A. member, I had - I honestly wanted to stop drinking. This time there was no pledge to sign, no swearing off for life. A man who had once begged dimes for beer and is today a prosperous merchant said; "You've signed the pledge a dozen times. We all have. This time just take it easy. Just say; "I won't take a drink today. I won't drink for twenty-four hours." Then say the same thing again tomorrow. Its easier not to drink for a day than to quit for a life. Easy does it, one step at a time. Sobriety is new to you, drink's an old habit. So just don't drink tonight and then don't drink tomorrow."

The second step for A.A. members, he told me, was "to believe that a power greater than ourselves would restore us to sanity, and to decide to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him." The words as we understood Him are vitally important. Most men recognize that there is a power greater than themselves, though definitions differ. I was a nominal Christian, having been baptized a Presbyterian. MY counselor, himself a Roman Catholic, suggested that I pray quietly by myself, for strength to keep sober for the next 24 hours. Observing my hesitation, he said; "It doesn't matter to whom you pray. I pray to God; you suit yourself. But when you get up in the morning, say within yourself, to whatever greater power you recognize: "Please keep me from drinking today." and when you go to bed at night, say "Thank you, but be sincere and mean it."

A.A. NOT PROHIBITIONIST

I was relieved that I didn't have to be "saved" or hit a revival-meeting sawdust trail in order to get into A.A. I never liked that sort of thing. But I could take the prescription offered, as plenty had done before me. I found A.A. non-sectarian, its members including Protestants, Roman Catholics, Jews and agnostics. I was also glad to find that A.A. is not even faintly a prohibition or temperance group. It is not a "gold cure," and there are no pills, no doctors, no clergymen. This knowledge made embarking on the Twelve Step program less formidable an undertaking. I decided to try it.

Operating on the 24-hour plan I totally abstained for three weeks, though it wasn't easy. Then came a bad break in the office, and in my bitterness I fell back on the timeworn technique - get blind drunk and achieve oblivion. I had to drink again the next day and the third day I couldn't get out of my room. I was in the drunkard's uniform - dressing gown, pyjamas, and no slippers - and could hardly lift my head from the pillow when my friend called for me to go to an A.A. meeting. But he didn't seem either shocked or disappointed, merely remarking, "your not the first to have a relapse, and it isn't necessarily serious." He went out to a drugstore for some high potency Vitamin B1, brought me food, and chatted cheerfully. I felt better before he left, and the next day was able to go to work.

This wasn't the last time I was tempted, but it was the last time I fell. Over and over, when the craving came back, I felt like giving my right arm for a drink. Often my A.A. friend would appear unbidden, almost intuitively, at my elbow, suggesting a movie, a ball game or some bridge. With him behind me I could fight back the urge to drink. For a long while I didn't go to movies alone because seeing anyone on the screen sip a cocktail set up an almost unendurable craving.

This man literally saved my life, but the whole A.A. group helped. This treatment was a form of mass therapy, and this is, to me, the foundation of A.A.'s success. Let me tell you what I mean by the term.

At meetings I met a man who had been reduced to drinking the alcohol he had drained from car radiators, tell how he bounced back to a prosperous place in his city's business life. I heard a physician tell how he drank himself out of a $20,000 a year practice and had been quite literally yanked out of the gutter by A.A., to fight his way back to sobriety and success. I listened to a workman tell how he had been in and out of jails for 10 years and now held a priority job in a war plant.

All these men had admitted publicly that they were alcoholics, that they could never hope to control their drinking and therefore must totally abstain. The very admission and subsequent discussion, helped us all tremendously. We faced facts we had evaded all our lives. Having been helped by the Twelve Step program, these A.A.'s helped others. For it is the basis of our program that only an alcoholic can understand an alcoholic and help him. The doctor prescribes a hypo in the arm, but he doesn't have the disease. The clergyman probably never drank anything stronger than Aunt Maud's elderberry wine. The wife says, "Think of your family," failing to understand that the alcoholic does think of his family, with the bittersweet remorse. The state says, passing periodic prohibition laws, "Thou shalt not drink," but alcoholics and non-alcoholics alike reply, "Nuts."

But the recovered alcoholic says to the shaking, despondent wreck just emerging from the fog after a frightful bender; "I know just how you feel because I have been there myself. Not just once or a few times. I've had those shakes, those chills and fevers, those sweats, that terrible, awful remorse, that horrible feeling of aloneness, that vicious craving for another drink, that desperation that makes me a liar and a thief and a beggar to get another shot. I've had these not once, but hundreds of times in the past 10 or 15 years. I know what it's all about."

"You're not just another drunken bum. You're not just another moral outcast. You're just a sick man with a disease as malignant, but more easily diagnosed and cured, than cancer. I think I have the cure for you if you honestly want to stop drinking."

The sanitarium treatment for alcoholism, which does not always succeed, is not available for many but the well to do. Many a discharged patient will get drunk on his way home from a three-week hospitalization only for the attainment of temporary sobriety. After that the first step is to take the patient to an A.A. meeting. There he gets the full impact of the mass therapeutic treatment.

Men who understand this disease explain that it's an allergy not a vice. This theory is comparatively new, and it explains why some people can drink safely and some can't, just as some are unmoved by ragweed and others are reduced to agonies with hay fever when exposed to the plant. It also explains why when a man is once an alcoholic he is always an alcoholic. Like the diabetic sufferer who takes insulin, the alcoholic can only hope to arrest his disease. He can stop drinking but he will still be an alcoholic when he dies. All this is explained by sympathetic fellow sufferers, who tell what they and other have accomplished.

The patient must say, privately and to at least one other person: "I just can't take it."

TRAITS IN COMMON

In addition to sharing an allergy, the symptom of which is unnatural craving, alcoholics usually have certain personality traits in common. We are often emotionally immature and burdened by an inferiority complex. The A.A. program helps in this field, too, and the third step requires a frank discussion of problems, and restitution to those who have been wronged. But the past is held to be water over the dam - just take a moral inventory, do the best you can to fix things up, and then go on being sober the rest of your life. I, for instance had always been a "worrier," and often worry literally drove me to drink. But since being in A.A. I have been honest with myself and have stopped worrying.

The majority of A.A. groups meet two or three times a week. There is one public meeting, to which all comers are invited, always addressed by a recovered alcoholic who tells his case history. In the Detroit-Windsor area, for instance, where there are 12 A.A. groups, a joint public meeting is held monthly, attended by some 400 alcoholics. That is an inspiring spectacle. Annually, in both cities, A.A. stages public banquets where the cocktail is tomato juice, and the liquor is demitasse coffee. Windsor, the strongest of the Canadian units, has benefited enormously by association with the able, active A.A.'s in the great Detroit organization.

A.A. has two other types of meetings - the clinical session for A.A.'s only and the social evening. In the clinic the boys take their hair down, tell of their drinking careers and try to analyze what made them drink, and by exchanging experiences help each other permanently ride the water wagon. There is the Saturday night bridge or poker session, when a dozen or more alcoholics rotate around each other's homes. For many of them it's the first time they've ever played poker sober. These activities offer an antidote to loneliness, which has driven many an alcoholic man to the nearest bar.

The patient exposed to this experience in mass treatment is cured in 75 out of 100 starts. Just being together in one large room a group of prosperous, cheerful men and women who once were "hopeless drunkards" has a tremendous psychological effect on the newcomer and old-timer alike.

I went through the A.A. program of admission, of acknowledging a power greater than myself, of taking inventory of my weaknesses and making restitution to those I had injured. But it was in the Twelfth Step - in helping others like myself - that I found the greatest satisfaction and a guarantee of permanent sobriety. A couple of months after I had been in A.A., I got another fellow to join. I thereby wrote myself an insurance policy, I paid the premium by helping myself and others. I drew the dividend of permanent sobriety. For once a man has induced others to join A.A., he'll never be likely to fall again himself. Pride, if nothing else will be his mainstay, for never can he let these men see him drunk. Of course A.A. has backsliders, but those who do slip off the water wagon climb on again with an agility they never thought believable before. It just isn't done to let down the fellow who helped you when everyone else, and all else, had failed.

We had a fellow who had been the "town drunk" for 15 years. Skeptics said, "if you can cure him you can cure anybody." This chap slept in used car lots, bummed dimes on the street, was in and out of jails, and drank everything from leftover beer to shaving lotion. Everytime he got out of jail he was plastered again as soon as he had the money. Yet he really wanted to quit. When he first approached me I was frankly apprehensive. But when we had exposed him to our program, fed and decently clothed him, and got him a job, he was a new man. He hasn't had a drink for 14 months. He's our most spectacular cure and one of our most helpful members.

Another was a lawyer, a man prominent in public life who had been hospitalized in the "best places" a dozen times. But always he found himself back in the same spot - holed up in a hotel room, the living likeness of "The Unhappy Drinker" who wants to stop but can't. He did his drinking on a different level of society than the "town drunk" but he was making an even better job of wrecking himself mentally and physically. He was also tossing a promising career into the ash can. He didn't know I A.A. existed in this city, but he had read of the international organization and wrote to the New York Office of Alcoholic Foundation Inc., and his letter was sent on to me. He hasn't had a drink for 15 months.

I was at an A.A. meeting one night when a man 60 odd years old, and very, very high indeed, stumbled in. He was belligerent and abusive. He'd located the local A.A. group, and he wanted help, but he had to drink himself a little courage to come to see us. We found he had once been a power in the Labor movement, a highly paid union organizer, now reduced to washing dishes in a "greasy spoon." He has totally abstained for 12 months and now has a good job compatible with his intelligence and education.

MOSTLY VOLUNTEERS

But I want to make it clear that A.A. never pesters a man to join. Ninety-nine per cent of the people who join our own group have asked for help. We must first be assured that a man wants to stop drinking before we'll move. If he doesn't want to stop more than anything else in the world then he's not ready for A.A. and unless he's ripe we'd be wasting our time, and might even prejudice him against us. If an alcoholic comes into A.A., attends a few meetings and then drops out, we never go after him. We wait until he's taken another real nose dive, and then we'll comb the bars and joints to drag him back to sanity. That may sound a bit brutal, but we have found that it is best to get a man when he is full of remorse after crawling out of the stupor of a bat, than to try to work on him when he's cold sober and falsely believes he has liquor licked.

Let me make it very clear that Alcoholics Anonymous is for alcoholics only. We want no part of the social drinker, or the man or woman who occasionally ties one on at a party. We define the alcoholic as one who is "powerless over alcohol." Any "morning after" drinker is either an alcoholic or a potential alcoholic. This is the type who'll take a drink when he doesn't want to, when he knows that taking that drink may wreck his future economically. The recovered alcoholic wants to cure others like himself, but he does not want to interfere with the drinking habits of those who enjoy their liquor and forget about it. We don't want to close any bars or cut liquor rations. We recognize that for most people drinking is an enjoyable, harmless social pastime, one that adds a good deal to the gaiety of nations. But we also recognize that it is not for us. A.A. will almost guarantee a cure based on total abstinence, but as yet to turn out a safe social drinker. Many of us firmly established in A.A. serve liquor to others in our homes and clubs, tipping ourselves on fruit juice and cokes. But that is not sound practice for new recruits, on the principle that it's foolish to stick one's head into the lion's mouth. He is wise to avoid temptation.

After I had been in A.A. a while the man who 10 years ago founded the movement spoke one night in a nearby city and I went to hear him. A charming, intelligent man, an able executive and fluent speaker, he could earn $80,000 a year today, yet he devotes his life to A.A., running the international organization from New York for barely enough to keep him going. Let's call him arbitrarily and to preserve the principle of anonymity, Davis.

Davis, a New York stockbroker who had a rich and varied drinking career, found himself one day in Akron, Ohio. He was alone, knew not a soul in the city, and was almost stone-broke, and he badly wanted a drink. But he knew that if he took one he would walk the same old path again to torture and eventual hospitalization. Davis had become intensely interested in the problem of alcoholism while paying a visit to a New York detoxicating hospital where he had been a patient. In his Akron hotel lobby Davis looked at a Church directory opposite the bar, impulsively he called a clergyman, although he did not know him, and through the minister he met an Akron physician who was really an advanced alcoholic. The doctor and the broker became friends, and tried to hold each other up on the water wagon. But the doctor fell off. It was on June 10, 1935, that the physician took his last drink. It was a drink given to him by Davis, to pull him out of a hangover. These two became the first A.A. group. In a year and a half they had effected only 10 cures. By the early part of 1939 the number had grown to 100. It was at that time that Alcoholics Anonymous - the A.A. bible - was published. This is a remarkable work, with a preface by the founder, and case histories of a dozen spectacular cures. A.A.'s call it the "Big Book." It is such a powerful piece of simple writing that cures have been effected by one reading of it, and nothing else. It is procurable from any A.A. group or by writing to the head office, Box 459, Grand Central Annex Post Office, New York City.

Since then, groups have been almost self-starting in Cleveland, Detroit, Toledo, Cincinnati, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Toronto, Washington, Montreal, Chicago and some 50 other cities and towns in the United States and Canada. Everywhere they are endorsed by clergymen, doctors and social workers.

About five years ago the movement gained a foothold in Canada. Toronto is the oldest and Windsor is the second oldest group.

NO RESPECTER OF RANK

What has Alcoholics Anonymous got to offer Canada and Canadians? A.A. offers to thousands of Canadian drunks and to borderline cases and potential alcoholics restoration to a happy and gainful place in society, painlessly and without cost. All they have to do is want to be cured. A.A. is really a co-operative, and alcoholics can band themselves together in a co-operative just as can the grain growers of Western Canada or the farmers of Ontario. A.A. welcomes everybody who wants to slay the dragon that has made his life hell-extrovert and introvert, beggarman and thief, lawyer and office worker, banker and day laborer, rich, poor and the suffering white-collarman, society lady and the truck driver.

For one thing, A.A. has taught its members that alcohol is no respecter of rank or birth or worldly position. I know the head of a war plant who's making money so fast he can't count it. I know a chap who works for this man for forty cents an hour, when he works. They are both alcoholics. One is a well educated, intelligent man, with a charming wife and family. The other is a poor chap who never had a chance to acquire an education, or the capacity to absorb it. They both suffer from the disease of alcoholism, just as they might in other circumstances have tuberculosis. A.A. can, and does, help both these extreme types and all the run-of-the-mill humanity in between.

A.A. groups offer very practical assistance too. Our reputation has grown to be respected by employers and by agencies of the state. We feed and cloth some down-and-outers we think deserving, and get them jobs. Six months ago a large firm wrote me asking if we had in our group a personnel man, for they believed an ex-alcoholic could, by his greater understanding of man and his frailties, handle men better than most other types. The other day I met the head of that firm on the street.

"You know that ex-drunk you sent me?" he enquired.

"Yes, " I recalled, "What's the matter? Did he get drunk again?"

"Drunk, no!" he snorted, "Send me half-a-dozen more like him."

That was one of the most satisfying moments of my life.

Recently a big bruiser of a chap, one of those "fighting drunks," was up in court on the old fighting the cops charge. But instead of sending him to jail this time, the magistrate paroled him to me when I was able to tell the court that the man had been in A.A. for six months and had had but this one brief relapse. I staked my own and the reputation of A.A. on that fellow, and I know I'll win.

And A.A. is for potential alcoholics, too, for the smart operator who's intelligent enough to see where he's heading before he actually musses his trousers in the gutter. We have had more than a dozen of that type join us in the last month.

To answer the inevitable "wise guy," who sees a racket in all human endeavors let me point out that the modest organization maintained by A.A. is financed through the voluntary contributions of recovered alcoholics. There are no dues or fees. At our meeting we contribute to the "kitty" the price of one drink or one bottle, depending on how flush we are at the moment. No newcomer pays a nickel. Each of the groups is completely autonomous. The Alcoholic Foundation Inc., New York, is the central clearinghouse for information and advice, and helps each individual unit. But no group owes money of allegiance to New York. Each can help pay the New York rent or not, as it seems fit. Many don't, but most do.

Depressed, lonely, and apprehensive about what lay ahead, Bill went to visit Winchester Cathedral. Inside the great cathedral, the atmosphere impressed itself so deeply upon him that he was taken by a sort of ecstasy, moved and stirred by a 'tremendous sense of presence.' 'I have been in many cathedrals since, and have never experienced anything like it,' he said. 'For a brief moment, I had needed and wanted God. There had been a humble willingness to have Him with me -- and He came.' In that moment, Bill knew that everything was all right, as it should be."

After leaving the Cathedral, according to Robert Thomsen, Bill thought he would cut through town, find a pub and have a few short beers before returning to camp. But as he started off, his attention was caught by a name carved on a headstone. Thomas Thatcher [sic], died age 26 in 1764. "He smiled, remembering Ebby Thatcher and his brothers in Albany, then he leaned down and read the full inscription. He read it again. When writing the Big Book years later he was able to quote it nearly verbatim."

On arriving at the Cathedral, we went immediately to see the tombstone to which Bill referred in the Big Book. We took some pictures there.

The stone which stands there now is not the one which Bill saw, and the name on the stone is "Thetcher," not "Thatcher." It reads:

In memory of

Thomas Thetcher

a Grenadier in the North Regt of Hants Militia, who died of a violent Fever contracted by drinking

Small Beer when hot on the 12th May

1764, Aged 26 years

In grateful remembrance of whose universal good will towards his Comrades, this Stone is placed here at their expence as a small testimony of their regard and concern.

Here sleeps in peace a Hampshire Grenadier.

Who caught his death by drinking cold small beer

Soldiers be wise from his untimely fall.

And when ye're hot, drink Strong or none at all

This memorial being decay'd was restored

by the Officers of the Garrison A.D 1781

An honest soldier never is forgot.

Whether he die by musket or by pot.

The Stone was replaced by the North Hants

Militia when disembodied at Winchester on 26th April 1802 in consequence of the original stone being destroyed.

And again replaced by

The Royal Hampshire Regiment 1966

After seeing the tombstone and taking some pictures there, I entered the cathedral. I stopped about half way toward the front, where Bill says he stopped, and offered a prayer of gratitude for Bill's life.

For those who have a chance to visit Winchester Cathedral I would suggest planning to spend a full day. Winchester, and Winchester Cathedral, have an interesting history apart from Bill's visit.

While I did not have the time to spend on this trip, I learned from material purchased there that the Cathedral had its origins in the 7th century, when a Christian Church was first built on the site. It has played a fundamental part of the life of this ancient city and in the history of England ever since.

"The cathedral was begun in 1079 in the Romanesque style. It is at the heart of King Alfred's Wessex and a diocese which once stretched from London's Thames to the Channel Islands. Its bishops were men of enormous wealth and power, none more so than William of Wykeham, twice Chancellor of England, Founder of Winchester College and New College Oxford. The chantry chapels and memorials of these great prelates are a feature of the Cathedral. These influential bishops also developed, re-fashioned and adorned this great Cathedral. There pilgrims sought the shrine of local saints, notably a former bishop, Saint Swithun, whose festival (15 July) was said to set the pattern for the weather for the next forty days."

The master masons who built the Cathedral faced two challenges. "One was to get the building up in the first place, and the other to create a large internal space which didn't collapse under its own weight. The fact that the building exists proves that both problems were ultimately solved. Construction will have relied on moveable scaffolding to support the walls and roof as they were erected, while mortar set and arches were completed. The builders will have moved along the building from bay to bay so that components could be reused, and each set of specialist skills kept in continuous use. Most components will have been prefabricated. Bringing together the relevant skills, building material, and finance will have been one of the greatest organizational challenges of the day.

"The masons who built Winchester cathedral did not push the limits as much as some others, but they did sometimes over-reach themselves, and encountered two major problems. Firstly, the original tower collapsed in 1107 and had to be rebuilt. We will see that no risks were taken with the replacement, which uses massive, and carefully constructed internal pillars to support a relatively low structure. Secondly, the original foundations of the cathedral were not sufficiently strong. The result was that foundations moved throughout the life of the cathedral, and by the end of the 19th century a great deal of work was needed to secure the foundations, and preserve the building."

The grave of Jane Austin lies in the North Aisle. She died in Winchester, after moving there in the hope that a Winchester doctor could cure her illness. She lived briefly just outside the cathedral close. The stone makes no mention of her writing (although a nearby wall plaque does) The text on the grave reads:

"In memory of JANE AUSTEN Youngest daughter of the late reverend GEORGE AUSTEN formerly rector of Steventon in this county. She departed this life on the 18th July 1817, aged 44, after a long illness supported with the patience and the hopes of a Christian. The benevolence of her heart, the sweetness of her composure, the extraordinary endowments of her mind, obtained the regard of all who knew her, and the warmest love of her intimate connections. Their grief is in proportion to their affection. They know their loss to be irreparable, but in their deepest affliction they are comforted by a firm though humble hope that her charity, devotion faith and purity have rendered her soul acceptable in the sight of her REDEEMER"

"The Cathedral was also the church of the community of Benedictine monks from its earliest days. Elements of the monastic buildings may still be traced through the Cathedral Close. Central to the life of the monks was the opus dei (the Work of God), the regular offering of prayer which they sang in the quire. The discipline of praying regularly for the world is continued today, most notably in the said morning office and the daily singing of Evensong by the Cathedral choir. Evensong still takes place in the choir of the Cathedral, the choir stalls with their magnificent gabled canopies, elaborately carved with flowers and plants, owls and monkeys, dragons, knights and green men. ...

"The monastery and pilgrimage to its shrine was suppressed by Henry VIII in 1539 and it was then that a Dean and Chapter of Canons took over responsibility for the Cathedral. Outstanding treasures are fragments of sculpture that survived the desecration of the reformers and the Winchester Bible, lavishly illuminated, written in the scriptorium here between 1160 and 1180. The seventeenth century library contains ancient manuscripts and early printed books. Along with the chantry chapels created for the great bishops of the past there are many memorials which tell of this island's story and those who went out from here to serve in distant parts of the world. Here, too, you will find burial caskets containing the bones of Canute and other early kings. Izaak Walton is buried here and, among many who must have provided characters for her novels, Jane Austen.

The famous "Winchester Bible" is housed there.

"The Winchester Bible is the finest of all the great 12th century bibles. A single scribe wrote out the entire bible in the Latin of St. Jerome, and the initials which stand at the beginning of each book of the bible were drawn and coloured by a team of artists over a period of 20 years. The colours, including gold and lapis lazuli are as intense today as they were 800 years ago."

"Once the capital of England, Winchester is literally bursting with historical sites, giving a here glimpse into a bygone age.

"Many of the ancient kings of England are buried in the city including King Alfred."

Sir Thomas Mallory favored Winchester as the site of King Arthur's Round Table.

It would be interesting to know if Bill went back to the Cathedral and spent time studying its history.

was occasionally tempted, also, to exhibit that terrific ego with which so many fellow sufferers cover up their feelings of inferiority.

"Only one who understands from experience the hell these men go through can successfully head a bureau like this. Remember, I am - not was - an alcoholic."

McGoldrick believes alcoholics must never forget they are allergic to alcohol, just as some people are allergic to strawberries or fish. "Once an alcoholic always an alcoholic;" and if they remember that, they are less likely to indulge in casual experimenting after they feel they have the craving under control.

While working on his own cure, McGoldrick helped also with Dr. Gregory's more stubborn cases. To his amazement, he began having success - largely because he discovered that the real secret of alcohol therapy lies in heart-to-heart personal contact. "When I work with alcoholics," he says, "my own example carries conviction and is part of the treatment."

For a broader "clinical" training he went later to the Bowery, where he spent months with drunks and derelicts. Dressed like one of them, he slept in flophouses, ate mission handouts, exchanged confidences with those not too befogged by alcohol.

Early in 1943 McGoldrick decided to give up his law practice and devote all of his time to helping alcoholics. When Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia offered him the post of Assistant Corporation Counsel - an honor many a lawyer would covet - he turned it down. Then he explained his newborn project to the Mayor and found an eager listener. When he left City Hall, he was New York's first alcoholic therapist. The Mayor had promised to back him unofficially for one year. The Alcoholic Therapy Bureau has now been given official status and operates under the Department of Welfare.

"We are not altogether altruistic about this," the Mayor said to me. "Don't forget that 80 percent of the cases in the magistrates' courts are alcoholics. This means a terrific cost to New York."

As the most fertile field in which to stalk the city's alcoholics, McGoldrick picked the municipal lodging-house for the Bureau's headquarters. The entire top floor was turned over to him and he begged chairs and desks from the city's warehouse.

In May 1943, with a staff of two Department of Welfare workers, McGoldrick chose from city prisons, hospitals and courtrooms 100 human derelicts whose drinking pattern covered 15 to 44 years of chronic alcoholism, one of them with a record of 83 arrests. They came from all walks of life. All were accorded the same treatment. Among them were doctors, lawyers, engineers, reporters, actors, salesmen.

Twenty-five of the original human wrecks whom McGoldrick picked up fell by the wayside. But the remaining 75 are now solidly on their feet. Omitting, as not typical, the cases of 25 who started their reformation in the penitentiary, the records show that 36 percent of these salvaged derelicts never took a drink after McGoldrick picked them up, while 22 percent had one relapse and 42 percent had two relapses before winning their victory. All have jobs.

The main steps in McGoldrick's cure are: restoration of faith, removal of fear, encouragement, renewal of social contacts and responsibility. Restitution should also be undertaken at the earliest possible moment; even though it be in tiny amounts, the alcoholic should start repaying those to whom he is in debt. Let's see how these principles are applied:

Bob, now 53 and long an alcoholic, had been working 14 years for a large corporation when his employer met him staggering in, and fired him on the spot. Then he took up drinking seriously. His heartbroken wife and daughter pleaded, threatened and finally walked out. Debts piled up. His friends crossed the street when they saw him coming.

At McGoldrick's suggestion, Bob was put in the general ward - not in the alcoholic division - of Bellevue Hospital until he got over the shakes. Then McGoldrick visited him daily, encouraged him to "talk it out." Like all drunks when they start sobering up, Bob was living in his past, full of his own degradation and shame.

At this stage, criticism of an alcoholic's drinking only fixes the picture more firmly in his mind. He must be taken away from the past.

"Our object is to focus his attention on a healthy, happy future," McGoldrick explains. "One of the greatest blocks to reformation is fear of failure. In every victim's subconscious mind lurks the memory of some failure - either in school, society, love or business. He fears that in making another attempt he may fail again. As soon as he believes that fate is working with, not against, him he has taken the first step toward restored self-respect. But you can't preach religion to him. If he wants God, it helps, but it's up to him."

After Bob was sobered up, the Bureau helped him find a job - one which he could do well without too much effort, one in which he would not fail with the subsequent feeling of having lost his grip.

"At this stage there is an upsurge of self-respect and the patient's moral inventory begins," says McGoldrick. "Alcoholics are -usually trying to escape from something. Once they have faced it, they have nothing to run away from. I know. I found this out myself -and Bob found it out. He's been going strong ever since."

Tom, a former saloon owner whom McGoldrick had salvaged, talked freely of his past and present.

"I haven't fallen off the wagon in nine months," Tom said. "I couldn't drink again. Not because of myself alone, but because of others. I'm coaxing four alcoholics along now. One is my brother. They might all go down without me."

His clear brown eyes were serene. "I don't have to fight myself when I pass a ginmill today. I never felt that way before. I'm staying sober because I want to. When you see an alcoholic like McGoldrick on his feet you think, 'Maybe I can to it too.'"

I asked McGoldrick if an alcoholic's family could cure him. He shook his head. "Only under the most exceptional circumstances," he said. "The relatives of an alcoholic suffer a special brand of humiliation, both before the public and in their own hearts. If, however, they have enough love and perseverance; if, instead of condemning him, they encourage him to analyze his drinking as he might analyze a disease, if they can make him realize how much they are depending on him; and if, above all, they are there when he needs reassuring, there's a chance of a miracle. But if the average alcoholic's family had the patience, compassion and realism to do this successfully, they probably would have saved their black sheep long ago."

In the early stages of their cure the men seldom go outside the Bureau building without being accompanied by McGoldrick or one of the other cured alcoholics. Later, when he is on his own, if a man feels an impulse to drink he puts in a telephone SOS to McGoldrick or else rushes back to him. Seldom does McGoldrick fail to talk the man out of his desire. After one or more of these crises the patient usually finds himself able to handle temptation under his own power.

I asked McGoldrick if he thought one year was long enough to prove his case. "One month is enough if the alcoholic wants to be cured," he said. "I know so-called reformed drunkards who, activated by fear or some other negative reason, had been on the wagon three to four years yet they were still far from being cured. You can look at my men and know they are not going to drink again - not because they are afraid to but because they don't want to. The cure comes from within, and it doesn't take a year to prove it's working."

The growth of the Bureau has made a separate building necessary and McGoldrick is just opening a three-story, 20-room frame house opposite the cool green of Bronx Bark. It looks like a private home or club. The ground floor has been converted into offices, dining room and kitchen. On the second floor are sleeping quarters - 20 beds - and a large sitting room, with radio, books and newspapers. There's a lecture room on the third floor.

Anybody who wants to know more about Nell's work should get her book, "Grateful to Have Been There," from Hazelden.

We also met her nephew Bill, who has her same last name. Isn't it remarkable that a Bill W. is now looking after her!!!!

More on Nell Wing.

I thought that you all might want to know that I had a visit Saturday with Nell wing and that she sends her regards to you all. I told her about an upcoming district archives workshop on Saturday, April 5th outside Harrisburg Pa. and mentioned that a number of archivists and archives will be there. I recorded a short message from her to you (all Archivists) on my cell phone. She also asked me to personally say hello to several of the presenters she knows. A relative of hers allowed us to visit her and she reminisced about the old days with Bill and Lois, the many friends she has made and about the important things in life; such as loving one another. I had never met her before and had an opportunity to explain to her that by being an archivist and helping AA to write AA comes of age and pass it on etc., that it allowed me to believe in a power greater than myself and that this program must be God given. The first thing that I noticed about her was the beautiful smile and her aura of peace and serenity. We took some pictures and were invited to come back. On her walls were many of the awards she was given as being AA's 1st archivist as well as the other accomplishments in her life. She recalled working in the office with Bill and entertained us with several amusing recollections of the early days of AA. I showed her some photos of Frank M, as well as some pictures of other members of our fellowship. I left her with an early picture showing Dr. Bob and Anne and Bill and Lois and friends at a picnic. The picture was a copy of one that had been sent to her 30-40 years ago. On the wall there was a picture of Bill and Lois as well as a painting of Bill and Dr Bob. She's not able to attend the workshop but sends her regards to everyone interested in archives and AA. Mike G Sepia Archives

Anonymous. And so far as the limited aim is concerned of helping people deprive themselves of alcohol, there seems no doubt that the popularity is deserved.

Where other methods tend to say, "Now you are cured; go back to your life," this voluntary association of 15,000 members is unique in offering not a "cure" so much as a "life." Not drinking becomes in itself an absorbing occupation, providing fellowship, prestige and--in spite of an absurd body of crude medico-religious dogma--a very real communal faith. Obviously no one can give up a symptom without finding at least a partial satisfaction for its cause, which in this case is intricately related to the social structure. It is no indictment of the method itself, therefore, to criticize the kind of life celebrated by AA, or to suggest that what really goes on bears no relation to the blueplate values offered as explanation and inducement. These are not people driven to self-denial because of any deep awareness of interpersonal failure or spiritual emptiness in their lives; usually they have found that alcohol was threatening such real possessions as job, family or the deference paid them by the less addicted. It is hardly surprising if the compensatory social life which they achieve together must be glorified by women's magazine phrases and lodge-meeting principles.

The advantage of the present 300-page pamphlet (disguised as a pulp-style novel) over the shorter booklets distributed by AA, lies in its detailed revelations of group activity. While the formal weekly meetings are devoted to inspirational talks by ex-alcoholics, coffee is drunk in no blue-nose spirit; good fellowship abounds ("You can get that sense of abandon without liquor"). AA members feel a natural solidarity: the way they would "get up and talk at meetings, really let their hair down, made -other contacts seem thin and superficial. Other people shadowy." And while AA insists that it has no ambition to impose sobriety on the nation, its members feel a natural willingness to share their benefits with any applicant. They are "on call," so to speak, day and night, answering requests for aid or enlightenment from strangers or backsliding fellows. Each member is at once both patient and physician: only from a fellow alcoholic can they receive that acceptance, without condescension, which society has withheld. As physician, setting an example to others, they have an incentive toward sobriety, but it seems to me they gain something more valuable as well: the privilege of adult responsibility without its full rigors. They feel free to become a child--a patient--again, whenever necessary. But in practice, of course, this dual role must cause some paralyzing inter-alcoholic confusions--depending on who is treating whom at the moment. Prestige is gained primarily through one's success in not drinking; second, through one's talent for mutual aid. Occasionally an unregenerate member is subjected to social ostracism. ("But probably every field has it lunatic fringe.")

One assumption is that only an alcoholic can understand an alcoholic. Within obvious limits this is true, but the quality of understanding is rather doubtful. Tag-lines of popular psychiatry, which serve as passwords in the

I appreciate the answers I've received about the Herbert Spencer quotation.
Jim Blair's reference to the Seldes quotation book seems close, but we don't have a real source from Spencer's works.

In response to Mel B's question on the quotation in the BB attributed to Herbert Spencer.

I read "Principles of Biology" twice and did not find the quote there.

I searched the reference books of quotations and found a book titled "The Great Quotations" by George Seldes (1960).

Listed under Herbert Spencer is the following quotation but it is not attributed to any of his works.

Note: that the wording is not the same as in the BB

"There is a principle which is a bar against all information, which is a the abstract probability that a falsity has usually a nucleus of verity, few bear this abstract probability in mind, when passing judgment on the options of others. A belief that is proved to be grossly at variance with fact, is cast aside with indignation or contempt; and in the heat of antagonism scarcely any one inquires what there was in this belief which commended it to men's minds.

Yet there must have been something. And there is reason to suspect that this something was its correspondence with certain of their experiences: an extremely limited or vague correspondence perhaps, but still, a correspondence.

Even the absurdest report may in nearly every instance be traced to an actual occurrence; and had there been no such actual occurrence, this preposterous misrepresentation of it would never have existed. Though the distorted or magnified image transmitted to us through the refracting medium of rumour, is utterly unlike the reality; yet in the absence of the reality there would have been no distorted or magnified image. And thus it is with human beliefs in general. Entirely wrong as they may appear, the implication is that they originally contained, and perhaps still contain, some small amount of truth.

Definite views on this matter would be very useful to us. It is important that we should form something like a general theory of current opinions, so that we may neither over-estimate nor under-estimate their worth. Arriving at correct judgments on disputed questions, much depends on the mental attitude preserved while listening to, or taking part in, the controversies; and for the preservation of a right attitude, it is needful that we should learn how true, and yet how untrue, are average human beliefs. On the one hand, we must keep free from that bias in favour of received ideas which expresses itself in such dogmas as "What every one says must be true," or "The voice of the people is the voice of God." On the other hand, the fact disclosed by a survey of the past that majorities have usually been wrong, must not blind us to the complementary fact that majorities have usually not been entirely wrong. And the avoidance of these extremes being a pre-requisite to catholic thinking, we shall do well to provide ourselves with a safeguard against them, by making a valuation of opinions in the abstract. To this end we must contemplate the kind of relation that ordinarily subsists between opinions and facts. Let us do so with one of those beliefs which under various forms has prevailed among all nations in all times.

Hi Tom,
Thanks for your e-mail. I think you have the right idea in that the quote is indeed consistent with Spencer's thinking.
I don't think it was Bill W. who put the quotation in the Big Book. It was included with a First Edition personal story titled An Artist's Concept. That story didn't survive to the second edition, but the quote was used in the section at the back discussing spiritual experience. They've continued to use the quote and it's on page 568 of the fourth edition, still in connection with spiritual experience discussion.

There wasn't much I missed in the misadventures of advanced alcoholics. I tried to re-enlist but could not make the grade -because of alcoholism. Frustrated, I became involved in street fights and frequently woke up in a jail cell, writhing in the excruciating pain of alcoholic neuritis. Under the usual treatment accorded drunks--such as 30 hours' solitary confinement--alcoholism thrives. All I thought about was getting a drink to blot out the humiliation of the experience.

One night I went to the kitchen to seek a hidden bottle. Mistaking the cellar door for the cupboard, I fell down the stairway. Hours later I returned to consciousness and saw our three cats silhouetted against the open door of the furnace, watching me. I felt ashamed. Their silent, questioning gaze was more effective than the rebuke of any person.

Crisis impended now. The doctor did not have to say, "It's killing you." I knew it. I cut down on liquor one day, only to drink harder the next. I existed in a gray half-world. Somewhere in the depths of my mind there stirred a remote recollection of Alcoholics Anonymous. Grasping at this straw, I wrote that first letter.

When the reply came from AA, it was brief but reassuring: "AA will work if you want it to work." That threw a lot of responsibility right back in my lap. The letter continued: "The requirement for membership in Alcoholics Anonymous is simply the sincere desire to stop drinking, and you certainly seem to have that. We will do all possible to help you, and of course there is absolutely no charge." Wishing me luck, they asked me to write again. I did.

One point from the booklets the organization sent me proved to be the key to the whole plan: "Get up in the morning determined that you will not have a drink throughout the day. Don't say you will never drink. Just concern yourself with this day." It made sense.

Days went by and I was standing fast. But there was more here than a state of mind, and that is where my doctor came in. He used sedatives and thiamin hydrochloride (B1) to steady my nerves and help my appetite.

Still, a tiger stalked me--bitter memories of the past, that only liquor would remove. AA, with its usual discernment, asked me to think this over: "God grant me the serenity to accept things I cannot change, courage to change things I can, and wisdom to know the difference." That impressed me profoundly.

From there on, a message would arrive each day, with something like this: "When `the feeling' torments you, eat sweets. It's good medicine. Alcoholics are used to great quantities of sugar in their systems, and when you stop drinking you cut off that supply."

The battle was not won immediately. I had two slips. But AA and the doctor agreed that a slip is not uncommon at the start, and that gave me heart. They pointed out -that it may be precipitated by any emotional crisis; so I learned to avoid both controversy and excitement. Overconfidence too, I discovered, is dangerous, and AA wrote that I might never be nearer my first drink than when I felt absolutely certain that I had won the fight.

Recently I stumbled upon one of the bottles I had hidden around the house. I put it away hastily. Fascination drew me back to it. I swished the liquor around, held it up to the light, smelled it. I wondered if it would be possible to take one drink, and imagined myself pouring a tumbler half full of the liquor, filling it up with water and sipping it slowly to savor the fragrance and satisfying sharpness. I grew taut as a violin string.

But then the mailman came with a long AA letter. At the end was this amazing paragraph: "Some AAs, after the pressure has been lifted, think: `Well, maybe now I could take just a drink or two and stop there.' If you ever come to this stage, before you take that first drink just sit down and remember! That's all! Remember! One drink is too much, a thousand not enough."

I shuddered to think how close I had been to disaster, and was mystified by the chance guidance which had brought that particular message at the crucial moment.

Letters always were expertly timed, always bright and frequently sprightly. Not long ago, after several bad days, I was frightened, and I wrote AA. The answer was, "In the first place, will you please calm down! By the time I finish reading one of the letters you write when you're excited, I'm fit material myself for a padded cell."

Another time I was wavering on the edge, and AA sensed it. A special delivery air mail arrived: "Don't talk so negatively about this thing taking more than you've got. I thought the Marines never stopped fighting." That one snapped me back, for I'm proud to have been a Marine.

The letters brought results where all else had failed, because AA talked my language: they too were alkies. Kindly argument by my son and daughter formerly had made me ashamed and angry with myself; but then, unable to find a way out, I would drink harder in a desperate attempt to forget it all. Acquaintances and friends had urged me to swear off, to "be a man." They seemed unable to grasp the fact that alcoholism is a disease, that there is no more reason to censure an alcoholic than there is to berate a person for breaking a leg or having cardiac trouble.

The technique of AA, I discovered, was not to push, or even to lead, but to walk with you and offer you something you need--if you want to accept it. There was no argument, no controversy. There was no concern, either, about temperance interests; they are not reformers. Neither are they concerned with race or creed. They do, however, feel it highly important that you have some belief in a power greater than yourself, because this fact of belief, or something to lean on, makes the fight easier.

"What the hell's the use of all this?" I asked in one of my letters.

"You'll eventually get the answer to that," AA replied. "You've got a lot of years left. Why not make them worth while? There are other people like yourself you can help, and there's nothing like helping others in order to forget yourself."

One day I began thinking about a trip to New York. My AA correspondent encourage me. People in the AA office were as curious to see me as I was to see them.

In our conversations the office people told me that I will always be an alcoholic. Most persons eventually lose the desire to drink and are not tempted in the presence of liquor. But I am one of those unfortunate few who are constantly in danger. I cannot look at liquor, smell it, even think about it. It sets that inner, involuntary compulsion astir. If I were to slip now, I -feel certain I could not fight this battle over again. Drink to me means death.

AA national headquarters have records to prove that 50 percent of those who come to AA with a sincere desire to stop drinking do so immediately; another 25 percent stop after one or two slips; and of the remaining 25 percent some fail entirely, some fail to keep in touch with the organization, and others eventually resume contact and stay dry. Two types cannot be helped by AA: halfhearted persons who merely toy with the idea of becoming dehydrated and those with brain lesions or psychoses.

The New York companionship strength-ened my shield and I was given a keener insight into the importance of the spiritual approach. I am not a religious man, but in the course of my return from the half-world of alcoholism I had begun to perceive the intervention of some outside force working in my behalf. This came to me slowly, during long solitary walks in the country. I began to feel that life must have some design; s o I tried to pray to whatever may be back of all this.

The change which AA helps a man accomplish is close to the religious experience of conversion. Indeed, it is the same if it is genuine and lasts. I see now that most failures result from lack of acceptance of some power greater than oneself. I have found added encouragement not only from everyone in AA but my friends. Once one recovers a constructive approach toward life, self-confidence and a belief in the future, the devil of alcoholism can be conquered. I believe--and my friends assure me--that I have done it.

Chapter 1. BILL'S STORY page 10

I could almost hear the sound of the preacher's voice as I sat, on still Sundays, way over there on the hillside; there was that proffered temperance pledge I never signed; my grandfather's good natured contempt of some church fold and their doings; his insistence that the spheres really had their music;

but his denial of the preacher's right to tell him how he must listen; his fearlessness as he spoke of these things just before he died;
these recollections welled up from the past.

96. He lived in Adrian, Mich.

He would tell his sponsees:

- 1) Learn to say "no."
- 2) Control your temper.
- 3) Set boundaries for yourself.
- 4) Don't feel sorry for yourself.
- 5) Don't hold two jobs.

As you can see by Number 5, he apparently thought trying to hold two jobs was worse than not getting a job at all, though of course he would have recommended that too.

We had a great funeral celebration for Vic in Adrian and I listed these items in my own tribute to him.

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] 5 MUSTS???

Someone said last night that in early AA there were 5 'musts' if you joined. One of them was get a job, does anybody know the rest of the list?

Thanx,

Moreover, although she said her illness was not cured but arrested, she expressed no fear of a relapse. And when I asked her to what she attributed the change, she ascribed it to Alcoholics Anonymous, an organization founded in 1934 by a former drunkard who had successfully reformed another habitual drinker. The organization now has nearly 400 chapters in the United States and Canada and claims a national membership of more than 15,000. Its members are not ashamed of having been sick and are so grateful for their own recovery that they try to help others, offering at their meetings friendship, counsel and guidance.

It was not only what Alcoholics Anonymous did for her but also what it has done for others which influenced Mrs. Mann to undertake her present work. Now, in addition to directing the activities of the national committee from its New York headquarters, she tours the country, giving lectures on the best ways to conquer alcoholism. "The alcoholic," she says, "is a sick person who can be helped and is worth helping. This is a public health problem. Apart from the economic aspect - for the alcoholic is an expense not only to himself and his family but also to the community at large - the humanitarian side is tremendously important.

"Our committee is endeavoring to teach the public that alcoholics must not be shunned but helped. We are getting local programs started throughout the country to make clear the basic facts about alcoholism, the need for a change in attitude towards those afflicted and the best methods for solving the problem through community action. We are assisting in the establishment of local committees, composed of representative citizens, which will act with our assistance in combating the evil.

"We are making available literature on the subject, explaining the treatment of the disease either at home or in clinics, and encouraging the transfer of alcoholics from jails to hospitals. A man should not be jailed for being drunk; he should be sent to a hospital to be cured.

"At the present time there are but two clinics for drunkenness in the entire country; yet alcoholism is as prevalent a disease as either tuberculosis or cancer and one that, rightly handled, is more easily treated. Our committee proposes to play the same part in fighting the disease as the tuberculosis committee does in its field. We are certain that when people in general become aware of the true state of affairs they will help in stamping out this evil. Do you realize that there are few places in the whole country with adequate facilities for the care and treatment of alcoholics?

"In the first place, alcoholism must be correctly diagnosed. One type is the symptom of an underlying mental ailment. This requires the care of a psychiatrist and will not yield to ordinary treatment for alcoholism. To cure it, the mental condition must be cured. On the other hand, so-called secondary alcoholism responds to simple re-education - that is, making the patient realize his illness and convincing him that his physical make-up is such that it is impossible for him to drink in moderation. This is the method employed by Alcoholics Anonymous. In some cases this re-education must be accompanied by either medical or psychiatric treatment and sometimes even by institutional care.

"Until the clinics are established with experts in charge, all drunkards will be handled in the same way, and there is little chance for their recovery. But in establishing these clinics we must watch one important thing: they must not be too closely allied with courts. They must be places no one need be ashamed to go to, places which do not brand the patients as lawbreakers. One of the principal aims of our committee is to encourage the establishment of such clinics throughout the country and to assist them with all the scientific data on the subject."

As she puffed a cigarette Mrs. Mann went on: "Alcoholism is like greatness. Some people are born alcoholics, some achieve alcoholism and others have alcoholism thrust upon them. I belong to the third class, for it was prohibition that did the thrusting.

"I was born in Chicago and my people were well-to-do. I had everything for which a girl could ask, including a year at school in Florence. When I came back to this country I was in many ways just like other girls in my set. The usual coming-out party, dances and other social events filled my life.

"But America's noble experiment was being tried out and decent young men thought it was smart to go around with hip flasks. In addition, they would take us girls to little places where they must be recognized through a peephole before being allowed to enter. I was young and happy and gay and I thought it great fun to take a drink.

"One thing I did not realize then - I did not learn it until years later - was that I, like three-quarters of a million others who are known and countless others who are not known, may be called allergic to alcohol. We are the unfortunates who are not immune to it. And there is no Schick test as there is for diphtheria, which can determine a person's immunity. One only finds out too late."

She went on to say that there are those who drink in moderation. They enjoy a certain release after a drink or two. Their tensions are eased and this, she believes, is a perfectly legitimate reason for their drinking. But they do not need to drink. A movie, a theatre or a visit to friends serves the same purpose.

As she continued her story it was hard to believe that she was talking about herself. She seemed calm and detached. There was humor in her talk and there was nothing of the "professional dry" in her manner. While apparently a certain emotional urge brought about her recovery. It was not accompanied by the jingle of tambourines or the "step-up-and-be-saved" shouts of the sawdust trail.

She told of her marriage a year after her debut and the discovery that her husband was an alcoholic. She does not blame him for her drinking, for she had the disease when she was married. But even his example did not stop her. Within a year she divorced him and drank more than ever. Then she went to England to get away from herself.

While she was there her family suffered financial reverses and she had to go to work. At first she became an interior decorator and later became associated with a photographic establishment. And all the time she kept drinking more and more to feel "normal."

"Of course," she said, "like all alcoholics, I made the usual excuses. I kept saying to myself that I could stop it if I wanted to, and I persuaded myself that I was drinking for business reasons. But I was miserable and finally I became convinced that I was going crazy. Strangely enough, I never once attributed my mental state to my drinking, but was sure that I was drinking to calm my nerves.

"Things got worse and worse. I became melancholic. Twice I tried suicide and finally one of my business associates insisted that I go to a sanitarium. I decided to return to America

"By this time I was a confirmed drunkard. For weeks I would stay in my room, too drunk to do anything but lie in bed. Even then I did not attribute my condition to drink. I was sure that it was my brain and that I would end my days in a mad house.

"Finally friends persuaded me to go to a sanitarium in Greenwich. I did not seem to improve much, but one day the doctor handed me a copy of 'Alcoholics Anonymous.' I glanced through it and became angry. I was not an alcoholic. This had nothing to do with me. So in a fit of temper I threw the book across the room. Then something happened which I cannot explain. The book lay open on the floor and as I picked it up my eyes lighted on the words, 'We cannot live with anger.' They attracted me and I sat down with it and began to read. I became interested and suddenly the truth swept over me. I was an alcoholic. I had an obsession of the mind coupled with an allergy of the body."

She wrote to Alcoholics Anonymous and began getting letters of encouragement from them. Then she came to New York to attend their meetings. "Here were decent people," she said, "all in the same boat as I. They did not look down on me nor did they lecture me. They did not say they were cured, but that their illness had been arrested. They did not touch liquor because they knew if they did they would become sick once more. They did not suggest that I sign a pledge. All they did was to advise me to promise myself that I would not drink for twenty-four hours and when the twenty-four hours were passed to make myself the same promise again."

Hi All

I'm getting skeptical on whether the "contempt prior to investigation" quote actually derives from Spencer. At the risk of falling into "contempt after investigation" there are a number of things that appear very odd.

1)

Given the wide academic study of Spencer (economics, theology, social Darwinism, etc.) it's very odd that the quotation's source cannot authentically be established. A reputable AA history web site has had a posting for several months trying to find the reference source.

Many of Spencer's works are on the web and easily searched for key words. After spending two days surfing the net I've come up empty handed. Google advanced search yields hundreds of hits but little information.

3) The hits do reveal that the quotation is widely cited in academic papers, on "recovery" sites, on AA history sites and in commercial advertisements (so little is sacred these days). There are wording variations but, in the main, the citation is as stated in the Spiritual Experience Appendix of the Big Book. Given the 23-24+ million copies of the Big Book that have been distributed, it's not all that surprising that the quotation is so widely known. The oddity though is that its authenticity seems to be premised on a work of AA rather than a work of Spencer. When cited, the quotation is universally attributed to Spencer. However, when a reference source is stated it is universally shown as the Big Book.

4) I've also looked at a number of "famous quotation" web sites. The "contempt prior to investigation" quote is not archived for attribution to Spencer (other than in sites where submissions are sent in by individual contributors who cite the Big Book as their source). This is very, very odd and adds to my skepticism of its factual attribution since it is such a profound and powerful quotation.

There is the possibility that the quotation might be in a piece of correspondence from Spencer rather than in a published work. I'd really love to get to the bottom of this one way or the other. It sure has my curiosity going. Is anybody having any success researching this?

Cheers

Arthur

I appreciate the answers I've received about the Herbert Spencer quotation. Jim Blair's reference to the Seldes quotation book seems close, but we don't have a real source from Spencer's works.

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Herbert Spencer

In response to Mel B's question on the quotation in the BB attributed to Herbert Spencer.

I read "Principles of Biology" twice and did not find the quote there.

I searched the reference books of quotations and found a book titled "The Great Quotations" by George Seldes (1960).

Listed under Herbert Spencer is the following quotation but it is not attributed to any of his works.

Note: that the wording is not the same as in the BB

"There is a principle which is a bar against all information, which is a proof against all argument, and which cannot fail to keep a man in everlasting ignorance—that principle is condemnation before investigation."

The search continues:)

am, back again, living a normal, happy married life in a Canadian town, loving and respecting that same man.

The average married woman, whose life has been free from the curse of alcohol, can never understand the humiliation, degradation and utter hopelessness of living with an alcoholic. It is a disease that isn't recognized until it has the victim so firmly in its grip that the chances for recovery, until recently, have been about hopeless.

Not only does this disease affect the physical health of the individual, but, worse still, it affects the brain to such an extent that everything becomes warped and the truth is not in him. It is pathetic and frustrating to see the man you love and whom your children adore gradually fall victim to an insidious disease which society considers only a weakness.

Years of pleading, of tears, of threats, were of no avail in the losing battle I waged against alcoholism, and it slowly destroyed everything I held dear.

It all began away back in the early 20s, in prohibition. Perhaps because "forbidden fruits are sweetest" many of our friends and my husband considered it was smart and clever to produce a bottle.

At first I didn't drink because I didn't like the taste of liquor, but when I began objecting to some of the silly antics it was suggested that I was narrow-minded, a prude, and so on. So, I, too, drank a little and found that when I did I was much more tolerant. I never drank much because it made me ill, and deep down I really hated it.

It wasn't long before occasional drinking parties in mixed company appeared to pall on my husband and some of his buddies. They found that they could drink much more without wives around to scold if they drank in their offices.

My husband had a very good position for a young man - manager of a branch business - and had a comfortable office in which he and his buddies would drink in comfort.

It was at this time I began to realize that liquor was beginning to rule my husband's life. Foolishly I scolded, resorted to tears, which only infuriated my husband when he was drunk. Then horrible words were flung at each other, unkind thoughtless things were said, and our love became a bit tattered around the edges.

Like all alcoholics, when my husband sobered up after a bad bout he would promise never to touch the stuff again, and really meant it, for he hated himself and the things he did when under the influence.

In those in-between periods we'd be so happy doing the things we enjoyed; hunting trips, picnics, driving over the countryside with the children. In that period of happiness I would begin to forget the humiliation of the past. But he was in the grip of something he could not control.

Strange as it may seem I never thought my husband would become involved with another woman. Perhaps it was because he never seemed to be interested in women, and I was often teased about this by his friends. They said, "You need never worry about Bill, he is not interested in any woman but you." This was flattering, but small comfort when I realized that, although he wasn't interested in other women, he had a mistress in a bottle who held first place in his life.

I am sure that if there had been no children I would have left my husband in those early days, but when you have small children you think twice about giving up a home and security.

Even though my husband drank to excess he still managed to do his work. His boss who visited our city periodically, were heavy drinkers too.

Then came the depression of the 30s. My husband's heavy drinking bills, the repairs to cars he wrecked and fines used up any spare money we could have saved. When our salary cut came it meant retrenching, but fast. At first it was a bitter blow, but somehow I thought, foolishly, this would mean that there would be nothing left over for alcohol. But the setback acted as a stimulant and he drank more than ever to forget the depression. I found myself avoiding the butcher, the grocer and the landlord, as we soon owed money to them all.

During this period our six year old son had to have an appendix operation. I shall never forget rushing him to the hospital late at night, and the kind neighbours who drove us, refusing my husband's request to get a bottle and bring it to the hospital for him. The doctor finally persuaded him that he could do no more good there and he was driven home where he proceeded to get drunk.

I stayed at the hospital, and it wasn't until 10 o'clock the next morning that my husband had sobered up enough to know whether the operation had been successful or not.

Finally, on Saturday, we agreed to meet at the hospital around 2:30 P.M. and have a long visit with our son. I got there at the appointed time and said that daddy would be along soon. Each time footsteps were heard in the corridor, our son would sit up and say, "I bet that's daddy now." Then the look of disappointment on his white little face was a knife twist in my heart. His dad didn't arrive and by 5:30 I had to return home, living in terror that my husband would visit the hospital drunk.

I arrived home worried and weary, and after getting dinner for the rest of the family began to feel a knot inside get tighter as the hours went by. Finally around 10:30 a neighbour phoned and asked me to come and take my husband home, as he was very drunk and was disrupting their party, which he had crashed earlier. After persuading him to return home I found I hated him and wished him dead.

I had long since learned it was useless to remonstrate with him when he was drunk and I tried to be calm and cool, but he would have none of this as he was in an ugly mood and spoiling for a fight. For several hours I listened to his drunken jargon and, finally, in disgust, I started to go to bed. This infuriated him, and he tried to prevent me from going upstairs. Then I struck him. He is a big man and could have crushed me with one blow, but he had never struck me in his life. This night he was a different person. He followed me upstairs, threatening with each step to strangle me for striking him. He yelled, "No one can hit me and get away with it. I'm going to wring your neck."

When we reached the top step I turned and faced him, saying, "There's my neck, strangle me if you wish, it will be one way of getting rid of you for the children's sake." He stared at me drunkenly, his eyes bloodshot and full of hate. Then he spat in my face, turned, and went downstairs.

He was still asleep in his clothes on the couch in the living room after he got up. Then he asked me if he had been obnoxious the night before as he couldn't remember anything from the time he had crashed the party next door.

He wouldn't believe the things I told him and accused me of making it up. Then he became contrite and asked forgiveness and a chance to prove that he could be a decent husband and father again.

I remember when I first realized that the respect in which I held my husband had been supplanted by contempt. He had been drinking very heavily and brought home some strangers late at night. He walked into our bedroom with them, introduced me as I lay blinking at the bright light, and cursed because I refused to get up and get them food. Following this, he went on the wagon, or so he said, for a week or so. Then we were invited to a party by friends who could throw business in my husband's direction.

Before we left home I asked him to watch his step and he agreed. I remember so well what he said: "You keep an eye on me dear, and when you think I have had enough just pinch my arm and I'll not have another drink."

After about an hour I noticed the usual signs: my husband tossing off large drinks too quickly, making repeated trips to the kitchen, our host eyeing him with suspicion. I quietly slipped to his side and gave him the warning pinch, looking into his eyes and silently pleading with him to go easy.

That pinch seemed to act with the suddenness of a match set to gasoline. My husband strolled over to the buffet where several bottles of whisky were open, calmly poured himself half a tumbler of straight whisky, then turning to catch my eye he tossed it off with an air of bravado.

I shall never forget the feeling of humiliation about half an hour and six drinks later when my hostess took me aside and asked me if I would take my husband home as he was spoiling her party.

Hundreds of such instances occurred during the next few years. Perhaps one of the reasons I stuck on was that deep down underneath I felt some miracle would happen, that basically he was a wonderful husband and father.

At last I got a position in a department store, working from 8:30 to 5:30. Our youngest child was now in school and I felt free to work. My husband lost his job and got another selling on commission.

One bitter experience occurred during the summer holidays when the children were home. My husband had been absent on a drinking bout for i about two days and nights. I had told him after the previous bout that if he repeated it again I would visit a lawyer and arrange a legal separation. He agreed. Yet he arrived home in the middle of the night so drunk that he fell into a stupor as soon as he hit the bed. As I lay there listening to his mutterings and snores, I hated him and actually wondered if I could press a pillow over his face and strangle him. It was such a temptation that I found myself trembling with fear.... and I got up and walked the floor the rest of the night.

He finally got a job in a factory at a low but steady salary, most of which went to pay the back rent. But the heavy drinking continued, partly, I think, to drown his humiliation and frustration.

When he lost the job in the factory after a few months, he decided that he would have to go away to battle it out himself. My health was suffering, not from the work I was doing but from - the worry he was causing. The children avoided him, and when he was sober he realized this and was more depressed. So the break was made.

No one can know the relief it was to be free of worry and the thought of him coming home drunk. A cloud had been lifted from our life; the children felt free to bring their friends around; and by watching every penny I was able, with some money my husband sent to me at odd intervals, to pay off some of the pressing debts.

We corresponded regularly and although his letters mentioned his private battle I knew he was trying. The cheques became more frequent and a little larger each time, so that we were able to face our creditors. However, I was gaining a feeling of independence; and the children were older, one of them working. My heart was numb as far as any feeling of affection for my husband was concerned.

I began hearing of his drunken exploits again, and it was then that I wrote and asked him for a legal separation. He knew I meant it this time. He wrote and asked for a little time to prove he could win his battle against alcohol. I agreed to three months, and the following week he wrote and said he had joined Alcoholics Anonymous. I had heard of this organization but didn't know very much about it, so I was quite skeptical. He wrote glowing letters of the work of A.A. and how he was endeavoring to learn more about it.

When he wrote, after six months, that he was coming home for Christmas I kept my fingers crossed and hoped.

We were delighted in the change in his appearance when he got down from the train. He was much thinner, had lost that alcoholic puffiness, his skin was clear and fresh. We talked for hours that evening about the therapy of A.A. and how it worked and I found my respect slowly returning. But I still had a deep fear I couldn't overcome.

After a few days, just a day or so before Christmas, he asked me if I had any wine or scotch in the house to serve friends. When I said I hadn't he remarked, "Don't worry about me, dear, those bottles are marked poison as far as I am concerned. Because I am allergic to alcohol, doesn't mean that normal drinkers can't handle it."

Fearful and trembling, I saw him come home the next day with a couple of bottles. It was with a sick heart that I saw him pour and serve it to our guests. But he didn't touch it, just quietly sipped a Coke. I couldn't believe it, and still had reservations. I knew he had fought a bitter battle, one of the hardest any man ever had to fight, and yet I wasn't convinced the victory wasn't permanent.

He returned to his job in another city and I carried on with my work. The children were happy with the change in their dad, but when his letters came suggesting we might become a family unit again, I rebelled. The children, now in their teens with the oldest faith in their father. But because I had lived my own life for so long I didn't want to give it up.

My husband had established himself in his own business by this time and was doing well, and working hard to help other alcoholics. If we were to live together again I would have to give up my job, my freedom, and set up a home in another city.

It wasn't an easy decision to make, but after listening to my husband, who had never been a religious man, tell me that he would never have won the battle had it not been for a Power Greater Than Himself. I knew he had won and for keeps.

As a member of Alcoholics Anonymous, my husband would strike out those last two words, "for keeps." It is against the principles of A.A. to say, "I'll never take another drink." They say instead, "I shall try not to take a drink TODAY."

I shall never forget the thrill of knowing that respect and love for my husband were slowly returning. I will never forget the night when he said, "Each morning before I get out of bed I ask for guidance and help through this day, and each night as I return to bed I say a grateful thanks."

Basic honesty, utter humility and a desire to help others is the foundation of a life of happy and contented sobriety, which I am now privileged to share.

The love and respect which I had thought lost forever have returned with a greater intensity and deeper meaning. Our children again love their father. I have no cause to regret that I came back to live with an alcoholic.

Isn't it odd how some quotations get into the public consciousness and we can never seem to pin them down?

Before Dave and I undertook to write the biography of Marty Mann, I was dragging my heels. I'm the primary writer, but I'd never tackled anything as overwhelming as a big book. It was that old bugaboo FEAR. Fear of failing, mostly. Dave had reassured me somewhat by promising to carry the research load, and I knew what a crackerjack he was. Still I wasn't convinced.

Then we heard a sermon by a friend. We have no recollection of the sermon's content, but one single sentence galvanized me: "God does not call the qualified; God qualifies the called." I got the message. My fears miraculously vanished, never to return. Two months later we were on the road with the first of several research roundtrips across the country.

We used the quotation from the sermon to introduce Part 2 of Marty's story because it so accurately described what happened to her. Dave made a routine phone call to the minister for permission to quote, and to inquire the source. Our friend had no idea where he'd heard it. So then Dave methodically began to search everywhere. Nothing. He did find variations of the quotation cropping up in all kinds of places, even gospel music, but no primary source. Finally, when major local libraries couldn't help, either, he was referred to a national research resource of librarians. Still nothing.

So that's where we had to leave the puzzle. Like the Spencer quote, ours was just out there in the ether. With our friend's permission, we used "his" quote. Someday someone may be able to enlighten us further. Maybe even one of you!!

While working at AA headquarters archives in the early '80's the Spencer quote source was often asked. Frank and I could never give an answer.

One of the great AA historians, Earl Husband, read every published piece by Spencer many years ago. He found no source.

I have a book called "The Great Quotations", published by The Citadel Press. It is a second paperback printing with copyrights 1960, 1966, 1983. The quote is a bit different than that stated at the end of Appendix II. In this book it states that the quote is attributable to Herbert Spencer but quotes it as; "...condemnation before investigation."

I don't have any idea what this means, only that there is a another published resource other than the Big Book. The fact that it is slightly different than what is in the big book makes me wonder where the author came up with the the quote. If he had taken it from the Alcoholics Anonymous book, it would devoted to the study and treatment of alcoholism, and it is manifested in such institutions as the School of Alcoholic Studies at Yale University and in numerous high- grade sanatoria and hospitals offering what the layman calls "the cure." But a growing number of pathological drunks get a flying start on the road to regeneration through Alcoholics Anonymous - "A.A.," as members of the organization refer to it.

Having been born in a home where temperance was actively preached and practiced, I grew up with the conviction that I would never touch liquor. I couldn't foresee high school, however, where I was catcher on the baseball team and left end on the football squad. My buddies were gay and carefree and considered "a couple of rounds" after a game quite manly. At first it was only a few beers; later we began mixing in a slug of whisky.

By the time I finished high school and went to work as a department store clerk I was a steady drinker. Before I ever reached 30, I became a travelling salesman, drinking with my customers and feeling that it made us chummy - that orders came easier. I drank at meals, at clubs, at banquets, in trains, in private homes - everywhere, in fact, except at home, where my wife would not permit liquor.

By a stroke of good fortune I was able to open my own department store in a medium-sized city. It prospered in spite of the fact that I was drifting from bad to worse. I cached supplies of whisky all over the store so I could get a "hooker" without running back to my office. I hid some in the advertising department, some in the receiving room, and more behind stocks on different floors. I was drinking as often as most people smoke cigarettes. If I didn't have a "snort" every hour or so, I'd get nervous and irritable.

At home our social life disintegrated. Not being able to depend on me, my wife stopped planning functions at home and gracefully rejected all invitations elsewhere. That made me feel I wasn't appreciated, that I was grossly misunderstood - a frustration that plunged me further and further into drink.

When the economic depression of the '30s descended, it seemed that all the forces in the world were conspiring against me. As business slumped, I worried, and the more I worried, the more I relied on drink. Every failure to stimulate sales had to be erased from my mind by alcohol.

My daily intake mounted to two quarts and more. I was hitting the bottle continuously, but I thought I was clever enough to conceal this fact from my employees, friends, and fellow Rotarians. Apparently I wasn't, though, because one day, February 8, 1942 - I'll never forget it - a prominent attorney and fellow Rotarian came to see me.

"Come over to the soda fountain and have a cup of coffee with me," he invited. I masked the shiver of revulsion that raced through me at the suggestion, but to be sociable I joined him.

"I want you to come over to my house tonight and meet some friends of mine," he said. "I think we can help you."

I stiffened. "Now look here," I snapped. "I don't need anybody's help, and I'll thank you to keep your nose out of my business."

He smiled indulgently. "You know, that's exactly what I said when I was invited to meeting a group of Alcoholics Anonymous."

You mean you're an A.A.?" I asked.

"Sure, the whole bunch at the house tonight will be. We've all had experiences like yours - and we've all, at some point, decided to quit making life so miserable for ourselves and everybody else. Why not come over and meet the boys and let them tell you about it? It can't do any harm and you're under no obligation to us. What do you say?"

I was staring into my coffee. My mind was whirring. It was true that I had vaguely realized my health couldn't forever withstand the abuse I was heaping on it, and many times when I thought of how unfair I was toward my wife, I caught myself feeling remorseful. And my business - it was skidding, almost out of control.

I forced a laugh as I turned to the attorney and with a feigned indifference said: "Yeah, sure, I'll come, if you insist. What can I lose?"

That night an amazing chain of events began. I went to that meeting breathing skepticism, disbelief, defiance. Like most alcoholics I nourished an inner feeling of exclusiveness, a kind of self-pitying smugness based on the false premise that my case was different, that no one else ever suffered the torments and disturbing influences that drove me to drink. But that group of seven A.A.'s made me feel as feeble as the winner of a booby prize at the Liars Club. They could match - and surpass - every drinking bout I ever had. Every reason I had advanced for drinking, they, too, had experienced. Then they offered others I never thought of.

As they talked I felt my defense crumbling. I began to recognize the sham of my previous rationalization. MY skepticism faded into acceptance; my disbelief turned to credence; my defiance melted into admiration. I thought: "If they could swear off, so can I."

"So when they told me that the only prerequisite for joining Alcoholics Anonymous was a sincere admission that alcohol had me whipped so completely my life had become unmanageable, I readily made that admission.

The very articulation of this truth seemed to sweep a great network of cobwebs out of my brain. Merely stating this fact, about which I had long tried to delude myself, was like opening a window in my mind and letting in a refreshing gust of clean, invigorating air. For the first time in years I sensed a gratifying relaxation course through my body.

Almost involuntarily I accepted an invitation to join A.A. I was made a member on the spot, and my new friends told me more about the way the organization works. I vowed, as I had vowed before, to quit drinking. But this time the circumstances differed. I had already achieved a state of intellectual humility and I had, in these A.A.'s, living proof that abstinence was possible. Moreover, I was too proud to let myself fail where they had succeeded - and I knew I could lean on them for help if I weakened.

As I fought to release myself from the grip of the obsession that enslaved me, I formed a clear picture of what was happening and what had happened to me during those 40 years of drinking. I was like a small boy passing a cemetery at night. Leaves rustle. His eyes pop and his hair stands on end. The wind shrieks eerily through the shrubs and he breaks into a run. The moving shadow of a swaying bush behind a tomb looks like a sinister zombie. The boy's feet sprout wings and he races frantically on. An owl hoots and he grows panicky trying to coax a few extra miles an hour out of his flying feet.

My rustling leaves, shrieking wind, moving shadows, and hooting owls had been business and social problems, feeling of inferiority, frustrations, worries over personal as well as business matters. To escape each new fear-inducing stimulus I gulped stronger and ever stronger draughts of liquor.

Now, I could see, I was imposing a sound, sensible procedure over this subconscious fear motivation. I had analyzed this 40-year flight from fear and knew the reasons for it. Bolstered by this knowledge, I could say convincingly to myself: "I am afraid no longer. I will stop running and take a deliberate step forward, then another and another. I will quiet this fluttering heart, stop perspiring, and walk out of this alcoholic cemetery with dignity."

That's the way it was. Looking back over my shoulder today and analyzing my salvage, I find that what happened after I joined Alcoholics Anonymous became a story of four parts. Here is the way it developed:

Part I: I admitted to myself my bondage to liquor and my inability to manage my life. This psychological broom swept the dust of deceit and delusion from my mind, preparing it for a readjustment. In a religious sense this was the act of repentance.

Part II: According to A.A. formula, I made a moral inventory of myself and acknowledged my shortcomings and faults to at least one other person. The pious will recognize this as an application of the principle of public confession. To the psychologist it amounts to bringing social influence to bear. Thus, having unfurled his faults publicly, the candidate's conduct will reap either social approval or censure. And being a vain creature, man strains mightily for approbation.

Part III: A.A. built a foundation of confidence and hope under me by showing me that the liquor habit could be conquered, for every member of this organization was persistent proof that others had won out. That victory was forged by a combination of my own will and outside help, both human and divine. Help was always forthcoming from other A.A.'s themselves, of course. This is one of the strongest pillars in the A.A. structure. Whenever a man feels himself slipping, he calls another member for help.

Part IV: This is the crux of the whole program. The first three parts set the stage; in Part IV the act begins. "Act" is the word, for the principle upon which A.A. works is that the alcoholic must do more than want to quit drinking. He must do something - right now! I am told that this is the practical application of the James -Lange psychological theory, which states that in the formation of habit, one first articulates a desire and then immediately translates that mental intention into physical action. By constantly reinforcing the mental impulse with physical activity, the individual establishes new behavior patterns.

All right, but what does one do? Well, it doesn't matter very much. It might take the form of going for a walk, of taking a drink - of water - or even reducing the number of drinks taken each day. As a follow-up of the Part II moral inventory, action can be taken to make amends to injured people whenever possible. If you've mistreated your wife, you might bring her some flowers or candy; if, when drinking, you've habitually growled at the neighbors, you might stop and say a kind word; if you've gone into debt, you might pay off these obligations - and so on.

And then, after you've won your victory, you have the never- ending opportunity of helping new members, which enables you continuously to reinforce your desire to stop drinking by doing something for another alcoholic. Only one who has himself been through the same experience can administer the proper mixture of sympathy and discipline to pull a patient through trying hours.

Phenomenal though its record is, A.A. does not guarantee to cure an alcoholic's predilection for liquor. About half recover immediately and another 25 percent make it after a relapse or two. Since 1934, when it was founded by a New York broker and an Akron, Ohio, physician, about 25,000 alcoholics have become members of A.A. They are banded together in nearly 900 groups in the United States, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand.

Just to clear up a few points often misunderstood, I'd like to emphasize that we are not prohibitionists. Our sole object is to remove the temptation of that first drink from those who cannot take just one or two and stop there. Many of us actually serve liquor in our homes; yet when we ourselves raise our glasses in toast, ours are filled with soft instead of hard drinks. Another and have made me the spokesman for their program.

The other group has not appointed me. The other group is not organized. It frequently does not know there is a group.

These prisoners that I spoke of are the alcoholics of America, three million strong.

Many of them are unaware of their own condition; are unaware of its nature; and are unaware that there is anything whatsoever to do about it.

They did not need to appoint men; I belong to that group. I myself shared their condition of being a prisoner until the truth made me free.

First, I wish to speak to you on behalf of the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism. Later, I am going to speak to you on behalf of that other group who needs our help.

The National Committee for Education on Alcoholism is exactly what its name implies. Our objectives are implicit in that title. We are interested solely in giving the public the true facts about alcoholism, its nature and treatment, in order that they may have the weapons of knowledge with which to effect a solution of this terrible and growing problem. We are not dealing here with a minor problem. We are dealing with what an Assistant Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service has rightly called "Our greatest unsolved public health problem." It is not unsolved because it is a new problem. Indeed, it has been with us from the beginning of time. It remains unsolved because it is a problem we have never faced. It is something we have never even discussed. The majority of people in their ignorance and fear scarcely admit of its existence. Alcoholism has for too long been a taboo subject; just as tuberculosis used to be forty years ago. It has been hidden under a dark cloud of stigma, made darker by fear of that stigma. Any child can tell you that no problem can be solved by refusing to recognize its existence. Equally true is the fact that no problem can be solved while unaware of its nature.

Many groups have been concerned for many years with the beverage alcohol. Millions of words spoken and written on behalf of hundreds of organizations have dealt with this. In the last analysis this concern has resolved itself into a violent tug of war between the "wets" and the "drys." In that tug of war it has been said that the alcoholic has been the rope - and that rope has become badly frayed. No organization until very recently has concerned itself with the plight of the alcoholic or the nature of his dilemma. That is where the National Committee comes in.

The National Committee is not concerned with the problem of beverage alcohol. We take no side in that ancient tug of war. We state flatly in fact that this organization, the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism and all of its affiliated Committees - eighteen of them at this date - are neither "wet" nor "dry." We go further. We state that this organization shall not concern itself in any activities designed to promote or prevent the sale or consumption of alcoholic beverages. Our concern is with a disease called alcoholism and its victims, those hapless, suffering human beings who are known as alcoholics.

We recognize, as did others concerned with the problem of alcoholism, that practically nothing was known by the general public of this disease. We realize that because of this lack of knowledge, the public attitude ranged from utter ignorance, through apathy and indifference, up to prejudice and active antagonism. The public attitude reflects not only a total lack of factual knowledge, but the presence of a mass of misinformation and falsehoods. Out of this attitude has grown the type of treatment which the citizens of these United States have given and still give to that segment of the population -their helpless fellow citizens - who suffer from this illness. I think you all know what that treatment is as well as I do. It is hostile, contemptuous, and punitive. It is completely without understanding and often without pity.

In most cities in this country there is nowhere to put the alcoholic who is in the throes of this deadly malady, excepting the local jail. We, as a nation, are not wont to treat our sick in this fashion. We are not cruel and barbarous. We are not medieval. We pride ourselves on being enlightened, and we are, on the whole, a kind people. And yet to a great body of very sick human beings we offer only punishment for their illness. We behave as if we were still in the Middle Ages.

This situation must be changed. It is our belief that it will be changed when the public is placed in possession of the facts. That is the challenging task which we have accepted. We wished to make these facts as simple and understandable as possible that they might be understood by every man, woman and child in this country. In order to do that, we adopted three simple concepts which are printed on each piece of our literature, and which our speakers reiterate over and over again throughout the cities of this land. They are simple, these concepts, but they are revolutionary in content., for they embody an attitude which is exactly the opposite to that shown by our actions in the past, and I am afraid I must add, in the present. We believe that when these concepts are accepted into the thinking of the people of America a change in their actions must result. We believe that repetition will help to implant these concepts in the mind of the public, and so they are embodied - in fact, they form the basis of every talk that is given on behalf of the National Committee. The three concepts are as follows:

One, Alcoholism is a disease and the alcoholic is a sick person.

Two, the alcoholic can be helped and is worth helping.

Three, alcoholism is a public health problem and therefore, a public responsibility.

Perhaps these do not appear revolutionary on the surface, but stop and think of the associations we all have been taught to have with the words disease and sickness. We know, for instance, that disease is no respecter of persons; it can strike anywhere, high or low, rich or poor, men or women. We do not punish sick people for being sick; we treat them. We go to great lengths to establish treatment facilities and they are the pride of our communities. We do not blame sick people for their condition, even when, as often happens, it is brought on by ignorance or carelessness or both. Once they are sick, however this came about, we want them to have the kind of treatment that will help them to get well. It would never occur to us to put a man with malaria in jail - as if to say to him, "you see what this does to you - now let that be a lesson to you and don't let it happen again." We know that he is sick, he is rarely capable of self-treatment. We know that he needs help - to overcome his illness. Put these simple associations beside our behavior toward those sick people who are sick with alcoholism and you will see how revolutionary that concept is.

The fact that alcoholism is a disease has been known to science for over 150 years. Many great Americans of the last century recognized this fact, although it was an English doctor who wrote the first modern treatise on the diagnosis and treatment of the disease of alcoholism in 1778.

Our own Connecticut Medical Society recognized alcoholism as a disease requiring special treatment and hospitals for that treatment in a resolution it presented to the Connecticut State Legislature in 1830. I myself was ashamed when I learned these things, and yet it was not my fault, for I had never been taught any such facts. Just the same, it is curious, is it not, that scientific facts well known to science over such a long period should never have become common knowledge? The normal gap, they tell me, between a scientific discovery and its acceptance by the public, before which of course, it cannot be of real use, is twenty years. Why should this gap be so extended? We are late in starting, but we are trying desperately to bridge that gap as speedily and as effectively as possibly now. This, in short, is our primary objective.

Our second concept, that the alcoholic can be helped and is worth helping is a statement that could not have been made even ten years ago from a public platform, because it could not have been proved. Although there have always been alcoholics who got well by one means or another and walked among us as normal human beings, they dared not mention what the nature of their illness had been. The stigma which had been attached to alcoholism was so great that if people knew the truth, these recovered alcoholics might have jeopardized their whole future - their jobs, their family relationships, their places in society, everything that makes life most dear. Not until the creation of Alcoholics Anonymous twelve years ago was there any change in the situation.

Then for the first time, alcoholics began to get well in numbers. They were banded together in groups and together they had the strength to face the hostile world and to talk of this illness from which they had recovered. They talked so that other alcoholics might learn the truth about their condition, and seek help. Their voices were heard. Today, Alcoholics Anonymous numbers more than 30,000 active members; well and happy people; prosperous citizens who have returned to their places in their communities; who are assets - no longer liabilities. These people make good citizens -these same people, who a few years ago were a stone around the neck of everyone who knew them; A care and a burden and a terrible cost to themselves, their families, their employers and their communities. Liabilities in every sense, they represented not only appalling economic waste, but also the most terrible human waste; heartbreak, broken homes and tragedies of very sort. Yet today they are assets. They can be seen and they are known for their accomplishments throughout the length and breadth of the land. They are the living proof of the second concept. No one any longer can say as I myself once said and as we all were taught, that the drunkard is a bum for whom there is no hope because there is something vital missing in him - he has no willpower, no character - or he would not let himself get that way. These people know that they have a disease of which they need be no more ashamed than if they happened to have diabetes or T.B. On the contrary, they can be proud of the fact that in spite of suffering from a progressive and often fatal malady for which there is no absolute cure, they have learned how to arrest their illness so that they can lead normal, healthy, happy lives.

Our last concept, that this is a public health problem and therefore, a public responsibility, follows inevitably upon acceptance of the other two. This is our job, yours and mine, as citizens and as human beings. We, the people, create public attitudes - and we can change them. Our first job is to change this attitude, for until that is done alcoholics and their families will not seek help. The majority of the estimated 3,000,000 alcoholics in this country fall into the category of what I call the hidden alcoholic. These are usually people who have some family left, and that family will go to any lengths to see that no one knows that the stigma of alcoholism has struck in their midst. In their opinion, the shame and degradation of having this fact become common knowledge far outweighs the welfare of the alcoholic. The alcoholic is "protected," hidden from view, but actually he is prevented from getting help. Not until the stigma is removed and alcoholism is discussed as freely and openly as any other illness, will these people dare to seek help. We must remove this stigma if we are to save thousands from unnecessary deaths.

But we must do more than this, for in many cases there will be no facilities for the treatment of some of these people. All of them may not be suitable for A.A. All of them may not be willing or ready to accept that particular method of treatment, and there are other methods which have also helped alcoholics back to normal life; psychiatry, lay therapy, the conditioned reflex treatment. Unfortunately the last three are both long and expensive - too often beyond the reach of the alcoholic and his family.

Nevertheless each method has its record of success. None of these methods are infallible. And in this illness it has been found that on occasion a combination of several methods of treatment will sometimes succeed in the most difficult and apparently hopeless cases.

So our efforts cannot stop with a mere change in public opinion. We must organize to change the conditions which that public opinion has brought about. We must see to it that there are other places than jails in which to put these sick people when they are in the delirium of their sickness - acute intoxication. We must set up information centers where individuals and family and friends - agencies that are forced to handle their problems - doctors and ministers who usually see more of it than anyone else -- can go to get the facts on the disease itself, and on the facilities available in that area for its treatment. These centers must ceaselessly carry on an intensive campaign of education in their communities, aimed at uncovering more and more hidden alcoholics and also at providing an environment of enlightened understanding in which the process of recovery will be possible.

Every community will find that there are not many facilities other than the local group of A.A. about which they can give information; and yet other facilities will be needed. Therefore, these organized groups (which we must call local committees of the National Committee) must next undertake the difficult task of persuading general hospitals to open beds for the treatment of alcoholics in the acute stage. This I might add, is a matter of crisis - of extreme emergency - in which the lack of immediate medical treatment all too frequently causes death. Next, they will need a clinic for diagnosis and treatment and later they will need rest centers for those who require long-term care.

It is no longer necessary to say that we believe - we can now say that we know that this program of community action is a beginning toward the solution of this problem which is so appalling in its devastation and waste. We can say we know because we already have eighteen such affiliated committees operating in eighteen cities throughout the country, and the progress they report is more than encouraging. It has convinced us that we can solve the problem of alcoholism in America - and we will.

Now I can go back to my regular method of speaking. I am strictly an extemporaneous speaker; I am not used to reading a speech; but with all the national hook-ups on the radio, I thought I had better.

I want to talk to you a little bit now about the second group which I said I represented. The unnamed, the nameless, the alcoholics. I would say that perhaps ninety per cent of them have no idea what their trouble is. You know, the alcoholic is a part of the public. The attitude that I have described to you which the public holds is shared in by those people who suffer from this illness. I can tell you this from my own experience. I had never heard the word alcoholic; I had never heard the word alcoholism. Of course, I had heard of drunkards; everybody has. I also knew or thought I knew what a drunkard was. He was that unfortunate person that one saw if one went to the less pretty part of town, shuffling about in rags, bearded, unwashed, sleeping in doorways, in gutters, sticking out filthy hands for a dime for a cup of coffee and you hoped he wouldn't touch you.

If I had given any thought to the subject I would have described that person as a person who had never had a chance, or the opportunity to know the normal way of life, and who, if he had been born to better things, had something missing, something that made him unable to take advantage of his opportunities. I would have said that there was nothing that could be done about it, and if there was he wouldn't be worth salvaging as there wasn't anything there in the first place.

I might have conceded that there were a few localized cases in which some terrible tragedy had driven the person to drink - to drown his sorrows in drink, but I actually that was pretty well confined to the pages of romance literature. That is all I knew about it.

I think you will understand then that when this thing began to happen to me it was simply not possible for me to identify myself with that picture. How could someone with my background, with my upbringing, with my education, how could someone like that have this happen. Oh, no, it couldn't happen here.

Another thing I knew (and anyone who knew me could testify) was that I had been afflicted with a little too much of that commodity known as will power, in my case called willful. I had always gotten what I went out for. I had achieved quite a bit in my life. I had never suffered from any lack of will power or lack of character either. And those attributes were not a part of the picture that I had. This person, this drunkard, had no will power, no spine, no backbone, no character.

When these things began to happen to me, it had to be something else, it could not be that. It had to be some terrible mental collapse since, obviously, I could not even look in that direction. I could not say, "this is me."

There you have the problem with a great many of the alcoholics. How can they admit to this thing with their perverted and prevalent conception of what this thing is? How can a man who still has a job or has only just lost his job through drinking come out openly and say: "I am a drunkard; I have no will power; I have no character; I am a bum?" He isn't and knows he isn't. He is faced with the same dilemma in which I found myself. Why is it that my will power is so strong on every- thing else and has no effect on drinking. Why can't I answer when my friends say to me, "Why can't you be like other people and drink sensibly," "Why can't you drink like so and so; I made every effort to take one or two and stop; but it was just like butting my head against a stone wall.

That wall was the wall of ignorance and the wall of prejudice. It nearly killed me, and it is killing other alcoholics every day. If we can break that wall down we can reach these people and we can help these people. A program of community action such as I described briefly will do that job. In every one of the cities where this program is in action more and more alcoholics come forward and ask for help. In every city where we have information centers they are coming and asking for this information and their families and friends and employers are coming. They are all asking, "What is this thing, alcoholism," "What can we do about it;" "Where can we go in this city for help?" And centers that have been established and the members of the Committee that set up those centers are aware of their needs and they have the answers for them: what hospitals will take alcoholics; are there any in the community; can we persuade them to take alcoholics in; can we at long last provide something for these desperately sick people. Can we provide medical treatment that will prevent their deaths? Yes, we can, and we must.

I want to establish here before I leave Detroit such a Committee as has already been started. I want to see the attempt made at community action. I believe that it can succeed and I believe that when all of these cities in this Country put this plan into action we will see in front of us the possibility of controlling the disease of alcoholism.

The thing we are attempting to do is not so very difficult - it is not very different from what we had to do on a national scale forty years ago with T.B. That was the primary killer then; that was the stigma then; that was the thing that no family would admit to having. They were so careful that no one should know, that people with T.B. died like flies from lack of treatment. Then an intensified campaign was put on...of education and the setting up of proper facilities. Now the White Plague T.B. is at last under control and we no longer regard it as the stigma it was. We can do the same for alcoholism but we must put not only moral support but financial support behind this effort. We must see that these things are done that will repay us a thousand fold.

I know by virtue of my own position as an alcoholic thousands of men and women who have recovered from this illness. I can assure you from my personal experience that these people make better than average citizens. It is as if they felt they had to make up for lost time. They put themselves into things with twice the amount of energy of anyone else. They work harder at it and they give more of themselves. These people are well worth saving and yet today we are allowing them to die right and left.

We know, for instance, that every year 12,000 people die with alcoholism put on their death certificates as the primary or secondary cause of death. We know also that that must be but a fraction of the actual deaths for we know that wherever the family is still there they will go to any lengths to see that those grim words are not put on the death certificates. These people do not need to die. That great loss that you heard Dr. Jellinek describe does not need to go on. All of this unnecessary waste we can stop. We can stop it first, by changing our own attitude, next by trying to change the attitude of everyone else we know, presenting them with these simple concepts, asking them to think them over and then to act on them. We can top it by setting up Committees such as I have described and by making great efforts to provide facilities for our cities. Those are the steps we need to take; those are the steps I hope you will take here.

My visit to Detroit has not been just to speak to you gentlemen, as great as that pleasure has been and deeply as I feel the honor of appearing before you as a woman. I understand that is a very rare occasion here. The real purpose of my visit is to put a piece of dynamite under those who are already interested and try to arouse interest in the rest of you to put into effect a program of community action.

It wouldn't do much good if I came and went and you talked about it for a few days and then other concerns came up and you forgot about it. No, We want something to go on; we want continuity in the program; we want results.

I am convinced that we can have in Detroit our most effective Committee for Education on Alcoholism if all of you present will help out.

Life Membership

Medicine Column

The organization of ex-drinkers known as Alcoholics Anonymous last week was rounding out its twelfth year. Taking stock, it found that it had 35,000 members and 1,200 chapters (including outposts in Canada and Latin America). It was picking up new members at the rate of 1,000 a month. In the last few months, A.A.'s stock among doctors and an estimated 750,000 U.S. alcoholics had climbed fast.

AA. was founded twelve years ago by a still-anonymous Manhattan stockbroker, known only as Bill, and an alcoholic Akron doctor. The organization has no officers, no dues, no big funds (its small Manhattan headquarters last year spent only $35,000, donated by members). Pledged to help other alcoholics,

Second Lieut. Bill W. didn't think twice when the first butler he had ever seen offered him a drink. The 22-year-old soldier didn't think about how alcohol had destroyed his family. He didn't think about the Yankee temperance movement of his childhood or his loving fiance Lois B. or his emerging talent for leadership. He didn't think about anything at all. "I had found the elixir of life," he wrote. Bill's last drink, 17 years later, when alcohol had destroyed his health and his career, precipitated an epiphany that would change his life and the lives of millions of other alcoholics. Incarcerated for the fourth time at Manhattan's Towns Hospital in 1934, Bill had a spiritual awakening--a flash of white light, a liberating awareness of God--that led to the founding of Alcoholics Anonymous and Bill's revolutionary 12-step program, the successful remedy for alcoholism. The 12 steps have also generated successful programs for eating disorders, gambling, narcotics, debting, sex addiction and people affected by others' addictions. Aldous Huxley called him "the greatest social architect of our century."

William (Bill) G. W. grew up in a quarry town in Vermont. When he was 10, his hard-drinking father headed for Canada, and his mother moved to Boston, leaving the sickly child with her parents. As a soldier, and then as a businessman, Bill W. drank to alleviate his depressions and to celebrate his Wall Street success. Married in 1918, he and Lois toured the country on a motorcycle and appeared to be a prosperous, promising young couple. By 1933, however, they were living on charity in her parents' house on Clinton Street in Brooklyn, N.Y. Bill had become an unemployable drunk who disdained religion and even panhandled for cash. Inspired by a friend who had stopped drinking, Bill went to meetings of the Oxford Group, an evangelical society founded in Britain by Pennsylvania Frank Buchman. And as Bill underwent a barbiturate-and-belladonna cure called "purge and puke," which was state-of-the-art alcoholism treatment at the time, his brain spun with phrases from Oxford Group meetings, Carl Jung and William James' "Varieties of Religious Experience," which he read in the hospital. Five sober months later, Bill W. went to Akron, Ohio, on business. The deal fell through, and he wanted a drink. He stood in the lobby of the Mayflower Hotel, entranced by the sounds of the bar across the hall. Suddenly he became convinced that by helping another alcoholic, he could save himself. Through a series of desperate telephone calls, he found Dr. Robert S., a skeptical drunk whose family persuaded him to give Bill W. 15 minutes. Their meeting lasted for hours. A month later, Dr. Bob had his last drink, and that date, June 10, 1935, is the official birth date of A.A., which is based on the idea that only an alcoholic can help another alcoholic. "Because of our kinship in suffering," Bill wrote, "our channels of contact have always been charged with the language of the heart." The Burnham house on Clinton Street became a haven for drunks. "My name is Bill W., and I'm an alcoholic," he told assorted houseguests and visitors at meetings. To spread the word, he began writing down his principles for sobriety. Each chapter was read by the Clinton Street group and sent to Smith in Akron for more editing. The book had a dozen provisional titles, among them "The Way Out" and "The Empty Glass." Edited to 400 pages, it was finally called "Alcoholics Anonymous," and this became the group's name. But the book, although well reviewed, wasn't selling. Bill W. tried unsuccessfully to make a living as a wire-rope salesman. A.A. had about a hundred members, but many were still drinking. Meanwhile, in 1939, the bank foreclosed on the Clinton Street house, and the couple began years of homelessness, living as guests in borrowed rooms and at one point staying in temporary quarters above the A.A. clubhouse on 24th Street in Manhattan. In 1940 John D. Rockefeller Jr. held an A.A. dinner and was impressed enough to create a trust to provide Bill W. with $30 a week--but no more. The tycoon felt that money would corrupt the group's spirit. Then, in March 1941, The Saturday Evening Post published an article on A.A., and suddenly thousands of letters and requests poured in. Attendance at meetings doubled and tripled. Bill W. had reached his audience. In "Twelve Traditions," Bill set down the suggested bylaws of Alcoholics Anonymous. In them, he created an enduring blueprint for an organization with a maximum of individual freedom and no accumulation of power or money. Public anonymity ensured humility. No contributions were required; no member could contribute more than $1,000. Today more than 2 million A.A. members in 150 countries hold meetings in church basements, hospital conference rooms and school gyms, following Bill's informal structure. Members identify themselves as alcoholics and share their stories; there are no rules or entry requirements, and many members use only first names. Bill W. believed the key to sobriety was a change of heart. The suggested 12 steps include an admission of powerlessness, a moral inventory, a restitution for harm done, a call to service and a surrender to some personal God. In A.A., God can be anything from a radiator to a patriarch. Influenced by A.A., the American Medical Association has redefined alcoholism as a chronic disease, not a failure of willpower. As Alcoholics Anonymous grew, Bill W. became its principal symbol. He helped create a governing structure for the program, the General Service Board, and turned over his power. "I have become a pupil of the A.A. movement rather than the teacher," he wrote. A smoker into his 70s, he died of pneumonia and emphysema in Miami, where he went for treatment in 1971. To the end, he clung to the principles and the power of anonymity. He was always Bill W., refusing to take money for counseling and leadership. He turned down many honors, including a degree from Yale. And he declined this magazine's offer to put him on the cover--even with his back turned.

embarrassing questions...They just seemed like real friendly guys."

These revealing remarks are quoted in a vivid article in the January-March issue of Federal Probation, "I Think You Guys Mean It," written anonymously by another member of the organization who is a lawyer and the editor of a national magazine, as well as editor of The Grapevine, the A.A.'s own publication. The article describes the A.A. program for probationers, prison inmates and parolees who are problem drinkers. A.A. chapters have been established in more than thirty penal and correctional institutions. Meeting once a week in groups of thirty or forty, under the supervision of prison authorities and chapter members, inmates hear talks by visiting A.A. members, and are encouraged to ask questions, make suggestions, and join in the discussion. New members are carefully screened to make sure of their sincere desire to stop drinking.

In A.A.'s work with alcoholic probationers, the prisoner is placed on probation to an A.A. "sponsor," who is responsible for his supervision. The sponsor introduces him to a local A.A. clubhouse, and goes with him to regular meetings. The new member is made to feel that he "belongs" to the group and is "one of the family."

Now in its thirteenth year, A.A. has 1,200 chapters including outposts in Canada and Latin America, and is winning about 1,000 new members a month, according to the February issue of Time. Supported by donations from members, it has no offices, no dues, no big funds. Members are pledged to help all other alcoholics, but give assistance only when called upon. Anonymity is an important rule of the organization, in order that new members may be encouraged to join.

Of its members, some 50 per cent have stopped drinking entirely after joining, 25 per cent have succeeded after one or two slips. By contrast, all but 5 per cent of alcoholics were formerly considered hopeless of cure, according to the Time report.

Yale Plan

Hopeful news for the nations alcoholics, who now number an estimated 750,000, is the success of the Yale Plan Clinic at Yale University. Eighty percent of those who continue through the full period of treatment at the clinic recover, Dr. Howard W. Haggard, Yale physiologist, declared recently in an address before the Washington Committee for Education on Alcoholism.

The clinic is operated on an out-patient basis, with a small staff consisting of a psychiatrist, a social worker, a secretary, and a part time physician. Hospital facilities of near-by hospitals are utilized when necessary.

The small cost of the treatment given at this clinic - averaging $68 a case - is stressed in an article in Wisconsin Welfare, written in support of this become drunk and disorderly, be hauled into jail in a stupor, or wildly belligerent, or just plain sick, and they will be thrown into a cell until they are sober enough to appear in court for a new sentence. And the circle will go round and round until they are dead.

For these men are victims of alcoholism, one of the most vicious diseases known to mankind. And neither they nor anyone with whom they come in contact have any hope for them. Coming from almost any walk of life, they have "hit bottom" as a result of a progressive disease from which some 4,000,000 Americans are currently suffering.

Alcoholism is one of those major diseases that have been nourished by ignorance, misunderstanding and stigma - long the protectors of venereal disease, cancer, and tuberculosis. If it is to be effectively attacked in the communities where alcoholics undergo their rounds of binges, terror, and agonized awakening, the stigma and misunderstanding surrounding it must be lifted. Only then will the "hidden alcoholics" - family skeletons in the closet - come forward and ask for help or be brought forward by their relatives, and only then will community leaders take an active interest in seeing that the proper facilities are available to them.

Happily some dramatic developments within the past fifteen years indicate that the negative attitudes which have long blacked out hope for the alcoholic may gradually be eliminated. Happily, too, these developments augur well for a shift in interest from an emotional controversy over liquor control to a concern for the alcoholic as a suffering human being.

Down through the centuries people have taken sides for or against drinking with a frenzy equaled only by their reactions to politics or religion. But the alcoholic was lost in the turmoil. Those against drinking saw the tragedies of alcoholism and wanted to abolish alcohol. It was a though persons with a knowledge of the discomforts of diabetes were to start a movement to abolish sugar. Those who believed in the freedom to drink fought hard for their freedom and looked down on the man without "self-control." And in "wet" periods or "dry" periods the alcoholic drank and suffered.

Shortly following repeal of the Prohibition Amendment, the air began to clear. A recognition dawned that alcoholism or addictive drinking, is not synonymous with drinking or even drunkenness; that only a fraction of those who drink become alcoholics; but that this fraction is large enough to represent one of the major public health problems in the United States; and that something must be done about it. For the first time attention began to be diverted from alcohol to the alcoholic. Today voluntary groups, states and municipalities throughout the country are working out programs to help the alcoholic get out of his vicious circle of drunkenness, aching sobriety, and drunkenness, into satisfactory, useful living.

WHILE THE MAJORITY of our 4,000,000 alcoholics still swim in a sea of hopelessness, more and more ropes are being thrown them by groups with a conscientious awareness of their responsibility to help. Among these are self-help groups of former alcoholics; community committees which are setting up information centers, clinics and hospital facilities for alcoholics; research scientists doubling their efforts to learn more about this disease; and enlightened government agencies which are beginning to recognize its public health aspects.

The question of whether or not alcoholism is a disease is still in dispute among some of the groups doing most to combat it, but the dispute boils down to one of semantics, for all are agreed on a single concept: that alcoholism - chronic excessive drinking, characterized by distinctive behavior patterns - is not caused by alcohol alone, but by more or less mysterious psychological disturbances incompatible with the presence of alcohol. The end result is an intolerance toward alcohol as permanent and incurable as the diabetic's intolerance toward sugar. Just as the diabetic must abjure sweets, the alcohol must abstain from alcohol. One drink will lead him to a disaster.

The basic cause is unknown. There may be one or many, and scientists are searching vigorously for clues. Their researches have brought forth the fact that there are many types of alcoholics, variously amenable to treatment. The most reliable statistics indicate that of 65,000,000 drinkers in the United States, 4,000,000 are chronic excessive drinkers - borderline or actual alcoholics. These have been broken down into problem drinkers, compulsive drinkers of primary and secondary types, social misfits and psychotic drinkers. Of these 4,000,000 inebriates, 750,000 are chronic alcoholics or persons whose drinking has resulted in diagnosable physical or psychological deterioration.

THE MOVEMENT TO EXTEND PRACTICAL help to alcoholics sprouts from several seeds, all planted at about the same time. The two with the most dramatic growth were sown independently in different places in the same year. That year, a red letter one for alcoholics, was 1935.

One seed was planted in Akron, Ohio by two habitual drunks. One was a doctor, the other a broker, both of some distinction before alcohol addiction began to ruin their careers and threaten to break up their homes. Intelligent men, they fought hard, but without much success, until they managed to get together in a sober interval. Then they decided that one drunk might help another. Out of this idea grew the now famous Alcoholics Anonymous. In a year's time these two former inebriates had not only achieved continuous sobriety for themselves, but had helped others to the same goal. Today the organization they started has some 85,000 members in 2,400 chapters throughout the country.

The entire membership is composed of alcoholics fighting desperately to help each other stay away from the substance that is poison to them. Many of the members have not touched a drop since they became A.A.'s Others have slipped from time to time, but have returned to the organization to keep up the fight.

Some former members have sunk back into the mire of perpetual drunkenness. But Alcoholics Anonymous, which maintains that 75 percent of its members have achieved sobriety, is generally conceded to present the most widely successful attempt at alcoholic rehabilitation in this country's history. Statistics on "success" are unreliable, for a man who is sober today may be drunk tomorrow - even though his sobriety has lasted over a number of years. Nevertheless, doctors, scientists, social workers, clergymen, public health experts, suffering relatives, and others who have had to deal with alcoholics, have watched the A.A.'s achievements with amazement.

The other seed was planted in New Haven, Connecticut, by two scientists, Dr. Howard Haggard and Dr. Leon A. Greenberg. Director and associate respectively, of the Yale University Laboratory of Applied Physiology, they were carrying on research in the effects of alcohol on the human body. This led them into an awareness of alcoholism as a phenomenon distinct from normal drinking or occasional drunkenness. As they continued their studies they realized that alcoholism could not be studied in a test tube, that too many factors involving disciplines other than physiology were concerned. Accordingly they raised the money to enlarge their staff to include sociologists, psychiatrists, psychologists, economists, and medical men. Today the laboratory's section on alcohol is larger than all the rest of its sections combined and heads up the program of research, education, and treatment that has come to be known the country over as the Yale Plan on Alcoholism.

From these two seeds have emerged the present sturdy sprouts of public and community concern. The A.A. experience has created a growing awareness of the fact that alcoholics are not "weak-willed" or "immoral," but people who need and can respond to the proper kind of help. In a twelve-point program chiefly emphasizing insight, fellowship, work for others, and spiritual faith, A.A. has wrought miracles that no amount of pleading, threats, shame, cajolery or punishment has ever been able to effect. Simultaneously, the Yale Plan has brought to light scientific facts about a problem formerly regarded only with emotion, indifference, or disgust. Largely because the scientists at Yale have insisted upon putting their knowledge to use, communities and government agencies throughout the country are beginning to stir from their lethargic indifference to do something realistic about their alcoholics.

Already thirteen states have initiated programs concerned with alcoholism, while in fifty cities throughout the country voluntary committees are surveying the local problem and taking action to meet it. In addition, a number of municipalities, notably, New York, Washington, D.C., and Oakland, California, are beginning to recognize the fact that the jails are no answer to a public health problem and are experimenting with more effective types of treatment programs.

IN ITS FOURTEEN YEARS OF existence the Yale Plan has gradually enlarged its original test tube focus to embrace six main divisions: Research; Publications; the Yale Summer School on Alcoholic Studies; the Yale Plan Clinic; the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism; and the recently inaugurated Yale Institute of Alcoholic Studies in the Southwest. Each has a reach far beyond the academic setting where the Plan originated.

The Research Division conducts studies on the effects of alcohol on humans - moderate drinkers as well as inebriates. Currently it is attempting to find the physiological disturbances that scientists feel must accompany the psychological factors in alcoholism - a theory based on the observation that though the alcoholic can be converted to a total abstainer, he can never hope to be a moderate drinker no matter how well adjusted he becomes through psychiatric treatment or other means. Such knowledge, if attained, might not only bring about a revolution in treatment methods, but also a hope of prevention by making it possible to spot a potential alcoholic before he has ever taken a drink.

The Publications Division brings together the findings of scientific research on alcoholism and of medical psychiatric, social, and legal experience with alcoholics. Chief among its publication is The Quarterly Journal of Studies in Alcohol, the bible of the field.

In the realization that knowledge in an ivory tower can be of little help to the sinking alcoholic, his harried wife, or terrified children, the instigators of the Yale Plan determined to spread what they learned as quickly as possible to persons who could put the facts to most effective use. Accordingly in 1943 they inaugurated the Yale Summer School of Alcohol Studies, a four week course for persons professionally concerned with alcoholics or education on alcoholism - doctors, ministers, social workers, police chiefs, judges, teachers. The curriculum, which covers almost everything, that is known about alcohol and alcoholism, focuses on alcoholism as a disease and the alcoholic as a sick person who should be treated with kindness, sympathy, and firmness and without resentment or moral judgment. The role of education in prevention is equally stressed, with the emphasis on supplanting "folklore" with true facts - for example the common belief that alcohol is a stimulant with the fact that alcohol is a depressant, or the not unpopular assumption that drinking inevitably leads to alcoholism, with a clear definition between the moderate drinker and the addict.

Some 200 persons have registered at the summer school each year since its opening. In addition, so many others have indicated interest in the course that this year a similar summer school will be held at Trinity University, San Antonio, Texas, under the auspices of a newly organized Yale Institute of Alcoholic Studies in the Southwest jointly sponsored by Yale and Texas Christian University. The new project includes plans for research, a summer school and clinical facilities similar to the parent program at New Haven. It is under the direction of Dr. E.M. Jellinek, biometrician with the Yale Plan since the first expansion from its physiological beginning.

SCIENTIFIC FINDINGS ARE OF little use to the sick unless translated into treatment. The Yale Plan Clinic, with a staff of two psychiatrists, a physician, a psychologist, and two psychiatric caseworkers, opened in 1944 as a demonstration of an integrated approach to the rehabilitation of alcoholics. Far from an attempt to compete with New Haven's flourishing A.A. chapter, the clinic is an effective complement to the group.

In spite of the relative success of Alcoholics Anonymous a group fellowship program does not answer the needs of all alcoholics - nor even of all who want to be cured. In many persons alcoholism is merely a symptom of some deep disturbance of either a psychological or physical nature. Thus a brain tumor may have its first manifestations in excessive drinking; a psychotic of the manic depressive type may go on bouts in his depressed periods; a person with deep neurotic conflicts may find in alcohol his only release; or an "uncomplicated alcoholic" may cringe from the testimonial or religious facets of the A.A. program.

All these persons need diagnosis and individualized treatment. Only an operation will help the man with the brain tumor. The psychotic will need care in a mental hospital; the neurotic, deep psychotherapy; while the uncomplicated alcoholic may need less intensive psychiatric help in gaining insight into the nature of his affliction, along with some counseling and guidance in regard to employment, domestic troubles, or social interests.

Diagnosis was from the first a major concern of the Yale Plan Clinic, but experience soon demonstrated that if diagnosis was to have any meaning it would have to be followed by therapy and guidance in cases needing treatment not provided by other community services. Since its opening the clinic has received 1,100 alcoholics, 60 per cent of whom have achieved either complete sobriety or markedly lengthened spacing between their drinking bouts. Referrals between the clinic and Alcoholics Anonymous are a commonplace, the clinic getting patients from A.A. and in turn recommending A.A. to persons who seem able to benefit from the fellowship program. Many persons are clinic patients and active A.A. members at the same time.

The Yale Plan Clinic was developed as a model for other communities as well as for experimental purposes. But neither Yale nor Alcoholics Anonymous pretended to be able to tackle the whole cast problem of alcoholism alone. No real dent is ever made in a public health problem until widespread understanding of its true nature develops.

For four years the National Committee for education on Alcoholism, an affiliate of the Yale Plan, has been trying to break down community ignorance and indifference, through field trips, consultation services, the provision of literature, and the promotion of institutes. The fifty communities which have setup local committees for education on alcoholism provide a measure of its success.

These committees are usually composed of persons of some influence in the community because of their social or professional standing, as well as of persons whose work brings them in close contact with alcoholics or their families - social workers, doctors, clergymen, judges, teachers, and members of Alcoholics Anonymous. As a rule, they begin shooting at three main goals: general public education on the problem and nature of alcoholism; the establishment of an information center where alcoholics, their relatives, and other interested persons can find out more about the disease and where to go for effective treatment; promotion or establishment of specialized clinics, hospital beds, and convalescent homes for alcoholics.

The local committees are in various stages of development. Though the oldest was created in Boston early in 1945, many of them only came into being in recent months, and are still in the organizational stage. Nineteen, however, are far enough along to be operating information centers as well as community education programs; and a few are offering direct rehabilitation services.

One of the more highly developed is the Western Pennsylvania Committee for education on Alcoholism, in Pittsburgh. Organized in 1945, this committee carries on a continuous educational program through a speaker's bureau, institutes, and the dissemination of literature, emphasizing the three points stressed by the national committee; alcoholism is a disease; the alcoholic can be helped; alcoholism is a public health problem. In addition, the committee operated an information center and diagnostic clinic, staffed by a psychiatrically oriented physician and the executive secretary, who is a trained social worker. The center cooperates closely not only with the A.A.'s, but with other community agencies serving alcoholics, particularly Morals Court. The committee has fortunately been spared a problem which looms heavily in other areas, the securing of hospital facilities for alcoholics, for Pittsburgh is one of the few communities where hospital beds are available to alcoholic patients.

How to get a person suffering from acute alcoholism into hospitals is an urgent problem in most communities. Acute alcoholism is often an extremely dangerous state which can be fatal if emergency medical treatment is not provided. The number of alcoholics found dead in their cells after being callously tossed into jail to "sleep it off" probably never will be tabulated, but anyone who has been around jails knows that this occurrence is not uncommon. Good hospital care in the sobering up period may also be crucial to rehabilitative efforts, since the mental and physical pain of the hangover is what frequently drives the alcoholic back to drink.

Few communities, however, have sufficient, if any, hospital beds available for alcoholics, a situation mainly due to the general hospital's disinterest in the alcoholic as a patient. While some municipally owned hospitals operate alcoholic wards, general hospitals more often than not refuse to have anything to do with the alcoholic patient except in extreme emergencies.

Because the lack of hospital facilities has long handicapped their work, many

A.A. groups have exerted special efforts to persuade general hospitals to provide beds for such patients, but without much success. A notable exception is in New York City where the Knickerbocker Hospital has given over an entire wing to alcoholics and put admission into the hands of the A.A.'s. Every person admitted to Knickerbocker's wing for alcoholics is assigned an A.A. sponsor, who visits the patient every day during his five-day stay and is the only visitor allowed. Doctors, nurses, and the A.A. visitors urge the patient to a realization that hospital treatment is only the beginning of rehabilitation and must be followed through by the patient's own efforts if real recovery is to be achieved.

Generally frustrated in their attempts to secure hospital beds, A.A. chapters are welcoming such efforts on the part of local committees for education on alcoholism, in the hopes that these representative community groups may be able to achieve through prestige what the A.A. 's with no pressure group value, have found extremely difficult. A number of local committees already have experienced some success in this direction. Only one, however, the Youngstown (Ohio) Committee for Education on Alcoholism, has managed to secure an entire hospital for alcoholics, which it owns and operates itself. As in the case of the A.A. association with New York's Knickerbocker Hospital, this system makes it possible to screen patients carefully at the point of admission so that the beds are made available to those most in need of them. It also makes it possible to offer rehabilitative service at the time of convalescence when the patient is more apt to be in a receptive mood.

ALCOHOLISM IS CALLED THE FOURTH public health problem in the United States. As such it warrants attention from the public authorities as well as from voluntary groups. Recent actions of thirteen state legislatures in authorizing programs on alcoholism indicate that such attention may at last be forthcoming.

Most of the state programs are headed by legislatively created commissions with varying degrees of responsibility. Some commissions are charged only with providing educational programs. Others, responsible also for surveying the problem and establishing facilities to meet needs, are hamstrung by inadequate appropriations. However, a few have drawn up comprehensive plans for education, rehabilitation, and prevention.

Among the most ambitious state programs is that of the Connecticut Commission on Alcoholism, set up by the state legislature in 1945. With an income of about $200,000 a year, representing 9 percent of the state's revenues from liquor licenses, the commission plans to operate a network of out-patient clinics modeled on the Yale Plan Clinic, as well as hospitals and possibly convalescent homes for alcoholics. Already three of the clinics are in operation, and plans for opening a fifty-bed hospital in Hartford are nearly completed. The commission benefits considerably from consultation with the Yale Plan staff and has its chairman, Selden D. Bacon, staff sociologist at the Yale Laboratory of Applied Physiology. A joint undertaking with the Yale Plan Clinic involves special services and research among women alcoholics at the State Reformatory for Women.

Oregon is unique in having developed a rehabilitation program under the auspices of an advisory committee to the State Liquor Control Commission. Here, too, the funds come from liquor licenses, and bring $115,000 biennially to the state's outpatient alcoholic clinic located in Portland. Plans for expanding the clinic's services to other areas in the state are currently under consideration.

Washington, D.C., has two clinics operating under the Bureau of Mental Hygiene of the District's Health Department, and a third in the offing. The latter, authorized by a special act of congress in 1947, and to be financed by liquor license revenues, will cooperate closely with the District Courts. Under the proposed plan the courts will send men and women to the clinic on probation.

Most clinics for alcoholics have a voluntary arrangement with the courts in their communities. Apparently the judges, weary of sentencing endless lines of familiar drunks to ineffectual jail terms, welcome the opportunity to break the vicious cycle. Usually, however, they refer only those alcoholics who would seem amenable to treatment - newcomers to their courts or persons in whom the repeating pattern has not been long established. The 69-year-old woman who had 124 jail sentences in New Jersey would probably not be considered a good treatment prospect.

In Oakland, California, a court-devised plan for breaking the circle of spree-jail-spree leans heavily on the authority of the court. Its instigators were two probation officers - one a "graduate" of the Yale Summer School of Alcoholic Studies - who persuaded the county judge to let them take a try at rehabilitating police court alcoholics. Accordingly, the judge, who used to sentence the day's line-up of 60 to 100 drunks en masse, views each inebriate as an individual person and fits the "punishment" not to the crime, but to the man's or woman's potentialities for rehabilitation. Those he regards as capable of straightening out without benefit of institutional care he puts on probation, leaving to the probation officer the job of painstaking guidance or referral to other services. Others who obviously need the protection of an institutional setting he sends to the county farm.

The question of the compulsory treatment of alcoholics is still under debate, but opinion seems to be growing that the protection of society as well as of the victims of also holism demands a move in this direction. In New York State a bill drawn up by the State Bar Association, and already introduced in the legislature, would authorize a proposed Bureau for Alcoholics to establish state farms for alcoholics to which persons needing long term institutional treatment could be committed by the courts, either after arrest or at their own relatives request. The bill would not only provide needed treatment facilities, far superior to jails, but would make commitment long enough for rehabilitation to get a good start.

ONE OF THE MOST VIGOROUS opponents of compulsory treatment is a man who through his own experience has devised a unique method of rehabilitation which he tried out on others with considerable success. Edward J. McGoldrick, Jr., director of New York City's Bureau of Alcoholic Therapy, established within the Department of Welfare in 1943, is an individualist among alcoholic therapists for he also holds out against the theory that alcoholism is a disease. The method which he uses at Bridge House, the bureau's convalescent home for selected male alcoholics, is based on theories of will and thought control. Agreeing with the scientists that alcoholism has a "psychic" basis, Mr. McGoldrick has developed a system of personal interviews and group lectures intended to convert the alcoholic from a sense of defeat to a sense of power over himself.

All therapists at Bridge House are former alcoholics who have been rehabilitated through the McGoldrick method. Though the method differs from procedures of Alcoholics Anonymous, the director goes along with them in the theory that persons who have "hit bottom" as alcoholics themselves can more easily help other alcoholics.

Mr. McGoldrick objects to calling alcoholism a disease on the grounds that it adds to the alcoholic's sense of weakness and helplessness, thus giving him an excuse to go on drinking. He opposes compulsory treatment as useless, for it ignores the ingredient of positive willingness which he feels is necessary to reform.

Bridge House, with only twenty beds, serves about 350 alcoholics a year, both on a resident and a non-resident basis. Its record of success, using Mr. McGoldrick's measurement of one year of complete sobriety, is 66 percent - a good record but one not affecting some 200,000 alcoholics in New York City who do not reach Bridge House, nor any of the city's alcoholic women. It is, however, a project being watched throughout the country.

Industry as well as the public has a real stake in combating alcoholism, for alcoholic workers cause a tremendous waste. It has been estimated that the 1,370,000 alcoholic males employed in heavy industry lose an average of 22 days each year from the acute effects of alcohol. Moreover, the alcoholic has an accident rate twice as high as the non-alcoholic. On the basis of such statistics, the Yale Plan Clinic is offering industrial plants a service to help take up the fight against this menace. This involves a survey of the extent of the plant's problem, help in developing constructive personnel policies affecting the alcoholic, the introduction of an educational program and an information service for workers, and help in establishing rehabilitation facilities.

All the efforts so far initiated to help the alcoholic seem infinitesimal when viewed against the size of the problem. But it is encouraging to remember that fifteen years ago practically nothing at all effective was being done in this

I am not an alcoholic. I don't even like to drink. Yet I, and thousands of others in my position, have an alcoholic problem as overwhelming as that of any man or woman who imbibes to excess.

I am the wife of an alcoholic, a member of that vast, unheralded company of persons whose destinies are linked inextricably with those of the intemperate.

A great deal has been written recently about alcoholism. Much of it suggests that the problem is one only for the alcoholic himself. Actually, his problem often is overshadowed by the supplementary problems it breeds among mothers and fathers, wives and children, who find themselves constantly confronted by situations demanding miracles of tact.

Guidance and help have been available increasingly of late to the alcoholic. Doctors have grown more and more concerned with his case; clinics have been established for his care; and, for companionship in trouble and possible cure, he can turn to that wonderfully understanding organization, Alcoholics Anonymous.

But where could those who suffered indirectly from his complaint go with their troubles? Until recently, they could depend only on the uncertain, frequently dangerous advice of friends. Adrift on an uncharted sea, the relatives of alcoholics would find themselves blown one way by passion and despair and the next minute blown just as erratically the other way by hope.

Now, some of them have found a new course to follow. In a number of communities they have begun to form informal organizations of their own, appropriately called Non-Alcoholics Anonymous. At meetings, the members' problems are discussed and solutions suggested. In our town, such a group is now functioning, and is gradually proving its worth to many people who had almost given up in despair.

For the help and solace it may offer to others whose cases are similar to ours, I am giving a condensation of the thoughts and experiences of members of our particular group. Since our meetings are largely discussions of anonymously written questions handed to the chairman, I am making my report in question-and-answer form, covering some of the situations which seem to be common to all of us.

Question: Can a wife or husband "talk" an alcoholic into giving up his drinking?

Answer: No! Nagging, or even a reasonable argument, will accomplish nothing until the alcoholic has made the decision by himself, uninfluenced by another.

This fact is one of the bitterest which must be faced by the mate of an alcoholic. Love does not enter into the situation, for it has been proven innumerable times that no real and lasting reformation can be accomplished except from within the victim.

The most that a nonalcoholic can do is to maintain a detached attitude as each episode occurs, be ready to deal intelligently with each situation, and to cooperate with the alcoholic's first fumbling steps toward reform. This requires real strength and staying power, to be sure, but it has been rewarded in thousands of cases.

Question: Should we allow our natural fear and worry to be seen by the alcoholic when he is in the first stages of sobriety?

Answer: No. We must show only confidence, no matter how many times our hopes have been shattered in the past. This is not as dishonest as it may sound; having gone through years of lies and subterfuges forced upon us by excessive drinking, we must now use this strength to win and hold tolerance and faith.

Question: How can the mate of an alcoholic stop worrying"?

Answer: First, analyze the situation, putting it on paper to clarify it in your own mind. Then, think of the worst that could possibly happen; accept the possibility that it might happen; and then start constructive thinking about what, if anything, can be done to remedy matters. Usually, this will bring an automatic release of tension and fear.

Question: What is the best attitude to take during the difficult times when an alcoholic is sullen and morose, or just plain bad-tempered?

Answer: These periods usually occur during intervals between "bouts" and indicate the poor adjustment of the personality to daily living, which is intensified a hundredfold by the pressure of abstinence. We have found that keeping busy with our own affairs, leaving the offender gracefully alone and being emotionally objective about the situation are the greatest helps in "riding out the storm."

Question: Should a mate accompany the alcoholic on his rounds during drinking bouts?

Answer: No. Many of us have done this, thinking our presence would reduce his drinking, or protect him from possible disaster as a result of his inability to cope with situations while intoxicated. What we actually do is furnish a "crutch" for him to lean upon. We also supply a basis for the ever-ready comment that we don't seem to mind his drinking--we have even joined him at it. The sooner we refuse to let ourselves be so used, the quicker his recovery.

Question: Is it wise for the mate of an alcoholic to accept or serve drinks while the other is trying to "stay sober"?

Answer: This is a problem which the individual must solve for himself. In some cases, it has been possible for the mate of an alcoholic to drink where other people are present, without having any harmful effect on the alcoholic. It has been the consensus of our experiences, however, that it is unwise for the non-alcoholic mate to drink when they are alone.

If the question arises during a social gathering where it might emphasize the alcoholic's refusal of drinks, it is better to accept a drink than to cause the alcoholic embarrassment.

Question: What is the best handling of the situation when children are involved?

Answer: Until a child is 12, it is preferable to minimize the situation. Pass over it by saying that father or mother is indisposed but will soon be better. Try to avoid contact between drinker and child until the current storm has passed. When this is not physically possible, be alert to act as a buffer between them whenever necessary.

If both parents are working, it is advisable to leave the child with some member of the family or close friend until the responsible parent has finished the day's work and returned home.

When a child has reached an age where he can absorb the knowledge, explain briefly that this father or mother is the unfortunate victim of a disease similar to diabetes; that these people drink too much because they have not yet learned that they have an ailment which can be helped.

Tell the youngster the simple facts about alcoholism--its slowly progressing pattern--and that it is the combined effect of wrong thinking plus a body chemistry which does not tolerate alcohol that makes these people act as they do.

Some readers will exclaim: "How dreadful to tell a young child that his parent does not think rightly!" Is that worse than having the child labor, through misunderstanding the problem, under the shame and disillusionment of having a "drunk" for a parent?

Today's children are wise in the ways of this world, and any mother or father who believes that she or he can conceal drunkenness is acting like-the proverbial ostrich.

These are only a few of the basic problems confronting every man or woman who has an alcoholic in the family. Many more have been discussed, each meeting bringing forward new ones or old ones with a slightly different angle. It would be impossible in one article to encompass the whole of our program.

But to the wife or husband of an excessive drinker, our recommendation is sobered up an astonishing number of American's heaviest drinkers. This is how they do it.

The Drunkard's Best Friend

by Jack Alexander

Alcoholism is a mysterious and repellent malady, with perhaps as many as a million victims in this country.

When a farmer in Aroostook County, Maine, announces that he is going to bake a cake, he is speaking figuratively. What he means is that he is bored with the loneliness of Aroostook's vast reaches, with the county's most famous product, potatoes, and with life in general; and that, to relieve his boredom, he is going on a vanilla-extract bender. In order to buy liquor he might have to drive as much as a hundred miles, over drifted or rutted roads, to reach a town uninhibited by local option. He tipples on vanilla, which is rich in alcohol, because it is easily and legally obtainable, in quantity, at the nearest grocery store. Grocers in local-option towns ordinarily do a thriving vanilla business with alcoholically inclined agrarians, but of late the strange society known as Alcoholics Anonymous has taken root in Aroostook and a disturbing effect on the vanilla turnover has been observed.

"You wouldn't believe it, Ned," one storekeeper lamented to a drummer on a gray day last November, "but my vanilla sales is almost down to normal."

The impact of Alcoholics Anonymous upon a community is not always that striking, but it is doing quite well at its self-appointed task, which, as almost everyone knows by now, is that of helping confirmed drunks to quit drinking. The help is provided solely by alcoholics who, through adhering to a specified program of living, have managed to arrest their own disastrous drinking habits. (A.A. members never call themselves ex-alcoholics, regardless of the length of their sobriety, the theory being that they are ineradicably alcoholics by temperament, and are therefore always vulnerable to a relapse).

During the past few years Alcoholics Anonymous has extended its influence overseas, and one of its more dedicated workers is the honorable secretary of the Dublin group. A Sandhurst graduate and a veteran of twenty-six years in the British Army, he is still remembered in some portions of the Middle East for his inspired work with the bottle. Now an abstainer, he lives off his major's pension and the profits of a small retail business. Like all faithful members of A.A., he spends much of his spare time in shepherding other lusher toward total abstinence, lest he revert to the pot himself.

The honorable secretary is a man of few spoken words, but he carries on a large correspondence within the fraternity. His letters, which are notable for their eloquent understatement, are prized by fellow A.A.'s in this country and are passed around at meetings. One of his more fascinating communiquis, received here in October, described a missionary trip to Cork, in company with another A.A. gentleman. The purpose of the trip was to bring the glad tidings of freedom to any Corkonians who might happen to be besotted and unshriven, and to stimulate the local group, which was showing small promise. This was the honorable secretary's chronological report:

8 P.M. The chairman and myself sat alone.

8:05 One lady arrived, a nonalcoholic.

8:15 One man arrived.

8:20 A County Cork member arrived to say he couldn't stay, as his children had just developed measles. .

8:25 The lone lady departed.

8:30 Two more men arrived.

8:40 One more man arrived, and I decided to make a start.

8:45 The first man arrival stated that he had to go out and have a drink.

8:50 He came back.

8:55 Three more arrived.

9:10 Another lady, propped up by a companion, arrived, gazed glassily around, collected some literature and departed unsteadily.

9:30 The chairman and I had finished speaking.

9:45 We reluctantly said good night to the new members, who seemed very interested. In summing up, the secretary said: "A night of horror at first, developing quite well. I think they have good prospects, once the thing is launched."

To a skeptic, the honorable secretary's happy prognosis in the face of initial discouragement may sound foolishly hopeful. To those already within the fraternity and familiar with the sluggardly and chaotic character of A.A. local-group growth in its early stages, he was merely voicing justifiable optimism. For some years after its inception, in 1935, the Alcoholics Anonymous movement itself made slow progress. As the work of salvaging other drunks is essential to maintaining the sobriety of the already-salvaged brethren, the earnest handful of early salvagees spent some worrisome months. Hundreds of thousands of toppers were prowling about in full alcoholic cry, but few would pause long enough to listen.

Six years after it all began, when this magazine first examined the small but encouraging phenomenon (Post, March 1, 1941), the band could count 2000 members, by scraping hard, and some of these were still giving off residual fumes. In the nine years which have intervened since that report, the small phenomenon has become a relatively large one. Today its listed membership exceeds 90,000. Just how many of these have substantial sobriety records is a matter of conjecture, as the movement, which has no control at the top and is constantly ridden by maverick techniques, operates in a four-alarm-fire atmosphere, and no one has the time to check up. A reasonable guess would be that about two thirds have been sober for anywhere from six months to fifteen years, and that the rest have stretched out their periods of sobriety between twisters to the point where they are at least able to keep their jobs.

The intake of shaky-fingered newcomers, now at its highest in A.A. history, is running at the rate of around 20,000 a year. The number that will stick is, again, a matter of conjecture. If experience repeats, according to A.A. old-timers, about one half will stay sober from the start, and one fourth will achieve sobriety after a few skids; the other one fourth will remain problem drinkers. A problem drinker, by definition, is one who takes a drink for some compulsive reason he cannot identify and, having taken it is unable to stop until he is drunk and acting like a lunatic.

How Many of the Four Million Will Join?

It is tempting to become oversanguine about the success of Alcoholics Anonymous to date. Ninety thousand persons, roaring drunk or roaring sober, are but a drop in the human puddle, and they represent only a generous dip out of the human alcoholic puddle. According to varying estimates, between 750,000 and 1,000,000 problem drinkers are still on the loose in the United States alone. Their numbers will inevitably be swelled in future years by recruits from the ranks of between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 Americans who, by medical standards, drink too much for their own good. Some of these millions will taper off or quit when they reach the age at which the miseries of a hang-over seem too great a price to pay for an evening of artificially induced elation; but some will slosh over into the compulsive-drinker class.

The origins of alcoholism, which is now being widely treated as a major public-health problem, are as mysterious as those of cancer. They are perhaps even harder to pin down, because they involve psychic as well as physical elements. Currently, the physical aspect is being investigated by universities and hospitals and by publicly and privately financed foundations. Some large business and industrial firms, concerned about reduced productivity and absenteeism, are providing medical and psychiatric aid to alcoholic employees. The firms' physicians are also digging into the alcoholic puzzle. The most plausible tentative explanation that any of these investigative efforts has come up with is that alcoholism is a sickness resembling that caused by various allergies.

Psychiatry has its own approach to the problem; it is successful in only a small percentage of cases. Clergymen, using a spiritual appeal, and the beset relatives of alcoholics, using everything from moral suasion to a simple bat in the jaw, manage to persuade a few chronics to become unchronic. So does one school of institutional treatment, which insists that alcoholism is solely the result of "twisted thinking" and aims at unraveling the mental quirks.

But the Alcoholics Anonymous approach--which leans on medicine, uses a few elementary principles of psychiatry and employs a strong spiritual weapon--is the only one which has done anything resembling a mop-up job. Whatever one's attitude toward A.A. may be, and a lot of people are annoyed by its sometimes ludicrous strivings and its dead-pan thumping of the sobriety tub, one can scarcely ignore its palpable results. To anyone who has ever been a drunk or who has had to endure the alcoholic cruelties of a drunk--and that would embrace a large portion of the human family--90,000 alcoholics reconverted into working citizens represent a massive dose of pure gain. In human terms, the achievements of Alcoholics Anonymous stand out as one of the few encouraging developments of a rather grim and destructive half century.

Drunks are prolific of excuses for their excessive drinking, and the most frequent alibi is that no one really understands what a struggle they have. With more than 3000 AA. groups at work in the United States, and every member is a veteran of the struggle, this excuse is beginning to lose its validity, if it ever had any validity. In most cities of any size the fraternity has a telephone listed in its own name. A nickel call will bring a volunteer worker who won't talk down to a drunk, as the average nonalcoholic has a way of doing, but will talk convincingly in the jargon of the drunk. The worker won't do any urging; he will describe the Alcoholics Anonymous program in abbreviated form and depart. The drunk is -invited to telephone again if he is serious about wanting to become sober. Or a drunk, on his own initiative or in tow of a relative, may drop in at the A.A. office, where he will receive the same nonevangelistic treatment. In the larger cities the offices do a rushing trade, especially after week ends or legal holidays. Many small-town and village groups maintain clubrooms over the bank or feed store; in one Canadian town the A.A.'s share quarters with a handbook operator, using it by night after the bookie has gone home. Some of these groups carry a standing classified advertisement in the daily or weekly newspaper. If they don't, a small amount of inquiry will disclose the meeting place of the nearest group; a local doctor, or clergyman, or policeman will know.

To some extent, the same easy availability obtains in the twenty-six foreign countries -where AA has gained a foothold. This is especially true of the nations of the British Commonwealth, particularly Canada, Australia and New Zealand, which together list more A.A. members than the whole movement could boast nine years ago; and of the Scandinavian countries, where membership is fairly strong. At a recent A.A. banquet in Oslo, Norway, 400 members celebrated their deliverance, drinking nothing stronger than water. Throughout Scandinavia the members bolster the program by using Antibus, the new European aversion drug. This practice is deplored by some A.A. members as showing a lack of faith in the standard A.A. program, but, of course, nothing is done, or can be done, about it, since the program is free to anyone who thinks he needs it and he may adapt it in any way that suits him.

More often than not, though, disregard of the standard admonitions backfires. A bibulous Scottish baronet found this out when, returning from London, where he caught the spark from a local group, he set out ambitiously to dry up Edinburgh, a hard-drinking town. But he tried it by remote control, so to speak, hiring a visiting American A.A. to do the heavy work. This violated the principle that the arrested drunk must do drunk-rescuing work himself in order to remain sober. Besides, the Scottish drunks wouldn't listen to a hired foreign pleader. In no time at all, and without getting a convert, the baronet and his hireling were swacked to the eyeballs and crying on each other's shoulders. After the American had gone home, the baronet stiffened up, abandoned the traditions of his class and started all over again, cruising the gutters himself, visiting drunks in their homes and in hospitals and prisons. Edinburgh is now in the win column, and there are also groups in Glasgow, Dundee, Perth and Campbeltown, all offshoots of Edinburgh.

Alcoholism on a large scale seems to be most common in highly complex civilizations. These tend to breed the basic neuroses of which uncontrolled drinking is just one outward expression. A man in a more primitive setting, bound closely to earthy tasks and the constant battle with Nature, is apt to treat his frustrations by ignoring them or by working them off.

Alcoholics' Anonymous has nevertheless caught on in some out-of-the-way places. A liquor salesman for a British firm, who was seduced by his own merchandise, started a group in Cape Town, South Africa, which now has ninety members. There are also groups in Johannesburg, Pretoria, Bloemfontein, Durban and East London, and in Salisbury and Bulawayo, Southern Rhodesia. The group at Anchorage, Alaska, which started in a blizzard, has a dozen members, including one slightly puzzled Eskimo, and there are small groups in the leper colony at Molokai, nurtured by A.A.'s from Honolulu, who fly there occasionally and conduct meetings.

The figures perhaps give too rosy a picture of the turbulent little world of Alcoholics Anonymous. Most of the members of any standing seem to be exceptionally happy people, with more serenity of manner than most nonalcoholics are able to muster these jittery days; it is difficult to believe that they ever lived in the drunk's bewitched world. But some are still vaguely unhappy, though sober, and feel as if they were walking a tight wire. Treasurers occasionally disappear with a group's funds and wind up, boiled, in another town. After this had happened a few times, groups were advised to keep the kitty low, and the practice now is to spend any appreciable surplus on a cake-and-coffee festival or a picnic. This advice does not always work out; last year the members of a fresh and vigorous French-Canadian unit in Northern Maine, taking the advice to heart, debated so violently about how to spend their fifty-four dollars that all hands were drunk within twenty-four hours.

It is difficult at first for the recruit to achieve serenity. As most groups are mixtures of men and women, a certain number of unconventional love affairs occur. More than one group has been thrown into a maelstrom of gossip and disorder by a determined lady whose alcoholism was complicated by an aggressive romantic instinct. Such complications are no more frequent than they are at the average country club; they merely stand out more badly, and do more harm, in an emotionally explosive society. Special A.A. groups in sixty-six prisons around the nation are constantly trickling out graduates into the civilian groups. The ex-convicts are welcomed and are, for some reason, usually models of good behavior. A sanitarium or mental-hospital background causes no more stir in an A.A. group than a string of college degrees would at the University Club; the majority of A.A.'s are alumni of anywhere from one to fifty such institutions. Thus Alcoholics Anonymous is something of a Grand Hotel.

The ability of the arrested drunk to talk the active drunk's language convincingly is the one revolutionary aspect of the A.A. technique, and it does much to explain why the approach so often succeeds after others have failed. The rest of the technique is a synthesis of already existing ideas, some of which are centuries old. Once a community of language and experience has been established, it acts as a bridge over which the rest of the A.A. message can be conveyed, provided the subject is receptive.

Across the bridge and inside the active alcoholic's mind lies an exquisitely tortured microcosm, and a steady member of Alcoholics Anonymous gets a shudder every time he looks into it again. It is a rat-cage world, kept hot by an alcohol flame, and within it lives, or dances, a peculiarly touchy, defiant and grandiose personality.

There is a sage saying in A.A. that "an alcoholic is just like a normal person, only more so." He is egotistical, childish, resentful and intolerant to an exaggerated degree. How he gets that way is endlessly debated, but a certain rough pattern is discernible in most cases. Many of those who ultimately become alcoholics start off as an only child, or as the youngest child in a family, or as a child with too solicitous a mother, or a father with an oversevere concept of discipline. When such a child begins getting his lumps from society, his ego begins to swell disproportionately--either from too many easy triumphs or, as a compensation, from being rebuffed in his attempts to win the approval of his contemporaries.

He develops an intense power drive, a feverish struggle to gain acceptance of himself at his own evaluation. A few of the power-drive boys meet with enough frustrations to send them into problem drinking while still in college or even while in high school. More often, on entering adult life, the prospective alcoholic is outwardly just about like anyone else his age, except that he is probably a little more cocky and aggressive, a little more hipped on the exhibitionistic charm routine, a little more plausible. He becomes a social drinker--that is, one who can stop after a few cocktails and enjoy the experience.

But at some place along the line his power drive meets up with an obstacle it cannot surmount--someone he loves refuses to love him, someone whose admiration he covets rejects him, some business or professional ambition is thwarted. Or he may encounter a whole series of rebuffs. The turning point may come quickly or it may be delayed for as long as forty or fifty years. He begins to take his drinks in gulps, and before he realizes it he is off on a reeler. He loses jobs through drunkenness, embarrasses his family and alienates his friends. His world begins to shrink. He encounters the horrors of the "black-out," the dawn experience of being unable to remember what he did the night before--how many checks he wrote and how large they were, whom he insulted, where he parked his car, whether or not he ran down someone on the way home. In the alcoholic world a nice distinction is made between the "black-out" and the simple "pass-out," the latter being the relatively innocuous act of falling asleep from taking too much liquor. He jumps nervously whenever the doorbell or telephone rings, fearing that it may be a saloonkeeper with a rubber check, or a damage-suit lawyer, or the police.

He is frustrated and fearful, but is only vaguely conscious that his will, which is strong in most crises, fails him where liquor is concerned, although this is apparent to anyone who knows him. He nurses a vision of sobriety and tries all kind of self-rationing systems, none of which works for long. The great paradox of his personality is that in the midst of his troubles, his already oversized ego tends to expand; failure goes to his head. He continues, as the old saying has it, to rage through life calling for the headwaiter. In his dreams he is likely to see himself alone on a high mountain, masterfully surveying the world below. This dream, or some variant of it, will come to him whether he is sleeping in his own bed, or in a twenty-five-dollar-a-day hotel suite, or on a park bench, or in a psychopathic ward.

If he applies to Alcoholics Anonymous or help, he has taken an important step toward arresting his drink habit; he has at least admitted that alcohol has whipped him. This in itself is an act of humility, and his life thereafter must be a continuing effort to acquire more of this ancient virtue. Should he need hospitalization, his new friends will see that he gets it, if a local hospital will take him. Understandably, many hospitals are reluctant to accept alcoholic patients, because so many of them are disorderly. With this sad fact in mind, the society has persuaded several hospitals to set up separate alcoholic corridors and is helping to supervise the patients through supplying volunteer workers.

To the satisfaction of all concerned, including the hospital managements, which find the supervised corridors peaceful, more than 10,000 patients have gone through five-day rebuilding courses. The hospitals involved in this successful experiment are: St. Thomas' (Catholic) in Akron, St. John's (Episcopal) in Brooklyn and Knickerbocker (nonsectarian) in Manhattan. They have set a pattern which the society would like to see adopted by the numerous hospitals which now accept alcoholics on a more restricted basis.

Early in the game a newcomer is subjected to a merciful but thorough deflating of his ego. It is brought home to him forcefully that if he continues his uncontrolled drinking--the only kind he is capable of--he will die prematurely, or go insane from brain impairment, or both. He is encouraged to apologize to persons he has injured through his drunken behavior; this is a step further in the ego-deflation process and is often as painful to the recipient of the apology as it is to the neophyte AA. He is further instructed that unless he will acknowledge the existence of a power greater than himself and continually ask this power for help, his campaign for sobriety will probably fail. This is the much-discussed spiritual element in Alcoholics Anonymous. Most members refer to this power as God; some agnostic members prefer to call it Nature, or the Cosmic Power, or by some other label. In any case, it is the key of the AA. program, and it must be taken not on a basis of mere acceptance or acknowledgment, but of complete surrender.

This surrender is described by a psychiatrist, Dr. Harry M. Tiebout, of Greenwich, Connecticut, as a "conversion" experience, "a psychological event in which there is a major shift in personality manifestation." He adds: "The changes which take place in the conversion process may be summed up by saying that the person who has achieved the positive frame of mind has lost his tense, aggressive, demanding, conscience-ridden self which feels isolated and at odds with the world, and has become, instead, a relaxed, natural, more realistic individual who can dwell in the world on a live-and-let-live basis."

The personality change wrought by surrender is far from complete, at first. Elated by a few weeks of sobriety, the new member often enters what is known as the "Chautauqua phase"--he is always making speeches at business meetings on what is wrong with society and how these defects can be remedied. Senior members let him talk himself out of this stage of behavior; if that doesn't work, he may break away and form a group of his own. If he does this, he gradually becomes a quiet veteran himself and other Chautauqua-phase boys either oust him from leadership of his own group or break away themselves and form a new group. By this and other processes of fission the movement spreads. It can stand a lot of outstanding foolishness and still grow.

Drunks, as such, are too individualistic to be organized, and there is no top command in Alcoholics Anonymous to excommunicate, fine or otherwise penalize irrational behavior. However, services--such as publishing meeting bulletins, distributing literature, arranging for hospitalization, and so on--are organized in the larger centers. The local offices, which are operated and financed by the groups thereabouts, are autonomous. They are governed by representatives elected by the neighborhood groups to a rotating body called the Inter-group. There are no dues; all local expenses are met by a simple passing of the hat at group meetings.

A certain body of operational traditions has grown up over the years, and charged with maintaining them--by exhortation only--is something called the Alcoholic Foundation, which has offices at 415 Lexington Avenue, New York City. For a foundation it acts queerly about money; much of its time is consumed in turning down proffered donations and bequests. One tradition is that A.A. must be kept poor, as money represents power and the society prefers to avoid the temptations which power brings. As a check on the foundation itself, the list of trustees is weighted against the alcoholics by eight to seven. The nonalcoholic members are two doctors, a sociologist, a magazine editor, a newspaper editor, a penologist, an international lawyer and a retired businessman.

Preserving the principle of anonymity is one of the more touchy tasks of the foundation. Members are not supposed to be anonymous among their friends or business acquaintances, but they are when appearing before the public--in print or on radio or television, for example--as members of Alcoholics Anonymous. This limited anonymity is considered important to the welfare of the movement, primarily because it encourages members to subordinate their personalities to the principles of A.A. There is also the danger that if a member becomes publicized as a salvaged alcoholic he may stage a spectacular skid and injure the prestige of the society. Actually, anonymity has been breached only a few dozen times since the movement began, which isn't a bad showing, considering the exhibitionistic nature of the average alcoholic.

By one of the many paradoxes which have characterized its growth, Alcoholics Anonymous absorbed the "keep it poor" principle from one of the world's wealthiest men, John D. Rockefeller, Jr. The society was formed in 1935 after a fortuitous meeting in Akron between a Wall Street broker and an Akron surgeon, both alcoholics of long standing. The broker, who was in Akron on a business mission, had kept sober for several months by jawing drunks--unsuccessfully--but his business mission had fallen through and he was aching for a drink. The surgeon, at the time they got together, was quite blotto. Together, over a period of a few weeks, they kept sober and worked out the basic AA technique. By 1937, when they had about fifty converts, they began thinking, as all new A.A.'s will, of tremendous plans--for vast new alcoholic hospitals, squadrons of paid field workers and the literature of mercy pouring off immense presses. Being completely broke themselves, and being promoters at heart, as most alcoholics are, they set their sights on the Rockefeller jack pot.

Rockefeller sent an emissary to Akron to look into the phenomenon at work there, and, receiving a favorable report, granted an audience to a committee of eager-eyed alcoholics. He listened to their personal sagas of resurrection from the gutter and was deeply moved; in fact, he was ready to agree that the

A.A.'s had John Barleycorn by the throat. The visitors relaxed and visualized millions dropping into the till. Then the man with the big money bags punctured the vision. He said that too much money might be the ruination of any great moral movement and that he didn't want to be a party to ruining this one. However, he did make a small contribution--small for Rockefeller--to tide it over for a few years, and he got some of his friends to contribute a few thousand more. When the Rockefeller money -ran out, A.A. was self-supporting, and it has remained so ever since.

Although AA remains in essence what it has always been, many changes have come along in late years. For one thing, the average age of members has dropped from about forty-seven to thirty-five. The society is no longer, as it was originally, merely a haven for the "last gaspers." Because of widespread publicity about alcoholism, alcoholics are discovering earlier what their trouble is.

As A.A. has achieved wider social acceptance, more women are coming in than ever before. Around the country they average .15 per cent of total membership; in New York, where social considerations never did count for much, the A.A.'s are 30 per cent women. The unmarried woman alcoholic is slow to join, as protection from her family than a man does; she is what is known in alcoholic circles as, a "bedroom drinker." The married-woman alcoholic has a tougher row to hoe. The wife of an alcoholic, for temperamental and economic reasons, will ordinarily stick by her erring husband to the bitter end. The husband of an alcoholic wife, on the other hand, is usually less tolerant; a few years of suffering are enough to drive him to the divorce court, with the children in tow. Thus the divorced-woman A.A. is a special problem, and her progress in sobriety depends heavily upon the kindness shown her by the other AA women. For divorcees, and for other women who may be timid about speaking out in mixed meetings, special female auxiliary groups have been formed in some communities. They work out better than a cynic might think.

Another development is the growth of the sponsor system. A new member gets a sponsor immediately, and it is the function of the sponsor to accompany him to meetings, to see that he gets all the help he needs and to be on call at any time for emergencies. As an emergency usually amounts only to an onset of that old feeling for a bottle, it is customarily resolved by a telephone conversation, although it may involve an after-midnight trip to Ernie's gin mill, whither the neophyte has been shanghaied by a couple of unregenerate old drinking companions. As the membership of AA cuts through all social, occupational and economic classes, it is possible to match the sponsor with the sponsored, and this seems to speed up the arrestive process.

During the past decade or so, the society, whose original growth was in large cities, has strongly infiltrated the grass-roots country. Its arrival in this sector was delayed largely because of the greater stigma which attaches to alcoholism in the small town. Because of this stigma and the effect it has on his business, professional or social standing, the small-town alcoholic, reveling in his delusion that nobody knows about his drinking--when actually it is the gossip of Main Street--takes frequent "vacations" or "business trips" if he can afford it. He or she--the banker, the storekeeper, the lawyer, the madam president of the garden club, sometimes even the clergyman--is actually headed for a receptive hospital or clinic in the nearest large city, where no one will recognize him.

The pattern of small-town growth begins when the questing small-towner seeks out the big-city A.A. outfit and its message catches on with him. To his surprise, he finds that half a dozen drinkers in towns near his own have also been to the fount. On returning to his home, he gets in touch with them and they form an intertown group; or there may be enough drinkers in his own town to begin a group. Though there is a stigma even to getting sober in small towns, it is less virulent than the souse stigma, and word of the movement spreads throughout the county and into adjoining counties. The churches and newspapers take it up and beat the drum for it; relatives of drunks, and doctors who find themselves unable to help their alcoholic patients, gladly unload the problem cases on AA., and A.A. is glad to get them. The usual intrafellowship quarrel over who is going to run the thing inevitably develops and there are factional splits, but the splits help to spread the movement, too, and all the big quarrels soon become little ones, and then disappear.

Nowhere is Alcoholics Anonymous carried on with more enthusiasm than in Los Angeles. Unlike most localities, which try to keep separate group membership small, for easier handling, Los Angeles likes the theatrical mass-meeting setting, with 1000 or more present. The Los Angeles A.A.'s carry their membership as if it were a social cachet and go in strongly for square dances of their own. Jewelry bearing the A.A. monogram, though frowned upon elsewhere, is popular on the Coast. After three months of certified sobriety a member receives a bronze pin; after one year he is entitled to have a ruby chip inserted in the pin and, after three years, a diamond chip. Rings bearing the A.A. letters are widely worn, as well as similarly embellished compacts, watch fobs and pocket pieces.

Texas takes AA. with enthusiasm too. In the ranch sector, members drive or fly hundreds of miles to attend A.A. square dances and barbecues, bringing their families. In metropolitan areas, such as Dallas-Fort Worth--there are upwards of a dozen oil-millionaire members here--fancy club quarters have been established in the old mansions and the brethren and their families rejoice, dance and drink coffee and soda pop amid expensive furnishings. One Southwestern group recently got its governor to release a life-termer from the state penitentiary for a week end, so that he could be the guest of honor of the group. "We had a large open meeting," a local member wrote a friend elsewhere in the country, "and many state and county officials attended in order to hear what Herman (the lifer) had to tell about A.A. within the walls. They were deeply impressed and very interested. The next night I gave a lawn party and buffet supper in Herman's honor, with about fifty A.A.'s present. This was the first occasion of this kind in the state and to our knowledge the tremens, reveal them to be suffering from a glandular deficiency--rapidly correctable by certain hormones which seem to overcome the excessive desire for alcohol.

This promises to bring many more far-gone victims within reach of the spiritual medicine of Alcoholics Anonymous. Such is the double-barreled hope for some 750,000 sick human beings still largely treated as pariahs and criminals as well as for the almost three million excessive drinkers who are in danger of someday becoming alcoholics. What sets these unfortunates off from the 48-odd million social drinkers who can take it or leave it alone?

Many real alcoholics start off as ordinary drinkers. Doctors have no blood test to warn them of deadly future danger. But sooner or later (social drinkers please note) the body chemistry of some people goes haywire. Then they cannot stop. They fight it. Desperately they swear off--for an hour, a day, a month, a year or more. Then they're sure they've got to have a drink. They do not really want it, but take more and more until they're insanely plastered.

Against this sickness doctors admit that until recently, they've been largely powerless. Psychiatrists have failed to prevent it from causing the insanity of 10 to 25 percent of our hospitalized mental patients. Deaths? In addition to the thousands caused by acute alcoholism and DTs, thousands more masquerade as heart disease, pneumonia and suicide.

The most effective agency for curing these sick people has been not medical but spiritual. Alcoholics Anonymous has shown that when men and women sincerely reach out for the help of a Power greater than themselves, they can overcome the craving for drink. For chronic alcoholism is a strange disease. To recover from it you first have to go almost crazy or nearly die. This was the discovery of Bill, Alcoholics Anonymous No.1. In 1934 he had been given up by his doctor as hopeless. Shaking and bleary-eyed, Bill was visited by an old drinking crony who had got religion, gone dry, looked as if resurrected.

"But I don't believe in God," Bill argued.

"Why not try your own idea of Him?" asked his friend "It's only being willing to believe in a Power greater than yourself."

Himself powerless, that hit Bill where he lived He went back to the hospital where they had failed to cure him, and again went through what alcoholics call the de-goofing routine. He lay on his bed absolutely helpless, hopeless and all alone. Then he said out loud: "If there's a God, let Him show Himself now." For the first time in his life Bill knew he was nothing.

Suddenly it was as if a horrible cloud had lifted; it was as if he lay in warm, bright sunlight. Everything was okay. It scared him. He rang for his physician, Dr. William D. Silkworth of New York, who had given him up. "You said I was going to go nuts, Doc. Is this it?" The doctor looked at the new light in Bill's eyes as he told the intensity of his happiness.

"Something's happened to you, Bill," he said. "I don't understand it. But if you're nuts, you'd better hang on to it."

Dr. Silkworth was a great man who had failed with all human science and was humble enough to use God for a medicine. From now on out for Bill it was God alone. That night Bill asked, "Aren't there thousands of hopeless drunks who might be glad to have what's been so freely given to me?" That was 16 years ago. Bill had been saved to start Alcoholics Anonymous.

Miracles become medically respectable only when they pile up into big statistics, scientifically authentic. By 1944 there were about 20,000 active AAs, all former derelicts, all now sober and working. What struck me then, and has since, was not so much that the AAs I met were dry but that they were a new kind of human being.

Earl, whom I've known intimately for years; is the founder of a powerful AA fellowship in a large city. Unmarked by his years in the gutter, he is serene and radiates reliability. Busy with his work, he still spends half his time salvaging drunks, never refusing calls day or night. He's a kind of Sermon on the Mount, walking.

"How did you get this way?" I asked.

"It isn't only me, we all had to get this way to save our lives," said Earl, smiling.

Earl's cure didn't begin like Bill's at all. Earl had no blitz conversion. Beat up by years of terrific drinking, frantic, his brain revolving, sleepless, half-starved, in black despair, snarling to himself that he'd lick this thing, but now licked by it and on the ropes, Earl met a man who had helped Bill found AA. This man, Dr. Bob, gave Earl no pep talk, no piety. He only told him the tragicomic story of his own sickness. "That's me, that's the way I drink, exactly," said Earl. "You're the first man I've ever met who really knows the score."

To Dr. Bob, Earl admitted for the first time that he was an alcoholic, incurable by himself. Though he had been too big for God, Earl now mumbled that a Power greater than himself was all that might save him. Was it Dr. Bob? No, Dr. Bob was only a man who understood him. So Earl began confessing his years of cruelty to his wife, his little girl, his father. He poured out his resentments that had driven all his friends away. He ruthlessly wrote down his crimes, like a dead beat who at last faces his debts.

Before he had half-recovered, Earl began to work to save hopeless drunks who were going to die. He saw his own half-formed faith help to drag doomed men from asylums and the undertaker's doorstep. This made his alcoholic craving fade without his fighting it; his hatred of others vanished automatically, without his battling it. Dr. Bob, other AAs, Earl himself? They were only instruments for something beyond human. Themselves were nothing.

So Earl began to get humility. He hasn't had a drink for 13 years.

He was AA No. 13 when his life was saved in 1937. Now there are close to 100,000 ex-doomed who are active members of AA in 3000 fellowships. Chronic alcoholism is unique as a disease in that its successful doctors are simply its ex-victims who have nearly died themselves. That's the secret of AA's astonishing growth. They are only laymen, but what doctors! They take their drunken patients into their homes. They offer encouragement in getting jobs and straightening out financial troubles. They do not complain when saving a souse means losing their sleep, and then interrupts their business next day. They comfort the drunks' frantic wives. They make incessant trips to police courts, jails, hospitals and asylums.

Of course the AAs have a secret weapon: it's only by curing all these others that they keep on saving their own lives. They know they themselves are only one drink from being drunkards; their helping others alone insures their own sobriety. It builds up their faith--which they know, without works, will die.

Like all good doctors they're alert to danger signals. The way some AAs have relapsed into deadly alcoholism confirms the faith of all AAs that they are instruments of a higher Power. When an AA thinks his abstinence has taught him to handle his liquor, when he thinks he can run his own show, he's a goner. Yet AA's record of recoveries is amazing. Of those sincerely willing to stop drinking, 50 percent do so at once; 25 percent make solid recoveries after a few elapses. Failures are most frequent among victims who have been forced in by anxious relatives or employers. Patients--open-minded as only the dying can be--must come in on their own.

AA has the practically unanimous approval of the medical profession; thousands of physicians now send patients who are beyond medical help. Dr. Harry M. Tiebout, noted psychiatrist of Greenwich, Conn., explains the character structure of alcoholics. They're egocentrics. He says their truly accepting God changes their deep inner brain pattern and brings sobriety.

Even so, AAs admit they've only scratched the surface of alcohol's mass tragedy. They can tell of many heartbreaking failures.

Here medical science bids fair to come to the rescue. While Dr. James J. Smith was studying thousands of alcoholics brought for emergency treatment (not cure) to Bellevue Hospital, New York, he spied a chemical hope against delirium tremens. What threatens the lives of DTs? Not merely their seeing snakes or purple crocodiles. Dr. Smith found the blood of DTs dangerously thick, their blood sugar perilously low. About to die, they breathe extremely fast, have a feeble, super-rapid pulse and a fever that may shoot up as high as 110.

It dawned on Dr. Smith that these ominous signs somewhat resembled the often fatal crisis of Addison's disease. In this disease there is a failure of the adrenal glands just over the kidneys, mysterious little hormone factories absolutely essential to human life. Not so long ago victims lived for only a short while. But now they can be kept in pretty fair health, even working, by injections of hormones from the cortex, or outer layer, of the adrenal glands of slaughtered cattle.

Jim Smith put two and two together. He shot big doses of adrenal cortical extract (ACE) into DT victims in their terminal stages. It was resurrection. Within 24 hours they lost the nightmare visions that often drive DTs to suicide.

Their shakes disappeared and their hearts again beat strongly and slowly. Their fevers rapidly cooled to normal. Dr. Smith then shot ACE into victims of alcoholic insanity who suffer neuritis and incessantly invent tall stories. Within 24 hours their pain, their crazy confabulations and their wild excitement were down to zero.

Injections of ACE soothed the hang-over heebie-jeebies that drive chronic alcoholics to take a hair of the dog that bit them. It calmed the fearful tension that comes on before the new binges of periodic alcoholics. In 1947, Dr. Smith reported the good news that, in general, alcoholism seems chemical. By last May Dr. Smith, as Director of Research on Alcoholism at the New York University-Bellevue Medical Center, was able to confirm his findings in a report at the annual meeting of the Medical Society of the State of New York.

Meanwhile, Dr. John W. Tintera of Yonkers, N.Y., and Dr. Harold W. Lovell of New York, after an independent investigation, had reported in 1949 that ACE practically eliminates the agonizing drying-out period that baffles alcoholics who are fighting to keep from drinking again. In victims who had been alcoholic for ten and even 20 years, injections of ACE magically cut down the craving that is the Gethsemane of these sufferers.

The ACE treatment of alcoholism may be a two-edged weapon. It may threaten Alcoholics Anonymous, who with their nearly 100,000 active members are right now the most successful doctors of chronic alcoholism. Shots of ACE seem so much easier than the AA's search for God.

But Drs. Tintera and Lovell urge all their hormone-treated patients to join AA. And Dr. Smith does not consider ACE a cure for alcoholism. "Even with this treatment," he says, "the alcoholic cannot drink" (i.e., without a relapse). The hormone treatment is still new and experimental, while scores of thousands of AAs have been dry for years.

struggle. By birthplace, heritage, tradition, habits, looks, and tone of voice Alcoholics Anonymous is unmistakably American. And yet in almost every way it contradicts the stencils by which non-American minds gauge American achievement. It has almost no money and wishes it could do with still less. In fifteen years its membership has grown from nothing to 120,000, yet it never urges anyone to join. Of formal "organization" it has almost none, yet it avers it "ought never to have any." A man or woman becomes a member by simple declaration, and need share his decision with only one other human being. There are no pledges or constraints in A.A.; no records that must be kept or quotas that must be broken. Seniority confers no favors. A.A. has one purpose only: "to help the sick alcoholic recover, if he wishes.

In a world whose spiritual values have dropped close to the vanishing point, the strange society of A.A. places its entire proposition upon the reality of spiritual experience. It achieves harmony among a membership in which Catholics associate not only with Protestants and Jews but with high-decibel agnostics or fancy religionists of species known only to God. Its members, who know better than to contradict the psychiatrists' diagnosis that they are "grandiose, infantile, and self-absorbed," practice daily an Obedience that has no enforcement mechanism and no system of punishment for infraction. The one rule common to every A.A. clubhouse is that if, as rarely occurs, a member seeks to attend a meeting while drinking, he is escorted to the door, with the invitation to return only as soon as he recalls his society's purpose.

If A.A., successful and American, had a password proof against any member's forgetting, it would be "Failure." One by one, each member tackled something that proved too big for him; only when he acknowledged his inability to deal with a circumstance that most people can meet with ease was he able to -become a full member of this organization, of those for whom "one drink is too many and a thousand aren't enough." Dentists and doctors, stevedores, ministers, cops, poets, publishers, matrons, vocational-guidance counselors, stenographers, artists, bartenders, and master mechanics are all to be found in A.A.'s ranks, as diverse and exclusive as a classified telephone directory. Yet all have a common vantage point; each one, from a broad and comfortable ridge, has a clear view downward into the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

Although alcoholism is a state so complex that a leak-proof definition is impossible here, a clinician can, in his own bald terms, describe it simply: "a progressive, incurable and fatally terminating disease." That alcoholism could be arrested was well known, but this knowledge -was for many years almost useless, for the arrestment was up to the drinker: would he or would he not stop? Usually he would not, no matter how he longed to, for he was inwardly convinced that he could not; so long as he knew that a couple of quick ones would give him a desperately bought temporary relief from his sufferings, he could see no permanent way out. Psychiatry's dictum that alcoholism was only a symptom of a deep-seated psychic disorder was not very helpful in the crisis forever engulfing the alcoholic and his family.

It dawned on Bill W. * in 1934, when he was close to the last stages of alcoholic disintegration, that if he attempted to help other alcoholics he might thereby help himself. He went to work--and found himself able to stay sober for the first time in years. But this was cold comfort, for the drunks on whom he worked stayed drunk. He was on the verge of a relapse that might well have been final when he met the drunken Dr. Bob in Akron. Only then did it dawn that the help must flow two ways: one-sided preachment was useless, but when help was mutually offered and accepted between two suffering and desperate drunks, each of whom sought to help himself by helping the other, a new element entered into a materialistically hopeless situation. As a result of this help from the helpless, Bill W. stayed sober and Dr. Bob got sober, and the nucleus of Alcoholics Anonymous was formed. By the end of that year A.A. had three members. By the end of another year it had fifteen. By the end of still another it had forty--divided among Akron, New York, and Cleveland. That was all.

Since those years A.A. has evolved into a membership of 120,000 divided into some 4,100 local groups. Metropolitan areas such as New York, Cleveland, Chicago, and Los Angeles may harbor 100 to 200 groups each. Ninety prisons have A.A. clubs within their walls, and over 100 clubs exist to further the A.A. idea, although not formally affiliated with A.A. In Chicago the weekly "intergroup" meeting never brings out fewer than 1,200 A.A.'s at a time. In New York, the "Annual Banquet" may have to be abandoned unless some way can be devised of splitting it into sections, for no hotel has a ballroom large enough to seat it.

Much more important are the statistics of sobriety. Of those who make a genuine effort to stop drinking through A.A. principles, 50 per cent get sober at once, and stay that way. Another 25 per cent get sober after some relapses. The remaining 25 per cent show improvement. A.A. is not out to make a showing. It refuses to screen its membership, as some doctors would like, to eliminate the "hopeless" cases; gaining a statistical advantage is not A.A.'s purpose--and furthermore an impressive number of "hopeless" cases have recovered. A.A. quietly and with good cause believes that all those who relapse or drop away will be back later and permanently, if they live. The word "cure," however, is not in the A.A. vocabulary. On the contrary the man who succeeds in staying sober must still recognize himself as an alcoholic.

Suppose you were to go to an open meeting of A.A., as you are perfectly free to do. You would find yourself in a group of from thirty to 300 people, one-third of whom might be women. (Only 10 to 15 per cent of A.A.'s active membership is female, but non-alcoholic wives of alcoholic husbands are attending meetings in increasing numbers, and this attendance is strongly encouraged.) The average age would be between thirty-five and forty and is steadily growing younger; it used to be that an alcoholic seldom recognized his trouble until his middle forties, whereas now, with greater publicity for the whole problem, he sees what is wrong sooner; today, some A.A.'s are not much over thirty. Prosperous, less prosperous, and poor would be represented in about equal thirds; so would the educational levels of college, high school, or less. If this were a typical meeting, 40 per cent of those present would be Catholics--double the number you would encounter in an exact sample of the U.S. population. At the other end of the scale are the Jews--represented by no more than a sprinkling, even in New York. **

There is no use trying to draw conclusions from appearances; the blowzy old lady near the front may be a casual visitor who never had a drink in her life, whereas the pink-cheeked, white-haired gentleman who looks like a deacon may have had a record of fifty alcoholic admissions into hospitals and jails. The group is probably meeting in the parish house of a church, a political clubhouse, a public auditorium, or a small mezzanine banquet room of a hotel--any place where an evening's rent is reasonable and the atmosphere is neither so high-toned as to discourage a man wearing out his last pair of shoes nor so forbidding as to scare a Caspar Milquetoast. The air is dense with tobacco smoke, and the evening's chairman has to bang his gavel hard to cut through the loud, familiar talk. There is no set speech for chairmen, but a typical opening might be something like this:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I wonder if the new people who are here for the first, second, or third time would please raise their hands. . . . That's fine. I'll ask the old-timers to please make themselves known to the new people and try to see they have a good time. As you know, AA. groups have two kinds of meetings, open and closed. The closed meetings are for alcoholics only, but tonight is an open meeting, so everybody is welcome. If there are any reporters here I just want to remind them that they can write anything they like so long as they don't use anybody's name. You've got to respect us on that because some people are funny: they usen't to mind being seen in the Hotel Metropolis so drunk they couldn't stand up, but they're still a little bit sensitive about being seen sitting down here cold sober. . . .

"Maybe you think we have some fancy test that can tell you whether you're an alcoholic or not. But we haven't. The only person who can decide whether you're an alcoholic is yourself. If you want a little helpful hint I'll tell you something I heard Fanny J. say at a meeting a couple of months ago: when anybody stops boasting about how much he had to drink the night before and starts lying about it, there's maybe just a little bit of a chance that he's getting to be one of us. But that's up to you.

"Some people are able to get the A.A. program while they still have their jobs and their wives and their homes, but there are others who don't seem to be able to quit drinking until they've lost everything. That's given rise to the saying that there are `high-bottom' drunks and `low-bottom' drunks. But remember what Bill W. said: `The difference between the high-bottom drunk and the low-bottom drunk is that both are lying in the gutter but the high-bottom drunk has his head on the curb.' We are all drunks. If you think you are a drunk we invite you to join us.

"You're going to hear from three members tonight, and they're all going to have very different stories to tell. All we ask of you new people is that you keep an open mind. If you don't happen to hear anything tonight that fits in with your own story, or reminds you of your own pattern of drinking, please keep coming, for sooner or later you're bound to hear something that hits you right where you live.

"And I ought to tell the newcomers that we don't practice any religious ritual of any sort here, except that we end every meeting by standing up and reciting the Lord's Prayer, and we ask you all to join. The first speaker this evening . . . "

The first speaker, and every speaker at every A.A. meeting, begins with one standard line: "My name is _____, and I am an alcoholic." Thereafter he says exactly what he likes, and what he usually likes is to tell the story of his drinking, and how, eventually, he came into AA. What a newcomer, feeling in his heart of hearts that he is an alcoholic, expects to experience at the first meeting can never be known, except it is a good bet he does not expect to be shaken with laughter. But that is what usually does happen to him, and what usually dissolves his intention of leaving after the first twenty minutes and making a dash for the nearest bar. No one has quite such terrific stories to tell as an alcoholic, and once he is released from his fears and shames by having put his alcoholic activity behind him he makes a formidable raconteur, using his old self as the butt of his new. The laughter that shakes the hall is the laughter of recognition.

Over and over, the newcomer hears references to the Twelve Steps and in particular to the Twelfth Step. The Twelve Steps constitute at once the philosophy of A.A. and its means to therapy for the alcoholic who is making an honest attempt to stop drinking. They are not absolutes, but are presented as suggestions. In condensed form for the quick-reading non-alcoholic, they are these:

First, the alcoholic admits that he has become powerless over alcohol; that his life has become unmanageable. This is the admission of failure without which his ego does not undergo the deep deflation that seems the key to success.

Next, he comes to believe that only a Power greater than himself can restore his life, and turns his will and his life over to the care of God as he understands Him.

Further, via nine detailed suggestions, the alcoholic undertakes a searching moral inventory of himself; admits to God and one human being his wrongs and shortcomings, asking God to remove them, and himself making the human amends possible. He seeks by prayer and meditation to improve his conscious contact with God as he understands Him, praying only for knowledge of His will, and the power to carry that out.

Finally, having had a spiritual experience, he tries to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all his affairs (the Twelfth Step).

"Alcoholics Anonymous" said Bill W. when the American Psychiatric Association invited him to address it in 1949, "is not a religious organization; there is no dogma. The one theological proposition is 'Power greater than one's self,' but even this concept is forced on no one. The newcomer merely immerses himself in our society and tries the program as best he can. Left alone, he will surely report the gradual onset of a transforming experience, call it what he may. Observers thought A.A. could appeal only to the religiously susceptible. Yet our membership includes a former member of the American Atheist Society and about 20,000 others almost as tough. The dying can become remarkably open-minded. Of course we speak little of conversion nowadays because so many people really dread being God-bitten. But conversion, as broadly described by William James, does seem to be our basic process. . . .

"Our deep kinship, the urgency of our mission, the need to abate our neurosis for contented survival; all these, together with love for God and man, have contained us in surprising unity. There seems safety in numbers. Enough sandbags muffle any amount of dynamite. We think we are a pretty secure, happy family. Drop by any A.A. meeting for a look."

Among the toughest of the tough, the lowest of the low, the most cynical of the cynical, the program works. The alcoholic, man or woman, is merely urged to look again at the idea of a Higher Power, and to dissociate that idea from the old-man-with-the-whiskers, the angry Santa Claus, the avenging anthropomorphic tyrant with which he was stuffed and terrified in his childhood. Gradually the phrase "as you understand Him" takes hold. Sometimes the concept of the Higher Power can be accepted only by some elaborate stratagem. One alcoholic, determined in his agnosticism, at last solved his problem by accepting as a Power greater than himself the steam radiator that clanked and hissed in his miserable room. It was hot and full of energy and burned him when he touched it. It was sufficient. The radiator clanked inscrutably; the alcoholic stopped drinking.

One by one, the speakers who rise and tell their stories 12,000 times or more a week the country over are driven to say the same thing: "I don't understand it, but I don't need to; it works." Certainly one thing that works is the feeling of fellowship engendered by several hundred people in the same room, every one of whom knows at firsthand the exact horrible details of alcoholic suffering. Most alcoholics, before they encounter A.A., are convinced that nowhere in the annals of medicine or abnormal psychology can any parallel to themselves be found. "It may be all right for some people but it would never work for me" is the most common first response heard by an A.A. having his first talk with an alcoholic who does not yet dare to hope. Nothing is a more powerful solvent to this sort of suffering egotism than being physically surrounded by several hundred people, every one of whom once held precisely that same thought, and slowly realizing that the horrors once thought to be unique are, in reality, a universal experience in the society of A.A. Most A.A.'s carry fat address books in their pockets; in these are crammed the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of the A.A.'s he has met inside or outside his own group. This is the equipment he needs for what is known as the Nickel Therapy: when the desire for a drink reaches dangerous proportions, the AA. drops a 5-cent piece in a coin telephone and dials the number of a fellow member who will sit out the siege with him.

The Twelfth Step, by which alcoholics work with alcoholics, does not mean that A.A. evangelizes, proselytizes, or whoops things up in any way among "hot prospects." If a despairing wife calls an A.A. (almost every sizable telephone book in the U.S. has an A.A. number in it) and asks that he "try to do something with Jim," the first inquiry must always be directed to the point, "Does Jim want it?" If the answer is "No, but God knows he ought to," the AA. will beg off seeing Jim and have a chat with his wife or family instead. Only when Jim is ready to talk will the AA. go to work directly. Even then, there is no urging. The A.A. member will talk not about Jim but about himself. He will emphasize that no A.A. takes any sort of pledge of sobriety. He works, instead, on the "Twenty-four Hour Plan," which the A.A. often expresses as "Tomorrow I may go on the damnedest bender you ever heard of, but I'm not going to have a drink today. The Twenty-four Hour Plan is of vital importance to those who have newly stopped drinking--for to them, nine times out of ten, the contemplation of the balance of a lifetime without the solace of alcohol is intolerable. Yet A.A.'s who have been dry ten years or more still wisely make their plans for sobriety no further than a day in advance. The first longing of someone who has stopped drinking is to be able to resume it successfully; only slowly is this point of view replaced by the one that says "I wouldn't take a drink now, even if I could." All this the A.A. discusses at low pressure.

Where the A.A. truly burns to get something across to the suffering alcoholic is in telling him that not only is life possible without alcohol but it is a damned sight more pleasant. This is difficult. A universal feature of advanced alcoholism is a sharp constriction of interests: the alcoholic who once belonged to a choral society, went to sketch class once a week, collected matchbooks, and went on short-line railroad excursions has now abandoned all these things in favor of continuous drinking. It is hard for him to find his way back to these things alone: it is hard for him to find his way back to society at all. But A.A. offers him a society that will instantly welcome him, ask him no questions, but instead begin to deluge him with the mirthful, frightful record of its own calamities.

A.A. is founded on the Christian principle of Love. It is the fashion, even in these dark days, for the worldly to scoff at such a declaration, but the A.A.

somebody else get sober.

Since I was a nurse, it seemed logical that the best way to meet this requirement would be to find a job in an alcoholic ward.

That's how it happens that during the past five years I've nursed more than 5000 alcoholics through the fading hours of their most spectacular sprees, in the AA ward of Knickerbocker Hospital in New York City. Helping other alcoholics to get well has become my life work.

Friends look at me with frank disbelief when I tell them I love my work because I meet so many nice people. That statement, applied to men and women who have indulged in every folly, benign and malignant, may be a little hard to swallow, but I really mean it. In five years only one patient has ever taken a swing at me, and it was a woman patient, at that. Being female myself, and redheaded besides, I promptly socked her back. After that she was very co-operative.

The only other violence was of my own instigation. A fresh, peppery little man--he came about up to my shoulders--kept pestering me for a drink, and drinks are not served in alcoholic wards. To stall, I told him he would first have to take his pill, which I knew would put him to sleep. "No drink, no pill," he said, and I retorted, "No pill, no drink." This kept up until my patience was gone. I turned the little fellow over, paddled his bottom and said, "Now, will you take the pill?" He took it nicely, and from then on we were good friends.

One thing has begun to be a little irritating, but only because of its monotony. About every third male patient, when he first comes in, takes a bleary gander at the white uniform and the red hair and croaks out a sally that's supposed to brighten everybody up--"H'r'r'm'm'm, do you go with the room?" They usually apologize the next day.

Yes, most alcoholics are nice. In no other branch of nursing within my experience are such respect, consideration and gratitude accorded the nurse by the patients. Even the most berserk were likable before they ran afoul of firewater, and can be likable again. The recovered alcoholics I have known have been quicker to help and readier to forgive, possessed of a livelier understanding and faster wit, than the general run of people. After recovering, that is. Drunk, they can be pretty dreary.

The origin of our ward is closely connected with the origin of AA itself. AA was founded in 1935. By 1939 it was evident that, though the movement was reaching a pitifully small percentage of the alcoholics who needed help, it was nevertheless achieving greater success than anything else ever had. Sufferers flocked to AA by the hundreds, many of them needing immediate medical treatment. The AA program of rehabilitation is based on understanding, friendliness, honesty and faith--all things requiring maximum application of the mental and moral faculties. Many desperate drunks who wanted AA could never stay sober long enough to do the necessary clear thinking.

At this point a great team--the AA founders." Bill," a New York broker, and "Doctor Bob," an Akron physician--stepped forward with an idea. Why not a place where sick alcoholics could be sobered up under expert care and at the same time gain a foothold in AA? Private-hospital officials, conditioned to believe that drunks could mean only pandemonium, were chary. Then, in 1939, such a ward, of eight beds, was established at St. Thomas Hospital, in Akron. In 1945, Knickerbocker, a private general hospital with 200 beds and a forward-looking management, agreed to open its doors, and thus the first AA ward in the East was born. The third floor of one wing, with a capacity of nineteen beds, was given over to the experiment.

The ward's success surpassed its backers' hopes. AA volunteers are on round-the-clock duty, ready to discuss the temptations and techniques of the life of sobriety. Half our patients, we estimate, go out from Knickerbocker into immediately successful AA lives, and two thirds eventually find their way to recovery. St. John's Hospital, in Brooklyn, and St. Michael's, in Newark, have opened wards after the St. Thomas-Knickerbocker pattern, and other hospitals have the plan under consideration.

I'll never forget my first day on duty. I spotted a wistful-looking little man with a red face and blue eyes waiting outside the ward. He was alone, and I knew that no patient could be admitted to this particular ward unless accompanied by a member of AA. Eager to demonstrate my efficiency, I said brightly, "Don't worry, we'll take care of you. Where's your sponsor?"

I took his bag and was about to remove his hat when he turned kindly old eyes up at me and said, quietly, "Relax, young lady; I'm Doctor Silkworth."

At that moment I wanted to sink through the three floors to the basement and on down into bedrock. Dr. W. D. Silkworth was widely known as one of AA's first medical advisers. Besides, he was the doctor in charge of the ward! Since then I've learned to tell the difference between doctor and patient, and possibly a few other things. You can't work with a man like Doctor Silkworth--as I did until last year--when, at the age of seventy-eight, he died--without learning something.

The traffic in our ward is evidence that alcoholism is no respecter of prestige. Two eminent men appeared for treatment just a few weeks after their pictures had appeared in advertisements as endorsers of special brands of strong waters. Ministers and priests are frequently our guests, as are doctors, lawyers, engineers, pilots, editors, housewives and stenographers.

Contrary to a popular notion, the alcoholic is not just the man in the gutter. The scion of a Social Register family once inherited a sizable fortune while recuperating in one of our beds. We've had a prominent judge, a famous senator and a member of Parliament. Practically every race and nationality has been presented, and the patients' occupations have spanned the alphabet from auctioneer to zither player. Our sample indicates that Irish stock is the most susceptible to alcoholism, Jewish the least, and that no ethnic group is immune.

Influx by occupations seems to be related to the calendar. Around mid-December we get a lot of housewives in the women's ward. Early in January the policemen begin coming in, and a little later that month the musicians. In February there's a concentration of publishing people--illustrators, writers, editors, advertising men. March is the month for business executives, great and small, and April brings a parade of salesmen. The rest of the year it's an odd assortment of bankers and peddlers, sailors and tailors, stenographers, bookkeepers and storekeepers, with an age range from nineteen to eighty-one.

As for the seasonal tides within occupations, one must remember that a person is not an alcoholic just part of the time. If he's an alcoholic at all, he's one all the time. He needs only an occasion involving extra liquor and extra tension to set him off. These situations seem to arise at different times of the year in different occupations.

Take the housewives. Around the middle of December the kids are home for Christmas vacation. The weather is bad and they can't be out of doors all the time, so they're underfoot and quarreling. There's the endless business of Christmas shopping--what to get Uncle Fred, and did old Aunt Minnie give us anything last year, and how much to spend? This last factor must be weighed against the family budget and the husband's disposition. On top of all that, the routine work must go on, but it's the season to be convivial. What is more helpful to the spirit of joy than a little nip, particularly since people are freer with their liquor at this time of year? Then there are lots of parties. And there's the haunting feeling, to a person having even a sketchy religious background, that Christmas was supposed to mean something quite different from all this. A woman who'd been walking the alcoholic tightrope up to then might easily fall off and land in Knickerbocker, with me.

Cops have a similar situation. During the holidays they have more traffic, more shoppers, more thefts, bigger crowds--in short, more police work of every kind. Bartenders are known to be solicitous of the men in blue. When holiday business is good and weather bad, there's no lack of little nips to warm ye. Christmas and New Year's tips to the officer on the beat are traditional, and they frequently come in the shape of a bottle.

The alcoholic cop may be able to stay in harness through New Year's Eve somehow, but he's likely to be ready for expert care very early in the year's first month. The same goes for the orchestra lads. The holidays are the time when they play their biggest jobs, get their biggest tips and the most free liquor.

Why the publishing crowd comes in during February, I don't exactly know. My hunch is that the so-called "creative" folk may be a little more sensitive to weather than the rest of us, and those February doldrums in these latitudes would get almost anybody down. One February we had quite a delegation from the editorial staff of a famous, and somewhat snippy, national magazine. I guess those creative imaginations got going on how nice it would be in the tropics, and local reality seemed just too grim. But as I say, you have to be an alcoholic first, before the weather can do much about it one way or the other.

In many industries, orders are placed for the whole year in one of the early spring months. These are tense times for executives and salesmen. If it turns out to be a big year, they're exuberant; if it is a bad year, they're gloomy; and both states of mind are sure to bring action from the alcoholics.

On entry, our patients are a beaten and penitent lot. They've been picked up by AA's wherever they happened to be when they called for help. They come from precinct lockups and flophouses, Bowery dives and penthouse suites, suburban estates, country clubs and furnished rooms. Nobody is ever brought to our ward against his will. Indeed, they're given to understand by their sponsors that they're lucky to get in. We have no repeaters--patients are admitted once, and only once. Sponsors deliver them, their suitcases and eighty-five dollars in cash in advance, then leave. Now begins the five-day course.

Once signed in, the patient's first two days are the most worrisome. It is in this period that deep depressions due to remorse are most likely to occur. The ward came near being discontinued during its first month, when a depressed patient found his way to an unbarred window and jumped three floors to his death. AA supporters quickly passed the hat, raising $1000 for strong steel screens. We've never had another attempted suicide. No patient is admitted who shows signs of oncoming delirium tremens or convulsions--these are sent to a municipal hospital equipped to handle disturbed patients--but sometimes the doctors guess wrong. Last year, among 1000 patients, we were caught with two cases of convulsions and a dozen of DT's.

Delirium tremens must be sheer hell. Its onset is marked by acute nervousness. First come the auditory hallucinations; then, usually the visual. The patient hears his name being called, or a violent argument in progress, or non-existent loud music. Then he begins to see things. I've had patients ask me in all seriousness to watch where I stepped so I wouldn't squash the strawberries. One demanded to know how the geese got into his room. These visions are sometimes, but not always, frightening. The strawberry and goose people were quite calm about what they saw. Heaven knows what fiends and horrors they're seeing when they scream. The worst case I ever saw was a man who was convinced he was being run down by a train. Most patients, during DT's, have moments when they know that what they're seeing is not real--and times when they're completely convinced of its reality.

No one condemns the alcoholic as he, when the remorse is on, condemns himself.

We give them vitamins to re-establish nutritional balance, fruit juices to combat dehydration, and bromides and belladonna for jagged nerves. By the third day they're beginning to take an interest in the world again, and that's where Duffy's Tavern gets in its wonderful work. (Duffy's Tavern is a kind of clubroom in the men's division, where patients meet and talk.)

The five days are planned as a chain of healing that will lead back into a life of sober usefulness. The first couple of days there's nothing much to do but medicate and feed them and maintain an attitude of good-natured understanding. This in itself, for people who are accustomed to contempt, hostility and despair when they're "on one," is an important part of the treatment.

I have a couple of devices of my own for maintaining morale. Every patient gets a nickname. "Cuddles," "Peaches," "Saint Anthony," "Pontius Pilate," "Napoleon," "Pinhead" and "Windy" are my favorites, and I use them over and over. We also make a good sport of treatment with the B-complex needle. This is inserted in the part of the anatomy scientifically known as the gluteus maximus. When I come into Duffy's with the needles, calling, "All right, boys, bottoms up!" I can always count on an assortment of grunts, groans, grouses--and laughs.

On the third day, patients are encouraged to move around. In the women's ward, there's visiting from room to room and talks with AA's from the outside; and, for the men, socializing in Duffy's Tavern. The patient begins to realize he's not alone in his plight. If others can endure it, he guesses that he can too. The fog begins to clear, and memory, at least partly, returns.

One time a husky tugboat captain who'd been staring gloomily out the window of duffy's suddenly snapped his fingers and exclaimed, "Nyack!"

"What do you mean, `Nyack!'" asked a mounted policemen.

"That's where I left my tugboat, ten days ago!" the skipper replied.

"Hey, I just remembered," said the cop. "You know where I left my horse? Van Cortlandt Park."

People sometimes wonder how we AA's can extract so much comedy from our own tragedies. Alcoholism is tragically foolish and, believe me, there's very little comedy when the drinker first realizes the full consequences of his drinking.

After the calamity is honestly faced up to, though, and a new life has begun, we figure there's no use brooding over it.

One of our patients, a New York politician, took a route to Knickerbocker which is typical of some of the more flamboyant toots. He'd been drinking for several weeks and had obviously had more than enough when he stepped into a bar where he was well known and ordered a drink.

"O.K.," said the bartender, noting his condition, "but first you better go out and get a ham sandwich and a cup of black coffee."

The politician discussed this step with another drinker. Concluding that it was sound, they set out for a nearby diner. On the way, they got to talking about the races in Florida.

"Let's go," said the politician.

"O.K.," said the friend. They took a cab to La Guardia Airport and in a short time were in Miami. The politician, besides being a follower of the races, had a wide acquaintance in the New York and Miami police departments. A policeman recognized him as soon as he stepped off the plane--his heavy overcoat and derby were easily spotted in the Florida sun.

"Look, chief, you're drunk," said the cop.

"You'd better go home."

"I guess I am a little, at that" said the amiable politico, and stepped aboard the next northbound plane. Back in New York the same bartender was on duty at the same bar.

"Where'd you go for that sandwich?" he said, spoofing. "Florida?"

"Yeah," the politician said, and in a couple of hours the bartender was drunk' too, loudly asserting that it could not be. Meanwhile the AA alarm had been sent out for the ward boss, and a pair of AA's who'd been scouting New York for him closed in.

The silliest story I ever heard in Duffy's was about a party I nicknamed Old Number Seven. His wife, to bring him off a prolonged binge, had removed all his clothing except his underwear, while he slept and had locked his closet door. When he awoke he was faced with the problem of how to get out and get a drink. He found a pair of tennis sneakers, ripped a square of cloth from the sheet, painted a big figure "7" on it, pinned it on his back and stepped out onto the avenue as a cross-country runner, headed for his favorite saloon.

AA volunteers, many of them graduates of the ward themselves, drop in at Duffy's and swap yam for yam. In this way many patients realize for the first time what alcohol has been doing to their lives and glimpse a way out. One man convinced his wife that the best plan for their security in old age was to sell their home and invest the proceeds in "a sound business"--a bar and grill. He quit the office job he'd held for thirty years and went into the liquor business. He drank up the establishment--capital, surplus and profits--in a year. Facing up to what he'd done, he resolved, in Duffy's, to start clean. Now he's one of our most effective volunteers. He hasn't got his home back yet, but he's back at his old job, pays the rent provides meals and stays sober.

One wealthy suburban housewife, mother of six school-age children, was the worst brat of the lot. Everything was "simply too much" for her. The children were too noisy and demanding, her husband too busy and preoccupied, household routine too dull, the cares of community living too numerous--she had to get drunk, for solace. Our ward, followed through by AA brought a change. Now she not only has ample time for her home, her husband and her children but is also a skillful AA worker, president of her PTA and a truly wonderful person.

The fifth and final day of our treatment brings its own special hazards. The patient's head is clear, his strength has returned and he has found new and understanding friends. Now he must face the world outside, the mess he has himself created. He slept poorly the night before. This uneasiness is so common that we even have a fancy name for it--"pre-discharge tension" Discharge day is the despair of many alcoholic wards. To many patients, the shambles outside seems beyond solution--they streak to the nearest bar, the deadly cycle begins all over again, and much good work is undone.

Our ward takes certain precautions. Nobody can be discharged unless he has been signed out, in person, by his sponsor and has been safely conducted to his home. He's encouraged to attend the weekly meetings of his local AA group. There he learns that other men and women of his community--some of whom he knows and respects--have somehow found the courage to deal with situations at least as disastrous as his own. He digs in. In almost exactly half the cases, he's back in a few months as an AA volunteer, ready to help others back along the path to sobriety.

Of course, we have our casualties. Every now and then I hear of somebody who once spent five days with us and who is now dead, either of convulsions in some other hospital or a suicide somewhere. These are the sudden ones; the slowly dying are just as pathetic. There's a nice old gentleman who lives in a big house by the seashore, alone except for a butler and maid. He doesn't need AA, he says. Every time he gets tanked he calls me up and begs me to marry him. In this condition there's no use trying to talk any sense into his head, so all I can do is kid him along. It's kind of hard, though, when I know for a certainty that one of the lonesome little drinking bouts of his is going, pretty soon, to be his last.

The reasons for failure are among the many mysteries connected with this baffling disease that researchers are still trying to unravel. Some people seem incapable, drunk or sober, of the clear thinking necessary to grasp and apply the AA program of living. There are physiological, neurological, racial and cultural influences that are only beginning to be understood.

But one of the greatest hazards, in my opinion, is pride. Many thousands with otherwise sound minds are enduring alcoholic torture rather than humble themselves to share the companionship of the genial ex-tanks of high and low estate who make up their local AA groups. They, and those who care for them, pay a terrible price for such pride. I know a "self-made" business executive who came home drunk one night and was exasperated when he found his wife and daughter asleep. "Just to get a rise out of them," he fired a bullet into the wall, lay down and played dead. He says he's not an alcoholic!

My own story? Humdrum enough. I was born in New York City, attended Catholic grade and high schools until I was eighteen, then spent three years in nurse's training at St. Mary's Hospital, in Passaic, New Jersey. I was a happy-go-lucky kid, and the glamour of the nurse's cap wore off when I discovered the discipline and effort it took to win one. When I met a big, hearty and, at that time, thoroughly enchanting Swiss, I gave up nurse's training and took an office job in New York to be near him. We fought hilariously for seven years and then were married. Sometime during that period I found time to finish my nurse's training, but I never worked at it.

My husband was a man who worked hard, played hard and drank hard, though he was not an alcoholic. At the time unaware of any distinction between the mere heavy drinker and the alcoholic, I drank with him. His recreational passions were hunting and fishing. I went along on his sporting trips, enjoying them thoroughly--up to a point. That point was when I'd got liquored up and was feeling sorry for myself. I was "neglected," and I began to make spiteful remarks. My patients tell me I have a ready tongue even when sober, and in those days I must have been something. Our quarrels, once more or less good-humored, grew increasingly bitter. My drinking, I now realize, was showing definite alcoholic symptoms.

I was bored most of the time, and drinking seemed a handy antidote. We had had no children. I lacked the initiative to practice nursing, and time hung on my hands. A couple of the girls would drop in at our apartment during the morning. We'd talk for a while, then have a drink. I'd nibble at the bottle during the day and would be pretty well along by the time my husband came home. A few drinks with him and a party that night and I'd either be blind, stupid, quarrelsome drunk or passed out.

How many times I've heard those admonitions that haunt every alcoholic: "Why don't you just have a few and enjoy them? Why don't you drink as we do?" Why couldn't I stop, once I started? I didn't know. Exactly how my husband and I stuck it out for eleven years I'll never understand. The blowoff came in 1945. He told me he was through and packed me off to Reno.

It was a devastating blow to my pride. I thought I'd been the one who was putting up with him. I learned, suddenly, that he'd been tolerating me. During the next two years I worked in a Reno department store, toured in Hawaii and visited San Francisco. I returned to my own family in New York in 1947, completely licked. I now found that I couldn't drink at all without getting drunk. Therefore, I had to be careful. My life was made up of stretches of sobriety punctuated, at ever-closer intervals, by short, despairing binges. When my brother-in-law told me about AA, I was ready.

My first AA meeting was, in many ways, a disappointment. There was a strictly "low-bottom" panel that night, that is to say, the speakers were not Harvard and Wellesley graduates--"bottom," in AA parlance, means the lowest state of alcoholic squalor a person will accept. Their drinking had carried them so much farther along Hobo Highway than mine that we seemed to have little in common. It left me with a conviction, though, that these people had the answer. The Twelve Steps of AA won me immediately--admit our frailty, seek God's guidance, repent our misdeeds, make amends, take a moral inventory, help others. Here was religion actually lived. Many are successful in AA without believing in God. To me, the highest power has always been the same God I used to know in church. Here I also learned, "once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic," which explains why, even after five sober years, I say that I am, present tense, an alcoholic. We stay sober one day at a time, never forgetting that we are alcoholics and therefore cannot take the first drink.

After a month of daily increasing happiness I was struck with an overwhelming sense of gratitude. I was grateful to that lonely handful of men who formulated the AA principles of recovery and set them down; grateful to the thousands of alcoholics who, in the face of every conceivable difficulty and temptation, had picked up these tenets and doggedly clung to them, fighting to hang on to their sobriety so it could be passed on to me. I felt I must do something in return.

When I learned about the AA ward at `Knickerbocker I knew what that something would have to be. I was a trained nurse. During all the years I had frittered away, that training had seemed meaningless. Now it made sense--I was meant to work in that ward. I bombarded the supervising nurse with telephone calls by day, and prayers to God at night, and three months later I got the job.

These five years have brought deep satisfactions. I can't convey how much it means to me to see the transformations in people. They come to us physical, mental and moral wrecks. They leave encouraged but still uncertain. Then, months later, they come back--bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked, eager to help; job back, family back, going concerns again, ready to pass on, with dividends, what's been given to them.

To know that I had some small part in this rebirth is a blessing far beyond what I deserve. The failures, the lost ones? Well, they're sad, of course. However, we must accentuate the positive. But for the grace of God, all of us might have been lost.

admit, the chances are you are an alcoholic. When I say that word, I have named a person afflicted with a disease. It grows progressively worse, constantly narrowing one's world until nothing is desired and nothing is real but alcohol.

Because you are a woman, your drinking life is probably most secretive, for you have done everything possible to hide it from everyone, even from yourself. And you may have succeeded. Perhaps nobody knows - yet - that you ever take a drink. For you dare not drink one cocktail in public, knowing that the first drink is the stumble at the top of a long flight down which you will inevitably tumble. You may become a "bedroom drinker," and I may have followed you at this moment into your own room, where you intend to reach for a bottle hidden under your lingerie or in an innocent hatbox on the top shelf. Your family may not yet be suspicious of your frequent "headaches."

On the other hand, you may be one of those shadows who live their lives in the twilight of bars and cocktail lounges. You may be the neighbourhood problem or the town scandal. Your family may have stopped trying to cover up for you; not even your children try to make excuses for you any more. Or you may even have lost your family because you were helpless about your drinking.

But at whatever stage you are at this moment, there is hope for you here. And neither blame nor shame should be attached to you. You do not deserve the self-righteous pleadings and the aggrieved accusations that everyone has showered on you. "If you loved us, you'd stop." "You think of nobody but yourself." "You should be ashamed of yourself, with all your education and opportunity!" You are not a selfish, immoral monster. Indeed you are quite the opposite. You are a desperately ill woman.

After you realize this, the next fact for you to accept is that you are free from any guilt. When you admit you are an alcoholic, you no longer deserve to be blamed and punished (beyond the inhuman punishment you have been giving yourself). You must only recognize that you are ill. Your illness is dangerous. It can destroy everything it comes near; unless it is arrested it can destroy the mind and the body of its victim. But it is no more your "fault" than having hay fever or diabetes would be. Alcohol is a poison to you if you are an alcoholic.

You are not alone in the indescribable torture that is alcoholism. There are countless thousands of women like you in early or late stages of falling to pieces. Of the sixty-five million people in our country who use alcohol, more than four million are problem drinkers. An estimated 650,000 of these are women. It is difficult to count them accurately, because women, especially housewives, can hide their condition better than men. They can hide it, at least, for a while. But the woman alcoholic suffers more acutely than does the man; her psychology and constitution are more complex and more sensitive. She can endure her self-loathing less easily, and she feels much more keenly the social stigma an ignorant society still puts on alcoholism. I don't need to tell you that, I'm sure. I wish with all my heart it were mere interesting theory to you, but I know it is not.

The bravado that insulates men alcoholics does not come to women like you until they have almost killed their real selves within their ill bodies. I have heard many women alcoholics say, " I was completely dead inside myself. Nothing could reach me and help me."

It is difficult for most women to admit, even to themselves, that they are alcoholics. Yet this admission is their first step toward sobriety and sanity. If you have not taken that first step already, let me help you make to today. For if you can admit that your inner panic and devastation are symptoms of alcoholism, you are ready for help.

My purpose in writing this letter to you is to tell you that, in spite of your desperate illness, you can "rejoin the human race" and live a reasonable normal life. In fact you will find that life to be much happier than average living. You will not return to the old life you enjoyed before alcoholism overwhelmed you. That life was not good enough for you; you tried to escape your frustration and despair by losing it in drink. This life I'm going to tell you about lies on the other side of a great experience, and you can find it and be exactly what God had in mind when He made you.

Alcoholics Anonymous is what I'm writing to you about. It has stopped the drinking of nearly a quarter of a million desperate, defeated men and women and redesigned their lives. If you are willing and humble enough to let it work for you, it will not only make today's drink your last one forever but will give you a new way of life, indescribably good and of benefit to all who see it.

The general public has little comprehension of the way A.A. works, and, in fact nobody can explain it intellectually. But there is multiplied evidence that it does work. After admitting yourself to be powerless over alcohol, if you sincerely want help, you ask a power greater than yourself to take over your life. On a superficial level this would mean little. But on the deep emotional plane where this asking occurs (and with all you suffering endorsing the plea), the strongest force a human being can experience is released. The presence of this felt power is stronger than the alcohol, which up to that moment had been the paramount urge, overmastering love of family, self-respect, and self-preservation itself. The A.A.'s cannot easily discuss this tremendous experience. But it does not need to be discussed; its results are beyond any doubting. Nobody knows how it works, but it does.

Let's talk about you a minute. How did you become an alcoholic in the first place? Not just out of cussedness or meanness, of course. Medical science and psychiatry have established the fact that many people drink to excess from emotional causes. I've know two women who became alcoholics because they lost their children, and many because their husbands failed them. Most alcoholics are perfectionists and idealists. They expect to accomplish wonders with their lives; when they cannot live up to their ideals, they cannot face their disappointment in themselves.

In spite of what others usually believe, alcoholics have terrific consciences. They care so deeply about everything that they cannot endure the stress and strain of worry. When an irresistible conscience meets an immovable inability to endure the agony of worry, there's a wide-open invitation to excess drinking. Emotional conflicts in you supersensitive people become so unbearable that escape, amounting to total obliteration, is sought. In some alcoholics a feeling of inferiority born in childhood builds up a compensation mechanism that creates egotism gluttonous for praise and success and never satisfied with what is offered to it. In women, the too fat ego demands flattery, indulgence, and, in some cases, continual romance. Disappointed in her excessive demands for perfection, a frustrated woman sometimes believes the dreamy promises of alcohol, the heartless deceiver.

When these extreme emotional tensions exist in addition to bodily allergy, alcoholic ruin is inevitable. People drink because they are unhappy; they are unhappy because they drink; and the vicious spiral whirls on until one cannot tell which was cause and which effect.

The way back from this unfathomable torture must include treatment for both the emotional obsession and the physical illness. Psychiatry and medicine have worked together on thousands of cases and in some have been successful. But their record of permanent success is discouragingly low. The alcoholic is called the "heartbreak of the medical profession," because all too often the physician knows that the beaten, suicidal body he is restoring will come back to him in a few months in exactly the same, or a worse condition.

The positive results of Alcoholics Anonymous are inexplicably high. It is usually estimated that nearly 75 per cent of alcoholics who try A.A. therapy come through to success. In some cases it is fantastically simple. At the end of their own resources, they ask for A.A. help, and from that day on never take another drink. In other cases they are "on and off" the program for months. I know of one young woman who tried for three years to make it. Even some of the A.A.'s who worked with her lost faith in her chances. But she stubbornly believed she would finally be able to stop drinking. One night last week I went to her third "birthday" party and I saw her blow out the candles on her cake.

She was unrecognizable as the person who struggled so hopelessly through many twilit years. When she first heard of A.A., she had been drinking for eight years, since she was nineteen. Her family had finally given her up, for she had drifted lower and lower until she was beyond their reach. At the age of twenty-seven she looked forty - fat and sloppy and maudlin. It was almost impossible to look at the tall slender girl in a smart white frock, blowing out the three candles, and believe she had any connection with the blowzy, fat woman who took her last drink three years ago. She has lately married a wonderful, substantial man who understands her perfectly and admires her wisely. They say they have the prize marriage in captivity, and I must say it looks just that.

One of the miracles of A.A. is that it transforms bodies as well as emotions and minds. The very substance of flesh and hair seems made over. Women whose bodies have been degraded by neglect and abuse now value their appearance, because, as one said to me, "God just seemed to paint a new portrait of me."

That wasn't mere wishful thinking when I said you could find more than average happiness in the lives of A.A. members. Of all groups on earth, the people who have rescued themselves from the undersea horrors of alcoholism are the most exuberantly joyous ones I've ever found. They are not indifferent or bored now; all living has quickened to importance for them. Does it seem unbelievable to you that you could ever be so conspicuously happy - without anything to drink? You'll learn new meanings for the word "happy."

When you stand outside a room where a group of Alcoholics Anonymous is meeting, the most frequent sound you hear is laughter. Mellow laughter, which can come only from people who have looked destruction and catastrophe in the face, not once but continuously over long years, and now are free and unafraid. The laughter, in short, of people who hold God's hand and feel safe.

That is the basis of Alcoholics Anonymous, the fact almost incredible to a world that is half-afraid to expect much of God in everyday life. The single thing that decides whether or not you will find your sobriety, the A.A.'s say is your willingness. Willingness to admit that you are powerless over alcohol and that your life has become unmanageable. Then willingness to turn your will and your life over to God, as you understand Him. This is not glib willingness, by any means. It is not achieved until you have passed your last outpost of helplessness. It is at the point where "Man's extremity is God's opportunity."

It is such a deep cry for help that sometimes you yourself do not recognize it as prayer. Until after it has been answered, that is.

For example, let me tell you about how a friend of mine found A.A. I'll call her Nora because that is not her name. A.A. provides absolute anonymity; one need not hesitate about trusting the privacy promised. Nora had been an unhappy child in an unhappy home. Not much had ever gone right for her, and she did not believe it ever would. As she grew up, one tragedy after another happened, and she tried to escape by drinking.

The first good thing that came into her life was the love she and her husband had for each other. Soon after they were married, Nora realized she was an alcoholic. Before marrying she had believed she drank because she was unhappy; now that she was happy she found herself unable to stop drinking. She did everything possible to keep her husband from realizing the truth about her. But her craving for alcohol was so uncontrollable that as soon as he had left in the morning she gulped down several drinks. (Alcoholics drink faster than most people.) She lay in bed most of the day, hating herself. When her head felt as if it would split, she put an ice pack on it; and when her husband came home, she quickly slid the ice pack to her cheek, saying she had a toothache.

Gradually, of course, he found out the truth. He begged her to promise not to touch alcohol, and she eagerly did. But the next time she was alone, she was powerless to resist. Her husband got medical help for her, but it did no good. She spent many sessions in sanitariums; those too failed.

Nora told me about this period a few nights ago as she was driving me to an A.A. meeting at our county jail. She said, "I've never been in jail myself, but I know about solitary confinement. An alcoholic has prison bars inside his own skull. He exists behind those bars in solitary confinement."

This wretchedness continued for many years without a ray of hope. Then one day she had an accident while driving. The doctors told her husband she was going to die. Amazingly she recovered, and this seemed to her one more evidence of her tragic bad luck, for she was sick of existence.

On the way home from the hospital, her husband told her he was going to put her permanently in an institution, for both their sakes. She said she would be committed willingly, because she loved him too much to keep killing him by inches.

At home she was put immediately to bed, and she tells me that for the first time in her life she cried out within herself to God. "If you can hear me, help me," was all she said. She went to sleep for a while, and when she woke up, she asked her husband to call a doctor. He said, "Which one, dear?" for many doctors had drifted in and out of her muddled existence. She said the first name that came into her mind, a doctor she had not seen for years.

In half an hour he was beside her bed. Since he had worked unsuccessfully on her case, he had become interested in A.A. Immediately he phoned the local A.A. office, and within an hour a woman member arrived at Nora's house.

Nora has never taken a drink since. She is convinced that the moment her very simple prayer was said, it was answered. She never doubted that her outcome was therefore safe. She is now a gentle and beautiful woman, full of happiness and freedom. The fear and inferiorities and her superstitious belief that she was marked for "bad luck" have completely dropped away. Her life is filled with activity and interest. But she never for a day forgets that she has surrendered herself and her life to God's managing. She remembers she is an incurable alcoholic and that one drink would plunge her back into darkness. She tells me that every night before she sleeps she says, "Thank you, God, for keeping me sober today."

To show you how complete is the allergy in some alcoholics, I'd like to tell you the story of a grandmother, whom we'll call Jane, who took the first drink of her life when she was fifty-nine years old. It was at a bridge party with some new neighbours. The other guests had only a glass or two of punch, but Jane couldn't seem to get enough of it. In fact, before the party broke up, the hostess mixed her several cocktails, for it seemed most amusing to see the proper little middle-aged woman suddenly so crazy about drinking. By the time Jane's husband, Jim, called for her she was hilariously making a nuisance of herself. Jim got her home and into bed, and she fell immediately to sleep. But just as she was dropping off she said, "Jim, we've missed the best part of life. Tomorrow I'm going to mix you some nice cocktails."

The next morning Jane went boldly into a package store and bought a bottle of rye. Her intention was to have one drink, for medicinal purposes, and to save the rest for cocktails to show Jim what they had been missing. But the one drink led Jane straight through the bottle. She was an alcoholic, completely and fully developed, just waiting for the first drop to set her off.

From that day on she was a problem drinker, completely out of control. At first it seemed screamingly funny that this could happen to such a little homebody. But before a month had passed, both Jim and she knew she was in real trouble. Her sons couldn't believe what had happened; it sounded too fantastic. But there was no doubt about her alcoholism, for nothing else mattered to her but her day's quart. Her minister prayer over her; her daughters-in-law kept the grand children out of her sight; her physician gave her a drug, Antabuse, which creates an aversion to liquor. But that neatly killed her when, in spite of warnings, she drank alcohol immediately afterward.

Six horrifying years followed. When she couldn't get money any other way, she went out on the street and begged for it. She sold her clothes, stole from her husband, and even got a job cleaning up a cocktail lounge, "for drinks." The day she was picked up by the police as drunk and disorderly, she hit bottom. Then, all by herself she went to an A.A. meeting. It was the beginning of the way back.

An Alcoholics Anonymous meeting is a tremendous experience I for anyone, even for a nonalcoholic like me. First of all, you are surprised to discover that it is not a solemn occasion. You find a cross section of types present, and except for those who are attending for the first time, everyone is laughing and talking. Only first names are used, for purposes of anonymity. The only distinguishing mark of the group is that everyone is unusually kind and affectionate toward everyone else. It is as if all shyness and shame and pretence have been stripped away and people are acting spontaneously - from within themselves instead of from the cautious exterior.

A.A.'s have told me that they felt at home for the first time in their whole lives when they attended such a meeting. This is understandable, for here no one criticizes, or blames, or is disgusted or shocked at anything. Here is utter understanding, because each person present has suffered through the same purgatories. Here also are people you cannot fool with the alibis and dodges and deceits the alcoholic always has at hand. Here are people who know 'em all and cheerfully tell you so. It is a relief to be among such people after you have lived for years in a maze of lies and subterfuges. It is as exhilarating as if you discovered a whole new race, with meanness and false pride omitted. It is as comfortable as if you were in a room full of people who all turned out to be yourself in different guises. You know you can trust them to see you as good - and as bad - as you are, without blame or shame.

Meetings follow a simple pattern. In California, for instance, an A.A. meeting would proceed in much this way: A chapter called "How It Works" is read from the Alcoholics Anonymous "textbook." A member volunteers to act as chairman to conduct the meeting. The chairman may begin by saying, "Good evening, friends. I am an alcoholic." After telling a little of his own history, he introduces speakers he has selected to tell about themselves. Each speaker, man or woman, tells what he was, what he is now, and how he made the trip between the two states of being. They tell their stories with complete frankness and often with much humour. A n alcoholic attending for the first time id often shattered with relief at hearing the horrors, which all his life have been mentioned in self-righteous whispers, now being talked about in plain words and with laughter. Inhibitions and self-condemnation too painful to admit collapse like walls of wax under this quite simple therapy.

When I ask A.A. how they can laugh and joke about their old sufferings, they say, "Well, you see, all that happened to my worst enemy. Not to me, certainly." It is the most wholesome kind of divorcement from the past that any therapy has ever achieved. The past was a series of hangovers; but when that past departs, it leaves neither hangover nor scar.

At the end of the meeting there is a moment of silent prayer; then everyone rises and repeats the Lord's Prayer in unison. I defy anyone to take part in this and remain untouched. Then there is coffee and cake and an hour of friendly companionship. Many alcoholics have become bankrupt in their social live, and A.A. offers them comfortable and easy opportunity to make friends again and to "belong."

There are meetings every day; in Los Angeles alone there are thirty-five meetings nightly. They are usually attended by slightly more men than women. There are also stag meetings for men who feel freer when no women are present, and all-woman groups, some of which meet in the morning or the afternoon.

Besides the usual meeting places, in many cities clubrooms are maintained, where friends may have a meal together, play a little bridge, read magazines, or just talk (one of the alcoholic's favourite enjoyments after years of

By George Dolan

It isn't easy for a guy to go on a bender while he's in prison. Inmates figure all their weekends behind bars are lost - but not because they've fallen off the wagon.

Still, in Huntsville, Texas, an Alcoholics Anonymous chapter flourishes in "The Walls" - prisoners' tag for the main unit of the Texas prison system.

"There's no problem here of a man going out on a drunk," admits the sponsor, Howard L. Sublett, "But liquor is the reason they're here. They were slaves to the bottle."

The A.A. members behind prison walls are trying to condition themselves mentally for a return bout with the free world when - and, in some cases, if - they leave.

Sublett, the chapter's sponsor is the 28-year-old assistant director of the prison system's Bureau of Classification. A thin, dark, intense young man, he donates his time and is one of the few non-alcoholics in the world able to take part regularly in an A.A. movement. He's as wrapped up in the program as are the alcoholics. His only "pay" comes from results.

A 35-year-old Dallas ex-convict paid him a bonus early this year. The former prisoner, who joined the chapter in "The Walls" while serving a ten-year robbery term, rejoined his wife and two children when he was released.

"You'll never know how happy I am," he wrote Sublett. "I'm working every day in a machine shop. And every night I drop on my knees and thank God I was able to find myself through Alcoholics Anonymous."

He was a member of the original group organized in June, 1948, at the penitentiary. Inmates themselves formed the chapter; and they run it, too.

Members meet every Sunday afternoon and are often joined by A.A.'s from the free world.

The bond between "inside" and "outside" members of the A.A. movement is strong. "When an Alcoholics Anonymous member leaves prison," says Sublett, "he invariably is met by free members. They take him into their homes, lend him money and help him find a job. This follow-up work is half the battle."

The "inside" members have no secrets from one another. At their Sunday meetings they rehash their lives and the influence alcohol has lent.

The spiritual therapy has helped the chapter secretary, a 28-year-old former Air Force man from Detroit, sentenced to life imprisonment in 1950 for rape, decided that "I've got something to live for now. Alcoholics Anonymous has

SLOTH

First in a mini-series dealing with the seven deadly character defects.

Sloth has long played a false role as a minor defect, more to be smiled at than feared, a back-row fault the alcoholic could ignore. The word itself usually expresses indolence, scarcely a serious item. So it is necessary to find out just what sloth means. It must be a lot worse than sitting in the shade to watch the dancers.

Since sloth is spiritual, it might be well to see what some authority on spiritual matters believes. One of the best is St. Thomas, whose writing is full of pertinent ideas for an alcoholic. He says that sloth is "melancholy in the face of spiritual good." (The AA who is sober, but always seems to have some dismal complaint?) The real evil of sloth, then, would be a stubborn refusal of joy, a grim holding on to guilt, depression, and melancholy, which can lead to despair - loss of hope. One of my sponsors said the chief factor that can cause a recovered alcoholic to drink is a loss of hope, from any cause.

For the alcoholic, sloth means being aware of the AA path of recovery, yet refusing to follow it, because the whole sobriety package seems too hard to accept. There are a lot of Gloomy Gus and Melancholy Minnie types who revel in their miseries and bog down completely, often tainting the lives of all close to them. They spurn help or friendship, and if they are "slippers," as is often the case, they keep mumbling, "It's no use. I can't forgive myself. I can't stop drinking." They guzzle themselves right into the grave, or into some mental hospital where their last state is worse than the first. (This is not meant to slight clinical depression, a genuine illness requiring all the skill that dedicated psychiatrists can and do give their patients.)

When we consider that sloth can take an alcoholic right to the gates of doom, it ceases to look minor. It takes its place among the most rightly feared of the seven deadly character defects that can trap the alcoholic.

Envy

Second in a mini-series dealing with seven deadly character defects

No one would argue if you said at a meeting that resentments are among our worst enemies. But resentments, like alcoholism, are a symptom. When you go looking for the cause, envy will often be dug out of the woodwork. Yet most people think of envy as a mild flaw, easily skipped over in the Fourth Step.

The truth is that envy has long since earned a high place among character defects. Like many an insidious foe, it has a way of throwing sliders that can fool anyone. As long as our defects go unrecognized, they have a way of growing; they aren't likely to fade away and get lost without real effort by the victim. And envy can sour the thinking process like sauerkraut in a milk-shake. The victim would never admit this. (Guilty ones rarely confess anything. Ask any judge, lawyer, or jury.)

To envy means "to feel annoyed or aggrieved at the superior possessions or advantages of another person." Any time an alcoholic gets annoyed in this way, there is danger ahead. What shows first as irritation grows quickly into resentment. Emotions can merely simmer; but as in a kettle with the lid jammed on, pressure rises, and resentment can burst into rage.

So what started as a touch of mild envy may eventually boil into something lethal and end in tragedy (which to us means a drink).

Suppose someone remarks here, "Why worry about it? Remember, Easy Does It." There is a strong answer.

It comes from Bill W., AA's co-founder, who noted in the Grapevine (November 1960) that alcoholics have three choices in seeking sobriety: (1) "A rebellious refusal to work upon our glaring defects can be an almost certain ticket to destruction"; (2) for a time, we can stay sober with a minimum of self-improvement and settle our selves into a comfortable but often dangerous mediocrity": or (3) "we can continuously try hard for those sterling qualities that can add up to fineness of spirit and action - true and lasting freedom under God."

If we take the third course, we'll begin with a "searching and fearless" look into ourselves. Do I envy John or Jane Doe, recently promoted while I sat still? Or their new car while mine is old and rusty? Or the fact that his son made MIT while mine took a low-level job? The list will be long; for each, it will vary; but honesty will show that envy warps countless minds.

Envy has a long arm; its fingers touch many sides of our thinking, and therefore influence our actions. Is this a human frailty that can't be helped? No! Once anyone uses the Fourth Step without reserve and begins to see exactly what is wrong, a start can be made. Only that is needed. Perfection isn't in reach. But willingness will open many gates, and the road ahead can be upward, if we so choose, one day at a time.

Greed

Sixth in a mini-series dealing with seven deadly character defects

If you tried to pin a big "G" for greed on anyone's chest, you might get a punch in the nose. You would be asked what in blazes this has to do with sobriety. But a little Fourth Step digging will get at the truth.

Greed is an excessive desire for more than one needs of anything. It is like an ingrown toenail, tough to get at and tougher to cure. I was greedy from childhood on - first, for more toys at Christmas, more vacation trips, more school honours, and then, after college, for better jobs and cars, more fun and games.

When booze came along, the overblown wish for "more" shifted to alcohol, and the life graph turned down. The vital question after reaching AA and finding the Steps was: What to do about it?

Going outside myself was suggested by everyone I asked. Greed is a spiritual cancer; like all our defects, it grows within us and has to be overcome by positive action on the outside. This is not easy - a deeply entrenched growth won't yield to a once-over-lightly touch. It takes strong daily effort. I must first spotlight greed, with the Fourth Step, and then go outside myself, with the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh, to seek help against it.

Experience shows that something like this can work: (1) Get a good idea of how far greed has blinded you; (2) if possible, go over the problem with another person; and (3) with the aid of Steps Six and Seven, prove serious intent by starting surgery.

Pinpoint some opposite qualities, such as generosity and kindness, and work toward them. The opening for most of us will be small - perhaps a a place of residence, occupied by men who would rather live in skid row than elsewhere. It is geared to their thinking.

Skid row would revolt others; yet these others have their own bottom in life, and I have heard a middle-aged son of a great banker say, after a splendid comeback in A.A., "I was never on skid row; I brought skid row to my apartment!"

Each group of A.A. members has its meetings, open and closed. Members speak. They discuss their problems. And they usually bring out their "low," their "bottom" in the drinking career.

One member said, "I owe a good deal to A.A. I now have two suits, a job, an apartment; when I awake I know what day it is, what happened last night. And only a little while back I was doing life in prison on the installment plan."

So he was. In Los Angeles, twenty days in jail for being drunk. In Tucson, forty-five days in jail. In the next town two weeks. Wherever he went, he got alcohol, whether cheap wine or the more costly whiskey, or just plain rubbing alcohol, if broke. And he always landed back in jail. This went on for years.

He got to thinking: "I have killed no one, but I am serving a life sentence." His low was unpleasant, but he was lucky. Somewhere he read about Alcoholics Anonymous and he asked for help. He got it, it turned out, that help which amounted to an unconditional pardon.

My last post was that of radio executive, before I went to A.A. And in the Philadelphia A.A. club, where I first became associated with members of the fraternity, I was approached by a man walking gracefully into the twilight of life, his hair white, his steps firm, his eyes as young as a boy's. He was a celebrity. He was the head of a big manufacturing concern. He told me his low.

His skid row was a room in one of the city's finest clubs. Days on end and weeks on end he remained in that club, speaking only to his chauffeur, who came with mail, and to the houseman, who came with bourbon. Bourbon by the bottle.

Finally, a banker arrived. There was a discussion of notes that were due, of the company president whose desk had been empty so long. And then the glove was flung to the floor: "Give me your stock or pay the note by 3 p.m.," said the banker.

Well, you do not have that kind of money around if you have taken residence in the black swamp; so the manufacturer got his stock together and gave it to the banker. And then he called A.A. He had hit his bottom.

He got his stock back. His firm is secure now. My friend summers in Maine and winters in Florida, but, wherever he is, he keeps in touch with A.A., and today he will tell new, flustered, insecure members his story of hitting bottom. It helps tremendously.

Another who told me his low was another highly successful businessman. He still had a fine home and a going business when he came into A.A. And a skid row in his rumpus room in the basement of his suburban home.

He drank alone, in bars alone, at home alone. There was nothing social about his drinking. It was guzzling.

So he kept his favourite whiskey in his basement rumpus room. And one day his wife went downstairs and found him there, fogged up, shaking, bewildered. There was a finger of whiskey left in his last bottle. He was sitting on the floor. He had been there for hours.

His wife took in the situation, inquired how he was doing, and he complained that he would soon be in terrible shape, because he did not feel up to going out for more liquor and he was running desperately low.

His wife went back upstairs. Presently, in half an hour or so, she was back. She had a case of whiskey. She placed it beside him and said, "There.. .drink yourself to death."

My friend says it sounded like a command, and it cut through the fog in his brain and told him something. It told him he'd hit bottom. His basement floor was as hard a bed as skid row concrete.

He did not drink that case of whiskey. It's been better than seven years since he's had a drink. Now he spends a good deal of his time helping out at the club where he learned about living happily with sobriety, and where he told me about hitting bottom and recognizing it.

Of course there are less spectacular bottoms. The laborer who slept for years in boxcars, wound up in the Salvation Army's place at Roxborough, Pennsylvania, talked with visiting A.A.'s and later got a job and stuck around. Ten or more years, that's been, and today this man who lived in boxcars has a wife and children, is a personality in A.A. and his community.

There is, too, the former head of a public utility. Now ten, eleven years in A.A., he will sit at a table in the A.A. club, have coffee and tell you that his son - in banking - changed his name legally and that was a low.

The same son, years later, heard of his father's late-in-life change for the better and called on him with a Christmas present. There is the suspicion he called as much in curiosity as for any other reason, but he remained for days.

Now they correspond and that's a good deal.

Capote. He includes an alcoholic district attorney who knowingly framed innocent men, and others who abused their families and friends.

> His most disturbing conclusion is that a number of history's worst tyrants have been alcoholics. He names Henry the Eighth, Ivan the Terrible, and Peter the Great. The most chilling account is about Josef Stalin, who was not only the son of an alcoholic but was under the spell of alcoholism during the long years when he held absolute power in Russia and sent millions to their deaths. Graham believes it was Stalin's alcoholism that caused him to escape into a bender when Hitler launched his treacherous attack on the Soviet Union in 1941. This virtually paralyzed the government at a most critical moment and left the country helpless and reeling until Stalin sobered up.

> Why did Graham write this book? Though nonalcoholic himself, he spotted secret alcoholism in business associates and came to understand how damaging it can be. He also studied alcoholism and went to the trouble of learning from AA and Alanon members. He came to see how alcoholism often explained behaviors that were otherwise inexplicable.

I appreciated Dick's reply and his information about James Graham's book. It was also reprinted as "The Secret History of Alcoholism," which I feel is the best title. But the index in that version is defective, according to James.

Let's hope that a new version with a correct index is published someday.

leaders hope, bring even more "menacing nuisances" into the organization. "Half the people coming into A.A. today are in this group," Bill W. says, "and the members of this new class immediately identify with each other. Otherwise we couldn't keep them."

Who exactly are these "menacing nuisances?" For A.A. purposes they are that segment of drinkers who are potential alcoholics. According to Bill W., there are certain well-defined symptoms by which they can be distinguished from other drinkers, e.g.: A persistent lack of control over your drinking even when you want to control it and when it is necessary that you do control it.

An underlying maladjustment from which the excessive drinking usually stems.

Like all A.A.'s the new members find themselves in one of the most cleverly conducted organizations of modern times. It accepts no money from outsiders, so that even if you wanted to leave a bequest to A.A. the money would be refused. It also insists on the public anonymity of its members. (last year Bill W. turned down an honorary degree of doctor of laws at Yale because it would have brought him a personal type of glory frowned on by A.A.) Yet these two rules have always been credited with bringing the organization more really worthwhile publicity (i.e., the kind of publicity that reaches alcoholics who need A.A.) than could have been achieved by any other public relations policy. (Good A.A.'s for example, disapprove of such authors as Lillian Roth, who has publicly broken the shell of her A.A. anonymity to write such a best-seller as "I'll Cry Tomorrow." Says one A.A. spokesman privately in this connection: "We have many members who have pulled themselves up by their own resources.")

By equal cleverness, A.A. which has baffled psychiatrists and religionists, has at the same time been approved by psychiatrists and religionists. There was a time when the Catholic Church, for example, did not see eye to eye with A.A., believing that its religion was enough to cure any alcoholic. Then A.A. pointed out to the Church that many of its own priests, far from being able to pull themselves up by their religion, had joined A.A. to be cured. As a result the Catholic stigma was removed from A.A. Yet the basis of A.A. itself, which, once was closely associated with the Oxford Moral Rearmament Group, is a highly individualized religion that has been made palatable for even the most adamant atheist. Organized as what Bill W. describes as "everything from a benign anarchy to a democracy to a republic," the organization is one in which no member can be compelled to contribute anything to it or to believe in any particular dogma. "If you believe," says Bill, "that the hen came before the egg or that the egg came before the hen you have enough religion to join A.A." Even the most scientific alcoholic, the says, has to admit that by the time he gets around to A.A. he can't help himself. Therefore, he has to admit that there's a higher power than himself and, says Bill, "We put teeth into this belief by telling him that God in effect is saying, 'I hope you boys behave' but John Barleycorn is saying 'You'd damn well better behave, because if you don't -'"

By such methods A.A. leaders estimate that they have now corralled 150,000 to 200,000 former alcoholics into their organization, though accurate membership figures are hard to come by, partly because all members of A.A. are allowed to make their own decisions on how closely they will work with the organization and partly because there are thousands of A.A.'s who, being isolated from cities where A.A. groups are able to meet, must in their own words "stay sober" solely by means of "The Big Book" and by means of A.A.'s monthly magazine, The Grapevine. Sales figures of the first edition of the book alone reached mammoth 300,000 copies - a figure that their membership extends far beyond their records. They know, for example, that by means of their tried-and-true methods the French membership has jumped to a great deal from a time when the only A.A.'s in France were American alcoholics in Paris. They also know that A.A. has transcended many international boundaries which are normally not transcended: for example, A.A.'s meet together from both North and South Ireland, crossing the boundary line to do so. One boundary still to be got across, however: the Iron Curtain. But in time even this boundary as well as others may disappear for, as A.A. leaders say, they have a built-in-self-perpetuating system: in order to stay cured every alcoholic has to spend some time helping another drunk to be cured or otherwise he may very well sink back into drunkenness himself.

Today for those alcoholics and potential alcoholics who would like to join A.A. but who are remote from all A.A. groups the new and revised edition of "The Big Book" is now available for $4.50 a copy. (to groups the price is $4.) If you can not find it in your local bookstore the book can be ordered from Box 459, Grand Central Terminal Annex, New York City. Nobody - not even A.A. leaders - can speculate what the demand for the book will be. Only one thing is certain: that is that this edition will do better saleswise than did the original edition when it was first published in 1939. In that year A.A. Publishing Inc., was left with 5,000 copies of a book which nobody seemed to want and for which the unpaid printer's bills were so alarming that A.A. headquarters was actually visited by a deputy sheriff bearing a dispossession notice. Fortunately for everybody, however, the old Liberty Magazine published an article on the struggling organization and shortly thereafter John D. Rockefeller, Jr., sponsored a dinner for the organization. From that moment on A.A. was a success and so was "The Big Book."

> There is in each of us a God-shaped vacuum that only God can fill.

sponsor tried that and he said he would not try that again without someone with him. He was sober a good 13 years at that point and a mature man. He was no fool.

Just as an AA context, I was visiting the local AA jail meeting and we all had a the usual moment of silence. In that moment, I lapsed into Ayin Sof. I could see but I did not evaluate. I knew I was in the room but I did not think about it. I didn't think about anything. I didn't even evaluate the light. I was just there. After that, the leader of the meeting asked people what they thought about during that moment of silence, and then asked me first. I said, "I wasn't thinking of anything." The guys laughed at me, but I was not embarrassed.

I remember what it was like before AA. Before AA my mind was filled with every random thought. I was never free of thoughts, and most of those thoughts were negative. In AA meetings I have heard it called "the committee". To be so free of "the committee" that I could be spend a long minute with no intruding thought at all is a true blessing for me. It must be the path to G-d.

They can laugh all they want. I am free.

From: Glenn Chesnut 4/22/2003 11:06:00 PM

I have never run into the phrase referring to the "the God-shaped hole" in our souls (the more common way it is given) in any works I have read which were written prior to the twentieth century. That doesn't mean it never showed up anywhere earlier, but I still have the suspicion that this is a very modern phrase.

When it's used by twentieth-century authors who are trained theologians, it seems (every place I've read it) to be a modernization of a famous passage from St. Augustine's Confessions, which is cited in its original Augustinian version more than once in Richmond Walker's Twenty-Four Hours a Day, in addition to many other places in many other books.

What Augustine, the great African saint, said in the opening section of his Confessions, was a prayer addressed to God, in which he said, "You have made us for yourselves, and our hearts are rest-less till they find their rest in you."

The image of the hole or vacuum doesn't show up of course in the original Augustinian version, but I have read twentieth-century authors who tried to explain the Augustinian concept that way: there is a place in our souls which is empty and restless, and feels as though it is lacking something absolutely essential, and the soul will keep on seeking restlessly till it finds the Spirit of God to fill up that empty spot.

When the psychiatrist Carl Jung (who certainly knew his Augustine) wrote to Bill W. (who had been introduced to Augustine's writings by Father Dowling), Jung was certainly influenced by that central Augustinian idea when he gave his explanation about people seeking alcoholic spirits to drink (and fill themselves up with) when the only thing that would actually quench their real thirst was the divine Spirit.

Since Augustine has been the most important single author for western Christianity outside of the Bible itself, you find his original sentence quoted and adapted by all sorts of people, in century after century. Pascal was deeply affected by Augustine, so I wouldn't be surprised if he either quoted the original version or made some adaptation of it somewhere in his writings -- I never looked for that precisely, though.

If anyone wants to trace the basic idea back before Augustine (354-430 A.D.), he was adapting an idea drawn from the writings of the classical pagan Greek philosopher Plato (427?-347 B.C.). Plato said (in the Symposium) that human beings were driven by a kind of Eros or Love which, at its lowest level, was only love for individual physical and material things (a fine horse or chariot, or sexual desire for another person). Aphrodite (Venus) and Cupid, as they were normally worshipped by the pagan Greeks, were the symbols of this Lower Eros.

But by training the soul (see also the Parable of the Cave at the end of Plato's Republic), we could learn to turn this into the Higher Eros, which at its highest level was the desire to walk continually in the Sunlight of the Good Itself. (Later Christian, Jewish, and Muslim philosophers all agreed that what Plato called "the Good Itself" was what they called God Himself.) Only when we walked in the Sunlight of the Good Itself, Plato said, could we find real Truth and honesty, and move past black-and-white dogmatic slogans and beliefs (which we had never even examined to see if they were in fact true), and move past all our illusions and denial, and see all the various hues and colors and dimensions of the realities which actually make up our world, as they actually are in truth.

The important thing here though, is that Plato said that Eros was a burning desire to "find the missing part" that fit into a vast hole torn out of our souls and bodies. I am only "half a person" until I can find the piece that fits into that gaping hole.

The precise quote "God-shaped hole" doesn't show up in Plato either. But the fundamental idea of the empty place in our souls, and the restless seeking to fill that hole or vacuum or "missing half" -- a seeking which can only ultimately be satisfied by the divine Spirit -- goes back extremely far in the western tradition, and is basically a Platonic-Augustinian motif.

Hey everyone!

I just want to say thanks to Alex H for sharing his experience in the jailmeeting.

About literature, I'm more in to the christian beliefs than jewism. The book I truly can recommend to every alcoholic is "The Sermon on the mount" by Emmet Fox, which is the text most that inspired Bill a lot when he wrote the big book. A true masterpiece for everyone who wants to be able to grow spiritually in the program.

Much Love Disco Dave, Gothenburg, Sweden.

Help for the Alcoholic's Family

by Jerome Ellison

The exclusive story, with case histories, of a new group that is bringing hope to alcohol's most tragic victims: The wives, husbands and children of the drunkards themselves;

One night three years ago a wife in Long Beach, California, despondent over her husband's drinking, went to a meeting of the local Alanon--contraction of Alcoholics Anonymous--Family Group to see what, if anything, might be done. After an evening of intent listening to men and women who had served as spouses to other drinkers, she returned home with her strategy drastically revised.

Always one to pour the household liquor down the drain when a binge was on, she now purchased five imperials of the finest, lined them up on the kitchen sink and waved an invitation to her husband to help himself. Unmanned by this reversal, he sat down to hear her explanation. He was so impressed by what she had learned about his problem that he returned the bottles unopened and hasn't had a drink since.

Alanon Family Groups, of which there are now about 700 neighborhood units, have produced many recoveries which are hardly less remarkable. The society is not mainly organized, however, to effect such comebacks. This is the province of its parent organization, Alcoholics Anonymous, or AA, the international fellowship of former problem drinkers who keep sober by helping inebriates find sobriety. Alanon tackles the problem from the standpoint of the nonalcoholic who is hurt in the emotional and economic tornado which so often accompanies alcoholism. Its members are mostly wives and husbands of AA members or prospects.

The field for Alanon is larger, the statistics suggest, than that available to AA itself, and the need is scarcely less urgent. The National Committee on Alcoholism, an educational and fact-finding organization, estimates that of the 65,000,000 Americans who drink, 4,000,000 have well-developed cases of alcoholism. A Public Affairs Committee summary of the annual cost to the nation charges $31,000,000 to medical care, $25,000,000 to jail maintenance, $89,000,000 to accidents, $188,000,000 to crime, and $432,000,000 to wage losses. Other costs, such as the addling of good brains, the neglect and abuse of children, the disruption of families and friendships, are borne in large measure by those closely associated with problem drinkers. It is this population segment of 20,000,000 that Alanon Family Groups are intended primarily to help.

"And we need help," says the wife of AA's surviving founder. "After years of living intimately with an acute drinking problem, we've become as jumpy as the drinker, and as much in need of restorative measures."

As in AA, help is given mainly in the form of shared experience. Just as former drinkers are best qualified to appreciate inebriates problems, so the harassments of the alcoholic's, spouse--or brother, father, sister, mother, sweetheart, employer or friend--can best be understood, Alanon members say, by a nonalcoholic who has had similar experiences.

The voices of experience are heard in the talks members give at meetings, during the refreshment period afterward, and through informal get-togethers between times. Sometimes, as in the case of the Long Beach wife, a listener gains insight that results in an immediate improvement of the home situation. Of course, no one had suggested treating alcoholism with alcohol. But the principle that a desire to stop drinking is an inward thing that cannot be created by outside lecturing, threatening, scolding or deprivation, is one of the tenets embraced in a way of life that AA's and their mates call "the program." The Californian grasped it promptly, applied it daringly and achieved a seemingly miraculous recovery.

"Hang around," new members are advised. "Sooner or later, you'll hear a story that exactly matches your own." When this happens, a feeling of belonging is strengthened, isolation is ended, anxiety begins to ease off.

In a recent trip through the East and Midwest I met and talked with scores of Alanon members attended their meetings and heard their case histories. There was a fantastic variety of family narratives, most of them having a happy ending. Families had been salvaged from circumstances seasoned counselors had pronounced hopeless. With the help of AA and Alanon, chronic drunks had been restored as dependable fathers, female barflies had made a comeback as conscientious mothers, families had been lifted from a special brand of hell to a special brand of peace.

"Stories," as members call their talks at meetings, briefly describe the family's condition before AA and Alanon, the circumstances that led to joining and the family record since. The "before" passages often recall days and nights of desperation and shame. "Our house was always a mess," a New York husband reminisced. "I could never be sure my wife would be sober when I came home; we could never entertain friends or go visiting. I hated all of it." A Westchester father said, "I dragged my son out of bars, argued with him, took his money and liquor away. Nothing worked."

Wives spoke movingly of what had happened to their loved ones and themselves. "He was changing before my eyes, losing his gaiety, growing irritable. He was a binge drinker and the binges came closer together."

"Our problem so filled my mind that I found myself forgetting appointments, riding past bus stops, looking at people and not hearing what they said."

"We lived in a small, gossipy, party-line town. We tried to keep up a gay front, but were stingingly unhappy."

From a Western state: "You know the story: father'd get plastered and you'd retreat to a corner to commit mental suicide and murder. I could never know what turn things would take; there was never any security or sense of well being or peace. Finally I built a wall around myself and retreated behind it. We didn't go out for months at a time."

The Alcoholic Doesn't Fool the Children

Some had taken refuge in a dulled acceptance. "I had given up hope and become a martyr. We never talked much; we were almost strangers. He was sure I had stopped loving him; I was sure he had stopped loving me."

"The strain had affected my disposition, and this, in turn, affected the children. Our daughter avoided home like a plague and our son was in trouble at school. Bills at all the stores were long past due, we had no cash, our furniture belonged to a loan company. For a family accustomed to making its way, it was hard."

Others had lived at a high pitch of nervous protest. "When he was out, I'd jump out of my skin when the phone or doorbell rang, chain myself to the house so I'd be there when he returned, visualize accidents, extravagances, infidelities, arrests. When he was home there were spilt drinks, uneaten meals, insults, physical violence, interrupted sleep, ordinary filth, constant quarrels."

One wife said, "Our marriage was held together by a little hope, a large fear and two children."

The children were not fooled. "I always knew when daddy was drunk, by the way he put his key in the door," a drinker's daughter said. "When he was like that I ran to my room and locked the door."

Another recalled: "Kids notice things. I remember them stumbling around saying, This is the way Marilyn's daddy walks."

In some cases a family member took the first step toward family recovery through Alanon, drawing the alcoholic into the AA orbit later. "Our doctor suggested AA as a possible step for our son," one father said. "I began attending AA meetings on my own, and after a time Bob went with me. AA made sense to him right away, and he hasn't had a drink since his first meeting." Later, this father helped organize a family group and served as its chairman.

The alcoholic's response is not always so prompt. "Alanon welcomed my daughter and me and gave us new hope," one wife said, "but my husband didn't join AA until a year and a half later, when being fired for drinking finally opened his eyes."

In a New York City Alanon meeting it was the questing wife, one night, who received the eye opener. After hearing the symptoms of alcoholism described she jumped up, saying, "I don't belong here, but in AA. I'm an alcoholic!"

Some members report having been self-conscious and even suspicious in the beginning. "We had been referred to AA by our minister. I knew nothing about it, and my son was afraid it might let him in for some kind of enforced soul-saving program. He came home glowing after his first meeting, relieved of this and a great many other fears." This Midwest mother learned of the family group, joined and became an effective counselor to other families.

Family groups like to compare notes about how they happened to "come in." Some are awed at the unlikely "chance" which brought help in a desperate hour. A husband said, "One day when I was at my wit's end about Mary's drinking, I ran into an old friend who had been a complete lush, and found out about AA. Mary said she'd try it, and I joined the local family group to help her."

A wife reported: "During the last week of Jim's last bout, a ninety-seven-day affair, I knelt down in my flower garden and said what was probably my first really serious prayer. A few minutes later a neighbor called and suggested I phone AA."

Frequently the alcoholic joins AA and the nonalcoholic partner affiliates with Alanon at the same time. "While I was in the hospital for an operation, my husband drank himself into another hospital. The AA's called on him, and when he came out he was a member. When I came out I joined the family group."

More commonly the alcoholic pioneers in AA, and the spouse joins Alanon weeks or months later. One factor is curiosity. "Something had worked a profound change for the better in my husband," a Buffalo, New York' wife testified, "and I wanted to find out what it was." Another factor is a constructive kind of rivalry. In my visiting around the groups I heard frequent reference to the growth in understanding and maturity of the alcoholic spouse through AA. "We had to find out what it was all about or be hopelessly outdistanced."

Finding out what it's about sometimes comes as a shock. "I was quite put out at my first meeting," one wife said. "I expected to hear my husband's problem discussed, but there was hardly any mention of husbands. I was huffed when one wife expressed the opinion that fear, worry, gossip, criticism, grudge-bearing, self-righteousness and self-pity might be as reprehensible as drunkenness, lying and thieving. This was a shock--it hit home." A more usual first reaction is one of relief. Again and again I heard of the newcomer's reassurance on discovering that others had survived all he now faced and more, and had emerged cheerful and with a solution.

The "after" portions of the stories did not always proclaim unqualified victories over the demon rum. AA claims to be able to help all sincere applicants except those who are "constitutionally unable to be honest with themselves." A number of these are represented in Alanon by their spouses. One wife felt that the Alanon program was successful in her case "simply because I have some degree of serenity and good health, and can feel respect and good will for my husband even though he's just come off a two-week drunk." Another reported dramatic relief from disabling headaches which she believed had been psychosomatic. A five-year member, she is successfully raising her two sons, though her husband remains a pathological drinker. One wife advised newcomers to be optimistic and patient about mates who were slow to respond. Her husband, now sober four years, had taken seven years to "make" AA!

Another group of "after" stories bears a restrained witness to improvement. "Has all disagreement ended in our household?" one woman asked rhetorically. "No, but friendly compromise has become possible."

After a year of Alanon, a wife reported: "The main difference in our family is that now we can talk. The two hardest people on earth to talk to are a drunk and an irritated wife. Now that we've broken the sound barrier, companionship is growing."

Generally, however, Alanon stories reflect a happily reconstructed family life. They are preponderantly enthusiastic. "I'll never forget those first meetings--seeing so many people I knew, never dreaming they'd had the same problem we'd had! I'd been a plain snob! We had all been so foolish to cover up our problem instead of solving it!"

"I've made such wonderful friends! We can laugh and even cry together and understand just what we're laughing or crying about."

"My advice to families with an alcoholic problem is, don't try to do it alone; it's too big."

"We found this secret of harmony: When each partner is trying to remedy his own defects, there's nothing to differ about."

I recall particularly a meeting in Des Moines, which has a family group of the predominantly female variety. Since AA runs more than five-to-one male, this is the usual, but by no means invariable, complexion of the spouse groups. The main AA group in Des Moines has more than 200 members and holds meetings in its downtown clubrooms, over a store at 816 1/2 Walnut Street, on Tuesday evenings. Saturday night is family night, and it is not unusual to have seventy for dinner and twice that many for the evening program of AA speakers. Family group meets on second Wednesdays at eight P.M.

At the meeting I attended I counted about eighty women. There were grandmothers and there was a babe in arms. The twenties and forties were well represented, with the thirties having a plurality. The members were smart in appearance and cheerful in demeanor, and the quarters pleasant. The loft measures perhaps forty by a hundred feet. In the rear are kitchen and dining facilities, a coffee bar and an office. The front portion, where the meetings are held,

is a lounge and auditorium. Presiding was the secretary, a long-limbed, gently spoken matron in her thirties named Dorothy H.

Before the meeting I learned that Dorothy was the wife of Ray H., a prominent local attorney and one of the founders of the Des Moines AA group, and that they have an eleven-year-old son. Ray, in his day, had been jailed eighteen times for drunkenness, and hospitalized countless times. On one of these occasions the attending doctor jotted: "A chronic alcoholic, formerly a man of repute." As Ray's secretary, it was once part of Dorothy's job to cover up for him during his binges. She agreed to marry him only if he'd give up drinking. He accepted the condition and stayed sober three months. There followed four "awful" years, until one day fourteen years ago, when an AA stranger from Omaha blew into town, told Ray he was the man to introduce AA to Des Moines, and wrought the marvel of sobriety.

The secretary and treasurer reported briefly, and members learned that some $17.85 remained in the till. A collection basket was passed, into which the ladies put as much as a dollar and as little as a dime. Four new members were introduced, and presented with pamphlets outlining the nonalcoholics' adaptation of AA's twelve suggested steps, stressing self-examination, self-improvement, prayer and service. A rummage sale was announced among the coming events, and a home-talent show. These latter are popular, drawing as many as 500 spectators. At one of them a prominent local political candidate and AA member offered his services as a target for custard pies. At five dollars a throw, he became a formidable moneymaker. By these and other means, the family group has provided the club with furniture, television, piano, refrigerator, dining silver and kitchen range.

The first speaker, an attractive forty-year-old redhead celebrating the first anniversary of her family's affiliation with AA, said it had been a short year and the happiest of their married life. "When Don came in a year ago, the neighborhood tavern keeper made a pool on which of the first fourteen days Don would resume drinking. The pool was extended to three, then four weeks, then called off. Don likes AA and likes sobriety, and now it's a year. In our house, it was a revelation to learn that for an alcoholic the dangerous drink is not the third or seventh or eleventh, but the first! It's wise to recall the things that happened while Don was drinking--it encourages a sense of gratitude--but unwise, I think, to brood over them. Some of them, recalled a year or two later, even seem funny.

"We didn't go out much, because Don drank all day and wanted only to sleep when he came home. Now and then, to make up, he'd blow me to his idea of a big treat--like the time he took me to a drive-in theater, then snored all through the show. Our social life has improved a great deal, now that people can understand what Don is saying. Don says my cooking is better. Of course, it is. He used to phone at dinnertime and say he'd be home in ten minutes. Two hours later he'd call and say he'd be home in five minutes. An hour later, when everything was dehydrated to the consistency of cedar shingles, he'd turn up for dinner." She had long been in the habit' she said, of cutting out and saving quotations that particularly appealed to her. She read us one: "A clever wife sees through her husband; a good wife sees her husband through."

The next speaker was one of the founders of the family group. "Jack and I came into AA eleven years ago. He's a broker. He drank a lot in his business and we drank together daily, I almost as much as he. Things were not going well with us, with Jack's business, with the children. There had to be a change, either for better or for much worse. Then Jack Alexander's article came along in The Saturday Evening Post, and we began to talk about AA. After three years of talk, my Jack actually joined, and, of course, I affiliated with the family group. It has given me friends, and steady help with current problems, and many good times." She closed by reading the passage of the marriage ceremony that goes: "---from -this day forward, for better for worse, for richer or poorer, in sickness and in health---" It helped her perspective to remind herself, she said, that she had once made such a promise and considered it binding.

The active therapeutic ingredient of AA-Alanon, a mysterious force that AA's are sometimes heard to call "the program," is a little hard to define. After attending meetings over a wide geographical spread, I concluded that the effective essence is not in physical surroundings or programming. In Montclair, New Jersey, and Kew Gardens, New York' the groups met in churches. In Jackson Heights they met in an office building, in Westchester in a museum, in New York City in an AA club, in Buffalo in an apartment. In Des Moines there were eighty at the meeting; in other places the average attendance was twenty. In Westchester and in one of the North Jersey groups, the chairmen were men. Buffalo and New York City had speaker programs. In Kew Gardens and Jackson Heights the meetings were open discussions. In Westchester and Montclair, new members submitted written questions, and the program consisted of older members' answers.

These were typical questions: How far does one go in accommodating an AA spouse's drunken proteges? How do you take a moral inventory? Should liquor be kept under lock and key? To what extent should one cover the lies of a husband who's still drinking? How long after the alcoholic stop drinking does that awful uncertainty persists?

A question which drew a comment from practically everybody present at the Montclair -meeting was: How do I find peace of mind? The consensus was that one never captured it by frontal attack; when it came at all, it was a by-product of some other activity--usually of trying to help someone else. Some found a measure of peace in counting blessings, others in talking out a problem with an understanding friend. Prayers--"Don't let me think that way," "Help me to make the most of this single day," and the familiar AA prayer for serenity and wisdom--were reported as tending to restore tranquility.

The program is obviously flexible as to size, location and form of meetings. I received an impression, however, that it called for a certain minimum of individual effort. A sincere desire to get sober and remain so is expected of the alcoholic; and of the nonalcoholic, a genuine wish to achieve and maintain harmonious family relationships. Reform activities are to be confined to oneself; efforts to change others are to be restricted to friendly concern. Criticism, gossip and grudge-bearing are definitely off the program. One may rib another person only on condition one ribs oneself more sharply. Humility, though regarded as nearly unattainable, is nevertheless to be sought, along with patience, understanding, thoughtfulness and honesty. The participation of a Higher Power is frequently alluded to as a desirable condition for the program's fulfillment. Regular attendance at meetings and frequent contacts with other members are parts of the program. Through these contacts the extraordinary understanding of one sufferer for another finds opportunity to take effect.

The growth of the family groups roughly parallels that of AA, which celebrates its twentieth anniversary this month with an anticipated attendance of 15,000 at its St. Louis convention. The two founders of AA were a Wall Street broker and an Akron physician. From the beginning, their wives were important partners in the movement. They turned their homes into virtual rescue missions overflowing with drunks. As more family men entered AA, there were more wives to be encouraged and advised. The book Alcoholics Anonymous, from which the society took its name, was published in 1939. Special chapters were addressed to the needs of wives and families of alcoholics. When the first meetings were held in members' homes, spouses chatted over coffee in the kitchen while AA's met in the living room. Some went along on responses to appeals for help--"twelfth-step calls"--talking with the sober spouse while the AA dealt with the inebriate. Later, in localities where the AA tradition includes large "open"--to the public--meetings, the nonalcoholic partner attended regularly. Even where there were only "closed"--to all but alcoholics--meetings, enough AA thought filtered through to provoke a lively curiosity.

Mainly, however, Alanon has drawn its strength from a discovery that the affected nonalcoholics have problems distinctly their own--problems which respond amazingly to appropriate application of the familiar ideas which make up AA philosophy. Nonalcoholic auxiliaries, variously called Alanon, Alano, Onala, wives' groups and ladies' auxiliaries sprang up. By 1949 there were about fifty of these. The need for some such agency as a partner and helpmeet for AA was becoming more evident. AA general headquarters at 141 E. 44th St., New York City was receiving a steady stream of inquiries from distracted wives and husbands of alcoholics. Family groups were clamoring for some sort of central facility.

A report on family groups was given at the 1950 convention in Cleveland, which was attended by more than 10,000 AA's and their mates. Returning delegates spawned groups everywhere. In the next five years 650 were formed, including units in Europe, Africa and Oceania. There are now 300 in Canada alone. Groups are so numerous in California that the state had to be divided into northern and southern councils. They are still forming, at a current rate of about one a week. The Alanon Family Groups Handbook, a 200-page two-dollar volume has just--June 1955, made its -appearance. The Alanon Family Groups Clearing House publishes a monthly bulletin and answers inquiries from P.O. Box 1475, Grand Central Station, New York 17, N.Y. It is manned by volunteers; overhead is defrayed by a traditional dollar a member in spring and fall.

AA as a whole has welcomed its offspring, if not always with a wild exuberance, at least with a warm tolerance. What is probably a consensus was well stated by AA's official publication, Grapevine, in an approving article by an initially suspicious member. "This reporter had heard about these goings-on," the piece says, "and, like many a smug AA, assumed they were mere knitting circles. I was lured into one of their meetings recently. If I came to sneer, I remained to pray. This was no sewing bee but a spiritual force at work. I guess I was expecting to hear long complaints about how they'd been put upon by our boozing. There was none of that. They were examining not us but themselves!"

Whatever "the program" may be, there is no longer much question that in many cases it can reunite families, sometimes beyond reasonable expectation. I talked with a father of five children who had spent nine years in a state penitentiary for bad-check passing, an activity that invariably accompanied his drinking. There was an AA group in the prison and he joined. When he found that it worked for two years "outside," he got in touch with his wife, who meanwhile had divorced him, and began a second courtship. Part of his wooing was introducing her to Alanon. They've now been remarried two years.

Then, of course, there are the cases where it has not quite worked, and these are the sad ones. While I was in Des Moines, Ray H., the lawyer, took me down to the courthouse one afternoon when a family case was set to be tried. "Just so you can see what can happen when we miss," he explained. Both the father and mother in the case were alcoholics and there were six children, eighteen to four. The continued destructive drinking of the father produced a home unfit for children. County welfare had worked with the family for years and given up hope, and now was asking the -court to take the children from the father and mother. This was done, and I shall not soon forget the tear-stained face of the fifteen-year-old daughter or the way the four-year-old kept looking into people's faces, trying to understand. There are such scenes in all the courthouses all the time, and not all of them, we now know, are beyond hope. There is need for AA's new present to all the family.

Volunteers at the Clearing House--all AA wives--don't have to be told of this need--they read their mail. One day they let me read some of it. I jotted down the closing words of one letter: "My husband is an alcoholic, but will not ask for help. He thinks he can work it out for himself. He's not doing it, but what can I do? Is there anyone in the world who can help us or will try to?"

eternity in the hearts of men ..." (3:11)

I checked "God-shaped" in the engines of a couple of Catholic Encyclopedias, to no avail. I downloaded Augustine, Ambrose and Pascal - whatever I could find. Ambrose's stuff would have cost me money that I wasn't willing to pay. However, there was only one supposition that that quote was from him when I typed "God-shaped vacuum" into my Copernicus search engine.

I was able to check The Confessions, The City of God, a number of Augustines letters and his "Soliloquies", but neither "God shaped" or "vacuum" appeared in any of them. I didn't really expect that they would. But when my curiosity gets aroused, I pursue. It is in Book One, Chapter One that we find "Thou hast formed us for Thyself, and our hearts are restless till they find rest in Thee."

I searched all available of Pascal's writings which were offered free online, using the word "vacuum" as the word to be found. I only found it in his scientific works. However, I did find phrases which go along with Glenn's supposition noted above. The preamble below is relevant to the them - the need implied by the "God-shaped vacuum/hole/lack" etc., etc, the following section is as close to "hole" and filling that "hole" as I could come. Pascal uses the term "abyss".

Pascal from the Penses, - 425 - Second Part - "That man without faith cannot know the true good or justice"

Pascal said, "All men seek happiness. This is without exception. Whatever different means they employ, they all tend to this end. The cause of some going to war, and of others avoiding it, is the same desire in both, attended with different views. The will never takes the least step but to this object. This is the motive of every action of every man, even of those who hang themselves. ... All complain, princes and subjects, noblemen and commoners, old and young, strong and weak, learned and ignorant, healthy and sick, of all countries, all times, all ages, and all conditions. ... A trial so long, so continuous, and so uniform, should certainly convince us of our inability to reach the good by our own efforts. But example teaches us little. ... And thus, while the present never satisfies us, experience dupes us ... from misfortune to misfortune, ... [and us into AA].

What is it, then, that this desire and this inability proclaim to us, but that there was once in man a true happiness of which there now remain to him only the mark and empty trace, which he in vain tries to fill from all his surroundings, [Sound like what Glenn said of Plato?] seeking from things absent the help he does not obtain in things present? But these are all inadequate, because the infinite abyss can only be filled by an infinite and immutable object, that is to say, only by God Himself.

According to Carl Jung, in a letter to Bill Wilson, the alcoholic's "craving Angeles, California.

This convention has led to an uproar in the Swedish AA community, because of the fact that we have to charge money for this convent. When flying in international speakers it is almost impossible to finance that through the "Hat money". The parole for AA in Sweden has always been; -"Everything in AA is for free!"

However, now they have called for a Swedish AA-central committee meeting just because of this convention. The intention is to ban this convention under the parole -"It is against the Traditions to charge a fee for conventions" *Read Fourth Tradition.

We, the AA-convention committee are puzzled about this havoc that this happening created and believe this calls for a response. We know the fact that International conventions almost always have a "Convention sign-up fee".

Does anyone know / have documented information that we can provide to the Swedish AA-central committee and/or the people that oppose this so heavily?

Hi Fredrk,
I just sent a check for $25 for registration fee at "Gathering of Eagles," which is held in Dallas, Texas, every year; this year it is May 23-25. A registration fee is also charged at the annual Founders Day weekend in Akron, which draws 10,000 people or more. I'm also sure I paid a registration fee at the 2000 International Convention in Minneapolis. I think a reasonable fee is in order and acceptable when there are fixed expenses that cannot be met simply by taking up a collection. AA might be free but lots of other things at a convention come at a price!

Good luck.

the subject - we must combat the increasing menace of alcoholism," says James F. Oates, Jr., chairman and president of Equitable Life Assurance Society. A big reason: alcoholism's direct cost to industry is estimated to be in excess of one billion dollars annually.

Nearly all companies used to treat excessive drinking among workers as a moral problem that was better left alone. If an employe's drinking got out of hand he usually was fired, not helped. But as companies have become aware of the high cost of alcoholism in their plants and offices, many have started tackling the rehabilitation problem head-on.

Some have set up their own programs for directing and rehabilitating alcoholic employes. They include Eastman Kodak, Western Electric, Allis-Chalmers, du Pont, Chicago's Commonwealth Edison and New York's Consolidated Edison. Other concerns are working closely with such community groups as Chicago's Portal House and the Houston Committee on Alcoholism.

Industry's problem centers on an estimated two million alcoholic workers out of a total U.S. alcoholic population of five million - up one million in the past five years, according to the National Council on Alcoholism, the central clearing-house for information on this subject. Absenteeism of these workers because of alcoholism will this year cost employers more than double the time lost through strikes in 1957.

Alcoholism's impact on an individual company and its workers often is much greater than management may suspect. In 1956, for example, the Norton Co., a Worcester, Mass., abrasives and grinding-machine manufacturer, made a survey of 33 employees with known drinking problems. They were skilled workers with an average of 16 years' service apiece. Eleven of the men were in an acute stage of alcoholism and on the verge of being discharged. They averaged 45 days of lost time per year, at an annual cost to each man of more than $700. The findings spurred Norton to help the workers in cooperation with Alcoholics Anonymous.

The corporate cost of excessive drinking includes such things as increased accidents, the expense of replacing trained workers and the reduced output and higher work spoilage from a disturbed drinker. "Our biggest problem is the so-called half-man - the alcoholic worker whose effectiveness is off 50 percent or more from normal," says one company personnel chief. "His mistakes may not be spectacular, but he doesn't get much done."

Companies are sometimes shocked to learn that as many as three per cent of their workers are alcoholics. That's because many management men still stereotype an alcoholic as a skid-row bum. These workers may present a fairly normal appearance.

Discovery of "hidden" drinkers is a major part of most company programs. Seldom will workers tip off the company about a colleague's excessive drinking. And usually the inroads of alcoholism on a worker's efficiency are made at such a slow pace that supervisors may miss the signs. (Researchers say that most alcoholic workers have a history of 10 to 15 years of increasingly heavy drinking before their illness interferes with their vocational life.) Supervisors at Consolidated Edison are trained to watch for clues: consistent tardiness or absenteeism on Mondays and frequent early departure on Fridays; unexplained disappearance from the job; recurrent accidents; unexplained changes in an employe's work habits or personality.

Unions, too, have stepped up their efforts to help detect and rehabilitate workers with drinking problems. "thousands of union counselors across the country are trained to recognize alcoholics and to refer them to the proper agencies," says Leo Perlis, director of AFL - CIO Community Service Activities. In Birmingham, Ala., seven companies and 17 unions have joined their efforts to help alcoholic workers.

Companies with alcoholism programs generally are enthusiastic about the results. Du Pont claims it's program has been "successful beyond our expectations." Some companies report the rehabilitated alcoholic often out-produces his fellow workers, perhaps out of a sense of gratitude for being helped.

"We feel that we have salvaged some valuable employees by treating alcoholism as a disease and, as with any illness, paying wages during treatment," asserts Volley B. Leister, personnel director of Chicago's Commonwealth Edison. His company uncovers about 15 alcoholics a year, refers them to its medical department, where treatment is determined on an individual basis.

Allis Chalmers a few years ago estimated that its alcoholism program, now 11 years old, was saving the company some $80,000 yearly just in reduced absenteeism. Among workers treated there, the absentee rate has been cut from 8 to 3 percent and the firing rate has been slashed from 95 to 8 percent.

An Allis-Chalmers worker with a drinking problem may be referred to the company's full-time alcoholism counselor (an A.A. member) by a friend, his foreman, a court or the plant hospital. During the rehabilitation program the employee is helped by members of the company's industrial relations department, which includes a psychologist, a psychiatrist, an attorney, welfare workers and a "problem counselor."

In 1952 New York's Consolidated Edison spent $25,000 to help set up a consultation clinic for alcoholism at New York University's Bellevue Medical Center - the first clinic devoted solely to the alcoholic in industry. Impressed by its value, 18 other concerns have referred alcoholic workers to this clinic.

About 85 percent of the problem drinkers discovered by Con Edison supervisors are willing to go to the clinic. Others join A.A. or place themselves under losses of memory such as were hitting me lately. I wondered if he ever got up in the morning with no idea of where he had left the car, not knowing whom he had been with or what he had said, without a dollar left in his wallet. I could tell him about meeting an important client for lunch and not being sure whether I could get a fork to my mouth. I could tell these people about the utter soul-shattering degradation of trembling hands that spilled coffee on my shirt or caused that match to miss lighting my wife's cigarette.

I could tell them - but would I? I shrank from the prospect of getting up before this parish house full of ex-drunks and peeling myself open for their inspection. How could people so earnestly reveal what seemed to me a shameful weakness? Could I ever admit to being one of them?

The chairman kept things going in friendly fashion. He said this A.A. meeting would complete his month of presiding over the local group's affairs and that he would appoint another member to carry on next month. He reminded the crowd that there are no officers in A.A., no fancy national headquarters - only simple services that will help carry the message to other alcoholics. "There are no dues or fees in A.A.," he said, "but we do pay rent to use this room every week, we buy coffee and refreshments, and right now I'll ask Joe to take up the usual collection." I noticed that when the basket came along my row it was generously filled, and I whispered to one of my new friends to inquire whether A.A. receives gifts. He said that the organization declines outside contributions, that every A.A. group is self-supporting, and that problems of money, property, and prestige might divert A.A. from its primary purpose.

"I should like to explain to any newcomers, " the chairman added, "that A.A. is strictly anonymous. This is the spiritual foundation of all our traditions, ever reminding us to place principles before personalities. We must always maintain personal anonymity at the level of press, radio, and films. This is an open meeting where visitors are welcome. Anyone interested in learning about A.A., also members of their families and friends, can join us at any time. The door of A.A. swings both ways. You can come in; you can go out. You can always come back - we'll be here."

The chairman then called on an attractive young woman who stepped to the speakers platform to speak. "My name is Kate, and I am an alcoholic." Kate told the intimate story of the near ruin of her home. As soon as the children were off to school and her husband had left for work, she tried to remember where she had hidden the bottle the night before. That first drink was like pulling down a shade, shutting out her remorse and shame, blotting out the hangover. She played records and danced around the living room in her negligee and exchanged neighborhood gossip over the phone with friends. Instead of eating lunch she drank it. By the time the children came home she was in bed: "Mother has a headache; make yourselves a chocolate milk and some sandwiches for supper."

This girl is no orator, I thought, but there she stands, looking good, relaxed, almost smiling, talking straight from her heart and from her own experience with tough problems that I know so well. Again I thought: Will I ever be able to do that? Wouldn't it be great if I could sit down privately with a man who knew exactly what I was going through and had licked it, who talked my language and wanted to help me? The closest I had ever come to it was a session I had with Dr. Richard Proctor at the Bowman-Gray Medical School, in Winston-Salem, North Carolina.

"Face your situation as it is and not as you wish it might be. When you understand what your problem is and why you have it - the real reasons, not your alibis and excuses - you can enjoy a normal life again," he told me. "Most people who drink are not alcoholics and probably will never will be. But for five million men and women drinking is a sickness, and you're one of these. There is just one guy who can cure you, and that is you." Dr. Proctor recommended that I try A.A.

Kate ended her talk with a phrase that stuck in my mind. She said, "But for the grace of God and A.A. I wouldn't be here tonight." Then came the Lord's Prayer: " ...And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil..." and the meeting broke up for coffee. I knew that it had taken me years to get myself into an alcoholic hole and that I could not pull out of it overnight; but I left sobered, thoughtful, determined to do my utmost to make the flash of hope come true.

For the next three months I attended two or three A.A. meetings a week. No one asked me any questions or gave me any lectures; all of them were glad to see me, and I made new friends at every meeting. I felt normal and healthy. Instead of going from the office to the club, then making a few stops at bars, I went directly, eagerly home. My wife was smiling, and her voice was happy. One morning my daughter said, "Daddy, every night I thank God, and I just want to thank you for being well again." Doris was a happy girl, too, and I was charged with new energy for a full day's work.

My old hobbies, like fishing, which I had neglected for years, began to look good again. The season would open before long, and I suggested to Marge that we go over to Bill's to make plans for May weekends. The thought of wading in fast water at the head of a long pool fanning out to a quiet stretch where I could drop a fly ready for a trout to strike was tremendously exciting to me. Plans must be made, gear overhauled. I could hardly wait.

I hadn't seen Bill for a year, not since my gang carried me into the house and left me on the divan when we were making ready for the last fishing season. But on this Saturday night we were talking as we used to in the old days, eagerly planning to leave before daylight on opening morning. The girls would join us for the weekend. Then Bill went out to the kitchen and came back with a tray of ice water and glasses, also with a flushed look on his face as though he had just had a good stiff drink. "I thought it would be nice," he said, "If we all had something to drink."

It was almost too much for me. Why the hell couldn't Bill offer everybody a highball and be natural about it? He and the girls wanted a drink. Couldn't I have the privilege of declining or accepting if I wanted to? I burned with anger.

My sullen mood spoiled what little was left of the party. Marge could sense my distress, and we made excuses to leave early. I kept my childish fury pent up and roamed around downstairs desperately tempted to drink anything I could find, but brewed black coffee instead and growled at Marge, who was entreating me to get some sleep.

I was groggy at daylight, but the idea occurred to me that I was entirely at fault. I phoned and said, "Bill, I'm sorry to disturb you so early, but I want to apologize about last night. The plain fact is that I can't handle liquor and you know it. All I ask is that you treat me like any other friend. Whenever you want a drink, don't let me interfere. Also please don't put ice water or a Coke in my hand. Just ask me what I would like to have, and I'll name it. I am trying like the devil to be worthy of your trust."

I heard a sleepy, "Thanks for calling, Bob. That makes me feel a lot better about the whole thing. We can have some great times together, and I want you to know that I am proud of you. Don't forget we've got a date for opening day!"

I gave up A.A. meetings. They were alright for somebody in bad shape, but I did not need them anymore. This period went on for a few weeks longer. I felt normal and healthy. I found that anything I did with liquor I could do better without it. I was my own man again, but I had neglected Mark Twain's remark that quitting smoking was easy - he had done it hundreds of times.

It was a good sign that my family was beginning to trust me. My wife, beaming with new confidence, told me that she planned to take the children on the following weekend on a family visit. Out of habit, I welcomed the chance to be alone, puttering around, varnishing my old trout rod, watching TV - and drinking. "But my God!" I thought. "I'm not drinking, and I don't want to start. What kind of crazy thinking is this?"

As the week wore on, I tried with less and less success to get the idea of having a few drinks out of my mind. They drove away Saturday morning early, and I kept busy in and out of the house, catching up on postponed chores. That evening I walked a mile to the liquor store and paused at the door to wonder. Then I went in and bought two bottles. A taxi rushed me home, and I tore off the cap and poured half a glass. Only the first drink tasted as I had hoped. During the rest of that bottle and half of the second I sat cursing myself for being insane. Words for the causes and symptoms of my sickness haunted me. "Oh, God, can I ever stop again?"

Sunday night I had to call a doctor to get a shot in the arm before the family got home. It was a bad night, but I kept away from anything to drink, and next night I went back to A.A., shaky, overwhelmed with remorse and shame. I ought to admit my slip. I could not make the aisle to go up front as other did, so I just stood where I was and muttered, "this past weekend I tried liquor. I couldn't handle it. I am sorry I had a slip, and thanks to you for keeping the doors of A.A. open. I have the proof now that I don't want to go out that door again. I know that there is no way out of the abyss, except giving up liquor."

I felt much better for coming out in the open. I was encouraged and managed a feeble grin. "I guess I forgot Mark Twain's lesson about giving up smoking," I said.

During the next few months I actually enjoyed being sober - not fighting that first drink, which is the one that does the damage. I settled down to regular attendance at an A.A. group where I felt most congenial. Perhaps I was still an imposter, playing a masquerade. I was not yet being completely honest with these decent people and with myself. For somewhere in this good period the terrible thought returned that someday I might do what no alcoholic on earth has ever been able to do, drink normally again.

Then one night before closing a meeting, the chairman dumfounded me by announcing: "For the next month I should like to name Robert, our new member as chairman." He was referring to me. Everybody clapped, and I wondered how in the world I could do it. I spent every evening rereading what we in A.A. call the Big Book and leafing through our monthly magazine, The Grapevine, to bone up for the job of chairman. I studied for the hundredth time our twelve steps to sobriety: the admission that we were helpless against alcohol but that a power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity if we would turn over our wills and lives to God as each of us understands Him.

My new responsibilities weighed heavily on me. The night of my first meeting as chairman I stood near the entrance of the parish house greeting everyone, my wife standing happily at my side. Alcohol is no respecter of persons: I was smiling and saying hello to lawyers, truck drivers, doctors, housewives, business leaders, mechanics, and, accompanied mostly by sponsors from our group, a few newcomers looking shaky and white, sick and bleary-eyed. As is customary at all A.A. gatherings, chatter, laughter, and smoke filled the air; wives in the parish-house kitchen brewed coffee and made sandwiches. It was time to start. I felt reticent and unworthy to fill the chairmanship, so that the traditional A.A. prayer with which I opened the meeting disturbed me: "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference."

While I read along the brief statement of principles which starts every A.A. meeting, that prayer began repeating itself. "The courage to change the things I can" - and the truth flashed in my mind with blinding clarity: You are still a coward still holding out; you are not really, not sincerely here! It probably lasted only a few seconds, but I could see the lies I had told the doctors who were trying to help me, the deceit of making light of my problem to my minister, family, and associates, those endless alibis and excuses that had always given me a getaway route for a backslide into drinking. I had never burned all my bridges, nor had I quite achieved enough humility to admit, to accept, and to act on my problem wholeheartedly. The next few words may have sounded natural to the audience, but to me they represented unconditional surrender. They meant I was not just a visitor at these meetings, looking over the program with a skeptical eye, trying something else to please my wife or maybe to learn some new way to live with liquor. I finally uttered the words I had never had the courage and humility to say: "My name is Robert, and I am an alcoholic."

A great weight lifted from my mind and body. Forgetting all the words I had read in the literature of A.A., the thoughts of others that I had memorized for this occasion, I plunged ahead. "I want to thank you folks for making me chairman this month, "I began, "I'm not sure I can do a very good job or that I am ready for it. Perhaps older and wiser heads around here decided that one way to keep me good and sober for a month was to make me chairman!

"Seriously, though, I have just gone through a few moments of decision that I would not swap for anything else that ever happened to me. Most of us in this room have in common a serious physical and emotional problem. We are trying to do something about it. I have just learned in standing up here before you that I can without a shadow of a doubt succeed; I can achieve recovery and can help others as you are helping me. Without A.A. meetings and group fellowship, I would be lost. I can't do it alone. I thank God I don't have to."

As I had known all along, my story was similar to their stories. But now it suddenly became not my story, not their story, but our story - for I was finally, completely one of them.

And then the final speaker emphasized the importance of taking each day as it comes. "This is a twenty-four-hour program," he said. "Today is the only day that counts. Yesterday is gone, and tomorrow may never come."

The hour was nearly up, and I concluded the meeting. "A.A. is not a religious organization," I said, "but many of us believe that the spiritual part of the program is the most important. Striving to live a good life, to be in tune with our fellow men, to be our best selves at all times is a program that will help anybody, including drunks. We'll all stand and close the meeting in the usual way... Give us this day our daily bread And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us... " And as he could not stick to his own medicine. He couldn't stop drinking for good.

Bill, a confirmed atheist himself, was hardly a candidate for Ebby's theoretical therapy. All he had was a desperate desire to stop drinking. Once, drying out in a hospital (he knew this was a temporary expedient), Bill felt his depression deepen unbearably till at last it seemed as if he'd sunk to the bottom of the pit.

Suddenly he found himself crying out, "If there is a God, let Him show Himself! I'm ready to do anything, anything!"

All at once the room seemed lit up with a great white light. He was in ecstasy. It burst upon him that he was a free man, free from his demon. All through him there was a wonderful feeling of a "Presence."

Then Bill became frightened. His scientific education told him, "You're hallucinating. Better call a doctor." It was providential that he confided his vision to Dr. William Duncan Silkworth, for many years physician-in-chief of the Charles B. Towns Hospital in New York City. "Dr. Silky," out of his vast experience, knew well that there was no medical hope whatever for most alcoholics and this had stirred his compassion for down-and-out-drunks.

"I'm crazy, Doc," said Bill, in a panic. Dr. Silkworth probed him with questions. At last he said, "no, Bill, you're not crazy. There's been some basic spiritual event here."

Bill now remembered a book he'd read in his search for a cure. It was The Varieties of Religious Experience, by the psychologist William James. James taught that true religious experiences have a common denomination of pain, suffering, calamity, complete hopelessness. This "deflation at depth" had to come, said James, before any victim was ready for God's medicine. And that was exactly what had happened to Bill before his illumination.

Bill, nothing if not a promoter, now wanted to tell other alcoholics about his experience. He envisioned beginning a chain reaction among them. "I started out after drunks on jet propulsion," says Bill. "It was a kind of twin-engine power drive - one part genuine spirituality, and one part my old desire to be a No.1 man, a big shot."

Bill's drunk-fixing turned out to be a flop. At the end of six months, none of the scores of inebriates he'd tried to bring to see God had sobered up. "look, Bill," said Dr. Silkworth, "you're having nothing but failure because you are preaching at these alcoholics. You've got to deflate these people first. Give them the medical business. Pour it into them about the sensitivity of their bodies that condemns them to go mad or die if they keep on drinking." They'd listen if it came from another alcoholic, Dr. Silky said. And then Bill might suggest the God medicine to them.

That got Bill his first convert, a physician in Akron, Ohio - Dr. Bob. Then these two guys got busy working on others. That 1935 summer in Akron, out of many attempts, Bill and Dr. Bob converted just one more alcoholic. The three of them were the first group of A.A.'s.

By 1939 Bill and Bob proudly counted a total of some 100 absolutely down-and-out drunks now dry. They presumed to write a book, Alcoholics Anonymous, to celebrate this unparalleled achievement. The book was built around what they called 12 steps leading to sobriety. We'll boil them down:

Have a real desire to quit.

Admit you can't. (this is the hardest step.)

Make a rigorous confession of personal defects.

Resolve to help others.

Ask for God's ever present help.

Accept and acknowledge that help.

At first the medical profession was dubious about a method that seemed "in no sense scientific." But more and more doctors began to come to the aid of Bill and his exhibulous band. Distinguished psychiatrist Dr. Harry Tiebout, of Greenwich, Conn., had completely failed to cure alcoholics patients - scientifically. Then one of his patients, a deeply alcoholic woman, came to him after her first A.A. meeting: " I think I have the answer. I'll never drink again, Doctor." And she hasn't.

This woman and other recovered people told Dr. Tiebout of their accepting a higher power - namely, God. But first, the A.A.'s taught them, they had to acknowledge their own helplessness; they had to admit they'd hit bottom. The trouble with typical alcoholics is that they're arrogantly sure they'll lick this booze business" themselves. Not until they finally find they can't, Dr. Tiebout saw, do they hit bottom. Then they can choose: to go down to insanity or death - or to start up toward God. When they chose God, they don't want to drink anymore. It is as simple as that.

"The miracle of A.A. was now clearer to me," says the doctor. "Hitting bottom became by therapeutic goal with alcoholics."

Bill and Bob and their converts counted more and more recoveries. By recovery they meant sobriety, total, complete and permanent. After six years the number had mushroomed to more than 2000, and by the end of the seventh year, to 8000. One reason for this astounding growth is, in the words of famed neuropsychiatrist Dr. Foster Kennedy, of New York, "Every cured drunkard is a missionary to the sick. God having saved them, they thank Him by doctoring others."

No A.A. need by anonymous to family, friends or neighbors. But before the public - press, radio, films and TV - the revelation of identity is not for them. Why? Bill explains it simply. The A.A.'s are really a new kind of person. To gain enough humility to stay alive they have had to give up what have been characteristics common to most of them - excessive ambition and pride - and quit their crazy contest for personal prestige. Anonymity is only another word for humility, the spiritual key to their way of life.

Now members of the medical profession gave A.A. high praise, recognizing it as the real treatment for alcoholics. And by thousands the doctors referred problem drinkers to Alcoholics Anonymous. But where in the early days all recovered alcoholics had to begin at real bottom, as strictly skid-row bums, now physicians began to ask the A.A. brethren an embarrassing question: "Just how deep is bottom? How do you recognize an early alcoholic? If we knew that, we could begin to raise the bottom."

Bill explained that the first sign is a loss of control of drinking. Many, perhaps most, people who drink have some experience with intemperance. But the potential alcoholic realizes he's beginning to get drunk at the wrong time - when the consequences could be painfully damaging. Using this sign, physicians have been able to discover incipient drunks by thousands and thousands. Doctors tell such patients that the fact they haven't yet lost their jobs doesn't mean that they aren't in danger, and send them to join a group of A.A.'s.

"It's the doctors who now recruit a third of all our cases," explains Bill. "That's why we number about 250,000 today." And A.A. puts its recovery rate at 75 per cent of all who sincerely try its treatment.

With such a resounding success, how does it happen that A.A. is still utterly without organization? No hospitals, no paid trained experts. A.A. remains a loosely knit fellowship, thousands of little groups of recovered drunks who meet constantly to sustain each other against their number one enemy, alcohol. The doors of the meeting places are always open for victims no matter how far gone. They try to lift up all who fall, which many do.

Why has the fellowship insisted on staying poor?

"John D. Rockefeller, Jr., must be thanked for that," says Bill. "We once asked him for funds for hospitals and a big organization. Mr., Rockefeller was deeply moved. But he said, 'I'm afraid money would spoil this thing.' He rejected the plea flatly.

An associate of Rockefeller had said, "Why, A.A. is first-century Christianity!" And of course we all know that that first-century Christians

It is a big iceberg. A recent estimate (and it is probably a serious under-estimate) counts more than 4,700,000 alcoholics in the United States - one man in every fifteen over the age of 20, six men for every woman. Only about 8 per cent are on skid row, and only about 750,000 have obvious signs of illness. There are one to two million problem drinkers in industry, hundreds of thousands in the wards of mental hospitals. Five to six million wives, husbands, parents and children are living in the same household with alcoholism and are the victims of its erratic behavior.

The count could be more accurate if researchers had an exact idea of what they were counting.

Alcoholism is not simply synonymous with drinking, heavy drinking or drunkenness, and no one is certain whether it is a symptom, a disease in its own right, or several diseases. Most of the rule- of-thumb definitions (the man who drinks alone, the man who drinks the first thing in the morning, the man who has "lost his will power") are either wrong or inadequate. Most of the scientific classifications (one of the researchers recently counted thirty-four) are not much better.

One theme, however, keeps recurring. The alcoholic is a man who is either unable to abstain from liquor or unable to stop once he has started; the first drink "pulls a trigger" and his controls disintegrate.

Within this broad definition, some researchers feel, there are at least two distinct types: "addictive" drinkers, driven usually by internal stresses, who seek the biggest, quickest alcoholic jolt they can find, and "habitual excessive symptomatic" drinkers, men in search of a gentle, anxiety-obliterating alcoholic plateau with the longest - not the quickest or most intense - effect.

Theories about the cause of alcoholism are equally vague. One group holds that a genetic - or combined genetic and nutritional -diet effect causes a craving for alcohol, but the evidence is skimpy.

Psychiatrists contend that alcoholism is the expression of self-destructive urges - "chronic suicide," in one man's graphic phrase - or of homosexual impulses, or of a fixation on oral pleasures. A recent Stanford University study explicitly tested these hypotheses, and found no good evidence for any of them.

Still another theory rests on the startling difference in alcoholism rates among ethnic and social-class groups in the United States. The relative number of alcoholics, for example, among Irish-Americans and "native-stock" Americans is much greater than among Italian-Americans and Jews. The figures are consistent with the idea that cultures with contradictory values and customs - for example, associating alcohol with pleasure and sin, escape and drunkenness - are likelier to produce alcoholism than cultures in which drinking is consistently seen as an unremarkable supplement to meals, or a part of ritual religion.

A dwindling but highly vocal group finally, still insist that the cause of alcoholism is alcohol itself, despite the fact that some 94 percent of all the Americans who drink never experience uncontrollable cravings for alcohol, blackouts, "the shakes" or similar symptoms.

Alcoholics Anonymous agrees that the alcoholic is forever "One drink away from a drunk" - but there the theorizing stops. In the belief that alcoholism comes in people, not bottles, it takes no stand on prohibition, temperance or liquor laws.

A.A. is a vast network of local organizations, but it has almost no organizational structure. Its growth has been meteoric, but it has never asked anyone to join. Its one goal is sobriety, yet no member ever "takes a pledge." Its tone and orientation are religious, but its membership includes several thousand agnostics who happily rub shoulders with Protestants, Jews, Catholics and Mormons.

Though it keeps no records, conducts no research and is, if anything, faintly hostile to too much probing (We're just a bunch of ex-drunks," says one member, "and we don't care how or why it works, so long as it does"). A.A. has been at least indirectly responsible for major strides in the scientific understanding of alcoholism.

It detracts not at all from A.A.'s accomplishments that this new scientific effort suggests that A.A. is not the whole answer to alcoholism and that, in fact, its methods and results are not much better or worse than any others.

What are the methods? The interested observer can find out on almost any night in any American city. Atypical meeting begins with from thirty to 100 men and women gossiping on rows of wooden chairs in a church meeting house or a rented hall. There is a busy traffic to and from a stand with coffee, soft drinks and doughnuts.

In one corner, someone is idly playing a piano. The air is heavy with cigarette smoke, and the talk is loud and cheerful. On the wall are a few signs with messages like "Easy does it" and "First things first." One bears the A.A. motto:

"God grant us the serenity to accept the things we cannot change, courage to change the things we can, and wisdom to know the difference."

The visitor who plays guessing games about those present soon discovers he is wasting his time: the seedy looking young man in the front row is a casual guest who has never been drunk in his life; the white haired, grandmotherly lady next to him has a record of twenty arrests and six hospitalizations.

Here and there, however, he may be able to spot a newcomer - someone drawn and tense and perhaps tremulous - and he may note that each one is sticking close to a "sponsor," an established A.A. member who is giving him special attention, introducing him to friends, pouring his coffee.

Finally, the chairman calls for order. "My name is Joe and I'm an alcoholic," he begins. He announces that this is the regular weekly "open" meeting of the group (there is a closed meeting for alcoholics only, later in the week). He calls for a moment of silence "to be used as each person sees fit." He announces plans for a dance, a bowling contest, and a party to be sponsored by the local "Al-Anon an auxiliary group in which relatives of A.A. members meet to talk over some of the problems of having an alcoholic in the family.

Then he introduces the first of three speakers from a neighbouring A.A. group who have come to "tell their stories." The first speaker begins with the standard line: "My name is and I'm an alcoholic." ("If he can make it anyone can," someone whispers gleefully. "He was the worst wet brain in history.")

What follows is, perhaps, the last thing the visitor expects: it is at once tragic and uproariously funny, and the hall rocks again and again with laughter.

A steelworker describes his weekly, wobbly odyssey from home to jail to hospital to home again - where his despairing wife, he adds, always covered him with the help-wanted pages from the newspaper while he slept it off.

A business executive recounts his early career as a bootlegger's assistant, hauling home-made gin in a baby carriage until "some drunk stole the wheels." Later, a confirmed alcoholic, his job and family gone, he decided to drink himself to death - only to discover, painfully, that "you don't die that easy."

A suburban housewife wryly displays the sole trophy of her drinking days, a citation as a faithful Cub Scout den mother. "The kids must of had a great time, with me drunk at every meeting," she says, but adds quietly, "except for two of them - my kids."

The laughter that comes is the laughter of recognition. The alcoholic newcomer discovers that the troubles, horrors and tragedies he thought were unique have, in fact, been shared by most of the people in the hall - people who now are not only sober but (to his even greater astonishment) happy.

A number of themes run through the talks, "Easy does it" turns out to be a warning against the grandiose ambitions and unrealistic drives that affect alcoholics. "First things first" is a reminder of the need for priorities in the long job of rehabilitation.

Another slogan, "Live and let live," is shorthand for the observation that resentment and self-pity push the drinker back toward the bottle. The "24-hour plan" expresses the knowledge that the alcoholic's only hope at present is total abstinence - and that it is easier to quit one day at a time than to face a lifetime without alcohol's solace.

In all the talks there are reference to the "Twelve Steps," which are the core of A.A. belief. Here the compulsive drinker admits that he has become powerless over alcohol, that his life has become unmanageable. He decides that his fate is in the hands of a "Power greater than" himself, and turns his life over to "the care of God as I understand Him."

He undertakes a searching self-inventory, admits his wrongs, tries to make amends, prays for removal of his shortcomings. Finally - the all-important Twelfth Step - he tries to carry the message of this "spiritual experience" to other alcoholics if and when they seek help.

This is, in essence, what began in Akron in 1935, spread slowly to New York, then to Cleveland and Chicago. In 1938 there were sixty members; by 1940, one man recalls, "there were two's and three's and five's of us in half a dozen cities."

Today after a period of explosive growth beginning in 1941, there are more than 7,000 groups. Each is autonomous and self-supporting (by voluntary and unrecorded contributions, not dues) and has no permanent chairman or officers.

The individual groups support an over-all "General Service Board" seven alcoholics, eight nonalcoholics - in New York, and this, together with an annual convention of elected delegates and a national newspaper wryly called "The Grapevine," is all that holds the loose federation together.

A.A. works, its students believe, by overcoming the drinker's biggest barrier - the lack of real, vital emotional contact with any single human or group, the feeling that nobody really understands or cares. In A.A. he finds people essentially like himself, who cannot reject him and whom he finds hard to reject or deceive. The concept of alcoholism as an illness eases his guilt; his identification with a group dilutes it. Gradually, the group itself provides a satisfying alternative to drinking.

How well does A.A. work? A.A. usually claims that of those who really try, 50 per cent sober up at once and stay that way, another 25 per cent remain sober after a few relapses. Unfortunately, the best evidence suggests that these figures are probably wrong. A few careful studies by outside observers report much lower figures in the 30-to-40 per cent range.

The most important source of error, of course, is the statistical catch in "those who really try." This means, in effect, counting only those alcoholics who find the program attractive enough to join, and dismissing the failures as persons who don't count.

Clearly, the alcoholics who join A.A. are a self-selected group and may not be representative of all alcoholics. A recent study by Cornell University's Dr. Harrison Trice - one of eight nonalcoholic members of A.A.'s General Service Board - found striking differences in personality and past experience between A.A. members and uncontrolled alcoholics who had come to meetings but failed to join.

But results like these may represent a major step forward, for they suggest that there is no single type of "alcoholic" and no single "cure." The important question then becomes, not "What works?" but "What works best - for whom?"

Twenty-five years ago when A.A. began, alcoholism made physicians uneasy, frustrated psychiatrists, hardened social workers, wearied judges and jailers, inflamed "wets" and "drys" and, all too frequently, killed the alcoholic.

It still does - but the picture is changing. Tranquilizing drugs can be used to help control alcoholic cravings and ease the pangs of withdrawal - and they give the physician, at last, the knowledge that there is something he can really do for such patients.

Psychiatrists, in recent years, have soft-pedaled their emphasis on alcoholism as a mere symptom of some deeper emotional disorder and focused on the drinking itself. Perhaps more important, they are beginning to abandon the widely held feeling that alcoholism is an incurable personality defect and are trying new, less orthodox therapies.

"The psychiatrist and his techniques have to be less rigid," notes Dr. Morris Chafetz of Massachusetts General Hospital's alcoholism clinic in Boston, "and he has to be a pioneer in his approach to each case."

"The passive, non-directive therapist of alcoholics who follows his usual therapeutic approach usually has no patients to treat after a while."

At this and other clinics, psychiatrists now work in teams with social workers and psychologists. Wherever possible, if the patient has a family, an attempt is made to bring the wife into treatment, too, in individual or group counseling sessions. Almost invariably, such efforts increase the success rate to 30 per cent or better.

Anonymous, or AA.

But though AA celebrates 25 years this summer, surprisingly few people know much about its workings.

Suppose you have an alcoholic friend who obviously needs help. The first step, if he's in bad shape, is to call his or your family doctor. You can follow this up by suggesting to the victim's wife (or husband) that it might be wise to contact AA. Or you can call AA yourself (it is listed in all city telephone directories). In many cases, of course, the doctor will suggest it.

Soon after you call AA, usually two members will appear. The wait may be a few hours--but probably no longer.

The two visitors will want to talk with your friend privately for at least half an hour, maybe much longer. If you haven't called a physician, they may do so. Or they may call a hospital for alcoholics; AA maintains contact with such institutions. In a hospital, the victim usually stays about five days, for rest under sedation and frequent conversation with AA members. The cost: $75 to $100.

If hospitalization isn't needed, AA will make sure that your friend gets to his own home. If he lives out of town, they can even arrange for other AAs to meet him at the airport or railroad station.

Once the initial crisis has passed, AA's long-range program of rehabilitation begins. Basically, the program consists of 12 suggested steps--making up a simple philosophy.

There are four main points:

An admission of defeat--a recognition that with drinking, life has become unmanageable.

A decision to seek the help of a Higher Power--which doesn't necessarily mean church religion or even a formal concept of God.

Self-analysis and a program to make amends and remove shortcomings.

An attempt to apply AA teachings daily and assist other alcoholics.

It's important that an alcoholic decide for himself to work with AA.

Don't force the subject. Psychiatrists and AA members alike will advise you to suggest the idea, perhaps pointedly--but that's all.

If he does want AA's help, members will get him to a local group meeting as their own Service Manual and/or do not use the voting procedure Bill outlined for us.

Thanks in advance,

Tom H.

Passionately Anonymous

The 15,000 men and women who thronged California's Long Beach Memorial Stadium last week differed from most conventioners in one major respect, there was no danger that any of them would get together in a hotel room to kill a bottle. For this was Alcoholics Anonymous, mustering its recovered, sworn-off drinkers, their relatives and well-wishers to celebrate its 25th anniversary.

Uncrowned but undisputed head of A.A. is Bill W., a tall Vermonter in his early 60s who drank himself out of a lucrative career as a high-risk stock operator. "In 1934," he recalls, "My doctor told my wife that if I didn't stop I'd have to be locked up because I'd either go mad or die." Bill W. didn't stop until he drank himself into a hospital and realized that he must stop or die. He had to find another drunk in the same predicament so that by helping each other they would ensure their own survival. In Akron, in June for each US state and Canadian province.

The pamphlet is a primer on how to get the structure established. Voting procedures vary depending on who was being elected (i.e. the state/province committee positions or the delegate). One interesting variation in the delegate election was that, if the election was going to be decided by lot, the Assembly had the option that lots be drawn for: (A) all candidates, (B) the three officers of the new committee (Chairman, Treasurer and Secretary) or (C) between the two high candidates in the running. The term "by lot" is used vs. "go to the hat" which came later.

If you don't have access to a Third Legacy pamphlet I can scan the pertinent pages and send them to you as a Word document. One section is titled "Assembly Meetings: How Conducted." A second interesting section is titled "The Conference Panels." It defines the qualification for determining delegate inclusion in either Panel 1 (states/provinces with AA populations of 5,000 members or more) or Panel 2 (states/provinces with AA populations of 2,000 members or more).

Cheers

functioning; or show the prodromal [premonitory] signs of such development." While attempts have been made to arrive at a more exact, measurable definition, this seems to describe the condition adequately.

Medical authorities are well aware of what an alcoholic does, even if they don't know the fundamental cause of his disease. His conduct and actions are almost predictable. The individual whose life is becoming unmanageable because of alcohol will need a morning drink, or drinks, to get going; he may sneak drinks, using all sorts of subterfuges and devices to cover up his secret. He may fail to return to work after lunch. He will begin to come in late for work, and then will build up a record of absences with flimsy excuses. He will slip out on one pretext or another for a quick one, carry a bottle on his person, or keep one in his desk or locker. He will be very sensitive to criticism, both of his drinking and of his work. He is very likely to have blackouts (complete loss of memory); and such blackouts may cover extensive periods. An alcoholic may even wake up in a strange city and be unable to account for his presence there. His relations with his family, friends, and fellow workers will show signs of disruption. His eating habits probably will change, and late in the disease he may go for long periods without eating anything at all.

Such signs are a clear indication that it is time to discontinue the use of alcohol completely and forever. It is a fact that a few incipient alcoholics are able to do just that of their own accord. But, more typically, such a person will insist that he has no problem and reject all offers of help. For him the need for liquor eventually will become compulsive. One drink of anything containing alcohol and a chain reaction follows over which the alcoholic has absolutely no control. He finds it impossible to stop drinking.

At that point, his moral standards just about disappear. His promises mean nothing. He becomes extremely artful and develops the most plausible excuses and explanations to avoid coming to grips with the reality of his situation.

This pattern stays with the drinking alcoholic all his drinking life. Furthermore, long periods of abstinence seem to have no effect whatsoever on his inability to regain control of his drinking. A week, a month, a year, even 10 years after he has "gone on the wagon," the first drink will activate the devastating compulsion, and he returns to his old pattern, usually in an aggravated form.

Why outside help?

A person who has reached the stage of alcoholic sickness must not be judged by the usual conventions. His actions should be regarded as symptomatic, and accepted as part of a disease process. And that's not easy. It is very difficult for the non-alcoholic to grasp the depth and complexity of the emotional factors involved in compulsive drinking; to appreciate that the socio-economic, intellectual, or professional background of the victim does not help him to resist the progression, once the compulsive phase of the malady has asserted itself. Help in such cases requires patience, skill, and a depth of understanding that can be developed only by long experience with the problem. That is why an alcoholic's family - or the alcoholic, himself, if he can bring himself to do so - must look to assistance from the outside.

In most communities, the possible sources of help for a family facing alcoholism are varied, and it is impossible to predict which of them will prove most useful in any one instance. But it is worth noting that some forty states now have tax-supported programs covering help for alcoholics, and in such a state reference to the state or local health department usually can make this resource available.

Also, the National Council on Alcoholism, Inc. (2E. 103rd Street, New York 29, New York) has local affiliated councils in 64 cities in the United States, most of which provide Alcoholism Information Centers where those who are interested can get personal consultation and literature, and referral to other community resources, such as hospital clinics specializing in the ambulatory or in-patient treatment of alcoholism.

The physician's role in treatment

Often the first attempt of an alcoholic at self-help is to arrange a visit to the family doctor for a check-up and a discussion of the problem. So much the better if the physical examination can be given by a physician who is experienced in treating alcoholics or is familiar with community resources for managing alcoholism.

What about treatment? It has become increasingly clear that alcoholics are prone to addictiveness. Barbiturates and tranquilizers, which are still prescribed for some alcoholics because researchers once hoped they would ease the emotional distress underlying alcoholism, hold implicit dangers of addiction and toxic reactions and are best used in a controlled situation. Antabuse, however, is a successful drug adjunct. This drug makes the body react with acute distress if alcohol is taken in any form. But Antabuse tablets have serious drawbacks. They should be used only under the continued supervision of a physician who is thoroughly familiar with the drug's properties. They must be taken daily; but, if responsibility for taking Antabuse is left to the patient, he often will skip it. More serious is the very real possibility that the alcoholic may be tempted to rely solely on the drug and avoid dealing realistically with whatever emotional and social problems are associated with his trouble.

In any event, it is only when the patient has obtained medical and psychological management that the real recovery process truly begins. And achieving this first goal is a long-term process.

Alcoholics Anonymous

As a method of dealing with emotional and personality problems of the alcoholic, group therapy appears to be more promising than private therapy. On this score, many patients, as well as their physicians, lean heavily on Alcoholics Anonymous (A.A.) to help out. Indeed, this organization is almost universally recognized as the one type of group therapy which has been most successful in helping alcoholics.

As most readers are undoubtedly aware, A.A. is an informal fellowship of alcoholics who are joined together to help themselves and others to maintain sobriety. The only requirement for joining the organization is the serious desire to quit drinking.

At the same time, the family of the alcoholic who has not yet accepted the fact that he must stop drinking altogether (or even of one who has accepted that fact and is acting upon it) can get comparable help for themselves from another organization, called Al-Anon, which is separate from, but closely identified with, A.A. (For information, write to Al-Anon Family Groups Council, 40 East 40 Street, New York 17, N.Y.)

The membership of one or more of his immediate family in an Al-Anon group has been an important factor in many an alcoholic's recovery. These groups emphasize the fact that they do not discuss the case histories of the alcoholics in whom they are interested, but confine themselves to the tensions and anxieties that are inherent in their own situations. Those who are within the family circle of an alcoholic suffer extreme anxiety, anguish, and frustration, since their attempts to help come to nothing; they feel beaten, hopeless, and angry - with overtones of guilt. It is only when they clearly realize that alcoholism is a disease, and that they are not responsible for its development, and when they understand and master their own feelings of guilt and hostility through group discussion, that they can cope effectively with the vagaries of the alcoholic's conduct and eventually help him get back on his feet.

A look to the future

So far, this report has devoted itself to a program which, in effect, locks the barn door after the horse is stolen - that is, to treatment of the alcoholic after he is in trouble and is seeking help. Another sort of program - aimed at detecting alcoholism early in the disease - is being pioneered by a few industrial concerns. The companies recognize that valuable personnel who might otherwise be lost to alcoholism can be kept productive if help is provided soon enough. Their program begins with a general educational program, aimed at both employees and management. Supervisors, in particular, are trained to sense the existence of problems in the lives of the employees under them. A channel is set up through which workers who may be succumbing to alcoholism can be referred, with a minimum

Hi John

Contact both your Area AA Delegate and Area AI-Anon Delegate. They can help inform on how important the Traditions are to both Fellowships and perhaps offer some advice on the matter.

In terms of written material, the information below is an abridged form of a past AAHistoryLovers posting in regard to alcoholics only "speaking from the podium." The subject also centered around the intermingling of AA and AI-Anon. The info was gleaned from:

The pamphlet The AA Group (P-16) - The wording in the pamphlet (on page 16) was changed

From -

"Whether open or closed, A.A. group meetings are conducted by A.A. members. At open meetings non-A.A.'s may be invited to share, depending on the conscience of the group"

To -

"Whether open or closed, A.A. group meetings are conducted by A.A. members, who determine the format of their meetings".

A.A. Guidelines - Relationship Between A.A. and AI-Anon (MG-8) - This publication poses a possible source of confusion on the matter. It states, in part:

Question: Should a group be affiliated with both A.A. and AI-Anon?

Answer: As the primary purpose of the A.A. group is to help the sick alcoholic to recover and the primary purpose of the AI-Anon Family Group is to help the AI-Anon to live with herself or himself, as well as with the alcoholic, it is suggested they not be combined, but remain separate groups. This enables both Fellowships to function within their Twelve Traditions and to carry their messages more effectively. Thus, the group name, the officers, and the meeting should be either A.A. or AI-Anon, but not both. "The A.A. Group" pamphlet suggests, "Whether open or closed, A.A. group meetings are conducted by A.A. members. At open meetings, non A.A.s may be invited to share, depending upon the conscience of the group". Naturally, all are welcome to open meetings of both A.A. and AI-Anon groups.

The underlined citation to the pamphlet "The AA Group" has not been updated to reflect the deletion of the words cited from the pamphlet.

What the Alcoholic Owes to Marty Mann

Out of her suffering has been born a network of hope and help for thousands.

By Floyd Miller

An ashen-faced man in search of help made his way into a quiet office on New York's upper Fifth Avenue. He was an alcoholic, and he poured out his despairing story to a handsome woman in her 50's who sat behind a large desk. After a few moments he paused, spread his hands helplessly and said, "its difficult to make you understand how I feel."

"Oh, but I know exactly how you feel, " she said. "I, too, am an alcoholic. I wouldn't be here if I hadn't gone through the valley of the shadow."

The woman was Mrs. Marty Mann, executive director of the National Council on Alcoholism, a voluntary health organization she founded 18 years ago. A remorseless crusader against ignorance and prejudice concerning alcoholism, she has been largely responsible for the fact that the nation's attitude toward the "drunkard" is changing, that alcoholism is now recognized as a disease and that thousands of our five million alcoholics are today being successfully treated. (Only one drinker out of 15 or 16 develops alcoholism. Like an iceberg, the symptoms are below the surface at first; but the disease progresses relentlessly until the victim, once he takes a drink, stops only when he is too drunk to continue. It usually takes 10 to 15 years of drinking for a potential alcoholic to acquire the disease full-blown. If un-checked, it can end only in insanity or death.)

On the lecture platform Marty Mann is electric. Her handsomeness is deepened by marks of suffering, and she summons up a power of purpose that transfixes her audience. Her husky voice speaks of reasoned facts, but with a spirituality that drives them hard into the hearts as well as the minds of those who hear.

Once in Jacksonville a man awoke in a hotel room after a week of drinking, turned on the radio and heard Marty Mann speaking from New Orleans. "No alcoholic wants to be the way he is," she was saying. "Alcoholics are not bums. They are sick, and they can recover from this disease just as from others."

The words penetrated the man's numbed brain, and for the first time he began to hope. He picked up the phone, called the radio station and asked to speak to the woman who had just broadcast. Marty not only talked with him; she put him in touch with someone in Jacksonville who could give him immediate help.

Marty Mann can supply almost immediate help from coast to coast through NCA's network of affiliates operating Alcoholism Information Centers in 74 cities. Without charge and without humiliation, the alcoholic or his family can telephone or come to these centers for consultation and referral. Depending on the individual's condition and need, he is sent to a doctor, a hospital, a clinic or to Alcoholics Anonymous.

Science now believes that two basic conditions must be present to make a person prey to alcoholism: an emotional vulnerability, and a body chemistry which makes him sensitive to the alcohol he consumes in an effort to ease his emotional stresses. Marty Mann's own case demonstrates these concepts with classic simplicity.

Born to a wealthy Chicago family, she went to the best private schools. As a debutante she entered a world that was all champagne and caviar. In her set it was gay and smart to go to New Orleans for the Mardi Gras. On the spur of the moment she married a young man she met there; she was 22. A year later tuberculosis, with which she had had a bout as a child, flared up, and she went to a Western ranch for both recovery and divorce.

Though she did not realize it until much later, her real descent into the hell of alcoholism began when she was 24, the year her father lost his fortune. Suddenly thrust against the buzz saw of life, she went to New York to look for a job. She moved into a small Greenwich Village flat with two other young women, and if there were days when they were without food, they were seldom without bootleg whiskey. For this was the Roaring Twenties.

Marty got a job reviewing books, and then became an editor of a glossy magazine. Her talent was apparent and her career well launched, but so was her social life. A writer who squired her to speakeasies and flamboyant parties of the era recalls with awe, " I can't remember dating a more beautiful and intelligent girl. And she could drink any man under the table. A hollow leg, that girl!"

A high alcohol tolerance - the ability to drink a lot without showing signs of drunkenness - is one of the early symptoms of alcoholism. Others soon followed for Marty. She became dependent on alcohol in order to enjoy a party; then dependent on it to cope with difficult events.

The death of her grandmother brought a small inheritance, and Marty quit her job and travelled to London. She was as sought after there as in New York, for she was bright, witty, the gayest of companions.

Now the first drink of the day was advanced to noontime and became increasingly important. Also, she began to drink surreptitiously at parties, belting down two while others were taking one. And she began to have memory blackouts. Then, in 1931, her tolerance for alcohol reversed. She began getting drunk on lesser and lesser amounts.

"What has happened to you?" her friends demanded. "Why can't you drink the way you used to?"

No one asked these questions more urgently than Marty. What frightened her most was the fact that, despite the most desperate exercise of will, she could not cut down her drinking.

One summer afternoon in 1934, at a weekend houseparty in the country, she had the blind staggers and had to be led upstairs to sleep it off. Her bedroom opened on a small balcony. Below was a paved courtyard. Marty was only vaguely aware of the events that followed. She never knew whether she fell or jumped. Even the moment of impact on the cruel stones was mercifully fogged by alcohol. She fractured her leg at the hip and broke both hinges of her jaw.

After having her leg in traction for six months, she recovered from the accident - but not from her drinking. Her inheritance gone, she got jobs and lost them. Now she huddled in a secluded corner of Hyde Park, sipping from a bottle. There one day a friend found her and begged her to do something about herself. "Maybe you should go back to New York," she suggested.

This struck a response in Marty's dulled mind. Typical of the later stages of alcoholism is the desperate conviction that a geographical change will somehow work a cure. Marty borrowed money and sailed for New York. But the transfer only changed the location of her drinking.

In rare moments of clarity she was completely disgusted with herself, and concluded that she must be insane. She went to a series of psychiatrists, none of whom would accept her as a patient after she described her drinking. The only suggestion the doctors could make was that she commit herself to a mental institution. This compounded her fears, and she returned to alcohol for forgetfulness.

Some hard, brave corner of her mind refused to give up the search for help, however, and finally Dr. Harry Tiebout agreed to take her, free of charge, as a resident patient in Blythwood Sanitarium in Connecticut. Here, for a year, she had regular psychiatric sessions, but the doctors remained baffled.

One morning Dr. Tiebout brought a manuscript to her. "This was written by people like you," he said. "They seem to have found a way out of trouble. Perhaps it can help you. Let me know what you think of it."

She began to read slowly, skeptically. As she read on, her skepticism gradually began to lift, to be replaced by a mounting excitement. These people were drunks; they had suffered just as she had suffered, and they had survived!

She discovered that her ailment had a name - it was called "alcoholism." It seemed a blessed thing just to have a name pinned to her. As she read on the fog or fear and ignorance began to part, and she learned that alcoholism was a disease! They described it as "an allergy of the body coupled with an obsession of the mind." She learned that the "allergy" was irreversible and that the affected person could never put alcohol into his sensitized system. The "obsession" was that the alcoholic was driven to take a drink despite his knowledge that disaster waited.

What was the answer?

It came with stunning simplicity: she must discard attempts at moderate drinking; she must give up all drinking. But wasn't this beyond her power? The manuscript spoke of God's help. Through the recent hellish years, though, she had lost God. Now, suddenly, she knew for a certainty: He could help her.

As she pondered this, something happened that she cannot fully explain. She seemed to lose the upper-most level of consciousness, and when she regained it she found herself on her knees beside her bed, her pillow wet with tears. And through her body surged a feeling of serenity and soaring confidence such as she had never known.

She ran to Dr. Tiebout to tell him what had happened. "have I lost my mind? Am I insane?" she demanded.

Thoughtfully, he said, "Something very real has happened. Let us watch and learn together."

They did watch and learn. The road back to health was difficult, but Marty was never again to feel alone, to know despair. Old friends noted the difference in her appearance; there was a new radiance about her. She explained, "You let God in, and He comes out of you."

Within a year she had an excellent job, but she knew now that her life would have real meaning only if she served other sufferers. Alcoholics Anonymous was helping many, but it could assist only those who sought it out. Most alcoholics were hidden, closed in by their ignorance and fear and shame. Marty dreamed of a vast program of education that would remove the stigma from alcoholism and allow alcoholics and their families to seek help openly, without shame; a program that would marshal sufficient public interest and support to provide adequate diagnostic and treatment facilities.

One February night at 3 a.m., Marty got out of bed, went to her typewriter and outlined a plan of action, which was to become the National Council on Alcoholism. It was presented to a group of scientists who had founded the Yale Center of Alcohol Studies. They underwrote it financially. On October 2, 1944, the NCA opened a modest suite of offices in the New York Academy of Medicine at 2 East 103rd Street.

Hi

This is response to both Tom's and Jose G's posting.

A few weeks ago I surfed thru the various Area web sites searching for information. When an Area develops its own "Service Manual" it may often carry the title of "Guidelines" or "Policies and Procedures", "Structure" or "Handbook". I found on-line information for the following Areas that is open to the public: Area 09 Mid-Southern CA (msca09aa.org), Area 26 Kentucky (area26.net), Area 53 Central and Southeast Ohio (area53aa.org), Area 58 Oregon (aa-oregon.org). If you wish to visit Area web-sites go to the AA (aa.org) web site - click on "Services for members" - then click on "General Service Conference Area web sites." These sites are all open to the public for information purposes.

Your not making it known what variation(s) your Area practices regarding Third Legacy voting procedures.

Areas are granted a fair amount of local discretion in determining what is procedurally in their best interest. Area practices and policies are typically established in the spirit of an "informed group conscience" (i.e. thoroughly discussed with due diligence to minority opinion) and backed up by "substantial unanimity" of a 2/3 (or higher) majority vote of Assembly attendees.

Areas, Districts, Groups, Intergroup Central Offices may vary procedurally from written materials (even those that are Conference approved). In some instances they may deviate from principles in the Traditions and Concepts and this should be addressed. In other instances they may simply be local variations that are acceptable. What I'm trying to say, is to be careful with taking the Service Manual, Traditions or Concepts and interpreting them in an overly legalistic way to presume they demand absolute lock-step conformity. That can open the door to a whole set of problems in its own right.

Perhaps you could be more specific and spell out your concerns about the Third Legacy voting procedures in your State Assembly. Otherwise, too much is left to the imagination.

Cheers

Arthur

Tom,

As an addendum to Jim's info:

The Norris article describes what was popularly called "the six point definition of an AA group."

A 1991 Conference Advisory Action removed the six point definition from the "The AA Group" pamphlet. A 1992 Conference Advisory action removed the six point definition from all literature in favor of defining an AA group by using Tradition Three (long form) and Warranty Six of the Twelfth Concept.

This is an excerpt from an article by John L. Norris, MD, Class "A" (nonalcoholic) trustee and longtime chairman of GSO in the October 1977 "Grapevine":

"I mentioned earlier that we have never discouraged special-purpose meetings but have been hesitant to list as groups those that might seem to preclude other alcoholics' attending. Perhaps we might talk a little bit about the differences between an AA meeting and an AA group. Our directories state: "Traditionally, two or more alcoholics meeting together for purposes of sobriety may consider themselves an AA group, provided that, as a group, they are self-supporting and have no outside affiliation." And in the beginning of our Fellowship in countries outside the United States and Canada, we agreed on six points that describe what an AA group is. They are:

"(1) All members of a group are alcoholics, and all alcoholics are eligible for membership. (2) As a group, they are fully self-supporting. (3) A group's primary purpose is to help alcoholics recover through the Twelve Steps. (4) As a group, they have no outside affiliation. (5) As a group, they have no opinion on outside issues. (6) As a group, their public relations policy is based on attraction rather than promotion, and they maintain personal anonymity at the level of press, radio-TV, and film."

I looked at the pamphlet titled "the AA member--Medications & other Drugs." At the beginning (p. 5) and the end (p. 19), point 2 says,

"Remember that the best safeguard against drug-related relapse is an active participation in the A.A. program of recovery." I infer from this that one can relapse by taking drugs as well as by taking alcohol. The whole thrust of the pamphlet is based on an assumption that there is a difference between merely "taking" a drug and "abusing" it, and there are stories from A.A. members who have done both. Around here--Philadelphia/Eastern Pennsylvania--the consensus is that someone who abuses prescription pain pills must change their sobriety date. In my 10 years of sobriety I have never heard anyone seriously argue otherwise.

One of my sponsees who has had the very bad habit of picking up every few years or so since he first came around in 1989 recently took pills prescribed to his AIDS buddy. When he asked me whether he had to change his sobriety date--obviously not wanting to--I asked him what he thought. He wound up admitting he had abused the medication and changing the date. If he hadn't, I would have told him I disapproved very strongly with his decision, though I wouldn't have MADE him change his sobriety date.

So I would say the short answer to your final question is definitely "Yes."

++++Message 992. RE: Carl Jung

To be sure, the late Dr. Bob and the very current W.W. did not want to be deified. They joined forces in 1935 simply to help each other stop drinking. Today the fellowship they started claims a membership of over 300,000 "arrested" alcoholics in 85 countries. The A.A. idea was based on psychological and spiritual concepts very similar to those of Frank Buchman's then-famous Oxford Group. Conceived in Akron, Ohio, the first AA Group was formed in New York City. In A.A.'s first five years no more than a few hundred people joined.

Then, in 1941, an article about A.A. by Jack Alexander appeared in the Saturday Evening Post and gave the movement an overnight boost. Membership leaped to over eight thousand by the end of the year.

A.A.'s basic tenet is that only an alcoholic can help another alcoholic; that psychiatric and other treatment is usually unsuccessful; but that alcoholics can, by banding together in a spirit of mutual help and understanding (and "by turning their lives over to God as they understand Him"), manage to lead relatively normal lives. Above all, they must face the fact that they must never again taken even one drink of alcohol.

As long as it restricted itself to informal organization and group "therapy," A.A. enjoyed--and deserved--universal respect. But a disquieting change has developed over the past fifteen years. A.A. is now highly formalized. The meetings, believed to be absolutely necessary, are ritualistic. And any suggestion to members that The Program is less than divine revelation evokes an irrational outcry.

I have no personal axe to grind. As a practicing psychologist who specializes in alcohol problems, I have been active since 1947 in both therapy and research. I have worked closely with Alcoholics Anonymous. I have also worked for the National Council on Alcoholism and for the Christopher D. Smithers Foundation, a charitable organization whose major interests are alcoholism and cancer.

I am disturbed by the fact that, for many members, A.A. is not as effective as it once was.

Moreover, I feel that much-needed scientific research is being diverted to other fields because of A.A.'s omniscient attitude. And I am not alone in my concern. Frequently in my practice, disillusioned men and women appeal to me: "Doctor, I've tried AA. over and over and I still can't stay sober. There must be something else dreadfully wrong with me! What is it?"

My friends in psychiatry, psychology, and pastoral counseling often ask me in discreet tones, "What's happening to AA?" Then, embarrassed at sounding critical, they add hastily, "It is a wonderful organization." Dr. E. M. Jellinek, dean of researchers in alcohol studies, pleaded at a workshop on alcoholism -held at Columbia University in June 1959 that A.A. leave science alone--so that scientists might get along with the business of objective research into the problem.

While serving as public-relations counsel to the National Council on Alcoholism in 1959, I attended A.A. meetings in a dozen major cities. This personal survey of AA. groups convinced me that there is a widening breach not only between A.A. and scientists, but also between practicing A.A.s and other alcoholics.

What has happened to the excellent program that once helped alcoholics stop drinking when medicine and psychology failed? Why has A.A. become a cult that many men and women reverentially call "the greatest movement since the birth of Christianity"?

"UTILIZE--DON'T ANALYZE"

I attended my first A.A. meeting in 1947 and was enormously impressed by the sincerity of the members. They were not professional do-gooders. The speakers seemed genuinely "humble," not piously proud of their humility. The "A.A. Personality"--identifiable by a studied air of serenity and steadfast smile (which I have come to think of, uncharitably, as the "A.A. Smirk")--had not yet come into existence. It is a product of "AA.: the Cult" as opposed to "A.A.: the Fellowship."

But one remark disturbed me even then. One man arose--a forerunner of the seer-and-pundit type now prevalent in A.A.--and declared, "There's an aggregate of two thousand years of drinking experience in this meeting room. If we don't understand alcoholism then nobody does." My own reaction was that nobody understood alcoholism (no one does now, either) and it was ludicrous for a group which admittedly had lost control of its drinking to claim superior knowledge of the subject.

As I began to attend meetings regularly, other aphorisms troubled me. One favorite cliché appeared to be of special importance and still is: "Utilize--don't analyze."

For some members this was fine. They were weary of trying to figure out how to drink normally; or how to endure sobriety now that it was achieved; or why they had become alcoholic in the first place. They were ready to accept blindly anything that would end the agonies of compulsive drinking.

But for others, such faith was impossible.

Some people simply must analyze--it is their most characteristic personality trait. Perhaps, during the early, frightening days of their newly found sobriety they take comfort in letting others think for them. But as their heads clear and their nerves stop quivering, the need to comprehend ideas intellectually is reasserted and they find themselves examining their own behavior with healthy curiosity. As one relapsed member mournfully described his "slip": "I had been dry for over a year and, like the window washer, stepped back to appraise my handiwork. I woke up two weeks later on the Flight Deck [the violent ward at Kings County Hospital] wondering what had happened."

Relapses occur frequently among such alcoholics trying to stay sober in A.A. Many A.A. members are unsympathetic to these less fortunate brothers, whom they regard as "hopeless psychotics" or "nuts who aren't 'real' alcoholics at all." Thus, we see in A.A. two disturbing tendencies: (1) to define an alcoholic as a person who stays sober in AA.; and (2) to relegate all other problem drinkers to the limbo of psychosis.

AAs are fond of quoting such "statistics" as: "Fifty per cent of all alcoholics coming into AA get sober and remain sober; 25 per cent have one or two slips, then 'get the program' and maintain sobriety; the other 25 per cent are either psychotic or not alcoholic at all."

A question arises: how do A.A. members garner these figures.? Because A.A. considers itself a deliberately permissive fellowship made up of autonomous groups which do not keep exact records, no real statistics exist. Nevertheless, individual members advance these generalizations as incontrovertible truths.

This kind of misinterpretation has narrowed A.A.'s once flexible philosophy into exclusive dogma. One undesirable effect is that those alcoholics who are not able to make A.A. work for them lose all hope; they fear that nothing is left for them except insanity (Korsakoffs Syndrome or the dreaded "wet brain") or death. This is not so. Many alcoholics achieve a sobriety made happy and creative through medical, psychiatric, psychological, and pastoral techniques. The sometimes-tragic misunderstanding--that only AA can help--is fostered by A.A.'s growing rigidity.

If A.A.'s intolerance were confined to its own community, we could "live and let live," as it exhorts its members to do. But A.A.s are indefatigable crusaders who greatly influence the national crusade against alcoholism--a malady which today afflicts five million Americans and costs taxpayers and industry over a billion dollars annually, according the National Council on Alcoholism. The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has called alcoholism the nation's fourth most serious public-health problem, ranking in importance with heart disease, cancer, and mental illness.

AAs hold key positions in city, state, and private agencies dealing with alcoholism. Many executive directors of local committees and information centers are members of AA. This means that public education on alcoholism is almost entirely in the hands of AAs. Furthermore, nearly all information about research, treatment, and community action is disseminated by public-relations directors who adhere to the A.A. party line. Thus, almost everything we read on alcoholism in newspapers and magazines is A.A. propaganda.

Zealous members spread this propaganda, not for personal gain, but to "flush out" alcoholics and help them share their own dubious serenity. I have had the unnerving experience of hearing a spontaneous remark made by an AA speaker in New York on a Monday repeated as gospel in Chicago on the following Friday. Much worse, I have heard a federal department chief publicly parrot a "statistic" I knew had been invented by an A.A. the week before. It is perhaps no coincidence that the A.A. publication is known as "The Grapevine."

Alcoholics Anonymous is hostile to criticism from any source. "All we ask is to be left alone," they cry. But they do not leave the American public alone. They influence public-health officials; they write extensively; they take positions on medical subjects such as diet and drugs (tranquilizers, sedatives, and stimulants all fall under the rubric of "goof-balls" to AA), and hold themselves up as final arbiters on any matter pertaining to alcoholism.

One result of this authoritarianism is that well-meaning laymen organize committees and sponsor "research"--which leads qualified professionals to assume that the job of fighting alcoholism is getting done. But it isn't--largely because of a basic fallacy in A.A. thinking: that it takes an alcoholic to understand an alcoholic. The trouble lies in defining the word "understanding." Scientists agree that alcoholics are more empathetic to other alcoholics than anyone else; but when they venture the opinion that trained specialists might be better equipped to conduct formal treatment and research than untrained alcoholics, they run into a storm of protest. AAs seem almost afraid that science will come up with a "cure" (an absolutely taboo word in the A.A. lexicon) and render A.A. unnecessary.

"What will we do if someone discovers a pill that cures alcoholism? It's our dedication that's keeping us sober and serene!" the executive director of an influential agency on alcoholism recently said to me. Needless to say, this person and most of this agency's staff are practicing members of AA. All are dedicated to combating alcoholism. But just as sobriety is a vocation for many A.A.s, for many agency people it is a career.

SOBRIETY . . . NOT SLAVERY

Another dangerous aspect of A.A. as a religious cult is the concept of sobriety as the ultimate goal of life. The very word "sobriety" has taken on a religious flavor and is uttered with hushed awe, rather than spoken of as a condition necessary to health and happiness. Practically all members who have passed the pigeon, or novice, stage speak of the quality of so-and-so's sobriety, as if evaluating degrees of spirituality.

Sobriety has, indeed, become the A.A.'s end which justifies any means. I know men whose wives work and support them so that they may devote their full time to "A.A. Work." I have talked with these women at Al-Anon meetings (groups formed especially for the spouses of alcoholics). Most are not complaining about their lot as A.A. wives; they insist that anything is better than living with a practicing alcoholic. But other women confess that eating, sleeping, and talking A.A. twenty-four hours a day is almost worse than having an alcoholic husband. The masculine point of view was summed up by a legendary souse at a bar who indignantly denied that he was an alcoholic. "I'm no blankety-blank alcoholic," he shouted, "I'm a drunk!" When asked about the difference he retorted, "Alcoholics have to go to those blankety-blank meetings all the time!"

I have heard husbands of alcoholics complain that A.A. has become a network of women's auxiliaries devoted to gossip and the "chanting of A.A. litanies such as, There but for the Grace of God.. .'; `Easy does it'; and `Living one day at a time.'"

A.A. dogmatism has prevented many people from seeking a more moderate solution: sobriety in Alcoholics Anonymous without slavery to it.

And there are still other possibilities such as psychotherapy or pastoral counseling. But AAs would probably retort, justifiably, that they'll stick to what they've got until something better comes along. Many alcoholics who come to A.A. have had unhappy experiences with psychologists or psychiatrists. Some therapists follow their own party lines, usually Freudian, too strictly and write off alcoholism as "just a symptom of some underlying emotional disorder"--implying that once the disorder is uncovered the problem of alcoholism will automatically be solved. Too many alcoholics are worsened by this oversimplified approach. Many others instinctively know better, especially when psychoanalysts begin probing their Oedipal Situations. However, most psychotherapists now understand that alcoholism is a complex, distinct illness and must be treated accordingly.

"ARRESTED" OR "RECOVERED"

But AAs veer to the other extreme. They assert vehemently that there's nothing wrong with alcoholics except alcohol, and all the alcoholic has to do is to stay away from that first drink. (There is a standard gag in A.A. about the alcoholic who always orders two drinks and only drinks the second one.) The facts are: (1) the alcoholic obviously wouldn't be an alcoholic if it weren't for alcohol (what would he be?) and he certainly must abstain from it if he is to get well; but (2) he undoubtedly is suffering from some sort of psychological disorder: emotional, mental, or social. Unfortunately, "psychology" is a synonym for "psychosis" to most A.A.s. When a recent Ph.D. dissertation on alcoholism was published in popular book form (Sever Sinners, by Arthur King, Harcourt, Brace and World, 1961), A.A.s immediately took the author to task for suggesting that alcoholics could be placed in categories of psychopathology like any other victims of a behavior disorder: the manic-depressive or compulsive-obsessive cases, for example, complicated by uncontrolled drinking. What was the big idea of saying alcoholics were a bunch of nuts, A.A.s demanded. Yet, they insist that "alcoholism is a disease." The President of the National Council of Alcoholism, an exceptional executive with a scientific mind, goes further, calling alcoholism a respectable disease. It can happen to anyone, he implies, and should not have social or moral stigma attached to it. I couldn't agree more heartily.

But AAs prefer to regard alcoholism as a purely physical disease: organic, glandular, metabolic, dietary--anything but mental. The only time this dread word is used is in an AA. definition of alcoholism: "A physical allergy, coupled with a mental compulsion."

According to the American Medical Association (Journal of the American Medical Association, May 25, 1957), "alcoholism can be classified into (1) primary alcoholism, which includes (a) those patients who from the very first drink of an alcoholic beverage are unable to control their desire for it and (b) those who through use over a great many years have developed an inability to take a drink or leave it alone and have become like group (a); and (2) secondary alcoholism, which includes those who use alcohol for its sedative action as a means of escape from reality and, in particular, from their personal problems. . . . This secondary group comprises by far the majority of patients suffering from alcoholism; however, most alcoholic patients prefer to be in the primary group." (Emphasis mine.)

By refusing to take into account problems of mental confusion, emotional immaturity, and social maladjustment, A.A.s are seriously hindering not only their own recovery, but scientific research as well.

If AAs are to be rescued from fanaticism, they must thoroughly understand two crucial words--"arrested" and "recovered." These are terms used to describe alcoholics who do not drink any more. Most members of A.A. fall into the former category; that is, they have arrested the development of their disease and have learned to live with it. To these men and women, alcoholism is something real in itself, like an incurable cancer. "Once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic" is one of A.A.'s most holy doctrines. They mean that once a person has lost control of his drinking he will never again be able to drink normally, even to the extent of one glass of beer. He must work regularly at the business of not taking that first drink.

This means he must practice A.A. in all his affairs; attend meetings without fail; do "Twelfth Step Work" (the analogy between A.A.'s "Twelve Steps" and the Ten Commandments is unmistakable); and proselyte other alcoholics into Alcoholics Anonymous. If he doesn't live AA., he's sunk. He gets drunk again sooner or later and--alcoholism being in the dogma of AA. A progressive disease--he'll be worse off than ever.

It is true, of course, that the drinking alcoholic becomes worse and worse in his drinking behavior. But what A.A. does is to superimpose this concept on the behavior of the non-drinking alcoholic. According to A.A., the disease itself progresses. This is erroneous thinking. An alcoholic who relapses after a period of abstinence may very well get sicker than ever, but because he has aged, not because his alcoholism has "progressed."

The term "recovered" means something different: it implies that the patient's alcoholism is no longer a problem. He may not be able to drink normally again, although some investigators such as D. L. Davies, Dean of the Institute of Psychiatry at the Maudsley Hospital, London, believe there are many such cases. This hospital's work has been conscientiously reported by the Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol (at the Rutgers Center of Alcohol Studies; "Normal Drinking in Recovered Alcohol Addicts" March 1962). Here is an excellent example of -the true scientific method, for the Quarterly Journal reports both fact and theory. It is not surprising that Dr. Davies' article has been either ignored by A.A., or brushed off with typical illogic: "Well, if these people drink normally, then they couldn't have been alcoholics in the first place." No AAs I queried had actually read the piece, though all were firm in their denunciation of it. I have heard A.A.s say that the report was immoral on the grounds that they might be tempted to drink again after hearing of it. Scientific truth was of no consequence.

The expression "recovered alcoholic" means that the patient no longer has to treat himself or take treatment from others at least twice a week for the rest of his life. He accepts life without alcohol; he makes certain adjustments within himself and in his attitude toward society; and he gets back into the mainstream of life. He might devote part of his time to helping alcoholics or others--probably he does--but because he can and wants to, not as a device to keep himself sober.

TRY A.A. FIRST, BUT

There are many such recovered alcoholics, both in and out of Alcoholics Anonymous. These men and women have learned one thing: neither A.A. nor psychotherapy, nor any other treatment is more than a bridge between alcoholism and real recovery. Good bridges, perhaps. I still believe that A.A. provides the best possible way, at present, for most alcoholics to get sober and start a new life without alcohol. Others need some form of psychotherapy and/or pastoral counseling--perhaps in conjunction with A.A. These disciplines are especially helpful to people who cannot, without professional guidance, sincerely practice certain of A.A.'s Twelve Steps, such as Step Four--"Make a Searching and Fearless Inventory of Ourselves"; or Step Ten--"Continue to Take Personal Inventory and When We Are Wrong Promptly Admit It"; or those Steps that refer to "a Power greater than ourselves."

Alcoholics Anonymous is not a sustain- ing Way of Life. Sobriety can never be a satisfactory ultimate goal; it is, after all, merely the absence of intoxication. It is what one does with one's sobriety that is important. AA. is a man-made means for attaining this sobriety.

Alcoholics Anonymous should not be a cult for the retardation of the "arrested" alcoholic. I do not suggest for a moment that a single A.A. quit the fellowship. On the contrary, I strongly urge sticking with it. To anyone who is having trouble with alcohol I say: try A.A. first; it's the answer for most people.

But to those who insist upon serving A.A. as if it were a holy and apostolic church, I say, Beware. Observe those members who seem genuinely serene. Talk with those who have been in A.A. a long time and who really practice "live and let live." Though A.A. is an important part of their lives, it is an adjunct, not the whole. They have crossed the bridge from arrested alcoholism to true recovery.

And if even then they cannot stay sober and happy, they should not despair. There are other ways, other bridges--physicians and psychiatrists, psychologists and pastoral counselors, who are capable and anxious to help them. Some specialize in helping alcoholics who have conscientiously tried A.A. and failed. Most agree that there's no such person as a hopeless alcoholic.

A.A. as a group must recognize its real function: to serve as a bridge from the hospital or the jail to the church--or to a sustaining personal belief that life is worthwhile. It must not pose as a spiritual movement that provides everything the alcoholic needs to fulfill his destiny. It must not teach its young (as it does in Alateen, its Sunday School for the children of alcoholics) such catechisms as: "We will always be grateful to Alateen for giving us a way of life and a wonderful healthy program to live by and enjoy." It must realize that "the actual coffee pot Anne used to make the first A.A. coffee (shown in "Alcoholics Anonymous Come of Age," Harper 1957, a commentary on the A.A. bible, Alcoholics Anonymous, Works Publishing Company, 1946) is not the Holy Grail. The cake and coffee served after meetings are just refreshments, not the body and blood of Jesus Christ.

Only then will Alcoholics Anonymous "come of age." Then, perhaps, more of its members will become "recovered" instead of "arrested" alcoholics. Science may then be stimulated to further research. And those alcoholics who are unable to make A.A. work for them may look elsewhere and find their serenity, too.

Arthur H. Cain, who has a Ph.D. from Columbia and is a graduate of Yale (now Rutgers) School of Alcohol Studies, is the author of Young People and idea embodied in "the 24 hour plan" that we should try to look ahead of the present in measuring our sobriety. We do not set out to stay sober one year, three or a lifetime. Our goal is just 24 hours - just the present - and if necessary we break the 24 hours into even smaller units of time.

Celebration of the personal anniversary inevitably turns thoughts not only backwards but ahead to the next anniversary, again setting up the psychological yardstick which the founders of AA found they did best without.

Another bit of AA philosophy which the personal anniversary contradicts is expressed in the wise observation that it's not the length but the "quality of your sobriety that counts." How often that has been proved! Over and over, again and again, events have demonstrated, sometimes tragically, or sometimes happily, that the test of security in sobriety is not how long in AA but how well founded in AA. Everyone knows of those unfortunate cases of the "oldtimer" who has been in several years and then has a slip. He knows, too, on the other hand, of "newcomers" who in a shorter span of time have progressed much farther along the road of personal recovery.

Celebration of anniversaries also tends to build up an "aristocracy of oldtimers," a kind of class system by which one is supposed to move up from the ranks of the herd into a more select group whose prestige depends on the number of years they have been around. That certainly is inconsistent with the democracy of AA. Likewise, the implication that through this "aging" process one is graduated from pupil to master does not jibe with the premise that one does not arrest alcoholism by himself. The whole curative fundamental of AA is that he must get help. So how can he become master, ever? It doesn't make sense.

Celebration of personal anniversaries puts an emphasis on time that is not justified by AA experience. Rare is the new one in AA who does not start counting years for himself when he attends a meeting at which some member's fourth, fifth or X anniversary is being celebrated by the group with figurative trumpets, orchids and fanfare. Rare, too, is the old one in AA, who, when he finds himself deferred to and looked up to as an "oldtimer," does not begin to get at least a suspicion that maybe he does know more, maybe he is a little apart from the herd. From that point it's not a long step to a recurrence of ego-itis, the same old disease that had a grip on all of us.

What good purpose is served by celebrating personal anniversaries? Does any member who is really participating in the opportunities of AA and enjoying the blessings of sobriety need to have others bring him bouquets for a thing from which he himself benefits, first, and which he undertook for himself, first? We think not - not if there is anything to AA's "unselfish selfishness."

The observation that it's not the years but the "quality of your sobriety" that counts is solidly founded on the record of experience. - T. D.Y.

Does anyone know the origins for the tradition of turning upside-down the Think signs/banners at some AA meetings?

The Law of Unselfishness

(Condensed from Christian Herald)

by Fulton Oursler

I have a friend who is a famous New York neurologist, and many dipsomaniacs come to him after having been pronounced incurable by other specialists. When I asked how he treated them, he told me about a man we'll call Bill Wilkins.

Bill Wilkins, a Wall Street broker, woke up one morning in a hospital for drunkards. Despondently he peered up at the house physician and groaned, "Doc, how many times have I been in this joint?"

"Fifty! You're now our half-century plant."

"I suppose liquor is going to kill me?"

Hi Hugh

In item 6, it states that election of the delegate is by Third Legacy Procedure. It also states that "Before balloting starts, eligible committee members' names (suggest full names be used) and districts are read to the assembly or written on the board ...". Then it states "The chairperson asks whether anyone is unable serve, and if so, that person's name is removed. (Some areas allow nominations from the floor)." In item 7 it states, "the alternate delegate is elected next, by the same procedure, followed by other area officers."

There is room for reasonable people to interpret item 7 either the way your Area practices it or elect "other area officers" by Third Legacy Procedure.

My Area (Northeast Texas) elects "traditional" area officers (i.e. delegate, chair, secretary, treasurer and their alternates) by Third Legacy Procedure. We also ask each candidate if they are willing to serve and they too accept or decline. Several instances are noted in the M-39 publication of Conference advisory actions where an area chair (and in one instance an area treasurer) had to substitute as delegate at a Conference. So I personally like to see these positions elected by Third Legacy Procedure even if the eventuality of their substituting as delegate seems remote.

Last year, our election assembly was exhausting due to a very high number of elections that "went to the hat." Also it can really hurt to see a candidate, who is only 1-2 votes shy of a 2/3 majority, not be the member selected "from the hat." However, I firmly believe that the Third legacy Procedure and resolving elections by lot works best in the long haul (to ensure politics stay out and humility stays in).

"Other officers" (i.e. service committee chairs) in my area are "appointed" by the outgoing and incoming area chairs from a pool of volunteers who sign up for the positions. We will be discussing a proposal to elect these positions by simple majority (show of hands) vote. If the assembly decides to do this then that's fine. If they decide not to do it then that's fine as well. In my area, past delegates are "ex officio" members of the area committee (to encourage their continued participation). Some areas allow past delegates to be voting members, some don't. Some areas have a registrar as an area officer, some don't. It doesn't mean one area is doing it right and another is doing it wrong.

There are two procedures of interest: (1) the election procedure and (2) the procedure used to define the election procedure.

The latter, I believe, is more important than the former (if done in the spirit of Tradition Two). If the latter procedure involved "informed" group conscience (the word "informed" is quite important) and "substantial unanimity" then your area has exercised its local autonomy to do what it feels is in its best interest. The "letter" of what is embodied in the Traditions and Concepts should not take dominance over the "context" of these principles as defined in their essays. An important part of Tradition Four is the "right to be wrong." Also the goal of the Traditions is unity not conformity.

However, if something doesn't sit right with you, then by all means bring it up for discussion at your area committee, assembly or area inventory. Your voice is important. One of the magnificent ingredients of "informed" group conscience is due diligence to minority opinion. I've seen numerous "super majority" assembly decisions reversed after a minority report was delivered. On the other hand, if there is substantial unanimity (i.e. a 2/3 or higher vote) to go a different direction, then "unity" also carries an individual responsibility to give that decision a fair opportunity to work.

Cheers

Arthur

Our Area Delegate pointed out the same thing when she saw my posting. I didn't keep a copy of what I wrote back to her, but in essence, Eastern Pennsylvania does two things differently. At the beginning we add the step of calling the name of each person eligible to stand; they respond with 'accept' or 'decline.' Also we only elect the Delegate and Alternate Delegate by 2/3 substantial majority; other offices are by simple majority. There are other minor differences that only amount to changes in wording.

Later on page 202 in PIO

"According to a letter dated July 18, 1938 from Dr. Richards () of John Hopkins, Bill, at that time, was using 'Alcoholics Anonymous' both as the working title of the book and as the name of the Fellowship." () She recommended having a chapter from a medical person which led to the inclusion of "The Doctor's Opinion." (PIO 200-201)

On pg 197 of Lois Remembers

She asserts (in the timeline) "June 15, 1938 - The name 'Alcoholics Anonymous' is used for the first time."

It's difficult to factually determine whether Joe W. originated the name "Alcoholics Anonymous" or just championed the name prior to publication of the Big Book. The inference in AA Comes of Age is that Joe W. was more proponent than originator. In AA Comes of Age, Bill states unambiguously "We do not know who first used these words." That statement may very well be the truth of the matter.

Subject: RE: [AAHistoryLovers] Story about Bellevue and Name "Alcoholics Anonymous"

12 years ago, in Atlanta, an early AA historian shared the following information.

The early members of the fellowship referred to themselves as "an unknown bunch of drunks". Shortly after the New York contingent broke away from the Oxford Groups and were meeting in their own homes, or places of business, a man by the name of Joe Worden, a patient at Bellevue, was brought to a meeting. He was one of the founders of the New Yorker magazine and he was in pretty bad shape... he died not to long after this meeting. He heard the name reference during the meeting and being a "wordsmith", a writer, he began to babble, "anonymous alcoholics". The reference stayed with the group after Joe left and unfortunately died. At the same time that this occurred, the members were working on a title for the book they had just completed. They decided to use "Anonymous Alcoholics" but at the very last meeting, before sending the information to the printer, one of the members suggested that they put the alcoholic first and call it "Alcoholics Anonymous". It had a nice ring to it and during this period a Spencer Tracy film called "Captains Courageous" was very popular so this same type of literature might also prove to be effective. It didn't work out that way, the book bombed and it took a long time to sell, but that's another story.

I have told this story hundreds of times, all over the US, Canada and Europe and it has never been challenged. Please let me know if you find different.

Peace,

Bill M

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Story about Bellevue and Name "Alcoholics Anonymous"

Recently, at a meeting, two members with 19/20 years sobriety agreed on a story that the name "Alcoholics Anonymous" was picked for the book by Bill W. (after "The Way Out" had been rejected) when Bill first said "We'll call it Anonymous Alcoholics" and a patient (or recent patient) from Bellevue said -- the only thing he ever said (according to both AAs) -- "No, change the order, it should be Alcoholics Anonymous, not Anonymous Alcoholics." Now, I'd not heard this before, and the timing doesn't seem to work, and I frankly think the whole thing more than a little unlikely, but I'm curious as to where the story comes from, and I wonder if any AAHistoryLovers know. -- JL for any of the positions votes if the Chair is not present. For any position at an election Assembly, either an AA stands for the position or an AA can be nominated, and Motions to close the 'nominations' sometimes happen when the field is numerous.

By the way, in Chicago Area 19, its Assembly does not allow GSRs to vote: DCMs and District Delegates (one for every thirteen groups) vote, and the method is supposed to allow an informed District group conscience to develop before Assembly voting.

Area 20 has over 1,000 registered groups but usually no more than 120 AA servants attend Assemblies. There's no requirement for a quorum, either, it's simply those who are participating.

The two-thirds majority applies to each election for service positions and Alternates, and it's asked whether to go to the hat after a fourth ballot. Until then it's a paper ballot. When only one AA stands for a post, the vote is by acclamation.

On Motions to change Area 20 Guidelines (Service, Spending, weekend Conferences, planning documents that are also called Guidelines) a two-thirds majority is also our standard practice (but no written ballot). Any Motion can be requested to have the two-thirds rule applied, and then a simple majority vote is taken on the request.

The practice does allow for a substantial unanimity and puts our Concept Twelve Warranties into beautiful effect. When the agenda items and issues are known and discussed ahead of an Assembly, those voting are reasonably prepared.

Simple majority votes encompass most everything else, but a "sense of the meeting" is often asked when discussion of any item or issue is under development (and not placed as a formal Motion to move forward on something).

Our General Service Conference utilizes the two-thirds majority rule for ALL Advisory Actions and for elections of Regional Trustees and slates of General Service Board candidates.

This year, when the Conference Literature Committee recommended restoring only "Dr. Bob's Nightmare" to its original Third Edition format, the Conference did not have the necessary two-thirds approval. If this item remains important enough throughout the coming Conference year, the vote can be taken again in 2004 if it's placed on a new Agenda.

Thus, no Conference action is binding on another Conference... :-)

Anyway, what I believe has to happen with the Third Legacy procedure is that father's belief that money would not be a good thing for a movement based on selfless service - "it needs only our good will." The millionaire went home without being asked to contribute.

Now, twenty-four years older and with a membership of 300,000 A.A. is rich in its own right. Despite bylaws prohibiting gifts larger than $100, money pours in to national headquarters at the rate of more than $400,000 a year and A.A. doesn't seem to know what to do with it all. Once a year it spends $20,000 or so to bring 100 delegates in from the fifty states for a week-long, all expense paid conference at a New York hotel. It has leased a floor in a midtown New York office building, where a dozen recovered housewives and spinsters answer letters, distribute pamphlets containing material on alcoholism purchased from free-lance writers, circulate a monthly bulletin of member's stories, articles, jokes and cartoons called the Grapevine, print and mail press releases, and go to meetings.

These workers receive annual salaries of $7,000 to $9,000 and are backed by a staff of stenographers and clerical employees - nonmembers. Herb M., a member with experience as a press agent and convention manager is paid $18,000 a year for part-time services (three and a third days a week). The rest of the money goes into sinking funds, which have no specific purpose, but are nice to have, since they produce, in the form of interest, more money for sinking funds. Bill W., the movements surviving co-founder makes around $25,000 per year - a sum a grateful membership does not begrudge - on royalties from three books: Alcoholics Anonymous, which started it all, Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions and A.A. Comes of Age. For a movement that was born and grew to greatness in the face of ridicule, adversity and bitter poverty, this is indeed wealth. Even if Nelson Rockefeller's canny father had never suggested it, the question would now arise whether the success will prove ruinous.

The prodigies of selfless service performed by members have had a stunning impact on a basically me-first society. Press, clergy and the professions have fallen all over one another to heap praise on the drunks who found a way out, and for a long time it has been almost bad manners to speak of A.A. in any but reverent terms.

Now, however, it is a public institution and subject to the same scrutiny accorded other community volunteer services. There are A.A. groups in every crossroads and neighbourhood - 10,000 of them. They have become almost as much a part of the community scene as the visiting nurse and the fire department, which they somewhat resemble. In a population containing 80 million users of Alcohol and 6 million cases of active alcoholism, they perform as necessary a life-saving function as the Coast Guard. Alcoholism has pressed its way into public attention as the nation's third deadliest disease, and A.A. has developed the only method yet found that produces large numbers of enduring cures, It suddenly finds that it has public responsibilities, that others besides its members claim a legitimate interest in how it conducts its affairs.

Many find the fellowship of interest entirely apart from its practical work of sobering up drunks. Though itself nonintellectual and sometimes anti-intellectual, A.A. strikes both therapists and theorists as being an almost classical demonstration of the psychotherapeutic theories of Carl Jung. Jung believed in God and in "spirit." He devised another vocabulary for transactions with agnostic professional colleagues, but firmly used these traditional terms in his correspondence. A good part of his life work was directed towards reconciling the insights of religion with those of the new psychiatry. Jung approved Freud's work as far as it went, but felt that forces unsuspected by Freud could be summoned to the aid of distressed humanity. This belief is also at the base of A.A., commonly described by its members as a "spiritual program."

This resemblance is not entirely coincidental for, though he did not know it and though his contribution was inadvertent, Jung had a hand in founding A.A. Early in the 1930s, Jung took a patient named Rolland H., a rich American and chronic alcoholic frantically seeking a cure. After an attempt at treatment, Jung told Rolland H. that psychiatry couldn't help him. Then, asked the desperate patient, what could? Perhaps a religious conversion of some kind, Jung said. Such an experience could never be guaranteed, but one could seek the company of those who had had them, and hope. Roland H. went to England, joined the Oxford movement, got sober and returned to New York. There he continued his association with the Oxford movement, taking particular interest in other inebriates. One of these Edwin T., carried the news to Bill W., a Wall Street broker, then prostrated by alcohol. After undergoing a shattering subjective experience of religious enlightenment, Bill W got sober and began looking for other alcoholics who were interested in drying out by the new method. He found one - again through the Oxford movement - on a business trip to Akron, Ohio. His new friend was a down-and-out alcoholic physician, Dr. Robert S. The two founded Alcoholics Anonymous and led the movement jointly until Robert S. died, sober in 1950.

A.A. was not completely without precedent. More than a century ago, a remarkable similar organization, The Washington Temperance Society, sprang up in Washington, D.C. and soon had branches in most big cities. Lincoln, concerned about alcoholism through the suffering of his law partner, Herndon, encouraged the members whenever he could, and even addressed them on one occasion. The Washingtonians had all the main features of A.A. - alcoholics helping one another, weekly alcoholics meetings, shared experience, readily available group fellowship, reliance on "the Higher Power." Bill W. and Bob S., added a spiritual regimen designed to produce personal improvement, a rule of anonymity, the practice of exchanging speakers between groups, and a membership restricted to those who confessed a problem with alcohol. The Twelve Steps of surrender, confession, self-examination, restitution and service were taken with only slight changes from the Oxford movement. The anonymity and alcoholics only rules were innovations.

AAs great expansion began with the publication of an article by Jack Alexander in the Saturday Evening Post of March 1, 1941. Ten years later the membership was up to 150,000: in ten more years it doubled that. America was suffering from the hangovers of a national binge begun with the repeal of Prohibition and not yet ended. By aggressive lobbying, the liquor industry cleared away the remaining restraints on the sale of booze. Saturation advertising disfigured the approaches to the major cities with five story whiskey bottles and bombarded the populace with reminders to drink. Consumption rose until it reached the present figures of a billion quarts of spirits, 2 billion quarts of wine and 12 billion quarts of beer a year. The industry employs a million people and pays them $5 billion a year—more than we spend on the combined crude oil, natural gas, coal and ore-mining industries, and nearly twice what we spend on education.

Trouble arose along with sales figures. Those who drink consume, on the average, a quart of whiskey, two quarts of wine and four gallons of beer a month. Some, of course drink far less than this, others—especially the 6 million chronic alcoholics—much more. Excessive drinking costs the nation $35 million annually in medical care, $30 million in jail maintenance, $100 million in accidents, $500 million in wage losses, according to estimates based on a Public Affairs Committee pamphlet. About a million people a year are admitted to be treated for alcoholism. One in twelve drinkers becomes an alcoholic: 14,000 deaths and 40,000 injuries a year result from the mixture of alcohol and traffic. 21,000 people die annually from cirrhosis, 6 million families are shadowed by alcohol and 12 million children suffer from their parents excessive drinking.

In the light of such figures, it is not surprising that A.A. seemed an answer to prayer in hundreds of thousands of families. A household devastated by booze is an isolated unit, plagued by debt, ridden by internal strife, with little hope, few friends, many enemies and a skeleton grown too big for the closet. AA replaces despair with hope. The family has friends again, understanding friends, people who have been through the mill, ready at any time for a cup of coffee and a chat. The necessity of total abstinence, and the means for attaining it, are made clear. The transformations are so impressive, and so often enduring, that the word "miracle" is frequently and understandably employed. Even physicians and psychiatrists, conditioned by occupation to disregard the claims of laymen, sought to learn from AAs source of clinical information on the management of a syndrome that had baffled their professions.

Alcoholics, even sober ones, are only human, and can tolerate only limited amounts of adulation without becoming dizzy. Effective speakers were in great demand to tell their "stories," not only at AA weekly meetings in distant places, but at convocations of professional groups, civic associations and service clubs. Big city groups stage annual banquets drawing up to a thousand people and costing up to $10 a plate. Resort hotels are taken over for State and regional conventions. All this has gone to the head of many a reformed booze fighter, and a type of paragon known in the local groups as "Mr. AA" pushed himself into key positions in the committee structure.

As AA became more prominent this tendency was noted outside the organization, and drew comment. A group of letters addressed last year to the editor of Harper's, was pointed: "Now that the myth of the Golden-Hearted prostitute has been laid to rest, let's tackle the Omniscient Ex-Lush." "The fanatics who prevail in some groups seem bent on making AA into a hostile, fundamentalist religion." "The movement needs to recover some of the good spirit it had before it became proud of its humility." These letters were occasioned by an article in which Arthur Cain pointed out tendencies toward cultism and narrow orthodoxy that limited the fellowship's therapeutic effectiveness.

My own experience with AA dates back more than 10 years. While writing a series of articles for a national magazine, I attended hundreds of AA local meetings and a number of state and regional affairs, and developed a wide acquaintanceship in the movement. My articles aroused the interest of Bill W., and I was invited to evaluate, as a paid consultant, some of AAs publications and activities.

This chore consumed a number of months in 1962 and 1963, and afforded an intimate view of the organization's national headquarters and policy making boards. Since my recommendations were not confidential-"AA has no secrets but the names of its members" is a hallowed tenet-they can be disclosed. They contained little more that had not been said before, some of it by Arthur Cain. Anyone else undertaking a similar survey would, I think, have reached the same conclusions.

At headquarters, I missed almost completely the bubbling good will, the creative open-mindedness, the open and stimulating swapping of ideas that made so many of the weekly neighborhood meetings memorable. Everybody was an expert, with a cluster of ideas closed to amendment. Bill W., The movement's traditional leader and a main source of the spiritual inspiration, had lost out in committee maneuvering to a policy of "putting the thing on a business basis." Committee politics took up half the working day; gossip was venomous. In quick succession I was told that the co-founder (in my opinion still sharp-witted at seventy) was senile, that a staff worker was a hypochondriac and a committeeman a homosexual. The accused were at pains to assure me, separately and without encouragement, that the accusers were a nymphomaniac, a schizophrenic and a megalomaniac, I observed nothing to substantiate any of these charges. However, there was no inclination toward the "fearless and searching moral inventory" recommended by AAs Twelve Suggested Steps.

The non-alcoholic Board of Trustees responsible for national policy was ultraconservative (one member, Archibald Roosevelt, had furnished literature for distribution by the John Birch Society) and this, I reported, had served the movement poorly. The board's rigid conservatism was reflected in a number of unfortunate policies, the most odious of which was a tacit endorsement of racial segregation within the branches. When a member submitted an article for the monthly bulletin pointing out that nearly all Southern AA groups and a great many Northern ones were racially segregated, and that AAs Negro membership had failed to keep pace with the growing problem of Negro alcoholism, the article was turned down on the grounds that it "might disrupt AA unity." Local AA groups are free from any national control other than moral suasion. That even this influence should be withheld on so fundamental a point seemed to me a serious error. It is, however, in keeping with the fact that there are no Negroes on the headquarters staff or on any of the numerous AA national boards and committees.

The policy on publications, I reported, is likely to cost AA its once acknowledged leadership in its field. When Alcoholics Anonymous was first published a quarter of a century ago, it won universal acknowledgement that AA was well in advance of the field. But though the medical and psychiatric professions have been remarkably slow in coming to terms with alcohol addiction, much progress has lately been made, and the AA "Big Book" is beginning to have an Out-of-date, early century, historical sound. The Board, however, has ruled that no further word shall be spoken. Despite the fact that the rank and file teems with exciting, relevant, informed and up-to-the-minute experience, none of it is permitted to appear in book form. To publish such literature, it is felt, would be to risk heresy. As a result, AAs official books, unfertilized by fresh documentation, tend to sound more archaic each year.

I concluded that AAs headquarters had been captured by an ultraconservative clique that was doing the society appreciable harm. This finding, was, of course, received by that clique without thanks and, despite the efforts of a small free-speech party, was prevented from reaching the delegates of the rank and file for whom it was intended. AA, at least in its national offices, bears heavily the marks of its culture in its time-affluence and the shortsighted conservatism that affluence begets.

Fortunately for future generations, the influence of headquarters on local groups is not decisive. "Oh, those guys!", is a typical reaction from a local group secretary. "We send `em their three bucks a year per member and forget about `em." Many groups make no contributions to "the national." In the neighborhoods and at the crossroads will surely be preserved in living practice those ideas that give mankind new hope whenever they achieve a renaissance-candor, humility, friendliness, enlightened understanding, a good-natured readiness to pitch in at any hour in any way to help a baffled human being.

and told to sit down. The desire to help others degenerated. As one disheartened former A.A. member told me, "I felt nobody cared what happened to Mary W. I felt they were just interested in another alcoholic who would become another notch in their belts. I felt as if I was being pressed into serving their cause and building up their oligarchy."

With this growing dogmatism came a Dark Ages attitude toward any scientist who might differ with official AA doctrine. According to -the AA litany, alcoholism is a physical disease which can never be cured: "Once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic." The corollary is: "A reformed alcoholic must live A.A. from day to day and never leave A.A."

Actually, there is no scientific evidence that alcoholism is an incurable, physical disease.

According to current evidence, the origin of uncontrolled drinking is psychological. A person drinks to ease anxiety, depression, boredom, guilt, timidity, inarticulateness. An alcoholic learns to become one; he is not born that way. This means that many alcoholics can return to normal drinking without fear of ending up on Skid Row. Over the past 17 years I have treated more than 50 alcoholics who no longer need to attend meetings or receive treatment. Most important, over 20 of my patients have learned to drink normally, to use -alcohol as a beverage, not a psychological crutch.

Yet when scientists have reported similar findings, A.A. members have often set out to discredit them. In 1957 Doctors Melvin L. Selzer and William Holloway of the University of Michigan came up with the then startling report that 13 confirmed alcoholics had become social drinkers. Because of the pressure of an influential A.A. member, the state agency that provided the funds for the study virtually ordered the two scientists to omit what it called these "embarrassing" findings. Doctor Selzer published his findings anyway.

In 1962 Dr. D. L. Davies, after a study at Maudsley Hospital in London, declared that seven men who had been alcoholics were able to drink normally after treatment; some had been drinking without problems for as long as 11 years. Doctor Davies concluded that "the generally accepted view that no alcohol addict can ever again drink normally should be modified." Some AA members branded the scientist's report "immoral, because it might cause some members to drink."

Dr. E. M. Jellinek, a co-founder of the Yale School of Alcohol Studies and a dean of researchers in the field of alcoholism until his death in 1963, was drawing on his own experiences when he declared: ". . . Alcoholics Anonymous have naturally created the picture of alcoholism in their own image . . . and there is every reason why the student of alcoholism should emancipate himself from accepting this exclusiveness as propounded by A.A."

Not only has A.A. interfered with scientific investigations, it has prevented medical and psychological treatment which runs counter to its own theories. At one New York City hospital, for instance, the physicians preferred using paraldehyde to treat acute intoxication. But then A.A. members implied that they would stop referring patients there if paraldehyde was used. The doctors were persuaded to switch to another drug, chloral hydrate. As the physician in charge of the alcoholics' ward explained, the A.A. non-scientists had discovered that paraldehyde was a form of alcohol. Actually, chloral hydrate is the more toxic drug. In fact, its indiscriminate use in another New York hospital has left some patients more intoxicated upon discharge than when they were admitted.

While A.A. adherents battle scientific inquiry that does not fit A.A.'s narrow theories, its chapters often attempt to assume total control of members' lives. Purporting to offer everything needed for human fulfillment, the fellowship now boasts of a "ladies auxiliary," called Al-Anon, for spouses of members and even a division for members' children called Alateen. It suggests that the youngsters open their meetings by reciting this incantation: "We will always be grateful to Alateen for giving us a Way of Life and a wonderful, healthy program to live by and enjoy!" Implied is the distressing theory that there is no other way of life for alcoholics except that of A.A.--a life in which every waking hour is devoted to the struggle for sobriety.

The wife of a Texas member described some unfortunate consequences of A.A.'s creed that the struggle against alcohol must be the most important ambition in a member's life. This must be placed above wives or husbands, children, homes, or jobs. They must be ready to abandon these things at any time The tragic part is, some of them while searching for this sobriety and serenity actually do exactly that." How pervasive the obsession with A.A. can become was poignantly demonstrated by a patient who had come to me because of worries about her A.A. husband. He had proposed that they move their bed into the AA clubhouse so they might be "available 24 hours a day just in case an alcoholic wandered in."

For many members, of course, staying sober is a fierce challenge daily. But under the A.A. program, the lives of many are so sterile that their growth as human beings is hindered. Taught to rely on slogans and compulsive A.A. routine, some are unable to face the fact that they are alcoholics because they are psychologically sick. It is for this reason that many A.A. members never recover.

A New Hampshire novelist and former A.A. member, who has been continuously sober for eight years, described this human waste when he wrote me: "I have met members who are actually afraid to think. They have made a high fence of A.A., which shuts them out from all pleasurable and vital aspects of life."

Behind the A.A. fence the original principle that alcoholics must be humble before God has been turned into the dictum that alcoholics are God's chosen people. This theme is preached in meetings and through books and pamphlets. A typical illustration is a booklet titled, "Around the Clock With A.A.," published recently by an A.A. group in California. One passage declares: "God in His wisdom selected this group of men and women to be the purveyors of His goodness. . . . He went right to the drunkard, the so-called weakling of the world. Well might He have said to us: `Unto your weak and feeble hands I have entrusted power beyond estimate. To you has been given that which has been denied the most learned of your fellows. Not to scientists or statesmen, not to wives or mothers, not even to my priests or ministers have I given this gift of helping other alcoholics which I entrust to you." Such idolatry causes the believer to see himself as all knowing, and turns the missionary into the zealot.

A.A.'s creeds not only infect its own members but pervade public education. Most of what we hear or read about alcoholism is inspired by A.A. adherents spouting A.A. dogmas. City, state and private agencies frequently fill all key posts with A.A. members. One western state actually requires that personnel assigned to its alcoholism program be A.A. members for at least two years. No professional experience is needed. The A.A. philosophy also dominates the National Council on Alcoholism, the only nation-wide public-information agency on alcoholism. N.C.A., which is supported by public donations, has over 60 affiliated information committees scattered throughout the country. Although both N.C.A. and A.A. deny that they are officially connected, many members of N.C.A.'s staff and some directors are A.A. members. A.A. members serve as directors in eight out of ten N.C.A. information centers in the largest cities in the United States.

Thus, it is not surprising that N.C.A. continues to parrot the A.A. line that alcoholism is a "progressive disease for which there is no known cure, but which can only be arrested." Further, N.C.A. in a series of radio and TV commercials actually stated that the American Medical Association has declared alcoholism to be a disease, although the A.M.A. has restricted itself to general statements that the alcoholic is "sick." Time and again, I have heard public figures recite A.A.-N.C.A. myths and propaganda as if they were gospel.

I once heard Arthur Flemming, former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, read verbatim a pronouncement on alcoholism which I knew had been prepared a year earlier by N.C.A.'s public-relations firm. Flemming offered the now familiar "statistic" that there are five million alcoholics in the United States. This figure is based on a study Doctor Jellinek of Yale conducted 18 years ago in a small community; he thought he had found that three percent of the population were alcoholics. N.C.A. applied this percentage to the whole nation. Doctor Jellinek, a great physiologist but no statistician, repudiated his own formula in 1956. The five-million figure is only a guess, for no scientific count of alcoholics has ever been made.

While N.C.A. issues well-intended but sometimes questionable facts and theories, A.A. officials, when pressed, often hide behind the famous Tenth Tradition, which states that "Alcoholics Anonymous has no opinion or outside issues, hence the A.A. name ought never be drawn into public controversy." This device enables members of A.A. to make outrageous assertions which A.A.'s headquarters promptly disavows when challenged. "Many people I have tried to help," said one Chicago member, "have abandoned the program because they couldn't take the ex cathedra homilies on drugs, alcohol, psychiatry, medicine, sociology, biology, to name a few subjects on which they speak with authority."

Much of the A.A.'s failure can be blamed on a lack of forward-looking, constructive leadership. Writer Jerome Ellison recently spent several months as a paid consultant to A.A. evaluating the fellowship's publications and activities. At national headquarters in New York City, Ellison declared, committee politics took up half the working day, and gossip was venomous. Everybody was an expert, Ellison went on, "with a cluster of ideas closed to amendment." He related how one member had submitted to the A.A. monthly bulletin an article which showed that nearly all southern and a great many northern A.A. chapters were racially segregated, and that AA. had failed to keep pace with the growing problem of Negro alcoholism. The article was turned down on the ground that it "might disrupt A.A. unity."

Ellison's most damning indictment concerned the rule made by A.A.'s non-alcoholic board of trustees that no change can be made in A.A.'s theories on alcoholism even though they are nearly a quarter of a century old. "Despite the fact that the rank and file teems with exciting, relevant, informed and up-to-the-minute experience," Ellison declared, "none of it is permitted to appear in book form. To publish such literature, it is felt, would be to risk heresy."

Needless to say, I do not suggest that A.A. be abolished or that a single member quit. That A.A. helps many thousands stay sober is obvious. But Alcoholics Anonymous should return to its original purpose of being a much-needed first-aid station. The "arrest" of uncontrolled drinking is the essential first step in becoming a recovered or cured alcoholic. During this critical period, the alcoholic needs the sympathy and understanding that only another alcoholic can give. But after three months or so, when the shakes have subsided and the cobwebs are beginning to clear, the recovering alcoholic should go ahead. He should not be taught that he must remain forever crippled and bound by the paralyzing concept "Once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic." It is at this point that the patient needs a different kind of understanding: an objective, dispassionate, clinical understanding that physicians, psychologists and pastoral counselors, not A.A. members, are trained to give. Only after he has undergone a rigorous and lengthy revision of his personality should he attempt to drink normally again, and then only if he desires to do so.

exactly what was going on , and you stopped for a second and turned toward me. I was standing by the refrigerator-or, more accurately, propping myself up with it. You didn't say anything. You didn't have to. Your disappointment, resentment, disgust, just plain hatred-it all burned in your eyes.

So what can I possibly tell you that you don't already know about what alcohol can do when it takes control of someone? You lived through too much of it-the nightmarish months before the divorce, then a household without a father, the times when you didn't hear from me and wondered why, the times when you did hear from me and wished you hadn't.

What I want to point out, what is so necessary for you to understand, is that what you saw happen in our home, and what happened to me after I left-the fleabag hotel rooms, the psycho wards-was only the last act of my love affair with the bottle. It all began before you were born; in fact, it began about the time I was your age, which is why you need to be thinking about alcohol and alcoholism right now.

We in Alcoholics Anonymous spend a lot of time sitting over coffee talking about our experiences, and one thing we've learned is that it isn't easy to predict what boy or girl is going to turn up with a drinking problem. As children, some of us went to bed every night in the security of well-knit families. Others were pulling the covers over their heads to shut out the hell of their homes. Some have Phi Beta Kappa keys; others didn't get past the ninth grade. None of us fit any alcoholic "type" as far as background is concerned.

Then how did we get to be drunks? Some people think we became alcoholics from drinking too much. I think we drank too much because we had something else wrong with us in the first place and used alcohol as a crutch. We had the equivalent of a broken leg in our inner selves- a weakness, a fear, a sense of guilt or anxiety, a shadow of uncertain outline that dogged our steps. This is not unusual in itself, especially among young people as they are becoming adults. What was unusual for us was how we reacted when we discovered alcohol and the way it could help us. Its effect was sheer magic. It rid us of that shadow.

The trouble is, our crutch began to play tricks on us. At times it would slip and we'd fall down. By the time we decided that it was bringing us more trouble than help, we made a startling discovery: we couldn't let go of it.

Quite a few of us began drinking regularly because alcohol gave us a deceptive sort of courage to meet situations that scared us. The more we relied on this artificial courage, the less genuine courage we could muster. If we drank to feel more comfortable around people, for instance, the result was that we felt all the more awkward and self-conscious and tongue-tied when we weren't drinking. If we drank to fight off boredom or loneliness, the more bored and lonely we became when we had no glass at our side.

I picked up my crutch in the most innocent way, not really knowing that I was slipping it under my arm. There were half a dozen of us kids who knew the secret of acquiring a chilled keg of beer on a Saturday afternoon. There was a little glen on a farm about five miles out outside of town that was made to order for our midsummer nonsense. With the right amount of beer under our belts-and not necessarily a dangerous amount-we could laugh ourselves silly at jokes that weren't really funny, and there was a warmth and conviviality that certainly couldn't be condemned.

Human beings have been amusing themselves this way for thousands of years, and I suppose that they always will, whether they gather around a beer keg at a picnic or the cocktail bar in a hotel. This is what is called "social drinking" and it is hard to make a case against it. As far as I know, I am the only one of that group I used to drink beer with who went the route of an alcoholic. It was the only kind of drinking I did for a long time. I had no idea that my fondness for alcohol was out of the ordinary. But in the most subtle and gradual way the occasions which called for my drinking began to multiply.

In the office where I had my first job after getting out of school there was a girl named Judy. She was bright and she had a sense of humor and, as you would put it, she "turned me on." I asked her for a date, and took her to a place I couldn't afford for dinner and dancing. I wanted to impress her.

That evening I discovered that Judy didn't like to drink. She didn't disapprove of drinking-it just didn't appeal to her. But we enjoyed each other, and when I took her home she said good-night in a way that made me think she would like to go out with me again.

The significant thing is that I never asked Judy for that second date. I dropped her flat, and scouted around for another girl. As much as I liked and admired Judy, as much as I wanted to get something going between us, I couldn't face the prospect of spending a lot of time with a girl who didn't like to drink. Some kind of subconscious "radar" told me that I could not have Judy and also drink as much as I wanted to. I made my choice.

I was to make the same kind of choice time and again. I picked companions who liked to spend their spare time-as I did-on a bar stool or nursing a fifth through an evening of cards. I doubt that I would have found their company very stimulating if it hadn't been for the liquid refreshment that was always in the picture. And all of this while I was developing two skills that you find in most alcoholics: the ability to conceal from others how much I was drinking, and the ability to conceal from myself how indispensable my alcoholic crutch was becoming.

Your mother didn't recognize this side of my character until after we were married. Our courtship was a whirl of bar-hopping and parties. Unlike Judy, she enjoyed drinking, or at least I always thought she did. She made a game attempt to keep up with me at first, and then she found herself on that bobsled ride so familiar to wives of alcoholics. From enjoying our life together she shifted to tolerating it and then to rebelling against it. She tried to understand me, to help me, and her only reward was a kick in the teeth. The divorce itself was an anti-climax. Our marriage had ended long before. I was just an overgrown adolescent.

As much as I recoiled at what I saw happening, I couldn't do anything about it. I made promises, sincere ones, time and again, and broke them. Once I left a hospital after a week of treatment for acute intoxication-intravenous feeding, sedatives, vitamins, a sweating-out and shaking-out that brought me back from the brink of delirium tremens-and within 48 hours I was drunk again. It was the same suicidal process, and it took me back to the same hospital in worse shape than before.

From what I've written, you might guess that I'm going to tell you to steer clear completely of demon rum. No, I'll be practical and assume that you have the same curiosity about alcohol that I did when I was your age, and that many occasions may arise when you'll either want to drink or be expected to.

First, test yourself with alcohol in a sensible way. There are wrong times and right times to fool around with beer or liquor. With a bunch of kids in a car is a wrong time; at a party where there are responsible adults is a right time. The best time is in your own home, if you can persuade your mother to cut you in on the action when she's having some friends in.

If you're like the majority of people, you'll find that first drink an interesting experience. You may dislike the taste, but like the effect, or vice versa. You may barely be able to "feel" one drink, or one drink may knock you for a loop. Just remember that no matter how mature and responsible you may consider yourself to be when you life that glass, you're dealing with what is, for all practical purposes, a drug.

Alcohol is a depressant, and the first thing it depresses or slows down is the higher center of your brain, your faculty of self-criticism, judgment and restraint. Remember, too, that in spite of what you see in the movies, in spite of the beer and whiskey ads, it is not necessary to drink to be sociable, to be a success in a business or profession, to sweep a girl off her feet.

Next, if the crowd you are running around with is drinking when you don't want to, or is drinking more than you care to, don't hesitate to say no when the next round is offered, to cut out, or to go home. It's stupid enough to get drunk; it's twice as silly to drink too much simply because that's what "everybody else" is doing.

Finally, and perhaps most important, there is always a chance that you have within you the characteristics of an alcoholic, a seed that is hidden but now waiting for circumstances that will let it grow and flower. If you should come to recognize in yourself a fondness for alcohol that seems to be greater than you observe in others-especially in people who impress you as competent, well-adjusted human beings-then the red flag of danger is up.

If you do any amount of drinking in the next few years, there is a simple test I wish you would take from time to time: Try doing without alcohol for a while and see what happens. This way you can get an idea of how much alcohol means to you, and how much you value what it does for you. You'll probably find that being "on the wagon" means no more than a moment of awkwardness when one of your buddies suggests having a drink. But if you find that removing alcohol from the picture makes a serious difference in the way you feel, if you are drawn back to it against your own resolve not to drink, this may tell you that alcohol does, indeed, hold a special danger for you, as it did for me. Then there is only one safe course: avoid the use of alcohol altogether.

You will have problems in life. You will have disappointments, doubts, fears. Never try to make the mistake of seeking an artificial, temporary solution to these problems through alcohol, pills or narcotics. A way of life cannot be built on such flights from reality. My prayer for you is not so much that you will find every happiness you seek, but that you will accept with clear-headed fortitude the times of trial that are sure to come your way, and receive with gratitude the love and good fortune that are always close behind.

++++Message 1014. Re: 3rd Legacy Voting Procedure
From: David Ballester 5/12/2003 9:21:00 AM

Hey there!

My name is David B and I'm an alcoholic from Gothenburg, Sweden. There has been some problems here with the service posts. There has been a little click of older members that has been having these posts for a long time. They're just ruling and voting without taking care of the groups that they are supposed to be serving. There are many alcoholics that are aware of this problem but we don't know what to do about it.

their parents, but to exchange ideas and experiences that will help them understand the nature of alcoholism and how to minimize its damage to their own lives.

The Alateens talked freely. There was a closed meeting, which I was allowed to attend on condition that I respect the participants' anonymity. The only other adult present was an attractive young mother who acted as moderator-counselor. She, too, was an insider, the wife of an alcoholic and a member of Al-Anon, the family group movement that has grown out of AA. She and the youngsters had agreed to report on their progress in coping with their common problems.

The Alateen case histories were at once tragic and heartening. The youngsters talked without self-pity about the tensions, the squalor, and fear that alcoholism imposed on their families.

At an early age, these children had learned that home was an unsafe place to bring friends. One boy told about a formal dinner that ended with his parents hurling plates and cutlery. A girl would never forget the birthday party that was climaxed by her father collapsing with his head in the cake.

The Alateens all confessed to having used the unhappiness in their homes as an excuse for their own weaknesses and misdemeanors that ranged from laziness and disobedience at school to criminal behavior.

Mark, a handsome, mop-haired 18-year-old, had served time in a state training school for stealing a car. It was his way of "paying back" his drunken father. Jacqueline, a pretty 17-year-old, had reacted to her father's alcoholism by taking to drink herself. At 16 she would raid his liquor stocks, then invite other teenagers to join her for drinking and driving in the family car.

Jacqueline's younger brother, Jay, had turned against their non-drinking mother. He explained: "Mother was always raging and having hysterics--I thought she was the sick one.

Dad was nice. When he was drinking he'd give us money and generally indulge us children."

It was at weekly Alateen meetings, the same youngsters testified, that they had gained insight not only into their parents' problems but also their own. Jacqueline stopped drinking. "When I understood about my father and how his drinking was a disease, I didn't get a charge any more out of alcohol," she said.

With unconscious pathos, 19-year-old Debbie, reporting her progress, said: "I used to think that if my mother really loved me, she wouldn't drink. I'd hide her liquor or throw it down the sink. But that just made things worse.

Then I joined Alateen and it was such a relief to learn about alcoholism."

From her Alateen handbook Debbie had learned that "the sick alcoholic doesn't want to make his family suffer. He doesn't want to get into debt, smash up cars, land in hospitals and jails. But the craving for alcohol is too strong. Even though he doesn't admit he drinks too much, he suffers from guilt, remorse, physical illness, loneliness and despair."

Debbie concluded: "But the main thing I learned from Alateen is that we children aren't responsible for our parents' drinking, and we can't make them stop."

The organization which answered these children's urgent needs came into being only ten years ago. Appropriately, it was the brain child of a 17-year-old Pasadena, California, boy whose father was a member of AA, his mother an Al-Anon. Impressed with the way they had been helped, he got together with five other boys whose parents had compulsive drinking problems and proposed that they, too, form a fellowship. His hope was that by pooling their experience and strength they could learn to cope with the complications that an alcoholic in the family added to their normal problems as teenagers. The response to Bob's idea was so enthusiastic that Alateen was founded and named that very night. Today, around 4,000 youngsters belong to 392 Alateen chapters in a dozen countries. The greatest concentration is in the United States, where there are 194 chapters; most of the remainder are in Canada. Although its rate of growth now surpasses that of Al-Anon, the sponsor and coordinator of its work, Alateen is still a mite, by comparison with the monumental need for its services.

According to the National Council on Alcoholism, there are some 6.5 million alcoholics in the United States. Canada has upward of a quarter of a million. But for every alcoholic, NCA estimates, there are at least four others whom his or her sickness directly affects. Explains Dr. Ruth Fox, a practicing psychiatrist and NCA's medical director:

"Alcoholism is a family disease. Excessive drinking of alcohol by a father or mother, or both, affects every member of the family--emotionally, spiritually, and often economically, socially, and physically."

The result often is a recurrence of the drinking problem in the next generation. As Dr. Fox points out: "Forty to sixty per cent of all alcoholics come from the disturbed background of an alcoholic family. The child of an alcoholic pays an appalling price in bewilderment, humiliation, and often in physical neglect and abuse. The security, love, and warmth that are necessary for a child's development are rarely present in an alcoholic home. Where these do exist, they are of such unpredictable quality that the child has difficulty developing the trust and confidence in himself that he will need for future successful living."

The desperation of that need is made plain in letters--about thirty-five a week--that youngsters write to Alateen world headquarters. Some of these letters ask for general information about alcoholism; others want the address of the nearest Alateen group, and all cry out for help.

A 15-year-old girl wrote from the Midwest about the distress of her whole family. Her father is an alcoholic who had tried AA briefly, then lapsed back into drinking. Her mother, despairing, has begun to talk about a separation. An older brother and sister, meanwhile, were "plotting to leave home; they just want to get out of the house." But the 15-year-old still loves her father, and "can't bear the thought of just leaving him with nothing and no one. He might fall asleep with a lighted cigarette and burn himself up."

Another youngster, also in his mid-teens, writes about how his family, under strains imposed by the mother's drinking, has disintegrated for the second time. The boy's own father had divorced his mother "because of her drinking problem." Now his stepfather has had enough.

His letter told a domestic horror story. My mother has been an alcoholic since I was about three. Don't get me wrong--I love her very much. I feel that if my stepfather had been a little more understanding she could have overcome her problem. But one night when she was drunk, he locked her out of the house. He is now living with a woman who, I guess, he plans to marry when the divorce goes through. My mother was pregnant when he threw her out. I now have a baby sister who will never know her father."

But the boy had not abandoned hope. He was writing, he said, "to find out how to combat my mother's sickness." He ended: "I would greatly appreciate it if you sent this information as soon as possible." Mrs. Timmy W., Alateen's international secretary, reads such tragic letters and realizes that "what these youngsters hope for by return mail is some magic formula that will make their parents stop drinking." Instead, Mrs. Timmy W. introduces them to a program concerned primarily with saving them, only indirectly with helping the sick parents.

What Alateen offers is much the same kind of treatment as AA prescribes. Trust in God is one of the first "steps of recovery" that both groups are encouraged to take. Then, through group education, they are helped to face up to their problems and to gain the strength and insight that will allow them to live with their problems. For a start, Alateens learn everything they can about alcoholism: that it is a disease--an abnormal sensitivity to alcohol, plus an emotional compulsion to drink--and that, to get well, the desire must come from the alcoholic himself.

"You can do nothing directly," their handbook, "Youth and the Alcoholic Parent," advises. "Persuasion, reproaches, bitter silences and tears--all these will only put your parent on the defensive and increase his guilt.

That leads to more drinking, more trouble."

The Alateen can best help his parent by helping himself. "Fear and dread are destructive emotions; put them out of your mind. There is hope for every alcoholic, no matter how black things look at the moment. Learn to live one day at a time and live it so you will grow. Yours is the only life over which you have any control."

Pat, an Alateen whose family had been broken and impoverished by alcohol, was sustained by the idea of living a day at a time. She told her story at the Alateen meeting I attended.

Pat's father, a professional athlete, began drinking soon after she was born. When she was seven, Pat was put in the care of her paternal grandparents. Her father continued to drink and drift from job to job.

Pat was in high school when her father, by now ill and unemployable, arrived at AA. He introduced her to Alateen.

"At first," Pat remembered, "I couldn't stop talking. I had to tell everything about my terrible life. I had no mother, my grandparents were old and sick, and my dad was out of work. When my grandfather died and then my grandmother--both in the same year--I came to Alateen for comfort. The kids here were the first to understand. But I got more than comfort from our meetings. I learned to care about other people and their problems and I learned to live one day at a time."

Now 17 and living with her father, who finds occasional work, Pat manages housekeeping and a part-time job on top of school studies.

"When I wake in the morning," she says, "I -think: How awful it would be to live this way all my life! But I can stand it for 24 hours."

The youngsters all emphasize the healing effect of talking out their troubles. Jacqueline put it: "The tension in me has simmered down because I can discuss it. That, and taking inventory of yourself, are what help most."

It was Jacqueline who a year earlier had taken to hiding her problems in alcohol, just as her father was doing. Her arrival home one night, floundering in drink, was the shock that sent him to AA. Now, Jacqueline reports, her whole family was "on the program." Her father's efforts had encouraged her mother to seek help for herself at Al-Anon. Jacqueline and her brother, Jay, go to Alateen.

"It wasn't until we'd taken inventory of ourselves at Alateen that Jackie and I began to see our own weaknesses and how we'd been -using Dad's drinking as a crutch," Jay confesses.

If the service posts are staff members of a General Service Office, they may be following the same practices that the US/Canada GSO practices. They do not rotate in and out of the GSO but usually rotate from one service desk to a different one every two years.

The history of our Conference advisory actions reveals that sometimes our GSO or Board may do things that make others unhappy or disturbed. The solution to these matters is usually through a General Service Conference. If the service positions you describe are board members that gets a little tricky depending on what your country has defined in its charter and bylaws. If they are members of some other Service Committee then that would be yet another different set of conditions and remedies.

Could you provide a little more information so that the situation could be better understood?

I'd be loath to brand them as "bleeding deacons" until you elaborate on what they are doing and what you are unhappy about.

Cheers

Arthur

Hi David B. from Sweden:

The problem of those "old bleeding deacons" controlling everything is not new.

Before the next election, put a "no confidence" motion on the floor, have it seconded and discussed. Especially discuss "rotation of service."

Then when the next election of trusted servants comes around...

put up a slate of newcomers for the positions and vote them in.

ARE YOU DRIVING YOUR ALCOHOLIC TO DRINK?

BY SHIRLEY KESSLER

Unless you know what you're doing, your efforts to cure can kill

You live with an alcoholic and you want to help. You've tried "sweet reason," emotional appeals, tears, lectures, coaxing and threats. You don't keep liquor around the house or you hide it. Or you pour it down the drain. But everything you do backfires. You're a heartbroken failure. What now?

Now look into an organization called Al-Anon Family Groups. Patterned after Alcoholics Anonymous it is aimed directly at you and the 20,000,000 others in America who are made miserable by 4,000,000 alcoholics. You cannot be innocent bystanders. What you do at home can greatly hinder or speed an alcoholic's recovery. Al-Anon helps you help your alcoholic. Its principles are based on sound, psychological grounds. The first fact it helps you face, for instance, is that alcoholism is an obsession disease. According to Dr. Ruth Fox, a noted psychoanalyst who has treated thousands of alcoholics, "A patterned response has been set up in the brain during ten or 15 years of turning to the bottle as the only source of comfort for the vulnerable personality disappointed in a cruel world." It is impossible to destroy or remove this pattern. Your alcoholic's only hope, therefore, is total abstinence. Even after analysis or 20 years in Alcoholics Anonymous, a first drink will start up the pattern. Your alcoholic can never drink again.

Getting your alcoholic to give up a self-prescribed formula for feeling better and for saving himself sometime later from his disability, is not your job. But you can help by spotting symptoms:

- 1) Drinking with defiance or out of necessity, not for either fun or relaxation.
- 2) Inability to limit the amount imbibed (unlike the "heavy drinker" who can moderate.
- 3) Progression. Untreated, the disease grows more virulent.
- 4) Blackouts—a later stage, a form of amnesia. This isn't passing out but "not remembering a thing" while under the influence.

Dr. Fox interviews an alcoholic's mate early in treatment. It's urgent he or she understand that alcoholics are supersensitive, easily upset and likely to project blame rather than face up to inadequacy. Dr. Fox reassures husbands and wives of her patients that they are not responsible for the illness, and cautions against adding to the difficulty.

If they will allow themselves to become allies of psychiatry, "the disease," according to Dr. Fox, "can be arrested at any stage, not after Skid Row or tragedy."

Yvelin Gardner of the National Committee on Alcoholism says, "members of the family mustn't let an alcoholic's gyrations send them into such a spin they think he's `mean' or `willful.' He's sick. It has been definitely shown that family members who have adopted understanding attitudes and approaches have brought alcoholics to seek help and recover many years sooner than would have been the case, and thus have prevented many broken homes and death itself."

Just as your alcoholic can't fight the battle alone, you need the support of others in the same boat. This focus on you came into view after the advent of Alcoholics Anonymous. Alcoholics struggling toward sobriety were often being encouraged by everyone except their families. Husbands and wives sat about AA anterooms waiting until group therapy began to work for their alcoholics.

While some of them had the patience to wait for the alcoholic to regain emotional balance, others worked unwittingly against AA by sarcasm and needling, shoving many AAers off the wagon.

In Come Back, Little Sheba, analyzed recently in the "Journal of Psychiatric Social Work," the sensitive hero was doing fine in AA until "by reminding him of the past and by not having any life of her own, the wife confronts her husband with his former inadequacies, provoking a bout with open aggression against her."

Growing aware of the importance of the non-alcoholic's role in a slip or a comeback, some wives of AA members organized a "clearing house" in 1951 to seek the help they needed before they could help their mates. This clearing house became Al-Anon Family Groups.

Mail coming to the still current P.O. Box 1475, Grand Central Station, New York 17, tells of pitiful mistakes. Some family members punished alcoholics by horsewhipping or not cooking for them, while others coddled them into asylums.

Information underlined by the National Committee on Alcoholism was sent out. Mates were told that alcoholism is not a sin, but a disease, an addiction manifested by uncontrolled drinking and not to be subject to home therapy.

Al-Anon Family Groups incorporated this year as a separate entity from AA. There are 700 world-wide groups, mostly in the U.S. and Canada. Any two people can start a group meeting in a home, church, school or any other room, to help each other, and eventually take the alcoholic into treatment in AA or psychiatry.

The Family Groups give husbands and wives a chance for releasing tensions in talks with others who understand. It is an experienced-exchange oasis. Doctors and social workers have called alcoholism a "family illness," because the wife or husband and children suffer emotional impairment, too.

So, until you straighten yourself out, you can't act with balance and the kind understanding to which alcoholics respond.

Since most alcoholics are men, the emphasis of Al-Anon is on the wife's role in his cure. However, the Family Groups are open to the man whose wife is alcoholic and the Al-Anon methods are equally effective for him. What are these methods and how do they work? Joan T., a Stamford, Conn., housewife, who sought out an Al-Anon Family Group, is typical.

She considers herself modern and fairly intelligent. But until recently she coped with the "problem" of her husband, Ted, a top engineering consultant, as families did 40 years ago.

For a long time, Joan wouldn't acknowledge the fact that Ted, a top engineering consultant, was an alcoholic. When she did, her concern centered on the growing social isolation and the pile of bills, while giving lip service to the concept "alcoholics are sick."

As Ted grew worse, heading for the inevitable straightjacket or hearse, Joan belittled and screamed abuse of him in her "private little closet." She avoided seeking the necessary outright help. Acting the shrew, she put Ted on the defensive. Partly to spite her, he refused to struggle against their enemy, alcohol.

Luckily, Joan saw a doctor about her "nerves." She couldn't sleep, laugh, or talk coherently any more. Ted's sexual demands, abuses in front of the children, and other selfish behavior, characteristic of the disease, were making life impossible. She was startled when it was suggested that although Ted wasn't ready for help, there was a new organization she could join.

In a neighborhood Al-Anon Family group, Joan was welcomed by 15 other wives and two husbands of alcoholics. All were well groomed, alert and cheerful. First, Joan received pamphlets on alcoholism. Then she heard others tell of their experiences, stories all could feel kinship with. Gradually Joan felt relief and hope. Finally she achieved a sense of peace as the meeting closed with the prayer: "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference."

At Al-Anon meetings the tales that are told are not gripes about mates but self-inventories. "My name is Peggy Adams and I am the wife of an alcoholic," one pretty brunette facing the group says. She tells of beatings and other indignities, but admits that she has provoked hostilities. She'd greet her husband with name-calling, like "bum" or "no good."

Since coming to the group her resentments haven't changed. But her tactics are more subtle and in keeping with the facts she's learned about alcoholics. "Hon, it's okay," she says now after an outburst, "call me anything you like. It won't change my love for you." This stops him cold. She then gets him into bed and then leaves him gracefully alone.

Others tell of their experiences about abusive behavior, understanding that it isn't the mate's "real self" but things erupting from his unconscious while drunk.

A middle-aged man confesses to forcing his wife along as a drinking companion, even when she pleaded for a "recover." When she tried suicide, he sobered.

Exploring their own motivations, Al-Anoners discuss the problem of being a crutch to an alcoholic. All agree it's as destructive to be too permissive or to pamper an alcoholic as it is to punish. Tortured clock-watching, going along on bouts to protect and running at the alcoholic's every phone call can be emotional crutch methods. These don't help the immature individual to grow up.

A girl named Nancy came to a Jackson Heights, New York, group with her mother. Nancy wanted to marry Tom, a newspaperman who drank, but Mama said no. A few months later, Nancy was insisting to the group, "If I jilt Tom, he'll drink himself to death." She was advised that "disappointment in love" is an oldie, like "a death in the family," and she was actually preventing his getting better by always being around to lean on.

Nancy, like all Al-Anoners, has been learning to live by the AA program. She has developed more assurance and is now helping others. Now when Tom phones for her to hurry over, a calmer Nancy is able to answer, "Drinking is your problem, not mine. You can go on and on and get worse or stay sober." Tom is already on his way to a cure through AA.

At first the Family Group members works on self-improvement. Week to week progress is reported and commented on with encouraging suggestions. Advice needn't be taken, however. Al-Anon has no pat formulas. Its aim is first to root out neurotic fears.

Harmonious family relations are the next goal. Questions of finances are discussed frankly in the groups. "I like to eat and pay bills. Ben cares only about his credit at the local bars. Am I a 'financial crutch,' if I go to work."

Usually it's considered best to let the male head of the house support it.

But if he's swollen from dehydration or can't concentrate, the wife may have to work. If she does, she must make it clear that it is for the family budget. She must not flaunt her superior earning capacity.

After an Al-Anon member is sure of her facts and feels more detached and nurselike about her alcoholic's condition, she leaves literature about the house. Discussions are held off until the hangover stage. Then alcoholism is talked about objectively. In sober moments the alcoholic is usually impressed with the statistics on the 4,000,000 compulsive drinkers and the 150,000 recoveries through AA and psychiatry.

A family's best weapon in this slow, patiently fought battle is the change in themselves. "Those meetings sure do you good," one alcoholic told his wife between drinking bouts. "The whole atmosphere at home has improved. Even the children aren't sassing anymore."

To prevent children from growing up feeling nobody cares, and often becoming alcoholics, too, they must know the facts. The ex-alcoholic can't drink, they're told, although it's socially acceptable. His emotional makeup is such that alcohol makes him sick. He'll get better, when he understands he can live without the bottle. But meanwhile he's confused and needs encouragement for the struggle ahead. Once the truth is known, he often goes to his first AA meeting with his teenager along as an ally.

You, the non-alcoholic, must be something of a psychological juggler. You mustn't pit the children against your mate or bar the alcoholic from the family circle. (on the other hand, the children may have to pick up and leave, if a drunk becomes dangerous. In that instance, they must, without warning, just pull up the rug and go.)

You must lead an active, normal life. You cannot be obsessed with "the problem" as the alcoholic himself is obsessed with drink.

When Ann's husband blurted out, "So I drink too much. But I don't need AA. I'll limit myself," she told him it was no use, but she said, "Okay, test yourself. For at least three months have any prescribed number of drinks per day, but no more. You'll see." He did.

She didn't plead with the old hat, "Stop drinking if you love me and the children" or "Please, be a good father." She simply reminded him if he went on he would lose his mind and probably die of a "wet brain" or a heart attack during D.T.'s. Slowly he realized that he wanted to stop drinking. He would no longer put off what Ann termed a "necessary operation."

The convalescence period is rough. Converts are usually over-zealous. They are on call like a doctor at all hours. Their home was crowded with drunks, where before there'd been just one. But unlike the women of a decade ago, Ann had her parallel work in the Family Group. She and her husband had a

I WAS A TEEN ALCOHOLIC

The Number one drug turn-on among teens today is alcohol. Half of the heavy users among teens are likely to become alcoholics, and it is estimated that there are already 450,000 teen alcoholics in the country.

Recent Parent Teachers Association surveys gauge that 75 per cent of high school youth now drink, and that more than half of those have serious alcoholic problems.

During the past ten years, arrests of girls eighteen and younger who were intoxicated by liquor have more than tripled. Arrests of boys in the same age group have jumped almost two and a half times, according to Dr. Morris Chafetz, director of the National Institute of Alcohol Abuse. Dr Chafetz also asserts that a third of all high school students state that they drink with regularity, while only 14 percent of teen-agers are total abstainers. (Among adults 32 percent don't drink at all.)

Alcoholics Anonymous a leading self-help organization, says that they currently have twenty-five groups oriented to young people. A year ago there were only twelve such groups, five years ago none. (Columbus Hospital, in New York City, has just expanded its alcohol treatment center to offer help to adolescent alcoholics, the first such program in America.)

Many young people are turning from hard drugs to alcohol, particularly beer and wine, states a recent report in the "Christian Science Monitor." Sales of "pop" fruit-flavoured wines are up from three million gallons in 1968 to 33 million gallons last year, and these wines are consumed almost entirely by young people.

Following is the true personal story of one teen-age alcoholic.

My name is Cathy C., and I am an alcoholic. I started to drink when I was fifteen. My first drink was in the park near my house, where a number of older neighbourhood teen-agers used to gather regularly, to socialize and drink beer.

One day one of the boys offered me a can of beer. I had always been painfully shy. In the past I'd felt ignored and left out by this group of older kids. But as soon as I drank the beer everything seemed wonderful. I was no longer shy; I couldn't talk to people, dance and sing. Everybody seemed to like me and find me fun to be with.

This was going to be it, I thought. Whenever the opportunity arose, I was going to drink. The taste meant nothing to me, though at first I stuck to milder stuff like beer and wine. It was the effect I was after, and the effect was wonderful as far as I was concerned!

In the beginning it was only weekend drinking. I soon graduated from beer and wine to screwdrivers (vodka and orange juice) which tasted better to me and had an even quicker effect in getting me high.

I had always done well in school, and during that first year of strictly weekend drinking I managed to keep up my usual good grades. But by my sophomore year my drinking began to increase, and my marks started to go down drastically.

I was part of a whole gang of kids who got together for parties or just casual drinking in the afternoon. Not all of them were that interested in alcohol. About half were strictly marijuana smokers, or were into pills. I tried pot and pills, but they just weren't my sort of high. Give me a six-pack or a can of those prepared screwdrivers then just becoming popular and I was happy. Though my parents weren't heavy drinkers, they did keep a small supply of liquor on hand for social occasions. Before long I was into this too.

By the time I was sixteen, at the end of my sophomore year, I was doing so badly at the parochial school I attended that I was asked to leave. But I was glad to go to the high school which was much larger, had less supervision, and was much less strict about attendance. Besides, most of my new friends attended that school.

I got in with what I considered to be the real "in" crowd, something I felt I could never have done before I started drinking. None of us really went to school. We would just check into the home room in the morning; then we'd get together and find out whose parents would be away that afternoon and go there and party. I don't think we attended school more than one third of the time that year.

At least 20 percent of the students were involved in this kind of thing, but I guess my closest friends were the real troublemakers. None of them wanted to be in school in the first place. They all wanted to quit, even if they had no plans for the future. At this point I'd say that at least half of the gang were still on drugs, but I stayed strictly away from that, not only because I didn't like it, but because of the danger with the law. I figured I was being pretty smart to stay with liquor, which was not only safer from a legal point of view but also cheaper and easier to get. Age was no barrier to getting alcohol though most of the taverns were pretty strict about ID cards. There were always a few phony ID cards being passed around, and there was seldom a problem buying the stuff in supermarkets or liquor stores. If a liquor store wouldn't sell to us, we could always recruit an older person to go in and get a bottle for us - just tell him we were planning a party or something.

That was the thing about drinking. People generally approved of it - they were glad that at least we weren't on drugs. Alcohol was familiar, something they could understand. Even the cops weren't too tough if they found us with booze. Of course, possession of liquor by underage kids is not a crime.

Toward the end of my junior year my behavior came to the attention of school authorities. They sent for my parents and I had many conferences with the school psychiatrist to find out why I was skipping so many classes. My father had been aware that I was in danger of becoming a problem drinker from the start. A year before, when I, had been out until two in the morning and had come home obviously tipsy, my father had been very concerned. When I sobered up he took me aside and said: "Kathy, you are one of those people who should never drink. You change drastically when you are drinking. Your personality is completely different."

I remember answering him "Yes, but the change is for the Better! I don't feel shy. Its terrific!"

One day, when I was sixteen, I found out that my mother wasn't going to be home that afternoon so I had the gang over and we had a groovy party, swinging on beer, screwdrivers and wine. But even though I was to some extent the life of the party, there was one guy there who wouldn't pay any attention to me. I am not sure what made me do it, maybe something I had seen in a movie or on TV, but I went into the bathroom, took a razor blade from my father's medicine chest, and with two quick movements slit both wrists. I really had no intention of killing myself. It was just a play for this boy's attention, and when I reappeared at the party, bleeding heavily, it certainly got attention.

Of course that was the end of the party, since I was rushed to the hospital. I know that I would never have done that if I had not been drunk out of my mind. When I was drunk, I didn't even feel the pain. I was sent to a private psychiatric hospital for two weeks as a result of this incident. When I returned to school, everyone seemed to know what had happened.

I told my father I couldn't go back to school because I was sure everyone was making fun of me. I went with him to the guidance counselor, and she agreed that my parents might as well take me out of school since I was getting nothing from it. The next season my parents, who had always hoped I would go to college, enrolled me in a business school. That was the year I turned seventeen. Now that I was no longer in high school, my life began to revolve more and more around bars. But I was still not aware that I had a problem; I felt I could quit drinking anytime I wanted to. This was the year I met Peter, my first serious boy friend.

Peter would drink occasionally, but he was not part of my crowd, and he thought my excess drinking was caused by the people I associated with. He introduced me to his crowd - much straighter than the group I went with and drinkers only on the weekends or special occasions.

The business school I was going to encouraged me' to take courses that would help me get better jobs when I got out, such as accounting and business English. But in two months I had dropped all courses except typing. It seemed to be the only one I could cope with when I had a hangover, which was often. By now my parents were deeply troubled, but I still refused to take their advice and even told them that unless they locked me up and chained me to the bed, there was nothing they could do about it.

Then I started to go in for morning drinks. I remember sitting in a bar one night and saying: "I'm going to have a beaut of a hangover tomorrow. The noise of those type-writers is going to drive me crazy!"

One of the fellows answered, "Try a drink in the morning. It'll bring you around."

So I figured: "This is marvelous! Now I can drink and not even feel sick the next day!"

Toward the end of my seventeenth year, I had my first blackouts - periods when I couldn't remember anything that happened. I was scared at first but I was still going with Peter, who was a very dependable guy, so I knew I'd get home all right.

Just after I turned eighteen Peter was drafted. I decided I would be a faithful girl and go out only with my girl friends or stay home at night and write letters to Pete. So instead of going to bars to get drunk, I would drink alone in my room.

I got my first job about that time, and it was terrific. I didn't have to depend on my folks for money or on my boy friends to but me booze.

But I was hurting myself desperately, without realizing it. I would go out with my girl friends on Wednesday nights, and the blackouts were getting worse, only now I didn't have Peter to protect me; often I didn't know how I got home or who had taken me there. I was still very straight and religious and I worried what might happen to me some night during one of those blackouts.

Up to this point I didn't drink at work. I knew this was different from school and that if I drank I'd be fired. But one day I decided I would just have a drink to break up the boredom at lunchtime. I took a bottle to the office, but I had this terrific hangover and felt I couldn't wait until lunch. By five I was in a blackout and couldn't remember anything. I know that I behaved very foolishly at the office and apparently fell down a flight of stairs and had to be taken to the emergency ward at the hospital.

When my father came to get me, he said; "Kathy, You must go to Alcoholics Anonymous. Nobody drinks the way you do. You shouldn't be drinking alone or hiding bottles."

By then even I began to realize I had a bad problem. But I hated the idea of A.A. There weren't many young people in A.A. then and I was sure it would be some kind of Salvation Army evangelistic crew. I finally agreed to go to my local chapter meeting, but to do that I had to get drunk.

The next day they sent two people over to see me and even arranged to have a twenty-three year old woman talk to me, as she was closer to my age. But she was married and had a baby. I was single. What would happen to my social life if I stopped drinking? The parties? The bars? I couldn't face giving up alcohol.

The next two years were a hazy nightmare. I became a "periodic drinker," drinking one week out of the month. I lost my job and drifted into a series of temporary jobs. The minute I got a paycheck, I was off on a binge. I began to let everything go - even my dress and appearance. Sometimes I didn't bathe for days. Peter got out of the army and saw that his girl had become a full-fledged, full-time drunk. This romance eventually ended.

Even then, I didn't consider myself an alcoholic. I felt all I had to do was learn to drink like a lady and control myself. I did attend a few more A.A. meetings, but I wasn't impressed. I got sick and was hospitalized several times. The thought of suicide crossed my mind, but I was afraid of failing at it. Besides, I'm a Roman Catholic and my religion was one of the main things that kept me from going that route.

At my family's urging I even went to a psychiatrist. He helped me with many problems, but not with the drinking, because I wouldn't let him.

I really didn't think much of myself at the time. My self-esteem was at a low point, and the only way I seemed to be able to avoid my feelings of self-hatred was to drink. My family life was miserable. It reached the stage where the family was ashamed to have guests come to the house when I was around. I began to wake up in the morning sick and nauseated. I was throwing up constantly and losing weight.

Finally I collapsed again, at the end of my physical endurance. This time somebody recommended that I be sent to the Freeport Hospital, in Freeport, Long Island - one of the few in the country devoted to the treatment of alcoholics. I was carried in on a stretcher.

In the hospital I was put to bed and given a complete physical examination. It was determined that I was in a severe state of malnutrition - my weight had dropped to 85 pounds from my normal 110, largely because during my drinking bouts I simply had no interest in eating. I was also suffering from vitamin deficiencies, particularly of B-12, which is the first to be destroyed by alcohol. I was put on a high-protein, high-calorie diet, given massive injections of B-12 until my bottom was sore, and given high-potency vitamins orally too. My liver showed signs of damage, but the doctor felt it would easily recover.

During the first few days I was also given a mild tranquilizer to help me cope with the shakes and withdrawal symptoms. But this was quickly discontinued.

"Alcoholics, above all, should avoid any sort of tranquilizer or stimulant. Their bodies have built up a high tolerance for drugs and they tend to increase dosage when they are troubled," I was told by hospital director Dr. Frank Herzlin. "This puts them right back into the alcohol habit in short order,"

Patients are usually ambulatory when they are admitted to Freeport, and all admissions are voluntary - nobody is committed, as they might be to a mental institution. In my case I was on my feet in two days and encouraged to take my meals with the others. I had pictured the patients as being "Bowery bum" types, but I could not have been more wrong. Most were attractive and well spoken. Though at twenty-one I was the youngest at the hospital, a number of patients were under thirty.

I was then entered in the educational program, which consisted first of orientation lectures to explain what alcoholism is and what it can do to you. There were three of these a day.

This was followed by another series of lectures for an hour and a half every morning, seven mornings a week. Afternoons were devoted to group therapy and individual counseling sessions. I was soon made to realize that I was not like other people, that I had a severe reaction to alcohol and could never be a "social drinker."

To me alcohol was, in effect, an allergy. I was told that the only way I would be able to stay sober, once I was discharged, was to join an A.A. group, and I attended several sessions which were handled by outside A.A. volunteers. Much time was spent trying to build up the patients' "self-esteem" - to convince them that being an alcoholic was not a sign of a weak or evil character but a condition that could be treated, like diabetes, though not ever cured.

I was started on a family program and my parents, brother and sister were invited to attend what we called the FOG sessions (Family Orientation Group). There my family was given lectures similar to my own orientation course, explaining what alcoholism is and how I should be treated. They were encouraged to join Al-Anon, an organization specially for the families of alcoholics. One of the important points stressed was that families should not disrupt their entire lives because one of them was an alcoholic, but must learn to start living for themselves. Sometimes after hearing the orientation lectures, other members of the family would realize that they too were alcoholics and apply for a course of treatment.

Altogether there were twenty-five different programs in one week for the alcoholic patients, including films, group and private therapy, rap sessions and lectures. We were also given a complete physical checkup every day. I know of no case in which any of the patients tried to smuggle in drinks or have any alcohol at this period. They had all been too close to disaster.

Treatment at Freeport is usually for one week. This costs $405 and is allowable on Blue Cross, but since I had no regular job at the time I was admitted, the cost had to be picked up by my family.

I finally left Freeport after two weeks, restored in physical and mental health, and convinced I could and must stay sober.

I was able, after a few months, to start another relationship with a boy I had known in high school. He knew of my illness and was confident we could fight it together. This did much to help my self-esteem.

But it was hard to stay sober. I still couldn't realize that in my case, I could not drink at all. Shortly after I left Freeport, I took a bottle of Vodka to my room, just to lift me out of the blues. I fell off the wagon with a bang, and within two weeks I was in almost as bad shape as when I'd first arrived at Freeport. I agreed to return for further treatment and was reminded of what I had been told so many times in the hospital and at A-A meetings. When you go back to drink, you don't go back to the beginning; you return to the point where you last left off.

This time I cleared the hospital in one week, convinced that I would really stay sober forever. I had another scare not long afterward while I was having some dental work done. The dentist had given me the usual dose of Novocain and started confidently to drill, when I let out a shriek of pain.

I had forgotten one of the warnings in the lectures at Freeport. If you are given anesthetics, you must always warn the doctor or dentist that you are a recovered alcoholic. Alcoholics often develop such a special chemistry with regard to drugs that they have been known to come suddenly out of anesthesia even during surgery!

I have finally learned that I can cope with my illness by facing it day by day, with the help of my family, my boy friend and Alcoholics Anonymous. I've learned to love waking up not feeling sick.

I took and passed a high school equivalency test and have now passed entrance exams for a local university, which I plan to attend next semester.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS

A CATHOLIC MEMBERS APPRECIATION

"I HEAR the A.A. want to start a group here. Do you know anything about these fellows?" I was shown this part of a letter from one country priest to another not so long ago. I am an alcoholic myself and a member of A.A. for twenty-four years. My own success in the adventure of sobriety is bound up with the success of A.A. in Ireland. The object of this article is to tell something about "these fellows": what we are, what we try to do and what we have so far achieved. For we have found a knowledge and understanding of A.A. has made us friends and gained us helpers.

Up to comparatively recently, Society has placed all drunks in the same category - weak-willed, callous, helpless and unhelpable, intentional sinners, skeletons whose greatest offence is that they will not remain snugly in their family cupboards. Yet nearly everyone knows at least one person whose drinking has apparently almost without warning become incomprehensible. Men with good homes, money, good business or jobs, good reputations, healthy, in no way unhappy, suddenly go off the rails. Normal, seemingly, when not drinking, their characters undergo a complete change once they start on alcohol. Their former occasional "night-outs" develop swiftly into bouts, the bouts come closer and closer together. In many cases they are seldom completely sober. Their drinking is followed by periods of intense remorse, by sincere though short lived attempts to stay off liquor. Their relatives are in turn startled, puzzled, anxious to help, resentful, contemptuous, enraged. They themselves are at first sure they can find a way of retaining control "next time," then frightened when they fail repeatedly, then hopeless. Their complete ignorance of what has happened to them, what is still happened to them, what is still happening to them, makes it impossible for them to explain to, and gain the understanding sympathy of, those they love and respect. Little by little they cut themselves off from their world; they live in a state of desperate loneliness and finally become outcasts. These are the persons sometimes called the Problem Drinkers. They are, in fact, alcoholics or compulsive drinkers, suffering from a physical allergy to alcohol combined with a mental obsession to take more once they start to drink: drinkers whose compulsion to drink is a sign of disease. There are few alcoholics who have recovered who would deny that this disease is really spiritual.

A.A. is a loose knit society of men and women alcoholics who have banded together in groups all over the world to share their experience, strength and hope with each other, that they may solve their common problem and help others to recover from alcoholism. There are at the time of writing over 14,000 such groups, with a total membership of about 500,000 spread all over the world. The only requirement for membership is a sincere desire to stop drinking. A.A. is not allied with any particular religion, creed or denomination. It has nothing to do with politics, other organizations or any institution. A.A. simply minds its own business to stay sober and help other alcoholics to achieve sobriety. Alcoholism is not a purely Catholic, Protestant or Jewish disease; it is not the exclusive illness of either the millionaire or the down-and-out. Alcoholism strikes at all creeds, class and income--grades impartially. A.A.'s success has largely derived from its refusal to recognize any difference between one alcoholic and another. They are all sick persons, requiring A.A.'s help. A.A. does not usurp the place of Church or Medicine. The alcoholic who joins in poor physical condition is strongly advised to consult his doctor. The alcoholic's religion, or lack of it, is his own affair. In general, it has been our experience that a good A.A. member becomes a better member of his Church. But our primary object is to achieve sobriety. From that sobriety the other things will stem; without it, they are impossible. A.A. is not concerned with money. It has nothing to sell and none of its members are paid for A.A. work. There are no positions of authority to be obtained ;each member is on exactly the same footing. Its policy of anonymity does away with the danger of membership being used as a means of obtaining personal kudos. Thus the three most ordinary occasions of disunity and disruption are guarded against. Each group is autonomous. Its own members care for the necessary money to meet expenses of rent, printing and incidentals. Donations from outside sources are politely refused. Its officers are elected in rotation. Its policy of anonymity was first chosen as a worldly safeguard for its members; the spiritual value of anonymity has become more apparent since. But while personal anonymity is required, A.A. is only too glad of any publicity to its aims and being.

It came into existence thirty six years ago in America through a chance meeting between a New York stockbroker named Bill (in A.A. all members go by their first names), and an Akron doctor, Bob. Bill had already managed to keep sober for six months as the result of following out a few principles of living largely based on the Oxford Groups "Absolutes." He had, however, just had the bad end of a business deal and came to realize that to preserve his own sobriety he must make contact with another alcoholic and help him to achieve sobriety as well. Both of these men had long and dreadful histories of drink; but from that first meeting, they both remained sober. Bob died twenty-two years ago, but Bill lived till 1971, a total abstainer for over 36 years, after he had been given up as a hopeless and unhelpable drunk. The society they started that day grew slowly and shakily; it took over four years to muster the first hundred members. Since then it has grown in increasing tempo to its present size. In numbers it is still mainly American, United States and Canada. Twenty-nine years ago it was carried to Australia by a travelling American. Three years later, it came indirectly from Australia to Ireland, this time by a priest.

This priest was on holiday in Dublin in September 1946 and was interviewed by an evening paper on the subject of a Boy's Town with which he was connected in Australia. In the course of his talk he commented at length on the success that A.A. was having in Sydney and expressed the hope that Dublin would do well to take it up. This interview was read by a member of the Philadelphia group, an Irishman who had gone to live in the States, who was over here on holiday. Spurred on by his wife, he determined to start a group in Dublin, with the help of a doctor and by advertising, he managed to scrape together a small number of men willing to make the experiment. Their first public meeting was held in The Country Shop on November 25th.; and here on that night the first A.A. group in Europe was formed. As in America, the start was slow and uphill. Today it is firmly established in Dublin (35 Groups); there are many large groups in Belfast; there are several groups in Limerick, Cork and Galway, and smaller ones elsewhere. Public meetings are held every Monday night, still in The Country Shop, where attendance's range from 50 upwards to 100. The maximum attendance was at a meeting held in the Mansion House when over 400 came along to listen to the Co-Founder of the Society, Bill. At a conservative estimate, there are at least 2000 members in Ireland and an estimated 8,000 in England, Scotland and Wales. A good many others, though partially convinced, are not yet ready to make, and act on, the necessary admission that they are beaten by drink. A world estimate is that about 70% of those who join and give the A.A. program a fair trial recover, though a great many of these suffer one or more relapses before they finally settle down. A short time ago, I was asked at a clerical meeting to explain to them why an alcoholic went on drinking long after it was evident that he was incapable of exercising control. I find it almost impossible to do so. I can only say that for a very long period of my own thirty years drinking I honestly believed I could, someday and somehow, find a way of drinking all I wanted without losing control. Life without drink seemed to me to be an unnatural and quite impossible way of existence. Later I became drearily hopeless and fatalistic about it. Though I still continued to make attempts to pull up, I felt even at the time that they were quite useless. I felt it would start again sometime, so what was the use of trying too hard? The truth is that we don't know why we drink; but when we tell the truth, we are not believed. Strength of will and sincerity of purpose do not enter into it. I have entered my name for a Retreat to find help in Quitting drink, yet gone to that retreat with a bottle of gin in my bag, which I drank between the first exercise and going to sleep. After a month's voluntary treatment in a private home, I felt convinced I had mastered drink; and been drinking again within a few hours. Drink makes us mentally unbalanced and we cannot be honest even with ourselves for long at a time.

My own case history may be cited as typical of an A.A. member, though space will mercifully prelude any but the minimum necessary details. I am seventy-five years of age, single and come from a good class Catholic family. My home life was happy and I went to a Catholic College in England. Later I entered the profession I wanted to join; I was very happy in it, I got on well. I was good at games; I was considered good at work, above the average of my rank in the British Army. I had a promising future to look forward to, I had nothing from which to escape. There was no previous history of drink in my family. I can see no reason why I should have become an alcoholic, yet almost from the start I drank like an alcoholic. At first I had some sort of control over myself as to when I drank. If circumstances seemed to indicate the need for it, I cut out drinking without much effort and with no feeling of self sacrifice. But even in those first years if I drank at all I went on for the rest of the night. Soon I was losing even that control. I began to drink at the wrong times, in the wrong places and before the wrong people. Good luck and good friends covered up for me for many years, but finally life caught up on me and I was retired on retired pay, branded as not to be re-employed. This virtual dismissal made very little impression on me. I still had enough money for drink and I had a home to live in. Six more years were to pass before the climax came. I had been inflicting every kind of unhappiness not only on myself but on my parents, not the least for the latter being my complete indifference to my religious duties. In April 1947 they ordered me out of the house and the family and their lives. By now I had added drugs to alcohol. My routine had become one of the drugs in the morning to revive me, drink all day and another drug at night to give me sleep. My parents' "revolt" opened my eyes for the first time to where I had descended. It proved to be my own gutter. Fear for my security and at the prospect of becoming one of the legion of the homeless lost (with the next stop almost certainly a Night Shelter), at last made me genuinely willing in my own interest to do anything I could to stop drinking ("Give me back my Legions" .). The trouble was that I could think of nothing useful. Doctors, homes, hospitals, promises, all had proved in vain. Then my memory went back to that interview I had read nine months before, about A.A. The Grace of God must have put it into my heart to go to a meeting that night, and I managed to strike a one-sided bargain with my parents that if A.A. could do some good I might stay at my parents on probation. I arrived at that meeting, more than half-drunk, shaking from drugs and nerves; not too good a prospect, even for A.A. By the goodness of God and the help He has sent me through A.A. I have not had another drink since then.

There is no set blueprint of recovery in A.A. Each member succeeds in his own way and time and at his own pace. So what I write must be taken as my own experience only. For me, recovery came from Knowledge, Decision, Group or social therapy, a return to Realism and the program of the Twelve Steps. All of these together for me make up the A.A. way of life. And I attacked my recovery problem in just that order, which seems to me to be entirely logical. Without Knowledge, I could not come to any decision that would stand up for long. Without Decision to recover, group therapy would be a waste of time. Without Realism I should have been continuing my old pattern of running away into dreamland from the inescapable facts of life. And while all these things were essential to me to stop drinking, I had to bring another factor into play, the Twelve Steps, to learn not only how to remain abstinent but to be happy in remaining so.

That Knowledge was elementary, though new to me. Alcoholism is a sort of disease acquired by two or three percent of the world's drinkers. The disease in simplifying language is the disease of not being able to drink in moderation. It is the first drink the alcoholic takes that sets his disease in active virulence, not the total quantity consumed. Alcoholism cannot be completely eliminated once it gains a footing. No matter how long I might remain abstinent at a time, I would never be able to control my drinking if I started again. But if I could find a way of not taking a first drink, I could stay sober and normal.

The decision I had to take was to give up drinking for good. I had to face the unpalatable fact that I must make abstinence my own first and most vital aim. As for the group therapy, I was prepared to accept that the older members had had to make themselves essential to their groups and the groups essential to themselves. If I was going to avail myself of the same means that they had found necessary and successful, it followed that I must attempt what they did. Group therapy to me does not merely mean coming together at stated times for formal meetings. These meetings are important for many reasons and as the visible sign of coherence. The equally valuable, though invisible, sign is keeping the closest possible touch with the members of the group even when they are not in actual physical contact. That can be done by constantly thinking about the group, working for it, praying for it; keeping it in mind as much as possible.

Reality consisted in recognizing that my alcoholic life must be cut down to a size I could hope to deal with. My disposition was such that if I continued to think of abstinence in terms of months or years, I would be pretty certain that nothing would be done. So I adopted the A.A. suggestion of living my life in periods of twenty-four hours at a time. Today, the only day in reality that I ever have at my disposal. From the beginning, I slowly advanced to being content to accomplish only what of the rest of my life I could fit into Today. That again required further realism to determine which things were of the most immediate importance to be done Today. But my primary reality will always remain concentrated on not taking one single drink Today.

Finally, the program of recovery, contained in the following Twelve Steps:

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.

2. Came to believe that a power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.
12. Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps we tried to carry this message to alcoholics and practice these principles in all our affairs.

These steps seem strong meat for reforming alcoholics. It helped me greatly to remember that this program was not some optimistic chart for super-saints. It was based on the actual experience of human beings, alcoholics like myself. They were not impossibly idealistic steps; they had all been attempted by others successfully. It is sometimes said that all the steps are spiritual except the first. For me, the first step is also essentially spiritual. I could admit in words to myself that I was powerless over alcohol, but where would that take me unless that admission embraced not only the actual wording but also what was implicit in it? No, taking that step was a declaration to myself that because I sincerely wanted to recover, I was fully resolved to try to live out the way of life suggested in the following eleven steps.

The second step, too, called for determination. Here I could no longer avoid my spiritual life. I had to subdue my pride and acknowledge that a greater Power, God, was in complete control of my life. I had to strive to make God a daily living reality in my life, not a pious Sunday morning superstition. The third step was perhaps the hardest, relinquishing control and guidance of my life to God. But in the measure of the success I attained here would lie the measure of success I would meet with in continued sobriety, happiness and peace of mind. The fourth step was akin to our general confession. For me, that moral inventory was not a moral mudrake but a serious effort to find out about myself, to find what things stood in the way of my carrying out the third step. The fourth step taught me self-knowledge. We take an inventory of ourselves; we do not attempt to beat our neighbor's breast.

The fifth was only a practical application of the truism that confession is good for the soul. This and the next few following steps contain no great difficulty for the alcoholic who is sincere in his acceptance of the third. The tenth was our nightly examination of conscience with the added obligation of owing up to human beings when we were frankly wrong. The eleventh was a guide to our carrying out the third. The sting of the steps is contained in the tail of the Twelfth, that part which suggests we carry out the foregoing principles in all our affairs. Many may be willing enough to practice them in their alcoholic affairs. The older members had found out that this would not be enough to ensure happiness and a good conscience. This part of the steps is that which binds them all together. It cannot be ignored with safety.

It always remains important that we remember why we joined A.A. It was to recover our own sobriety for our own sakes; not to preach to the unconverted. That must remain our primary goal. We cannot afford to forget our previously helplessness when friends talk prettily of our apostolic mission. Charity begins at home.

Since A.A. has been operating there for longer and on a very much greater scale, the Church in America has had more opportunity to assess its work and direction. An extract from a letter received here from the Chancellor of a very large archdiocese will give some idea of the impression made. "The Bishops of our country up to now have not taken any official stand on A.A. The movement has not been condemned; the movement has not been officially approved. Personally I am convinced that the A.A. movement is the most sound and the most successful approach that has ever been made in our country to the problem of the alcoholic. In my archdiocese, I am under the impression that about one-half of its members at one time were Catholics. The Twelve Steps appeal to me as being entirely in harmony with the Catholic faith and morals, as being clearly stated religious and moral principles in language which is simple and easily understood. Honesty to oneself, humility, contrition, purpose of amendment, unburdening one's soul and accusing one's self of failing to another person, placing one's hope and confidence in God, making restitution, relying upon prayer and meditation, spiritual reading, seem to me to be sound and solid principles necessary for rehabilitation. The apostolic step to carry the message to alcoholics and to help others to rehabilitate themselves `is also in conformity with Christian teaching and seems to be psychologically of utmost importance. Cases have come to my attention of priests who were victims of alcoholism being re-instated through A.A. A large number of lukewarm and indifferent Catholics have returned to an active practice of their faith; and strange as it may seem, several instances are known of non-Catholics who have been brought to the Catholic faith through the A.A. movement.. .The Chancery has been very solicitous to avoid giving the impression that the archdiocese was trying to take over the A.A. movement or trying to take over the A.A. movement, or trying to interfere in either the organization or activities of the Group."

It may sound ungracious to stress the importance of that last sentence, considering that A.A. is looking for all the help the Church can give. But one of the biggest attractions to the prospective member is that he is joining a society of alcoholics run and controlled in every way by alcoholics. Any suggestion that the group was in some way controlled or unduly influenced by an outside "partisan" body, however benevolently disposed, would be bad news for the unity of the members. We seem to be forced into the ungenerous position of having to say to our outside helpers:

"Please do all you can for us; but stay in your corner until we want you."
In truth, we are only guided by our experience, which is that one alcoholic is the best ambassador to another. We speak the same language, a language that cannot be entirely understood by even the most sympathetic of our friends who is not himself an alcoholic.

What we ask from priests who have a will to help us is that they will be content with steering alcoholics towards us and that they will be willing to stand aside when they have done so; that they will, even though perhaps with every conscious effort, try to understand that the alcoholic is not, in his present condition at least, a deliberate sinner but a very sick person requiring experienced treatment; and that they will examine our successes rather than our failures, for our successes are being gained in a field considered hopeless until recently. And we ask them, too, not to look on us as rivals to any temperance movement already sponsored by them. We are not in competition with anyone or anything.

A.A. is not a charitable society in the sense that it engages to supply its members with loans of money, employment or even clothes for which it has no further personal use. It is a charitable society in the meaning of Christ's teaching. We ask for nothing material for ourselves personally or as groups. We do ask for charity for the sick alcoholic; sympathy for his problem; understanding of his condition and a willingness to advise him to seek recovery where so many thousands have already found it. A.A. is in no way a substitute for the Sacraments"; it has proved to be in most cases of Catholic alcoholics a positive urge towards them. It is with confidence then that we ask for the good will of the readers of The Furrow and for their prayers - that those of us who have recovered may maintain our sobriety and that the Grace of God may bring our members and their families that happiness which is the end of man.

The Vatican and Alcoholics Anonymous. A Dublin member of Alcoholics Anonymous, 23 St. Stephens Green, Dublin 2, writes:

Archbishop Enrici, Apostolic Nuncio to Great Britain, came to, and spoke at the recent European Convention of A.A. held at Bristol at the end of September last. Afterwards he made the suggestion that, as he believed little was known at the Vatican about A.A. and its suggested way of recovery, a visit from a couple of its members might be of great value to both parties.

Accordingly, in January of this year, an English Catholic member and I departed for Rome and remained for a fortnight. Our only contact, up to the time of our arrival there, was through the Bishop of Clifton, the very recently appointed rector of the English College. But through his generous guidance we obtained a list of those he thought we should try to contact. And through the kindness of the Irish mother superior of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God at Mater Dei Convent (they have a sister house in Raheny, Dublin), we were lent the services of an Italian-speaking nun to help us to effect the necessary approaches by telephone. We acknowledge with deep gratitude that all of them, very willingly and at very short notice, agreed to make the appointments which enabled us to carry out the program given briefly as follows:

Talks given to the students and staff of the English, Irish, Beda, Scottish and North American Colleges.

Reception by Mgr. Uylenbroek, Secretary of the Council of the Laity.

Reception by Cardinal John Joseph Wright, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy.

Reception by the Superior General of the Society of Jesus, Very

Rev. Father Arrupe, S.J.

Reception by the Servants of the Paraclete.

Membership is open to anyone with an alcoholic relative or friend; even teen-agers are welcomed. (In some communities, teen-age children of alcoholics have set up their own groups, called Alateens.) Most members are women, largely because there are many more men alcoholics than women. There are no bylaws or dues; members make small, voluntary contributions to cover the rental of a meeting place and the cost of refreshments. In addition, each member is encouraged to contribute a dollar twice a year for the support of the national headquarters.

Most groups meet once a week or twice a month. A typical meeting might open with a nondenominational prayer for serenity, followed by the introduction of new members. Next might come a group discussion, an address by an outside speaker (a doctor, psychiatrist, or clergyman), or a reading of inspirational literature. Typical problems discussed might be: how to protect the children from the impact of alcoholism; whether the wife (if the husband is the alcoholic) should go to work to ease the financial situation; or what the basic cause of excessive drinking is.

The heart of most Al-Anon meetings, however, is the "personal story" period, in which two or three members recount their own experiences in living with an alcoholic and either ask the group's help in easing some of the problems or recount the methods they themselves have found successful. Members are encouraged to be frank but urged to withhold particularly intimate or emotional problems for private discussion with individual members.

Basic to Al-Anon's philosophy is the idea that the family of an alcoholic is powerless to control his drinking. But a nonalcoholic can control himself, and the Al-Anon program tries to help its members by urging them to live one day at a time; to accept the idea that alcoholism is a disease; to examine their own consciences and try to remove from their conduct toward the alcoholic any trace of self-righteousness, resentment, or irritation; and to live full lives themselves, even if that means developing interests and activities the alcoholic cannot share. In carrying out this program, Al-Anon, like AA, stresses the need for reliance on spiritual help.

Al-Anon promises no miracles. About ten percent of its new members usually drop out after two or three meetings, when they discover the organization does not attempt to solve the basic problem of alcoholism itself. In other cases, the alcoholic relative bitterly resents having his problems discussed with strangers. Often the Al-Anon program just does not take. But even more often, Al-Anon says, its members are greatly helped by simply being able to talk over their problems with others in the same situation. As they struggle to overcome their own resentment, fear, or despair, they make at least their own lives more bearable. And in some instances, the resulting improvement in home life encourages the alcoholic relative to seek help himself from doctors, psychiatrists, clergymen, or AA.

suggested 'why not go start an AA meeting?', when Connor was depressed that the Irish weather had rained on his golf vacation.

If anyone knows anything more about Flynn, like from what part of Philly he hailed, or anything, please let me know.

alcoholics because of the stigma that is attached to the label. Medical science has at least tagged alcoholism for what it is: a disease. But public opinion is slow to follow. So, when a friend tries to tell you that you're not an alcoholic, he thinks he is doing you a kindness.

In the second place, many people still have a fixed and stereotyped conception of what an alcoholic is—a human derelict on Skid Row, or a moneyed ne'er-do-well languishing in some institution. If you don't fit into either category, they find it impossible to believe you have lost your tolerance for alcohol.

In the third place, your admission that you are an alcoholic disturbs some of your friends because it is a threat to their own drinking habits. "If this fellow is an alcoholic," they say to themselves uneasily, "what about me?" There is little logic in such a reaction: only one drinker out of 15 or 16 becomes an alcoholic. But I have had the distinct impression on many occasions, that the person loudly assuring me that I couldn't be an alcoholic was really trying to reassure himself.

And finally, alcoholics often have to face strong opposition from close relatives who feel that any such admission will bring disgrace or disapproval upon the family. Recently a good friend of mine died of alcoholism at the age of 43. Doctors found her physical disabilities indicated she had been an alcoholic for a great many years. Yet six months before she died, her father told me impatiently that she wasn't an alcoholic, and named a dozen women who drank more and behaved far worse. All her friends and relations had assured her that she wasn't an alcoholic. Most of them still think she died of heart failure, a falsehood that the newspapers faithfully recorded.

The only way an alcoholic can begin a program of recovery is through recognition of his disease. This is never easy since addiction invariably carries with it a deadly tendency to justify, to rationalize, to deny anything that might bring about the end of drinking. Believe me, I know. I went through it myself.

A GRIM REALIZATION

A number of years ago, three people very close to me seemed to have drinking problems, so I obtained and read Marty Mann's "Primer on Alcoholism" with a view of being of help. Several years later, my own drinking behavior was sufficiently abnormal and depressing to make me recall the book. I reread it, and I also read "Just One More," by James Lamb Free. It was a grim experience. I tried frantically to dodge - I sought every means to prove that I wasn't an alcoholic. But the evidence was too strong.

What evidence? Well, in one of his classic studies, Dr. E.M. Jellinek lists the characteristics displayed by the victim of alcoholism in three successive stages of the disease. I found that many of these descriptions applied to my own behavior. Black-outs, for example. These are episodes involving loss of memory, and should not be confused with "passing out."

There were many times when I would play bridge quite competently all evening, and have little or no recollection of it the next day. Once I drove 120 miles from San Francisco to my home in pebble beach, and woke up the next day with no awareness of having made such a trip.

MORNING-AFTER REMORSE

Many other symptoms listed by Dr. Jellinek were present in my drinking pattern, although, like many alcoholics, I usually succeeded in keeping them from my friends. Sneaking drinks, evasiveness about drinking habits, excessive remorse the morning after - the signs were all too plain. I was still years from Skid Row, but I was on my way. I didn't look like an alcoholic, and I obviously didn't act like one-but when I finally described my symptoms to a doctor, he confirmed my fears - I was one!

I remember very well the reaction among some of my closest friends. It was almost violent: derision, denial, anger, endless proof that I could be an alcoholic. Soothing, wonderful words to a man who craves a drink! Welcome justification for starting all over again!

I remember very well the reaction among some of my closest friends. It was almost violent: derision, denial, anger, endless proof that I could not be an alcoholic. Soothing, wonderful words to a man who craves a drink! Welcome justification for starting all over again!

I know now that these reactions were based on ignorance - false conceptions of what an alcoholic is and how the disease works. Nobody knows all about alcoholism; even to the experts, some aspects of it remain a mystery. Let me try to dispel a few of the major misconceptions.

To begin with, please don't consider the alcoholic a moral weakling. Actually, he may have more will power than you have. But he is ill-the sickest of men.

Next, don't limit your mental picture of an alcoholic to the derelict in the last stages of the disease. There lies the derelict in the gutter, close to insanity or death. Has he just recently become an alcoholic? Was it five years ago when he became a dishwasher? Was it ten years ago when his wife divorced him? Was it 15 years ago when he lost his bank job? Was it twenty years ago when he first began sneaking his drinks to make sure of "getting his share?" Was it 25 years ago when he had his first blackouts? Today science knows that he became an alcoholic at least 25 years back-and that he was just as much an alcoholic then as he is now.

Try to remember that alcoholism is an iceberg disease - the symptoms are largely hidden, at first. In fact, during the first five or ten years of their addiction, alcoholics generally take great care to appear as normal social drinkers. It is the heavy drinkers or occasional drunk who misbehaves. It is the alcoholic who apparently remains sober. But it is the alcoholic who slips away first from a cocktail party, often on the pretext that he has "work to do" but who then goes home or to an out-of-the-way bar and satisfies his grim, compulsive need.

Don't be misled by appearances. My wife, Virginia, who recovered from alcoholism when she was 29, is a youthful and energetic woman. People meeting her for the first time and learning of her disease invariably protest, "You can't be an alcoholic, you look as healthy as a child!" She is an alcoholic-and looks as youthful as any victim of the disease who has been blessed with an early recovery.

Alcoholics Anonymous leaves statistics to the authorities and the research groups, but it is a generally accepted fact that in the beginning, some 24 years ago, the average age of AA members was 50 or more because only end-of-the-liners were thought to be alcoholics. Today, thanks largely to the remarkable educational work of the National Council on Alcoholism, younger people are joining in various programs of recovery. Most newcomers to AA nowadays range from teen-agers to persons in their 20's, 30's or 40's. They are recognizing the disease early.

THE INVISIBLE LINE

This brings me to one last recommendation. Sometimes the young recovered alcoholic is told that he must have had a light case since it didn't progress very far, and that surely he must be able to take a little wine or beer. In the first place, there is no such thing as a "light" case. The alcoholic who crosses the invisible line is - and will remain - an alcoholic all his life. And there is no such thing as a partial alcoholic: either you are one or you are not. In the second place, it doesn't matter whether the fatal drink is wine, beer, 100-proof bourbon--or for that matter a cough syrup with an alcohol base. It is the alcohol that does the damage, in any form.

So please try to help us. Recommended to those who may be problem drinkers that they write to the National Council on Alcoholism in New York or one of the 55 community committees throughout the country, or call AA. Or read Marty Mann's "Primer on Alcoholism," or James Lamb Free's "Just One More."

But don't tell them they're not alcoholics. If you are wrong and they believe you, they may die.

Dear Jim, Yes, from what I have heard over the years what you say is correct & it does all come together, it was Connor F who spoke to Fr. Tom Dunlea, when Connor was depressed and his wife noticed the article in the Dublin Evening Mail (reference Email received as follows : We have in our Archives the October 1946 Evening Mail article about Fr. Dunlea.) and Connor F's wife said why don't you go and talk to this Priest from Australia. And what happened after is as you say below. Bill W also had a golf experience, in the Club House Bar on Armistice Day 1934, I believe it was? Thank God that the down side of Golf can be put to good use? Kind Regards, John R help and encouragement of his wife he devoted the rest of his holiday to this task.

From the outset he discovered that his assignment would be a difficult one. He ran into stone walls everywhere. He was even told at one stage that there were no alcoholics in southern Ireland-but he would probably get them in Northern Ireland.

It was pointed out to him in no uncertain terms that if people had problems with the "demon drink" all they had to do was join The Pioneer Association-Ireland's highly respected temperance society, and not waste time with some new and unusual idea taught by Americans.

He also gave an interview to the Evening Mail newspaper outlining AA's endeavours to help people suffering from alcoholism "to overcome the obsession which compels them to drink against their will." The article also included a Box Number for people to write for information.

He received a few replies-one from a man telling him that he should contact his brother. He made contact with a few people but nothing concrete came from any of them.

He was just about to give up and with time running out fate played its hand-as it did with Bill W in Akron eleven years earlier-when once again, and in more or less similar circumstances, an understanding non-alcoholic woman played a part in the birth of AA-this time in Ireland.

Her name was Eva Jennings and she was staying in the same hotel as Conor and over breakfast he confided in her his many problems in getting AA set up in Dublin.

She was very sympathetic towards his plight and arranged for him to meet a Dr. Norman Moore from St. Patrick's Hospital in Dublin (founded by Dean Swift) whom she believed would be of some help.

Dr. Moore was quite enthusiastic and listened to what Conor had to say as he had already read about AA in a Readers Digest article. He informed Conor that he had a patient in the hospital "whom he feared he might be saddled with for life" and was willing to introduce them both stating: "If you can help this man, I'll believe in AA 100 percent."

The patient, Richard P. from County Down in Northern Ireland, was sent under escort to Conor's hotel and immediately they "clicked" and Richard was released from hospital.

Both men then set about arranging the first closed meeting in Dublin which took place two weeks later on November 18th 1946. Neither man was ever to drink again.

There are currently 13,000 members in Ireland with over 75,000 meeting annually.

Noted dates:

Conor F. died in Philadelphia on July 8th, 1993.

Richard P. died December 19th, 1982

Eva Jennings became a great friend of AA until she died in August 1997.

Bill W and his wife Lois paid their first visit to Dublin in 1950.

++++Message 1030. A.A. History Help
From: Thom K. 5/23/2003 1:23:00 AM

Hi,

This is my first time posting to this group, recommended by a friend who's the archivist for our Area. I hope someone has some info to share in my two current A.A. history pursuits:

1. I'm helping a gal pull material together on A.A. and Buddhism. I gave her the stuff from A.A. Comes of age, Not God, The Spirituality of Imperfection and lots of bits and scraps I've accumulated from A.A. and non-A.A. sources over the years.

I know that Dr. Tiebault wrote some stuff on A.A. and Buddhism (some of it in the A.A. Grapevine and some published elsewhere), but I can't track it down. That, or anything else you have or can point me to, will be a great help.

"The Collected Writings of Harry Tiebout" is another recent book, and if Dr. T had written a comparison with Buddhist principles, I can immediately refer to his multiple essays on surrender. I wouldn't expect much more than a few phrases or sentences on the subject, though I may be in error. Our AA Grapevine is a most excellent magazine but it doesn't always go into depth on anything outside of our AA principles.

The history lovers of Alcoholics Anonymous most definitely must admit that Hazelden has attempted to fill in the existing gaps that might never be found in Conference-approved literature, where those gaps may never be made accessible from the GSO Archives. If Hazelden had not bought the rights to "Not-God," "Grateful To Have Been There," and negotiated the placement of such treasures as Dr. Silkworth's papers, AND MORE, your questions might never get answered.

Of course there are other publishing houses where our AA history can be found, but you will find a lion's share of credible scholarship that Hazelden has made available.

Have a great search!

Hi,

I know that Dr. Tiebault wrote some stuff on A.A. and Buddhism (some

"New Groups Include One In Dublin." The new groups listed in the column had registered with the NY office between November 10 and December 10, 1946.

Sackville M's story (The Career Officer) says that he showed up at "The Country Shop" restaurant for a meeting on April 28, 1947 and he "found about thirty-five or forty people in the room" for their "open night meeting." Grapevine Vol IV, No. 5 October 1947 on pg 13 had a letter from Sackville acknowledging that the Dublin Group had just received its first issue of the Grapevine (the August 1947 issue). It announced that the group had about 20 members.

Then in the November 1947 issue Sackville wrote again announcing that the group would celebrate its first anniversary on November 25.

In the December 1947 issue Sackville wrote again outlining the format of the Dublin group's "member meeting":

1. Correspondence read; reports of any contacts made.
2. In weekly turns:
 - a. Reading of three or four selections from the current AA Grapevine, followed by discussions.
 - b. Reading of a chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous followed by discussions on it.
 - c. Round-table debates on a series of alcoholic questions.
 - d. Impromptu discussions on alcoholic subjects - names of speakers (who can choose own subject) drawn from a hat.
3. Any general group business.
4. Appointments for speakers for next public weekly meeting.
5. Recital of the Lord's Prayer.

Signed - S. O.C. M.

In January 1948 issue of the Grapevine there was a letter posted from Sackville about the Dublin Group's anniversary party

"No Froth on the Tea At Dublin's First Birthday"

From Dublin Ireland

A dinner was held at the County Shop November 27 when 33 members, their wives and friends got together. Many of us looked around furtively to see if anyone was noticing us pouring water into our glasses and one or two absentmindedly attempted to blow the froth off the tea. But a real happy evening, which spun out far later than we realized, was spent by us all. We led off with a cable from C. and a special message written to our own group by Bill. These had a grand reception. Then our founder spoke of AA and in particular of the invaluable advice, [illegible], information and practical assistance received from The Foundation so far away yet so closely in touch.

Our doctor advanced the proposition that alcoholism is not hereditary from a family sense but is from a racial point of view. He said Poles and Irish were the two peoples most addicted to alcoholism.

A musical performance finished with Auld Lag Syne, and the party reluctantly dispersed.

The keynote of the party was the surprisingly happy atmosphere and the "we must have more of this" attitude. Our thanks to AA for giving 33 men and women the opportunity of having their return to society and for recovery itself.

It wasn't a large number judged by American parties, yet we all felt that behind those 33 of us hovered the spirit of happiness engendered by all the 50,000 in AA.

A happy Christmas and New Year - and may we have the pleasure of seeing a lot of you in Dublin in 1948.

Signed - S.M.

Cheers

Arthur

Conor resided in Southwest Philadelphia, with his wonderful Irish wife, Margaret.

I taped Conor at his home there. Margaret was present, along with Conor's niece, myself and John H. (Berwyn Butterfly).

Conor and Margaret went to Ireland in 1946 for a vacation. They took a pile of Big Books with them, and what they referred to at that time as "Can openers;" Can openers were predecessors to our present day pamphlets, Can openers contained information regarding AA: steps, traditions, prayers, meeting locations sometimes.

It took more than a month to flush out one single alcoholic in Ireland. Eva Jennings was an Irish social worker who encouraged Conor to stay on, that an alcoholic would materialize sooner or later. The clergy was not very helpful, except Fr. Tom Dunlea who went to Australia, and told AA members there that AA in Ireland needed support; according to Conor people got on boats and came to the fledgling AA in Ireland. I believe it was Eva who suggested the short blurb in the local newspaper and the first call came in.

Thom--

You mention the similarity of the 12 Steps to the Spiritual Exercises of St Ignatius. In fact there is a book out that I read a couple of years ago on this very subject. The title is "A 12-Step Approach to the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius." It is written by Father Jim Harbaugh, a Jesuit priest from the Seattle area.

I thought the book a good read and an excellent study in the similarities--often strikingly so--between the 12 Steps and the Spiritual Exercises. As one ancient sage lyrically put it, "There's nothing new under the sun!"

Just a thought: Harry Tiebout's son, Harry Tiebout, Jr., was a philosophy professor who taught a very popular course in world religions at the University of Illinois. His particular area of expertise was Asian religion, at a time when few people knew much about it. I have wondered if Tiebout Sr.'s observations about Buddhism and recovery developed through correspondence with his son. I have seen references to an article on the subject (by Tiebout Sr.) but it doesn't seem to be accessible.

Hi

I've found only one reference to Buddhism by Tiebout (he refers to the Zen variant).

In
Grapevine issue 22, number 4 (September 1965) Tiebout authored an article:
"When the Big "I" Becomes Nobody" (he emphasizes the need for reduced ego and humility as a safeguard against alcohol). The article is

Education and Welfare's National Institute of Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA). "Youths are moving from a wide range of other drugs to the most devastating drug--the one most widely misused of all--alcohol."

The upsurge of problem drinking among the young is only part of a more disturbing nationwide and even world-wide problem. In the past few year alcoholism--among youths and adults alike--has at last been recognized as a plague. From 1960 to 1970, per capita consumption of alcohol in the U.S. increased 26%--to the equivalent of 2.6 gal. of straight alcohol per adult per year. It is now at an alltime high, probably surpassing the levels during such notoriously wet eras as the pre-Civil War and pre-Prohibition years. Moreover, according to the NIAAA, about one in ten of the 95 million Americans who drink is now either a full-fledged alcoholic or at least a *problem drinker (defined by NIAAA as one who drinks enough to cause trouble for himself and society). Uncounted thousands of the problem drinkers are under 21 and, in fact, the approximately 9 million excessive drinkers are representatives of--and affect--the whole spectrum of American society.

The facts gathered by NIAAA about alcohol abuse are as depressing as they are impressive:

After heart disease and cancer, alcoholism is the country's biggest health problem. Most deaths attributed to alcoholism are caused by cirrhosis of the liver (13,000 per year). An alcoholic's life span is shortened by ten to twelve years. Recently, medical researchers have found evidence suggesting that excessive use of alcohol may also quietly contribute to certain kinds of heart disease, and that it `eventually damages the brain (see [sidebar: The Effect of Alcohol]).

In half of all murders in the U.S., either the killer or the victim--or both--have been drinking. A fourth of all suicides are found to have significant amounts of alcohol in their bloodstreams. People who abuse alcohol are seven times more likely to be separated or divorced than the general population.

The dollar cost of alcoholism may be as much as $15 billion a year, much of it from lost work time in business, industry and the Government.

At least half of each year's 55,500 automobile deaths and half of the 1 million major injuries suffered in auto accidents can be traced directly to a driver or pedestrian "under the influence." (In virtually all states, that influence is legally set at a blood concentration of .1% or more alcohol. A 150-lb. man can reach this level if he takes three one-jigger-- 1 1/2 oz. per jigger--drinks within an hour.)

Many of the deaths and injuries are caused, by the under-21 age group, and arrests of young people for drunken driving have skyrocketed since states began lowering the drinking age from 21. In the year following its lowering of the drinking age, for example, Michigan reported a 41% increase in such arrests.

But parents seem relatively unconcerned about their children's drinking. In fact, children who drink are often simply following the example set by their fathers and mothers. Teen-agers know that their parents make scenes if they catch them smoking marijuana. But if the youngsters come home drunk, most of them are merely sent quietly to bed. "Often when we report to a parent that his kid isn't acting the way he should and smells of liquor," says Don Samuels, a Miami drug-education coordinator, "the reaction is: Thank God! I thought he was on drugs." Actually many teenagers use both marijuana and alcohol.

The alcoholic tide has been pushed higher by the fast-selling, inexpensive pop wines, which disguise their alcoholic content with sweet fruit flavors. "Kids seem to look on the stuff as a zippy, sophisticated soft drink," says Houston's Bruner Lee, education director for the Texas Council on Alcoholism. "But this `kiddie stuff,' this pop wine, contains 9% alcohol--about twice as much as beer." After the pop wine phase is over, the kids often go on to much stronger drink.

Vanilla Extract. Most school officials are too embarrassed by the alcohol problem to do much more than reluctantly admit that it exists. One system that has faced up to it and conducted reliable surveys is in the suburban county of San Mateo, south of San Francisco. There, in 1970, school officials found, 11% of the ninth grade boys (13-and 16year-olds) said that they had drunk some kind of alcoholic beverage 50 or more times in the past year; in 1973 the figure had jumped to 23%. Among senior class boys (17-and-18-year-olds) the percentage of such relatively frequent drinkers rose during the same time span from 27% to 40%. Senior class girls drank less, but they are catching up fast: 29% said that they drank 50 or more times in 1973, compared with only 14% in 1970. Notes Paul Richards, an adviser at a San Mateo high school: "This school represents a socioeconomic background from welfare to upper middle class, and the drinkers come from all categories."

The under-21s are not the only ones who are drinking more. Reversing past patterns, which showed middle-aged men the most prone to alcoholism, there has recently been a marked increase in alcoholism among people in their 20s and 30s and among women. In the `50s, by National Institute of Mental Health estimates, on of every five or six alcoholics was a woman; the ratio is now one woman for every four men.

These figures may in fact be under-stating the problem for women, because a nonworking woman, who does not have to punch a time clock or stand scrutiny in the office, finds it easier than her husband might to hide her habit. One alcoholic housewife in Miami admitted stashing Clorets in every jacket pocket and downstairs drawer to disguise her liquor breath from unexpected callers. Others try to hide their alcoholic breath by sipping Listerine, Scope or vanilla extract.

In some places the ratio between men and women problem drinkers is already equal. For example, in Florida's Dade County (pop. 1,385,000), authorities estimate that there are 78,000 alcoholics--and almost half are women. At the Women's Alcohol Education Center in South West Miami, patients can relax in a pool or on a patio and their kids can play in a garage full of toys and live animals. The center is open from 9 a.m. to 11 p.m., and has a daily average of 18 women visitors.

Who is an alcoholic, and who is "merely" a problem drinker? The definition depends on the definer. Thus Mrs. Fred Tooze, head of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, maintains that an alcoholic is "anyone who drinks alcohol. As soon as they start to drink they're on that road downward." By that definition many of the researchers in alcoholism would be practicing alcoholics themselves.

Quantity consumed is only one criterion--and not necessarily the decisive one. "We see little old ladies who drink less than a pint a day who are dying," says Harold Swift, of the Hazelden Foundation's model treatment facility in Minnesota. "Yet we see men who go through better than a fifth a day and still function well."

An alcoholic does not necessarily know that he is an alcoholic. The stereotype of the stumbling, mumbling Bowery bum applies to no more than about 5% of the alcoholics in the U.S. Most alcoholics hold jobs, raise families, and manage to hide their addiction from everyone, often even from themselves. An alcoholic may go on for years, imbibing three martinis at lunch, two more on the way home and three when he gets there. One day, however, he may wind up in a hospital with a broken leg and, deprived of his daily quota, may suddenly find himself in the middle of the DTs (delirium tremens), which are characterized by extreme agitation, confusion and frightening hallucinations.

Social Custom. The National Council on Alcoholism, a voluntary health organization, has drawn up a checklist of 26 questions for drinkers. In its view, a yes answer to any one of them warns of possible alcoholism. Some of the council's questions: Do you drink heavily after a disappointment or a quarrel? Did you ever wake up on the morning after and discover you could not remember part of the evening before, even though you did not pass out? Do you try to have a few extra drinks when others will not know it? Are you secretly irritated when your family or friends discuss your drinking? Have you often failed to keep the promises you have made to yourself about controlling or cutting down on your drinking?

The Rutgers University Center of Alcohol Studies offers a more concise definition: "An alcoholic is one who is unable consistently to choose whether he shall drink or not, and who, if he drinks, is unable consistently to choose whether he shall stop or not." Yet the more researchers study alcoholism, the more complex they realize it is. There are, in fact, almost as many "alcoholisms" as there are alcoholics. Behavioral Scientist Don Cahalan of the University of California at Berkeley objects to even attempting a strict definition. Drinking, he says, is a continuum, and no one can draw an exact line between an alcoholic and a severely troubled drinker. "The issue," he states, "is why some people apparently waste their lives on alcohol while others don't. What's the 'glue' that binds some people to their alcohol problems?" Adds Marty Mann, the woman who founded the National Council on Alcoholism: "No one has ever found the way to turn a non-alcoholic into an alcoholic. There is a basic difference in people."

For those who are susceptible, U.S. society offers powerful temptations. Observes NIAAA's Morris Chafetz: "There are houses where they don't even say anything to you when you come in the door before they ask, 'What will you have to drink?'" He also notes that "in our crazy-quilt value system, masculinity means that if you can hold a lot of alcohol and seemingly not show its effect, that's somehow a sign of strength." Chafetz points out that in some other countries--Italy and Israel, for example--drinking is an accepted social custom, but there is little alcoholism. Why? The reason, he thinks, is that alcohol in those countries is a companion to a happy occasion, not the occasion itself.

Many other countries, however, have a much worse problem with alcohol than the U.S. France, for instance, has the highest rate of alcoholism in the world (an estimated 10% to 12% of the population, including some children), and the Soviet Union may not be far behind. Soviet newspapers now blame 60% of their country's murders, holdups and burglaries on that old demon vodka. Soviet Party Chief Leonid Brezhnev gave tacit recognition to the problem when U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger visited him recently. Discussing with Kissinger plans for a U.S.-built soft drink factory in the Soviet Union, Brezhnev mused: "Maybe we can teach our people to drink less vodka and more Pepsi-Cola."

Bad Reflection. Some experts believe that alcoholism may be encouraged by the destruction of traditional values. Buttressing this notion is the experience of the American Indians and Eskimos, whose cultures have been disrupted more than those of any other ethnic groups on the continent. "The major problem is one of social disintegration," says Dr. Charles Hudson, chief of psychiatric services at the U.S. Public Health Service's Alaska Native Medical Center. "The original social structure in many places in rural Alaska has been blown apart, much as it has been in central cities, the ghettos and Appalachia. The things that were important to people have been taken away, and when there's nothing to do, they'll take their last buck to get a bottle and stay drunk all the time."

Blacks and Chicanos are also particularly prone to alcoholism, possibly for similar reasons. Among whites, the Irish Americans probably rank highest on the alcoholic scale. No one can explain precisely why, although Irish American social life has often centered around the pub or bar, and heavy drinking has been a culturally accepted means for temporarily getting away from problems. Jews, by contrast, have a relatively low incidence of alcoholism, though it is rising among them too. Jews have always frowned on public drunkenness as being a bad reflection on their entire culture, and drinking has not been the accepted way to relieve problems ("Jews eat when they have problems," quips one Jewish psychiatrist in Manhattan).

Although alcoholism, when it occurs, often follows ten years or so of problem drinking, there are also alcoholics who apparently skipped even the social-drinker phase. They passed from total abstinence directly into chronic alcoholism. This may be due in some cases to a biochemical imbalance of some sort. "There have been people I call 'instant alcoholics' who are in trouble the minute they drink," says Marty Mann.

There may be some yet unknown hereditary factor that fosters alcoholism. Dr. Donald Goodwin, a psychiatrist at Washington University in St. Louis, studied the case histories of 133 Scandinavian men who had been separated from their natural parents and raised by foster parents. The sons of alcoholic fathers were four times as likely as the sons of non-alcoholics to be alcoholics themselves. Similar studies by Goodwin of twins raised by different families seem to offer even stronger support for some genetic explanation. Most researchers are reluctant to accept such biological determinism as the sole cause, but many agree with Goodwin that there may very well be some errant gene that makes at least some alcoholics more vulnerable than the rest of humankind to the bottle. "There is no one overall answer," concludes Don Cahalan. "We are trying to exorcise a devil, but there is no one devil. There is a host of demons."

There is also a host of treatment centers - 7,500 by latest count - and treatments.

Until recently, alcoholics were thought to be all incurable, afflicted with a kind of psychic leprosy. Doctors would scarcely touch them (many still refuse to treat them), and the law looked upon them as human vermin who had to be swept off the streets and thrown into drunk tanks. Old attitudes still persist, but within the past five years there has been a remarkable change in prognosis. No miracle cure, no equivalent of the Salk vaccine is in sight for the alcoholic, and none is ever likely to be found; but for every one of the many alcoholisms there is at least one treatment or combination of treatments that offers a good chance of cure.

The common element in most of the cures is group support. Explains Jim Bryan, director of therapy at Chit Chat Farms, a highly successful alcoholic treatment center west of Reading, P.: "We tell the patients it can be done and you don't have to do it alone. The patients help each other get well." Half the staff-including Bryan himself-are recovered alcoholics, providing even more credence to the support they give to patients during Chit Chat's 28-day, $840 treatment. "We do not look into the whys of their drinking," says Bryan, "but how can they stop."

No In-Depth Therapy. At Lutheran General Hospital northwest of Chicago, where the treatment runs 21 days and costs $1,827, there is also an emphasis on interaction between patients and staff and among the patients themselves. For most patients, there is no in-depth therapy. "We're off this kick of using psychotherapy," says Medical Director Dr. Nelson Bradley, a psychiatrist, echoing the general opinion of experts that classical psychoanalysis is of limited help for most alcoholics.

The patient at Lutheran General is treated for withdrawal symptoms-which can range from the shakes and hallucinations to convulsions and full blown DTs-and given a medical assessment during his first five days. On the sixth day he is assigned to one of three 25-patient teams. They meet three times a week-in many cases with wives, husbands, children and even employers-in sessions designed to bring the alcoholic back into society through lectures, educational films and discussions about drinking problems. Lutheran General follows up its patients for about two or three months, some of them with psychotherapy, and it estimates its success at about 50% after three years. "Beyond 50%," says Bradley, "you've got to have the involvement of the family and the employers. Then the success rate can go as high as 80%."

A variant of the Lutheran General and Chit Chat models is the treatment center that combines group therapy and hypnotic suggestion with a behavioristic kind of aversion treatment: electric shocks or drugs to make the very odor of liquor abhorrent. At Seattle's Schick's Shadel Hospital, which offers an eleven-day, $1,500 program, each patient is taken to "Duffy's Tavern," a small room decorated with enough bottles of whisky to lubricate a regiment. The patient is given a nausea-inducing shot and then handed a glass of his favorite brand. He sniffs the aroma, takes a sip and swirls it around in his mouth. Then, sickened, he spits it out into a handy container.

Fatal Illness. The patient goes through a similar process four more times during his stay at Schick's Shadel, at the end of which he will presumably associate nausea with liquor-and have a long-term aversion to the stuff. "Aversion conditioning is not fun at all," Schick's Shadel's Director Dr. James W. Smith tells incoming patients, "but you are dealing with a fatal illness. In other fatal illnesses, such as cancer, surgery is often called for if it gives the patient the best fighting chance for survival. At the moment this is the best we know of--the method that will do the best job in the shortest time."

Aversion therapy has been widely criticized. Says one social scientist: "I think doctors who emphasize aversion conditioning are misguided. They claim that they are curing alcoholics by giving them a shot in the behind, which makes them sick. But how long does that really last?" A program that draws even more fire is one in which doctors study alcoholism by *offering drinks to alcoholics. Indeed, Dr. Edward Gottheil, who oversees such a research project at the Coatesville Veterans Administration Hospital in Pennsylvania, admits that his work is "extremely controversial." Still, he argues, traditional centers either study alcoholics without their alcohol or alcohol without the alcoholics--but not drinking itself. `The idea that complete abstinence is the only treatment interferes with research," he says.

At Coatesville, patients are not only given individual psychotherapy, group therapy, music therapy and antidrinking seminars but are also allowed one or two ounces of pure alcohol (ethanol) once an hour on the hour, from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m., simply by asking for it. If he drinks the allowable maximum every hour, a patient can achieve a considerable buzz by 9 p.m. More important, 13 times every day he must make a conscious decision: to drink or not to drink. In a follow-up study of their first group, Gottheil and his associates claim that, after six months, approximately half of the group members were either dry or drinking less than twice a week.

Almost everyone else who works with alcoholics regards this study as heresy against the almost universally accepted belief that a recovered alcoholic can never drink again. "Out of 3,000 alcoholics treated at this hospital and another 12,000 consulted, I have never seen one return safely to social drinking," says Richard Weedman, head of an alcoholic treatment center at Chicago's Grant Hospital. "One drink won't push him off the wagon, but if he takes another three weeks later, bang! He's gone."

Most of the methods owe a large debt to Alcoholics Anonymous, the oldest, the biggest (650,000 to 750,000 members) and still the most successful organization by far for helping alcoholics. "Until the researcher is able to demonstrate some better practical techniques, the A.A. approach continues to merit our admiration and endorsement," says Gottheil. And, write Sociologists Harrison Trite and Paul Roman: "Despite lay leadership, A.A. has apparently achieved a success rate that surpasses those of professional therapies."

An A.A. member is anyone who considers himself a member. There are no required dues, and lest riches corrupt the fellowship, no one is allowed to contribute more than $300 per year. Instead of using professional therapists, the members help each other; one alcoholic is always on call to come to the aid of another. The treatment is nothing more sophisticated than the gathering together of a dozen or more other alcoholics who share their drinking histories and admit to themselves and each other that they are powerless to control their drinking. Members attend meetings as often as they feel the need. "My name is John," a member will intone at each meeting,

"and I am an alcoholic" Says an Atlanta executive who has been a member for 25 years: "I am deeply convinced that AA. is the only way. Doctors cannot cure alcoholism because it is not simply a sickness of the body.

Psychiatrists cannot do it because it is not simply a sickness of the mind, and ministers cannot do it because it is not a sickness of the spirit alone.

You must treat all three areas, and that is what AA. does." (If a member's physical problems are acute, A.A. gets him admitted to a hospital.)

Easy Cop-Out. Even A.A. requires the alcoholic's commitment to change. Many workers in the field are now trying to downplay the idea--espoused by Marty Mann 30 years ago--that alcoholism is a disease. The label may make problem drinking worse by absolving the drinker of responsibility. An over-emphasis on the psychological causes of alcoholism can have a similar effect. "A search for the roots of the personal problems that cause a person to become addicted can become an easy cop-out," says Psychiatrist Robert Moore. "The classic therapy game becomes a technique of protecting his alcoholism."

What about the alcoholic who does not want to change--or does not even recognize his problem? For many there is still no answer, no lifeline that can be thrown to them. For many others, however, there is new hope in an old and hitherto unacceptable technique--arm twisting by the boss. Recognizing that alcoholic employees are costing them countless billions a year, many companies are investing money and effort in affirmative action. Since the late '40s, when the first industrial programs started, some 200 firms, including General Motors, Hughes Aircraft and even Hiram Walker, the distiller, have jumped on the bandwagon, the majority of them in the past five years. Many of the firms have written the plans into their union contracts. Although the programs are costly, they actually save money in the long run because they can salvage valuable careers.

An alcoholic employee is absent 2 1/2 times as often as a non-alcoholic. Indeed, he is partially absent even when he is working, often without drinking. The industry could no doubt change its pitch--use older models and show people drinking only at parties--without cutting sales or profits.

Public Awareness. What else can be done? For a starter, the Nixon Administration should give Chafetz's agency the entire $137,947,000 it has requested for the coming fiscal year, instead of attempting to cut it to $99,800,000. The money would be well spent on research, training, community health services and public education. Second, the 30-odd states that have not yet removed drunkenness from the criminal statutes should do so, adding treatment centers and halfway houses on the Minnesota model. Third, more companies should start alcoholic rehabilitation programs, looking upon money spent combating alcoholism as almost an efficiency measure, which it certainly is.

How is the battle against alcoholism going? Again, there is good news and bad news--with an emphasis on the latter. Senator Hughes, who, more than anyone else, was responsible for the turnabout in the Government's attitude, is as good a judge as any. He is happy that tax dollars are joining the fight against alcoholism, and that the public is finally becoming aware that alcoholism is a treatable condition from which, with dedicated help, two-thirds or more of its victims can recover. But he sees even that as only limited comfort. "I'm not optimistic that we're gaining on the problem," he reckons, "Instead, it's gaining on us."

SIDEBAR: The Effects of Alcohol

Almost immediately after it hits the stomach, alcohol is coursing through the bloodstream to the central nervous system, where it starts to slow down, or anaesthetize, brain activity. Though it is a depressant, the initial subjective feeling that it creates is just the opposite, as the barriers of self-control and restraint are lifted and the drinker does or says things that his well-trained, sober self usually forbids. Only later, after a number of drinks, are the motor centers of the brain overtly affected, causing uncertain steps and hand movements.

How quickly the alcohol takes effect depends on many factors. One person may be bombed after a glass, while another stays relatively sober after several. Because alcohol is diluted in the blood, a 200-lb. man can usually tolerate more liquor than a 110-lb. woman. Food also retards absorption of alcohol from the gastrointestinal tract, and a few ounces taken with a meal are less powerful than an equal amount downed an hour before. By the same token, some drinks with food in them--eggnogs made with eggs, milk and cream, for example--have slightly less wallop than straight drinks. The tomato juice in a Bloody Mary or the orange juice in a screwdriver is not enough to make any appreciable difference.

The total quantity of alcohol in a drink and the rate of consumption determines the alcohol level in the bloodstream. Thus a Scotch and water would pack the same punch as Scotch on the rocks or a Scotch and soda if all three were drunk at the same speed; drinking more slowly gives the system a chance to eliminate some of the alcohol. The mixing of different types--beer, wine, whisky and brandy, for instance--might make a drinker sick, but it would not make him any more drunk than the same alcoholic measure of just one of these drinks.

So far medicine has found no cure for the hangover, although aspirin can alleviate the headache. Despite a plethora of folk cures (none of them really effective), the best policy is to avoid drinking in excess the night before. Actually, no one knows exactly what causes the hangover's unpleasant symptoms of headache, demonstrating much less efficiently than his non-alcoholic colleagues. If he is fired, the investment that the company has put into his training is lost altogether. "The company of any size that says it does not have an alcohol problem is kidding itself," says Ray Kelly, an Illinois state mental health official. In any typical group of workers,

3% to 4% are likely to be disruptive drinkers.

In the typical industrial program, a supervisor, noticing an employee's work slipping, alerts a counselor. If the counselor's investigation finds that alcohol is the culprit, he calls the man in and recommends a treatment-and-rehabilitation plan that falls under the company's medical insurance coverage. There will be no stigma attached if he enters the plan, the counselor tells him, and if he successfully completes it, his career will not be hurt. "If they do not want to go for treatment," says Jack Shevlin, an alcohol counselor in Illinois Bell Telephone's pioneering program, the answer is in effect: "Of course you do--if you want your job."

The results have been more than encouraging, and in most programs about 90% of the alcoholic employees do elect treatment. When a company puts its weight behind an employee's rehabilitation, the chances of success are better than 2 in 3, say doctors at Lutheran General, which works with 52 companies in the Chicago area.

Halfway Houses. Government at all levels has become sensitive to the alcoholic's plight--and the enormous damage that he wreaks. Since 1970, when Congress demonstrated Washington's changed attitude by passing an alcohol abuse and alcoholism act, a score of states have enacted laws that remove drunkenness (though not drunk driving) from the criminal statutes. Thus drunks are no longer put in jail. Other places, however, must be provided to receive them. These are called Local Alcoholism Reception Centers (or LARC), where the alcoholics are detoxified. They then graduate to "halfway" houses for outpatient treatment. Because LARC makes a strenuous effort to reach alcohol abusers early, the centers can usually help improve the physical condition, earning ability and family situation of their patients.

Sparked by Iowa's Senator Harold Hughes, who is himself a rehabilitated alcoholic, the Government has begun an expensive program to combat alcoholism through research, education and funding of local programs. Starting with $70 million in 1971, federal spending has now reached $194 million. Eighty-five percent of this amount is allotted to treatment, rehabilitation centers and halfway houses, many of which would no doubt still be only token efforts without substantial federal funding to the states.

The liquor industry has awakened to the problems that excessive use of its products causes. Some of the companies have been promoting moderation through advertising and posters. Seagrams, for example, last year spent $250,000 for hard-hitting magazine ads against excessive drinking. Licensed Beverage Industries, Inc., the public representative of the distillers, spends $150,000 a year on research projects and allots $250,000 each year for a national advertising campaign, promoting "responsible" drinking. (Know when to say when" is the theme of one ad. "If you can't stop drinking, don't start driving" is the message of another.) Last week liquor industry leaders and state beverage-control officials met in Miami with experts from the Rutgers Center of Alcohol Studies to consider other measures that could or should be taken. Jack Hood, board chairman of the National Alcoholic Beverage Control Association, told conferees of plans to use "the unmatched power of education to convince every American, young and old, that responsible drinking is the only kind that anyone should tolerate."

Still, for an industry that has revenues of $18.3 billion a year (after federal, state and *local taxes), such expenditures are probably only a fraction of what they should be. Contrasted with this are all the ads pitched toward the young, implying that not even a weekend in the country can be truly enjoyable nausea, depression and fatigue, which many drinkers experience at one time or another.

Some recent research indicates that even social drinking can have both immediate and possibly long-range deleterious effects on the body. According to Dr. Peter Stokes, a psychobiologist at Cornell University Medical College, the liver becomes fatty and therefore less efficient after only a few weeks of downing three or four drinks a night. But in the early stages, at least' the condition can be reversed by abstinence. More moderate imbibing--two drinks a night with meals, say--almost certainly does no harm to most people. New studies link drinking to heart-muscle damage and deterioration of the brain. Research by Dr. Ernest Noble of the University of California at Irvine shows that alcohol inhibits the ability of the brain cells to manufacture proteins and ribonucleic acid (RNA), which some researchers believe play a role in learning and memory storage. After 20 or 30 years, says Dr. Noble, two or three drinks a night on an empty stomach may impair a person's learning ability. Both Stokes and Noble cite studies showing premature and irreversible destruction of brain cells after years of heavy drinking.

Some frightening studies of the results of drinking have not yet been accepted throughout the medical profession, but the physical effects on an alcoholic of very heavy drinking are beyond dispute. A pint of whisky a day, enough to make eight or ten ordinary highballs, provides about 1,200 calories--roughly half the ordinary energy requirement--without any food value. As a result, an alcoholic usually has a weak appetite and often suffers from malnutrition and vitamin deficiency. The slack cannot be taken up by popping vitamin pills; heavy alcohol consumption impairs the body's utilization of vitamins. At the same time, excessive intake of alcohol also affects the production and activity of certain disease-fighting white blood cells, giving the alcoholic a particularly low resistance to bacteria.

Inevitably, the alcoholic develops a fatty liver, and his chances of developing cirrhosis, a condition of the liver in which liver cells have been replaced by fibrous scar tissue, are at least one in ten. A severely damaged liver cannot adequately manufacture bile, which is necessary for the digestion of fats; as a consequence, the alcoholic often feels weak and suffers from chronic indigestion. This may be made worse by gastritis, which is caused by alcohol irritation of the sensitive linings of the stomach and small intestine. The troubles of a heavy drinker do not end there, and through damage to the central nervous system and hormonal imbalance, alcohol may even cause impotence.

The Price of Alcoholism:

Five Case Histories

No one is a typical alcoholic, and the only thing all alcoholics have in common is their addiction. That fact was reemphasized by the reports of Time correspondents who interviewed many of them across the U.S. and Canada, including the following:

JOE, 52, an Atlanta stockbroker, began his career as an alcoholic at 15 when he went camping with his brothers. One of the boys opened a bottle of wine, and Joe instantly discovered his weakness. "That night was it for me," he says. "I went looking for a drink in the morning, and I drank all the way through high school. I was in the grip of an insidious, progressive disease." Joe continued to drink through Harvard and the service, but when he went home again his parents sent him to a hospital for "aversion therapy." "I stayed sober two or three months," he remembers. But for him, the aversion was only temporary.

Drinking, borrowing money, being arrested repeatedly, at 27 he was so far gone that he was not able to write his name. In December 1948 he went to Alcoholics Anonymous but fell of the wagon after only two months. In March he was back in A.A., and has been going to meetings ever since.

"People there welcomed me," he says. "My goal was to live. Survival, that's all. They told me that if I helped other people, I, would receive and be helped myself. A funny thing happened. I got better. In two or three months I was in better shape than I had been in for five years. I needed a miracle and got it. But it's not over yet. It won't be over until I die."

ELIZABETH, 44, a Manhattan advertising woman, was a fierce teetotaler because both her parents were problem drinkers. At 35, facing the prospect of a mastectomy, Elizabeth went to her psychoanalyst. The doctor proposed that she try a drink to calm her fears. "I'll never forget the feeling," Elizabeth says. "It hit me instantly. This was something I'd been waiting for without knowing it, and I never wanted to be without it again. I felt so warm and calm and safe."

It turned out that she did not have cancer, but she went on drinking anyway, "right around the clock." Although she sipped almost a fifth of Scotch a day, it did not seem to affect her work. "I never got really drunk' never had a hangover." One night while waiting for a date she took an extra slug of Scotch "to be bright and special." Instead she stumbled and cut her forehead on the mantel. Her date found her bloodied and bleary and walked out. This shocked her so much that she went to AA.

Elizabeth dried out for a while and then had a relapse, drinking more heavily than before. Finally she returned to the A.A. program, which she has followed successfully for five years. "Mine was one hell of a binge," she says, "and I consider my sobriety precious. I wouldn't do anything to jeopardize it."

JAY, 45, a Montreal journalist, says that he began drinking heavily "out of a sense of fatalism"; his father, mother and brother are all alcoholics.

"I turned into a chronic liar and charlatan, trying to cover up my affliction. I made raucous scenes and picked fights for no reason. I often wet my pants and vomited all over myself in public. I went to doctors and got tranquilizers, which I proceeded to combine with liquor, which made me even worse. I went to private clinics, public hospitals and even ended up in a mental home. I went to a priest and then to Alcoholics Anonymous. They were well-meaning people, but their piety seemed too facile to me, and I usually had to rush to the nearest bar every time I came out of a meeting. I was thrown into jail, mugged, and slept in the gutter. I stank' my gums bled, and my hands were too shaky to shave without a couple of drinks."

The turning point for Jay came when he awoke in a seedy hotel with the DTs. "My eyes were bulging from their sockets. My arms and legs flailed about like windmills. Then those black dots started spreading across the walls and ceilings, and I had to choke back a scream.

This was the point at which I finally decided I wanted to live, not die, and forced myself to go get cured."

The cure came at Toronto's Donwood Institute, where he went into group therapy and was put on a daily dose of Antabuse, a drug that causes nausea, palpitations and anxiety at the first whiff of liquor. To ensure his long-term sobriety, a six-month supply was implanted under the skin of his abdomen. "I finally walked out--cured, tingling with life and vigor and almost hypersensitively aware. But as I saw a bar, the craving hit me so hard that I bent double. Was this the way it was going to be all my life? The answer apparently is yes. The desire would fade, but somewhere--in the clink of glasses or the sight of good red wine--is the trigger. It is a trigger that I dare not pull."

BARBARA, 26, a Miami divorcee with two young children, started drinking when she was 13. "My mother was a heavy drinker," she says, "and we always had lots of liquor around the house." Married soon after high school, she became pregnant and--at doctor's orders--began downing a shot of brandy to help her sleep. "I didn't like the taste, but before my baby was born I was drinking half a bottle a night."

She and her husband eventually separated, and Barbara started to vary her drinking habits. "The kids were one and three, and I sipped wine while I prepared their lunch. Within six months, I went from a small bottle a day to a gallon, then on to martinis and Scotch. It could be blowing a blizzard, and I'd trek through anything to get my bottles."

"People are so drink-oriented," she adds. "It's the acceptable thing to do. You never go to a party or dinner without drinks." Guidelines morning or before driving--were discarded, and arrests for drunkenness began to pile up. Sent to a detoxification center after one eight-day binge, she sneaked out to a bar, then, at 5 a.m., accepted a ride back from one of the male patrons. He invited her to stop at his apartment for a drink. She had to fend off a rape attempt, suffering a broken jaw and scarring cuts on her face. "I thought I'd hit bottom before," she says through the wires that still hold her teeth together, "but now I realized that this was it."

After attending a Dade County alcohol rehabilitation center for the past three months, Barbara is sober and plans to remain that way. She fears, however, that her drinking may have permanently hurt her children. "They remember my wine-drinking days when I'd throw up in their wastebasket. Now if they see me drinking a Coke, my older girl will come over and taste it and then reassure the younger one: "It's OK."

BOB, 18, a New York City carpenter, started off on a bottle of Canadian whisky from the family liquor cabinet when he was twelve, and from that moment would drink whatever and whenever he could. "If it was beer, I laughed a lot. If it was wine, I would get very mellow. If it was whisky, I was sure to go wild and get into a fight."

Kicked out of school for fighting a guidance counselor in what he calls a "temper blackout," Bob was sent to Bellevue Hospital for a psychiatric examination. "At the nut house they told me I wasn't an alcoholic because of my age. I was told that if I handled my emotional problems, I would be able to drink normally." Bob nonetheless tried AA., not once but three times between binges. "I just hadn't decided that I wouldn't drink any more."

Finally the A.A. "cure" took when Bob was at the ripe age of 15. Sobriety has not been easy. A well-meaning social worker pressured Bob to take tranquilizers to relieve his tension. He refused. "If I did that," he asks, "then why not drink? I was tired of being told that (1) I'm alcoholic, and (2) I need to take tranquilizers to -survive. If I had taken drugs, I would have been in the nut house again in a matter of months."

to another not so long ago. I am an alcoholic myself and a member of A.A. for twenty-four years. My own success in the adventure of sobriety is bound up with the success of A.A. in Ireland. The object of this article is to tell something about "these fellows": what we are, what we try to do and what we have so far achieved. For we have found a knowledge and understanding of A.A. has made us friends and gained us helpers.

Up to comparatively recently, Society has placed all drunks in the same category - weak-willed, callous, helpless and unhelpable, intentional sinners, skeletons whose greatest offence is that they will not remain snugly in their family cupboards. Yet nearly everyone knows at least one person whose drinking has apparently almost without warning become incomprehensible. Men with good homes, money, good business or jobs, good reputations, healthy, in no way unhappy, suddenly go off the rails. Normal, seemingly, when not drinking, their characters undergo a complete change once they start on alcohol. Their former occasional "night-outs" develop swiftly into bouts, the bouts come closer and closer together. In many cases they are seldom completely sober. Their drinking is followed by periods of intense remorse, by sincere though short lived attempts to stay off liquor. Their relatives are in turn startled, puzzled, anxious to help, resentful, contemptuous, enraged. They themselves are at first sure they can find a way of retaining control "next time," then frightened when they fail repeatedly, then hopeless. Their complete ignorance of what has happened to them, what is still happened to them, what is still happening to them, makes it impossible for them to explain to, and gain the understanding sympathy of, those they love and respect. Little by little they cut themselves off from their world; they live in a state of desperate loneliness and finally become outcasts. These are the persons sometimes called the Problem Drinkers. They are, in fact, alcoholics or compulsive drinkers, suffering from a physical allergy to alcohol combined with a mental obsession to take more once they start to drink: drinkers whose compulsion to drink is a sign of disease. There are few alcoholics who have recovered who would deny that this disease is really spiritual.

A.A. is a loose knit society of men and women alcoholics who have banded together in groups all over the world to share their experience, strength and hope with each other, that they may solve their common problem and help others to recover from alcoholism. There are at the time of writing over 14,000 such groups, with a total membership of about 500,000 spread all over the world. The only requirement for membership is a sincere desire to stop drinking. A.A. is not allied with any particular religion, creed or denomination. It has nothing to do with politics, other organizations or any institution. A.A. simply minds its own business...to stay sober and help other alcoholics to achieve sobriety. Alcoholism is not a purely Catholic, Protestant or Jewish disease; it is not the exclusive illness of either the millionaire or the down-and-out. Alcoholism strikes at all creeds, class and income--grades impartially. A.A.'s success has largely derived from its refusal to recognize any difference between one alcoholic and another. They are all sick persons, requiring A.A.'s help. A.A. does not usurp the place of Church or Medicine. The alcoholic who joins in poor physical condition is strongly advised to consult his doctor. The alcoholic's religion, or lack of it, is his own affair. In general, it has been our experience that a good A.A. member becomes a better member of his Church. But our primary object is to achieve sobriety. From that sobriety the other things will stem; without it, they are impossible. A.A. is not concerned with money. It has nothing to sell and none of its members are paid for A.A. work. There are no positions of authority to be obtained; each member is on exactly the same footing. Its policy of anonymity does away with the danger of membership being used as a means of obtaining personal kudos. Thus the three most ordinary occasions of disunity and disruption are guarded against. Each group is autonomous. Its own members care for the necessary money to meet expenses of rent, printing and incidentals. Donations from outside sources are politely refused. Its officers are elected in rotation. Its policy of anonymity was first chosen as a worldly safeguard for its members; the spiritual value of anonymity has become more apparent since. But while personal anonymity is required, A.A. is only too glad of any publicity to its aims and being.

It came into existence thirty six years ago in America through a chance meeting between a New York stockbroker named Bill (in A.A. all members go by their first names), and an Akron doctor, Bob. Bill had already managed to keep sober for six months as the result of following out a few principles of living largely based on the Oxford Groups "Absolutes." He had, however, just had the bad end of a business deal and came to realize that to preserve his own sobriety he must make contact with another alcoholic and help him to achieve sobriety as well. Both of these men had long and dreadful histories of drink; but from that first meeting, they both remained sober. Bob died twenty-two years ago, but Bill lived till 1971, a total abstainer for over 36 years, after he had been given up as a hopeless and unhelpable drunk. The society they started that day grew slowly and shakily; it took over four years to muster the first hundred members. Since then it has grown in increasing tempo to its present size. In numbers it is still mainly American, United States and Canada. Twenty-nine years ago it was carried to Australia by a travelling American. Three years later, it came indirectly from Australia to Ireland, this time by a priest.

This priest was on holiday in Dublin in September 1946 and was interviewed by an evening paper on the subject of a Boy's Town with which he was connected in Australia. In the course of his talk he commented at length on the success that A.A. was having in Sydney and expressed the hope that Dublin would do well to take it up. This interview was read by a member of the Philadelphia group, an Irishman who had gone to live in the States, who was over here on holiday. Spurred on by his wife, he determined to start a group in Dublin, with the help of a doctor and by advertising, he managed to scrape together a small number of men willing to make the experiment. Their first public meeting was held in The Country Shop on November 25th.; and here on that night the first A.A. group in Europe was formed. As in America, the start was slow and uphill. Today it is firmly established in Dublin (35 Groups); there are many large groups in Belfast; there are several groups in Limerick, Cork and Galway, and smaller ones elsewhere. Public meetings are held every Monday night, still in The Country Shop, where attendance's range from 50 upwards to 100. The maximum attendance was at a meeting held in the Mansion House when over 400 came along to listen to the Co-Founder of the Society, Bill. At a conservative estimate, there are at least 2000 members in Ireland and an estimated 8,000 in England, Scotland and Wales. A good many others, though partially convinced, are not yet ready to make, and act on, the necessary admission that they are beaten by drink. A world estimate is that about 70% of those who join and give the A.A. program a fair trial recover, though a great many of these suffer one or more relapses before they finally settle down. A short time ago, I was asked at a clerical meeting to explain to them why an alcoholic went on drinking long after it was evident that he was incapable of exercising control. I find it almost impossible to do so. I can only say that for a very long period of my own thirty years drinking I honestly believed I could, someday and somehow, find a way of drinking all I wanted without losing control. Life without drink seemed to me to be an unnatural and quite impossible way of existence. Later I became dreadfully hopeless and fatalistic about it. Though I still continued to make attempts to pull up, I felt even at the time that they were quite useless. I felt it would start again sometime, so what was the use of trying too hard? The truth is that we don't know why we drink; but when we tell the truth, we are not believed. Strength of will and sincerity of purpose do not enter into it. I have entered my name for a Retreat to find help in Quitting drink, yet gone to that retreat with a bottle of gin in my bag, which I drank between the first exercise and going to sleep. After a month's voluntary treatment in a private home, I felt convinced I had mastered drink; and been drinking again within a few hours. Drink makes us mentally unbalanced and we cannot be honest even with ourselves for long at a time.

My own case history may be cited as typical of an A.A. member, though space will mercifully prelude any but the minimum necessary details. I am seventy-five years of age, single and come from a good class Catholic family. My home life was happy and I went to a Catholic College in England. Later I entered the profession I wanted to join; I was very happy in it, I got on well. I was good at games; I was considered good at work, above the average of my rank in the British Army. I had a promising future to look forward to, I had nothing from which to escape. There was no previous history of drink in my family. I can see no reason why I should have become an alcoholic, yet almost from the start I drank like an alcoholic. At first I had some sort of control over myself as to when I drank. If circumstances seemed to indicate the need for it, I cut out drinking without much effort and with no feeling of self sacrifice. But even in those first years if I drank at all I went on for the rest of the night. Soon I was losing even that control. I began to drink at the wrong times, in the wrong places and before the wrong people. Good luck and good friends covered up for me for many years, but finally life caught up on me and I was retired on retired pay, branded as not to be re-employed. This virtual dismissal made very little impression on me. I still had enough money for drink and I had a home to live in. Six more years were to pass before the climax came. I had been inflicting every kind of unhappiness not only on myself but on my parents, not the least for the latter being my complete indifference to my religious duties. In April 1947 they ordered me out of the house and the family and their lives. By now I had added drugs to alcohol. My routine had become one of the drugs in the morning to revive me, drink all day and another drug at night to give me sleep. My parents' "revolt" opened my eyes for the first time to where I had descended. It proved to be my own gutter. Fear for my security and at the prospect of becoming one of the legion of the homeless lost (with the next stop almost certainly a Night Shelter), at last made me genuinely willing in my own interest to do anything I could to stop drinking ("Give me back my Legions".). The trouble was that I could think of nothing useful. Doctors, homes, hospitals, promises, all had proved in vain. Then my memory went back to that interview I had read nine months before, about A.A. The Grace of God must have put it into my heart to go to a meeting that night, and I managed to strike a one-sided bargain with my parents that if A.A. could do some good I might stay at my parents on probation. I arrived at that meeting, more than half-drunk, shaking from drugs and nerves; not too good a prospect, even for A.A. By the goodness of God and the help He has sent me through A.A. I have not had another drink since then.

There is no set blueprint of recovery in A.A. Each member succeeds in his own way and time and at his own pace. So what I write must be taken as my own experience only. For me, recovery came from Knowledge, Decision, Group or social therapy, a return to Realism and the program of the Twelve Steps. All of these together for me make up the A.A. way of life. And I attacked my recovery problem in just that order, which seems to me to be entirely logical. Without Knowledge, I could not come to any decision that would stand up for long. Without Decision to recover, group therapy would be a waste of time. Without Realism I should have been continuing my old pattern of running away into dreamland from the inescapable facts of life. And while all these things were essential to me to stop drinking, I had to bring another factor into play, the Twelve Steps, to learn not only how to remain abstinent but to be happy in remaining so.

That Knowledge was elementary, though new to me. Alcoholism is a sort of disease acquired by two or three percent of the world's drinkers. The disease in simplifying language is the disease of not being able to drink in moderation. It is the first drink the alcoholic takes that sets his disease in active virulence, not the total quantity consumed. Alcoholism cannot be completely eliminated once it gains a footing. No matter how long I might remain abstinent at a time, I would never be able to control my drinking if I started again. But if I could find a way of not taking a first drink, I could stay sober and normal.

The decision I had to take was to give up drinking for good. I had to face the unpalatable fact that I must make abstinence my own first and most vital aim. As for the group therapy, I was prepared to accept that the older members had had to make themselves essential to their groups and the groups essential to themselves. If I was going to avail myself of the same means that they had found necessary and successful, it followed that I must attempt what they did. Group therapy to me does not merely mean coming together at stated times for formal meetings. These meetings are important for many reasons and as the visible sign of coherence. The equally valuable, though invisible, sign is keeping the closest possible touch with the members of the group even when they are not in actual physical contact. That can be done by constantly thinking about the group, working for it, praying for it; keeping it in mind as much as possible.

Reality consisted in recognizing that my alcoholic life must be cut down to a size I could hope to deal with. My disposition was such that if I continued to think of abstinence in terms of months or years, I would be pretty certain that nothing would be done. So I adopted the A.A. suggestion of living my life in periods of twenty-four hours at a time. Today, the only day in reality that I ever have at my disposal. From the beginning, I slowly advanced to being content to accomplish only what of the rest of my life I could fit into Today. That again required further realism to determine which things were of the most immediate importance to be done Today. But my primary reality will always remain concentrated on not taking one single drink Today.

Finally, the program of recovery, contained in the following Twelve Steps:

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.

6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.
12. Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps we tried to carry this message to alcoholics and practice these principles in all our affairs.

These steps seem strong meat for reforming alcoholics. It helped me greatly to remember that this program was not some optimistic chart for super-saints. It was based on the actual experience of human beings, alcoholics like myself. They were not impossibly idealistic steps; they had all been attempted by others successfully. It is sometimes said that all the steps are spiritual except the first. For me, the first step is also essentially spiritual. I could admit in words to myself that I was powerless over alcohol, but where would that take me unless that admission embraced not only the actual wording but also what was implicit in it? No, taking that step was a declaration to myself that because I sincerely wanted to recover, I was fully resolved to try to live out the way of life suggested in the following eleven steps.

The second step, too, called for determination. Here I could no longer avoid my spiritual life. I had to subdue my pride and acknowledge that a greater Power, God, was in complete control of my life. I had to strive to make God a daily living reality in my life, not a pious Sunday morning superstition. The third step was perhaps the hardest, relinquishing control and guidance of my life to God. But in the measure of the success I attained here would lie the measure of success I would meet with in continued sobriety, happiness and peace of mind. The fourth step was akin to our general confession. For me, that moral inventory was not a moral mudrake but a serious effort to find out about myself, to find what things stood in the way of my carrying out the third step. The fourth step taught me self-knowledge. We take an inventory of ourselves; we do not attempt to beat our neighbor's breast.

The fifth was only a practical application of the truism that confession is good for the soul. This and the next few following steps contain no great difficulty for the alcoholic who is sincere in his acceptance of the third. The tenth was our nightly examination of conscience with the added obligation of owing up to human beings when we were frankly wrong. The eleventh was a guide to our carrying out the third. The sting of the steps is contained in the tail of the Twelfth, that part which suggests we carry out the foregoing principles in all our affairs. Many may be willing enough to practice them in their alcoholic affairs. The older members had found out that this would not be enough to ensure happiness and a good conscience. This part of the steps is that which binds them all together. It cannot be ignored with safety.

It always remains important that we remember why we joined A.A. It was to recover our own sobriety for our own sakes; not to preach to the unconverted. That must remain our primary goal. We cannot afford to forget our previously helplessness when friends talk prettily of our apostolic mission. Charity begins at home.

Since A.A. has been operating there for longer and on a very much greater scale, the Church in America has had more opportunity to assess its work and direction. An extract from a letter received here from the Chancellor of a very large archdiocese will give some idea of the impression made. "The Bishops of our country up to now have not taken any official stand on A.A. The movement has not been condemned; the movement has not been officially approved. Personally I am convinced that the A.A. movement is the most sound and the most successful approach that has ever been made in our country to the problem of the alcoholic. In my archdiocese, I am under the impression that about one-half of its members at one time were Catholics. The Twelve Steps appeal to me as being entirely in harmony with the Catholic faith and morals, as being clearly stated religious and moral principles in language which is simple and easily understood. Honesty to oneself, humility, contrition, purpose of amendment, unburdening one's soul and accusing one's self of failing to another person, placing one's hope and confidence in God, making restitution, relying upon prayer and meditation, spiritual reading, seem to me to be sound and solid principles necessary for rehabilitation. The apostolic step to carry the message to alcoholics and to help others to rehabilitate themselves is also in conformity with Christian teaching and seems to be psychologically of utmost importance. Cases have come to my attention of priests who were victims of alcoholism being re-instated through A.A. A large number of lukewarm and indifferent Catholics have returned to an active practice of their faith; and strange as it may seem, several instances are known of non-Catholics who have been brought to the Catholic faith through the A.A. movement. .The Chancery has been very solicitous to avoid giving the impression that the archdiocese was trying to take over the A.A. movement or trying to take over the A.A. movement, or trying to interfere in either the organization or activities of the Group."

It may sound ungracious to stress the importance of that last sentence, considering that A.A. is looking for all the help the Church can give. But one of the biggest attractions to the prospective member is that he is joining a society of alcoholics run and controlled in every way by alcoholics. Any suggestion that the group was in some way controlled or unduly influenced by an outside "partisan" body, however benevolently disposed, would be bad news for the unity of the members. We seem to be forced into the ungenerous position of having to say to our outside helpers:

"Please do all you can for us; but stay in your corner until we want you."
In truth, we are only guided by our experience, which is that one alcoholic is the best ambassador to another. We speak the same language, a language that cannot be entirely understood by even the most sympathetic of our friends who is not himself an alcoholic.

What we ask from priests who have a will to help us is that they will be content with steering alcoholics towards us and that they will be willing to stand aside when they have done so; that they will, even though perhaps with every conscious effort, try to understand that the alcoholic is not, in his present condition at least, a deliberate sinner but a very sick person requiring experienced treatment; and that they will examine our successes rather than our failures, for our successes are being gained in a field considered hopeless until recently. And we ask them, too, not to look on us as rivals to any temperance movement already sponsored by them. We are not in competition with anyone or anything.

A.A. is not a charitable society in the sense that it engages to supply its members with loans of money, employment or even clothes for which it has no further personal use. It is a charitable society in the meaning of Christ's teaching. We ask for nothing material for ourselves personally or as groups. We do ask for charity for the sick alcoholic; sympathy for his problem; understanding of his condition and a willingness to advise him to seek recovery where so many thousands have already found it. A.A. is in no way a substitute for the Sacraments"; it has proved to be in most cases of Catholic alcoholics a positive urge towards them. It is with confidence then that we ask for the good will of the readers of The Furrow and for their prayers - that those of us who have recovered may maintain our sobriety and that the Grace of God may bring our members and their families that happiness which is the end of man.

The Vatican and Alcoholics Anonymous. A Dublin member of Alcoholics Anonymous, 23 St. Stephens Green, Dublin 2, writes:

Archbishop Enrici, Apostolic Nuncio to Great Britain, came to, and spoke at the recent European Convention of A.A. held at Bristol at the end of September last. Afterwards he made the suggestion that, as he believed little was known at the Vatican about A.A. and its suggested way of recovery, a visit from a couple of its members might be of great value to both parties.

Accordingly, in January of this year, an English Catholic member and I departed for Rome and remained for a fortnight. Our only contact, up to the time of our arrival there, was through the Bishop of Clifton, the very recently appointed rector of the English College. But through his generous guidance we obtained a list of those he thought we should try to contact. And through the kindness of the Irish mother superior of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God at Mater Dei Convent (they have a sister house in Raheny, Dublin), we were lent the services of an Italian-speaking nun to help us to effect the necessary approaches by telephone. We acknowledge with deep gratitude that all of them, very willingly and at very short notice, agreed to make the appointments which enabled us to carry out the program given briefly as follows:

Talks given to the students and staff of the English, Irish, Beda, Scottish and North American Colleges.

Reception by Mgr. Uylenbroek, Secretary of the Council of the Laity.

Reception by Cardinal John Joseph Wright, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy.

Reception by the Superior General of the Society of Jesus, Very

Rev. Father Arrupe, S.J.

Reception by the Servants of the Paraclete.

On January 19, we had the supreme honour of being received by His Holiness Pope Paul in private audience. The Pope graciously greeted us not only for our own sakes, but for the work we were engaged on (i.e. Alcoholics Anonymous), which he described as fine work, a real apostolate. He urged us to press on with our work, gave it his blessing and told us that he would keep it and us in his prayers.

The granting of this private audience went far beyond our dearest dreams and was a most wonderful experience for us both. It was, too, a historic event in the thirty-six--year history of our fellowship, being the first

Canadians over the age of twenty there were 2,190 alcoholics; in 1973 there were 3,850. Alcoholics, specifically male alcoholics - may be defined as those who consume more than fifteen centiliters of absolute alcohol every day, which means about fourteen ounces of whisky, thirty-two ounces of wine, or nine bottles of beer. Another index, the sale of alcoholic beverages, is equally discomfoting. The total annual volume sold in Canada increased, of course, is accounted for by our growing number of youthful drinkers. In the United States the Director of the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and alcoholism has informed us that the number of American teenagers who get drunk has doubled over the past twenty years.

Encouraging male teenagers, at least, is the persistent macho image around drinking. If the thought of a man's drinking heavily were disgusting, Dean Martin would never come on as a lush. But the thought is not disgusting. A "hard drinking" man is still a slightly romantic figure, usually, "hard living" and "two fisted" as well. (Although, curiously enough, belligerent drunks are usually timid and rather submissive when sober.) Women have no such encouragements, since a hard-drinking woman has never been a charming figure in popular mythology - she's either sad and lonely or somebody like a rich heiress in a Palm Beach mansion with a voice like Lauren Bacall's. (This does not prevent women from drinking, of course, but it may inhibit them from seeking treatment - it is only in the past year or so, for example, that woman have been joining Alcoholics Anonymous in numbers nearly equal to men.)

Alcoholism may be our largest drug problem, then, not only because it is the most readily available drug in our society, but because our culture seems to have an ambivalent attitude towards alcoholism. Drunkards are disgusting, but on the other hand boys will be boys - if you're an Irishmen and a poet, for example, it's almost obligatory to be a boisterous and winning drunk. In some special grows I like the Canadian Armed Forces, or teenagers in northern mining towns, heavy drinking is so much a part of expected behaviour that an abstemious drinker, not to mention a teetotaler, runs the risk of being an outcast.

Even when drinking is not openly encouraged, it is still fatally easy, in all social groups, for a man or woman to become an alcoholic without ever becoming noticed as a person with a problem. The alcoholic, unlike the junkie or the speed freak, can indulge his vice in the best social situations and still fit in like the priest at the Communion breakfast. These people are often the "functioning alcoholics" - Men and women whose daily consumption of alcohol is well above those fifteen centiliters, but who still have their families, their high-salaried jobs, their position in society. They don't fall into alcoholic stupors, they never even become involved in loud alcoholic scenes. They're not drunkards - most people, including themselves, would never think of them even for a moment as alcoholics.

Sooner or later, however, they run into problems. A successful thirtyish lawyer, say, wakes up in the middle of the night in a state of approaching panic. He goes downstairs, notes the car parked in the garage, the children sleeping in their rooms, the lights off in the kitchen and the living room. Only one thing keeps troubling him; he cannot remember going to bed. He remembers the party he attended, but he doesn't remember driving home in his car, coming into the house, taking off his clothes, and climbing into bed. He has suffered a "black-out", a mild case of amnesia.

As time goes on, he notices he suffers more and more of these blackouts. He knows that it is a warning sign that he is drinking too much, that he may, in fact, be an "alcoholic." But he can always brush this thought aside. An alcoholic is a woman who spends all day in bed with a bottle, who has spare mickeys of gin hidden in the breadbox. Alcoholics are men like the character Jimmy Cagney played in some movie from the 1940's, sweating and writhing on the floor from a bad case of delirium tremens. Alcoholics are not like him, a responsible person who plays bridge, goes to the Caribbean on skin diving holidays, and never gets drunk.

Of course he would have to admit that by the time eleven A.M. rolls around he becomes a little restless in his office, waiting for lunchtime and a few officially sanctioned martinis. And in mid-afternoon he usually rewards himself for a hard day - or consoles himself for a rotten one -with a few drinks from the built-in bar in his office, and then goes home and has a drink or two before dinner, and then, while he's getting dressed for a party, he has another one, and of course at the party knocks back a few, and coming home afterwards treats himself to a stiff nightcap. If he counted up all those centiliters of absolute alcohol on his pocket calculator, starting at lunchtime, he might indeed come up with an alarming figure, but who bothers to count? The important thing, really, is that he's steady on his toes -he'll start to worry about his drinking when he slobbers on the hostess and walks around with a lampshade on his head at parties.

The warning signs are by now well known, but they are easily ignored by people like this lawyer. He usually has powerful rationalizations on hand to quiet the doubts. If he gets really jittery he can go on the wagon for a couple of weeks and absolutely, definitely, prove to himself that he has no problem with liquor. (Ignoring the fact that during these two or three weeks he is always mindful of the reward in store for him when he hops off the wagon - ignoring, too, the tranquilizers he turns to now and then to help him over the dry spell.) Usually such people continue for years before they start descending the long alcoholic slide into more serious drinking -when their work definitely does suffer and their family starts to fall apart from the general unhappiness solidifying into outright misery. It's a melodrama too familiar, by now, to recount in detail.

But it is still a North American melodrama that increasing numbers of people regularly play out. The cost to society is staggering. (A billion dollars a year to the Canadian people, according to the LeDain Commission of Inquiry into the Non-Medical Use of Drugs.) Nobody is sure how to ease this cost. And the suspicion keeps arising in people who have to deal with the problem that the epidemic of alcoholism, frightening though it is, may be just the most noticeable and dangerous form of addiction in a society of many widespread addictions. In the end, all addictions - whatever their source - may be alike.

This point will become more important in future considerations of alcoholism. If it generally accepted, the social view of alcoholism will doubtless be revised - revised a second time. The first great revision occurred sometime in the 1930's with the establishment of Alcoholics Anonymous. A.A. was heavily responsible for spreading the notion that alcoholism was an illness, and that drunkards were not primarily moral failures who succumbed to the bottle through lack of willpower but sufferers from a mysterious but very real disease, perhaps an "allergy" to booze or a metabolic imbalance or a chemical deficiency of some kind in the body. This was an entirely commendable achievement on A.A.'s part. In effect, it immediately raised the status of alcoholics, at least in respectable circles. But the A.A. view also raised a few questions. There is still no way you can predict whether a child will have trouble with alcohol from a biochemical examination of his or her body. And, practically speaking, A.A. itself treats alcoholism more as a spiritual dilemma than a disease. (The key notion of A.A. is that the first step towards recovery for any alcoholic lies in his admitting that he is powerless over alcohol, and that only a reliance on a Higher Power - sometimes referred to as a Power greater than ourselves - can restore sanity to his life.)

There were certain consequences of this view. One of the consequences was that alcohol itself became kind of personification of evil for the alcoholic - a force in itself that has taken hold of the sufferer's life like a plague bacillus and will not let go. As a writer in the Big Book, a kind of operating manual for A.A. says; "Remember that we deal with alcohol - cunning, baffling, powerful." Other consequences are an insistence that an alcoholic can never take another drink as long as he lives (the fatal-glass-of-beer syndrome) and the general feeling that many alcoholics cannot free themselves from this disease - this enticing, relentless disease until they hit "rock bottom."

Today most theorists of alcoholism don't even bother to debate the question of whether alcoholism is a disease; when not even medical doctors seem able to come up with an acceptable definition of "disease." It hardly seems a fruitful topic for debate. That some of the implications that have been widespread because of the general selling of alcoholism as a disease are now being challenged-the implications, chiefly, that a return to controlled drinking is always impossible for a true "alcoholic," and that a man cannot free himself from the "disease" of alcoholism until the abyss beckons and he realizes that spiritual means are the only means left to fight it. Perhaps the most important implication being challenged is that there is something in the nature of alcohol itself - the "subtle ease." as A.A. writers call it - that causes addiction. If this idea is false, reasons those who question it, the possibility arises that alcoholism may have the same roots as the behavior of a person who deals with life by "TVing it," getting glued to his set for forty hours a week -or, for that matter, a person who goes on eating binges.

The people who are leading the attack on these very beliefs, and thereby intending to revise accepted notions of alcoholism, are those Trojans of the rat labyrinths, the behavioral psychologists. In a way it is inevitable that they would stake out pieces of turf traditionally associated with groups like A.A. The Alcoholics Anonymous approach - heartfelt, exhortatory, spiritual-was bound, sooner or later, to clash with the clinical, empirical human-engineering approach of the psychologists. Nobody denies that A.A. has been the most effective group by far in dealing with alcoholics, and its unlikely that any government or private program in the foreseeable future will help alcoholics give up their dependence on alcohol to the extent that A.A. has done. But ours may be a time when the most significant contributions to understanding alcoholism will come from other than A.A.

To the clinical psychologists alcoholism is not a medical problem but a learned behavior. "The way most psychologists would view excessive alcohol consumption," says Howard Capell, a psychologist at the Addiction Research Foundation of Ontario, "is that, for whatever reason, it's something that's learned, just the way a lot of other things are learned, and that in some sense it's an adaptive response. A lot of people think that what it's adaptive to is conditions of stress, and that what alcoholics are really doing is medicating themselves for anxiety." This in spite of the fact that it has been clinically demonstrated that large quantities of alcohol actually make a person less able to handle tension, stress or anxiety. (But of course, the first few drinks always do seem to lighten a man's load - the only problem being that a man who depends heavily on alcohol for this purpose never knows when to stop.)

In this view, alcohol is a kind of problem solving technique that is too easily and too accessible - despite its disastrous consequences - for the person to give up, once he has learned to depend on it. Dr. Martha Sanchez-Craig, who formerly directed a residence for alcoholics in Toronto for the Addiction Research Foundation speaks passionately for this view and its efficacy in treating alcoholics. It is a view that does, in its own way, invest the alcoholic with a certain amount of dignity. "Look," she points out, to say "you have a problem is very different from saying You are sick." To say, "everybody has problems, but you, unfortunately, have discovered alcohol." "You would feel more comfortable in knowing that you and I are not different. You have problems, I have problems, everybody has problems. But you have discovered alcohol."

Dr. Sanchez-Craig tried a simple experiment to shed some further light on the uses of this problem solving technique. "I sat with numerous people and asked them to describe in very specific terms the last time they drank in excess. This had to be in specific terms -I held them to that. Second, I asked them how they felt about the event. How did they interpret it? How did they come to a decision to drink? How did they rationalize it? How did they feel the alcohol was going to function? Ninety-five per cent of the respondents, according to Dr, Sanchez-Craig, were reacting to what she termed, using the odour-free language of the social sciences, an "aversive" social situation - where the boss picked on them, or their lover walked out them. "They were feeling depressed, lonely, anxious - the negative feelings. The thinking was rigid and catastrophic. They would think. This woman has rejected me. Therefore no one will ever love me. I will be alone for the rest of my life."

That people will turn to booze when they feel hit hard by life, or when they succumb to what the A.A. folks term "stinking thinking" -the low, sweet descent into despair and self-pity - is hardly news and yet if alcoholic behavior can be traced back, as Dr. Sanchez-Craig and other psychologists feel it can, to this kind of habitual response, gradually imprinting itself on the nervous system of an alcoholic -the response of seeking relief from painful situations in the soothing touch of alcohol - then it may be possible to imprint new responses, new awareness of different choices, on that same nervous system. Alcohol itself is not the problem. It could just as well be Valium the alcoholic loved, if that alcoholic had grown up in a culture where there were two or three Valium bars on every city block. Alcoholics, or "problem drinkers," once they are taught new responses to the painful stimuli that drove them to drink, could conceivably even learn to drink moderately again.

This suggestion infuriates many workers in the field of alcoholism who feel that one of the greatest enemies of the recovering alcoholic is the delusion he often cherishes that one day he will be able to drink again - drink again and handle liquor like a gentleman. For alcoholics one drink will always be too many and a million not enough. But sometimes the issue of just who is, and who is not, an alcoholic becomes almost metaphysical in its elusiveness and remoteness from specific, concrete touchstones. A.A. for example, insists that any "alcoholic" who subsequently learns to drink moderately and never goes on a binge for the rest of his life was not a true alcoholic in the first place - a formulation that obviously begs the whole question.

Part of the problem is that most alcoholics do not seek any form of treatment until they are in their forties, in which case they've usually had about twenty hard-drinking years behind them. If you have been drinking heavily for that long, your brainstem is pretty-well shell-shocked anyway, and obviously not capable of resisting the lure of those first few drops of Alcohol. The critical question revolves around young people in their twenties who are clearly on the road to alcoholism. Dr. Gordon Bell, president of the Donwood Institute in Toronto, a hospital that treats mostly alcoholic patients, concedes that "many of the patients we've had, had they been fortunate enough to come to us much earlier, would have had another alternative besides total abstinence. "If a program of teaching controlled drinking were ever launched successfully, it would have a great deal more impact on this group of budding young alcoholics than programs that had total abstinence as their only aim.

Dr. Sanchez-Craig, who is very much interested in such a program of controlled drinking, insists that people who enrolled in it would have to meet very definite criteria - they would have to be young, intelligent, in good health, strongly motivated to overcome these drinking problems, and strongly attached to things like jobs or families they knew they stood to lose from chronic heavy drinking. No one who has been abstinent for any length of time, even somebody who was under thirty, would be submitted into the program.

The concept of controlled drinking for "problem drinkers" is one fruit of the approach to alcoholism that treats it as a learned response rather than a disease. Another fruit is the concept of "constructive coercion" wherein alcoholics are confronted by their employers or their spouses or someone else, who threatens them with severe consequences if they don't enter treatment for their alcoholism. According to this concept, you don't have to wait for the alcoholic to recognize one morning, through the mist of his pain, the awful unmistakable image of his utter helplessness. This coercion implies, in a way, that alcoholism is no big deal. It is based on the premise that people, unless their nervous systems are completely warped, will respond the way you want them to when you make it absolutely clear to them what they have to do and what will happen to them if they don't do it. Clinical psychologists tend to feel that if you could just apply constructive coercion to the alcoholic on a daily basis you would have the means once and for all to reduce or eliminate his drinking problems. Arrange it so that the spouse has to spend fifteen minutes in an isolation booth before he can take a drink, things like that; a few "behavioral interventions" imposed upon him. Enough behavioral intervention and you've probably got the problem licked, supposing the subject is not too far gone at the start of the project.

Of course this means that you've got to have many allies, agents so to speak, in your struggle to tinker with the environment of the individual alcoholic. Dr. Capell sums up the perspective of the behavioral therapist in this way; "When you start to talk about effective individual interventions you're probably going to end up having to think of ways to intervene that involve more than just interaction between a patient and a therapist. Rather we'll have to recruit the environment. It's probably the case, as with most things, that effective treatment will involve more than one approach to the same individual but my basis is that behavioral interventions of the type that experimentally oriented psychologists advocate look like the way to go.

had by nibbling at the raw fruit that Eve insisted he try.

All sorts of people, from philosophers to stew-bums, have argued both sides of the alcohol question since the dawn of civilization. One can cite volumes of authoritative opinions to support either view, pro or con. Even the Bible doesn't give much help. Take your choice:

Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging.

-Proverbs XX., 1

Drink no longer water, but use as a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities.

-I Timothy v., 23

Woe to them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink.

Isaiah v., 11

Drink thy wine with a merry heart.

- Ecclesiastes ii,13

Today, in the light of modern science plus the accumulated wisdom of the ages, we know a lot more about alcohol and human nature than did Adam and his immediate descendants. But despite the millions of dollars and the millions of laboratory man-hours spent on research, the basic cause and cure of what we call alcoholism are still no more known than those of the common cold. Learned authorities can't even agree on whether it's a disease or a state of mind.

We drinkers have enjoyed a brief respite from the pointing finger, since the Demon Cigarette has taken the spotlight away from poor old John Barleycorn as the nation's Number One health menace.

But the hard fact remains that some 19.5 million American males and females, or about 10 per cent of the total population, are what the medicos politely call alcohol-dependent-and five per cent, or about 9.7 millions are real bottle-nursing alcoholics. That's a lot of luses, brother! We spend from 11 to 12 billion dollars annually on alcohol, and its consumption is constantly on the increase. The alcoholic population of New York State, to take just one example, is growing by 20,000 annually.

Spurred by statistics on the dangerous upcurve of alcoholism and its attendant evils of broken lives, broken homes, lost jobs, lost work-hours, crime, traffic fatalities and all the rest, more and more attention is being paid of late to finding ways and means to stamp out or at least cut down this ancient and costly social blight.

Fortunately, we've advanced quite a way and become a bit more mature since the nave days of little more than a generation ago, when the tragic Volstead Act was voted into law with the starry-eyed idea that National Prohibition, the "noble experiment" that fizzled, would be the cure-all for drunkenness.

We've also progressed a mite since the times of the fire-and-brimstone temperance crusaders, when Carrie Nation, the terror of bartenders in the Gay Nineties, used to smash up saloons with an axe.

Today's more enlightened reformers, by and large, no longer insist on throwing out the baby with the bath water. From banning all booze at the source, the emphasis has shifted toward eradicating the abuse of the right to drink. The spotlight is on treating and trying to cure the individual "alcoholic," and the immediate tactical target is to find out just what makes him tick.

State, federal and local government health and welfare agencies, big private foundations, universities, medical and sociological research groups, and nationwide industries-including even a segment of the liquor industry-have teamed up in a concerted and determined drive on alcoholism. The current campaign is sparked not by moral ideals but by the cold, businesslike realization that there is simply no place nor time for the bumbling drunkard in today's stepped-up Space Age economy. He costs society too much. He can no longer be coddled. He has to go.

The California State Legislature at this writing is near final passage of a bill greatly expanding and reorganizing the state's Alcoholic Rehabilitation Program. The McTeer Bill, considered a model for other states, sets up a special Division of Alcoholism under the Department of Public Health, and provides increased state financial support for locally-operated alcoholic clinics. The long range plan contemplates "comprehensive and integrated local programs, subject to State Health Department approval, for the prevention, treatment and control of alcoholism."

Research labs are probing deeply into the problem of the problem drinker. Not long ago, University of California scientists spent 14 adventurous days pouring large quantities of vodka down the not unreceptive gullets of two "volunteers," recruited through an employment office with the guarantee that they were 100-proof alcoholics. EEG recordings of the subject's brain-waves, while apparently in a drunken stupor, showed that behind their closed eyelids, their brains were "teeming with ideational activity"-the antithesis of the supposed sedative effect of alcohol.

A research team in the VA's psychopharmacology Research Lab at Sepulveda,

California, recently used 70 stray cats in an experiment to determine the effects of alcohol on different personality types. Both the "anxious-withdrawn" and the "out-going-aggressive" types of kitties were quickly put to sleep by a moderate dose of grog, while the felines classified as "normal" stayed perfectly alert on the same amount, and "often seemed to take more interest in their surroundings."

Similar studies are going on all over the country—notably at Rutgers, Yale, and several other universities. It was recently proposed that the federal government should put a special bottle tax on liquor, the revenue to be earmarked for "organized research on alcoholism including all its aspects."

Amid all this furor of concern over the Anti-Social Behavior of the American Drunk, and the conflicting theories on the nature of "alcoholism" itself, one constant factor has come into more and more prominence in the past decade or so; the phenomenal success of Alcoholics Anonymous in rehabilitating thousands of men and women who had been given up as hopeless.

Started in Akron, Ohio, in 1935 by a New York stockbroker and an Akron physician who had lick his own drinking problems by achieving a spiritual rebirth, AA now numbers more than 300,000 members through-out the world. As of 1963, there were over 10,000 local AA groups in 80 countries—most of them, of course, in the U.S.

A.A. is described as "a fellowship of men and women who share their experience, strength, and hope with each other, that they may solve their common problems and help others to recover from alcoholism. The only requirement for membership is a desire to stop drinking. The primary purpose is to stay sober and help other alcoholics achieve sobriety."

While it includes members of all religions and many of no religion at all, AA's basic concept is a religious one in the broadest sense. The alcoholic, according to the AA book, must start with the First Step: admitting that he is "powerless over alcohol, that his life has become unmanageable." Secondly, he must come to the belief that only "a Power greater than himself" can "restore him to sanity."

If the would-be AA doesn't sincerely feel these convictions deep down inside, he is fooling nobody but himself; he has little hope of advancing to the Twelfth and final Step, which is: "Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs."

AA's spectacular success in weaning several hundred thousand lushes away from the bottle and returning them to normal productive lives is a fact that can't be disputed. Admittedly neither medicine, psychology, nor organized religion can boast anywhere near such a record.

However, another indisputable fact is that a great many more thousands of drinking people, even though they realize their problems and seek help, shy away from AA because of its "cold turkey" insistence on total abstinence, on complete surrender of one's former bibulous ways. This is basic with AA; it's a foregone conclusion that you can't hope to follow the program and are wasting your time, unless you give up drinking entirely, for good and all.

And now, to further complicate the picture, comes a scholarly team of top-level psychiatric researchers from the University of Cincinnati College of Medicine, with the news that their study definitely shows that some alcoholics can be cured - rather than merely "arrested" - which is all that AA claims to do. In other words, there is a "Thirteenth Step."

The quasi-mystical belief that no recovered alcoholic can ever again take a drink safely without hitting skids was challenged by Drs. E. Mansell Pattison, E.B. Headley, L.A. Gottschalk and G.C. Gleser, in a report presented to the 121st Annual Meeting of the American Psychiatric Association in New York a few months ago. (The first three named are MD's the fourth a Ph.d. Dr. Pattison who read the report, is now a Research Fellow of the National Institute of Mental Health in Washington).

Their block-busting research paper, modestly entitled The Relation of Drinking Patterns to Over-all Health in Successfully Treated Alcoholics, was based on a painstaking and thorough fellowship study of 32 patients at the Alcoholism Clinic, Division of Mental Health, Cincinnati Health Department. The implication, of course, is that the 32 men picked at random for study are typical of many thousands more, both men and women.

"An untested assumption," the doctors said in their preamble, "is that the successfully rehabilitated alcoholic can never drink again, and that he is not successfully rehabilitated if he is still using alcohol. A clinical report by Davies in 1962 on the return to normal drinking by eight addictive alcoholics was followed by a furor of published protests of disbelief.

"Subsequently Pattison reviewed the evaluative literature on alcoholism treatment and found seven clinical reports which described groups of treated alcoholics who had returned to some degree of successful drinking.

"In light of these clinical findings, this study was designed to test the hypothesis that successfully treated alcoholics who engage in non-pathological drinking are as healthy mentally, socially, vocationally, and physically, as abstinent ex-alcoholics."

Note that the report deals with "non-path-ological" drinking. This means that ex-patients who returned to compulsive drinking, or got into self-destructive predicaments again by their drinking, were not counted as "successes."

The sampling on which the study was based consisted of 32 male alcoholics discharged as "improved" from the Cincinnati Alcoholism Clinic during 1962-63; all these patients were seen for 10 or more psychotherapy sessions and had been discharged at least one year.

(The sample was drawn from a total of 252 discharged patients. Not included were patients discharged from treatment less than one year before the follow-up study - because checkups had indicated that "the probability of loss of abstinence is highest during the first six months after discharge, and that after the first year, adjustment appears fairly stabilized.")

Complicated scales were set up to assess the various aspects of physical health, interpersonal health, and vocational health, from interview data; a "drinking scale score" was devised to reflect drinking quantity, behavior, and consequences. As the study progressed, the following sample was divided into three groups: abstinent, normal drinkers, and pathological drinkers. Some improvement was found in all three groups; the abstinent and the normal drinkers naturally had improved more than those who had returned to pathological tipping.

From the mass of data accumulated, the following case reports, among others, were cited as typical of patients who had returned to normal drinking:

Case No. 1. This 36-year-old white male machinist had drunk heavily since he was a teen-ager. Although he worked steadily, his drinking became a compulsive daily routine. His job was threatened and his marriage disrupted. He was seen in individual therapy in the Clinic for over two years, during which time he worked out the divorce from his first wife and remarried. He was interviewed two years after termination.

He was happy with his new wife and young children, but wished that he could provide more for them. He paid alimony for his first family, which he felt was just. He described his drinking as definitely changing in pattern during the course of therapy. He now drinks about once a week and never experiences any compulsion to drink more. However he occasionally feels like drinking when he feels depressed over finances. He felt that the Clinic had helped him to see his problems and work them out.

The next case was a bit more complicated, and went deeper into the roots of the subject's drinking:

Case No. 2. This 30-year-old white male mechanic had drunk heavily for 10 years. He felt that his alcoholism had started when he was a lonely teen-ager in the Army. He went AWOL to marry his fiance, and afterward was plagued by guilt and shame over his desperation and anger at his wife for seducing him away from the Army duty. For the past six years he had been unable to work steadily because of his heavy drinking, and marital quarreling had led to their separation at the time he came to the Clinic. He was depressed and suicidal.

He was first seen individually and then jointly with his wife for a total of 20 interviews. He and his wife felt that they had learned to talk to each other and resolve long-harbored grudges. He had always felt inhibited but now felt able to express himself. Although he had stopped drinking for a short while, he and his wife tried drinking together at family gatherings, and he found that he now experienced no compulsion to continue drinking, nor did he find that drinking was desired or needed as a problem solving measure.

Now comes a case history that you can quote to your bartender friends, for their edification:

Case No. 3. This 38-year-old white bartender had been a heavy drinker all his life. He had drifted to various odd jobs and eventually landed in jail subsequent to public intoxication and marital quarrels.

He was divorced at the time he came to the Clinic on court probation. He was seen for 28 interviews, but he is uncertain that the Clinic was of much help. He feels that his severe drinking was due to his marital problems.

When interviewed 20 months after termination he was happily remarried, had two steady jobs, had saved a substantial sum for a house, and was a contented family man.

Although a bartender, he never drank except at home, and never got intoxicated. He used pseudo-masculine defenses, was nervous, and overtly aggressive. Nevertheless he and his family both agreed that alcohol was no longer a problem.

And as for the man in the gray flannel suit:

Case No. 4. This 26-year-old white insurance salesman had been a compulsive drinker since age 17. His marriage had been stormy and he accused his wife of running around with his drinking partners. He had had many arrests and came to the Clinic on court probation. He and his wife were seen jointly for 15 interviews, but they did not feel that it was of any help. They admitted that they had psychiatric problems, but he felt that he wanted to be told what do to rather than just examine his life.

However, since attending the Clinic a dramatic change had occurred: the couple had reconciled and were now working together to develop a stable emotional and financial marriage situation. He still drank occasionally, usually on the week ends, only at home, and without any feelings of compulsivity. He thought that he might be tempted to drink more than he ought, if he was in a tavern with his buddies, because they would pressure him. So he only drank at home. He has been working successfully for the first time in his life, and has stable family relationships.

"It is evident," the medicos commented, "that none of these men received any long-term reconstructive type of psychotherapy. In fact there was little change in terms of personality dynamics. The same may also be said for most of the normal drinkers reported in previous clinical studies.

"There are those, of course, who will immediately claim that men such as these were not truly addictive alcoholics or subject to compulsive drinking. However by their own admission, by our measuring methods, and by clinical standards, these men were apparently as much addictive alcoholics as those who were now abstinent and those who continue pathological drinking. Likewise, the other clinical reports indicate that the normal drinkers did not appear to differ from other populations of addictive alcoholics."

The research report then went into various possible explanations of the successful readjustment these men had made. Then the doctors turned their clinical microscope on the other side of the picture: ex-drinkers who had continued to stay off the booze - but who were not doing so well in other departments of life:

Case No. 5. This 56-year-old white salesman had been a compulsive drinker since age 18. He had asthma and stuttered. Although deeply attached to his mother, he was angry with her for her over-conscientious religious principles. He was continually plagued by guilt feelings and still has difficulty expressing his anger. He was treated in the Clinic for about five years with both individual and group psychotherapy. Although he had been abstinent for two years, he continually feared a relapse.

He believed that the clinic was of tremendous value in helping him to understand himself. However, he believed that his very active participation in Alcoholics Anonymous was the main thing that kept him sober. His wife was a leader in the Al-Anon movement. Although he enjoyed his sobriety, he was plagued by many neurotic traits which interfered with effective social functioning, and his wife sheltered him. He remained very dependent and could neither assert himself nor handle rage without developing psychosomatic symptoms.

The next case reflected similar emotional crippling, in a man who was desperately hanging onto his sobriety as a life-preserver:

Case No. 6. This 39-year-old white technician had always felt inadequate and yet angry that superiors did not give him adequate recognition. He had started drinking five years previously over difficulties on the job. As the drinking increased he almost had a nervous breakdown, but instead drank himself to oblivion. He was on the verge of losing his job and was in legal difficulties when he came to the Clinic. He tested the therapist several times by coming to the Clinic drunk. When he found out that he was still accepted, he stopped drinking and had been abstinent for two years.

At follow-up 19 months after discharge, he was working steadily and his family adjustment was good. However he had many anxiety attacks and psychosomatic symptoms. He frequently felt depressed and asked the interviewer directly for help. He had intense feelings of inadequacy, and although he was performing well on the job he had continuing difficulties with his superiors.

And here was another fellow who wasn't exactly to be envied simply because he was able to lay off the grog:

Case No. 7. This 48-year-old white public servant had been drinking at an increasing pace over the past five years until he drank continually on the job. He was on suspension when he came to the Clinic. He was seen for 12 interviews during which he stopped drinking and he had remained abstinent for 19 months. He felt that the Clinic sessions were of some help, but he felt that most importantly he wanted to stop drinking.

On interview 14 months after discharge, he was highly defensive and used overt paranoid defenses. He grossly denied any difficulties in any sector of his life. Yet his defensive needs led to a furtive type of existence, continually covering the tracks of his past difficulties, and maintaining a rigid self-concealment which left little room for any social interaction.

The psychiatric research team summed up its findings:

"The conclusion to be drawn from these two groups of clinical reports is that the criterion of abstinence is only one of several variables which are relevant to assessing the outcome of treatment of alcoholics. The presence of normal drinking subsequent to therapy does not need to imply that these patients are less well adjusted or less successfully treated than those patients who are abstinent. Nor does it follow that the patient who is abstinent has necessarily achieved a return to normal living or adjustment

"The current research was not designed to evaluate the efficacy of treatment, but rather to conduct a controlled design study of the outcome of some treated alcoholics. The findings of this study corroborate prior clinical reports that some alcoholics do return to normal drinking. The characteristics of these alcoholics remain to be determined, as well as the reasons for their type of outcome. Thus these findings do not necessarily imply a change in treatment philosophy.

"However, it calls into question the assumption that abstinence is always a requisite of successful therapy, and it also calls into question that abstinence should always be the goal of successful therapy. We would argue that abstinence as a condition of treatment is a prescription which should be used by the therapist with discretion, as with any other therapeutic maneuver and that the goals of treatment, whether abstinence, psycho-social rehabilitation, or characterological changes, are goals which must be determined with each individual patient."

So there it is, the Cincinnati research, summed up, has shown that some alcoholics, successfully treated by the Clinic by ordinary methods of psychotherapy, have achieved a normal adjustment to life and are now able to indulge in social drinking without disastrous effects. Conversely, some alcoholics, similarly treated, who have remained strictly off the bottle - including at least one who attends AA meetings regularly - have not made such an adjustment, and remain ridden by tensions and anxieties; the only achievement they can point to is that they don't drink anymore.

The AA reply, of course, would be that those who have successfully returned to normal drinking were not real dyed-in-the-bourbon alcoholics in the first place-they were simply "heavy drinkers." The AA book (Alcoholics Anonymous, AA World Services, Inc., New York, 1935; second and revised edition 1955), goes fully into this aspect, stating flatly:

"We have seen the truth demonstrated again and again: Once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic. Commencing to drink after a short period of sobriety, we are in a short time as bad off as ever. If we are planning to stop drinking, there must be no reservation of any kind, nor any lurking notion that someday we will be immune to alcohol."

The Cincinnati researchers, however, have found that on the basis of various personality tests plus physical examination, those men who successfully took up drinking again, after therapy, were no different from other addictive drinkers.

The controversy is an old one, and we could go around in semantic circles. Just what is an alcoholic? If a man drinks heavily but continues to handle himself okay, or if he lays off and then returns and doesn't get into trouble, then AA would say he was "not a true alcoholic." On the other hand, if he is "cured" of drinking, later reverts to it, and lands back in the gutter-then he is an alcoholic. Somehow this sort of reasoning seems like putting the cart before the horse.

One primary aim of today's research is to determine whether the condition we call "alcoholism" is an actual, specific disease, or a personality disorder-which is not quite the same. Fortunately, today, we have more or less discarded the old view of drunkenness as a moral vice, to be cured by "will power"-by "pulling yourself together." The compulsive alcoholic can no more lay off the bottle by "will power" than can a man suffering from a cold simply make up his mind that he's going to stop coughing and sneezing. The question is, does the alcoholic have a definite physical disease that can be diagnosed and treated as such-or is it that his total character, his personality, is maladjusted and needs renovating?

Dr. E.M. Jellinek, in his authoritative review The Disease Concept of Alcoholism (Hillhouse Press, New Haven, 1960), points out that around 1940, the phrase "new approach to alcoholism" was coined, and that in the past 25 years we have come a long way from the old days when the drunkard was considered simply a no-good bum who could snap out of it if he really wanted to.

The AA view, oft repeated, is that alcoholism is "an obsession of the mind coupled with an allergy of the body." This is the "disease" concept-but AA takes no stock in cure by psychotherapy, auto-suggestion, or medical drugs.

It is AA's dedicated belief that true alcoholism can only be alleviated-the disease not cured but its symptoms arrested-by a deeply felt spiritual experience, specifically by complete surrender to the will of God. And AA has a strong argument in the fact that this approach has worked for thousands of people after everything else had failed. The proof of the pudding, says AA, is in the eating.

Medicos on the other hand, while giving full credit to AA's fine work, do not believe that all alcoholics will necessarily respond to the same sort of spiritual therapy. Further, the doctors look toward curing the disease, or disorder, by renovating the individual's entire personality. For that matter, AA likewise insists on a basic personality change: with the proviso, however, at which many doctors balk, that the rehabilitated person must never drink again.

Perhaps it would be well to state at this point that neither this writer nor this magazine have anything but admiration for the great work done by Alcoholic Anonymous, and for the phenomenal recoveries made by thousands of its members. Neither are we urging abstainers to go back to drinking, nor trying to give them excuses to do so. We are merely presenting here the latest findings of high-level psychiatric research, by men who are just as dedicated to eradicating alcoholism as are the AA groups.

There is not exactly a feud between AA and the psycho-therapists (it is an AA tenet not to engage in controversy), but there is a basic difference in approach. The Cincinnati researchers, in their report, pointed out that psychiatrists in the past have in general shied away from treating alcoholics, due partly to the various headaches involved, and partly to the pronounced lack of success. Dr. Pattison acknowledged this frankly-and at the same time took a crack at AA-when he said:

"In part, due to psychiatric abdication, lay groups have taken the lead in treatment, but not without detriment to scientifically conceived treatment programs."

This is not the first time the difference between AA and orthodox psychotherapy have been pinpointed. Back in 1935, a noted psychiatrist, Dr. Harry M. Tiebout, of Greenwich, Connecticut, in an address to the 20th Anniversary convention of AA in St. Louis, told the assembled recovered alcoholics: "You cannot afford to wear haloes simply because you have achieved sobriety!"

Dr. Tiebout, as vice-chairman of the Connecticut Commission on Alcoholism and one of the first medical authorities to endorse the AA program back in the late 30's, was entitled to speak with authority. He earnestly reminded the AA'ers that "ego control will continue to be a problem if you hope to remain sober."

Citing 10 years of research into the problem of "ego reduction" among alcoholics, the doctor cautioned that "a return of the full-fledged ego can happen at any time."

"Years of sobriety," he said, "are no insurance against its resurgence. No AA, regardless of his veteran status, can ever relax his guard against the encroachments of a reviving ego."

Dr. Tiebout gave credit to AA for stressing the concept of "surrender." "The function of this concept is clear," he said. "It produces a stopping of the runaway ego by causing the individual to say, I quit, I give up my headstrong ways, I've learned my lesson. Very often, for the first time in that individual's adult career, he has encountered the necessary discipline which halts him in his headlong pace."

The Connecticut psychiatrist didn't go directly into the business of total abstinence-but his point was that not the mere giving up of liquor, but control of the headstrong, selfish, self-destructive ego in all its aspects should be the target of any therapy.

On the subject of total abstinence, the Rev. Christopher M. McElroy, O.Carm., of Oakland, New Jersey, spiritual director of the Matt Talbot Legion, a Catholic temperance group, recently wrote to the editor of America:

"Many consider that Alcoholics Anonymous is the answer to the problem (of destructive drinking). And certainly, although this organization has reached only 300,000 of the more than five million alcoholics, it is much more effective than pills or the pledge. I am afraid, however, that for the general run of people, anti-alcoholism movements are doomed to failure when they forsake the virtue of temperance and accentuate abstinence. For then abstinence becomes a positive virtue, and the taking of one drink becomes a vice.

"In our day, the hard reality is that most Americans drink because they like to-and want to. For 12 out of 13 of them, alcohol will never be a problem,

Programs that will help you stay on the wagon

In the current hit film, Neil Simon's Only When I Laugh, actress Marsha Mason portrays an alcoholic who spends her life's savings for a 12-week "cure" at a sanitarium - and falls off the wagon once she returns to the real world of career, motherhood, and friends who drink even as they try to keep her from doing so. If you know someone addicted to alcohol, or are among the 10% of all social drinkers who regularly become dependent on what counselors consider a mood-altering drug, don't think that a hospital stay alone provides a permanent solution. "Aftercare is every bit as important as the in-patient treatment," says Richard W. Easterly, executive director of the Chit Chat Foundation, which has a rehabilitation program for alcoholics in Wernersville, Pa.

While treatment as an in-patient can be expensive - the Chit Chat program costs roughly $3,000 for 28 days of intensive therapy and behavior modification sessions - you can expect to pay nothing for aftercare to keep you sober. It is provided by Alcoholics Anonymous, the 45-year old "fellowship of men and women" with a record of success in helping addicts refrain from drinking. It collects no fees, charges no dues, and keeps no membership rolls - admitting anyone who simply has a desire to stop drinking.

Your first visit to an A.A. meeting will probably surprise you. Anonymity begins outside the meeting place, usually with a small sign bearing an innocuous name - such as "Discussion Group" - and no reference to A.A. Whether you have been provided with a contact by a therapist or hospital, urged to attend a meeting by an employer or family member, or realized that your ability to function effectively at home or work is being impaired by alcohol, you will be free to use your full name, nickname, or a factious name. Because groups meet in offices, schools, churches, lodges, and private homes, your chances of encountering Skid Row types are nonexistent if you drop in on one in your neighbourhood or near your office. The people around you will include your peers. One-third are likely to be female, and a few may be teenagers.

Do not expect anyone to rush toward you with a membership application - there are none to fill out - and chances are that at a meeting in a large metropolitan area, few A.A. members will even glance your way. At an "open" meeting, which can be attended by alcoholics and nonalcoholics alike, a volunteer "leader" will begin by saying something like, "Hello, I'm Robert, and I'm an alcoholic." He may then introduce one or two A.A. members who will discuss their own drinking experiences and relate what sobriety has meant to them. Afterwards, others may note their similar or dissimilar experiences.

Bill Pittman wanted to find out more about Dr. Howard, the psychiatrist in Montclair, New Jersey. In my own researches into early A.A. history -- as for example in some of the work I did putting together my book The Factory Owner & the Convict, about a group of A.A. leaders in the upper midwest -- I found that a very useful tool to use is city directories. All the local libraries I have checked in have all the old city directories for their locality going back to the 1930's and earlier, whereas around here at least, they don't usually keep all the old telephone books.

I'm writing this note, because I think a lot of A.A. historians and archivists in the U.S. would find this to be useful. The city directory will give not only the person's name, address, and telephone number, but also the name of the person's spouse, and what both of them do for a living. Sometimes, I knew the name of an oldtimer's spouse, or what the person's occupation was, and this enabled me to verify some other things about the person, and that I had the right person to begin with.

There was confusion for example, among my oral sources, about which member of the Keller family had been one of the founders of the A.A. group in Elkhart, Indiana -- it was the opposite of the normal problem in A.A. history, where I knew his last name but not his first name, or at least not for sure -- but I felt fairly sure that his wife's name was Henrietta, and I knew that he was not in the pharmaceutical business, which enabled me to find the right man, and establish that he sold real estate. It also enabled me to eliminate one other tale I was told about him, which could not have been true, based on the city directory entry.

For a physician or psychiatrist, there will also usually be a separate entry in the business section, which may give you more information about that early A.A. member's life. In this case, did Dr. Howard list himself as having certain kinds of psychiatric specialties, or was he associated with a treatment center of some sort?

A lot of early A.A. history is picking up bits here, and pieces there, until you can form a fuller picture. But I always try to check the old city directories to verify everything that people tell me, because sometimes people's memories get confused.

+++Message 1049. Resurgence of Ego by Dr. Harry

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] Re: A.A. History Help

Hi

I've found only one reference to Buddhism by Tiebout (he refers to the Zen variant).

In Grapevine issue 22, number 4 (September 1965) Tiebout authored an article: "When the Big "I" Becomes Nobody" (he emphasizes the need for reduced ego and humility as a safeguard against alcohol). The article is reprinted in "Harry Tiebout -The Collected Writings" Hazelden Pittman Archives Press, Order No. 1119. Pages 114-115. An excerpt:

"The great religions are conscious of the need for nothingness if one is to attain Grace. In the New Testament, Mathew 18:3-4, quotes Christ with these words: 'Truly I say to you, unless you turn and become like children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven. Whoever humbles himself like this child, he is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven.'

Zen teaches the release of nothingness. A famous series of pictures designed to show growth in man's nature ends with a circle enclosed in a square. The circle depicts man in a state of nothingness ... the square represent the framework of limitations man must learn to live within. In this state 'Nothing is easy, nothing hard' and so Zen, too, has linked nothingness, humbleness and Grace. ..."

Cheers

is under review by the supreme court, changes alcoholism from a crime to a disease, a diagnosis already made by such diverse authorities as the World Health Organization in 1951, the American Medical Association in 1957, the American Psychiatric Association in 1965, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in 1996, and a national commission in 1967.

The general acceptance of alcoholism as a disease not only reflects a new concept of the illness, but also requires a new public approach to its treatment, postulating as it does that alcoholics be handled in clinics and hospitals instead of in jails. New ward space is being opened and new institutions are being built; medical schools are beginning to add the subject of alcoholism to their curriculums. The federal government is now asking Congress to increase substantially its current $20-million program, of which $13,500,000 is marked for research, training, and education. State expenditures are running about $10 million. There are, in addition, federal plans in the works to treat alcoholics among civil servants, and state plans are being drafted in California and Pennsylvania.

The year 1968 thus becomes the time when alcoholism finally receives recognition as the personal and social catastrophe that a quarter-century of sustained research effort has shown it to be: an illness of the magnitude of heart trouble, cancer, and severe mental disorder. A body of knowledge, remarkable in size for the small amount of research money expended, has been put together on its characteristics, causes, and treatment. No one expects that the incidence of alcoholism will diminish in the foreseeable future. There are no drugs available now or in prospect to work the kind of cure that has all but eradicated polio. Indeed, recovery rates from alcoholism are abysmally low. But the only direction to go is up.

The highest recovery rates, surprisingly, are to be found not in clinics and hospitals, but in offices and factories. By putting the body of knowledge about alcoholism to work in company programs, industry is achieving recovery rates as high as 65 to 70 percent - higher than those for other major diseases and far higher than any imagined only a short time ago. This achievement represents not only a successful use of research, but a major contribution to it as well. Alcoholism is one disease in which laymen, notably men in executive posts in business, play a role as diagnosticians and therapists as well as sufferers. Moreover, the simple fact that business is increasingly willing to admit that its executives can themselves be alcoholic demonstrates an important gain in knowledge about the nature of the disease.

There are some 80 million drinkers in the U.S., and of this number there are five million alcoholics, give or take a million, according to estimates of the Rutgers Center of Alcohol Studies. Such estimates have meaning, however, only if it is agreed that all statistics on alcoholism, are rough - far rougher than statistics on atherosclerosis, cancer or tuberculosis - and that precise definition of the disease is as yet impossible. Unlike other diseases, alcoholism is discovered primarily through study of the behavior of the persons who are attempting to hide their behavior, not primarily through the study of invading organisms or infected organs. For statistical purposes, it can be thought of as a disease, in the words of Rutgers' Mark Keller, "causing injury to the drinker's health or to his social and economic functioning." By that definition, there is one alcoholic for roughly every sixteen persons in the country who ever consumed alcohol. Some years ago men outnumbered women by about five or six to one, but it may be that the ratio is now four to one or even lower.

The sufferers divide into three principal types:

The loss-of-control alcoholic. In this type preponderant in the U.S., Canada, Great Britain, and Northern Europe, increased tissue tolerance to alcohol and alteration in cell metabolism produce an addiction that makes control over drinking either difficult or impossible. This leads both to compulsion to drink and to harrowing physical symptoms when coming off drink. Typical of the out-of-control drinker is an executive vice president of an industry trade organization who lost family, friends, home, and job, who sobered up in one hospital only to get drunk and land in another, and whose recouping of losses and rise to his present post came only after his recovery. But just as typical is a senior officer of a company with $300 million in sales who hid everything and lost nothing tangible at all (although he figures his drinking cost his company more than a million dollars' worth of business) and who surprised his colleagues when he told them of his alcoholism a year after his recovery began.

The unable-to-abstain alcoholic. Physical addiction also characterizes this type, which predominates in France and other wine-producing countries where heavy drinking throughout the day is socially acceptable. Addiction leads, however, not to the uncontrolled-spree behavior typical of American alcoholics, but to an inability to get off drink for even a day or two.

Social protection for such alcoholism is common in France but rare in the U.S. The president of a small business organization in New Jersey built his own kind of social protection around his drinking. He had secretaries, subordinates, bartenders, and family trained to help him keep a relatively constant volume of liquor in his system. But when he was suddenly separated from his family he quickly began spree drinking and ended by touring hospitals and jails. Dr. George N. Thompson of the University of Southern California reports another case: "A patient who had continued a desk job fairly successfully for twenty years while he drank two fifths of bourbon daily. He finally succumbed to hepatic cirrhoses but never seemed to suffer from toxic effects to his nervous system."

The dependent-but-unaddicted alcoholic. This type does not drink compulsively, but heavily enough to cause eventual damage to his family and work relationships, and sometimes to his health. Often he progresses into out-of-control alcoholism. What happens to him depends less on the quantity he drinks than on his drinking behavior. He can cut down if he is aware that he is heading for trouble. It is not always easy to spot this type of drinker, and the difficulties are increased because so many alcoholics delude themselves into believing that they are heavy drinking nonalcoholics.

Executive suite and skid row

The alcoholic reinforces his delusion that he is some other sort of drinker by adhering to the popular notion that alcoholism has a definite location - skid row. But, in fact, only about 3 percent of all the alcoholics in the country are to be found there. Only recently has the general public been willing to acknowledge that alcoholics are also to be found in the bosoms of their families, the arms of their churches, and the management rosters of their corporations. In fact, alcoholism has been found to be more of a problem in the executive suite, in professional offices, and in workshops than on skid row. Generally speaking, the more educated, the more urban, and the better salaried Americans are, the more likely to drink.

The skid-row myth, says Dr. Selden D. Bacon, director of the Rutgers Center of Alcohol Studies, grew out of the old controversy between the wets and the dries. Many persons escaped both camps by avoiding the problems of alcoholism altogether; they came to believe that such problems simply did not exist in nice families or in good neighborhoods, but only in out-of-sight areas where they could be handled by the police, the courts, the jails, and the state mental institutions. Dr. Morris E. Chafetz of Massachusetts General Hospital has shown statistically that admitting physicians in hospitals tend to diagnose alcoholism as if it were a disease confined to the unwashed and the ill clad. When a disease is socially unmentionable, medical research in that disease is stymied by want of support. The new recognition that alcoholism is also found among respectable people is a fact possibly more important for research than was the similar recognition of cancer about a generation ago.

In short, social considerations are as much a factor in alcoholism research as are the physical and psychological characteristics of its victims. A concatenation of sociological, biochemical, and psychiatric happenings, alcoholism has to be studied by specialists in many fields. Moreover, it is an illness whose patients band together in great numbers - 400,000 of them in 14,154 groups throughout the world - as Alcoholics Anonymous to treat one another. Multiple approaches to the problem often commingle but sometimes conflict. The fact, for instance, that alcoholism is far less prevalent among Jews than among the Irish is explained in terms of cultural or psychodynamic conditions, but some physiologists explain it as the consequence of genetically determined body chemistry. Such diversity of approach is actually an important research aid, and it has already produced a very considerable body of knowledge about the nature of the illness, a good deal of information about its treatment, and plenty of speculation about its causes.

The observable symptoms of the disease, its course from early manifestation all the way to recovery or death, together with its incidence and characteristics in various segments of the population, can now be defined roughly. There is, for instance, ample working data on alcoholism among factory and white collar workers with reasonably precise studies on work performance, absenteeism, accidents, and the like. There is also an increasing body of data about alcoholism among executives, a topic not generally discussed only a few years ago.

There is, moreover, a good deal more that is known about alcoholism's sundry complications. An HEW study of 1,343 patients at alcoholism treatment centers in California reveals that accidents kill seven times as many alcoholics as nonalcoholics, cirrhosis ten times as many, influenza and pneumonia 6.2 times, and suicide (a new research area) 3.5 times. A sampling of 922 drinkers (532 known to be and 390 thought to be alcoholics) and 922 nondrinkers at E.I. du Pont de Nemours indicates that various other degenerative diseases, including some not popularly associated with alcohol, strike drinkers with measurably greater frequency than nondrinkers: e.g., hypertension 2.3 times as frequently, cerebrovascular disease 2 times, stomach ulcer 1.9 times, asthma 1.7 times. "More alcoholics," declares Dr. Edwin Boyle of the Miami Heart Institute, "die of cardiovascular catastrophe than from all other causes combined."

Other studies, supported by A.A. experience, yield an equally important and far more heartening discovery: alcoholism can be arrested much earlier in its course than was previously thought possible and with much better likelihood of recovery than in its later stages. It was once believed that only those alcoholics who had gone down through the whole bitter sequence of the early, middle, and late stages would accept therapy. Today an estimated 50 percent of A.A. members join during the early and early-middle stages. "An alcoholic," explains a vice president of a company headquartered in New York, "is constantly building up a wall of defenses around his illness. Early in the process when the wall is low, it takes much less suffering to convince him to clamber over it than it takes when the wall is high."

Physiological research also has been yielding detailed information on the way alcohol acts in the human body, how it is metabolized, how it sedates - producing in the process an initial misleading euphoria, but subsequently depressing and anesthetizing - and how it leaves behind that jittery sense of excitation that often prompts the alcoholic to another drink or another bout. Established are such facts as alcohol's ability to induce hyperactivity of the brain through its effect on the brain's reticular activating mechanism. The ancient surmise that alcohol in the bloodstream is the agent of the alcoholic's compulsion to keep on drinking has been confirmed by a variety of experiments, including a thirty-one day test conducted by Harvard's Dr. Jack H. Mendelson, in which alcoholic volunteers were subjected to twenty-four days of controlled drinking and seven days of observed withdrawal, in the course of which classic and unmistakable signs of physical addiction were manifest.

Why it comes and how it goes

Certain facts about the treatment of alcoholism are indisputable. As rooted, it has been established as a disease treatable by physical, psychological, and A.A. therapies. Medical authorities have perfected the hospital handling of its agonizing withdrawal symptoms - the physician has a whole battery of variously acting drugs at his command - and withdrawal is now rated no more of a risk than minor surgery. It is universally agreed that the one way to arrest the illness is to get the patient off drink altogether. And it is known that the alcoholic can't get off drink through his own will power, that he must seek outside help.

At this point, however, the various sociologists, psychologists, physiologists, and the A.A. laity tend to part company. Alcoholics Anonymous is widely conceded to have produced more recoveries than have all other therapists put together, but it suffers in the minds of some professional research men from being insufficiently scientific. A scientist can hardly quarrel with the fact of 400,000 recovered alcoholics, but he can nonetheless feel uneasy about a fellowship whose program begins with an admission of abject surrender of one's life as unmanageable, follows with belief in "a Power greater than ourselves that can restore us to sanity," and prescribes constant meetings and labor with other alcoholics. Such propositions, whose principal intellectual ancestor is the pragmatic philosopher William James, are not subject to quantitative measurements and are often troubling to outsiders. What is more, only about one alcoholic in fifteen in the country is a member of A.A. Its one requirement for membership - a desire to stop drinking - is thought by some to limit its therapeutic efforts to a relatively select few.

Sociologists come under cross fire from some of the other professionals for focusing on nonmedical aspects of alcoholism. Their basic proposal for treatment is the prevention of alcoholism by social and cultural change, a proposal whose value can be determined only at some time in the future. Moreover, they offer both statistical studies and cogent etiological arguments. "It has been noted," says sociologist Dr. Seldon Bacon of Rutgers, "by almost all observers for decades that by and large Americans are anxious, confused, ambivalent, at times guilt-ridden about their attitudes toward drinking." Sociologists have delineated such uncertainties in detail and have re-created in the process the history of drinking in the U.S., replete with such intriguing facts as nearly identical per capita consumption rates between 1850 and 1968, despite the intervention of the industrial revolution, urbanization, and world wars.

Knowledge through no-knowledge

Physiologists and psychologists, highly vocal about the causes and treatment of alcoholism, have contributed another body of facts, and also have delineated important areas of ignorance. Dr. Peter Stokes, research physician at Payne Whitney Clinic of the New York Hospital and co-discoverer of the effect of alcohol on white-cell mobilization, remarks confidently, "We don't know anything about the causes of alcoholism; we can't identify the susceptible individual; we can't treat specifically or chronically; and we can't prevent it." This state of knowing what one does not know, Dr. Stokes emphasizes, is essential for solid future discovery. Medical research in general has to explore areas of ignorance before arriving at areas of new information. Cancer research, more advanced than research in alcoholism, developed its virus theory only after assiduous exploration of the unknown.

Physiologists, of course, examine complex cellular, metabolic, glandular, and like biochemical events, while psychologists and psychiatrists apply a body of concepts ranging from learning theory and conditioned reflex formulations to personality testing and psychodynamics. Almost all researchers in these fields believe it is likely that alcoholism rests on a physical base upon which is built a psychological structure, but research knowledge both of base and structure is as yet not very deep. Alcoholism indeed coexists with various types of mental and emotional illness that require specialized medical attention. Until very recently it was believed that predisposing psychological factors played a causative role of some sort in the development of alcoholism. Alcoholics, after all, are so frequently separated from reality that they can be called schizoid, so regularly low in mood they can be called depressed, so often unsure they can be called dependent, and so obviously devoted to the bottle they can be labeled obsessive-compulsive and orally fixated. But these characteristics did not necessarily pertain to their condition before they became alcoholic, and the same characteristics, moreover, are not uncommon among nonalcoholics. Today there is less enthusiasm over predisposing factors.

Enthusiasm plays a key role in medical research, but in the search for remedies for alcoholism, it is now much more subdued. In the past, various therapeutic devices, based on various etiological theories, were put forward with considerable ardor as the therapies for alcoholism, but they turned out later to be at best adjuncts to standard therapy. Among these are psychodrama, group therapy, and hypnosis as well as individual counseling. The list also includes the barbiturates (useful but themselves addictive), aversion therapy, vitamins and sound diet, Ayerst Laboratories' Antabuse (still widely used), ACHT, tranquilizers (also useful and also addictive), LSD, Searle & Co., Flagyl, and latest of all, niacin, proposed for use in massive doses as an adjunct to therapy to deal with hypoglycemia and schizoid conditions.

Almost all alcoholics, of course, would welcome any pill or any procedure that would not deprive them of liquor. For fifteen years a New Jersey management consultant read selectively in the professional literature to convince himself that he was a neurotic drinker who would be able to drink normally as soon as his neurosis was resolved. He persuaded his physicians and psychiatrists to let him try out a whole series of new treatments, from barbiturates to LSD. Despite repeated hospitalization, he believed fervently that his emotional health was improving - up to the very moment when desperation eventually convinced him he was a common out-of-control alcoholic. As U.S.C.'s Dr. Thompson says, "It is axiomatic that it is useless to attempt psychotherapy on a patient who is continuing his drinking."

The new social acceptance of alcoholism as a disease rather than as a stigma of sin, say the professionals, should help break down the massive defenses alcoholics develop against yielding to treatment. Acceptance is providing a cultural climate in which they may be more readily helped and a long needed financial base for an important burst of new research.

Crisis precipitation

There is already enough knowledge for dealing effectively with the problems of alcoholics on the job. An HEW study estimates that 70 percent of them, indeed, are still on the job and have been there for fifteen to twenty-five or more years. An alcoholic's job, in fact, is the last great bulwark of his defense against admitting his illness; the threat of its loss can often produce the inward crisis that is required before he will submit to treatment. Well-conceived company programs, moreover, can speed up the precipitation of such a crisis, in the process rescuing men from unnecessarily long suffering at a cost to the company that is far less than the amount it is already losing through poor productivity, absenteeism, severance or retirement payments.

Successful company programs - programs that succeed with two out of three alcoholics, as they do at Equitable Life, Eastman Kodak, Consolidated Edison, Allis-Chalmers, and du Pont - are still rare, although more than 200 companies have some sort of program or some statement of policy. Because alcoholics are so skilled in avoiding anything that looks like a trap, some programs are little better than no programs at all.

Good basic company procedure is relatively simple. It depends on early recognition of the alcoholic, employee or executive, by his immediate supervisor on the basis of his work performance and on his referral by the supervisor to the company physician. The physician has to be - or has to become - one of the small and select group of specialists in alcoholism, though he does not usually treat the man himself. He refers him after diagnosis to Alcoholics Anonymous, to a psychiatrist, a hospital, or a rehabilitation center. Follow-up is in the hands of the company physician. And in all cases, willingness to accept treatment is a criterion for determining whether an employee continues to hold his job.

The mechanics of this operation are straightforward. It is not difficult to spot alcoholics on the job; usually they are recognized long before they think they are. Most of them can be identified simply by running through work records on absenteeism and performance. But getting a supervisor to refer a man to the medical department is a different matter. It is almost impossible if the program is not well conceived, difficult when even a good program is new, though relatively easy when the program is widely understood.

Removing resistance

When the medical director of a billion-dollar company was summoned one day to his company's executive offices, he found himself in the presence of two senior officers. He was told by one of them that the other was beginning to get into such trouble with drinking that he would have to report him to the board of directors unless he accepted medical help. The medical director simply said, "Since this is a health matter, we will treat this conversation as if it never happened." He then took the sick executive back to his office, talked with him, got him into the hospital for a two-day checkup, dispatched him to a rehabilitation center for a four-week "vacation," and on his return introduced him personally to members of an A.A. group. A few weeks before, the physician had handled a case involving a maintenance man employee in precisely the same way.

Implementing a program based on crisis precipitation requires a marked amount of organized wisdom, experience, and good sense in dealing with the tortured complexities and resistance's of the alcoholic mind. For example, it is essential that the confidential relationship between doctor and patient remain inviolate; otherwise the whole program will be bypassed by the alcoholic. It is not necessary for the word alcoholism to appear in company records. Equitable Life's Dr. Luther A. Cloud finds it wise even to avoid using the word in his conversation with a patient until the patient himself does so. At Eastman Kodak, executives not infrequently refer themselves to Dr. John L. Norris, associate medical director, who is also the nonalcoholic chairman of A.A.'s general service board. Among all employees about two out of ten are self-referrals.

One pitfall to avoid, warns Dr. Harrison M. Trice of Cornell's School of Industrial and Labor Relations, is a company plan that is designed to take care of alcoholism only among wage and salary workers. Alcoholics are so notably thin-skinned, whatever their level of employment, that it is advisable to handle all of them as if they were executives. If a plan works smoothly with executives, it will work smoothly with others down the line.

Atmospherics and the chief executive

Obviously a company plan cannot be rigid-Practicing alcoholics respond far better to a general atmosphere than to an inflexible system. At Equitable, atmospheric considerations include easy and unobserved access corridors to Dr. Cloud's office. Although Eastman Kodak is a pioneer in company alcohol problems, Dr. Norris and the company management still feel no urge to commit all of the program to paper; it is simply discussed between Dr. Norris and the top executives who frequently drop into one another's offices to talk informally about a wide range of company and community health matters. Olin Mathieson's Dr. J. Ray Chittum holds that his program should not even be called an alcoholism program, maintaining that alcoholism should simply be considered one of the various illnesses that his company helps treat.

One manufacturing company with a number of scattered plants in the Midwest has no organized plan at all and uses outside physicians instead of company doctors. But it is known confidentially to a good many men both at headquarters and down the line that both the president and their personnel head are recovered alcoholics active in A.A., and as such the company's authorities on alcoholism. This company has probably one of the lowest rates of active alcoholism in the country.

Most of the information required as the basis of sound and successful company programs can be found at four institutions where the problems of alcoholism in industry have been under scientific and professional study for many years. Dr. Milton A. Maxwell, of the Rutgers Center of Alcohol Studies, is an expert on problems of accidents and absenteeism. At Cornell, Dr. Trice is knowledgeable about problems of early identification and crisis precipitation. At the National Council on Alcoholism, Lewis F. Presnall has installed practical programs in a number of specific companies. And at the Christopher D. Smithers Foundation of New York, the organization that has given research in alcoholism most of its private financial support, R. Brinkley Smithers pays special attention to company programs. Smithers is the foundation's president and president also of the National Council on Alcoholism.

Obviously, the experience of particular men or particular companies cannot be overlaid on the organizational pattern of other companies. Such patterns typically represent a company's unique way of doing business, and any change in them is a matter for the chief executive officer. The chief executive, indeed, is the one person in any company who must take responsibility for an alcoholism program, not simply because it is advisable to have top backing for good ideas, but because it is essential for him to do the actual tailoring of any system to the company cloth.

On the chief executive falls further responsibility for the alcoholics the program does not help. To be sure, two men in three can Recover and often achieve levels of performance not previously reached, but there remain the men who refuse therapy or abandon it. Some of them pass on to other companies, end up on early retirement, relief, or skid row. Moreover, it has now become known that an alarming percentage of alcoholics commit suicide upon losing a job or separating from family. Such negative consequences of crisis precipitation can be mitigated in some part, however, by the chief executive taking two steps: first, making it clear to employees that acceptance of treatment for alcoholism is a defense against loss of job, and, second, separating alcoholics when necessary from the company on an on-leave basis, it being understood that they will be taken back whenever they accept therapy.

Pragmatic synthesis

For its successful crisis-precipitation approach to the problem of alcoholism, industry clearly owes a debt to research. Scholarship, however, owes a debt to industry programs, not simply for the statistical, psychological, or medical data they yield, but also for showing the way to the pragmatic achievement of the higher recover rates known. These results suggest that the synthesis of research findings with working industrial programs may be more significant than either the research or the programs alone.

Important in this synthesis is industry's use of Alcoholics Anonymous as the chief therapeutic agent of company programs. Business proved a new challenge to A.A. through its methods of crisis precipitation that sent men and women for therapeutic help long before they might otherwise have gone, and thus provoked a new response. Now that the dimensions of the disease of alcoholism are becoming widely known, it may well be that many physicians and psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers, together with their hospitals and clinics, will develop new forms of crisis precipitation and share their therapeutic load more widely with A.A. Today there simply are not enough professionals in the country to handle the number of alcoholics needing treatment, and there are 350,000 members of A.A. available anywhere and at any hour in the U.S. and Canada.

Whatever else A.A. may be, it is a successful method of treating a disease, and a study of methods of recovery can lead to important facts about the nature of the disease itself. A.A. recovery for one man, the executive vice president of a research and development corporation in the South, included listening to more than 1,000 case histories during the first two years of his membership, getting to know intimately the life histories of more than fifty persons, introducing fifteen newcomers directly to A.A. and twenty-five more in partnership with others, and discussing the problems of alcoholism with more than a hundred nonalcoholic friends, scientific colleagues, and business associates. A.A.'s response to the challenge of still-suffering alcoholics is the combined response of cohorts of such men striving to maintain their own recovery through helping the recovery of others. Working with A.A., business has worked wonders.

A.A. was conceived in Akron, when Bill Wilson, a stockbroker suffering from an uncontrollable drinking problem, got in touch with Surgeon Robert Holbrook Smith, a total stranger and also an alcoholic. Wilson's desperate idea: apply the buddy system to the problem of quitting. Since then A.A. has grown steadily. Participation in the organization, which defines itself simply as "a fellowship of men and women who share their experience, strength and hope with each other that they may solve their common problem and help others to recover from alcoholism," has doubled over the past ten years. Explains Cathleen Willis, director of Alcoholics Anonymous of Chicago: "Alcoholism is increasingly recognized as a disease. People are more aware of what's wrong. A lot of employees are not tolerating alcoholism in the workplace, and a lot more famous people are coming out of the closet - people you wouldn't normally identify as having a drinking problem."

Anyone with a desire to stop drinking can join A.A. (There is no absolute definition of an "alcoholic.") People in the organization make themselves available to counsel and sponsor members. Alcoholics Anonymous is open to all ages, faiths (including atheists) and races. Says one member of the New York City branch: "People think A.A. is some monolithic kind of thing. But there is an awful lot of shading. Some groups are very spiritual. Some are very social. For example, over on the East side of Manhattan, meetings are packed with yuppies who talk like they have just swallowed their Apple computers, the jargon and the technical talk is so thick. But our theatre group has its own particular problems related to the stage industry. Regardless of the group, along with the differences there are the bonding similarities of the central problem: alcohol. "Some assemblies are dominated by a single profession. In Washington, for example, one, made up almost entirely of IRS employees, calls itself the "1040s," Another "911" consists of policemen. "Birds of a Feather" is a gathering for airline pilots.

Typical meetings last for one hour. A volunteer usually acts as a moderator, speaking for half the time on "experience, strength and hope." Usually the talk explains what life was like for the person while he was drinking and how it has changed for the better. Later the moderator opens the floor. He or she might ask: "Did anyone want to drink today?" Members respond, frequently dealing with personal issues. The groups have no regimen per se, only the so-called twelve steps that include such basic tenets as admitting one's powerlessness over alcohol and acknowledging the existence of a higher power than oneself.

Attendees are, of course, anonymous. They introduce themselves by first names only when they address the assembly and often follow their name with the almost liturgical, "I am an alcoholic." Anonymity protects them from the social stigma of the disease, but it also serves a subtler function. A.A. succeeds in part because it insists upon self-sacrifice. Members find themselves paying attention to other sufferers. Meetings stress togetherness and constantly reinforce the principle that self-pity and guilt over alcoholism are destructive. "It's a feeling that you've finally arrived and in Akron, Ohio. The fellowship is reckoned to have started on June 10 of that year, the day that Dr. Smith took his last drink, a beer accompanied by a tranquilizer. Dr. Smith needed to steady his nerves--he was about to perform an operation.

The whole story starts a few years earlier. A pebble from the Alps had started the avalanche of recovery that was to become Alcoholics Anonymous. In 1931 the Swiss psychoanalyst Carl Jung was treating an American named Rowland H. for a drinking problem. No sooner had therapy ended, however, than Rowland lapsed back into drunkenness. Refusing to take him back as a patient, Jung told Rowland bluntly that further psychiatric measure were pointless. His only hope of recovery, said Jung, lay in a "vital" spiritual experience.

Returning to the United States, Rowland found spirituality--and sobriety--with the Oxford Group, an evangelistic organization founded by a Lutheran minister, Dr. Frank Buchman. Rowland shared Jung's message, and his own experience, with other problem drinkers whom he met through the group.

As a result of Rowland's efforts, at least one member, Ebby T., was able to stop drinking for a time. Near the end of 1934, Ebby, then about six months sober, went to Brooklyn to see his old friend Bill Wilson, who had fallen upon hard times.

Bill, a tall, good-looking man, had been one of the first, and best, security analysts on the New York Stock Exchange. He had conceived the notion that investors would do well to take a closer look at the businesses whose stocks they were buying. He and his wife, Lois, had quit their jobs and taken to the road to do just that.

His breakthrough was to discover the great investment potential of the General Electric Company at the advent of radio. Other coups followed and brought Bill prestige and success. The crash of 1929 hurt Bill, but he made no less than two financial recoveries in the early '30s. Alcohol (in the heart of the Prohibition!) finally reduced him to poverty. A friend remembered how things were during this period:

"Nearly half a century has passed, but I can still see Bill coming into Ye Olde Illegal Bar on a freezing afternoon with a slow stride--he never hurried--and looking over with lofty dignity at the stack of bottles back of the bar, containing those rare imported beverages straight off the line from Hoboken. One time at Whitehall subway station, not far from Busto's [a speak-easy] he took a tumble down the steps. The old brown hat stayed on; but, wrapped up in that long overcoat, he looked like a collapsed sailboat on the subway platform. I recall how his face lit up when he fished out of the heap of clothes an unbroken bottle of gin," he reminisced.

At the time of Ebby's visit, Bill was becoming violent and increasingly abusive; his doctor suspected brain damage. For Bill, self-hate was the daily companion to the terror that he and Lois felt. Ebby, on the other hand, looked and felt good. Rather hesitantly, he explained how he had stopped drinking. He didn't really expect to get through, but as Bill was to confess later, "In no waking moment could I get that man or his message out of my head."

Bill continued, however, to drink. A month later, he was back in Charles B. Towns hospital, an alcoholic rehabilitation center, for the fourth time. Ebby paid him another visit there. Bill asked him to repeat the "neat little formula" that had enabled him to stop drinking; Ebby did so "in perfectly good humor." The process involved admitting that you were beaten, getting honest with yourself, talking it out with somebody else, making restitution to the people you had harmed and praying to your own conception of a God.

Bill was, to say the least, uncomfortable with the idea of a higher power, but he was in the grip of a terrible depression--his pride could no longer hold out against the danger and disgrace drinking had brought upon him. Suddenly he found himself prepared to do "anything, anything at all." Without faith or hope he cried, "If there be a God, let Him show Himself!"

Then came an event that would change everything. "Suddenly the room lit up with a great white light. I was caught up in an ecstasy that there are no words to describe. It seemed to me, in the mind's eye, that I was on a mountain and that a wind not of air but of spirit was blowing. And then it burst upon me that I was a free man."

In later years Bill was to downplay this event. With cheerful iconoclasm, he would refer to it as his "hot flash" experience. He insisted that his real battle with ignorance and arrogance lay ahead. But he never took another drink.

Ever the skeptical Yankee, Bill suspected initially that his "hot flash" might have been nothing more than a hallucination associated with the d.t.'s. He discussed this fear with the hospital's chief of staff, Dr. William D. Silkworth. Silkworth, a neurologist, had already introduced Bill to the idea, unorthodox at the time, that alcoholism was a disease rather than a moral weakness. Now he affirmed that Bill had undergone "some great psychic occurrence" and advised him to hold on to it.

Life began anew for the Wilsons. They attended Oxford Group meetings and lived off the small wages Lois was earning as a salesclerk in a Brooklyn department store. Bill yearned to become the family's breadwinner once again, but he had always been the slave of his own enthusiasm. Caught up in something, he would give it all his considerable energies.

Now Bill was consumed by the idea of a movement of recovered alcoholics who would help their still-suffering fellows. He was convinced the message from

Dr. Silkworth and from Ebby T. could work for other alcoholics, too. Ebby's message had been particularly effective. Ebby knew the hopelessness and blindness of alcoholism from the inside; surely his empathy had enabled him to get through to Bill when nobody else--not even Lois--could. The first six months of Bill's sobriety were spent in enthusiastic but fruitless attempts to help other alcoholics. Bill's approach was almost exclusively spiritual. Finally, Dr. Silkworth, who was permitting him to speak to patients at Towns, suggested bluntly that he "stop preaching at drunks" and concentrate on the medical facts instead. If an alcoholic could be told by another alcoholic that he had a serious illness, that might do the trick. . . .

Bill did not put this advice into practice immediately. A business opportunity intervened. He went to Akron to take part in a proxy voting battle for the control of the National Rubber Machinery Company. The prize would be a position as an officer in the company and a new career. He was, after all, only 39, and great things still seemed possible. For a while, the proxy solicitations went well, and victory appeared to be in Bill's grasp. Abruptly, however, the tide turned in favor of the opposition. Bill's past offered them an excellent weapon they did not hesitate to use. The battle was lost. Bill's associates returned to New York and left him alone in Akron to salvage the situation.

It was Friday afternoon, and Bill faced a weekend alone in a strange city. Lonely, and resentful over his defeat, he paced up and down in the lobby of his hotel. At one end of his beat was a bar, where the familiar buzz of a drinking crowd offered comfort and conversation. Bill was gripped by fear. He thought of his work with other alcoholics during the past six months. Unsuccessful as it had been from their point of view, the work had certainly kept him sober. Now he needed another alcoholic as much as that person needed him.

He called an Episcopal clergyman listed on the church directory displayed in the lobby and explained his situation as frankly as he could. One call led to another, and by Sunday he found himself in the home of a young woman member of the Oxford Group. She wanted him to speak to her friend, Dr. Robert Smith, who had recently confessed to being a drinker. Dr. Smith arrived at five that afternoon with his wife and teen-age son in tow. Hung over, he explained he could only stay 15 minutes. He stayed six hours.

Bob Smith's drinking has been a serious problem since he had been at medical school. The suffering involved in maintaining a faade through the subsequent years had been considerable. Fifty-five years old, he had by all accounts been an excellent doctor. Now, however, his career was in ruin, and his financial position desperate.

At the invitation of Bob's wife, Anne, Bill stayed with the Smiths for the rest of his time in Akron. A month later, Bob took his last drink. Only weeks later Bob and Bill carried the message to another man, Bill D., a lawyer who had had to be tied to his hospital bed after he had blackened the eyes of two nurses. Bill D. found permanent sobriety.

Through Bob and Bill's efforts the self-help society began to grow. Bill was the pioneer, the promoter and the organizer, but Bob was unsurpassed at working personally with alcoholics. In the next few years, he would treat thousands without charge--in addition to rebuilding his career as a surgeon. "It is difficult," wrote a priest who worked with Bob, "to speak of Dr. Smith without going into eulogistic superlatives. While he lived, he laughed them off, and now, though [he is] dead, I feel he still laughs them off." A classmate from medical school recalls a day near the end of Bob's life in 1950. "One of the outstanding incidents of my life is the Sunday we spent with him at his home in Akron. It was something like people coming to Lourdes--people he'd never seen or heard of. One was a dean of a large college in Ohio. Two people who stand out in my memory were a lawyer and his wife. They had driven all the way from Detroit to tell him what he'd done for them through AA."

Two years after their first meeting, Bill and Bob could count at least 40 sober alcoholics, some of them "very grim, last-gasp cases that had been sober a couple of years." They realized the chain reaction they had started could spread throughout the world. "What a tremendous realization that was!" Bill wrote. "At last we were sure. There would be no more flying totally blind."

While Bob continued to build the fellowship in Akron, Bill began writing a book (Alcoholic Anonymous: AA members call it "The Big Book") about its methods and philosophy. Until then AA's message had been transmitted exclusively face-to-face. For a while, it seemed that the potent magic of that message had been lost in print--the book simply didn't sell. Local newspapers and word-of-mouth continued, however, to spread the news of hope for alcoholics, and before long a steady trickle of orders began coming in.

Then Jack Alexander began working on an article about AA for The Saturday Evening Post. Initially prepared to debunk the fellowship, Alexander, after an exhaustive investigation, became an enthusiastic believer. No sooner had his article appeared in the March 1, 1941, Post than the group's small office in New York was swamped with orders for the book and letters asking for assistance. Somehow, the staff (a young woman, Ruth Hock) and volunteers (everybody else) managed to send a personal reply to each inquiry. Throughout North America (and indeed, the world) the Big Book took the place of the personal "sponsorship" that had brought sobriety to pre-1941 members.

AA almost burst upon the world too soon. At the time of the Post explosion, it had just begun to develop its unique "corporate poverty" policy--without which it could not have attained its present power and importance.

Money had been a problem for Bill and Bob from the start. Both had spent their early years of sobriety in straitened circumstances. When AA was three years old, Bill was offered "an office, a decent drawing account and a very healthy slice of the profits" of Towns hospital in exchange for "moving his work" into that institution. Initially he was delighted, but other members of the New York group persuaded him to refuse. (Today, many AA members work as paid alcoholism counselors--but in the fellowship's formative years salaries might have been too heavy a strain on AA's all-important tradition of free and voluntary assistance.) Shortly after deciding to keep his AA work non-professional, Bill lost his home. For the next two years he and Lois lived with friends and moved more than 50 times before they could afford their own home.

Renouncing personal gain, Bill, however, clung to the idea that AA itself should be liberally funded. He believed that AA should build a chain of hospitals and mount a public education campaign. With these aims in mind, he and his associates approached John D. Rockefeller, Jr., for financial assistance. Rockefeller dispatched an investigator to Akron. The report he received made him a life-long supporter of the group--and a firm believer that money would spoil it. In 1940, he gave a dinner for AA and invited the leading members of New York's financial community. At this dinner, he asked his son Nelson to announce that he (John D.) was donating only $1,000 and to explain that AA required little more in the way of financial assistance. The other guests followed suit--one banker sent a check for $10!

Likewise, some members of the fellowship now began questioning whether they really wanted a well-funded organization with a powerful executive. AA had, after all, been founded on the power and enthusiasm of the individual. While the group debated this issue, the steady growth of the first years was suddenly overtaken by waves of new members in the wake of the Post article. AA began to realize it enjoyed a fabulous amount of good will. It did not need Rockefeller.

The issue of funding came to a head when one-well-wisher left AA a legacy of $10,000. After a lively discussion, the group made a unique decision. They would not accept it. ". . . [A]t the slightest intimation to the general public from our Trustees that we needed money, we could become immensely rich. Compared to this prospect the $10,000 was not much, but like the alcoholic's first drink, it would, if taken, inevitably set up a disastrous chain reaction. Where would that land us? Whoever pays the piper calls the tune, and if the AA foundation obtained money from outside sources, its Trustees might be tempted to run things without reference to the wishes of AA as a whole. Every alcoholic feeling relieved of responsibility would shrug and say, 'Oh the foundation is wealthy! Why should I bother?' The pressure of that fat treasury would surely tempt the Board to do good with such funds, and so divert AA from its primary purpose." As the result of this decision, AA neither solicits nor accepts any outside contributions. Only members may contribute, and even they are asked not to donate more than $500 per year.

What does surrender mean?

For reasons still obscure, the program and the fellowship of AA could cause a surrender, which in turn would lead to a period of no drinking. It became ever more apparent that in everyone's psyche there existed an unconquerable ego which bitterly opposed any thought of defeat. Until that ego was somehow reduced or rendered ineffective, no likelihood of surrender could be anticipated.

AA, still very much in its infancy, was celebrating a third or fourth anniversary of one of the groups. The speaker immediately preceding me told in detail of the efforts of his local groups—which consisted of two men—to get him to dry up and become its third member. After several months of vain efforts on their part and repeated nose dives on his, the speaker went on to say: "Finally, I got cut down to size and have been sober ever since," a matter of some two or three years. When my turn came to speak, I used his phrase "cut down to size," as a text around which to weave my remarks. Before long, out of the corner of my eye, I became conscious of a disconcerting stare. It was coming from the previous speaker.

It was perfectly clear: He was utterly amazed that he had said anything which made sense to a psychiatrist. The incident showed that two people, one approaching the matter clinically and the other relying on his won intuitive report of what has happened to him, both came up with exactly the same observation: the need for ego reduction. It is common knowledge that a return of the full-fledged ego can happen at any time. Years of sobriety are no insurance against its resurgence. No AA's, regardless of their veteran status, can ever relax their guard against a reviving ego. The function of surrender in AA is now clear. It produces that stopping by causing the individual to say, "I quit. I give up on my headstrong ways. I've learned my lesson." Very often for the first time in that individual's adult career, he has encountered the necessary discipline that halts him in his headlong pace. Actually, he is lucky to have within him the capacity to surrender. It is that which differentiates him from the wild animals. And this happens because we can surrender and truly feel, "Thy will, not mine, be done."

Unfortunately, that ego will return unless the individual learns to accept a disciplined way of life, which means the tendency toward ego comeback, is permanently checked. This is not news to AA members. They have learned that a single surrender is not enough. Under the wise leadership of the AA "founding fathers" the need for continued endeavor to maintain that miracle has been steadily stressed. The Twelve Steps urge repeated inventories, not just one, and the Twelfth Step is in itself a routine reminder that one must work at preserving sobriety. Moreover, it is referred to as Twelfth Step work—which is exactly what it is. By that time, the miracle is for the other person.

Hi,

The
Henry Tiebout article,
"When the Big "I" Becomes Nobody," was reprinted by the Eugene, Oregon newsletter, E.V.I. News, in June of 2001. It is available online as a file at <http://www.efn.org/~eviaa/pdfs/NewsJun01.pdf>
PDF

It's
a fascinating read.

Hi

I've

found only one reference to Buddhism by Tiebout (he refers to the Zen variant).

In

Grapevine issue 22, number 4 (September 1965) Tiebout authored an article:

"When the Big "I" Becomes Nobody" (he emphasizes the need for reduced ego and humility as a safeguard against alcohol). The article is reprinted in "Harry Tiebout -The Collected Writings" Hazelden Pittman Archives Press, Order No. 1119. Pages 114-115. An excerpt:

"The

great religions are conscious of the need for nothingness if one is to attain Grace. In the New Testament, Mathew 18:3-4, quotes Christ with these words: 'Truly I say to you, unless you turn and become like children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven. Whoever humbles himself like this child, he is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven.'

Zen

teaches the release of nothingness. A famous series of pictures designed to show growth in man's nature ends with a circle enclosed in a square.

The circle depicts man in a state of nothingness ... the square represent the framework of limitations man must learn to live within. In this state 'Nothing is easy, nothing hard' and so Zen, too, has linked nothingness, humbleness and Grace. ..."

Just

a thought: Harry Tiebout's son, Harry Tiebout, Jr., was a philosophy professor who taught a very popular course in world religions at the University of Illinois.

His particular area of expertise was Asian religion, at a time when few people knew much about it. I have wondered if Tiebout Sr.'s observations about Buddhism and recovery developed through correspondence with his son.

I have seen references to an article on the subject (by Tiebout Sr.)
but it doesn't seem to be accessible.

On the outside I looked prosperous, but inside I was tormented by feelings of inadequacy. When I was 40, an enormous swelling was diagnosed as advanced cirrhosis of the liver. I had been getting purplish bruises all over my body and suffered nose- bleeds - all typical of this kind of liver damage. Once, on a business trip, I couldn't stop vomiting blood and lost half of all I had. My life was saved with transfusions. But I couldn't stop drinking, even after I had another hemorrhage.

Finally, my physician gave up on me and sent me to Dr. Harry M. Tiebout, one of the few psychiatrists then practicing who were sympathetic toward Alcoholics Anonymous and who recognized alcoholism as a disease, not a character flaw. Tiebout suggested I go to A.A., but I was too far gone to quit drinking at that point, and so was committed to High Watch Farm in Kent, Conn. There I took the first of A.A.'s 12 steps: I admitted I was powerless over alcohol, that my life had become unmanageable. On July 4, 1961, I joined the fellowship of A.A. and started a sober life.

Three years later when I volunteered to help A.A. with public relations, I met Bill W. He was a legend, and I was nervous as I entered his Manhattan office.

Bill was slouched in a chair, his feet up on a battered oak desk that was scarred with dozens of burn marks from cigarette stubs. When he stood he was about six feet, two inches - slender and loose-limbed. He had a long face and sparkling blue eyes. He acted as if meeting me was the nicest thing that had happened to him in years. "I'm Bill," he said, stretching out his hand. "I'm a drunk."

I started mumbling how I owed him my life, and Bill, embarrassed, looked at the floor and said, "Just pass it on."

In time, I became a voluntary trustee of A.A. and came into regular contact with Bill W. At conferences and board meetings, I often watched him seek out newcomers off in a corner. He knew the loneliness, the shyness and the insecurity of the alcoholic. "I'm Bill," he'd greet them, just as he had me. "I'm a drunk." I never heard him use the word "alcoholic" when referring to himself.

Bill acted and seemed like an ordinary man. But he was an extraordinary ordinary man. It didn't take me long to realize that everybody who knew him had wonderful stories to tell about Bill and his wife, Lois, who co- founded Al-Anon for the families of alcoholics. But nobody had a better story to tell than Bill himself.

He called it the "bedtime story." I heard it first in 1966 at the office Christmas party, but he had been telling it for years. We had gathered for fruit punch, cookies and carol singing. Then, as people sat on desks and chairs, there was an expectant silence. Bill W. had been standing by the punch bowl. Now, with a slithering, corkscrew motion, he settled on the floor and started to talk.

East Dorset, Vt., boasted fewer than 500 inhabitants when Bill W. was born there on November 26, 1895. He grew up in a home torn by arguments, which often led to Papa's going away for a few days. Bill felt that sense of some disaster lurking around the corner which many children of broken homes experience. It tormented him as he got older. When he was ten, his parents divorced and went their separate ways - something almost unheard of in 1906. Bill was left with his maternal grandparents.

To make up for his loneliness and feelings of inadequacy, Bill became an over compensator. At age 12, he began to show drive, ambition, competitiveness. When his grandfather read a book about Australia and told Bill that only a native of that country could make a boomerang, Bill spent six months whittling until he carved one that worked. Later, he saw that boomerang as a curse - because it proved to his ego that he had the tenacity and will to be "number one" at anything - music, sports, science. For example he fixed a broken fiddle and practiced until he played first violin in the school orchestra. He was not a jock by nature, but he drove himself and became captain of the baseball team.

In nearby Manchester, a popular summer resort, Bill got to know Ebby Thatcher, from Albany. The Two young men became lifelong friends. In 1913, two years after meeting Ebby, Bill met and fell in love with another summer visitor, a slim, dark-haired girl from a well-to-do Brooklyn, N.Y., family. Lois's love for Bill was as burning and constant as his for her, a love that was to survive the vicissitudes of all his years of alcoholism. But alcoholism was still far down the road.

Bill W. did not take a single drink of alcohol until he was a 22- year-old army officer stationed near New Bedford, Mass., during World War I. The shy young man from Vermont felt clumsy and out of place at social gatherings - until someone gave him a Bronx cocktail, a mix of gin, sweet and dry vermouth, and orange juice.

"That barrier," he said, sighing, "that had always stood between me and other people came down. I felt I belonged that I was part of life. What magic there was in those drinks! I could talk and be clever."

Unlike some alcoholics who go through a slow process of increasing dependency, Bill became a blackout drinker from the start. He was one of those persons in whom alcohol powerfully alters mind and emotion. The first drink sets up a craving for a second and the drinker has absolutely no control if he takes the first.

Bill was careful to restrain his drinking when he was with Lois and her family. He and Lois were married before he was shipped to France as a second lieutenant in the Coast Artillery. There, he discovered fine burgundy and cognac. By the time the war was over in 1918, he had proved to himself again that he was a "number one" man, a leader of men, a hero.

When Bill returned to the States, he and Lois lived with her parents. By day he worked as a fraud investigator for an insurance firm. At night he attended Brooklyn Law School. Soon he was fascinated by the stock market and became a successful analyst, speculator, and wheeler-dealer, with clients at several brokerage houses on Wall Street.

But Bill's drinking was taking over. He was too drunk to pass his final exam at Brooklyn Law. Any disappointment - or success-now became an excuse for getting drunk.

And when Bill drank, he often became abusive and violent. He got into fight with waiters, cabdrivers, bartenders, strangers. In the morning, after moods of guilt and remorse` he would swear to Lois that he would never drink again. By evening, he was drunk.

For a long time, Bill and Lois were able to delude themselves. They lived in a luxurious apartment, joined country clubs. As late as 1928, Bill was making thousands of dollars and drinking much of it away. Some mornings Lois found him dead drunk, asleep, outside the apartment house.

The stock-market crash in October 1929 wrecked whatever Bill's drinking had not. Deeply in debt, he and Lois again moved in with her parents. Lois got a job at Macy's. Bill now lived to drink, because he had to drink to live. "Like other alcoholics," Bill told us, "I hid liquor like a squirrel stores nuts - in the attic, underneath flooring, in the flush box of toilets. When Lois was out working, I'd replenish my secret supply. I was now drinking for oblivion - two, even three bottles of gin a day."

By 1932, Bill had begun to fear for his sanity, "Once, in a drunken fit," he said, "I threw a sewing machine at Lois - my dear Lois. Another time I got mad at her and stormed through the house kicking out door panels, smashing walls with my fists. I remember a night when I was in such hell that I was afraid the demons inside me would propel me through the window. I dragged my mattress downstairs so I couldn't suddenly leap out."

By midsummer of 1934, Bill entered New York City's Charles B. Towns Hospital, which specialized in the treatment of alcoholism. Most people regarded alcoholics as persons who lacked willpower, character and moral discipline. But Bill's doctor at Towns, William Duncan Silkworth, was one of the few medical men to conclude that alcoholism is a sickness. He told Lois that not many alcoholics as far down the slope as Bill was ever recovered. He was already showing signs of brain damage. Bill would have to be confined for the rest of his life.

But Bill looked so robust after the treatment that he went home. This time he stayed sober for several months. However the morning following Armistice Day, Lois found him in a stupor, hanging on the fence outside the house. They looked at each other and Bill saw the last gleam of hope dying in her eyes. He knew he was doomed. Well, so be it, he thought. He resigned himself. As long as I have my gin.

Not long afterward, Ebby Thatcher, Bill's old friend and fellow drinker, phoned. What a strange coincidence! (We in A.A. say that a coincidence is a miracle in which God chooses to remain anonymous.) Bill invited him over. How good it would be to share a few with his former drinking buddy.

Soon the doorbell rang. There stood Ebby - clear of eye and clean of breath.

"What's gotten into you, Ebby?" Bill asked.

Ebby grinned and replied, "I've got religion."

So Ebby had become a starry-eyed crackpot. " I figured he'd start preaching at me," Bill recalled. "he didn't. He just told me how his drinking had gotten out of hand, how he'd been in trouble with the law, and how a couple of friends had given him a place to live." One of them, Roland Hazard, a hopeless drunk, had been in and out of sanitariums for years. He finally went to Carl Jung, the Swiss Psychoanalyst. Was there no hope? Rowland asked.

"Yes, " Jung had said. In rare instances alcoholics had powerful spiritual experiences, "emotional displacements and rearrangements," which suddenly turned them around. Jung had tried for such a change in Rowland and failed.

But one day Rowland attended a meeting of an organization called the Oxford Group - where people gathered to talk about their shortcomings and to follow certain precepts. There Rowland experienced a profound change of emotions and found a direct contact with God. He stopped drinking.

When Rowland told his story to Ebby in Vermont, the first link in the chain of what would become Alcoholics Anonymous was forged. And now Ebby was carrying the message to Bill.

"Ebby told me he had to admit he was licked," Bill said. "He had to openly admit his sins, make restitution to people he had harmed, and give love without a price tag. He had to pray to whatever God he believed in - and if he didn't believe in a God, to act as if he did. Ebby told me he hadn't had a drink for six months.

"A couple of weeks later, after another bender, I went back to Towns Hospital and checked myself in. Ebby came to see me. Get honest with yourself, he said. Talk it out with somebody else. But I didn't want any part of this God foolishness. Pray to whatever God you think is out there, Ebby said. That's all there was to it."

During one more sleepless night, Bill fell to the "very bottom," and "my stubborn pride was wiped out." He called out, " if there is a God, let him show himself! I am ready to do anything!"

Suddenly, the hospital room "Lit up with a great white light." A strange ecstasy flooded through him. "A wind not of air but of spirit was blowing," was how he described it. "I felt at peace... and I thought, No matter how wrong things seem to be, things are all right with God and his world. "

Bill was discharged on December 18, 1934. He never took another drink of alcohol. But he was always at pains to reassure us that most alcoholics did not have sudden blinding experiences like his. Most of us found a God, a higher power of our own, very slowly.

In the beginning months of his own sobriety, Bill pulled drunks out of bars and took them to Oxford Group meetings. He preached at them. Nobody stayed sober. He tried helping patients at Towns Hospital. He failed. Dr. Silkworth told Bill to talk with drunks, not at them, and to stress the hopelessness of the disease.

>In his studies on the addictions, Rado³ more explicitly asserts that the Ego >must be reduced. He first portrays the Ego as follows: "Once it was a baby, >radiant with self-esteem, full of belief in the omnipotence of its wishes, >of its thoughts, gestures and words." Then, on the process of Ego-reduction:
>"But the child's megalomania melted away under the inexorable pressure of >experience. Its sense of its own sovereignty had to make room for a more >modest self evaluation. This process, first described by Freud, may be >designated the reduction in size of the original ego; it is a painful >procedure and one that is possibly never completely carried out."

>

>No Compromise With Ego

>

>Like Freud, Rado thinks only in terms of reduction; the need for the >complete elimination of Ego is a stand which they cannot bring themselves to >assume. Hence they unwittingly advocate the retention of some infantile >traits, with no clear awareness that trading with the devil, the Ego, no >matter how carefully safeguarded, merely keeps him alive and likely at any >occasion to erupt full force into action. There can be no successful >compromise with Ego, a fact not sufficiently appreciated by many, if not >most, therapists.

>

>Thus the dilemma encountered in ego-reduction would be best resolved by >recognizing that the old Ego must go and a new one take its place. Then no >issue would arise about how much of the earliest elements may be retained.
>The answer, theoretically, is none. Actually the total banishment of the >initial state is difficult to achieve. Man can only grow in the direction of >its complete elimination. Its final expulsion is a goal which we can only >hope.

>

>The second question raised here is, "How does the surrender reaction change >the inner psychic picture?" This question is based on a presupposition, >namely that surrender is an emotional step in which the Ego, at least for >the time being, acknowledges that it is no longer supreme. This >acknowledgment is valueless if limited to consciousness; it must be >accompanied by similar feelings in the unconscious. For the alcoholic, >surrender is marked by the admission of being powerless over alcohol. His >sobriety has that quality of peace and tranquility which makes for a lasting >quiet within only if the surrender is effective in the unconscious and >permanent as well.

>

>The effects of surrender upon the psyche are extremely logical: The traits >listed as~ >characteristic of the Ego influence are canceled out. The opposite of king >is the >commoner. Appropriately, Alcoholics Anonymous stresses humility. The >opposite of >impatience is the ability to take things in stride, to make an inner reality >of the slogan,

>"Easy does it." The opposite of drive is staying in one position where one >can be >open-minded, receptive and responsive.

>This picture of the non-Ego type of person might be amplified in many >directions but to do so would serve no immediate purpose. To have discussed >the effect of the Ego upon behavior, and to have pointed out what may happen >when the Ego is at least temporarily knocked out of action, is sufficient >to, make the point of this communication: It is the Ego which is the >arch-enemy of sobriety, and it is the Ego which must be disposed of if the >individual is to attain a new way of life

>

>Up to this point, no clinical material has been submitted to confirm the >ideas presented. Their validity will be apparent to many therapists. One >brief citation from clinical experience will be offered, however, in the >hope that it may serve as a concrete illustration of these ideas.

>

>The patient, a man in his late 30's, had a long history of alcoholism with 7 >years of futile attempts to recover through Alcoholics Anonymous, >interspersed with countless admissions to "drying out" places. Then, for >reasons not totally clear, he decided to take a drastic step. He determined >to enter a sanatorium and place himself in the hands of a psychiatrist, a >hitherto unheard of venue. We planned to arrange for a limited stay at a >sanitarium where he could have regular interviews with me.

>

>>From the outset, he was undeniably in earnest, although it was only after >the first interview that he really let go and could talk freely about >himself and the things that were going on inside him. After the usual >preliminaries, the first interview started with a discussion of feelings and >how they operate. The patient was questioned about the word Ego as used at >A.A. meetings. He confessed his ignorance of its true meaning and listened >with interest to brief remarks on how it works. Before long, he was locating >in himself some of the Ego forces which hitherto he had been vigorously >denying because they savored too much of vanity and selfishness with that >recognition, the patient made a revealing remark. He said, in all sincerity, >"My goodness, I never knew that. You don't do your thinking up here >(pointing to his head), you think down here where you feel" placing his >hands on his stomach. He was learning that his feelings had a "mind" of >their own and that unless he heeded what they were saying, he could easily >get into trouble. He was facing the actuality of his Ego as a feeling >element in his life, a step he was able to take because he was no longer >going at full steam ahead. His decision to place himself under care, a >surrender of a sort, had quieted him and made him receptive, able to observe >what was going on in himself. It was the beginning of a real inventory.

>

>The next insight he uncovered was even more startling. He had been requested >routinely to report any dreams he would have. Much to his surprise, they >appeared regularly during the period of contact. In his fifth dream, the >patient found himself locked up in an institution because of his drinking.
>The interpretation offered, based upon relevant materials, was that the >patient equated any kind of stopping with being locked up; that his real >difficulty lay in the fact that he could not tolerate being stopped, and >abstaining was merely another stopping he could not take. The patient's >reaction to the interpretation was most significant. He remained silent for >some little time; then he began to talk, saying, "I tell you, Doc, it was >like this. I'd get drunk, maybe stay on it 2 or 3 days, then I'd go into one >of those drying out places where I'd stay 5 or 6 days and I'd be all over >wanting a drink. Then I'd come out and stay sober, maybe a week, 'maybe a >month, but pretty soon the thought would come into my mind, I want to drink!
>Maybe I'd go into a tavern and maybe not, but sooner or later I'd go and I'd >order a drink, but I wouldn't drink it right off. I'd put it on the bar and >I'd look at it and I'd think and then I'd look and think: King for a day!"
>The connection between Ego and his own conduct had become explicit, as well >as the relationship between not being stopped and Ego. He saw clearly that >when he took that drink, he was the boss once more. Any previous reduction >of Ego had been only temporary.

>

>In treatment, the problem is to make that reduction permanent. Therapy is >centered on the ways and means, first, of bringing the Ego to earth, and >second, keeping it there. The discussion of this methodology would be out of >place here, but it is relevant to emphasize one point, namely the >astonishing capacity of the Ego to pass out of the picture and then reenter >it, blithe and intact. A patient's dream neatly depicted this quality. This >patient dreamt that he was on the twelfth floor balcony of a New York hotel.
>He threw a rubber ball to the pavement below and saw it rebound to the level >of the balcony. Much to his amazement, the ball again dropped and again >rebounded to the same height. This continued for an indefinite period and, >as he was watching, a clock in a neighboring church spire struck nine. Like >the cat with nine lives, the Ego has a marvelous capacity to scramble back >to safety -- a little ruffled, perhaps, but soon operating with all its >former aplomb, convinced once more that now it, the Ego, can master all >events and push on ahead.

>

>The capacity of the Ego to bypass experience is astounding and would be >humorous were it not so tragic in its consequences. Cutting the individual >down to size and making the results last is a task never completely >accomplished. The possibility of a return of his Ego must be faced by every >alcoholic. If it does return, he may refrain from drinking, but he will >surely go on a "dry drunk," with all the old feelings and attitudes once >more asserting themselves and making sobriety a shambles of discontent and >restlessness. Not until the ego is decisively retired can peace and quiet >again prevail. As one sees this struggle in process, the need for the >helping hand of a Deity becomes clearer. Mere man alone all too often seems >powerless to stay the force of his Ego. He needs assistance and needs it >urgently.

>
>Summary

>
>In the process of surrender which the alcoholic necessarily undergoes before >his alcoholism can be arrested, the part of the personality which must >surrender is the inflated Ego. This aspect of personality was identified as >immature traits carried over from infancy into adulthood, specifically, a >feeling of omnipotence, inability to tolerate frustration, and excessive >drive, exhibited in the need to do all things precipitously. The manner in >which surrender affects the Ego was discussed and illustrated briefly from >clinical experience. The object of therapy is to permanently replace the old >Ego and its activity.

Hi Bob

The short answer to your question is in the Service Manual (page S13 - 1998-1999 edition).

It explicitly indicates that Rockefeller was paid back sometime in 1944. The info below might also be useful.

Dec. 1937: Bill's brother-in-law, Dr. Leonard V. Strong, set up a meeting with Willard S. Richardson (manager of John D. Rockefeller's philanthropies). A second meeting was held and included Bill, Dr. Bob, Hank P., Fitz M. and Ned P. (a new man). Other attendees were Dr. Silkworth, Richardson, Frank Amos, A. LeRoy Chipman and Albert Scott. (AACOA 147-149, BW-RT 245-246, NG 65-66, PIO 181-185)

Feb. 1, 1938: Frank Amos went to Akron, OH to inspect the group there. He made a very favorable report to Willard Richardson who presented it to John D. Rockefeller Jr. urging a donation of $50,000. (Note: BW-FH 105-106 says $10,000, $5,000 a year for 2 years). (SM S3, BW-RT 246, LR 197, DBGO 128-135, BW-FH 105-106, PIO 185-187, LOH 143, AGAA 217) Rockefeller refused to make the $50,000 donation but provided $5,000 to be held in a fund in the treasury of the Riverside Church. Much of the fund was used to pay off Dr. Bob's mortgage and provide Bill and Bob with $30 a week as long as the fund lasted (BW-RT 247, AACOA 149-151, DBGO 135, PIO 187-188)

Feb. 8, 1940 John D. Rockefeller Jr. held a dinner for AA at the Union League Club. 75 of his 400 invited guests and friends attended. Nelson Rockefeller hosted the dinner in the absence of his ill father. The dinner raised $2,200 ($1,000 came from Rockefeller). Rockefeller and his dinner guests provided about $3,000 a year for the next 4 years (to 1945). This was accomplished through the Alcoholic Foundation, which raised funds and received the income from sales of the Big Book. (LR 197, BW-RT 264-267, AACOA viii, 182-187, NG 92-94, BW-FH 109-112, PIO 232-235).

1942: Board Trustee A. LeRoy Chipman asked John D. Rockefeller Jr. and his 1940 dinner guests for $8,500 to buy back the remaining outstanding shares of Works Publishing Inc. stock. Rockefeller lent $4,000, his son Nelson $500 and the other dinner guests $4,000. Rockefeller's custom was to forgive $1 of debt for each $1 repaid. The money was to be repaid out of the Big Book profits at a later date. Two years later the Big Book sales had done so well AA was able to pay off the whole Rockefeller loan. (AACOA 189, BW-FH 110-111, SM S7, S13, LOH 148, Note AACOA says $8,000)

1945: The Foundation wrote to John D. Rockefeller, Jr. and the 1940 dinner guests that AA no longer needed their financial help. Big Book royalties could look after Dr. Bob and Bill and group contributions could pay the general office expenses. This ended all "outside contributions" to AA. (AACOA 203-204)

Cheers

Arthur

Dear AA History Lovers,

Our fellowship received money from the Rockefeller Foundation in the late 1930s and again in 1940. I am of the impression that AA eventually repaid the Foundation in full. I think Bill W. stated this fact on one of his tapes, but I would like to authenticate this fact in AA printed literature. I have researched much of the available conference approved literature, plus Not God, but can find no reference to this happenstance.

I would appreciate help in this matter.

Thank you,

Bob S., Richmond, IN

More and more Americans are struggling to break the grip of drugs and alcohol-and they're turning to a growing network of treatment programs for help.

Getting Straight

The snapshot is frightening: a grinning skeleton of a man wearing a LaCoste shirt. "Look at that," says Paul, 37, a lawyer and owner of a trucking firm. "Matchsticks for arms and slits for eyes. Eighty-seven pounds and coked out of my gourd." In the five years before the photo was taken, Paul explains, he "snorted away" his wife, his suburban home and $500,000. After the drug ate away the cartilage inside his nose, he bought liquid cocaine and dropped it into his eyes. Then a year and a half ago, shortly after posing for the cadaverous photo, Paul pointed a .38 pistol at his head; luckily, his girlfriend managed to wrest it away. "That night I saw an ad on TV for a cocaine hot line," recalls Paul, who now weighs 200 pounds. "If I hadn't called, you would have read an obituary last year about an 87-pound man who blew his brains out."

Paul is just one of hundreds of thousands of Americans who in the past few years have tuned in to the realization that drugs and alcohol were killing them, turned on to the help offered by a growing network of treatment facilities-and dropped out of the drug culture. The common perception is that more Americans than ever are abusing drugs and alcohol while comparatively few of those already addicted are seeking help, but U.S. government officials maintain that the opposite is true: they call it "the cooling of America."

"Since 1979, in terms of national levels of the numbers of people using drugs and, to a lesser extent, alcohol," reports Dr. William Pollin, director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, "there has very clearly been a peaking, a leveling off and the beginning of a downward trend. This is really a dramatic change from the explosion of past years."

In fact, the surprising possibility that there may now be more people trying to kick habits and fewer getting hooked is beginning to be borne out by statistics on cocaine abuse. According to NIDA, of the 35 million Americans who were users (defined as those who used drugs 20 days out of the month immediately preceding the survey) of illicit drugs in 1982, 4.1 million used cocaine-down from 4.5 million in 1979. And government surveys indicate that between 1976 and 1981 there was an astounding 600 percent increase in the number of Americans who sought help for cocaine abuse in publicly funded programs. While there are no available statistics that reflect a surge of enrollment in the private programs that coke users prefer, experts also noted that reported membership in Alcoholics Anonymous-which has become increasingly involved with cocaine abuse-has more than tripled since 1968, from 170,000 to a total of 586,000.

Candor: By all accounts, the "getting straight" movement began with an unlikely addict: former First Lady Betty Ford, who courageously announced in 1978 that she was about to enter a hospital for treatment to combat her dependency on alcohol and painkillers. Most drug counselors agree that just as Mrs. Ford's candor about her mastectomy a few years earlier made it much easier for other American women to handle their own struggles with breast cancer, her public acknowledgment of her addiction to alcohol and drugs took away a great deal of the stigma and shame attached to those problems. "Betty Ford has done more to get people in treatment than any government program," declares Dr. David Smith, who in 1967 founded-and still runs-the Haight-Ashbury Free Medical Clinic in San Francisco. Adds Larry Meredith, program chief of San Francisco's Community Substance Abuse Services: "Betty Ford made it okay and respectable-almost in vogue-to have a problem and deal with it. She has been a national treasure."

But she was only the beginning. After she went public with her problem, a stream of similar announcements from politicians, athletes and especially entertainers quickly swelled to a flood, as every actor in Hollywood suddenly seemed to be queuing up for a chance to confess all on "Good Morning, America." Several—including recovered alcoholics Jason Robards and Daniel Travanti, star of NBC's popular "Hill Street Blues"—have taken an active role in the crusade to help other alcoholics; both gave up the bottle in 1973. Some celebrities, like Elizabeth Taylor and Johnny Cash—who both went for treatment to the Betty Ford Center that opened in 1982 at the Eisenhower Medical Center near Palm Springs, Calif.—put out forthright press releases that 10 years ago would probably have euphemistically alluded to a hospitalization for "gastritis." Others, like comedian Richard Pryor, spoke out only after their drug or alcohol problems landed them in public trouble.

Athletes, the cherished role models of youth, were also catapulted out of the closet. A claim that 75 percent of National Basketball Association players dabbled in cocaine proved exaggerated—but the image-conscious league and its players' union did adopt the strongest antidrug code in pro sports. Former Super Bowl heroes like Washington Redskins safety Tony Peters and Cincinnati Bengals runner Pete Johnson were caught in the cocaine glare. In baseball, Kansas City outfielder Willie Wilson has been wearing earplugs to keep out the gibes of fans who resent his conviction and jail term for possession.

Whether they resorted to public confession, intensive treatment or earplugs, the celebrities who went public probably opened the straight road to many of their admirers. Says Dr. Carlton Turner, special assistant to the president on drug-abuse policy: "When someone with a position of influence or name recognition says, 'I have a drug problem,' it gives a lot of other people the courage to do the same."

One of those people is Julie, 29, a story editor for a film-production company in Hollywood, who 11 months ago joined Cocaine Anonymous and kicked a heavy cocaine and alcohol habit that was destroying her life. Julie exemplifies several significant trends that characterize a new breed of addicts who are showing up for treatment: she is a woman, she was addicted to more than one drug and she sought treatment in a program based on Alcoholics Anonymous, the venerable organization founded in 1935 to help alcoholics stay sober through mutual support, self-examination and spiritual guidance. Also like Julie, a growing number of the men and women who are flocking to alcohol and drug (A and D) rehabilitation programs are educated members of the upper-middle class: doctors, lawyers, bankers and other professionals.

Mixers: They seek help in a wide variety of settings, ranging from church basements to locked units in psychiatric hospitals to cabins with breathtaking views. But what distinguishes them most from an earlier generation of addicts is "polyabuse," the current medical buzzword that describes their dependency on a combination of alcohol and drugs, or on more than one chemical substance.

An estimated 10 million Americans are problem drinkers. "But it's very hard to find a pure alcoholic these days," notes Paul Sherman, a Rye, N.Y., consultant on executive substance abuse. "Most of them are mixers," agrees Donnie Brown, executive director of Metro Atlanta Recovery Residences, Inc., "and I'm talking about everyone from street people all the way up to doctors." A good example is Johnny, 30, a Los Angeles actor and ex-abuser who started doing drugs at 15 and who got straight two years ago. "I was a garbage-can addict," he recalls. "I wasn't choosy. I took pills, drank like a fish, used hallucinogens, did cocaine. I would carry a small aspirin box which contained all the pills I needed, according to how I wanted to feel."

Cocaine users are especially likely to abuse-and become dependent on-a Smorgasbord of "downers" to combat the jittery, strung-out irritability coke induces. Alcohol, sedatives and tranquilizers are widely used for this purpose, along with another depressant that a small but growing number of heavy users consider the perfect antidote to the cocaine jitters: heroin.

The new candor about A and D addiction may be the catalyst that has enable so many drinkers and drug users to throw away their pipes, syringes, pillboxes, bottles, spoons and straws, but a number of social, economic and historical influences have also combined to provide just the right climate for the getting-straight movement.

For one thing, the enormous numbers of young people who experimented with marijuana and LSD in the 1960s and 1970s didn't all grow up and grow out of their habits.

Some kept on trying new highs and, inevitably, many of them got hooked. Now entering middle age, these "baby boomers" are trying to put their lives in order by kicking drugs. Another important factor, says NIDA's Dr. Carl Leukefeld, is the current American enthusiasm for physical fitness and self-improvement, combined with a growing awareness of the health risks drugs and heavy alcohol use carry.

Perhaps most important, America has changed its attitude towards addiction. "The alcohol and drug addict has always been looked at in a moralistic way," says Dr. G.

Douglas Talbot, a rehabilitation expert who operates the Ridgeview Institute Chemical Dependency Program in Smyrna, Ga. "But now it's being recognized more and more that this is a disease. That perception has made more people come into treatment."

Economic factors have also played a role in encouraging drug-dependent Americans to get help. Large businesses have realized that it is far more cost-effective to get substance-abusing employees rehabilitated than to hire and retrain new ones; thus, many firms have developed Employee Assistance Programs (EAP's) for addiction.

Although many insurance plans will still offer coverage for treatment of alcohol but not other drugs, next month Blue Cross and Blue Shield will launch a pioneering new "substance abuse benefit" that emphasizes early identification and intervention and will cover up to 165 days of treatment.

Discreet: Without insurance, the cost of getting straight can be truly prohibitive-as much as $350 a day at posh private hospitals like Silver Hill in New Canann,

Conn., and Laurenwood, a three-year-old psychiatric hospital near The Woodlands, Texas, that may soon become an official treatment facility for the drug plagued National Football League. Outpatient programs, of course, cost much less. At New York's Regent Hospital, a discreet private facility that caters primarily to affluent coke addicts, an outpatient program that includes both individual and group therapy costs $185 a week-far less than the $300 to $500 that patients have typically been spending on cocaine.

The seemingly insatiable demand for drug and alcohol-rehabilitation services has spawned a thriving new American industry. Comprehensive Care Corp., based in Newport Beach, Calif., launched its first CareUnit for A and D treatment in 1972; today there are 150 CareUnits in 42 states, with new ones opening at the remarkable rate of two a month. In some cases health care entrepreneurs have joined with chronically underused hospitals to turn their empty wards into profitable drug clinics. In Denver, order rehab centers that once primarily treated alcoholics are now revamping their images and facilities to attract today's younger, more hip polysubstance abuser. Staffers with some of the nonprofit programs refer disparagingly to the new moneymaking outfits as "finger-lickin' franchises."

While there is some controversy over the best way to treat addiction, the vast majority of private rehabilitation centers-some of which are also nonprofit-offer regimens that can be described as variations on a theme. The frills and activities may differ-from strenuous hiking and aquatic relaxation to "meditation walks" and household chores-but the basics remain the same: detoxification (with or without medication), group therapy, family counseling and a long-term outpatient involvement in a self-help support group like AA, sometimes for the rest of the patient's life.

Individual psychotherapy, the rehab experts agree, is notoriously ineffective in treating addiction. "Unfortunately there are large numbers of patients who have lain on psychiatrists' couches, month after month, intoxicated with Demerol, talking about their mothers," observes Dr. Thomas Crowley, executive director of the University of Colorado's highly respected Addiction Research and Treatment Services (ARTS) program. "What they really needed to do was to stop using Demerol." Murray Firestone, a psychologist who heads the rehab program at Beverly Glen Hospital in Los Angeles, agrees. "The No.1 error in treating people with chemical dependency is getting seduced by other problems," he says. "Chemical dependency is their main problem, and if they are loaded when you treat them, you are wasting your time."

Churches: The granddaddy of treatment programs is, of course, AA, which spells out 12 steps to recovery and asks members to place their faith in a "higher power" to help them stay sober. While AA's tenets and structure remain unaltered 49 years after its founding, there are winds of change whistling through the churches, school auditoriums and hospitals where members gather. At almost any meeting, what's new about AA is immediately apparent; recently, there has been a steady and sizable upswing in the number of women, young people and polydrug abusers who have joined. Under-30 membership rose 50 percent between 1977 and 1980, and the trend continues. Women now make up one-third of the membership, compared with 22 percent in 1968. AA has become the program of choice for such a diverse population that some meetings now attract members just from specific groups; there are special meetings for doctors, lawyers, gays and people in the entertainment industry-and one is on posh Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills. No matter what their income is, AA members pay nothing.

Chic: With the influx of younger, hipper members and a less lopsided male-female ratio, some AA meetings have become decidedly more sociable, and even chic: bottles of Perrier are appearing along with the traditional coffee and cookies. Members are discouraged from dating within AA for the first year, but Julie, the Los Angeles editor, admits, "Sometimes I go to a meeting not to be uplifted but because I know a great-looking guy is going to be there." But that doesn't mean she regards her 11-month sobriety lightly. "So it's chic," she shrugs. "So much the better."

Whether the problem is booze, pills. Pot, coke or a pharmacological potpourri, AA is often the solution that works. Indeed, many drug experts believe that all chemical addictions are different faces of the same demon, a craving so strong that it cannot be controlled despite its destructive consequences. "Everybody has bodily needs: to breath, to eat, to have sex, to urinate," observes Dr. David Fram, director of drug-abuse treatment at Washington's Psychiatric Institute. "The best way to think of being addicted to drugs is that you have acquired another body need that that you must pay attention to and that you must fulfill."

According to estimates by the American Medical Association's Committee on Alcoholism, just as many women as men feel that "body need." But in the past, women with alcohol and drug problems were likely to hide at home behind the convenient curtain of housewifery. Today, Today, in most rehab programs, women account for 30 to 40 percent of patients.

Immoral: But traditional attitudes still make it difficult for many women to admit to a drug or alcohol problem. "We're still chauvinistic in our thinking about women who use drugs," says William Johnson of Georgia's Department of Human Resources. "They are thought of as weak sisters, immoral and loose. Men are excused much more easily." Apparently: the National Council on Alcoholism reports that 9 out of 10 wives of alcoholic husbands stand by them, but only 1 in 10 husbands married to alcoholic wives does the same.

"Society expects a lady to drink, but not to have a drinking problem," notes Betty Ford. "I consider it my life's work to remove the stigma from women admitting they are alcoholics." She has made a formidable start at the Betty Ford Center she founded with recovered alcoholic and tire-fortune heir Leonard Firestone. Men and women may choose to live separately during the four to six week-week program. "Women shy away from a lot of subjects when men are around," explains the former First Lady. "Also, men tend to take advantage of women's nurturing nature in group therapy and the women end up worrying about the men instead of themselves."

Although the Betty Ford Center looks like a country club, the program is ascetic. The day begins with an 8 a.m. meditation walk and includes assigned housework for all patients, including male movie stars and Elizabeth Taylor, who didn't flinch when she had to take out the garbage and hose down the patio. No telephone calls are permitted during the first five days, and television-an addiction of a different type-is confined to weekends. The program closely follows AA tenets, especially the emphasis on reliance on others with the same problem.

The Palmer Drug Abuse Program (PDAP), founded in Houston by an Episcopal minister 13 years ago, offers another regimen based on AA principles of mutual support, with a special emphasis on social activities for teen-age addicts. PDAP's division for abusers over 24 is whimsically called Over The Hill, or OTHERs. To Jill, 42, it was a godsend. A secretary addicted to Valium and alcohol, she first joined PDAP because her five children were all doing drugs. It took her three years to acknowledge her own problem. "Finally," she says, "You get sick and tired of getting sick and tired."

Outcon: AA also plays prominent part at Talbott's 50-acre Ridgeview Institute. Talbott, whose career as a prominent Dayton, Ohio, cardiologist crumbled under the weight of alcoholism and drug abuse, believes AA offers the most effective form of treatment available. "And it's nothing more than group therapy," he says. Talbott was instrumental in the rehabilitation of Martha Morrison, now head of the institute's adolescent unit, who says he was the only one she couldn't outcon. "It's very difficult to outcon a con, manipulate a manipulator," says the 59-year-old Talbott.

In Boulder, Colo., the Boulder Psychiatric Institute has launched an addiction program that captures the atmosphere of an exotic retreat within the confines of Boulder Memorial Hospital. Called Day At a Time, the treatment regime for up to 12 patients includes art therapy, yoga, meditation, aquatic-relaxation therapy-and a solid AA orientation. When Sandra Haun, 32, came to Day At a Time, she was desperate. The daughter of two alcoholics-both of whom died from alcohol related problems-Haun claims she was "born alcoholic;" her mother would slip whiskey into her baby bottle when she was cranky as an infant. Addicted to pot and a variety of pills as well as booze, Haun dropped out of college and drifted from job to job. One morning last year, she says, "I woke up and looked in the mirror and saw an old woman at 31. I said to myself, 'If there's a God, I hope he hears me.'" Now in the programs six-month aftercare phase, Haun recognizes that her recovery is only just a beginning. "Alcohol is very cunning and patient," she explains. "It will wait forever. It's always going to be there."

Recently the special hazards facing health-care professionals have received particular attention. Martha Morrison refers to the "M.D.-eity complex. Doctors say, 'I prescribe all these drugs, I make life-or-death decisions; it will never happen to me.'" At Denver's ARTS, which consists of a network of specialized clinics, including two strictly for cocaine and one for addicted health-care professionals, counselors are studying an intriguing but controversial new sobriety incentive that has been described, accurately, as self-blackmail. The plan is known as contingency contracting. An addicted doctor, for example, writes a letter to the state board of medicine admitting he is an addict, and surrendering his license. The letter is deposited with the ARTS director Crowley, and a contract is drawn up directing Crowley to mail the letter if the patient fails-or fails to show up-for one of his regular urine checks for the presence of drugs. Unfortunately, some of the letters have to be mailed.

Skiing: Although alcohol and drugs are sometimes called "social" drugs, addiction is fundamentally a solitary, isolating way of life. Thus a critical aspect of treating alcohol and drug dependency is pulling the patient out of his or her self-involvement and into constructive relationships with others. At the Aspen Addiction Rehabilitation Unit of the Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center, group cohesiveness and reliance on others are fostered by rigorous outdoor activities that include rock climbing, cross-country skiing, rope crossing and log walking. The cooperation required, explains the program director Allen Drum, teaches patients to count on each other for help and prepares them for long-term involvement in support groups like AA, Narcotics Anonymous or Cocaine Anonymous. The three-month-old facility, which treats ten patients at a time in its 28-day program, operates out of a converted 1945 ranch house situated at the base of scientific Buttermilk Mountain.

Abusers can also benefit enormously from the involvement of their families. "This is not the kind of illness a person can have all alone," says Howard McFadden, founder of The Ark, another A and D "retreat" in the Colorado Rockies. "This is a family disease. Family members need treatment, too."

In the past, AA and other rehab groups emphasized that an addict had to "hit bottom" before treatment could be effective. Now many programs encourage deliberate intervention by family, friends or employers, before the abuser has wrecked his life. Sometimes the direct approach works—a firm but friendly confrontation with the addict about the likely consequences of his or her behavior. (Both Betty Ford and Elizabeth Taylor got straight only after their children intervened in this manner.)

In other cases, the intervening person may shock the abuser into self-realization by provoking a crisis; a six-year-old, for example, might say to his father, "I'm afraid of you."

Bottom: Some counselors say that families should—if necessary—force the abuser to go it alone without their emotional or financial support, so that he or she will hit bottom and have to face the problem. At least one psychiatrist believes this was where the Kennedy family may have made its mistake with Robert Jr., 30, who has long struggled with heroin dependency, and David, who died last month of a polydrug overdose at the age of 28. With continuing protection from their family, says the physician, the young men were partly cushioned from the reality of what they were doing to themselves.

Teen-agers who abuse drugs and alcohol rarely bottom out before their parents drag them—sometimes literally kicking and screaming—into a rehab program, and their prospects for recovery are not always bright. According to a just released NIDA study, 40 percent of American high-school seniors have used an illicit drug other than marijuana, and some rehab centers are admitting addicts as young as 12. "The front line in the fight against drugs is the fifth and sixth grades," declares

James P. Comstock, program manager of San Francisco's adolescent Care Unit. Lee Dogoloff, head of the White House office on drug policy in the Carter administration, agrees. "By adolescence it's too late," he warns. "Once the juices start flowing, they can't hear you."

Gary, now 18, didn't hear much of anything after discovering the thrill of marijuana four years ago. "It became a constant struggle to hold onto the feeling," says the youth, who progressed rapidly to speed, Quaaludes, cocaine and LSD until "it was like my brain was fried." At 15 he started dealing. "I'd walk into the bathroom at school and say 'Quaaludes,' and they'd be gone," he reports. By his senior year he was shooting drugs—cocaine, Percodan, anything he could find. It was Gary's

A dry soul is wisest and best.

-Heraclitus

Of all the things that happened on my last binge before going to Alcoholics Anonymous, I remember clearly only one: a powerful, somewhat surprising surge of fellow feeling for a couple standing next to me at a Manhattan bar. The bar was not one of my favourite watering holes. I had none but that time, not much caring where I drank or with whom. But this place was more familiar than most, filled with an ill-assorted crowd of professional people, Hispanics, street people, and the odd preppie. The couple, too, seemed haphazardly matched, and it was evident that before this moment they had never spoken to each other.

The man was black, with a Che beret and wispy chin whiskers. A law school textbook lay open beside his beer. She was drinking spritzers: a woman in her late twenties, in tweeds, and with plain gold hoops in her earlobes. She was white and, as I subsequently overheard, of Irish descent. They were making friends, talking about his ancestors, and it came out that one of his great-great-grandfathers had been a ship captain on the Liverpool - West Indies run. And so, miraculously, had one of hers. Alas, they couldn't prove the link beyond a doubt, for the law school student could not remember his ancestor's last name. But I remember how delighted they were to establish the possibility of one, and how their joy touched off something like it in me, their secret sharer. I felt buoyed up as if on the gentle swells of the sea they'd been taking about: the old oceanic feeling, you might say, but in my condition, rather poignant. Then the couple went on to talk of other things (police brutality, as I recall) and I went back to my bourbon and water.

There are more synonyms for "drunk" than for any other word in the English language. Wentworth and Flexner's Dictionary of American Slang has to resort to an appendix to cover them all. There are 313 words in it. Most of us could add one or two to the collection. I like misjudged, for example: a splendid equivocation by which the drunk manages to suggest that he has merely underestimated the potency of the liquor, or that his behavior is being sadly misunderstood. At any rate, the clear implication of this vast vocabulary is that drunkenness is the most verbal of human conditions until it becomes the most unspeakable.

What intrigues me is the allusion that so many of these words make to the liquidity of drunkenness. We drunks are all sailors, stumbling and reeling from tavern to tavern. But to us it is the world that totters and plunges. Nothing stands still for us, no more than deck furniture stands still in a storm at sea. Everything spins - the faces of friends, the bar, the streets, the bushes in the front yard, the stairs, the toilet, the bed. A drunk's world is hopelessly fluid, now rocking us gently, now breaking over us with blind and cruel force.

Perhaps my fascination with the liquidity of drunkenness is idiosyncratic. It certainly doesn't seem to be shared by my fellow drunks in A.A. At a meeting once, I tried to convey a sense of my drinking career by comparing it to a salmon's epic voyage to the swimming pool. "I drank like that fish swam," I said. I told them how

I dived into the tumbling waters with fervour and rose in glory. What was my quest? It was infraverbal, instinctual. And when I got there, where the waters were still and warm, I found a dreamy breeding ground of the self, with the bright air just above, attainable (wasn't it?) by a mere flick of the tail. But then, immersed in the pool, it seemed that my flesh was flaking off and floating away before my eyes, until at last I was all nerves and eyesight, staring into the fireplace, drinking Gallo from a gallon jug, trying to remember or forget, neither of which I could do, and weeping into my glass.

It seemed a terrific analogy when I launched into it at the meeting, almost a fable. But long before I reached the spawning pool I sensed that many of my fellow alcoholics had gone onto a different wavelength, and thereafter I kept my story plain. An analogy is a way of fishing for the unfamiliar, of catching it on the hook of the familiar. But nothing about drunkenness is unfamiliar to the people at an AA gathering. They want only to have the familiar made vivid, sharp, personal, immediate. They want conceteness: the kind of booze, the names of the bars, what your wife said then, what the cop looked like, how much, when, how long. They want stories.

Drinking, all we did was tell stories, if only to ourselves. Drinking, we built ourselves a drunk's ladder of words, one end propped on clouds, the other end floating on water. The whole ladder is important if you understand drunkards, but the fluid footing is where you begin to understand AA. The fellowship exists to ground the drunk's ladder on solid earth, on common ground, and whether we extend one end of it back up into the heavens or simply lay it down to bridge the chasms between ourselves and others, it is still made of words.*

Elpenor, the youngest of Odysseus's companions, is described in The Odyssey as an ordinary fellow, not overly brave, not particularly wise. He was also the first to die, doing so even before the ordeal of the great captain and his crew had properly begun. The circumstances, however, make his name irresistibly appealing to the writer of this essay, as a pseudonym.

What happened to Elpenor could have been funny. For nine long years Circe, the goddess of human speech, held the Ithacans captive on her remote island, transforming them into dumb animals, slaves of their most ignoble appetites. But then at last Odysseus persuaded Circe to give them speech again, to make them men, and to let them begin their voyage home. One whole day, before setting sail, they spent feasting on meat and wine; then at nightfall they lay down to sleep in Circe's great hall. All but Elpenor: heavy with wine, hot, he found a ladder and climbed up onto the roof. He was still there when Odysseus, down below, roused his comrades in the morning. Poor Elpenor! Springing up at the sound of voices, befuddled, he forgot the ladder he'd come up by and pitched headlong from the roof. "His neck," as T.A. Murray translates Homer's lines, "was broken away from his spine, and his spirit went down to the house of Hades."

But this was not the end of Elpenor's story. When Odysseus's turn came to make his own descent into Hell, Elpenor was the first of all the shades to greet him. "Son of Laertes, sprung from Zeus, Odysseus of many devices," he cried, "an evil doom of some god was my undoing, and measureless wine." He begged a favor of his captain, that when Odysseus gained again the common ground of mortals, "heap up a mound for me on the shore of the grey sea, in memory an unhappy man, that men yet to be may learn of me. Fulfil this prayer, and fix upon the mound my oar wherewith I rowed in life when I was among my comrades."

An A.A. meeting is an answer to a plea which everyone has heard and spoken:

My nerves are bad tonight. Yes, bad. Stay with me. Speak to me. Why do you never speak? Speak.

The ground rules differ from meeting to meeting. Some are for alcoholics only, others for anyone at all. Some are "beginners' meetings," but because beginners often tell the most touching and dramatic stories, and because veteran alcoholics want to keep their memories fresh and help those less experienced in the ways of sobriety than they are, these meetings are usually packed with old-timers as well. The number of people varies greatly. In New York I've seen meetings of twenty-odd people jammed into the cellar of a brownstone, and more than 200 crowded into the basement of a cathedral-sized church. Where I live now, meetings seldom draw more than fifty and sometimes only two or three. Twenty seems to be the average.

This is a good number, to my taste, and the meeting where I feel most at home attracts about that many once a week. We have beginners, too, vanned in from a drying out farm back in the hills. The format of the meeting is the open discussion group, with a lead-off- speaker telling his tale, the other members following up with bits and pieces of their own stories. I always speak, whether I want to or not. I think of it as a kind of spiritual discipline: to attend to what's being said, to keep one's mind open to the spark of recognition, to wait in mounting tension for the moment when one will be called on, then finally to hazard a link between one's own story and another's. The sensation, when I have said my bit, is what most of us came for, serenity.

But no one is under any compulsion to speak. On the contrary, old-timers tell you again and again that one of the great virtues they discovered in the program is the capacity to listen, without making assumptions or jumping to conclusions, without analyzing, categorizing, glossing, or comparing (what I'm doing now, for example), but with appetite, imagination, and sympathy. At an A.A. meeting, good listeners become as little children listening to fairy tales. And a fairy tale of sorts is what, typically we hear.

I imagine many of my fellow drunks would be infuriated to hear their stories, "true" stories recalled with anguish and told quite literally in fear and trembling, described as fairy tales. Yet that's what they are to the listeners and I don't mean to belittle them. After all, as Walter Benjamin has told us, a fairy tale is usually the story of a quest, through which as children we may learn to confront the forces of the mythical world, the dreadful projection of our fears, our hurts, and our mistrust. In quest stories a child goes forth, a child much like the listening child in his secret conviction of helplessness and oppression. And along the way he discovers that the real world of experience is much like the mythical world of apprehension: peopled with witches, ogres, and tyrants, rife with duplicity, danger, evil, and death.

But as the child battles through his ordeal, he also finds that nature is in secret complicity with his struggle. Life himself wants him to survive the ordeal, to defeat his enormous adversaries, to come into his kingdom. Little people, common people, all denizens of the earth, appear to help him. And the child must let nature's secret complicators in, trust them, and with them trust himself, his wits and his high resolve. And with this access of trust, the last liberating secret is revealed: that freedom is a gift of strength, and strength a gift of going forth and suffering. The gift of the story to the listener is hope.

Point for point, this is the story one hears over and over again at A.A. meetings. Not that anyone orders us to tell them in this form. All we're told is to share our "experience, strength, and hope" for ten or twenty minutes. There are no other instructions: no one prompts, analyzes, jeers, breaks in to tell his own story, or criticizes.

But that's the way they usually come out, as quest stories, and one reason they do is that it's so easy to construe the actual course of a drunk's career in that way. The ism, alcoholism, is a disease. (I prefer to think of it as a gift, like the gift for music, but malign. Becoming an alcoholic is like winning a recital at Carnegie Hall: you must have the gift, but you must also practice. Still, most drunks take it as a disease.) But because the disease of alcoholism goes its way in a seemingly purposeful fashion, it is a simple matter to personify it. In A.A. we call it "cunning, baffling, and insidious," and having gone that far, we might as well call it the demon. When he first appears on the scene, he is frisky and cute as Faust's poodle, found on an idle stroll. Later, revealed for what he is (charming, helpful, always available at the crook of an elbow), he begins making promises and deals. And this Demon knows how to make a deal, how to keep a promise. The stories I've heard! Hardworking foremen, corporate swashbucklers, surgeons, interior decorators, bus drivers, librarians, fishermen, submarine skippers, mongers of all sorts and kinds of things, all of them stewed to the gills morning, noon, and night, yet never faltering on their upward climb, never losing their jobs, never falling in the esteem of their fellows.

But we all lost our souls, and in the typical story, sooner or later, everything else as well: jobs, money, family, friends, health, the lot. We end up in a barroom, say, screaming a challenge to take on any man in the place. Ludicrous: we might be blowing bubbles in the bathtub. There are no takers. But out on the street, the Demon's little helpers are waiting, a bunch of pint-sized muggers come to collect. The deal was that you hold the liquor. With the grip reversed, you lose.

So begins the most crucial episode in the drunk's career: hitting bottom. Everyone finds his own bottom. It might be on the carpet of an executive suite or in the backyard where the pints of vodka are buried; it might be the gutter, the slammer, or the bin. Wherever it is, it seems somehow more textured with the actual than anything we've known since we first set out on this voyage. And the Demon is down there as well, delighted as always to help a drowning man. Voices reach us, urgent voices. One, heroic in timbre (though strangely demonic), cries out, "Hold on!" Another, so close to the bottom we're lying on that it might be coming from there, speaks in a croak. "Let's go," it says, "let go." These voices, this site, are the drama of Alcoholics Anonymous.

What quest were we on when we set forth? What was it we wanted, really wanted? It wasn't anything in particular. That was the trouble. All we had was neediness and vision, bottomless neediness and wondrous vision. Out of these we conjured a god - the god, in fact, whose servant is the Demon. W.H. Auden called him Possibility, and said that his idolaters were legion in modern societies. But drunks have always known about that god, long before there were modern societies, for on the downward leg of the drunkard's quest it is Possibility who fills the sails.

Possibility, after all, is simultaneously the one great true thing (anything can happen), the great half-truth (I can do anything I want to), and the great lie (I can be anyone I want to). There are moments of Possibility-worship in everyone's story. In most people's lives, however, Possibility makes itself felt as more or less fixed object of desire, not the wind but the compass: riches, celebrity, a lively love life. The more concrete the desire, in fact, the more coherent the voyage, the story, and the "I" who is telling it. In a drunk's story, Possibility appears as it is to the true idolater: the achingly elusive element in which we live and move and have our dreams, the pool, the drowning pool, of the self.

I don't know how many times I've heard an A.A. storyteller begin his story with the assertion that he began drinking to "get along," because he was shy and ill at ease at parties and a snootful made it easier for him. I would never identify with this until a few months ago. I was at a party, a small dinner where there was a man who I instantly realized was clever, more articulate, more entertaining, and more forceful than I could ever be. This would have been hard to bear under the best of circumstances, but these were especially difficult. For one thing, the hostess was a woman whose attentions I coveted and my "rival" was winning. For another, I had stopped smoking three weeks before; this was my first foray into unfamiliar social territory without cigarettes.

By dessert, I was in such a rage of envy that I grabbed a cigarette. (One of his cigarettes, needless to say.) I think I'd have grabbed his wine bottle, too, if there hadn't been another recovering alcoholic at the table. Still, I smoked, which was bad enough, I smoked out of envy. Cleverer than I could ever be? Ever? Dear God, say it isn't so! Say that I could if I tried. That I could if I made myself new. That I could, by some miracle, be someone else. But now, wafted onward on my nicotine afflatus, I was another man - if nothing else, a man who had not smoked but did now. Exhaling, I could see my self I wished in the moist clouds of smoke, and a good deal less of the man I envied.

Booze, I now realize, did the same thing for me. Looking back to when I began drinking, I can see that I was no different from those others who say they drink to make themselves agreeable, lovable, clever. We drank to spawn new selves, to be reborn in Possibility, more charming, more persuasive, more resolute, more high-spirited - until at last our new selves swam away and lost themselves in the darkness and silence of the bottom.

If spawning Possible selves is what the drunk was up to during the first part of his quest, then "re-collecting" and "remembering" those selves is what he is doing when he tells us about it. Recalling himself as he was, prostrate before the idol, he remembers daring great deeds and speaking resounding words. But even if he did and said half of what he dreamed, even if he was the selves he gave birth to, the lived experience eluded him, forever being dissolved in the solvent of alcoholic Possibility. God does save drunks and fools, but what he saves them from is experience. The story of a life devoted to Possibility sounds like a quest story with the ordeals left out. It's just a haphazard accumulation of endings: triumphs or catastrophes, as the case might be (for anything can happen), but completely severed from the necessary middle, the traveled ground of experience.

In the rooms, then, where A.A. people tell their stories, there are really two dramas going on, the events recounted in the narrative and the narrator's struggle to recover his experience, to build a new ladder of words on a firmer footing. The story emerges rung by rung, sometimes as farce, sometimes as melodrama: a situation comedy or a horror show. Often it is both. At one meeting I used to go to, for example, a tough little Irishman convulsed us with an inexhaustible series of disaster stories involving run-ins with the police, tractor trailers, frosty bank managers, night nurses in the drunk ward. He used to tell how he was cured of the gambling addiction that overcame him after he went into A.A. He and his wife were at a Florida racetrack, and each had bet on a different horse. His horse, which had been in the lead, stumbled and fell. His wife's horse, which was second, tripped over the fallen favourite and broke its neck. "I took it as a sign," he would say, "a bad sign."

But farce is easily transmuted into horror. There are meetings where one feels beaten, physically and morally, by the ingenuity, the persistence, the cruelty that human beings bring to the task of destroying themselves. Again and again you find yourself saying, "Now, dear God, surely he's reached his bottom!" He has not. But the storyteller has. The storyteller is here now, warm and dry and safe, perhaps with a firm grip on sobriety, perhaps just digging his fingers into the beach against the pull of the slamming sucking surf. So the end of the story is always both happy and tragic. Now, right this minute, he is in these rooms, telling his story among common people, close to the world's center of gravity. (Meetings seem always to be held in basements.) But after the meeting he must go out again into the fluid world of Possibility. And out there, as he and every member of the gathering know, waits the certainty of death.

In some stories, the presence of death is almost palpable. In these versions the hero hits bottom and goes into A.A. The quest should move on from there, a quest for sobriety, but it does not. Instead, we see the drunkard lifting himself up from the bottom time and again, only to slip back. The pity of it is unbearable: the rehab centers, halfway houses, asylums, prisons, A.A. itself, in and out, in and out. These are epics, heroic and terrible. The terror, of course, comes from the hero's willed participation in his own doom. The heroism is the storyteller's. Telling that story, groping in agonizing silence for words, the speaker becomes an actor in his real life, the protagonist in a struggle between cynicism and trust, despair and hope, death and life, death and love - now enacted, in these rooms, in an agon of remembrance.

Therapies of the word, of course, are almost as easy to come by as a drink. And it might be asked, as alcoholics in A.A. meetings do often ask, why it is that these other therapies, psychoanalysis in particular, were never able to help them stop drinking. It's a good question, and I think the answer tells something about the kinds of people alcoholics are. (The question of whether we were always that kind of person, or became that way as a result of drinking, is a chicken-and-egg question, and not a good one.)

What goes on in an analytic session is quite similar to what goes on in an A.A. meeting. Analyst and patient meet periodically, the patient bearing his anxieties, some too deeply rooted or too painful for words, others already fixed in words - too fixed, like a published text. The analyst brings his own experience, and in the encounter between the two, the patient undergoes a kind of conversion, or rather a series of conversions, in the course of which he works out a new, illuminating, and presumably helpful version of his life story. So, too, at an A.A. meeting: there, the newcomer learns to channel the maelstrom of his experience along the lines of a quest story. And there are parallels, as well, between the dramas played out in each kind of session. In A.A. there is the drunk's mortal struggle to compose his life in words and the counterinsurgent denial of his need to stop drinking, as well as of the proffered way to stop. In analysis the drama is the patient's painful ordeal to become a maker of sense and his fierce resistance to the analyst who can help him.

But it's just there, in that element of drama, that the alcoholic finds analysis wanting.

We alcoholics are intensely social, constantly threatened by loneliness: we need to go out, mix it up with the crowd, see and be seen, perform. What can an audience of one man or woman do for us?

And we want sacrifice. Once we sacrificed ourselves on the altar of Possibility; now, giving ourselves to others like ourselves, we learn a new form of sacrifice, one with life itself as the gift for giving. In analysis there's nothing like that, nothing so dramatic: if anybody is being sacrificed it is the therapist, who may be dying of boredom. But he is being paid for it, which rather spoils the fun.

Considered as theatre, moreover, psychotherapy in general (as a drunk might say) is pretty small stuff, as primal as the quest story. Sophocles' Oedipus is what we want; Freud's is too refined, too limited. Lacking experience, and in that sense childlike, we like our theatre crude and dirty and full of miracles. But we also like it formal. If a psychotherapeutic treatment has any form, it's usually apparent only to the therapist, and not necessarily even to him. The A.A. drama seems as simple and straightforward a container of meaning as the mind could devise. It has to be, for containing is precisely what it must do for us. We are the incontinent, those whom Dante found wallowing in putrid slop, and what we crave is integrity, coherence, simplicity. A.A. drama is oral, a tribal culture which gets passed on by means of stories and maxims. There's an A.A. maxim for every contingency: Count your blessing, One day at a time, Easy does it, Live and let live, First things first. The beginner finds them stupefyingly banal. Then he learns that they are nothing more than condensed stories waiting to be brought to life by his own experience.

Some of our tribes even have bards. I think of Ted, a regular at some of the meetings I go to. The first time I heard him speak I thought the Ancient Mariner had grabbed me by the arm. His voice rumbles along the edge of a cough and his story emerges with the beat and power of epic verse. He takes us from the loafing idyll of his youth to the horrors of a bin for the criminally insane. In his story Ted is always moving, stumbling from bar to bar, from doorway to alley to flophouse, from courthouse to prison, always on foot. Fondly, wryly, he ticks off the names of the bars, their proprietors, their regulars. Sober now, on the upward curve, he is still moving, still on foot. "you've all seen me, haven't you?" he says. Everyone has once a month., perhaps, they catch a glimpse of him, day or night, walking with his easy stride from town to town along the shore road. He is walking to meetings mostly, and now in his story he names the meetings, recalls anecdotes he's heard at them, laments the dead, sings the praises of those members who stopped and gave him a lift. Sometimes he'll fix the date of an incident by something he read in the papers. "It was the day they buried old Patrick P." says Ted, or "the night they had that terrible fire up in Galahanty."

Ted is a mythmaker. In the usual fairy-tale quest, the only name you hear is that of the hero (I'm Susan, and I'm an alcoholic"), a name so rudimentary that every individual can identify with it. And the action of these stories takes place anywhere, somewhere in such and such a kingdom, but really in the good listener's head. Myth, however, occurs in historical time, in a real country, among real people, and the men and women of myth are the real heroes of that country and people. A myth is constitutive: it makes for a collective identification. That's what Ted's stories do. They weave a magic circle of words around our meetings, making a tribe out of a group of lonely quest-heroes. In his own story, Ted is Odysseus; but in his manner of telling it, he is our Homer. He offers himself up, a creature as wretched and glorious as the powers of speech, for us to identify with, to be at one with, to die with or to live with, if he can only go on telling his story.

I have never yet had a slip. Ordinarily, I think no more of slipping than I think of my dead mother, who had a fatal one. Drink is something I kissed goodbye. Hut one evening a man was telling us how he and his wife (also an alcoholic) were driving home from a meeting when they decided to stop off at a roadside restaurant for a steak. It was a wonderful steak, he said, and they had just been to a wonderful meeting, and the two things coming together, the spiritual and the physical well being, left him feeling, as he ominously put it, "on top of the world." Suddenly, the thought of how wonderful it would be to cap off the evening with a creme de menthe slashed through his mind. Now, as it happens, he didn't have a crme de menthe. It also happens that I detest creme de menthe. Yet the word, the mere sound, gave me a taste of it, as real as the taste of the coffee in my hand, and the taste struck me with terror. The essence of A.A. is contained in that incident. What happened was something so simple as to be almost barbaric: a ritual drama that transformed our anxiety into pity and terror, our pity and terror into awe.

Awe is a reflex of the spirit, I think, and the spiritual is a dimension of existence that drunks are especially vulnerable to. There are many of us, however, myself included, for whom spirit in all its uses (except, naturally, the liquid) had become a meaningless, a tiresome, even a threatening word. By the time I went into A.A., I'd pretty well dropped it from my vocabulary. The booze had been one cause of this, of course, having drowned my spirit along with everything else, but my background had helped, too. Where I come from, all the actualities and potentialities of being human are parceled out to disciplined licensees: mind the philosophers, psyche to the psychologists, language to the linguists, and so on. Spirit, according to this scheme of things, belonged to the religionists, the devotees of a god, and my spirit's experience at the hands of religionists had been uniformly depressing.

A.A. did nothing at first to disabuse me of this. It is true that when I went into A.A. I miraculously rediscovered my spirit. But for a great many days thereafter, I could not have told you what I meant by the word. Spirits (as in "high spirits") got at part of it. So did morale. Yet there was always something hollow in the sound of the word when I spoke it, some dead spot of failed resonance when I heard it spoken, where there should have been, though I hardly knew why, a full and joyful understanding.

My difficulty lay in my laggard belief that spirit had something to do with religion, that it had to be in the most conventional sense transcendent, that it had to be somehow always straining upward, higher than man, toward God. Most A.A. people have no difficulty with these thoughts. Like nine-tenths of their fellow Americans, they are happy to declare (to pollsters, for example) that they believe in God and that their God is in some sense a higher power. At meetings, "Higher Power" is the way God is most frequently referred to : "My Higher Power, whom I choose to call God." The locution is tactfully existential. Still, at first I could never hear that word, God, without the abyss opening up just beneath my heart. There is no question that the Higher Power most A.A. people have in mind is the Judeo-Christian one; and neither is there any question about what this power, this high god, does for me. He gives me the jitters. He's bad for my nerves, the affliction with which I went into A.A. in the first place; and speech between us is quite impossible.

But the interesting thing is not only that I had difficulty getting the word spirit to sound right in my mind and heart. It is also that no one in A.A. has ever attempted to "help" me by pointing the way to his notion of God. Never, for example, have I heard anyone in A.A. refer to Jesus Christ. This is astonishing, for most A.A. people are Christian (like most Americans). Moreover, Jesus' "story" has some rather close parallels to the typical A.A. story. Surely the drunk's agony of weekend. About 10,000 people attend meetings and historic sites in celebration of the founding of Alcoholics Anonymous. Some of the events take place on the campus of the University of Akron. I live a block from Dr. Bob's house (<http://www.drboobs.com/>) in Highland Square, a gentrifying neighborhood of single-family Arts & Crafts-style homes built around 1915 as the city's population was rapidly growing with the great rubber boom. Founders' Day has a big impact on the neighborhood as thousands of people visit the home over the weekend. Everyone mows their lawn, weeds their gardens, and generally spruces up their home in the week before to prepare for the crowds. A huge banner reading "Welcome Home" appears on the front of Dr. Bob's house. The people come in cars, vans, buses, and, most conspicuously, on motorcycles. Many make the trip to Akron by motorcycle, which is fortunate for Highland Square since the streets around Dr. Bob's house are narrow brick-paved affairs with little room for parking. Most of the visitors have their picture taken behind the big rock in the front yard of Dr. Bob's house. A brisk trade in T-shirts, magnets, key rings, pins, coffee mugs, and other such commemorative things takes place on the corner outside Dr. Bob's house, and a few dozen homes in the neighborhood take advantage of the huge increase in foot traffic to hold yard sales. Young children run profitable lemonade stands. Local musicians play on the porches of nearby homes. It's a carnival atmosphere, even if it's a celebration, for most, of being clean and sober.

Kay Stewart was an A.A. sponsor and worked as a counselor in the drug and alcohol treatment center for teens and adults at the Interval Brotherhood Home.

At meetings, she would tell people that A.A. is a place to learn to live without drinking.

A.A. will not get you to heaven or hell, she would say, but it will keep you sober long enough to figure out where you want to go.

She was born in West Virginia, one of eight children. She would say she came to the "big city" of Akron when she was 17. She had never seen so many streetlights, people or cars on the roads.

"If we saw more than four cars on the streets at home, we would say it must have been a big funeral," she said in 1999 on the 32nd anniversary of an A.A. affiliate, the Flame Group (the flame is the beacon of recovery).

And then told her other story, how she started drinking at 14 or 15. At first, she drank White Lightning, a homemade booze made in the hills. When she came to Akron, she wanted to become part of the in-crowd. She liked dancing and good-looking guys.

She decided she was going to drink to the day she died, and, as she used to tell people, she almost did.

She met a sailor, married at 16 and had two children. They were married 13 years.

After they divorced, she moved in with her parents, went to work and started drinking more heavily.

Then she met Stewart.

"He was my kind of man. He liked to drink a lot, too, but he wasn't a fighting drunk," she said in one speech preserved on tape. "We drank every day. We had to drink in order to live."

But then she started losing the car, forgetting where it was parked, hitting cars because she didn't know what the drivers in front of her were going to do.

Once she ended up in jail. Her son and husband had to bail her out.

Her daughter ran away and got married at age 16 because of the drinking.

Then came the clincher -- she was seeing dead people.

meetings are like a scene from Invasion of the Body Snatchers." So, I decided that AA was even worse than drinking.

Looking back on it, I was looking for an excuse to continue drinking; and AA certainly provided it.

All is not well in alcoholism treatment programs, either. In addition to the disorganization I found at the treatment center I attended, there are other problems.

One is that most counselors apparently have been alcoholics, have gotten sober through AA, and adhere religiously to its principles. Participation in AA is a requirement for group participants in most treatment centers, and an atmosphere of AA religiosity permeates many programs. This is a common problem in treatment situations.

Another problem is that many counselors and administrators in such programs are power-trippers and seem to enjoy laying down and enforcing arbitrary rules governing participants' behavior. This is an especially serious problem in alcoholism programs because those in the early stages of recovery from alcohol dependence tend to be very vulnerable emotionally.

Probably the worst thing about AA is its religiosity. The centerpiece of the AA dogma is, unfortunately, the Twelve Steps. God or a "Power greater than ourselves" is mentioned in fully half of the steps. Thus, anyone with the honesty to admit that the existence of God is no more likely than the existence of Santa Claus is, at the least, made to feel very uncomfortable at most AA meetings. What makes matters worse is that "AA step zombies" as a matter of course tell those new to the program that if they don't follow the steps, they'll never make it—they'll start drinking again. That is often a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Life is filled with annoyances, dangers, and uncertainties, and like most people, steps-o-maniacs don't want to face them; they don't want to be adults. They want a Big Brother to take care of them.

The religious beliefs of most AA members do not free them, as they would like to believe, from their dependence on alcohol; rather, they act as a substitute for it.

If they were actually free, they wouldn't need the fix of regular meetings and the constant reinforcement of their comforting but irrational beliefs.

Guilt is another bothersome aspect of Alcoholics Anonymous religiosity. The Twelve Steps are replete with references to "our wrongs, our shortcomings," and "making amends." This places responsibility for the alcoholic's addiction squarely on his or her shoulders. Not only does this induce guilt, it's also thoroughly unscientific and is just plain wrong. Modern research has clearly shown that alcoholism is a matter of genetics, that alcoholics have about as much choice in the matter as they do about the color of their eyes. AA-induced guilt only serves to make dealing with the very real problems recovering alcoholics face even more difficult.

An additional problem related to religiosity is hypocrisy. There is a saying in AA: "Fake it until you make it." What that means in practice is that newcomers should sit on their doubts and mouth the AA line until they forget they ever had doubts. Thus hypocrisy is an essential element in the cloning process of step-zombies. An acquaintance told me that he had recently mentioned certain doubts at an AA meeting. After it was over, his sponsor (a sort of Big Brother within AA) told him that he wasn't supposed to criticize AA itself. Puzzled, he replied that he thought AA was supposed to be a program of honesty. To that, his sponsor said, "Yes, but you shouldn't criticize the organization." He replied, "I think I don't need a sponsor."

Sponsors are supposed to provide newcomers with advice and assistance, but they end up running the lives of those they're supposed to be helping. Naturally, the position of sponsor attracts meddling busybodies who love to control others. They often hang around AA meetings on the lookout for newcomers, like vultures on the watch for fresh meat. Newcomers, like all people in the early stages of recovery from alcoholism, are emotionally vulnerable and often fall into the clutches of these buzzards. If you've recently quit drinking, are checking out AA, and someone, unasked, says to you, "I think you need a sponsor," don't walk, RUN in the opposite direction.

So much for the negative aspects of Alcoholics Anonymous. There are also positive ones. A very good feature is that AA is open to all, the only requirement for membership being a desire to stop drinking. No identification is required, and there are no dues or fees.

Another good feature is that AA is decentralized. Groups are autonomous, and there is no hierarchy giving orders to the membership. Among other things, this leaves room in AA for dissident groups and members.

But the most important thing is that AA works, at least for some people. Why? I believe there are three main reasons. One is that AA is an important social outlet for many. Loneliness is a terrible problem in our society, and people will flock to almost anything that relieves it—even AA meetings.

A second and related reason is that AA meetings allow alcoholics to realize that their problems are not unique. Meetings provide members with the opportunity to vent feelings, and to give and receive emotional support, and oftentimes useful advice, on ways to avoid drinking.

The third reason is that AA steps provide structure—a well groomed path to follow—and that can look awfully attractive when your world has turned upside down and you no longer have your best friend—alcohol—to lean on. I believe that to a large degree the content of the steps is irrelevant. What is actually important is simply that the steps are there and that those dependent on them believe that they're the means for overcoming alcoholism. Another way of spelling recovery—via-the-steps is placebo.

These things, especially the first two, are all that is really needed. Any program that provides alcoholics with the opportunity to meet, talk, and support one another on a regular basis will work; it will help alcoholics stay sober. A structure similar to the steps—but without their religiosity and blame-laying—which would

Alcoholism was considered a moral failure, not a disease. But Akron police knew Sister

Sister Ignatia and an emergency room intern,
Dr. Thomas Scuderi, a Sicilian immigrant, began

However, Sister Ignatia believed that her alcoholic patients deserved to enter the hospital through the front door like anyone else suffering illness.

So did AA founder Dr. Bob Smith.

On August 16, 1939, they admitted their first alcoholism patient, making St. Thomas the first hospital in the world to acknowledge alcoholism as a medical condition.

Ignatia Hall doesn't draw the same crowd as Dr. Bob's house or grave, but pilgrims still feel awe standing on the fifth floor.

This was the 15th year Gloria B., a 54-year-old Columbus woman, has visited Akron for Founders Day, but the first time she saw Ignatia Hall. She works in a hospital in Columbus and will be sober for 16 years in October.

She wondered what it would have been like for people with her illness in the 1930s who had to be sneaked into the hospital. But this time, she came in the front door and a helpful employee pointed her to the correct elevator.

“It gives you kind of an eerie feeling,” she said. “We were recognized as important people and ushered around.”

Sponsorship - What We Used to Be Like

"Go to meetings, and get a sponsor" - two strong suggestions that virtually all AAs hear at their very first meeting. For both the shaky newcomer and the seasoned oldtimer, sponsorship has always been an essential component of solid sobriety. The theme of this year's General Service Conference, "Living AA's Principles Through Sponsorship," offers the Fellowship as a whole an opportunity to reexamine its effectiveness today. In workshops and scheduled presentations, Conference members will take a hard look at how well we are fulfilling our responsibility for sponsorship, ask whether it may be fading away, and discuss ways of providing information to medical and other professionals.

The experience of our past reveals how the practice of sponsorship developed from a sometimes rigid system of indoctrination to the often informal approach we are familiar with today. The roots of sponsorship precede even the founding of AA. In November 1934, Ebby T., an old friend and drinking buddy of AA's co-founder Bill W., came to visit him - sober for the first time Bill could remember, and eager to talk about his new way of life. In a memorial to Ebby in the June 1966 Grapevine, Bill

wrote: "As most AAs know, he spoke to me of the release from hopelessness that had come to him (through the Oxford Groups) as the result of self-survey, restitution,
outgoing helpfulness to others, and principles that I used later in developing AA's
Twelve Steps to recovery." It would take Bill a while longer to sober up, and Ebby had difficulty achieving long-term sobriety, but it was Bill's first experience of the power of one alcoholic talking to another, and throughout his life he would continue to refer to Ebby as "my friend and sponsor."

That amazing power of one-to-one sharing has always been the heart of AA life and growth. In the summer of 1939, Bill W., away from home and family and desperate to hang on to his newly achieved sobriety, sought out another drunk, and carried
the message to co-founder Dr. Bob S. That meeting marked the true beginning of the AA
Fellowship, and together these two found other drunks and brought them the message of hope. Our founding members in Akron and New York went eagerly to work, twelfth stepping alcoholics in hospital wards or wherever they could be found, and making sure they practiced the steps that the budding Fellowship was beginning to develop as a program of recovery.

A small band of ex-drunks in Akron, and then in New York, clung together out
sheer necessity, and several sober members would be sent to call on new prospects and keep track of their progress. In the earliest days, drunks often moved in with sober members until they could get on their feet (both Bill W. and Dr. Bob had housefuls), but after a few years - and several unhappy experiences - they realized that few

of their boarders actually got sober, and they might be doing them more harm than good.

In the book "Dr. Bob and the Good Oldtimers" (pp. 108 ff.) describes the gradual growth of AA in Akron in the period after Bill left to go back to New York.
"In February 1937, another count was taken, and there were seven additional members
in Akron, for a total of 12 ... There were dozens of others who were exposed to the program ... Over this period, Dr. Bob and the early members worked out with new prospects a procedure that was very rigid at first but became more and more flexible and open as the months and years passed."

First, they would interview the wife, asking whether the husband really wanted to stop drinking. Then Dr. Bob would talk to the man himself, assuring him that if he was serious about it, he could be helped. "In Cleveland or Akron, you couldn't just walk into AA the way you can today," said Cleveland's Clarence S., one of those early members. "You had to be sponsored. The wife would call, and I would go to see her first. I told her my story. I wanted to find out several things about the prospect.
... Then I would know how to approach him, figure out how to reach him. I might set some kind of trap for him. I had a lot of whammy working."

We didn't know anything about a program of attraction," said Warren C. ... "We called the wife ... We might even talk to his boss ... When we went and sat down with this fellow, we knew all about him." ...

"Following this preliminary questioning, the new prospect would be hospitalized
and
"defogged." ... When the newcomer was well enough, all of the members in town visited him every day - three or four in the beginning, 20 or more a few years later.

... If
a newcomer agreed to go along, he was required to admit that he was powerless over alcohol and then to surrender his will to God - in the presence of one or more of the other members."

One-to-one sponsorship as we are familiar with it today apparently has its roots
in the Cleveland Group. In October 1939, the "Cleveland Plain Dealer" published a series of articles about AA "that ushered in a new period for Alcoholics Anonymous, the era of mass production of sobriety." Bill W. wrote in "Alcoholics Anonymous Comes of Age"
(pp. 20-1): "The newspaper's switchboard was deluged." Calls were relayed to the tiny group in Cleveland. "For weeks and weeks AAs ran about in desperate haste to make Twelfth Step calls on the swelling list of prospects

"It was soon evident that a scheme of personal sponsorship would have to be devised for the new people. Each prospect was assigned an older AA, who visited him at his home or in the hospital, instructed him on AA principles, and conducted him to his first meeting. But in the face of many hundreds of pleas for help, the supply of elders could not possibly match the demand. Brand new AA's, sober only a month or even a week, had to sponsor alcoholics still drying up in the hospitals."

When the first group grew too large, a second was started, and then a third.
"Luckily the AA book had come off the press six months before, and some pamphlets were also available," which "probably kept the hectic situation from confusion and anarchy."

The oldtimers in New York and Akron had serious misgivings - "How could they possibly manage? We did not know. But a year later we did know; for by then Cleveland had about thirty groups and several hundred members The Cleveland pioneers had proved three essential things: the value of personal sponsorship; the worth of the AA book in indoctrinating newcomers, and finally the tremendous fact that AA, when the word really got around, could now soundly grow to great size."

As AA expanded, many groups began to establish programs to instruct new members, and in the mid-1940's, the editors of AA's new national magazine, the Grapevine, asked readers to share their experience of group plans for sponsoring new members. The June 1945 issue described four Thursday night educational meetings established by the Wilson Club, one of four St. Louis groups. The first meeting dealt with Bill's story, drunk and sober, and the growth of AA to the time it reached St. Louis. "During a 15 minute recess, each man is asked to write in a few words just what he considers an alcoholic to be." These are followed by the reading of an address by a local doctor discussing the medical angle.

The second Thursday covered the spiritual angle and the Twelve Steps, and ended with a reading of an address by "a greatly revered Jesuit priest, Father Dowling, who really started the St. Louis group." The third week discussed all chapters of the Big Book and included a talk given by a Protestant minister. The final meeting reviewed the AA literature and explained the operation of the Wilson Club.

"Wilson Club members are not considered full, active members until they have attended these four educational meetings. They are then presented with a Wilson Club membership card - a white one. At the end of one year's sobriety this is replaced by a gold card."

In the September issue that year, members of the Genesee Group in Rochester wrote that their plan also included four talks, but it differed from the St. Louis plan "in this respect: Our prospects, or novices as we call them, are given a personal 'canvass or workout' by their sponsors before they are permitted to attend a group meeting ... It has been our observation that bringing men into the group indiscriminately, and without adequate preliminary training and information, can be a source of considerable grief and a cause of great harm to the general moral of the group itself." They believed that a prospect had to accept the program without any reservation before being granted membership. "The time when the novice's progress has reached [that point] varies according to his mental capacity, his eagerness to learn, and the sincerity of his self-examination The sponsor's judgment of when his novice is ready is accepted by the group as final and the sponsor then brings him to his first meeting."

The July 1945 Grapevine published a list of 19 things that constitute a good sponsor, contributed by the Minneapolis Group. After outlining a number of suggestions that might have come straight out of the current AA pamphlet, "Questions & Answers on Sponsorship," numbers 15 to 18 offered a lesson in alcoholic human nature:

15. When a drunk goes to another sponsor with tales of persecution, if the second sponsor doesn't talk it over with the first sponsor, the issue becomes one of personalities, and the second sponsor will find that the slipper has outsmarted him.

16. Don't listen to a lot of gossip by slippers.

17. Second sponsor should get in touch with the first sponsor and find out what has been done, so that he can't pull the same stuff on the second sponsor.

18. If a new member alibis about coming to class and meetings, after a short while the sponsor should impress on him the importance of attendance. If you can't get him to come, then he has put you in a position where you cannot help him, as he will not let you. So drop him. the seed has been planted; redirect your energies elsewhere. Somewhere along the line he will be back when he wants AA."

In subsequent issues, the experience of groups in St. Paul and Chicago echoed the need for instructional meetings for new members. St. Paul's consisted three meetings, starting with the principles of the first three Steps, then covering inventory and restitution and winding up with the spiritual aspects of the program. Chicago devised a system of neighborhood groups, which began with two of the oldest members who "conceived the idea of an informal bull session with the men under their sponsorship," inviting new men to their homes to discuss any problems they were having. The experiment was successful, and "presently it became apparent that the idea could well be systematized. The city was divided into 10 area and a discussion group to meet regularly on Thursday nights and was formed in each one."

The article goes on to describe the experience of Tuesday night meetings in the Loop. "As time went on the increasing number of newcomers appeared to justify a special instruction meeting. The first of these was held informally in one corner of the large meeting hall by a volunteer older member who gathered the newer ones and talked to them and answered their questions. This haphazard plan was so evidently successful that a definite regular meeting was arranged to precede the main meeting."

By far the most attention-getting article in the Grapevine series appeared in the September 1947 issue under the title "Little Rock Plan Gives Prospects Close Attention." It set forth a remarkably thorough and formal system.

"The Little Rock Plan was, we believe, the first of its kind in the country.

By

adhering strictly to the Plan, hundreds have been brought into AA

"It is not easy to become a member of this group. When a person has expressed a desire to achieve sobriety and has had a sponsor appointed for him, he must leave his work or position for at least two weeks. Usually the prospect is required to spend that entire time within the confines of the club rooms, studying, preparing a case history, meeting and filling assignments laid out by the sponsor.

"If, after two weeks, he has discharged his assignments to the satisfaction of his sponsor, he is brought before the executive committee and there his request for membership is presented by his sponsor in his presence ... If he is deemed eligible

... he is brought before the next meeting, receives a warm welcome, and is handed a copy of the 'Approach Program' and the Twelve Steps.

"That is not all, however. We do not simply say, 'Now ... go your way, and may bless you.' no, we do not cut him off in mid-air, so to speak. We give him a small diary and ask that each day thereafter for 28 days, he record his impressions of the day ... and enter therein, 'I have not taken a drink this day,' and sign his name.

God

"At the end of this period he returns the diary to the club, is again welcomed,

and is admitted to full membership He is then assigned to a squad, given some definite task, and encouraged to work, guided by some older member, with new prospects."

Two months later, in the Grapevine's letters page, readers reacted with indignation:

"This sounds more like the police department or probation department plan.

There is only one AA plan and this is right out of the book. No organization. No rules.

 That's the plan we in Southern California try to follow," wrote A.M. from Los Angeles.
 From Detroit, H.E.T. exploded: "Good grief and little fishes! What have they got out
 there in Little Rock, Arkansas - a concentration camp? ... Where do they get the authority to keep anybody out of the group? ... Imagine bragging about making it tough for anyone to join AA?" And E.B.T. from Boston protested: "So Little Rock prides itself on being tough ... and obviously the article you published sounded as though they pride themselves more on their slip record than on letting everyone who asks have a helping hand from AA. that may be a group of something, but it didn't sound like an AA group."

While the Little Rock Plan went much too far for the vast majority of AAs
 there have always been as many styles of sponsorship as there are sponsors and newcomers.
 Some members have been able to make it through the rough days of early sobriety only because their sponsors made them toe the line - "my sponsor never made

Rochester Prepares Novices for Group Participation

(Editor's note: This is the third in a continuing series of articles outlining the various indoctrination plans followed by different groups throughout the country. In forthcoming issues, methods used in Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Cleveland will be presented.)

Dear Editor: The educational plan of the Wilson Club of St. Louis which was outlined in the June number of The Grapevine was read by the members of the Genesee Group of Rochester, New York, with considerable interest. As the education of our "novices: has been the chief concern of our group since its inception a year ago, we were all particularly keen to know that other groups are accenting that feature of group activity which we believe to be of the greatest importance.

Our Genesee Group plan utilizes the same technique as the St. Louis Group but has the additional, or more accurately, preliminary feature which seems to us of sufficient importance to justify this communication. We hope to invite comment, suggestions or criticisms from other groups or individuals who may have ideas along this line or who may have some other method of instruction which they are now employing. From such an interchange of thoughts and opinions through the medium of our columns much good may come. I might even be possible to evolve from such discussion a coordinated general plan or framework within which all AA groups could work. Certainly, "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

Our plan differs from the Wilson Club plan in this respect: Our prospects or novices,

as we call them, are given a personal "Canvass or workout" by their sponsor or sponsors before they are permitted to attend a group meeting. These personal talks follow the line set forth in a booklet prepared by our group for that purpose. It was designed to assist in bringing a prospective candidate up to his first meeting with a thorough knowledge of the aims and purposes of AA and the obligations he will have to impose upon himself if he undertakes membership in our group. It has been our observation that bringing men into the group indiscriminately, and without adequate preliminary training and information, can be a source of considerable grief and a cause of great harm to the general morale of the group itself. We feel that unless a man, after a course of instruction and an intelligent presentation of the case for the AA life, has accepted it without any reservation, he should not be included in a group membership. When his sponsors feel that the novice has a fair working knowledge of AAs objectives and a sufficient grasp of its fundamentals, he is then brought to his first group meeting.

The time when the novice's progress has reached the point of acceptance of the program varies according to his mental capacity, his eagerness to learn and the sincerity of his self-examination. It is not measured by the yardstick of any lapse of time or the length of his sobriety. The sponsor's judgment of when his novice is ready is accepted by the group as final and the sponsor then brings him to his first meeting. There he listens to four successive talks based on the 12 Steps and the Four Absolutes. These are twenty-minute talks given by older members of the group and the steps, for convenience and brevity, are divided into four sections. The first three Medical Association, which 21 years ago formally declared alcoholism a disease. At that time, only a handful of programs, such as Hazelden in Minnesota, offered treatment for alcoholics. Since then medical centers and treatment programs have proliferated across the country. There are more than 7,000 treatment programs, a 65% increase in the past six years alone. Partly because of the new spotlight on the dangers of alcohol, Americans are beginning to moderate their drinking habits: consumption of alcohol peaked in 1981 and has since declined by 5%. In many social circles today, the big drinker stands out like W. C. Fields at a temperance meeting.

The most exciting developments in the battle against alcoholism are taking place in the nation's laboratories, where scientists and medical researchers are probing its neurochemical roots and hunting for genes that may influence its development. Next month researchers from six national laboratories will meet in New York City to coordinate their search through human DNA for the genes that may underlie alcoholism. If they are successful, doctors may one day be able to test young people for certain genetic markers, the chromosomal quirks that predispose some individuals to alcoholism, and warn those who are at risk of developing the disease. Says Henri Begleiter, professor of psychiatry at the State University of New York Health Science Center and president of the Research Society on Alcoholism: "Never in the history of alcoholism have we made as much progress as we have in recent years."

For the 18 million Americans with serious drinking problems, life is a runaway roller coaster that, left untended, inevitably leads to disaster. "It ruins everything that matters to you," says New York Times reporter Nan Robertson, a recovered alcoholic. "In the end, the bottle is your only friend. Alcoholics would rather do anything than stop drinking." For the vast majority of Americans, the occasional social drink is a harmless affair. For the afflicted, however, the most innocent gathering of family or friends--a wedding at a suburban country club, a casual gathering on an urban sidewalk--can turn into a nightmare of temptation, indulgence and worse. Recalls a youthful recovering alcoholic: "My biggest fear was getting through life without a drink. Today it is that I might pick up that one sucker drink."

The stakes are high. Alcoholism claims tens of thousands of lives each year, ruins untold numbers of families and costs $117 billion a year in everything from medical bills to lost workdays. The magnitude of the problem has been overshadowed in recent years by the national preoccupation with the new threat of AIDS and the widespread use of drugs such as heroin, cocaine, marijuana and crack. "Take the deaths from every other abused drug," says Loran Archer, deputy director of the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism (NIAAA) in Washington. "Add them together, and they still don't equal the deaths or the cost to society of alcohol alone."

Alcoholism's toll is frightening. Cirrhosis of the liver kills at least 14,000 alcoholics a year.

Drunk drivers were responsible for approximately half the 46,000 driving fatalities in the U.S. in 1986. Alcohol was implicated in up to 70% of the 4,000 drowning deaths last year and in about 30% of the nearly 30,000 suicides. A Department of Justice survey estimates that nearly a third of the nation's 523,000 state-prison inmates drank heavily before committing rapes, burglaries and assaults. As many as 45% of the country's more than 250,000 homeless are alcoholics.

Despite all the advances in knowledge and attitudes, plus the deluge of books, movies and television programs on alcoholism, the cartoon image of the cross-eyed drunk slumped in the gutter or staggering through the front door still lingers in the minds of some Americans. Not long ago many believed, as two researchers put it in the 1950s, that "alcoholism is no more a disease than thieving or lynching." Such attitudes are fading fast, to be sure, but not without leaving a residue of ambivalence. Says LeClair Bissell, 59, a recovered alcoholic and physician: "At the same time we say through our lips that alcoholism is a chronic disease, many of us feel in our guts that it's a moral or self-inflicted problem."

Yet it is a disease, and it can be a ruinously expensive one. A four-week drying-out regimen can cost anywhere from $4,000 to $20,000 for in-patient care; today medical insurance covers the tab for 70% of American workers in companies with more than 100 employees. In the early 1970s, the Kemper Group of Long Grove, Ill., was the first national insurance company to include coverage for alcoholism in all its group policies. The firm's hunch: the bill for helping an alcoholic quit today would be cheaper than nursing him through afflictions like cirrhosis of the liver and strokes later in life. The logic of acting sooner rather than later has spread throughout corporate America. Some 10,000 firms and public agencies, including 70% of the Fortune 500 companies, now have employee-assistance programs to help alcohol and drug abusers pull their lives together and get back to work. "Before this," says William Durkin, employee assistant manager at ARCO, "the normal handling was to tolerate the alcoholic employee until he became intolerable and then to fire him."

Progress in the actual treatment of alcoholism is disappointing. Most facilities still rely on basic therapies worked out in the 1940s. Though some centers advertise grossly exaggerated success rates of 70% after four years, the best estimates are that only 12% to 25% of patients manage to stay on the wagon for three years. Alcoholics Anonymous, the tremendously popular association of an estimated 1 million recovering alcoholics, remains the single biggest source of support for chronic drinkers. But its record is hard to assess because of members' anonymity. Even so, only 15% to 20% of alcoholics get any treatment at all. Says Enoch Gordis, director of the NIAAA: "Something very important is still missing here."

Simultaneously, another shadowy fact of life about alcoholics has been dragged into the light: the severe emotional scars they leave on their spouses and especially on their children. "Years ago the focus fell solely on the alcoholic," says Carol, a mother of four and wife of an alcoholic. "Nobody identified the needs of the family." Indeed, alcohol abuse accounts for more family troubles than any other single factor. A Gallup poll this year found that one in four families reported a problem with liquor at home, the highest reported rate since 1950 and twice the 1974 rate. According to Health Secretary Bowen, alcohol is the culprit in 40% of family-court cases and accounts for between 25% and 50% of violence between spouses and a third of child-molestation incidents.

Though awareness of alcoholism's destructiveness is growing, the sheer number of alcoholics shows no sign of abating. Young people are especially vulnerable. Bowen states that nearly 5 million adolescents, or three in every ten, have drinking problems. Several studies show that children are beginning to drink earlier than ever before, and a Weekly Reader study earlier this year reported that 36% of fourth-graders were pressured by peers to drink. "Kids are making decisions about alcohol and drugs when they are 12 to 14, whereas in the preceding generation they made those decisions at ages 16 to 18," says Lee Dogoloff, executive director of the American Council for Drug Education. "The younger a person starts drinking, the more likely he is to develop problems later in life."

Who, exactly, is an alcoholic? The question is a tricky one: symptoms are not always clear cut, and even doctors do not agree on a definition of the disease. The extreme cases are obvious. A person in the grip of alcoholism blacks out from drinking too much, suffers memory loss, and wakes up trembling with craving for another drink. But most cases show fewer dramatic symptoms. Also, the behavior of alcoholics fluctuates wildly. Some drink heavily every day, while others can stop for brief periods, only to go off on binges. This past year the American Psychiatric Association settled on three basic criteria to define and diagnose alcoholism: physiological symptoms, such as hand tremors and blackouts; psychological difficulties, which include an obsessive desire to drink; and behavioral problems that disrupt social or work life.

The search for alcoholism's general underpinnings began in earnest in the early 1970s with a simple question: Why does the disease seem to run in families? Dr. Donald Goodwin, chairman of the psychiatry department at the University of Kansas School of Medicine, set about seeking an answer by studying 133 Danish men who were all adopted as small children and raised by nonalcoholics. Goodwin divided his subjects into two categories: those with nonalcoholic biological parents and those with at least one alcoholic parent. Then he interviewed each of the adopted men in depth and examined health records to see which of them developed alcoholism in adulthood. If the disease had a genetic basis, Goodwin reasoned, then the children who had an alcoholic biological parent would wind up with drinking problems more often than the others.

His findings were startling. The sons of alcoholics turned up with drinking problems four times as often as the sons of nonalcoholics. That result helped put to rest the popular assumption that alcoholics took up drinking simply because they learned it at home or turned to it because of abuse suffered at the hands of an alcoholic parent. The study, however, did not rule out environmental factors. Indeed, scientists now estimate that fully 30% of alcoholics have no family history of the disease. But Goodwin showed that some inherited attribute was involved. "What we learned from the adoption studies," says Dr. C. Robert Cloninger, a professor of psychiatry at Washington University in St. Louis, "is not that nature was important or nurture was important but that both are important."

But it was still far from clear how hereditary and environmental factors combine to create an alcoholic. In the early 1980s, Cloninger joined a team of Swedish investigators led by Michael Bohman, a psychiatrist at the University of Umea, to study an even larger group of adoptees. Since Sweden's extensive welfare system keeps thorough records on each citizen, Bohman was able to compile detailed sketches of 1,775 adopted men and women, more than a third of whom has an alcoholic biological parent. As Cloninger studied the health, insurance, work and police records of his subjects, two distinct categories seemed to emerge--and with them new evidence that alcoholism may have more than one form.

Cloninger's first group of alcoholics, about 25% of the total, tended to drink heavily before the age of 25, had bad work and police records and met with little success in treatment programs. Drinking was a habit they seemed to pick up on their own, with little encouragement from friends or other influences. When Cloninger checked how often alcoholism appeared in the sons of men who fit this description, he found it surfaced nine times as often as in the general population. This variation of the disease, Cloninger concludes, is heavily influenced by heredity. Because it appears primarily in men, he calls this form "male limited" alcoholism.

The second type included both men and women and made up about 75% of the study's alcoholics. They started chronic drinking usually well after the age of 25, rarely had trouble with the law, and often successfully kicked the habit. Their children were only twice as likely to have trouble with alcohol compared with the general population. Cloninger labeled this category of alcoholism "milieu limited," indicating a genetic predisposition to the disease that is triggered by extended heavy drinking.

Cloninger's work added key pieces to the puzzle of alcoholism by suggesting traits that certain types of alcoholics have in common. For example, Cloninger found that his male-limited alcoholics tended to be aggressive, even violent types. He hypothesizes that the nervous system underlying such behavior may react to alcohol in a way that quickly leads to dependence. "It's not proved," says Cloninger. "It's testable." Says Boris Tabakoff of the NIAAA: "For those of us looking for biological markers, Dr. Cloninger's work gives us a road map we can follow to link genetic traits to behavior."

If researchers could develop medical tests that identify biochemical signposts indicating a predisposition to alcoholism, they could warn potential alcoholics before trouble started. SUNY's Begleiter found just such a potential marker in the brain. By using an electroencephalograph to measure the brain waves of nondrinking sons of alcoholic fathers, Begleiter discovered that a particular brain wave called the P3 showed a dampened response. In each instance the sons' brain waves closely duplicated those of their fathers, while other subjects with no family history of alcoholism showed strong P3 waves. In addition, Dr. Marc Schuckit, a researcher at the San Diego Veterans Administration, has found that after several drinks some men whose fathers are alcoholics show fewer changes in the levels of two hormones, prolactin and cortisol, than men whose fathers are nonalcoholics. Eventually, such findings may provide important clues in the search for the genes involved in alcoholism.

Scientists acknowledge that work on the effects of alcohol on individual brain cells is still in its infancy. Part of the problem is that ethanol, the active ingredient in alcoholic drinks, easily penetrates the membranes of all cells and disrupts their normal function. Unlike other psychoactive drugs, ethanol does not target specific parts of nerve cells, or neurons, but seems to enter cell membranes and sabotage the nervous system indiscriminately.

Steven Paul, chief of the clinical neuroscience branch at the National Institute of Mental Health, is studying how ethanol affects certain cells in the brain to induce sedative effects. He is looking at a group of receptors, sites on the membranes of brain cells, that link with a molecule called gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA), a neurotransmitter that moves across the synapses between neurons. GABA homes in on a complex known as the GABA-benzodiazepine receptor. If there are a sufficient number of GABA molecules present in certain areas of the brain, anxiety diminishes. Tranquilizers such as Valium and Librium work by attaching themselves to the receptor and increasing GABA's effectiveness.

Paul believes ethanol also reduces anxiety by acting on those GABA-sensitive neurons. Altering the amount of GABA in the brain could theoretically neutralize the effects of intoxication. To that end, Paul is currently experimenting with a drug, Ro15-4513, that blocks ethanol's ability to activate the GABA receptor, thus sharply reducing alcohol's sedative effects in rats. Although the drug is toxic to humans, variants could one day be useful in treatment. Other scientists are studying a new class of drugs that seem to block the alcoholic's craving for a drink. These compounds boost the amount of another neurotransmitter, serotonin, in the brain, thus encouraging a sense of well-being-and bolstering abstinence.

Ethanol has a harmful effect on nearly every organ in the body. Chronic heavy drinking increases the risk of myocardial disease and high blood pressure. Alcohol eats away at the stomach and intestines, causing bleeding in some drinkers. Alcoholic males may experience shrunken testes, reduced testosterone levels, and even impotence. Sustained drinking sometimes disrupts women's menstrual cycles and can render them infertile. Among expectant mothers, drinking, can produce birth defects and is a major cause of mental retardation in American children. Even the immune system's efficiency is reduced by alcohol. Studies are under way to determine whether heavy drinking might cause AIDS to surface more quickly in infected carriers.

But alcohol takes the worst toll on the liver, where most of the ethanol in the bloodstream is broken down. Because alcohol is so high in calories (there are 110 calories per jigger of 90-proof liquor), the liver metabolizes it instead of important nutrients, a phenomenon that can lead to severe malnutrition. The high caloric content of ethanol also causes fat to build up in the liver, one of the earliest stages of alcoholic liver disease. This is frequently followed by scarring of the liver tissue, which interferes with the organ's task of filtering toxins from the blood. The slow poisoning leads to other complications, including cirrhosis, an often fatal degeneration of the liver that affects at least 10% of all alcoholics and is especially hard on women. "They die of cirrhosis earlier than men, even though they consume less alcohol," says Judith Gavaler, an epidemiologist at the University of Pittsburgh Medical School.

This year studies at the Harvard Medical School and the National Cancer Institute reported that even women who drink moderately may have a 30% to 50% greater chance than nondrinkers of developing breast cancer. Heavy drinking among men and women alike has been linked to cancer of the liver, lung, pancreas, colon and rectum. In October a team led by Dr. Charles Lieber, a leading alcoholism researcher at the Bronx Veterans Administration Medical Center in New York City, reported that it had isolated a possible link between alcohol and cancer in humans. The culprit appears to be a member of the family of enzymes called cytochrome P-450s. In the presence of alcohol, the cytochrome can turn certain chemicals in the body into carcinogens.

Despite the medical recognition of alcoholism as a disease 21 years ago, there is still uncertainty over its legal status as an illness.

Michael Deaver, the former aide to President Reagan who is on trial for lying to a grand jury about his lobbying activities, is arguing that he was not responsible because he is an alcoholic and his drinking at the time impaired his memory of events and facts. In the past the so-called alcoholism defense generally has not been very successful, but it has worked on occasion in perjury cases.

Next month the Supreme Court will hear a case that is likely to hinge on the Justices' decision as to whether alcoholism is a disease. Two former soldiers, now recovered alcoholics, are seeking to overturn a 56-year-old Veterans Administration policy that classifies alcoholism as "willful misconduct" rather than a sickness. The VA's definition prevents alcoholics from receiving benefit extensions awarded to veterans with illnesses. In seeking to make their case, the plaintiffs' lawyers are expected to bring up the new evidence that alcoholism may have a genetic basis. Says Kirk Johnson, general counsel for the A.M.A., which filed an amicus brief in the case: "We want a medical judgement, not a ruling based on fear, misunderstanding and prejudice."

For alcoholics, the only way to stop the havoc alcohol causes is, of course, to quit drinking. That is easier said than done. The main barrier to ending the torment is the alcoholic's characteristic, and usually adamant, denial that any problem exists. Mary, 61, who has not taken a drink for 14 years, remembers blacking out and waking up with her hands trembling so badly that she could not hold a cup of coffee. "I had reasons for all those things happening to me," she says, "and none of them had to do with my drinking."

How, then, to break the psychological impasse? One way is to follow a strategy called intervention, which was pioneered in the early 1960s by Vernon Johnson, an Episcopal priest in a Minneapolis suburb. In intervention, family members, friends and co-workers directly confront the alcoholic to shatter his carefully nurtured self-delusions. Beforehand they meet with a specially trained counselor (the fee: $500 to $750) to rehearse. In the actual confrontation, the alcoholic is presented with a tough but sympathetic portrayal of the mess he is in and is urged to accept prearranged admission to a treatment center, often the same day. Says Carol Remboldt, publications director at Johnson's institute in Minnesota: "Intervention allows a tiny aperture to be poked in the wall of an alcoholic."

The process can be painful. A 31-year-old daughter read her alcoholic parents a letter in which she described how she had seen her mother change "from the best friend I ever had" to an unhappy and unreliable woman. "The good parts of your character," she said, "are being stolen away by alcohol. Don't let that bottle overtake your life." Indeed, children often provide the most persuasive statements. One alcoholic's resistance crumbled when his son said, "Daddy, when you read me the funnies on Sunday morning, you smell." Peggi, a former schoolteacher and recovered alcoholic, remembers the day seven years ago when she was faced down by her husband, sister and three sons. "It was awful" she recalls. "But it was crucial for me to see how my drinking affected their lives."

As Poet Robert Bly, the son of an alcoholic, puts it in a book called Family Secrets, edited by Rachel V. (Harper & Row, 1987): "Every child of an alcoholic receives the knowledge that the bottle is more important to the parent than he or she is." To mend the damage from those year-in, year-out traumas, hundreds of thousands of Americans have turned to Al-Anon and other family-therapy organizations. An offshoot of A.A. that was formed in 1951 for relatives and friends of alcoholics, Al-Anon has more than doubled in size since 1975 and now boasts some 26,000 regional groups. But the real comer is the children-of-alcoholics movement, aimed at the nearly 30 million offspring of chronic drinkers in the U.S. Made up of a variety of organizations, the movement took off four years ago with the best-selling book Adult Children of Alcoholics, a guide to the dilemmas C.O.A.s face, by Janet Geringer Woititz, a human-relations counselor in Verona, N.J.

At a typical C.O.A. meeting, participants sit in a circle and offer reflections on their own experiences, from a paralyzing fear of intimacy to acute conditions like bulimia, a disorder marked by episodes of excessive eating. At the heart of their pain and confusion is a childhood fraught with anxiety. "When we were kids and our parents were drunk' it was our problem," a 21-year-old daughter of an alcoholic told Time's Scott Brown. "Somehow it seemed that we should be super people and make our family healthy." Reliving painful childhood experiences among sympathetic listeners enables the C.O.A.s to feel emotions they had suppressed. Recalls Rokelle Lemer, a pioneer in the movement: "I had to learn to re-parent myself, to comfort the little girl inside."

For both family members and chronic drinkers, the greatest frustration is the absence of a surefire treatment for alcoholism. The truth is that success rates often depend more on the individual makeup of the alcoholic than on the treatment. Alcoholics fitting Cloninger's male-limited type are less likely to remain sober after treatment, along with those with unstable work and family backgrounds. "The best predictor of patient outcome is the patient," says Thomas Seessel, executive director of the National Council on Alcoholism. "Those who are steadily employed, married and in the upper middle class are more likely to succeed. They have more to lose." In response to allegations that some centers have exaggerated how well their patients do after treatment, Congress has ordered the NIAAA to investigate treatment programs.

Today about 95% of in-patient treatment centers in the U.S. use a 28-day drying-out -program developed in 1949 at Hazelden. For the first few days, staff help patients through the tremors and anxiety of withdrawal. From that point on, the emphasis is on counseling. The aims: dispel the alcoholic's self-delusions about drinking, drive home an understanding of alcohol's destructive properties, and make it clear that the only reasonable course is to stop, drinking--permanently. Some centers use Antabuse, a drug that induces vomiting and other symptoms if the patient has a drink. Schick Shadel, a program with hospitals in California, Texas and Washington, employs aversion therapy to condition alcoholics to recoil at the smell, taste and even sight of a drink. Most programs, however, rely on A.A. or other counseling programs to help reinforce the message of abstinence.

"Everyone knows how to get sober," says Michael Baar, an Albany, Calif., psychologist. "The problem is keeping them in that state." Relapse prevention is the latest attempt to help reduce the number of recovering alcoholics who fall of the wagon. Terence Gorski, president of the Center for Applied Sciences in Hazel Crest, Ill., has studied thousands of relapse cases and found that on their way to recovery, alcoholics go through specific stages, each with its dangerous temptation to return to drinking. Early on, it may be hard to cope with withdrawal. Later, the patient may falter in developing a normal family and social life. Finally, there is a period of complacency, when the recovering alcoholic no longer fears drinking as he once did. At each point, says Gorski, "the person is out of control before he actually starts to drink." His solution: counselors who meet regularly with recovering alcoholics to help them identify and face problems before they get out of hand. Says Gorski: "It is compatible with A.A. and self-help groups. The only difference is that we go beyond what AA. has to offer."

Will there ever be a simple cure for alcoholism? Probably not. Even so, the next decade or so holds dramatic promise for advances in understanding and effectively treating the disease. Researchers hope eventually to sort out alcoholics according to the neurochemical bases of their addiction and treat them accordingly. "We are still trying to map out these neurochemical systems," says Edgell Newport's Wallace. "If we succeed, then it is likely that we will be able to design treatments." A.A. and other groups may always be necessary to help alcoholics assess the psychological and emotional damage of chronic drinking, but there is hope that medicine may make the course to sobriety less perilous.

Medical and scientific promise, however, should not eclipse the importance of public policy efforts to curb heavy drinking among adults--and stop it altogether among youngsters and adolescents. Education is one approach. The Government's "Be Smart" campaign, aimed at eight-to-twelve-year-olds, has had some success. Mothers Against Drunk Driving has been a primary factor in the fight that has raised drinking ages from 18 to 21 in 34 states plus the District of Columbia since 1982. Despite strong opposition from the alcohol industry, which lobbies vigorously against higher excise taxes for alcohol and warning labels on beer, wine and liquor bottles, groups like MADD and the National Council on Alcoholism continue to push initiatives that will further discourage consumption of alcohol.

In his speech two weeks ago, Health Secretary Bowen complained that brewers and beer distributors spend $15 million to $20 million a year marketing their products on college campuses, encouraging heavy drinking and "contributing to poor grades, excessive vandalism, many injuries, and not so infrequently, death." Bowen asked Education Secretary William Bennett to encourage university presidents to restrict alcohol promotions on campus. Spuds MacKenzie, the canine star of Anheuser-Busch's advertising campaign for Bud Light beer, is also in the doghouse. This fall the National Association of State Alcohol and Drug Abuse Directors filed complaints with several federal agencies charging that the campaign encouraged kids to drink.

For those who know what British Novelist Malcolm Lowry described as the alcoholic's "fine balance between the shakes of too little and the abyss of too much," sobriety cannot come too soon. That is the challenge for medical researchers. But just as much energy should go into the job of preventing the disease. That means not only finding genetic markers to warn those susceptible but also changing attitudes in a society that still glorifies drinking. As Bowen remarked recently, "To do anything less than all this would be a disservice to ourselves, our society and to the many future generations whose lives and livelihoods are at stake." For millions of American alcoholics, there is no time to lose.

Diary of a Drunk

What is it like to suffer from alcoholism?

The writer of the following article, who spent 28 days in a treatment center in the Northeastern U.S., offers his reflections:
