Dying of alcoholism normally takes years. But before a final, prolonged bout of uncontrolled drinking caused my physical collapse and led to treatment, there was no doubt I was well on my way. My appearance was shocking. I was about 20 lbs. Underweight and malnourished, the result of giving up almost all forms of food except coffee, sugar and, of course, alcohol. I was in the early stage of delirium tremens, the DTs. I sometimes heard faint ringing noises in my ears and suffered unexpected waves of vertigo. I felt near constant pressure in my lower back and sides from the punishment my liver and kidneys were taking. My personality was also seriously diseased. I was nervous, reclusive, by turns extravagantly arrogant and cringingly apologetic. I tried to cover my extremes of mood with brittle cheerfulness, even though I was desperately afraid. If you asked me how I was feeling, I usually lied, "Just fine."

I now see "just fine" as a key phrase that encompassed my diseased physical and mental condition. At the nadir, my addiction to a chemical that was killing me was nearly complete. I knew that something was very wrong with me. I even knew I was an alcoholic, but I had long since come to believe there was nothing I could do about it. I had decided that it was perfectly appropriate--just fine--that I should die. In fact, I honestly hoped that I would, sparing further grief for many people I loved. Dying, I thought, was the best thing I could ever do for them. The idea of living without alcohol could not occur to me. I preferred the idea that I was a hopeless case.

No one finds alcoholism more mysterious than the suffering alcoholic, and I was no exception. I had no idea why I was an alcoholic at all, though I should have: my father was one. But from his illness I had gained only a morbid fear of the substance, which lasted until I reached college. I would never touch the stuff. That prolonged abstinence while my adolescent peers experimented with liquor only made what happened to me more mystifying. I thought I could take alcohol or leave it.

Why did I ever start to drink at all? The short answer is that initially it made me feel better. Alcohol numbed my self-awareness, the same trick that it performs for nonalcoholic drinkers at cocktail parties. The difference is that normal drinkers dull their self-consciousness only slightly, the better to socialize. I very quickly tried to send all my thoughts and feelings about myself to oblivion. Psychologically, I was undoubtedly depressed when I began to overcome my well-founded but ill-understood fears about alcohol: my father died when I was a sophomore. For whatever reasons, I spent the better part of two decades trying to stay emotionally and physically numb.

Even in those early days, signs might have pointed an expert on alcoholism toward my growing problem. One hint was my immediate tendency to drink to unconsciousness. At parties, I would often fall asleep in mid-hullabaloo on the couch. That drew plenty of jokes at the time. Only much later did I recognize that I had been passing out. Another signal was an initial, abnormally high tolerance for alcohol, at least until the passing-out stage. I thought I could hold my liquor pretty well. Now I think it means that my body was being less dutiful than most in handling overdoses of a hazardous chemical. (Years later, when only a couple of drinks would overload my toxified -liver, causing slurring of words and other drunken symptoms, I finally joined the company of those who "can't hold a drink.")

Exactly when did I become addicted to alcohol? I don't know that either. The addiction was preceded by a delusion: I thought I drank to socialize. Maybe I did. My alcoholism took years to develop into a chronic affliction, and during much of that time I went to bars after work, one of the guys. The delusion was gradually reinforced by gravitation. I mingled more and more with other persistent drinkers who took longer and longer to call for their bar tabs. Most of us were actually alcoholics in varying stages of development. The nonalcoholics had long ago selected themselves out. Those of us who remained agreed that we were "normal." Unhappy, but normal.

Alcoholic perception is like that, in a hundred insidious and distorting ways. All of them are aimed at protecting a drunkard's notion that he is possessed of free will. My drinking buddies and I agreed that we did not have a drinking problem. Everything in our increasingly narrow world, though, was a problem that required drinking: the wife, the kids, the boss, the government. In dingy watering holes from which everyone with a healthy life to lead had gone home, we conspired to overlook the obvious, that our bodily cells were addicted, and our minds were along for the ride.

Inexorably, the need for alcohol grew, while the lies wore thin. As my alcoholism accelerated, I abandoned most drinking partners and joined the ranks of solitary toppers bellied up to countless bars. I lost any sense at all of what would happen after I started drinking; I became completely unpredictable. Sometimes I would go home after a couple of drinks (there was usually more booze there). More often, I would join the lineup of other alcoholics at the bar telephone stalls, fumbling with worn-out excuses about unexpected visitors and urgent business meetings. Sometimes I would simply hole up in my office with a bottle after everyone else had gone home. There

Nan Robertson, author of the forthcoming A.A.: Inside Alcoholics Anonymous, is a journalist and reformed Alcoholic. A New York Times reporter for more than 30 years, she won the Pulitzer Prize in 1983 for a personal account of her nearly fatal struggle with toxic-shock syndrome.

'I'M ONE DRINK AWAY FROM A DRUNK'

Where would I be without Alcoholics Anonymous? I would be dead. I entered A.A. in 1975. I haven't had a drink in 12 years. But it took me years to get well, and I had a turbulent recovery, including hospitalization for a nervous breakdown. The most courageous act of my life was not to recover from toxic shock; it was to admit that I was a drunk and to do something about it.

The world is full of functioning alcoholics, and I was one of them. I didn't drink on the job for the longest time. I never lost my job through drinking. I didn't ruin my career. I would have done all of these things had I gone on long enough.

For me, it was a conversation with one person who told me I had to stop, who was not himself an alcoholic but whose father had died an active alcoholic. It was the combination of this man's gentleness and the fact that he was a doctor - but that really wasn't the important thing. It was that he had suffered through alcoholism. And somehow, what he had to say to me started me on the road back.

I began drinking alcoholically when I was 33, which was about the time I married my second husband, Stanley Levey. I was controlled for the 10 years of our marriage before his death by the fact that he was a moderate drinker, the fact that he loved me. I was careful about my drinking. After he died, very traumatically, all controls were off, and I began drinking suicidally and did so from 1971, when Stan died, almost through 1975, when I went to Smithers (an intensive alcoholism-treatment center in New York City) and then immediately thereafter joined A.A.

The worst-kept secret

I drank very heavily at night. My friends at work didn't know this. I thought I'd kept the secret. But when I called up from Smithers joyfully telling everybody I'm an alcoholic, it was the worst-kept secret in the world. My mother had known, all my close friends had known and my stepson had known.

You know, alcoholics drink for every reason they can possibly find. Your life is structured around alcohol. I used to look forward to lunch all the time because there I could have a couple of martinis and a beer. That's pretty pathetic, isn't it? I always wanted to go to restaurants where drinks were served. I didn't want to go to coffee shops. It's very, very typical.

There's a dramatic difference between the way women alcoholics drink and the way men alcoholics drink, which has a lot to do with the way society views women who drink heavily. Women alcoholics generally are hidden alcoholics. It is much less socially acceptable for women to go to bars, to be drunk and disorderly publicly, so very often women drink at home. They often drink alone. Betty Ford is a classic case.

A debt of gratitude

People don't judge people in A.A. People don't check up on you. They do not care what you did out there when you were drunk. All they care about is helping you now that you're trying to get sober. That's something that's very hard for outsiders to understand, how extremely flexible A.A. is. If I feel in a crisis now, I'll go to meetings. I still go fairly regularly, but not as much as I did when I was in a terrible state. At most, I would go to A.A. meetings perhaps five times a week. Now, I go to about one a week, sometimes one every two weeks.

It's very hard, if your life has been saved by an organization - with your help, of course - not to feel deeply grateful to it.

If you are a member of a family that includes an alcoholic, don't protect him or her. Don't call the boss to say, "Fred is sick today and can't come to the office." Don't pour the liquor down the sink. Don't rant and rave. Don't threaten, unless you mean it, that "I'm leaving you."

You have to detach yourself from the person who is an alcoholic and find your own life, because the alcoholic wraps his arms around the bottle - and the family wraps its arms around the alcoholic, and all of their lives become distorted. Their lives are dedicated to the principle that they have to keep this secret and they have to protect their drunk and nobody must know.

What you can do is save your own life. One of the best ways to find help is in Al-Anon, for the families of alcoholics, to know that you're not alone. They teach you to have a life of your own.

The best question to ask yourself or ask about someone you love: Is drinking distorting any part of my life - my working life, my social life, my family life? If it is, then you've got problems. Also, if you are secretly worried about your drinking, chances are you have reason to be worried. All alcoholics are, in their own souls, worried about their drinking. They may deny it; it is a disease of denial. Some people would rather be crazy than be called a drunk. It's something that people are ashamed of. There's a terrible stigma involved in saying: "I am a drunk. That's what I am. I'm a successful, charming, effective drunk that's sober, and I'm one drink away from a drunk."

Conversation with Beth Brophy

not accept the sponsorship.

3. Work on only one member at a time.
4. Come to all the classes with the new member.
5. Keep in close touch by telephone.
6. See that the new member comes to all the meetings and be there also.
7. See that he meets people.
8. Have older members talk to him.
9. Don't sell the club to new members.
10. Don't quote the big names in the group.
11. Uphold other members to the new member.
12. Do not encourage discussion of personalities.
13. Do not make things too easy, such as lending money, etc.
14. Help straighten out new member's financial and domestic problems by pointing out what experience has shown to be the best way.
15. When a drunk goes to another sponsor with tales of persecution, if the second sponsor doesn't talk it over with the first sponsor, the issue become one of personalities, and the second sponsor will find that the slipper has outsmarted him.
16. Don't listen to a lot of gossip by slippers.
17. Second sponsor of same member should get in touch with the first sponsor and find out what has been done - what were the reaction of the slipper - so that he can't pull the same stuff on the second sponsor.
18. If a new member alibis about coming to classes and the Tuesday night meeting

as absorbed from the Akron group. The feeling has been that growth should be steady
and sound. There has been a considerable amount of favorable publicity in the Chicago
newspapers and all of it has been unsought. It is an unspoken tenet of the group
that
the restoration of each individual to a calm, orderly way of living is of more importance than promoting the group in public. Experience has been that there is
a very great power in the example group members have given those who knew them before their entrance on the program.

Spirit of Simplicity

This spirit of simplicity extends to the activities of the group as a whole.
Organization at all times has been only to such extent as to insure against over-organization. Fortunately the Chicago group early in its existence was given this advice by the leader in Akron: When the time is right and you are right, Providence will show you the way.

Six months after the group moved into the Loop for regular Tuesday meetings it became apparent that the general meeting itself was not a proper place for the discussion of business affairs. We, therefore, set up an earlier meeting on the same evening
for any matters of business which might come up. This meeting was without officers
and any member interested could attend. For lack of a better name it was called the Set-up Meeting. This has continued, although now one member from each neighborhood group attends and at this meeting the members may present for discussion any subject
in which their groups are interested.

The plan for the neighborhood groups developed naturally with no impulse to organize for the sake of organization. At about the same time the Set-up Meeting was formed a rather considerable rush of prospects appeared. Each was sponsored by an older member

but there was no arrangement on the part of the group as a whole for meeting or helping the new people except by casual contacts at Tuesday meetings. Two of the older members conceived the idea of an informal bull session with the men under their sponsorship at the time invited to a home to sit around for the evening and discuss any particular problems of their own. This experiment was so successful that other informal gatherings at unstated times were held here and there throughout the city.
Presently it became apparent that the idea could well be systematized. The city
was divided into 10 areas and a discussion group to meet regularly on Tuesday nights
was formed in each one. As each group has acquired new members it has divided and in some cases subdivided until there are now 60 in the Chicago area. It has been found
that the value and pleasure in these group meetings lie in a rather small attendance.
Some of these groups have been reluctant to divide because of close association in their early days of AA and remain large. The general feeling, however, is that from six to 15 members is the ideal size of a group for a discussion meeting.

Tuesday night meetings in the Loop are at present held in the Engineering Building at 205 West Wacker Drive. This is the fifth meeting-place required by expansion of
the group. Many members and their wives have dinner in the building before the meeting.
In general the procedure on Tuesday nights follows the early pattern which is
a program of speaking conducted by a chairman. The practice now is that four or five speakers, each allotted 10 minutes, give the Tuesday programs.

As time went on the increasing number of newcomers appeared to justify a special

instruction meeting. The first of these was held informally in one corner of the large meeting hall by a volunteer older member who gathered the newer ones and talked to them and answered their questions. This haphazard plan was so evidently successful that a definite regular meeting was arranged to precede the main meeting.

Another Tuesday night meeting was organized for the benefit of old members who were concerned with sponsorship.

Even before the Chicago group began its regular Tuesday meetings in the Loop the need for companionship was recognized and met by a Saturday night open house at the home of one of the members. The group soon outgrew the accommodations of any home and moved the Saturday night festivities into a hotel in Evanston. Members of the far south side soon set up their own Saturday night open house and since then another regular party has been established on the north side and one each on the northwest and west sides.

The Alano Club

Another activity is the Alano Club on the sixth floor at 189 West Madison Street. This project is sponsored and supported by members of the metropolitan group, administering it separate from the central office but entirely in keeping with AA principles and practices. Open house with coffee and cake at the Club at 1PM Wednesday and at 8:30 PM Friday.

In the experimental field the Chicago group has had success with patients at the Chicago State Hospital on the Northwest side of the city. By special arrangement the group has been enabled to send men and women in need of hospitalization and to obtain treatment for them without putting them through the regular process of commitment. Regular AA meetings are held at the hospital Wednesday nights, conducted in turn

Grapevine, June 1945

Educational Plan

The Wilson Club, one of the four St. Louis AA groups, is now using a very satisfactory method of "educating" prospects and new members. It has done much to reduce the number of slippers among new members. In brief, it is somewhat as follows:

Each new prospect is asked to attend four successive Thursday night meetings, each one of which is devoted to helping the new man learn something about Alcoholics Anonymous, its founding, and the way it works. The new man is told something about the book, and how this particular group functions.

At the first meeting Bill's background is sketched - his drinking career and the various events which led to his drying up; his trip to Akron, his meeting with Bob, and the subsequent growth of AA up to the time it reached St. Louis. We give some of the local history on the formation of the Wilson Club. During a fifteen minute recess, each man is asked to write in a few words just what he considers an alcoholic to be. Then a few answers are read, followed by the reading of an address made by one of our best doctors discussing what an alcoholic is from the medical angle.

The second Thursday covers the spiritual angle, trying to help clarify many of the 12 steps. This is followed by the reading of an address by a greatly revered Jesuit priest, Father Dowling, who really started the St. Louis groups.

At the third Thursday meeting, all chapters of the book proper are highlighted and discussed, followed by the reading of a talk given us by a very prominent Protestant minister, who has read the book many times and has made Alcoholics Anonymous the subject of several of his sermons.

Then at the final meeting, the AA literature is reviewed, including our own pamphlets, and the Wilson Club operation is explained to them in detail; such as attention to these "previews" enabled each individual to reorganize or rewrite his discussion so that it would contain what the group as a whole considered an adequate presentation of the subject on the basis of their collective experience and what they knew of experiences elsewhere.

Critical

In general, the plan is to cover the AA program as clearly, concisely and completely as possible in four 45 minute discussions, with time for questions at the end of each. The arrangement of the club rooms permits all four discussions to be presented at one time, each in a separate room, every Wednesday evening. New members are urged to attend all of the sessions in the proper order. It is emphasized each time that the discussions are not to replace any other AA activity, but to supplement them and to serve as an outline into which the new member can fit his past experiences, his present objectives and his progress toward these objectives.

At every meeting the three objectives of AA are kept before the group:

1. To attain and maintain the FACT OF SOBRIETY.
2. To RECOVER from those things which caused us to drink.
3. To HELP OTHERS who want what we have.

By adherence to simplicity in concept and in presentation in all discussions, we try to give aid to the new member in understanding how to progress toward these objectives.

Attendance at discussions indicates the fact of sobriety, so that the emphasis is placed on a Program of Recovery. Each of the 12 Steps is considered in respect to its place in the whole program rather than for its value per se. The four discussions are integrated each time by brief review of what was covered before and preview of what is to be the content of discussion to follow.

Questions are encouraged at the end of the discussions and frequently require as much time as the discussion. Some attempt is made to consider questions of general interest here, while other questions seem best referred to discussion with the sponsors or others who may be better able to give help on them.

Older members also are urged to attend discussions and many do attend. Their contributions in the question period are very valuable. The plan in the present stage of evolution seems to show sufficient improvement over earlier methods to justify its approval for another six-month period. It is our hope that we can continue to progress in this as one of the ways of helping others.

Discussion No.1: The Admissions:

1. The admission of alcoholism, as a result of our experiences with it - what we are and how did we get that way.
2. The admission that we want to do something about it - the qualifications for AA membership.
3. The belief that we can obtain help - which is not debatable.

A brief outline of the purpose and scope of the discussions is stated. A brief history of AA and a statement of the motives, methods and scope is made. A short consideration of what constitutes an alcoholic and a statement of alcoholism as a disease, along with the progress in public thinking about alcoholics and alcoholism, are included. The objectives in AA membership are pointed out and certain mechanisms for getting over the tough spots are mentioned.

This material is covered by each of the persons giving this discussion according to his own methods and is varied to meet the needs of the group present so far as possible. At the end, each new member is given a small card. On one side of this card is a list of the activities at the club rooms for each night of the week, with

the address of the club rooms. At the top is a reminder - "I made a 24-Hour Deal Today," at the bottom - "Easy Does It."

On the reverse side of the card is an outline of the Program of Recovery, which
is also the outline of the discussions. Space is provided for the name and telephone number of the sponsor and co-sponsor. The new member is also given a single sheet of information about the St. Paul group and other brief information which may be
of value to him.

Discussion No. II: Inventory and Restitution:

The steps concerned with inventory are read and discussed with regard to what constitutes an inventory, how to go about it and when to do it. Emphasis is on honesty, thoroughness, clear thinking and "follow through" in practicing the 10th
Step. Restitution is approached in the same fashion and the steps concerned are discussed as means to an end. The 5th Step is mentioned as a further aid in self-understanding and as a way to do something about our character analysis.

Discussion No. III: Spiritual Aspects of the Program:

Steps 2, 3, 5, 7 and 11 are read and discussed in their relation to our objectives to the remainder of the program. Open mindedness, tolerance and personal understanding of A Higher Power are stressed as essential to progress in this part of the program.
"Easy Does It" is the watchword in this discussion.

The 12th Step is used as the basis of a summary of the Program of Recovery, as our "insurance" in AA and as a way of living in keeping with normal human behavior
and experience. The three parts of the 12th Step are discussed separately.

1. Spiritual experience is discussed as sudden conversion to a new way of life or the more common result of the cumulative effects of all experiences in working at
the program which result in a personality change. Continuance of spiritual

Here are the letters in response to Rochester's Genesee Group's plan.

RE: Sept 1945, 'Rochester Prepares Novices'

-in October 1945 'Mail Call'

'On the "Four Absolutes" '

From Manhattan

Apropos the article from Rochester in your September number, and speaking for myself, I do not like the reference to the "Four Absolutes" in the same sentence

with

the "12 Steps."

Let's keep the AA program simple, and not couple it with an outside religion, creed, or dogma. -- J.D.

...

'Fair to the Newcomer?'

From Manhattan

Since I believe that almost without exception alcoholics are deep-rooted individualists, I deplore a tendency I have noted recently among certain AA groups to lay down the law to newcomers. I have in mind specifically the article appearing

in the September issue of 'The Grapevine' regarding the procedure followed by the Genesee group of Rochester, N. Y., in the education of what that group terms "novices." The article invites comment - even to the extent of criticism - so

I

would like to express my (one individual's) entire personal views on a subject of seeming importance to the future healthy growth of AA.

I came into AA when the membership numbered approximately 2,000 with the distinct understanding that the only requirement was the honest admission on my part that had a serious drinking problem and that I sincerely wanted to do something about

I

it

(i.e. Step No. 1). Beyond that no one told me what I had to do about anything but it was definitely suggested I attend regular meetings as soon and as often as possible.

These meetings were my source of training and membership was up to me, not my sponsor, nor by approval of the group. Let me add hastily, at this point, that I do believe meetings, conducted by older members, at which newcomers can ask questions and present their problems and at which the 12 Steps are explained, are often most helpful. Any other course of instruction seems to me to border on self-righteousness on the part of older members, the anathema of any alcoholic. Mention is also made of the booklet prepared by the Genesee group for the purpose of preparing a "prospective candidate" for his first meeting. I recently acquired a copy of this booklet entitled, "Rudiments of AA." Again I must take exception to the answer contained therein to a supposed question from a "prospect" or "novice." "Q. All right - I am an alcoholic and I really want to quit drinking forever. Am I now ready for AA?" "A. Not quite, but you have come a long way. One further step is necessary. You must have a belief in God and faith in His power to help you." To answer the question of whether or not this is good medicine for the newcomer, let us consider for a moment the 12 Steps of the AA program. It will be remembered that there is no mention of "God, as we understand Him," until the 3rd Step, although reference is made to a "Power greater than ourselves" in the 2nd Step. I take it that no AA of any experience whatever expects the newcomer to accept or to understand the entire program by the time he is ready for his first meeting. I have never claimed to be agnostic or atheistic but that answer might well have frightened me away from AA forever. The spiritual aspect of the program often takes the individual a long time to acquire but faith in a Higher Power eventually comes to us if we continue to have faith in the group and endeavor to the best of our ability to help others. Finally, although I have been "dry" now some four and one-half years, which

is,
of course, comparatively unimportant as long as I remain "dry" for the current 24 hours, I am unenlightened and probably a little stupid and have not yet learned
what comprise the Four Absolutes. For me, the 12 Steps seem to be sufficiently well thought out to assure permanent sobriety if I remember to work on them all and don't become careless or complacent. However, "God works in mysterious ways, His wonders to perform" and what keeps me sober may not be the answer for the next guy, so good luck to the members of the Genesee group, even if I don't agree with a few of their ideas.
-- A.T.

-in Nov 1945 'Mail Call'
'Answer from Genesee' from Rochester, N. Y.
May I have a little space in which to reply on behalf of the Genesee Group
of Rochester, N. Y., to the two Manhattan letter writers, "J.D." and "A.T.," both
of whom availed themselves of our invitation to "comment," "suggest" or "criticize"
our
"plan of education" briefly outlined in our letter in the September issue of
"The Grapevine"?
That they both went outside the letter for their "criticisms" and only addressed himself, and that mostly by inference, to the plan is immaterial.
"A.T."
They
both took exception to the "Four Absolutes," (not mentioned in the letter). "J.D." because, in a booklet prepared by our group for the assistance of our sponsors
in informing their prospects of the "who," "what" and "why" of AA, we used in the conclusion thereof the words, Four Absolutes, in the same sentence with the 12 Steps.
"A.T." was annoyed because, after four and one-half years in AA, he didn't know what they were.
For the edification of them both - Honesty, Love, Purity and Unselfishness comprise the Four Absolutes and how adherence to these well known principles of ethical conduct could harm even an alcoholic, the writer is at a loss to understand.

"The Ethical Conduct of Alcoholics Anonymous is based on two definite sets of 'laws' (italics mine) known as the Twelve Steps and the Four Absolutes."

(Quotation

from "A Manual for Alcoholics Anonymous" published by Akron Group No. 1, the original chapter so-called of AA - a book which the writer saw about three years ago when he first attended an AA meeting.)

The further criticism of "A.T." seems to be that he objects personally to any method of instruction other than through the medium of a group meeting - on

the ground that "any other course of instruction" borders on "self-righteousness"

-

I

would call his attention to a letter published in the October issue of 'The Grapevine' by "Bill" - and would ask "A.T." how Bill, Dr. Bob and the early

members

could have informed others if their 'only' recourse had been to take a prospect to a "meeting"? For that matter, how would an AA Group in a new city get started if only one AA were to attempt it, as has been done many times without the assistance

of

any

group meetings and with considerable success?

"A.T." has another objection, not to the plan, but to one question and answer

contained in the booklet referred to above - on the ground that the answer,

"you must have a belief in God and faith in His power to help you," might have frightened

him

away from AA forever.

That might be so, but "A.T." must remember that this book was prepared by our group from our personal experience in AA work and contains only what we found was the most effective way, not the only way, in which we could work to help a man become a successful AA. We are not primarily concerned with large attendance at meetings.

On the other hand, I do not see what harm can be done by telling a man in advance that a belief in God is an integral part of the program - or isn't it? Unless "A.T." attended meetings conducted differently from those with which the writer is familiar, he ran headlong into God at the opening of his first meeting. All meetings around here are opened and closed with prayer - I never heard a prayer yet addressed to anyone but God and most prayers contain petitions. It would seem extremely silly to address a petition for help to any person or thing if you had no faith in His or Its power to help you.

"A.T." closes his letter by wishing us "good luck." We thank him for that wish but with the gentle reminder that depending too much on "luck" and not enough on good judgment, common sense, and a firm belief in the truth of AA principles was one of the reasons we wrote the little booklet.

So we say to "A.T.," may he have continued success in his AA life and come and visit us - we promise not to frighten him. -- M.L. (For the Genesee Group)

...

'Who's to Judge?'

From Birmingham, Ala.

When I read or hear about some group having set up any kind of a system or screening or rules for "admitting" newcomers I feel uneasy. I can't help but ask if anyone of us in any group anywhere has the right to appoint himself a judge as to when somebody is "ready" for AA. I certainly don't think anyone has the right to go beyond the two requisites: Admitting one's life has become unmanageable through alcohol; wanting to do something about it. I find nothing in the AA book suggesting that one has to have a belief in God, for instance, BEFORE he can come into AA,

or
that one must be pure or saintly or anything else like that. -- E.P.

-in Dec 1945, 'Mail Call'

'Plea for Simplicity'

From Manhattan

I must object mildly and without rancor to the charge made by M.L. of the Genesee

Group, in your November issue, that I misquote. So please permit me to refute such charge by direct quotations from the Genesee-Manhattan exchange of letters appearing in your September, October, and November issues, relating to the Rochester plan

for the education of novices in AA, such quotations being as follows:

September letter from M.L. - Genesee: "There he (the notice) listens to four successive talks based on the 12 Steps and the Four Absolutes."

October letter (mine): "... speaking for myself, I do not like the reference
to the Four Absolutes in the same sentence with the 12 Steps."

November letter from M.L. - Genesee: "They (A.T. and myself) both went outside the letter for their criticisms They both took exception to the Four Absolutes

(not mentioned in the letter), J.D. because, in a booklet prepared by our group

...

we used ... the words Four Absolutes in the same sentence with the 12 Steps."

From the above it will appear that the Four Absolutes were mentioned in M.L.'s

first letter, and my comment was directed only to the letter, since I have not yet

read the Genesee booklet, so that I could not have been referring to it.

Reduced to its essence, the substance of my so-called criticism is simply
this:

The ordinary novice comes into AA bewildered and confused in mind. In the normal

case, all that the older members can hope to do is to give him an inkling of

...

the

AA program - Honesty, Humility, and Helpfulness. Why confuse him in the early stages with the much more difficult concepts of Absolute Love, Absolute Purity, and Absolute

Unselfishness? Later on he may be able to embody these more abstruse concepts in his basic AA philosophy of life But do not make it too tough for him by with hard liquor. According to the National Council on Alcoholism Inc., 3.3 million drinking teen-agers from 14 to 17-nearly 1 in 5-are already showing signs of developing serious alcohol-related problems. One result: almost 10,000 young people die each year in accidents linked directly to imbibing.

But aren't a few beers on Saturday night more desirable than smoking marijuana or snorting cocaine? "Not if you view the results from where I sit," says Dr. Harold Rockaway, a psychiatrist and chief of the St. Joseph Hospital Alcohol Rehabilitation program in Houston. "The adolescent alcoholics we're dealing with are sick. They're school dropouts. They're often in trouble with the law. And they can't stop without help." Alcohol, he stresses, can be more physically destructive than the "hardest" of illicit drugs.

Fortunately, there are many ways of treating and preventing adolescent alcohol use. "Many adults think that adolescents don't need or want their intervention, but nothing could be further from the truth," says Dr. Marie Armentano of Massachusetts General's alcohol clinic and an instructor in psychiatry at Harvard Medical School. The raucous behavior of intoxicated youngsters is a cry for help.

Deadly Firsts. Why do young people start drinking? Researchers at the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism attribute it to peer pressure, a belief that drinking is adult, the example set by relatives and family friends, and the easy availability of alcohol. One way or another, adolescents get the message that drinking is okay.

If there is a family history of alcoholism-parent, sibling, grandparent, uncle, aunt-the chances of problem drinking are considerably greater. In one survey of adopted children, the biological sons of alcoholics were over three times more likely to be alcoholic than were the sons of nonalcoholics-even though there was no exposure to the alcoholic biological parents after adoption. Another study concluded that having an alcoholic parent is one of the most important factors in an adolescent's early use of liquor.

What's the first step if signs point to alcohol abuse? "Try to determine the degree of drinking," says Dr. Armentano. There is a difference between "abuse" and "Alcoholism." Abuse-the most prevalent problem among adolescents-is characterized by frequent drinking that leads to other problems: the junior-high student who starts fighting or staying out all night; the youngster who becomes reclusive, cutting off family and friends; the good student who fails courses.

An adolescent alcoholic, by contrast, may have any or all of these problems with one thing more: a physical dependency on alcohol. Several years ago, a group of recovering adolescent alcoholics appeared on the Merv Griffin television show to describe their experiences. A baby-faced 17-year-old told of his first drunk at age 5 after sneaking champagne at a family New Year's Eve Party. This started him on secret drinking-which wasn't discovered until he was a 10-year-old altar boy. At that time he polished off several bottles of sacramental wine and threw up during a communion service. It took four more years of uncontrolled drinking before he landed in Alcoholics Anonymous.

Another teen-ager said she started sharing older boys' booze to be part of the crowd. By age 15 she was a quart-a-day drinker, feeding her habit by bartering sexual favors. One day, after she wretched bile and blood for six hours, emergency-clinic doctors diagnosed cirrhosis of the liver-giving her one year to live if she didn't stop drinking. That same day she joined AA and has been "clean" since.

Working Treatments. "Teen-age alcoholics aren't weighed down by all the emotional baggage' carried by adult drinkers," says Dr. Rockaway. As a result, they are more amenable to psychiatric treatment and usually recover faster. In the St. Joseph's Hospital program, the first few weeks of in-patient treatment establish certain truisms: the youngsters are hooked on an addictive drug; they are not alone in this addiction; they can function without alcohol. The program includes AA members who speak the same language and provide examples of alcoholics who have their habit under control. Most of these teen-agers make it back home and to school within four weeks.

For about 25 percent of teen-agers referred to the Massachusetts General alcohol clinic, the cause turns out to be depression, an emotional disorder that afflicts over nine million Americans and is grossly underdiagnosed in adolescents. A teen-ager who can't live up to his parents' expectations may use alcohol to cope with the pressure; setbacks such as parents' divorce or failing grades may send an adolescent into a tailspin. A regimen of anti-depressant medication- "which often is enough to stop the drinking, when the drinking is a symptom rather than the primary problem," says Dr. Armentano-plus one-on-one psychotherapy can be effective. In the majority of cases, though, the most effective intervention is in group setting. This can mean school alcohol-education classes, clinic-based groups, or self-help organizations such as AA, which are increasingly being used by adolescents.

Early Intervention. "Although treatment of alcohol abuse and alcoholism is effective," says Ellen R. Morehouse, head of the White Plains, N.Y., Student Assistance Services (SAS), "it often comes too late to prevent irreparable damage." A teen-age drunk at the wheel of a car becomes a lethal weapon; a daily drinker may be on the way to liver disease. Hence one SAS goal is to prevent alcohol use among youngsters who haven't started drinking-as well as to provide support for the children of alcohol parents and to counsel adolescents already using alcohol. Early in the school year, prevention sessions are designed to help newcomers adjust, while high-school-senior groups focus on alternatives to alcohol as a means of relieving stress.

How do you get kids to attend such sessions? "There's nothing mandatory about the program," explains Morehouse, "except for students caught using alcohol or other drugs on school grounds." Nevertheless, local publicity and presentations by student-assistance counselors attract up to 4000 students a year.

"Occasionally," says Morehouse, "we come across a true alcoholic." The youngsters with serious problems are usually referred to outside agencies for more comprehensive treatment. The rest are evaluated and slotted into an appropriate group or individual counseling sessions.

A survey of nearly 3000 students who participated in the SAS program in 1982-83 showed a significant drop both in school absenteeism and in the number of students using alcohol and other drugs. The survey also showed an effectiveness in preventing students from becoming involved. This program is now also used by other schools in New York and in 16 additional states.

Recognizing a Killer. Not every adolescent who needs help is willing to confide in adults. So in the Boston suburbs, an organization called CASPAR (Cambridge and Somerville Program for Alcohol Rehabilitation) has developed the Alcohol Education Program (AEP), with after-school sessions in a facility that looks like a private residence. Teen-age peer leaders are used, and group members are paid $2 an hour to attend. A bribe? "Maybe," says a CASPAR counselor, "but the results are worth it."

The program's first thrust is in grades two to six, where specially trained teachers conduct 45-minute classes once a week for ten weeks. "Although our primary objective is to reach children of alcoholic families," explains Ruth B. Davis, AEP director, "the presence of youngsters whose parents are not alcoholic removes any onus." This way, large numbers of children receive basic alcohol-prevention education at a time when it has maximum impact.

A second thrust involves youngsters in grades 7 to 12. To get around their reluctance to deal with adults, 12 high-school students from a cross section of backgrounds are selected each year for extensive training as peer leaders. About half come from alcoholic families; the rest have at least observed negative alcohol use. The result is stronger rapport between the leader and group members.

AEP's third target is children from alcoholic families. The program helps these children understand why a parent drinks, why they are not at fault for the parent's habit, and how the child can avoid the same trap.

Not long ago, a parent summoned to the emergency room of a Connecticut hospital was told that his 16-year-old son had been injured in a drunk-driving accident. The parent heaved a sigh of relief. "Well," he said, "at least he wasn't using drugs." But, clearly, alcohol can no longer be considered as the lesser of two evils. Instead, we must recognize liquor for what it is: a potentially addictive substance responsible for 10,000 teen-age deaths each year, as well as thousands more lives wrecked in other ways.

even to our horney-toed hillsmen. Four of our first seven A.A.s had to be lassoed and hauled out of caves where they had been living with panthers and bears. Two of the other three were easily taken: our local founder dug them up out of the sod - incorrectly diagnosed. The founder himself was a screwball trumpet player from one of the state's oldest, most revered families - fundamentally incapable.

A perfect foundation for an AA group.

It all began on March, 1949, in the mind and heart of a Little Rock (trumpet playing) insurance executive, an alcoholic who had been dry for five years after reading
Peabody and practicing an unlabelled brand of AA. He had had very little success
with fellow alcoholics and when he read the first notice of AA he went for the book.

He roped in a furniture salesman (without wares) and a broken down (young) newspaperman who had buried himself (for keeps he thought) deep in the oblivion
of
the State Hospital for Nervous Diseases.

These pioneers in what Bill calls the "mail order section" went to local newspapers and obtained a modest notice in each; rented a Post Office box; began contacting ministers, police and court officials, and exploring flophouses, poolrooms, courts.

Business was brisk.

Within a few weeks the membership included 25 men and two women.

The troubles began early. Some of the men got the idea that they had joined a wet nursing organization and proceeded to turn it into one; the women turned out
to be less alcoholic than unattached. One by one the members sloughed off.

Results: three months after founding, four charter members remained, two shaky.

At this time, prospects were given only the book, the weekly meeting, the offer of association, and were more or less on their own. One of the charter members drafted a program which, after several overhauling detracted by tryouts, became known as The Little Rock Plan, or the Approach Program. The sole motive behind it was to improve effectiveness of the group's service to alcoholics.

It is a big dose, a rough assignment, highly controversial among groups familiar with it. It has served the Little Rock group well. We like it. (Detailed information will be furnished upon request.)

Out of the application of the Approach Program came the sponsorship system: one veteran and usually a young neophyte conduct a prospect through the program, which requires a minimum of two weeks of the prospect's full time.

We now have a membership in Little Rock of approximately one hundred; a women's group under our wing and meeting with us weekly; a swell club room establishment; and several branches in smaller Arkansas cities including Camden, where an even dozen from Little Rock now work for the Navy.

Four paramount lessons learned:

You can treat the spiritual phase any way you choose in the group as a whole, but sooner or later it becomes dominant in all the group's activities. In the beginning the group gave this phase very little house. It's the big motivation now, accepted, recognized, revered, held in awe.

For his own good you mustn't coddle a prospect.

Slips? We're now on our 'steenth policy and system for coping with slips. All printed in the Grapevine ... This sounds more like the police department or probation department plan.

There is only one A plan and that is right out of the book. No organization.

No

rules. That's the plan we in Southern California try to follow. -A.M.

...

'More Little Rock'

From Detroit, Mich.

Good grief and little fishes! What have they got out there in Little Rock, Ark. - a concentration camp? It sure doesn't sound like AA to me, at least not like anything

I ever heard or read about AA in the four years I've been in (no slip, either).

Where do they get the authority to keep anybody out of the group? Or, rather, where do they get their authority - period! One of the great virtues of AA is that it vest authority in no one. Those people, if that's a correct report, just seem to have appropriated it on their own.

Imagine bragging about making it tough for anyone to join AA! As I read the book, one of our obligations is to get the message to as many as we can, help everyone

we can, open the door wide to everyone who knocks, -- H.E.T.

...

'And Little Rock'

From Memphis, Tenn.

Around here we were treated to quite a contrast recently. Bill came down here to speak to the regional convention. As always, he was tolerant, understanding, sympathetic - no big shot stuff from him; no expert speaking with authority.

No

"do's" or "don't" or "musts."

Then I read that thing from Little Rock. Quite a difference between the way they think and the way the founder of AA thinks.

No wonder that group has only had 500 pass through it in seven years. That's pretty slow growth and quite understandable. They seem more interested in statistics on slips than in practicing AA. -- T.L.

...

'Plus Little Rock'

From Boston, Mass.

best

I can with plain text.

Note: This pamphlet originated a year after the publication of the 12 Steps in our book Alcoholics Anonymous and ten years BEFORE the 12 Traditions.]

-----Cover-----

Alcoholics Anonymous

Little Rock Plan
(Arkansas)

-----page 1-----

Alcoholics Anonymous

Little Rock Plan
(Arkansas)

-----page 2-----

[blank]

-----page 3-----

- CONTACT -

A prospect should never be approached unless he personally has requested an interview; the only exception being a person whom you personally know. When a member of the family or the friend of a prospect requests you to contact him, advise that such an unsolicited contact would be unsatisfactory and might result in creating such a prejudice in the mind of the prospect that he would not later request help from A A. In such case, explain the AA Program to the friend or family and secure for them a copy of the Saturday Evening Post Story. Suggest that this be given the prospect and that he be told that if he desires more information about the program, he should contact a member of Alcoholics Anonymous.

(If a prospect is a friend, you may handle the contact in a way best suited to the status of your friendship. However, in contacting a friend, it is suggested that the best results can be obtained by merely telling him in an impersonal way, what AA has done for you. Refrain from creating an impression that you are trying to obtain his acceptance of the program. If he is ready for the program he will evidence it by asking questions. If he does not evidence this interest, he is doubtless not ready and you will accomplish no real lasting results by attempting to "sell" the program. You will have done all that is possible by making the program available to him, and the chances are that it will not be long before he will seek you out for more information.)

-----page 4-----

FIRST INTERVIEW

Your principle objective in the first interview is to establish in the mind of the prospect the fact that you have a sympathetic understanding of his problem and that this understanding springs from the fact that you have yourself had the same problem.

You can accomplish this understanding by being certain to tell the prospect your history. If the prospect is in the throes of a hangover, determine the seriousness of it. If his physical condition requires a drink, first get him to his home or room and then see that he gets a drink. However, the sooner the liquor is cut off the better. Tapering off methods are usually unsuccessful unless rigidly administered to the patient. If he is not in shape to talk, your first problem is to help him to get over his hangover. When the prospect is in a physical condition to talk, begin by telling him of your alcoholic problem, of your drinking experiences, and try to get him to talk of his. Then tell him something of your experience with AA and explain the program as you see it.

The program discussion should end with the propounding of these questions:

1. Are you in your own mind convinced that you cannot handle your alcohol problems?
2. Are you willing to let a group of fellows who have had the same problems prescribe a course of treatment for you?
3. Are you willing to do ANYTHING to eliminate alcohol entirely from your life?
4. Do you believe in a power greater than the power of man?

-----page 5-----

If the prospect answers these questions in the affirmative then tell him that AA has the answer to his problem, the same as it gave the answer to your problem and the problems of several thousands others and that you are sure that he would enjoy the book - "Alcoholics Anonymous", which you will leave with him if he is ready to read it.

(If the prospect is sober when first contacted he must be required to get the Book himself, at the office of the Assisting Secretary at the Club Rooms or wherever you designate.

If the prospect is not certain that he can answer the questions in the affirmative, tell him this is not unusual; but emphasize that it is necessary for him to be able to answer them honestly in the affirmative before the AA Program can be successful. Suggest that his hesitancy indicates he is thinking honestly and being honest both with himself and with you which is the first stone upon which the program is built.

Suggest that he think through what you have told him and meantime read the AA Book. If he accepts the book, emphasize that it must be read and returned in three days.

Handle the interview in such a way that you evidence a sympathetic understanding of his hesitancy to answer the question, yet at the same time be contrarily firm in saying to him that the program will not work successfully until and unless he is able to honestly answer the four basic questions in the affirmative; tell him that he is not quite ready for the program until he can accept wholeheartedly and believe in the affirmative answers; otherwise he might get the idea that the program will pull him through merely by exposure to it. In other words, do not try to sell the program. Let the prospect know that he must want the program above all else;

-----page 6-----

And then if he does, you can assure him that his problem will be solved.

If the prospect is not ready to read the book in three days, do not insist. Tell him to call you in a few days and you will tell him how to secure a copy of the book.

You might ask him if you can have his permission to send other associates to call on him. At the next regular meeting of your squad make a brief report on the case.

Be sure that you have told the prospect you case history and impress on the associates who are asked to call on the prospect that they each must above all else tell the prospect their case histories.

Should the prospect accept the book, impress on him that it must be completed (or returned if prospect secures book from secretary) on schedule. Explain that the reason should be obvious. Unless the solution of his alcoholic problem is sufficiently important to make the reading of the book the next most important step in his life, he has failed to recognize his situation. Also point out that the program is directed toward the building of a new way of life, that we alcoholics have formed many habits that must be replaced by new, constructive habits in order to build this new way of life; that one of the worst habits of an alcoholic is procrastination, and that we start out in the beginning to replace this habit with the habit of doing things when they should be done.

Before leaving the prospect tell him that you are asking him to make only three promises to himself and to you.

1. That he will read and study the book and will complete it within three days.
2. That if he feels that he has to take a drink before he has completed the book he will call you and wait until you get to him before he takes a drink. You in turn promise that you will get to him immediately on receipt of such a call and agree that if after talking to him he has to have a drink you will secure one for him. (Do not ask him not to take a drink.) Then tell the prospect that you will see him at least once each day while he is reading the book. If the prospect is up and in condition to be out and about when you locate him and is able to go to the Corresponding Secretary for the book, then it is all right for you to arrange to have the prospect meet you at some place and time mutually convenient each day during the time he is reading the book. (You may find it best to go to the home of the prospect for these interviews.)

-----page 7-----

In all cases write down your office and home telephone numbers for your prospect.

At the next regular meeting of your Squad make a brief report on the case.

The prospect is your particular problem and other associates should not attempt to work with him unless you request it. It is your responsibility to see that the prospect carries out the program as outlined on schedule. No prospect (or any other person) is permitted to attend a regular group meeting until he has completed the Approach Program.

At any time during your association with the prospect, you are to seek advice of other associates, especially your Squad, should a problem arise which you are unable to handle alone.

AFTER FIRST INTERVIEW

Do not fail to arrange your call on the prospect at the end of the three day period assigned to reading the book at a time and place so that you and he will have a full discussion. Always be prompt in all of your appointments as you are requesting the prospect to be. If the prospect is to call at your home or office at the expiration of the three day period - be available at the appointed time.

-----page 8-----

Discuss the book with him. Tell him of your reactions to it and listen attentively to his. Encourage him to elaborate on his drinking experiences. Then ask him again whether he can answer the four basic questions in the affirmative.

If he still cannot, ask him if he would like to give you his reasons.

If you cannot convince him his reasoning is faulty, tell him that in your opinion he is not quite ready for the program. If he approves, give a full report of the case to one or two associates and ask them to make a call. Await further action until you have had a report from these associates.

If he still cannot truthfully give affirmative answers to the four basic questions, return and tell him to continue to think about the program and feel free to call you at any time in the future when he can honestly see the affirmative answers.

Then at the next regular Squad meeting, make a further report on the case. If, on the other hand, the prospect can answer the four basic questions in the affirmative, he is ready for the first test of his willingness to do ANYTHING to conquer his problem. Should the prospect be unemployed, you advise him that the approach program requires complete attention to the Program and that he could not handle a job and the Approach Program at the same time. Make no promise as to how long it will take a prospect to complete the Approach Program. The problem of employment must be dismissed entirely from his mind for the time being. He may protest against this. If so, you should tell him that the program in the beginning will require most of his time and thought, and that a search for employment or actual employment would conflict with the proper execution of his assignments and would be an attempt to solve his two problems at once. Emphasize that a job is of trivial importance

-----page 9-----

so long as he has the problem that is certain to make him jobless. The Alcoholic Problem must first be eliminated. Cite the experience of Associates who have completed the Approach Program while jobless and then have experienced amazing economic progress; and the experiences of prospects who have failed on the program because a job was more important to them than the solution of their one big problem. Should the prospect be employed, you advise him at this point (following the reading of the book) that the approach Program requires complete attention and that he could not handle a job and the Approach Program at the same time. Therefore, he must obtain a leave of absence from his job - if he desires to continue in his present position - or resign from the job - if he is dissatisfied with it. In case the prospect desires a leave of absence, he must go to his boss and tell him the true reason for the requested leave; that he has discovered he is an alcoholic, that he has an opportunity to conquer the problem through association with a group of alcoholics and that his first treatment is a program usually requiring three or four weeks of his entire time.

If, when this request is made, the boss declines the leave of absence, the prospect is to report the fact to you and you will at once call a special meeting of the Committee to deliberate on what steps must be taken.

-----0-----

The next step, after reading the book, is the case history. The prospect is requested to write a case history of his life in chronological order including his family background, his schooling, his martial experiences, if any; his employment, and a detailed account of his drinking, from the first drink up to the time of his contact with AA. Explain that this is to be a frank, honest story of his life and that if he wishes, you will be the

-----page 10-----

Only one to see this history; that the way in which it is written, whether on typewriter, with pen or pencil; the form, the grammar, etc - all is immaterial, that what you want is for him to get everything down on paper so that it will enable you to help him get his mind free and his past cleaned up so that he can start a new life. Tell him the schedule on this is three days. Ask him to call you if he needs anything special during this time. Also you should see the prospect at least once each day or evening during this period. Also during this period, send other associates around to see the prospect.

When the prospect has finished his history, arrange to meet him so that you can spend at least two hours at a time and place that will enable you both to relax and talk frankly and fully. Have him read the history to you. Try to find his reasons and excuses for drinking and be able to point out to him the fallacies in them. Also look for the real cause of his Alcoholism. Be sure to impress at this time that he is now embarking on a program that will enable him to find a new way of life; that he is undertaking the program for himself alone, and not for his wife, for his family, for his economic good, or for any other reason. Point out that he can solve no problem until he has solved his alcoholic problem, and that when that is solved he will find the solution to the other problems because his mind will then be freed.

Following the reading of the history, get a pencil and paper and make out a schedule of activity for the prospect for the next seven days, but give the schedule to the prospect one day at a time. Emphasize to the prospect that he must report each day to you on the results of that day's work and to receive schedule for the succeeding day. Set a definite time and place for prospect to meet you each day.

ASSIGNMENTS

First - Make a list of his creditors. Have the prospect see the local creditors and explain to the creditors that he has found that he is an alcoholic; that he

-----page 11-----

that he has been introduced to the Alcoholics Anonymous program and has undertaken to follow it, that he is sorry he has not paid his bill, that he is first going to get started on the treatment for his alcoholism and then obtain a job. He will return and discuss a plan for payment of the bill just as soon as he has completed the entrance program and obtained employment.

Second - If the prospect has creditors outside the city have him write them and explain the situation in the manner outlined for the personal credit contacts 'above'.

Third - Make a list of all former employers for whom the prospect has worked during the time of his abnormal drinking. Have him see each one located in Little Rock and write those located outside of Little Rock. In either the personal calls or the letters it should be explained that he has discovered he is an alcoholic, that he has found the AA Program and is undertaking to follow it, and is putting the first steps into practice by coming around (or writing) to say he is sorry for the fact that he was drinking excessively while working for him, etc.

Do not fail to emphasize to the prospect that he must in every letter or interview say that he is not looking for employment at this time. He must stat that he is not ready for employment and intends to devote his efforts to a recovery from alcoholism until such time as his progress is satisfactory to the AA group.

Fourth - Make a list of all people to whom the prospect owes apologies and/or against whom he holds resentments or dislikes.

-----page 12-----

Fifth - Make a list of old friends (not drinking acquaintances) with whom the prospect has not had very close contact in recent months due to his drinking, but with whom the prospect would again like to be on friendly terms. (In the list of assignments have the prospect see at least one of these each day.)

Sixth - Give the prospect a list of names, addresses, etc., of members of the group and ask him to see at least one member of the group each day and discuss with him for a few minutes his progress, troubles, etc.

Out of the foregoing information and such other necessary clean-up steps as the prospect's history and your discussion with him indicates advisable, give the prospect enough assignments each day to keep him busy that day and continue to do this until completed.

Seventh - Interspersed with other assignments for the second week should be the following lectures which should be taken only in this order:

1st day- "There is a Solution"; 2nd day- "More about Alcoholics"; 3rd day- "How it Works"; 4th day- "Into Action"; 5th day- "Working With Others"; 6th day- "A Vision for you".

The associates who will give the foregoing lectures will be assigned by the Committee.

-----page 13-----

Have him report to you once each day so that you can check over his list of assignments, give him any helpful suggestions and so forth. This is the time when you have the opportunity to do your greatest service. The ultimate success and the solution of the prospect's problem depends much on the sincerity with which you take the time daily to encourage the prospect to "do the best you can this day". If you are not sincere and helpful to the prospect you can not expect him with a brain befogged by alcohol, to get the habits upon which the success of this program depends. Slips can be traced almost always to the failure of the prospect during the first thirty days to get his mind entirely clear of old troubles and of doing something about the program each day on schedule.

Eighth - When the prospect has seen all of his creditors (or written them), his boss and ex-bosses, and has made his apologies, ask him if he has talked the program over fully with his wife; if he has had an honest heart-to-heart talk with her and made all possible amends to her. If he has not, suggest that he do that immediately, and that from then on he should talk over his progress on the program daily with her so that she can begin to understand fully the program and will begin to know that she has a part in the program. (It is desired that the wife read the book.)

-----page 14-----

Ninth - He is then ready to select some minister, priest, rabbi, and or practitioner and go to him for an interview, explain that it is not necessary for him to join a church and that he may tell the clergyman that he is not ready to join a church. The interview with the minister is for the purpose of a "confession" and the assurance a minister can give that God, as the prospect understands Him, is forgiving. He should read his case history to the minister, should explain in detail his problem, giving his un-

My name is Josh and I'm not an alcoholic. In the past a college student with my drinking habits - a frequent beer or two, a couple of times a year to excess - wouldn't feel compelled to declare this. But when I got ill from drinking last spring at Princeton and was taken to the infirmary, I was told to meet with the school's full-time alcohol counselor. Opening a folder in my name, he began the interview: Do you play drinking games? Have you gotten sick on alcohol before? Do you consume more than fourteen drinks a week? After fifteen minutes of this, he told me that getting sick was "a significant episode" in my "drinking history," that I was teetering on the brink of alcoholism.

Subjection to this type of inquisition is an increasing part of the curriculum on America's campuses: 60 percent of colleges have some sort of substance abuse program. And the idea behind it - that a given level of consumption or a major bender means you're a confirmed lush, or close enough to being one to need treatment - now pervades the $2 billion alcohol- treatment industry.

Today's treatment theories reflect a far broader neo-temperance trend, which first became evident around 1984, when Mothers Against Drunk Driving succeeded in raising the drinking age to 21. In 1988 then Surgeon General C. Everett Koop called (unsuccessfully) for a ban on happy hours. Last January an award-winning edition of Little Red Riding Hood was banned for first-graders in the Empire, California, school district because Grandma takes a glass of wine after escaping the wolf. Today's puritans lobby for a whole range of prohibitions, from banning alcohol industry sponsorship of sports events and rock concerts to barring convenience stores, gas stations, and supermarkets from selling booze.

The new public awareness about drinking has, of course, helped to reduce the horrendous problems caused by alcohol abuse. Consumption is down, particularly among the young. In 1980, 58 percent of Americans between the ages of 18 and 24 said they drank beer, according to Simmons Market Research. By 1989, only 47 percent did. The number of deaths attributed to drunk driving has fallen, too, from 20,356 in 1982 to 17,849 in 1989 - a 12 percent decline in seven years.

You'd think such a success might moderate the impulse for ever more draconian correctives. But if anything the anti-alcohol severity is increasing. Last summer the Supreme Court found that "the measure of the intrusion on motorists stopped briefly at sobriety checkpoints" is a small price to pay in the effort to reduce the "death and mutilation" caused by drunk drivers. Thirty-nine states now have "dram-shop" liability and twenty-four states have "social host" liability, in which bartenders and hosts can be held partially responsible when someone they serve gets in an accident.

In the treatment industry, the tactics used to intimidate heavy drinkers have become more coercive. An increasingly popular method of alcoholism treatment these days is "intervention." Invented by Dr. Vernon Johnson, a reformed alcoholic who became famous when he pressured Betty Ford into treatment, the method relies upon a team effort. Family, friends, and co-workers "intervene: by confront-ing the offender in public -sometimes at work, preferably when he is hung over - with a list of grievances and a series of ultimatums. Johnson's transcript of a typical intervention from his recent book, Chemical Dependence, includes threats from the victim's wife that she'll leave him if he doesn't seek treatment, and from his boss, who says he'll fire him. A car is supposed to wait outside so the victim can be whisked directly to a treatment center.

The Johnson Institute promotes intervention through travelling workshops and a large mail-order business of books, cassettes, and videos. One of Johnson's biggest clients is the national network of Employee Assistance Programs, in-house and regional counselors who specialize in alcohol problems and are currently working with 12,000 corporate government offices across the country. A supervisor, noticing lagging performance or simply suspecting an alcohol problem, can order an employee to meet with an EAP counselor. the counselor, who doesn't have to meet any national training standards, will tell these presumed alcoholics to go on the wagon. If the employee is caught drinking again - whether or not the drinking is affecting his job performance - his boss is encouraged to send him back for more counseling or fire him.

Coercive treatment is essentially an extension of one of the main precepts of Alcoholics Anonymous: alcoholism - a disease over which the alcoholic has no control - starts with the first drink and leads inexorably to death if the alcoholic does not become perfectly abstinent. It is thus essential to stop alcoholism in its early stages, no matter how scant the evidence. In recent years, however, the disease theory of alcoholism has come under attack. (See "alcohol and Free Will" by Robert Wright, TNR, December 14, 1987.) Studies have shown that even many hard-core drinkers are able to control their drinking. Yet virtually every major alcohol treatment program in the country largely adheres to the A.A. tenets, and now a growing number are using some form of coercion.

Drunk drivers, understandably enough, have come under particularly ferocious scrutiny.

District Court Judge Albert Kramer of Quincy Massachusetts sentences about 470 drunk drivers a year to enroll in Right Turn, a $725, twenty-six week, out-patient treatment program, and to attend a series of A.A. meetings. "Everyone is assumed to be having a problem by virtue of their DWI conviction," explains Dr. Steve Valle, director of the program. "Social drinkers are really high-risk problem drinkers." As do most treatment programs, Right Turn uses a questionnaire to determine if you're an alcoholic. Right Turn's test is adapted from one by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. Out of curiosity, I took it myself. Sure enough, I scored a 30 out of 47, which meant I was in "the final, deteriorative stage of alcoholism, when most alcoholics outwardly appear to be alcoholic." The test was designed in such a way that each symptom on a night of overindulgence was recorded separately, boosting my score.

Across the country convicted drunk drivers are ordered to begin treatment, usually at an A.A. chapter, or are given a choice Between treatment and prison, which is, I suppose, a choice of sorts. But forcing someone to go to A.A. presents another problem: six of A.A.'s "Twelve Steps" to counter alcoholism allude to God. Last year a Maryland drunk driver, John Norfolk, objected to his court-ordered A.A. meetings, saying the government was forcing him to participate in a religion. The state yielded - Norfolk was switched to a non-religious program - before a judgment was rendered, avoiding a precedent and letting Maryland continue with court-ordered A.A. There are now, though, non-spiritual groups for people with drinking problems, which judges are beginning to use as A.A. alternatives in sentencing. In contrast with A.A., one group, called Rational Recovery, believes everyone has the power to overcome alcohol problems - without undergoing lifelong treatment.

The craze for compulsory treatment would make some sense if there were proof that it worked. Yet a 1988 Bureau of Statistics report found that nearly half of all inmates convicted of driving while intoxicated had previously been involved with an alcohol treatment program, and one in eleven was in treatment at the time of arrest. A major report issued last spring by the National Academy of Science's Institute of Medicine cites a study in which sanctions (e.g., suspending licenses) were shown to be more effective against recidivism than alcohol treatment.

Of course, all this might be an elaborate process of self-denial. After several more sessions with my college alcohol adviser, a couple of compulsory sessions with A.A., and an "intervention" organized by TNR interns, maybe I would be forced to admit that, yes, I am an alcoholic. The trouble is, by the time that's all over, I probably will be.

Source: The New Republic, April 22, 1991.

|||||

+++Message 1088. Periodical Lit:
From: Jim Blair 6/13/2003 9:15:00 AM

|||||

A New Course on Campus: AA 101

California school takes the pledge

At first glance, the wealthy Los Angeles suburb of Pacific Palisades seems an idyllic community of winding roads and ocean-view estates. But in the last 16 months it has been the setting for tragedy. Ten young residents have died violently, many in incidents involving alcohol or drugs. Just last month four teenagers were killed in a fiery crash when their speeding car struck a light pole on a main boulevard, veered across the median strip and hit a tree. The driver, 17-year-old Russell Kantor, was reported to have a blood alcohol level of .08 percent, just below the state's .10 criterion for drunk driving.

While many in the community mourn the deaths, Palisades High School psychologist Linda Levine decided to start what is believed to be the country's first high-school chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous. "I think some students have decided that one way to memorialize the kids who died would be to get sober in their honor," says Levine. "There's an instinct to try to keep this thing from having been totally in vain."

Getting clean. The high school already has 19 different organizations aimed at students with substance abuse problems, including a lunchtime support group for expatriates of hospital treatment programs and a mandatory program after school for students caught using or carrying drugs. Palisades High also has a two-year-old chapter of Alateen, for those with alcoholic relatives and friends. But Levine felt kind needed more. "How do you tell your dad you want to go clean," she says, "If you've never confessed that you're not clean?" The school, following the A.A. credo of anonymity for participants, allows students to go to once-a-week sessions without informing their parents, and no records are kept. Levine's only role is to unlock a classroom door and let A.A. leaders in. About 10 youngsters are attending now, she says, and the turnout increases every week.

In 1977, Palisades High caught the nation's attention as the subject of the best-selling book, "What Really Happened to the Class of 65?", a case study of the pressures of growing up in a rich community. Young inexperienced drivers operating fast cars, late-night parties where alcohol and drugs are used, a lack of parental supervision - these are the facts of life in well-to-do communities across the country. Many residents think these are the factors behind the recent spate of fatalities in Pacific Palisades, where the median house price is $660,000. Despite the A.A. program's initial success, some Palisades residents think the drinking problem won't improve without parental involvement. One mother, who didn't want her name used, says many parents feel they've done enough if they hire a driver for their kids on prom night. Her son's best friend was killed in a collision a year ago. "I think the adults are very aggressive and very successful and very much on the fast track," she says, "these kids have a lot to live up to."

The A.A. chapter isn't the only new anti-drinking initiative in the Palisades. A representative of Mothers Against Drunk Driving will speak to the students next month and bring along Russell Kantor's demolished car as dramatic evidence. "Somehow we have to get across to the young people here that it's not a question of not drinking and driving," says Parent Teacher Student Association copresident Sally Lorillo, "It's a question of not drinking."

The Little Rock Plan was, we believe, the first of its kind in the country. By adhering strictly to the "Plan" hundreds have been brought into AA and because this group has kept accurate records and statistics, we can report that our success is better than the national average of 75%; or to put it another way, our "slip" record is lower than the 25% expected and reported from other groups over the country.

It is not easy to become a member of this group. When a person has expressed a desire to achieve sobriety and has had a sponsor appointed for him, he must leave his work or position for at least two weeks. Usually the prospect is required to spend that entire time within the confines of the club rooms, studying, preparing a case history, meeting and filing assignments laid out by the sponsor.

If, after two weeks, he has discharged his assignments to the satisfaction of his sponsor, he is brought before the executive committee and there his request for membership is presented by his sponsor in his presence. In some instances, because of the peculiarity of the case, he may not be admitted for varying periods as high as six months in some cases. However, if he is deemed eligible by the committee, he is brought before the next meeting, receives a warm welcome, is handed a copy of the "Approach Program" and the 12 Steps.

This is not all, however. We do not simply say, "Now here you are, you have had it all, go your way, and may God bless you." No, we do not cut him off in mid-air, so to speak. We give him a small diary and ask that each day thereafter for 28 days, he record his impressions of the day, any event, whether a happy one or a sad one, and enter therein, "I have not taken a drink this day," and sign his name.

At the end of this period he returns the diary to the club, is again welcomed and is admitted in full membership, the privilege of the ballot and an unrestricted part in the activities of the fellowship. He is then assigned to a squad, given some definite task, and encouraged to work, guided by some older member, with new prospects.

In dealing with the new man, here are other procedures. First of all, in addition to being required to adhere strictly to the assignments required by his sponsor, he serves his apprenticeship in what is known as "The Prospect Squad." Here he learns from a squad leader various phases of the work of AA, mingles with other neophytes, hears their experience and contributes his own. If he needs guidance or advice this is where he gets it, along with other new men seeking the way out.

There is the "slip squad," where the man who has suffered a setback, no matter how severe or how light, must serve from two weeks to six months before he is again recognized as a full fledged member. Often the slippee is assigned tougher, more strenuous assignments than when he first was admitted. Here he discusses the slip freely with those men, who like himself, have "missed the boat" somewhere down the line. He tries to find out why he made the mistake and learns again that "to err is only human" and that a slip in the beginning is not uncommon, certainly not fatal.

The executive committee is comprised of representatives from each squad. The squads meet once a week on nights other than the regular meeting and transact the actual business of the Fellowship.

We spend much time in planning and executing the new man's graduation from the freshman stage. We carry him slowly and carefully through the "Prospect Squad"; admit him to membership; keep our contacts with him through that critical period, the Only Bill Wilson could have imagined A.A. as it is today, because only Bill, among the old-timers of Alcoholics Anonymous, had such grandiose, improbable dreams. In the summer of 1935, there were only two A.A. members - Wilson, a failed Wall Street stockbroker, and Dr. Bob Smith, a practicing surgeon - sitting in the Smith kitchen in Akron, Ohio, through half the night, chain-smoking and gulping coffee and trying to figure out how they could sober up other drunks like themselves. The society they had founded attracted only 100 members over the next four years; it would not even have a name until 1939. Now there are more than a million and a half of us around the world - members of the most successful, imitated, yet often misunderstood self-help movement of the 20th century.

About half of all A.A.'s are in the United States, the rest are scattered among 114 other countries. Many additional millions have passed through the movement and been made whole by its program, but A.A. periodically counts only those who are regularly attending meetings.

For those in the know, there are clues to A.A.'s presence everywhere: the sign on a jeep's hood in a Mexican town that says the "Grupo Bill Wilson" will meet that night; a West Virginia bumper sticker advising "Keep it Simple." The Serenity Prayer, attributed to the theologian Reinhold Niebuhr and recited at the end of A.A. meetings, appears framed on the wall in a South African living room or embroidered on a pillow in a chic Madison Avenue shop.

A.A.'s meet in Pagopago, American Samoa, on Wednesday nights, in McMurdo Sound, Antarctica, on Saturdays, and in Lilongwe, Malawi, on Mondays and Friday. They find one another just to sit and chat between meetings in a doughnut shop and coffee shop on the main street of Peterborough, N.H., a town of 5,200 that has four A.A. groups. One of them is called Our Town in honor of Thornton Wilder, who took Peterborough as the model for his nostalgic play about American small-town life. The belfry of a Roman Catholic Church near Covent Garden in London and a bank's board room in Marin County, Calif., are reserved for A.A. meetings once each week. Some groups meet on ships, at sea or port. To these exotic settings must be added the thousands of prosaic basements and halls in churches, community centers and hospitals where most A.A.'s inch their way back to a life of quality.

In the last decade or so, large numbers of Americans, mainly entertainers, have gone public to say they are recovered alcoholics. Almost all said their motivation, and their hope, was, by their example, to inspire still-drinking alcoholics to recover. But the great mass of membership everywhere is composed of more or less ordinary people. They are neither movie stars nor skid row bums; the great drama of their lives has not been played out in the spotlight or in squalid flophouses. These alcoholics have suffered., increasingly isolated, in bars, in their own bedrooms, or in the living rooms of friends who have become estranged by their drunken behavior. Their recovery has been worked out in private.

Over the last 50 years, the substance of A.A. - its core literature, its program of recovery and its ways of looking at life - has changed very little. But in terms of the numbers and diversity of its members, A.A. today would be unrecognizable to its pioneers. In the early years, A.A. members were almost exclusively male, white, middle-class, middle-aged and of Western extraction. They were men who had fallen very far, often from the top of their business and professions.

The A.A. of 1988 is huge, increasingly international, multiethnic, multiracial, cutting across social classes, less rigidly religious than it was in the beginning, more accepting of gay people, and of women, who now form one-third of the total North American membership and about half of the A.A. membership in big cities. Increasingly, many turn to A.A. for help in earlier stages of their disease.

A much more abrupt and spectacular trend is that young people have streamed into A.A. in the last 10 years, most of them addicted to other drugs as well as to alcohol. Dr. LeClair Bissell, the founding director of the Smithers alcoholism center, in Manhattan, expresses the consensus of the alcoholism research and treatment world when she says: "There are almost no 'pure' alcoholics among young people anymore. They are hooked on booze and other drugs, or only other drugs."

It is common now at A.A. meetings to hear a young speaker say, "My name is Joe, and I'm a drug addict and an alcoholic."

The dually addicted anger some A.A. members. One with 20 years of sobriety says: "This fellowship was formed to help suffering alcoholics, and alcoholics only. That's why it has been so successful - we don't monkey around with other problems."

In a few communities, A.A. members have formed groups billed for those "over 30." The message is clear: No druggies wanted. This development infuriates John T. Schwarzlose, executive director of the Betty Ford Center for substance abusers in Rancho Mirage, Calif.: "A.A. is the epitome of tolerance, flexibility and inclusiveness, but some drug addicts have told me about being turned away from A.A. meetings in the Midwest and South when they say they were just addicted to drugs, Now I tell them to say they are both alcoholics and drug abusers." In the big cities and at A.A. headquarters, attitudes toward the dually addicted are much more welcoming.

For a long time, Alcoholics Anonymous was believed to be a purely North American phenomenon. It was thought that its themes of self-help and voluntarism would not transfer to more relaxed cultures. A.A.'s Ecuador-born coordinator for Hispanic groups voiced the early point of view among his Latin friends: "A.A. is O.K. for gringos, but not for us. In Latin America... if a man doesn't drink, he's not a macho." To his surprise, A.A. began to boom among Hispanics in the 1970's. Mexico's membership of 250,000 is now second only to that of the United States. Brazil, with 78,000 members, and Guatemala, with 43,000, are next-highest in Latin America.

Until recently, A.A. had been unable to gain a toe-hold in the Soviet Union or in Eastern Europe. The movement had been regarded there as possibly threatening, because of its precepts of anonymity and confidentiality, its religious overtones and the fact that it operates outside any government control. Then last summer, the Soviet Union sent to the United States four doctors specializing in addiction. They visited Alcoholism-treatment centers, the Summer School of Alcohol Studies at Rutgers University and numerous A.A. meetings. When they returned home, they took back quantities of A.A. pamphlets translated for them into Russian. Still, the only Eastern European nation to embrace A.A. has been Poland. Its Government finally recognized what is called the "psychotherapeutic" value of A.A.

In the United States, those long familiar with A.A. meetings notice that there seem to be disproportionately high numbers from certain ethnic groups. "Alcoholism goes with certain cultures, such as Celtic or the Scandinavian, that approve of drinking, or at least are ambivalent about it," says Dr. Bissell. "But in some environments or religions, people don't drink on principle. These abstinent cultures in the United States include Baptists, some other Southern Protestant sects and Mormons."

For a long time, there was a widely held belief that Jews did not become alcoholics. The work of JACS - Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others - is helping to dispel that myth. Jews are present in large numbers, JACS says, at A.A. meetings in many large cities where there is a significant Jewish population. But rarely do A.A. meetings take place in synagogues or Jewish community centers.

Sheldon B., an alcoholism counselor in New York, told of how a few years ago he approached his own rabbi with the idea of opening their temple to an A.A. group. He thought that Jewish members in any A.A. group might be more comfortable about accepting help in a synagogue setting than in a church. The rabbi informed him that there was no need: "There are no Jewish alcoholics." When Sheldon B. said, "But I am an alcoholic," the rabbi thought for a moment and then replied, "are you sure you know who your real father was?"

Although there are black A.A. groups and mixed racial groups in large Northern cities, the number of blacks in A.A. does not appear to reflect the race's proportion in the nation - 29 million, or 12 percent of the population.

"There is a great stigma in being black and being drunk, even recovered, a black Philadelphia teacher declared at a meeting devoted to the subject. "I made the mistake of telling my principal that I had a problem. I checked myself into a treatment center. She used a hatchet on me."

As a black Milwaukee social worker explained: "The black community is afraid that if blacks admit their alcoholics, it will reinforce the white stereotype that they are shiftless...The black community likes to think that oppression causes their alcoholism...Other oppressed minorities use the same argument. "Who wouldn't drink?" they say.. "Our lives are so goddamned awful.. .Oblivion is the only way out of our pain."

Homosexuals are coming into A.A., and in sophisticated communities are welcomed. Some recovered alcoholics have formed all-gay groups, just as there are special groups for women, doctors, agnostics, lawyers, airline pilots and others.

"Growing up in Alabama, I was taught to hate myself," one gay member told an A.A. meeting. "I was a nigger sissy. In A.A., I learned that God loves us all. My business in A.A. is to stay sober and help you if you want it."

A.A. surveys do not inquire whether members attend religious services or if they believe in God. There are no questions about ethnic or racial origins, sexual preference or whether alcoholism runs in the family. But a family predisposition to alcoholism is reflected strikingly within A.A. Often, speakers at meetings begin: "My name is Mary, and I am an alcoholic...and my father [or mother] was an alcoholic."

Longtime A.A. members believe that it is hopeless to drag another into sobriety if the alcoholic is determined not to be helped or refuses to believe he is ill. Even so, the courts in some states are sending thousands of offenders to A.A. meetings instead of to jail. But the A.A. program sometimes catches on even with unwilling alcoholics.

There are many things outsiders believe A.A. to be that it is not. It is not a temperance organization or Prohibition society. A.A. does not want to save the world from gin. Nobody invites you to join A.A. You are a member if you say you are, or if you walk into an A.A. meeting with the thought that you have a drinking problem and you want to stop. There are no papers to sign, no pledges to take, no obligations to speak up, no arms twisted. The attitude of members toward those outside who drink moderately is, "I wish I could drink as you do, but I can't."

A.A. is not a religious cult. Some members are agnostics or atheists. Many choose to believe that their "higher power" is their A.A. group. Most members prefer to call A.A.'s program "spiritual." Yet God is mentioned directly or indirectly in five of the Twelve Steps, which A.A. uses to help heal individuals, and this sometimes repels outsiders who might otherwise be attracted. (Boiled down to six instantly understandable principles, the Twelve Step program might read: We admitted we are licked and cannot get well on our own. We get honest with ourselves. We talk it out with somebody else. We try to make amends to people we have harmed. We pray to whatever greater Power we think there is. We try to give of ourselves for our own sake and without stint to other alcoholics with no thought of reward.)

A.A. does not work for everybody. But then, nothing does. About 60 per cent of those coming to A.A. for the first time remain in A.A. after going to meetings and assiduously "working the program" for months or even years. Usually, they stay sober for good. But about 40 percent drop out. These statistics refute a widely held notion that A.A. is always successful or an "instant fix." Even so, its success rate is phenomenally high.

Freudian analysis and religious faith, for example, may be two great ways to heal the human spirit, but they do not work on their own for alcoholics. The vast majority of doctors, psychologists and members of the clergy who are familiar with A.A. as well as almost all experts in alcoholism, make A.A. their No.1 choice for a long-term program of recovery. A.A. precepts are built into the programs of every respected intensive alcoholism treatment center in the country, including those of Hazelden in Minnesota, Smithers in New York and the Betty Ford Center. John Schwarzlose of the Betty Ford Center expresses a typical opinion. "Patients ask how important it is that they go to A.A. after they're through here. I say, "I can give you a guarantee. When you leave here, if you don't go to A.A., you won't make it."

A.A. has no ties with political parties, foundations, charities or causes, nor does it sponsor research into alcoholism.

And unlike most tax-exempt organizations, A.A., whose current annual budget is $11.5 million, does no fund raising. Nor does A.A. accept money from outsiders. The funds supporting headquarters services come mainly from A.A.'s huge publishing empire, which distributes authorized literature to members.

Each group is self-supporting, passing a basket at every meeting to help pay for coffee, snacks, literature and rent for the meeting space. Those present often give a dollar. Others may just drop a coin in the basket. Some cannot give anything.

No member may donate more than $1,000 a year to A.A. Nor may a member bequeath more than $1,000, or leave property to A.A., which has never owned any real estate.

"The reason we discourage gifts and bequests," says Dennis Manders, a nonalcoholic who served for 35 years as the controller at A.A. headquarters, "is that we don't ever want some person dropping a million bucks in the A.A. hopper and saying, 'Now, I'm going to call the tune.'"

About half of the groups contribute nothing at all for headquarters services. Many members feel that carrying the expenses of their "home group" is enough. This kind of autonomy and decentralization typifies Alcoholics Anonymous.

The average A.A. member, according to surveys, attends four meetings a week.

After about five years of regular attendance, some A.A.'s go to fewer and fewer meetings. They may stop altogether when they feel they are able to function comfortably without alcohol. However, some speakers at meetings are full of cautionary tales about how they drifted away from A.A. and drank again, sometimes disastrously and for long, periods of time, before returning to the fold.

The movement works in quiet and simple ways. Members usually give of themselves without reservation; exchange telephone numbers with newcomers; come to help at any hour when a fellow member is in crisis; are free with tips on how to avoid that first drink. Most people in A.A. are flexible, tolerant of eccentrics, suspicious of "rules" and "musts." The lack of ritual can be a surprise to beginners. So is the absence of confrontation, finger-pointing, blame-laying, angry debate and chronic whining.

The essence of A.A. can only be guessed at in big, showy gatherings, such as its international conventions every five years. It is in the intimacy of the neighbourhood meetings that the truth, the flavor and the inkling of the reasons for A.A.'s success can be grasped. The members may meet in groups as small as 2 or 3, or as large as 200, but the usual attendance is somewhere between a dozen and 40 people. In New York City, the most active single A.A. spot anywhere, there is a choice of 1,826 listed meetings held by 724 groups every week.

As A.A. grew and diversified, the stigma of alcoholism gradually faded. There were many stages along A.A.'s road to respectability, beginning in the 1940's, that gradually transformed the public's perception of the society of recovered drunks from a butt of disbelief and even ridicule to that of an accepted and admired organization. None was more significant than the action taken by the American Medical Association. In 1956, the AMA's trustees and its House of Delegates declared that alcoholism was a disease, thereby validating a central belief of A.A., from its co-founders on, that it is a sickness, not a sin.

Now the Supreme Court of the United States is debating the legality of the issue. Last Dec.7, the court heard a challenge by two Vietnam War Veterans against the Veterans Administration for excluding "primary alcoholism" (in which drinking itself is the root disorder) from the list of illnesses and disabilities that allow veterans more time to claim education benefits. Extensions can be granted to veterans hindered by physical or mental problems "not the result of their own willful misconduct." The justices are expected to hand down an opinion before the Court's term ends in June.

The structure of A.A. is a little harder to grasp than the disease theory of alcoholism. It is close to the truth to say that A.A. consists of a million Indians and no chiefs. And that it is less an organization than an organism that keeps splitting amoeba like, into ever more groups. If a member doesn't like how things are run in his group, he can start another one with people he finds more compatible. This has given rise to an A.A. saying: "All you need to start a new group is two drunks, a coffee pot and some resentment."

There is a structure in Alcoholics Anonymous, but it would set any conventional notion of how to run a business on its head. Basically, the local groups are boss and the board of trustees and the staff at the General Service Office are supposed to carry out their orders. The board of trustees is made up of 14 A.A. members and 7 nonalcoholics.

Although alcoholics hold all the top administrative jobs, they never handle money. A.A.'s financial operation is run by nonalcoholics. The reason is that Bill Wilson and the early A.A.'s were afraid that if anybody running A.A. fell off the wagon, that would be bad enough, but if he were handling finances as well, the results could be disastrous. The philosophy has endured.

The manner in which A.A. directs its collective affairs and sets policy can be seen most clearly - or in all its democratic confusion - at its yearly General Service Conference, the closest approximation to a governing body of A.A. About 135 people attend, including 91 delegates elected at regional A.A. assemblies in the United States and Canada. Also on hand are the trustees of the board and representatives of the head- quarter's staff.

The day-to-day business of Alcoholics Anonymous has been carried on since 1970 in a brick building at 468 Park Avenue South, in midtown Manhattan. Whatever policies are decided at the conference are carried out by the headquarters staff. Their jobs are divided into specialties such as literature, treatment centers, prisons, public information and cooperation with professionals - doctors, counselors, social workers and teachers, for example - in the alcoholism field. And just in case somebody should become overly fond of a specialty, all the top staff members, except the general manager and the Hispanic coordinator, regularly rotate jobs every two years. The same frequent rotation occurs at every level in A.A. Officers in local groups usually step down every six months.

The seven nonalcoholic trustees, who are often experts in some profession, such as medicine, law, banking or social work, serve a special need. Joan K. Jackson, a sociologist with long experience among alcoholics, explains: "We can use our full names in public. We are not perceived by outsiders as having any vested interest. Privately within A.A., our greatest function is as gadflies and questioners."

What makes A.A. headquarters run is the A.A. World Service publishing empire. It now brings in $8.8 million annually or 76 per cent of A.A.'s yearly corporate revenues. It is the cause of some trepidation among those who have taken what amounts to a vow of poverty. Each year, A.A. distributes 7 million copies of more than 40 pamphlets (mostly gratis for members), and almost a million and a half copies of 6 books and two booklets. Seven million copies of the Big Book (A.A.'s central text, published in 1939, whose formal title is "Alcoholics Anonymous") have been sold. Last year alone, about a million Big seasoned citizen of 70 years.

Dr. Paul Sherman was a professional of stature, a strategic thinker, and an early and influential member of the emerging profession of Employee Assistance. He was the President of this Association, then known as ALMACA, from 1976-1978. We were not even a decade in the making at that time, when Paul was providing leadership, structure, and direction to this evolving group of occupational alcoholism and related workplace and varied treatment interests.

Under his guidance, the Association was positioned for growth and grassroots efforts by geographic regions, the rudiments of EAPA structure today. Emphasis was placed on internal administration and resources for external operations in anticipation of EA profession and Association growth. The stage was set for movement beyond the first two staff members (Executive Director Jim Baxter and Associate Director Judith Evans) to the eventual hiring of "Thundering One Hundred" veteran Tom Delaney, as Executive Director. Former EAPA President, Don Magruder, recalled Paul as an effective leader who used the Association committee process well and focused on giving structure to the Board and staff operations. On a personal note, Don described Paul as "truly a gentleman, professional, strategic ... a very nice man."

Paul hailed from Chicago and completed a doctorate in industrial and organizational psychology from the Illinois Institute of Technology in 1961. He held several key HR executive positions from 1965-1979 with the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation (ITT), having directed personnel planning, development, and industrial relations operations across ITT North America. He developed, implemented, and directed the Behavioral/Medical and Employee Assistance Programs for ITT. In 1979, he founded Paul Sherman and Associates, a national consulting firm offering a wide range of executive assessments, EA, organizational development and more. Paul had an early and well-established reputation for services targeting chemical dependency in executives, key managers, and professionals.

Dr. Paul Sherman represented himself and our Association well on CBS Evening News, the Today Show, Not for Women Only, Good Day New York, Freeman Reports, in the New York Times, Wall Street Journal, and many HR and EA professional journals. Paul was well suited to reach out to corporate and political decision-makers on behalf of his consultancy and his Association. He brought the late Sen. Harold Hughes to address our Association in a past annual conference in NYC. It is through the Hughes Act that initial funding created the NIAAA, and grant money to help this grassroots effort gel in to the membership association then known as ALMACA.

In addition to spouse Joan, of White Plains, and their seven grandchildren, sons David and Scott; daughters Julie and Laurie; and his sister Charlene survive Paul. The family requests donations in Paul's memory be sent to the National Council on Alcoholism & Drug Dependence, 20 Exchange Place, Suite 2909, New York, NY 10005.

I conversed with son David on Tuesday. It was just after the funeral. I

I suspect that this is about to change. An entire generation that came of age in the '60s and '70s, that thought that cocaine, alcohol and pills were the inevitable accompaniment of work in "the biz" are now recoiling from the disorder that drugs have wrought in their lives. They are retreating to A.A. And therein lies a tale of how A.A. and Hollywood work.

I would never have known about this were it not for a few things that happened to me in late 1987 when I became a father for the first time at the age of 42, lost more than I could afford to in the stock market crash and learned that a loved one was a drug addict. Like any good American, I asked my doctor for the means to cut the anxiety, allow me to work and let my eyes close in sleep at the end of the day. Soon, I had my cupboard filled with sleeping pills and tranquilizers; with chloral hydrate and meprobamate, Xanax and Halcion to take the edge off reality. Within months I was walking around in a sort of prescribed fog. I felt far better, but I still had a real problem - the pills were doing nothing about them. I told a friend that I wanted to see what my life would be like without medication that dulled the sharp edges. He suggested that I go to A.A. I told him that I almost never drank, but he just smiled. "try it," he said, "You'll like it."

And indeed I did. From the first meeting I went to in Beverly Hills almost eight months ago until now, I have been moved by the way that A.A. cleans up messy, wrecked lives. At every meeting there is a similar format. After prayers and brief readings from "Alcoholics Anonymous," the basic text, one or more persons stands up and talks about what it was like before A.A., how he or she happened to come to the program and how he or she lives without drugs and alcohol. Some of these talks are astoundingly graphic.

At one of the first meetings I went to, a young man told about how, when strung out on intravenous cocaine, he would hold his arm over a fish tank, cut into his veins with a razor and watch the blood flow into the tank and turn the water pink." Another man recounted how he could almost simultaneously shoot cocaine into each of his arms while he also smoked freebase. Others, by the score, told of getting drunk and crashing into telephone poles - then sailing through windshields. They talked about drunk tanks and jails.

Personally, I appreciated the more analytical approach. One man, who spoke for almost every addict I have ever known, said that he had been a "heartbroken child." He had carried that heartbreak around with him all of his life until he met alcohol and drugs and then found that they organized his life. They took away the pain and allowed him to succeed at his work - until they so disorganized his life that he literally fell apart. A.A., its tenets, its group willpower, its spiritualism, he said, had helped him put his life back together.

I found this form of public confession deeply affecting. But more than this, this quintessentially Protestant, holy roller sort of ritual (albeit delivered with startling restraint considering the subject matter) struck me as key to

The Long Road Back

'After-care' for drug and alcohol abusers

At the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif., patients are prohibited from receiving phone calls for their first five days of treatment, cannot keep any medications they might have-not even vitamins or mouthwash-and are assigned chores: Elizabeth Taylor hauled garbage and hosed down the patio. At the Smithers Center for Alcoholism and Drug Treatment in New York City, where New York Mets pitching ace Dwight Gooden spent the last four weeks, residents trying to kick the habit go through a program that harkens back to grammar school: they meticulously copy out statements, such as a list of definitions of sobriety, and attend lectures. But when patients complete the standard one month of in-house treatment at a rehabilitation clinic, they are only beginning what may be the most critical part of their recovery: after-care.

Even doctors and psychologists who debate the merits of various treatment programs agree on one thing: a few days or weeks spent in an alcohol-or drug treatment center is not enough to wean patients from their dependency. Some 80 percent of addicts, be they drinkers or drug abusers, fall off the wagon at least once, says Dr. Thomas Kosten of the Substance Abuse Treatment Unit at Yale University. And short "detox programs" have, he says "a failure rate of 90 to 100 percent within a couple of months." For that reason, every reputable rehab center provides its patients with an aftercare program to follow after release. Though the requirements vary, they generally include weekly follow-up visits to the clinic for meetings to talk about learning to live sober.

But a primary goal of many after-care programs is to get patients into Alcoholics Anonymous or a similar support group that uses AA's 12 steps. "Meetings are your lifeline," says Betty Ford. The clinics urge patients to attend 90 AA meetings in their first 90 days back home and, after that, to attend regularly or whenever they feel the need-for the rest of their lives. Sometimes, just going to a meeting to help others will keep an addict on the wagon. Mrs. Ford, for instance, regularly works with patients.

One relapse-prevention strategy recognizes that old environments can trigger old habits. Ex-patients encounter "cues" that can prompt them to reach for the bottle or the white powder once again. The cue might be a friend who uses cocaine or a party at which many people are drinking. Clinics therefore teach patients to identify such cues and deal with them-to quickly leave the party, for instance, or find new, non-coke-snorting friends.

Most centers have patients return for counseling after release. Graduates of Smithers usually return two or three times a week at first, then once a week for about two years, says associate director Dr. Allan Lans. Gooden, who tested positive for cocaine use late in spring training, is expected to receive psychiatric counseling up to three times a week. One reason for mandated follow-ups is that patients who've grown accustomed to leading

REMINDERS:

Many people get upset when they send a message which is not posted to the list. So here are some reminders:

One: we are not an AA group. The list is open to anyone interested in AA history whether AA members or not.

Two: we are not a chat room. Please do not use the list to comment on other people's posts. You can copy the E-mail address of the person posting to E-mail that person directly with any comments about his or her post. So don't send them to the list unless you have additional history on the subject.

Three: Nothing will be approved for posting unless it contains AA history or questions about AA history. No personal opinions, or posts based just on rumor or vague memory of what someone told you will be posted. To the extent possible please list the sources for any information you send.

Four: Posts that repeat history already on the list will not be posted, so please use the search box at the top of the page to make sure the information is not already on the list. Also please search the list before posting a question which may already have been answered. I spend a lot of time writing to people who ask a question which is already answered on the list, and would prefer to spend that time doing further research on our history.

Five: I prefer that you do not send website addresses. (I sometimes make exceptions to this rule.) Instead, copy any AA history which is not already on the list to a new post. This is to avoid bringing to the attention of the members of the list websites which may contain inaccurate material about our history.

We try to keep the information on the list as accurate as possible. There are several professional historians on the list who have published books on AA history and they help us to distinguish what is history and what is merely AA legend which may have been repeated often by oldtimers.

To read old posts go to:

Yahoo! Groups : AAHistoryLovers Messages : 1-31 of 853 [88]

New members may be particularly interested in the "Let's Ask Bill" series posted by Jim B. of Canada. They begin at Post 19.

Yahoo! Groups : AAHistoryLovers Messages : Message 19 of 853 [89]

having changed so much after a year of sobriety that he was unrecognizable. After 3 1/2 years, he got drunk and never got sober again; died in 1954.

"A Feminine Victory": Florence R. They might have called it "100 Men," except for Florence. She was the first woman to come into AA and put together continuous sobriety. She stayed sober one year, then married a drunk, got drunk, and committed suicide in 1941.

"A Business Man's Recovery": William R. He's got a terrific, inspirational story in the Big Book, with all kinds of colorful details like fleeing to South America to work in the oil fields so he could learn to drink responsibly like the oil well workers; he thought that would help him. He was the first alcoholic trustee on the board of the Alcoholic Foundation; unfortunately he got drunk as soon as he was elected.

"A Different Slant": Harry B. Harry is probably "Fred" from the chapter "More About Alcoholism," the competent accountant who thought he didn't need AA, he could stay sober on self-knowledge, but inexplicably kept winding up in the hospital. He says in his story that he wants to illustrate that even a successful businessman, like himself, can become an alcoholic. He was elected to the board of the Alcoholic Foundation to take over when William R. got drunk, and promptly got drunk himself.

Curiously enough, the author of the "The Backslider," the 5th story, is the first one who stayed sober. His name was Walter B., and he was the first one admitted by Dr. Bob and Sister Ignatia to the hospital after they formed their partnership to hospitalize drunks.

The author of the 6th story, "The Seven Month Slip," actually slipped for about 30 years. His name was Ernie G., and he has the distinction of marrying Dr. Bob's daughter, Sue, while drunk, in 1941. Dr. Bob was against the marriage; in fact he found out they had gotten married by reading the newspaper. Both Dr. Bob's children married drunks. Ernie stayed sober about a year, got drunk, and stayed drunk off and on until he died in 1971.

There's a strain of propaganda these days that says that AA was much more successful in the early days, but that doesn't seem to be borne out by the Big Book stories. Perhaps it is appropriate that on AA's anniversary, we take a moment to remember how many of the early members who created this fellowship that has saved so many lives didn't make it themselves.

|||||

+++Message 1101. Illinois sharing, 1959
From: ricktompkins 6/16/2003 10:30:00 PM

|||||

Of the Southern, Northern, and Chicago AA Areas, here's a talk from a Chicagoan to the Southern section, preserved by the Northern section in a transcript. Luke H. was elected as Chicago Area 19's first Delegate to the General Service Conference in 1951, Ward M. served as Southern Illinois Area 21 Delegate to the same Panel. Earl T. got sober in 1937, Luke mentions first meeting Ward in 1942, and all three remained close friends.

March 2, 1959 talk by Luke H. of Chicago at the Abe Lincoln Hotel, Springfield, Illinois

Springfield is one of my favorite AA centers. I was here with Earl T. at the first meeting of downstate groups and I have been here on several occasions of AA activity. The friendly hospitality hear-about gives me the feeling of being very much at home.

Another bond comes from having watched the growth of AA in Springfield almost from the beginning. When I first met Ward M. he had been on the program a year but hadn't acquired a single steadfast disciple, and he was rapidly becoming impatient. I tried to calm him by telling him that Earl had experienced the same frustration in Chicago for two years, and that what kept him going was Dr. Bob's kindly counsel that all would be well in due season, "Just stay sober and don't try to force things," said Dr. Bob. So, Ward, like Earl, learned patience, which is a very good thing for an AA to have.

AA in Springfield finally got out of the loner class one summer day in 1943. After several disappointments with slippery prospects, Ward had Jerry O. all but signed up. For the clincher we went to the Leland Hotel, which Ward held in high regard for its chocolate ice cream. It turned out that Jerry was dead ripe, so thereupon the Springfield group in the multiple sense became fact.

By the way, if anyone wishes to make a pilgrimage to the birthplace he may go to the Leland dining room and pace off 15 feet in from the east wall. If he is truly of the faith, he may have a vision of Ward founding the Springfield group over a double helping of a chocolate ice cream sundae.

No, while I felt much complimented by being invited to speak at this meeting, I also felt somewhat hesitant. When you bring in a speaker in from outside and treat him bountifully, you have the right to expect something super.

In short, the Word. I have no such gem.

Do we in AA have the key to sobriety in one syllable? I mean to say, have we one shot for the newcomer anything like the advice given by the old pugilist to the boy who wanted to know the one fundamental to be a fighter. The old pug said, "Breathe."

Of course, there's the temptation to tell the man or woman seeking sobriety, "Stop drinking." But he's heard that already from every side. In fact, each one of us heard it until our ears ached. Now we know better. We know that sobriety results not from a negative position but from a positive action. Our program only begins with "Stop drinking." From there on our task is to build up a personality that can adjust in an uncertain world without resort to alcohol.

We say to the newcomer, "Here are the tools we used. Take them and start your own project and we'll give you all the help we can."

Within the frame of the Twelve Steps, he has a broad choice of materials, starting with his own understanding of a Higher Power. Each story of AA success is different and all are equally good. Who can say that John A, who keeps sober and happy in his way, has a truer philosophy than John B, who keeps happy and sober in his way? If it's more uniformity we're looking for, there's always the Infantry Drill Requisitions.

So, instead of standing here and pretending to offer sovereign remedy for the sickly souse or sobriety in one easy lesson, I'd rather use my time to tell of some of the things seen along the way.

In AA I have learned from both the Greek and the Barbarian, from the wise and the unwise, from my sponsor and many others who have maintained happy sobriety, and also my friend who is just now making his tenth start since 1941.

I believe he will make it yet, if not this time, maybe next time, but I won't sell him short.

I have always considered myself among the fortunate. For one thing, I found AA - or probably the other way around - when I was still enough alive to make use of the program. Furthermore, I had used up my share of slips, and I knew as much as anything that one more chance was all I could expect.

I had become what I now am pleased to call a profound drinker. This classy term, I would have you know, has clinical authority, having appeared in a medical report of inmates of the Seattle jail. As near as I can define it, a profound drinker is one who really has the problem.

In the last year or so of drinking, I came to know deep down that I really had the problem. My difficulty was that I couldn't come up with a decision. By myself, I would doubt if I ever would have. Then, all of a sudden, the stage was set. The timing was right, and I met AA as if it had been rehearsed.

A great part of my good fortune was the warm support given me immediately. My family, whom I had hurt the most, forgave without reservation. So did my employer. The doctor who introduced me to my sponsor, the lawyer whom my wife had engaged to deal with our domestic difficulties, even a bartender, lined up on my side.

The barroom scene took place when I had been dry a week. I was in the saloon with five others of my set, ostensibly out for a bit of lunch. One of them called for drinks, and when I took a coke, there was considerable merriment.
The owner came to where I was standing somewhat apart and said, "I'm very glad to see it. Some of the fellows ought to get off the stuff, too."

There's a little more to the story. Within a short time thereafter, three of the five were in AA. One of them has not had a drink to this day and the two others were sober to their deaths.

I feel privileged to have been in AA for the formative period, for I have had the opportunity to watch interesting developments over the years. AA was given a foundation that seems to reveal the wisdom of Providence in the design. The early members were far-gone alcoholics. Thus, the maximum test was applied, and it was proved at the outset that AA can work for the worst. Nevertheless, there were moments of doubt. There was also the challenge of the skeptics. The Journal of the American Medical Association reviewed the Big Book when it appeared and shrugged it off as the rash venture of laymen into a field where medicine itself had not found the answer.

The second era dawned brightly, AA was attracting drunks in sizeable numbers and the early adherents were still sober. Favorable publicity appeared in newspapers, Liberty Magazine, and the Saturday Evening Post. These were the balmy days. New people came in flocks, and it seemed that on every hand, rescued souls were taking watches out of hock, getting their jobs back, and even being elected vice president of the firm. Slips were not unduly numerous, and hearts were young and enthusiasm ran high.

As it appears to me, the next chapter brought disappointment. By then, some had been on the program for considerable time - five and even ten years. Yet, here and there, one turned up missing. These fellows had been active, enthusiastic AAs. Perhaps in some instances they had been too fired up for the long pull. At any rate we began to hear that so-and-so wasn't attending meetings any more. Some had gone back to the bottle. All this was a shock, for while we had come to expect a certain rate of slippage among newcomers; we had supposed that a five-year man was solid. A particularly dismaying thing was that to no one knew just how to approach the delinquent senior to get him back.

Perhaps that period hasn't come to its end, but there are signs that a new era of experience has begun. In a rather small circle, I know of five stray elders who have come back to their group meetings in recent months.

If these are only individual experiences with no common factor, they may not be important in our movement, but if the attraction of AA, given time to work has the power to restore the lost spirit, then it is significant indeed, for the future as well as the present.

AA came of age numerically in 1955. But we have also reached maturity in a larger sense. We have learned that adversity can be overcome.

In the springtime of the fellowship the spirit of youth prevailed. People who had felt miserable suddenly felt wonderful. Even though seasoned drunks, the early members were fairly young in years and the group was touched but lightly by illness and death.

The pioneers, who were then in middle age, are getting along, and like other human beings, are subject to human infirmities. In Chicago this has been particularly noticeable, for among those afflicted with physical ills are men and women who were outstandingly active and helpful in the group.

Now, although forced into inactivity, they are still helpful, and in a greater degree than ever. For us, their serene acceptance of misfortune is final proof that our program is all-sufficient.

They have renewed their strength and ours. They have become the eagles of AA.
Instead of complaining that their devotion to the good cause entitled them to a better break of luck, they have been truly grateful for being conditioned to meet adversity. They have exemplified the program to the final stage of individual experience. They have given us AA Triumphant.

The attainment of emotional maturity is a real accomplishment for any one person, let alone a mass movement of thousands who started at scratch.
Alcoholics are the juveniles of the human race. This is neatly pointed up by James Thurber in his story of the Bear Who Let It Alone, which I shall now read to you.

"In the woods of the far west there once lived a brown bear who could take it or leave it alone. He would go into a bar where they sold mead, a fermented drink made of honey, and he would have just two drinks. Then he would put some money on the bar and say, 'See what the bears in the back room will have.'

"But finally he took to drinking by himself most of the day. He would reel home at night, kick over the umbrella stand, knock down some bridge lamps, and ram his elbows through the windows.

"Then he would collapse on the floor and lie there until he went to sleep. His wife was greatly distressed and his children were very frightened.

"At length the bear saw the error of his ways and began to reform. In the end, he became a famous teetotaler and a persistent temperance lecturer. He would tell everybody that came to his house about the awful effects of drink, and he would boast about how well and strong he had become since he gave up touching the stuff.

" To demonstrate that, he would stand on his head and his hands and he would turn cartwheels in the house, kicking over the umbrella stand, knocking down the bridge lamps, and ramming his elbows through the windows.

"Then he would lie down on the floor, tired by this healthful exercise, and go to sleep. His wife was very distressed and his children were very frightened.

Thurber adds a moral: "You might as well fall flat on your face as lean over too far backward."

I have a kind of moral of my own to the bear story: "To sober up, grow up."

While I like to think is that I am more grown up than I used to be, there have been times when my sense of maturity was put to the test. This happened not long ago in spectacular fashion. All of a sudden, without anything leading up to it, I found myself figuring that I had been sober exactly half as long as I had been married. In other words, Mrs. H. had a sober husband as long as she had put up with the other kind. This was strictly accurate, for prior to AA she had never known me to practice sobriety. The first time she saw me I had been tipping; just enough to be attractive, you know, but nevertheless unmistakable. In later years this was a good gimmick for me, when berated I could reply, "You should have known what you were getting; let's have no complaints."

So, this big idea flashed into my mind. My next thought was, now we're all even, I'm paid up, I'm off the hook. But it wasn't quite clear what was to follow. I know I didn't entertain any thought of taking to drink or staying out all night. I can't afford today's prices and I get sleepy sooner than I used to. But more than that, I have come to like being sober. So if I were to take advantage of this 50-50 deal with Mrs. H. I would have to find some other way. And the only possibility was to let up on trying to be a normal person.

Well, it didn't take me long to realize that the sobriety I now enjoy depends on a sober way of life as complete as I can make it. I couldn't see any place to trim. By this time I had finished shaving that morning, I was back to where I was before I got slugged in the head with the silly idea.

A little later, I told Earl about it and he said the same thing had happened to him. As long as we had both skimmed through, we tossed it off. But we wondered whether this was not more or less common AA experience. Had some of the long timers I mentioned a while ago figured that their bill was paid and had succumbed to the idea?

If I had tried to put my wayward vision into practice, it would, I am sure, have meant a quick return to the childish mentality of my drinking days.

Hemingway admitted to alcoholism on the cover of People; this year, it's

Names of recovering addicts and some identifying details have been changed, since anonymity is the founding principle of A.A. and all other twelve-step programs.

this year, it's thirteen-year-old Drew Barrymore. "A.A. has lost the image of unshaven bums," says Matthew, a 28-year-old actor who's been attending meetings for eight months. "Everybody's in to it."

"Getting high is no longer hip," says Candy, a long-term pill popper who's been sober for seventeen months. "Now it's hip to be in recovery. The program is the best-kept secret in Manhattan."

Why the rush to "the rooms," as members call the meetings? Hipness has nothing to do with it; nobody hangs out in church basements for fun. While alcoholism takes its toll over the course of years, coke, free-basing, and crack are causing people to bottom out within months. "It's very simple," says Paul, a 45-year-old real-estate broker with a large investment firm, who became a born-again Christian when he kicked his coke habit. "There's a line you cross where it becomes impossible. It usually takes twenty years with alcohol, ten to fifteen years with pot, five years with snorting cocaine, six months for shooting it, and a matter of weeks for crack."

"Alcohol is a much slower route to addiction," says Nancy Dombrowski, a private therapist who is affiliated with the Alcoholism Council of Greater New York. "But when you mix alcohol with cocaine, you get there on the express train." In the past four years, the number of CA groups nationwide has gone from 169 to 1,043. In New York, the number of NA groups has doubled to 266.

On the Friday before New Year's Eve, Marissa and Tracy are at an NA meeting in a church basement in the East Eighties, where their friends Max is celebrating his fourth year of sobriety or, as he prefers to call it, "being clean." The 75 people are mostly under 40 and range from yuppies to obvious junkies. Marissa runs up to Max and gives him a stuffed dog. He gives her a big hug. One attractive couple has brought a new baby.

This is an anniversary meeting. The five speakers in the front of the room have been sober anywhere from a year to nine years. There's a chocolate cake to celebrate. A thin girl dressed in black is passing out slices. People help themselves to coffee from an urn in the back of the room. Others light up cigarettes in the smoking section.

"Don't compare drug stories," cautions Candy, the pixyish woman in the leopard-skin boots who is leading the meeting. "Just relax and identify. One of the best things about this program is the idea of a day at a time. Otherwise things look so big. All these days add up. What you see tonight are all these 'just for today's' adding up to one, four, nine years."

The speakers - two women and three men, ranging in age from 24 to 40 - take turns. They introduce themselves as addicts and say how long they've been clean. Everyone applauds, and then their stories begin: burnout tales from hell that all end up on a note of hope. This NA meeting seems raunchier than the A.A. meetings, a little more out of control. The word "death" comes up often. There's a sense of mortality that isn't dispelled by the Georgette Klinger bag passed around for donations. But there's also a feeling of victory and solidarity here. It's like a locker room full of athletes primed for the same goal: winning the game.

Max, 30, is one of the last to speak, "Hi, everybody. I'm Max, and I'm an addict, and today is four years." The room bursts into applause. Max's story is both banal and sad. With a little editing, his narrative could be another Bright Lights, Big City. Max, a middle-class kid from Long Island, worked at a club in the city where drugs flowed as freely as Rolling Rock. Max indulged with the best of them. "Everyone at work did coke," he says. "People were always giving it to me to get in free. But I didn't know where to draw the line. I would end up in court every three months because I hadn't paid my rent. I had no phone or electricity. My girlfriend broke up with me. One of the guys I worked with died. I remember people used to leave NA stationary on my desk and it was like, "How dare you think I have a problem?"

People laughed in recognition. "Then I hit rock bottom, I was taking money from my family. I forged a check to my father, who's an accountant. One day, I was sitting over this drawing board. My nose was stuffed and caked from doing blow, and then it started bleeding. It was like the beginning of the end. The next night it was my birthday. I had an eight of an ounce of coke, and I was with some girl whose name I didn't even know. The next morning, I called my parents and made them fly me down to Florida to get clean. My first meeting was in Florida."

Max winds up his story: "I always felt less than other people; I never felt like I fit in. I've learned how to be human in four years of recovery. I didn't do this alone. My recovery is about people; we have unity here. That's how all the healing is done. Now I have a beautiful midtown office. I laugh about it sometimes.

When the meeting ends, people join hands and recite a prayer: "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference. Keep coming back; it works if you work it." The ring breaks up, and people stand around chatting, exchanging phone numbers.

"The key to the rooms," says Marissa, "is that there are guidelines; there are rules. And there's unconditional love. Nobody ever says, 'Don't come back,' No matter how sick you are, no matter what you've done. No one leaves you or abandons you. When I first started the program, I used to think it was a cult thing. But it's not. It's just a better way of living."

All over Manhattan, there are similar meetings around the clock. During lunch, midtown professionals flock to an A.A. group called Foglifters, at Fifth Avenue and 55th Street. On Sunday evenings, in a dimly lit, tiny room on Perry Street, there is a smaller, more intimate meeting. Every midnight in a building off Times Square, dozens of people climb the stairs to a film noir-ish room with a tin ceiling and slow-moving fan. At St. Bart's an Adult Children of Alcoholics group fills a classroom decorated with elementary-school drawings. And actors gravitate to the Studio Group at a church on the Upper East Side.

A.A. meetings and their various spinoffs are based on a twelve-step program that hasn't changed since it was created in 1935 by two "hopeless" drunks, Dr. Bob Smith and Bill Wilson, who had a heart-to-heart talk about their mutual problem. Wilson, a broker from New York who had made several fortunes and lost them to alcohol, was in Akron, Ohio, on business. He had been sober for three months, but when the proxy takeover he had come to town for failed, he wanted a drink. Wilson, who had been hospitalized for his last binge, learned two important things: that alcoholism is a disease, "an allergy of the body and an obsession of the mind," and that relief would come only after he surrendered himself to God. (Wilson and his wife were members of the Oxford Group, an international organization that practiced the faith of the early Christians.) He called a local minister for advice, who in turn contacted a woman from the local Oxford Group. She introduced him to Dr. Bob Smith (known just as Dr. Bob), a surgeon who was also an incorrigible alcoholic. What he and Wilson came up with was powerful but simple: A.A. is based on both abstinence and the concept that talking about their addiction with fellow recovering alcoholics - real-life experts on the problem - is a potent form of reciprocal therapy. As Dr. Bob wrote about Wilson, "He was the first living human being who knew what he was talking about in regard to alcoholism from actual experience. In other words, he talked my language."

By June 10, 1935, Dr. Bob was stone-cold sober. He and Wilson began to spread the word, drunk by drunk. By 1939, the group had developed a guidebook. A New Yorker writer came up with the title Alcoholics Anonymous. Popularly referred to as "the big book," it lists the twelve basic steps for recovery.

It's these steps that give A.A. its "religious" reputation. After admitting that they are powerless over their problem and that their lives are unmanageable, alcoholics are exhorted to believe in a "higher power" and to turn their will to the care and direction of God.

But between the pious-sounding lines is a pragmatic program: A.A. forces alcoholics to admit they have a problem and provides them with a structural solution and support group. Arnold Washton, who runs Washton Institute, an outpatient rehab center for addicts says, "Twelve-step programs help define the problem in a meaningful way and enforce honesty with oneself and others.

They maintain a focus on realistic goals. And they provide the support of a community of friends and peers with special understanding and empathy. The rewards can be extraordinary."

Dr. Anne Geller, director of the Smithers Alcoholism Treatment and Training Center, says, "Going to these groups also gives people some activity to fill up the time when they are struggling to come off an addiction. It fills the void."

The program is free. The only requirement is a desire to stop drinking and drugging. This is especially important for those without insurance. Members are asked only to make voluntary donations to help rent the rooms and pay for literature and refreshments.

For many, however, A.A. still seems like some kind of religious order. First, there are all the references to God, and then there are the slogans. Talk to a member for more than fifteen minutes and a lot of homilies inevitably pop up: "First things first." "One day at a time." "Easy does it." "Keep it simple." "You're only as sick as your secrets." "One [drink] is too much and a thousand isn't enough." "Progress, not perfection." "Life on life's terms." "God is good, orderly direction."

Some people are turned off by the "God part" that never return for a second meeting. Others solve the problem by thinking of this higher power as the collective strength and wisdom of the people in the rooms. And then there are those who become truly religious.

"My sponsor said, 'Get on your knees before you go to bed, and talk things through,'" remembers Max. "And I said, 'Jewish guys don't get down on their knees.' He said, 'Did you ever get down on your knees to do a line of blow? I said I would have gotten on my belly. I call the higher power my spirit. There's nothing more spiritual than one person helping another.'"

"I hesitate to talk about a higher power because I am a very skeptical person to begin with," says Matthew. "For years, I thought of myself as an agnostic with no real ties to any kind of organized religion. But as the Big Book says, 'The hoop A.A. asks you to jump through is plenty wide.'"

Jay, 25, went from being agnostic to being fervently religious. "I remember going to my first meeting and seeing all these people that weren't religious fanatics. They weren't nuts, they weren't losers. They were hip people," he says. "They were happy, and they were talking about incredible things. If you go to these meetings for a year and you see somebody on their first day and then after six months, that's proof."

Just having lived long enough to get into the rooms can be proof of a higher power. "it wasn't hard for me to make that leap," says Anne, a 31-year-old sales representative. "Since I was fifteen, I can't tell you how many times

I've been in a car with a drunk driver, and it always turned out okay."

But people are people, and the sacred sometimes becomes the profane. One step the founders didn't have in mind was the "Thirteenth Step" - when a member who's been in the program for a while picks up a newcomer. "A person is so vulnerable when they first come in. To hit on someone is just awful," says Paula. "Once a new girl raised her hand and said she'd been clean 50 days, and I heard this guy say, 'Good. Get them while they are still shaking.' This is not a social club. This is really a place to get better. It's medicine."

Max admits, "there are a lot of people who develop relationships in the rooms. But I'm sick enough on my own. The last thing I need to do is to find someone who is a similar thinker. Still, I know when I first came around, a pretty girl made it easier. Everybody's motives aren't that pure. Some people are looking for a lover. Some people are looking for a job."

"I remember people telling me that A.A. was 'in.' That it was the new scene," says Marissa. "That's not what it's about at all. Anyone who comes in thinking that loses so much. It's not a sex club or a singles club of the eighties. People are terrified of endangering the safety of the rooms. And anyway, everybody knows, it's so incestuous."

There's an unwritten rule that members should avoid major changes in their lives - including relationships - for the first year of recovery. But the social aspects of the twelve-step programs are important, especially since members are told to try to avoid the "people, places, and things" associated with their habit. "These people are going to have to eliminate large parts of their life-style," says Dr. Washton. "Having new people to socialize with is very important."

"I have had to cut off so many people I used to see," says Dan, a cocaine addict who hasn't used the drug for nine days. "I really need the people in A.A." Some members even begin finding it difficult, if not impossible, to deal with people outside the program. This can be a real problem for non-members who have intimate relationships with members.

One 33-year-old woman who recently separated from her husband says, "A.A. kept him alive but stole him from me. You expect problems to be solved, but they are replaced by a whole new set of problems. The irony is that if I could scrape him off the pavement when his heart was palpitating and his face was gray and his tongue was hanging out, you think I could deal with a healthy, sober person. But A.A. became a rival in the marriage. If he doesn't go to a meeting, he gets hypercritical, antsy, negative. He goes to a meeting and comes floating out. It's almost like a fix. But I still wouldn't trade his being in the program for anything in the world, because I know without it he would be dead."

The meeting can also bring people together. Jim, 31, is engaged to a woman he met in A.A., and he knows at least six other couples who met through the program. Most people find a healthy medium in handling relationships: The dealer has to go; friends who aren't only drugging or drinking pals can stay.

Until recently, drug addicts were not always welcome at A.A. Max remembers "going to a meeting in Florida and saying I was an addict and being asked not to share." Says Candy, "Eight years ago, I was thrown out of an A.A. meeting because I was a drug addict, and they said I had no right to be there. You still hear some resentment." But today, many young members identify themselves as cross-addicted: Most cocaine users are also alcoholics. "My husband used to say, 'I have a coke habit, not an alcohol problem.' Then he'd drink," says one woman. "But as soon as he had a drink, he'd lose control over his urge to do coke. Then he'd disappear." Fellowships like A.A. recommend complete abstinence from addictive substances. "Once you start getting high, it brings you back to your drug of choice," says one member.

Some addicts prefer meetings such as CA or NA, that focus on their particular problem. Others are drawn to A.A. because its members tend to have longer histories of sobriety than those at the more recently founded fellowships. Many members rotate among several types of meetings to get the support they need.

New members try to do 90 meetings in 90 days. They are encouraged to call other members when they get cravings or urges, and there's a sponsorship program that provides one-on-one guidance. There are 1,800 A.A. meetings in Manhattan, varying in size and ambience.

This 54-year-old form of free therapy may have become a burgeoning subculture, but it's far from an instant panacea. It means a lifetime of hard work. Members know they can never drink or take drugs again: The "pink-cloud" high most newcomers get when they enter the program soon gives way to the realization that staying sober is just the beginning. Working the twelve Steps means transforming yourself. Like psychotherapy, it's a process that involves peeling back layers of personality.

It's easy for an outsider to parody the program. Often, it seems like a New Age Salvation Army or seventies-style group therapy run amok. There are meetings that are overly social, and some people become as addicted to the meetings as they once were to a substance. Others take on the fervent tone and jargon of the born-again.

That's because those who've gotten sober feel that they've been saved. For many, private therapy didn't work; dividing their stashes into cute little packets didn't work; rationing drinks didn't work. The alternatives were a totally dysfunctional life, or death.

It's a Tuesday evening, and the A.A. meeting in the basement of a church on Park Avenue in the Sixties is bustling. The crowd is a mostly upscale mix of about 60 men and women. One woman seated in the front of the room has just finished "qualifying," or telling her story. She's obviously struck a chord. Hands shoot up all over the room. The first person to share is a pretty blonde. "Hi, I'm Paula, and I'm an addict and an alcoholic."

"Hi, Paula," the room booms back.

"Hi, everybody. I've seen you here a lot, but I never heard your story before," she says to the attractive brunette in her thirties who's just finished her own tale of drug abuse, abusive relationships, arrest, recovery, and professional success. "I really identified with you. I graduated from an Ivy League school, and I'd be sitting in a crack den saying, 'But I've got a Ph.D.,' and they'd be saying, 'Pass the pipe.'"

The meeting breaks up into small coed clusters. It's easy to pick up on some flirtation among members. "Sure I go to meetings when I have crushes on some of the guys , " says Paula. "They say that whatever gets you here doesn't matter. People do date people in the program. But there's an old- timers' saying that there's a slip under every skirt. It's true that most people slip up because of relationships too early on. It takes the focus off yourself and your recovery."

A week later, in her office, Paula tells a wild but typical story. Paula, 32, works in the entertainment business. Posters of celebrities cover the walls, and the conversation is constantly interrupted by the phone and fax machine. Like many in the program, Paula chain smokes. "Basically, I'm a nice girl from the suburbs," she begins. "All I can say is my whole life, I felt something was just off. I always felt I was never good enough and you'll hear this a lot from people in the program. From the minute I started getting high and drinking, I knew that's how I wanted to feel. They say that we have a disease, and the word is 'dis-ease,' you know. I knew that when I drank and did drugs I felt more comfortable. And if you go to enough meetings, you'll hear every alcoholic and drug addict say this. But once we take a drug or drink, it's like we have no stop button."

Paula did well in high school and went to college and then to graduate school. She moved to New York when she was 24. "I felt really lost, and that's when all the trouble started," she says. "I began by doing little teeny bits of coke. I felt so empty. And somebody turned me on to free-basing. I did one hit, and I thought, this is what normal people must feel like. I absolutely loved it. It rapidly started ruining my life."

She missed work and spent all her time hanging out with a dealer. "He was a disgusting sleazeball hairdresser," she says. "And there was this whole scene of washing your hair, cutting it, and free- basing and drinking champagne. I hated him, but the minute you free- base, you love everybody. Then there'd be these huge fights where he'd say everyone was using him and smash the free-base pipe. And I'd say, 'I'm never going to come back.' But then the craving would start."

Paula was fired from one job after another but always managed to scrounge up enough money for drugs. "I got money from my parents. I didn't pay bills. I charged roommates more rent than they should have been paying. I used money I was supposed to pay my shrink with. And I got a new boyfriend, another dealer. We were like little hustlers down at Washington Square Park. By the end, we were cooking crack for rich people. I stole from him constantly." By now, Paula was a typical wreck.

"I weighed 95 pounds," she says. "My apartment was full of mice. My eyes were bulging out. I looked like Don Knotts. But I kept going. I was fired from my final job. I was going to be thrown out of my apartment. I had no lights or electricity. I would look outside, and it would always be this beautiful sunny day. You'd miss work, and it would be ten in the morning, and you'd want to die. You wish you were anybody but who you were. That was the worst feeling. Just hating yourself so much."

Eventually, Paula's parents sent her to a rehab clinic, where she stayed for five months. She moved back to New York and started going to CA meetings. "In the beginning, the fellowship of people is more important than the actual steps," she says. "I mean, all you really have to do is to remember that you are powerless over drugs and alcohol. But eventually the steps help you change. When it comes down to it, if you remain the same person, you're going to end up doing drugs and alcohol again. Basically, you're a sick person getting better. They say that whatever age you started drinking or drugging is when you really stopped growing emotionally. I've heard the program called 'growing up in public.'" Paula has now been sober two and a half years.

Sarah and Matthew are a rich, good- looking young couple. They could be out on a date, but this Wednesday night, they are at one of their favourite A.A. meetings, in a church in the East Sixties. The elevator man is used to the activity and cheerfully takes the hordes up and down. The members are affluent, slinging their fur coats and leather jackets over the folding chairs, stashing their briefcases and shopping bags underneath. There are about 50 people in the room, and only five could be called skid-row types. Sarah and Matthew look perfectly at home.

Sarah, an investment broker, has been sober two years; Matthew, an actor, has been sober eight months. Both are trust-fund kids who went to prep schools. But somehow, their upbringing let them down. "You're enabled by your looks and your money," says Sarah, 24, who looks like a little Amy Irving. "But you are not given any foundation, any building blocks for living."

Sarah grew up in a "very high-society, party atmosphere." At ten, she was sampling the drinks she mixed for her parents. Her parents were divorced when she was twelve, and her mother, then in her late thirties, dated, partied, and hung out with her three daughters, all of whom are now in A.A. "She tried to play mother and best friend. I partied, drank, and did coke with her a lot," Sarah says. Sarah and her sisters were popular, athletic, seemingly together. The truth wasn't quite so pretty.

It wasn't until Sarah's older brother tried to commit suicide that anyone in the family was willing to take a closer look. Sarah's father stopped "enabling" his children with money. But Sarah continued to play the party girl. "I still looked good. I had money in the bank and lived in a beautiful apartment," she says. "I would go on binges. Then I would try to go to meetings. Finally, I was able to get sober for a year, but I didn't work the first step at all. I didn't admit I was powerless over alcohol, and I thought I could control my drinking. Then I drank for three straight weeks, and I knew it was over. My life was a mess."

By now, Sarah's two sisters were sober, and Sarah began to take the program seriously. "Before, I didn't want to meet any of the people in the program," she says. "I thought I was different, better. This time, I embraced it in a totally different way. I was so relieved. I felt like this is where I belong. I'm an alcohol. I felt safe. The program gives you the tools to learn to function in the world, to learn to deal emotionally with things that used to baffle you, because you used alcohol to deal with emotions. It's a bridge back to life, but it's not life."

Pot smoking brought Matthew to the meetings. "I got through school on a combination of wit and charm," he says. "I thought it was a great joke to show up in class high. After a while, I could barely function. When I graduated, I wasn't getting any acting jobs. My life started to fall apart."

Matthew went to a rehab center on the West Coast. When he returned to the East Coast, he started going to meetings. "I knew I had a problem with pot for a long time," he says. "But I thought A.A. was a group of weaklings. The twelve steps are simple, not complicated, mystical, or cultish in any way. I have new friends, a new girlfriend, and my professional life has improved. I am hooking up with an agent as a result of taking some action I never would have taken if I weren't sober."

The Saturday night CA meeting in an auditorium in a hospital uptown is packed. Tonight the guy qualifying is a blue-collar worker with the timing and delivery of a stand-up comic. Before long, everyone is laughing at his descriptions of life under the influence of coke: the hours he spent glued to the window, convinced that his car was being stolen or that the Feds were in the street. The times he ripped up the carpet looking for coke. The way he terrorized the family cat, or spent all his time in the bathroom pretending to shower or to slug Pepto Bismol for his ulcer. His transparent attempts to explain missing paychecks to his wife or get credit from his dealer, who lived, conveniently, on the first floor.

"They say the difference between an addict and an alcoholic is that the alcoholic will steal your money and the addict will steal it and help you look for it," he says, remembering how he rolled back his sleeve to show off his watch at the first meeting so nobody would think he was an out- of-work bum. He also remembers how his wife threatened to leave him. He's now the proud father of a newborn daughter.

From the comments in the room, it's clear that he's touched a lot of people. "I can't believe your growth," says one woman. "When I look at you, I see that I must have grown, too."

Dan, a sweet-faced 26-year- old, looks very nervous. This is his fourth meeting. His drinking and drug problem, which started in high school, has escalated into a full-scale coke and beer addiction. He used to consider himself a "literary druggie." Now he can't even get through a day at the small publishing house where he works without taking drug and drink breaks.

An eight ball (three and a half grams of coke) barely lasts him several days. Everything in his life is in jeopardy. "the physical urges are hell." he says. "But the program has given me a center, a way to get out all the urges and talk about it. I don't have to isolate myself or worry about shocking people. Recovery is subsuming my life, in some ways, more than the drugs and alcohol. If I didn't have the program to take me one day at a time, I'd be overwhelmed. But the little applause you get makes you come back." For Dan, the program is a slender thread between his present and future that could snap at any minute.

We are in the midst of an answered prayer," says Tommy, 29, who's just completed four months of recovery. "I think the program is pretty miraculous. I see people who would be just totally trashed become really decent members of society." But the people in the rooms are only a tiny fraction of addicts, and there are far more "slips" than long-term recoveries.

Marissa's ex-boyfriend is still doing drugs. "He thinks the program is full of s_ and that the people are fake. How can someone just hug you and not even know you? He thinks the people talk a lot of bull__ and they don't really feel it. There are people who never grasp it, who miss something, and it's sad. It just doesn't work for them. My ex has been in and out of the rooms for six years. The program is not for him right now. He needs something more."

Recently, an NA member who Max was sponsoring died. I'd wait for him at St. Mark's Place and he wouldn't show up. He stopped coming to meetings. He stopped calling me. I saw it coming, but I couldn't see him dying. People die from this." At some NA and CA meetings, a moment of silence is observed for those still out there.

Marissa, for one, counts herself lucky. Eighteen months ago she was a burned out v\club kid. Now she has a new apartment, is back in school, and has started a line of greeting cards that she says is being picked up by a major company. She's got a life of her own. "When I first came in, I had no sense of self," Marissa says. "I felt I was a nonperson. For the first time, I'm honest with myself. I don't have to hide. There are many people who go in and out of these rooms for years and never make it. It's an action program; nothing is delivered to you. If you don't work, the program doesn't work for you."

Source: NEW YORK, February 20, 1989

|||||

+++Message 1103. Home Group
From: Sandy Trus 6/18/2003 12:33:00 AM

|||||

I'm a new member of this group. SD June 20, 1991. I'm syarting to do a little teaching in a treatment center. For my own education. I've been unsuccessful in learning the origin of the Home Group suggestion. Could anyone please help.
Thanks. Sandy

|||||

+++Message 1104. Periodical Lit: Time, April 10, 1989
From: Jim Blair 6/18/2003 7:08:00 AM

|||||

Soviet Scene

Moscow Beginners

Where Slava Starts Over Again

At a meeting of the country's first A.A. group, alcoholics learn a sort of personal perestroika, one day at a time.

By GLENN GARELIK

"My name is Slava, and I am an alcoholic."

The young man speaks rapidly, but every syllable reverberates. More than 30 other men and women seated in a large drab room at a Moscow community center listen quietly. Over the next hour and a half, most of them, giving only their first names, will stand under the bare fluorescent lighting and make the same confession. It is a painful admission to make anywhere, but especially in the Soviet Union, where drinking is legendary and individual accountability has decayed. This is the daily meeting of Moscow Beginners, the first antidrink group for Soviet citizens that is registered with Alcoholics Anonymous.

A.A. is a new weapon in the country's struggle against alcoholism, encouraging people to rebuild themselves - a sort of perestroika of the personality, one day at a time. More poignantly, it is an exercise in self-expression that is the essence of glasnost, an act of standing up and discussing a shortcoming that the state once preferred to keep quiet.

Disturbed by his countrymen's fondness for the bottle, Mikhail Gorbachev in 1985 launched an all-out campaign against alcohol. The Soviets raised the legal drinking age from 18 to 21, limited the hours when alcohol could be sold and increased the price of vodka from 4.7 rubles ($7.75) to ($16.50) a liter. But popular resistance has forced Gorbachev to ease up on his crusade, and public drunkenness is on the rise again.

Moscow Beginners was started in 1987 by the Rev. J.W. Canty, an Episcopal priest from New York City who came to Moscow in 1985 to help lay the groundwork for the group. Meanwhile, Volodya, 36, a machinist, had heard about A.A. on a Canadian radio broadcast and had written to A.A. headquarters in New York, which in turn informed Canty that he had a taker in Moscow. The group's first session was held in a hotel room across from the Kremlin, was attended by Volodya and two visiting American members of A.A. Membership grew slowly, largely because the group did not have official recognition and would-be members were unaware of its existence. But radio and television programs highlighted Moscow Beginners, and now the Ministry of Health has endorsed A.A.'s self-help concept.

As at A.A. sessions around the world, the Moscow Beginners tell tales of searing despair. For Sasha, a 37-year-old engineer, the horror culminated in 1987, when he was repeatedly hospitalized for alcoholism and his wife left him. "I was watching my life spin out of control," he now recalls.

Like Sasha, almost everyone in the group has undergone compulsory hospitalization, some as many as seven times. The hospital stays can be as long as six months, and patients are often treated with sulfazine, a drug that induces high fever. The intended result: to sweat the toxins out of the body and thus shock it into a change of behavior. The drug's effects are not long lasting, and Western doctors refuse to use it.

Two Moscow Beginners tell how they were forced to spend terms of up to two years in prisons - reserved for those who cannot be cured by the hospitals. There, boredom was punctuated only occasionally by days of forced labor in understaffed factories. Even the government has admitted that these jails are not likely to keep alcoholics on the wagon.

By contrast, Sasha says, he is enthusiastic about A.A.'s methods, "the beginning for me was when I learned that the word alcoholic could be said out loud, that people would even applaud. With alcoholism, you have to admit despair before you can experience victory."

Volodya has known his share of despair. Having drunk heavily since his teens, he says, "I thought I would never be able to stop. I went to clinics where I would dry out, but I could never stay sober. I felt I did not have what it takes to help myself. And then came the group. It was like a miracle."

It is an interesting choice of words in an officially atheist society, and A.A.'s teaching that members must learn to rely on a "higher power" creates an inevitable conflict for Moscow Beginners. Some of the members are uncomfortable with the group's religious tone; others, understandably, are afraid to tamper with the organizations time- tested tenets.

"My name is Mikhail, and I'm an alcoholic," says the next speaker. Sober only a short while, Mikhail, 41, stayed home from work, on his last birthday out of fear that his co-workers would insist on celebrating the event with a bottle. "I don't want to talk about my drinking tonight. I just want to thank you for the chance to express myself honestly. Until I came here, I had never done that before."

Already the group is reaching out to others. Some of Moscow beginners spend Saturday afternoons visiting inmates in two of the city's alcoholic prisons, and this month a clinic using American treatment methods and run jointly by Soviets and Americans will open for out-patients. It will be the first alternative to the state-run program. Beyond that, according to Volodya, "young people are writing to us from all over the country."

Tonight, though, it is 33- year-old Slava who is in trouble. "I have to tell you something this evening that I am not proud of," he says hesitantly. "I drank today. And my wife left me. Please don't abandon me. You know what I am going through. Forgive me for betraying you."

"Betrayed is a strong word," says Liuba, 35, a factory worker who during her drinking days found herself waking up in the beds of men she never remembered meeting. "It's better not to use it. We might not have drunk today, but only at the end of the day can any of us say that with confidence."

"You know," says Slava, "after being here and talking, I feel peaceful inside. I'm sure I'll get better; with the help of my friends, I will get better."

"Until I joined this group, I felt isolated," says Sasha afterward. "Now I am helped by my friends - and by my strength and example, I can be of help to them." trying to humanize itself. Says By helping others help them selves, Volodya: "What I like about A.A. is Moscow Beginners is rebuilding the that it ends our dependence on a sense of self-worth that society cure from above. We are had stripped from them. In a rediscovering how to help limited way, the A.A. style could ourselves, and how to help each turn out to be just what the doctor other. In this country we had ordered for a society that is forgotten how to do that."

Source: TIME, April 10, 1989.

=====

+++Message 1105. AA History Timeline Document
From: Arthur Sheehan 6/18/2003 11:06:00 AM

=====

Hi All

Last January an AA History Timeline document was offered to members of the AAHistoryLovers special interest group. The document builds upon, and expands, a wonderful work by Archie M. from Tennessee (which can be found at several web sites). The goal of the expanded Timeline is the compilation of historical facts with corroborative references to well-researched and reliable works authored by AA Historians. Currently over 30 reference works have been researched and several are still being folded into the document.

The Timeline sent out last January has been substantially updated and is again being offered to members of AAHistoryLovers. It is a Microsoft Word document that is a little over one megabyte in size. If you would like to obtain a copy please do the following.

- 1) First off, do not reply to the AAHistoryLovers distribution list. This will burden Nancy O. with messages. Reply directly to ArtSheehan@msn.com.
- 2) Prior to replying please ensure that your ISP will allow receipt of a message with a one megabyte+ MS Word document attachment.

The e-mail addresses of requestors will be compiled into a distribution list. Distribution is planned for the end of June.

The document is marked "Confidential - for AA Members Only." It contains the last names of deceased members. It also uses a number of reference sources that are marked "Confidential for AA Members" (e.g. Conference advisory actions and Conference final reports).

Cheers

Arthur

=====

+++Message 1106. Re: Home Group
From: Glenn Chesnut 6/18/2003 1:02:00 PM

=====

Origin of the idea of the "home group"

In many parts of the U.S. in the 1940s, you were lucky if there was any A.A. group meeting in your own town at all. That group would frequently meet only once a week, although once A.A. got big enough in a town like, say, Elkhart IN (pop. 40,000), they would have one open meeting a week where everybody and their spouses went (in a church or some place like that), and divide the A.A. people up into several smaller subgroups, each of which met once a week for a closed meeting in someone's home. In Elkhart, you were simply told by the leaders which subgroup you were to attend (which was your "home group" in the sense in which you are using the word) -- the Wednesday night meeting, or the Thursday night meeting, or whatever.

But in smaller towns, there would not be enough A.A. people to do that. So in western Long Island in the 1940s, you would have one A.A. meeting a week in the town where you lived (your "home group"), and then people would get together in small groups in someone's automobile and go to visit A.A. meetings in other nearby towns on some of the other nights of the week. Two or three of the visitors were often asked to stand up and give short (five or ten minute) mini-leads at the meeting they were visiting.

In my part of Indiana, even in the 1950s, the really dedicated A.A. people were still travelling to visit meetings many miles away, so that everybody in A.A. in northcentral Indiana knew who people like Brownie and Goshen Bill and Nick K. were.

You and the people who were in your "home group" became very close to one another as a result. Your sponsor would also be a member of that group, who showed up every week without fail. You would drop in on one another's homes just to chat and visit, have picnics together, and that sort of thing. You had the feeling of a really close-knit support group that you could call on instantly if you were hitting any kind of problem -- not just your sponsor, but everybody else in that group.

Over a period of time, the people in that "home group" got to know one another very well indeed. There were no secrets after a while. This was very good. Alcoholism is a disease of isolationism. Also, as Submarine Bill puts it (one of our local good old-timers), "You are as sick as your secrets," and I have seen many people fail in attaining quality sobriety because they closed off other people too much, and wouldn't talk about their real feelings and the real problems they were struggling with in their lives. This "home group" was a small close-knit group where you could finally come to trust a few other people enough to "tell them where it hurts." A medical doctor couldn't help a patient who came to him in obvious enormous pain, but who responded to all his questions about "where exactly does it hurt" by screwing up his face and saying obstinately "Won't tell you!"

All of this helped to produce a high success rate among these early groups. There is an A.A. group in my area which still operates much like that, and I have verified (over the past twelve years) that they have an 81% success rate in getting people sober and keeping them sober: of the newcomers who come to that meeting without fail once a week for a year, 90% are still sober at the end of the year. They get to know the other people in the group extremely well, and vice versa. Even if they later transfer to other meetings, 90% of that group are still sober today.

PRINCIPAL SOURCES:

The Factory Owner & the Convict (pub. 1996, now out of print, but due to be reprinted by the end of this summer, when it will be available on amazon.com and so on), a book about the early years of A.A. in northcentral Indiana.

Sgt. Bill S., On the Military Firing Line in the Alcoholism Treatment Program (at the typesetters now, will be available through amazon.com and so on in another month or so), a book which contains the memoirs of an oldtimer who began attending A.A. meetings in 1945 and got permanently sober on Long Island in 1948. (He also started the first officially sanctioned alcoholism treatment programs on military bases, where he obtained a 50% success rate in his program at Lackland AFB in the 1950s for example.)

The annual Christmas Eve radio broadcasts over radio station WSBT by Ken M., the founder of A.A. in South Bend IN, during the 1940s and 50s: great emphasis upon the way the group bands together to forge its way through hostile territory, where a single person by himself or herself would be overcome. (Contained in the South Bend archives.)

The Higher Power of the Twelve-Step Program: For Believers & Non-Believers (available through amazon.com and so on) contains many statements by A.A. old-timers, some of which are relevant to understanding why the home group concept was so useful in producing real healing.

----- Original Message -----

From: Sandy Trus

Sent: Wednesday, June 18, 2003 6:46 AM

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Home Group

I'm a new member of this group. SD June 20, 1991. I'm syarting to do a little teaching in a treatment center. For my own education.

I've been unsuccessful in learning the origin of the Home Group suggestion. Could anyone please help.

Thanks. Sandy

----- Yahoo! Groups Sponsor ----->

Get A Free Psychic Reading! Your Online Answer To Life's Important Questions.

The disease theory takes many forms, sometimes pointing just to the physical damage alcohol abuse does cause the body. Some people can never control their drinking, and genetics may be the cause. Proponents of the disease theory argue that it has helped some people realize they have a problem, a need to get treatment and to abstain from alcoholic beverages. But critics of the theory suggest that it relieves responsibility for the drinking problem, and they also note that the medical field has not come up with a sure cure.

"The more psychologists and attorneys dismiss forms of misbehaviour as uncontrollable compulsions, the less people are held accountable for their actions - even when they have harmed others," writes Stanton Peele, a consultant with Mathematica Policy Research in Princeton, New Jersey.

"Creating a world of addictive diseases may mean creating a world in which anything is excusable," he adds in his Sciences magazine commentary.

Trouble from the disease theory abounds when it is introduced into the legal system, especially as a matter of civil rights. Specialists who help people get off the bottle emphasize the responsibility of the alcoholic to recover and abstain from drinking. In the hands of lawyers, though, the client is never at fault. It's always the fault of the employer, or the disease, or the employer's failure to offer treatment for the alcoholism at the right time or the right place. That approach suits the alcoholic just fine, because one of the symptoms of the problem is to blame everyone else.

At this point, "civil rights" for alcoholics could hurt alcoholics badly. What's needed for recovery is not civil rights, which leads to lawyers and lawsuits. The need is the alcoholic's growing sense of responsibility.

One of the most effective responses to alcohol abuse has been Alcoholics Anonymous, which places heavy stress on the responsibility of the alcohol abuser through the Twelve Steps.

"Make a searching and fearless moral inventory of yourself," declares one step, followed by, "admit to God, and to yourself, the exact nature of your wrongs. Be entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character." Other steps include restitution to offended people.

The principles of A.A. don't include a list of civil rights for the alcoholic. Adding this problem to a legal list of disabilities is not just bad law and bad policy. It's a slap in the face of Alcoholics Anonymous and its work with people for so many years.

So far drug addiction has been successfully removed from the legislation, on the sensible grounds that drug addicts do not need additional civil rights at a time when the federal government is declaring war on illegal drugs. The next sensible step is to take alcoholism out of this legislation as well. Civil rights and alcohol abuse make a bad mix.

Some women are grateful for what 12-step programs have given them: a generally available peer model providing support and understanding at no cost. Yet no one way works for everyone. The steps were formulated by a white, middle-class male in the 1930s; not surprisingly, they work to break down an overinflated ego, and put reliance on an all-powerful male God. But most women suffer from the lack of a healthy, aware ego, and need to strengthen their sense of self by affirming their own inner wisdom.

Research strongly suggests that alcohol addiction has links to genetic predisposition. A vital point that seems overlooked in AA is that in the case of nearly all substance abuse, the brain chemistry and the body ecology need extensive healing in order to prevent the protracted withdrawal syndrome of depression, anxiety, volatile emotions, and obsessive thinking that can last for years. Too often women endlessly attend groups, have psychotherapy, or take antidepressants when their emotions are actually being influenced by a chemical imbalance that could be helped by proper nutrition and exercise.

Other addictions and codependency (as well as the will to recover), are influenced by cultural oppression, which includes poverty, battering, racism, sexism, and homophobia. Treatment programs need to incorporate understanding - and advocacy - regarding these concerns.

As a psychologist and former member of 12-step programs, I have encouraged women to write steps that resonate with their own inner selves, putting the focus on self-empowerment.

Here are the 12 steps (as published by AA World Services) followed by a critique and by some possible empowerment steps:

1) "We admitted we were powerless over [our addiction]-that our lives had become unmanageable." The purpose of this step is to crack through denial or an inflated ego and acknowledge a destructive problem. It can be helpful to say "I am powerless to change my partner," but many women abuse chemicals or stay in harmful relationships because they feel powerless in their lives. Thus, many women prefer to affirm that they have the power to choose not to use chemicals or have dependent relationships. So, alternatively:

We acknowledge we were out of control with but have the power to take charge of our lives and stop being dependent on others for our self-esteem and security.

2 . "Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity." I believe that spiritual power is neither higher nor lower but all pervasive. I would replace the passivity implied in this step - that something external will magically restore us to sanity - with "affirmative action"; I came to believe that the Universe/Goddess/ Great Spirit would awaken the healing wisdom within me if I opened myself to that power.

3. "Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him."

This conjures up images of women passively submitting their lives to male doctors, teachers, ministers, often with devastating consequences. Instead: I declared myself willing to tune into my inner wisdom, to listen and act based upon these truths.

The following steps are grouped together here because they all ask women to focus on negative aspects of themselves:

4 . "Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves."

5 . "Admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs."

6 . "Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character."

7. "Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings."

8 . "Made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all."

9. "Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others." (All emphasis mine.)

We women need to make a searching and fearless inventory of how the culture has mired us down with guilt and shame, recognizing how hierarchy has harmed us, and how we have been complicit in harming ourselves - and only then look at how we have harmed others.

So, instead:

We examined our behavior and beliefs in the context of living in a hierarchal, male-dominated culture.

We shared with others the ways we have been harmed, harmed ourselves and others, striving to forgive ourselves and to change our behavior.

We admitted to our talents, strengths, and accomplishments, agreeing not to hide these qualities to protect others' egos.

We became willing to let go of our shame, guilt, and other behavior that prevents us from taking control of our lives and loving ourselves.

We took steps to clear out all negative feelings between us and other people by sharing grievances in a respectful way and making amends when appropriate.

study of alcoholism in the elderly. A variety of research approaches were used to address questions that ranged in level and focus from government policy to individual case-handling. While a tremendous amount of useful and important information was developed in that study, none of it is as important or useful as what you are about to read in this article.

Health and social service providers who work with elderly people need to realize that about 10% of the elderly are likely to manifest varying degrees of health, psychological and social dysfunctions related to the excessive use of alcohol. The difficulty associated with detecting excessive alcohol use is inversely related to the chronicity and severity of the problem. About two-thirds of elderly alcoholics are severe, chronic alcoholics whose symptoms tend to be both obvious and profound. These symptoms are likely to include physical signs of intoxication (e.g. dysarthria, ataxia, impaired motor skills, attention and memory deficits, inappropriate behavior) alcohol withdrawal (e.g. tremulousness, nausea, vomiting, anxiety, tachycardia, hypertension, sweating, insomnia, loss of appetite, mild disorientation), medical problems (e.g. gastritis, cancers of the digestive tract, especially esophagus and stomach, pancreatitis, fatty liver, hepatitis, cirrhosis, organic brain syndrome, peripheral neuropathy, blackouts, atherosclerosis, hypertensive heart disease, cardiomyopathy, muscle pain and deterioration, weakness), abnormal laboratory tests (e.g. elevated uric acid, low levels of platelets and clotting proteins, decreased production of red and white blood cells, SGPT and SGOT elevations, low magnesium and potassium), and psychiatric and emotional problems (e.g. anxiety and depression, suicidal ideation, sleep disturbances, confusion and disorientation, frequent life crisis, disturbed interpersonal relations, and marked change in personality when drinking).

The remaining one-third of cases are likely to be less obvious. These people generally started drinking excessively later in life and their dependence on alcohol has not yet resulted in profound debilitation. Regardless of the obviousness or chronicity of the alcohol problem, "patients" are far more likely to present themselves as having medical problems than to walk in and announce that they have a drinking problem. Denial is the most basic and frequent psychological response to the suggestion that one has an alcohol problem. Thus, while you are well-advised to get some training in the recognition of alcohol problems, it is not likely to help you much unless you also have some idea about what to do with older people who drink excessively once you have found them. This is where we get into the areas of intervention and referral for treatment the most delicate aspects of handling alcoholic clients.

A major difficulty in making referrals for alcoholism treatment is resistance on the part of the client. This may be augmented in elderly problem drinkers who were the youth and teens of the Prohibition era and who hold very negative and moralistic attitudes about alcoholics. This population is also poorly educated about alcohol and alcoholism, and their denial of alcohol problems is likely to be supported by their observations that they do not drink or act as their stereotype of an alcoholic would.

Confrontation may thus be the first step in the referral process. Ideally, the counselor will have established a collaborative relationship with the client, and a mutual rapport. Generally, the best approach is for the confronting person to share his or her concerns, using the client's presenting complaints to bring up the subject of excessive drinking. The counselor may wish to point out destructive patterns of alcohol use; the relationship between drinking and symptom manifestation; or educate the client as to future problems he or she can expect if drinking is continued. The counselor should avoid the label "alcoholic" as well as judgmental, blaming, or punitive statements.

When the client has accepted the need for, or the reality of the referral, it will be necessary for the counselor to explore with the client his or her perceptions about treatment, and needs and preferences in regard to treatment. Fear is a common response to the idea of entering alcohol treatment, and the counselor should allow the client to express fears of being "locked up," socially ostracized, or financially ruined as a result of entering an alcohol treatment program. When the client has overcome the initial shock and its attendant anxieties, the counselor can explore those issues pertaining to the type of facility which is acceptable to the client.

The third step in the referral process is assisting the client in contacting the referral agency. This might include arranging transportation to the agency; contacting directly the person who will meet the client there; arranging a specific time for the appointment; obtaining signed releases for the transfer of information; and arranging for follow-up report(s) from the referral agency. Referrals to agencies with long waiting lists should be avoided, as research shows that the longer an alcoholic waits before entry into the treatment system, the less likely he or she is to enter or succeed in treatment.

There are a variety of existing programs for the treatment of alcoholism, ranging from in-patient, hospital-based programs to out-patient clinics and half-way houses. In choosing a referral for an elderly alcoholic or problem drinker, a number of factors must be considered. First is an assessment of the person's physical condition. Does he or she require detoxification or immediate medical attention? If this is judged to be the case, then referral to a hospital's alcohol program or to a detoxification center may be appropriate. Does the client have special health-care needs or disabilities which would bear on his or her eligibility of treatment? Before referring a client to any institution it is advisable to be aware of the organization's requirements and the scope of its services.

The Most Important Things You Need to Know about Alcoholism Treatment

The variety of approaches to the treatment of alcoholic patients is mind-boggling in its diversity and this diversity constitutes a testimonial to the frustration and lack of success which caregivers have experiences. Once you move beyond standard medical remedies for the physical maladies associated with alcohol dependence, you enter the realm of actually treating the disease of alcoholism. After 20 years of clinical and research experience, I am convinced that the program provided by Alcoholics Anonymous (A.A.) has provided more help to more people than any other approach. Furthermore, I see no evidence that this reality is likely to change in the foreseeable future. The most important information in this article is what you are now going to read about A.A. and how it works.

Most caregivers in the elderly services network have only a superficial awareness of A.A. Unless they are members of A.A. or have a close relationship with an A.A. member, their knowledge of A.A. is likely to be deficient and their attitudes toward A.A. may be distorted. The notion that A.A. is a "religious program" which "has twelve steps" and "requires a lot of meetings in smoke-filled rooms" fails to do justice to a vast, sophisticated and free alcoholism recovery program.

The majority of alcoholism treatment programs in the U.S., including hospital-based in-patient programs, out-patient programs, and long-term residential care programs use the A.A. philosophy and encourage patients to become actively involved with A.A. While a period of hospitalization may be necessary for many alcoholics to detoxify safely and to stabilize medically, the real test of the efficacy of treatment does not occur until the patient is back out in the world and independently faces the challenges of abstaining from alcohol. Data from the AoA-funded study clearly indicated that elderly alcoholics who became actively involved with A.A. were far more likely to remain sober than those who did not. This research also clearly showed that group therapy and social support, whether related to A.A. or not, were the most important and effective elements of treatment.

The A.A. approach to recovery incorporates a "medical" model of alcoholism and a "moral-spiritual" model of recovery. The medical model of alcoholism asserts that alcoholism is a disease which, if not treated, is progressive and may lead to premature illness and death. The fundamental medical problem is that some people respond physically to alcohol in an abnormal way which leads to excessive use, dependence, "craving" and an inability to control intake.

The medical model of alcoholism has received some persuasive research support in recent years as evidence has been generated in support of the assertion that there may exist, in some people, a genetically inherited predisposition to become alcoholic. While it is true that there is a continuing scientific debate over the characterization of alcoholism as a disease, this debate has proven to be of more scientific interest than therapeutic value. In my opinion, the medical model of addiction has been valuable in therapeutic practice largely because it is more acceptable to the "patient" and to society to view addictions as illnesses rather than as reflections of a personal failure of will-power or some other equally humiliating characterization.

The A.A. 12-step program of recovery begins with the practical observation that, for whatever reason, the individual has lost the power of choice with respect to alcohol consumption. The alcoholic's capacity to drink moderately is so impaired as to render the notion of "free-will" a fiction. Along with the inability to control alcohol consumption is a diminished capacity to manage one's health and life in general. The recognition and acceptance of this reality constitutes an enormously important psychological change from denial to awareness. It's like walking from darkness into light and it constitutes the foundation on which a program of recovery can be built. It is part of the wisdom of A.A. to know that this "awakening" is very much an individual matter which will not happen until the individual is "ready." Getting to the point of readiness may require that the individual "hit bottom" through considerable suffering. Sadly, some alcoholics never do reach a state of readiness and, other than intervention through some sort of confrontation, there seems to be little that outside agents can do to assist the process.

The second step of A.A. further reflects the genius of the program in that it provides hope and strength to replace despair and weakness. In this step the alcoholic acknowledges the existence of a power greater than self which can restore "sanity." The acceptance of a "Higher Power " is both a source of strength and inspiration to some people and an obstacle to be dealt with for others. The concept of a Higher Power in A.A. refers to "God" as we understood "Him" and it is the cornerstone of the spiritual foundation of A.A. Unfortunately, the "religious" nature of the A.A. program has been used by many alcoholics to justify their avoidance of the program. They complain or argue that this is a "turn-off" or that they can't relate to it. So profound is this phenomenon that in Alcoholics Anonymous, the A.A. "Big Book" which describes how the program works, there is an entire chapter entitled "We Agnostics" which deals with this issue. For some, A.A. becomes the higher power. For now, suffice to say that it is a gross distortion of the A.A. program to assert that one must be a highly religious person to benefit from the program.

The remaining 10 steps of the A.A. program also reflect the wisdom of those who have struggled to recover from alcoholism and while space limitations preclude an examination of each of them here, I will address a few points which they cover. In A.A. it is accepted that the cessation of drinking does not constitute recovery - it merely makes recovery possible. The need for profound life-style change is reflected by the individual's conscious decision to lead a less self-centered life and to accept one's place in the broader scheme of life. The alcoholic is asked to make "a searching and fearless moral inventory of self" and to share this with another person. Sound psychology is represented here in that exposure of the truth is consistent with a healthy orientation to reality and the emotional catharsis associated with relief from guilt and shame represents an unburdening of the self from negative, depressive emotions. Confession really does seem to be good for the soul.

BLITZED

By Joshua Zimmerman

My name is Josh and I'm not an alcoholic. In the past a college student with my drinking habits - a frequent beer or two, a couple of times a year to excess - wouldn't feel compelled to declare this. But when I got ill from drinking last spring at Princeton and was taken to the infirmary, I was told to meet with the school's full-time alcohol counselor. Opening a folder in my name, he began the interview: Do you play drinking games? Have you gotten sick on alcohol before? Do you consume more than fourteen drinks a week? After fifteen minutes of this, he told me that getting sick was "a significant episode" in my "drinking history," that I was teetering on the brink of alcoholism.

Subjection to this type of inquisition is an increasing part of the curriculum on America's campuses: 60 percent of colleges have some sort of substance abuse program. And the idea behind it - that a given level of consumption or a major bender means you're a confirmed lush, or close enough to being one to need treatment - now pervades the $2 billion alcohol- treatment industry.

Today's treatment theories reflect a far broader neo-temperance trend, which first became evident around 1984, when Mothers Against Drunk Driving succeeded in raising the drinking age to 21. In 1988 then Surgeon General C. Everett Koop called (unsuccessfully) for a ban on happy hours. Last January an award-winning edition of Little Red Riding Hood was banned for first-graders in the Empire, California, school district because Grandma takes a glass of wine after escaping the wolf. Today's puritans lobby for a whole range of prohibitions, from banning alcohol industry sponsorship of sports events and rock concerts to barring convenience stores, gas stations, and supermarkets from selling booze.

The new public awareness about drinking has, of course, helped to reduce the horrendous problems caused by alcohol abuse. Consumption is down, particularly among the young. In 1980, 58 percent of Americans between the ages of 18 and 24 said they drank beer, according to Simmons Market Research. By 1989, only 47 percent did. The number of deaths attributed to drunk driving has fallen, too, from 20,356 in 1982 to 17,849 in 1989 - a 12 percent decline in seven years.

You'd think such a success might moderate the impulse for ever more draconian correctives. But if anything the anti-alcohol severity is increasing. Last summer the Supreme Court found that "the measure of the intrusion on motorists stopped briefly at sobriety checkpoints" is a small price to pay in the effort to reduce the "death and mutilation" caused by drunk drivers. Thirty-nine states now have "dram-shop" liability and twenty-four states have "social host" liability, in which bartenders and hosts can be held partially responsible when someone they serve gets in an accident.

In the treatment industry, the tactics used to intimidate heavy drinkers have become more coercive. An increasingly popular method of alcoholism treatment these days is "intervention." Invented by Dr. Vernon Johnson, a reformed alcoholic who became famous when he pressured Betty Ford into treatment, the method relies upon a team effort. Family, friends, and co-workers "intervene: by confront-ing the offender in public -sometimes at work, preferably when he is hung over - with a list of grievances and a series of ultimatums. Johnson's transcript of a typical intervention from his recent book, Chemical Dependence, includes threats from the victim's wife that she'll leave him if he doesn't seek treatment, and from his boss, who says he'll fire him. A car is supposed to wait outside so the victim can be whisked directly to a treatment center.

The Johnson Institute promotes intervention through travelling workshops and a large mail-order business of books, cassettes, and videos. One of Johnson's biggest clients is the national network of Employee Assistance Programs, in-house and regional counselors who specialize in alcohol problems and are currently working with 12,000 corporate government offices across the country. A supervisor, noticing lagging performance or simply suspecting an alcohol problem, can order an employee to meet with an EAP counselor. the counselor, who doesn't have to meet any national training standards, will tell these presumed alcoholics to go on the wagon. If the employee is caught drinking again - whether or not the drinking is affecting his job performance - his boss is encouraged to send him back for more counseling or fire him.

Coercive treatment is essentially an extension of one of the main precepts of Alcoholics Anonymous: alcoholism - a disease over which the alcoholic has no control - starts with the first drink and leads inexorably to death if the alcoholic does not become perfectly abstinent. It is thus essential to stop alcoholism in its early stages, no matter how scant the evidence. In recent years, however, the disease theory of alcoholism has come under attack. (See "alcohol and Free Will" by Robert Wright, TNR, December 14, 1987.) Studies have shown that even many hard-core drinkers are able to control their drinking. Yet virtually every major alcohol treatment program in the country largely adheres to the A.A. tenets, and now a growing number are using some form of coercion.

Drunk drivers, understandably enough, have come under particularly ferocious scrutiny.

District Court Judge Albert Kramer of Quincy Massachusetts sentences about 470 drunk drivers a year to enroll in Right Turn, a $725, twenty-six week, out-patient treatment program, and to attend a series of A.A. meetings. "Everyone is assumed to be having a problem by virtue of their DWI conviction," explains Dr. Steve Valle, director of the program. "Social the groups, with an international membership of 20,000. "Some people in SOS are quite religious, but they don't believe in an intervening God who would come down and stir their coffee for them."

RR also shuns the religious element. Founded in Lotus, Calif., five years ago by clinical social worker Jack Trimpey, the organization has grown to holding meetings in more than 150 cities from a high of just 30 last year. It traces its roots directly to the ideas of Albert Ellis and his New York-based Institute for Rational-Emotive Therapy. Ellis's theories, formulated in the 1950s, blame emotional problems on the distorted perceptions rather than inner conflict - a view also held by practitioners of cognitive therapy. Trimpey, himself an A.A. dropout, says RR tries to help members recognize the sort of "crooked" thinking that sets up impulse behavior. "The beast" is what RR members are taught to call the irrational inner voice that tells them it would be great to have a beer or a tumbler of vodka with breakfast. To the RR way of thinking, A.A.'s notion of "powerlessness" is another irrational idea. "It perpetuates the addictive cycle," says Trimpey. "It says, 'I have no choice.'" But RR insists that choice is the essence of the drinking problem. "You can pick up a container of beer and drink it without somehow choosing to," Trimpey says.

For some alcoholics, the appeal to forces within one's own control simply works better. "The whole higher-power concept just never did it for me," says Paul, a 45-year-old Brockton, Mass., mechanic who bounced in and out of A.A. for a dozen years before hooking up with a Boston-based RR chapter. "It was like hocus-pocus, like magic. When I put my hand on the door knob at the package store, I'd say, 'O.K., higher power, where are you?'" With RR he has learned to think differently. "Now I don't even get in my car to go to the package store. I think it out (and) say, 'I've been there before. What's going to come of it?'"

A.A. of course doesn't discourage that kind of reasoning. But it holds that alcoholics are never really cured of the "disease" of drinking, and should attend meetings all their lives. Thus, critics complain, A.A. simply substitutes one kind of dependency for another. Jean Kirkpatrick, a sociologist and founder of the 5,000 member Women for Sobriety, says that that presents a particular problem for a woman, who is "already dependent on alcohol, on her husband, on everything but herself." In A.A., Kirkpatrick says, "she develops new dependencies, on a sponsor, on a higher power, on going to meetings for the rest of her life."

Like RR, Women for Sobriety has other ideas. Its own 13 steps stress positive perceptions ("I am what I think") and individual responsibility. Kirkpatrick, who founded the group after A.A. failed to halt her own decades-long bouts of alcoholism, says a Ralph Waldo Emerson essay on "Self-Reliance" finally helped her realize that by changing her thoughts she could change herself. WFS literature tackles A.A. head-on, saying that the older group's "philosophy is to turn over our will and our lives" while WFS advocates "Taking Charge." A.A. puts "emphasis on alcoholism," the literature continues; WFS emphasizes recovery.

The organization justifies its single-sex approach on the ground that women alcoholics have different psychological and emotional needs from males. "We try to give women self-value, self-esteem and self-confidence, which most of them don't have," says Kirkpatrick. "Hopefully, this empowers women." (In A.A., she notes, members introduce themselves by saying, "my name is X and I'm an alcoholic." WFS members say, "My name is X and I'm a competent woman.")

Shrugging off the criticisms, A.A. defenders insist that it doesn't compel members to believe, literally, in a deity. In practice, they say, religion plays a relatively minor role. "Realistically, 12-step people have never behaved as if they think the power is outside themselves," says John Hopkins professor George Bigelow, a psychologist who runs the schools substance-abuse program. "In fact, most of the steps deal with what people themselves are going to do."

Enviably-recorded; Undoubtedly, part of A.A.'s attraction is the release from accountability implied to the appeal to higher forces. Calling drinking a disease instead of a personal failure also seems to help some people. "acknowledging an addictive disorder as a disease has some of the same element of psychological forgiveness as the confessional," says Bigelow. "it says, 'It's a disease, it's not my fault.'" A.A. supporters also see nothing wrong with fostering dependency on the group. "For some people, it's exactly what they need," says Dr. Edward Khantzian, a psychiatrist at the Danvers State and Cambridge Hospitals in Massachusetts. "They need an antidote for the terrible, progressive self-centeredness that develops with this addictive illness."

Even critics of A.A. acknowledge that it has worked for thousands over its more than half a century of existence. Because its operations are anonymous by definition, there is no official count; but according to statistics, the organization succeeds in keeping around 29 per cent of its members sober for more than five years, a record considered enviable in the field. The alternative groups will have to prove their own staying power, but meanwhile there is surely room for more than one approach. Indeed, one member of the Seattle RR chapter also belongs to A.A., attending RR's Friday-evening meetings and A.A.'s sunrise meetings on Saturday and Sunday. "In A.A. I'm an alcoholic," he says. "In RR I'm not. I have to remember what day it is." The double allegiance is fine with RR's Peterman. "This is an alternative," he says. "We're not trying to replace A.A. If we help one more person that A.A. couldn't help, then we've saved one more life."

David Gelman with Elizabeth Ann Leonard in New York
Binnie Fisher in Seattle

man with scruffy reddish-brown hair and a mustache, perhaps 40 or just over, wandered in and looked about in sullen appraisal.

"Well, I finally learned the hard way, I just had to let go and let God," a girl was saying, running her hands through her dark hair. "That's about all I have for today, so I'll pass."

It was the scruffy-haired fellow's turn already, and he wasted no time. "I'm Scott," he said, "and I'm an alcoholic."

"Hi, Scott," everyone greeted him.

"I'm glad to be here," he said. "I came today - although this isn't my regular meeting - because my sponsor's been telling me I'll never stay sober unless I confess, like the fifth step tells us to. Here's the deal. Back in 1971, I murdered my girlfriend - it's that simple. I injected her with an overdose of heroin. I took her to the emergency room, but nobody suspected I had done it. It was easy to get away with it."

A few heavy sighs, but no one interrupted. It was not unusual to hear a shame script, a recitation of what people had done when they were drinking - a "drunkalogue." Most of it was covered under the leader's usual reminder at the opening of each meeting. "What is said here should stay here."

"I served some prison time later, for manslaughter, on a drunk driving charge," Scott added, "but they never found out about my girlfriend. So there it is and I'll pass."

"Don't worry," the leader assured him, "We're not going to hang you."

Then a woman stood up and walked over to Scott.

"Jesus Christ died 2,000 years ago for your sins," she said. "I want to give you a hug. God loves you." Awkwardly, she bent down and hugged Scott.

Perhaps Scott had exaggerated his guilt. There's the joke about the alcoholic who was in a San Francisco hotel at the time of the great earthquake. He awoke, looked out the window, and said to himself, "Oh, hell, how am I ever going to pay for this?"

The meeting droned on as usual, with speakers one by one telling of their struggles not to drink, and to maintain a spiritual center. None made a reference to Scott's confession. And when they were finished, all stood up, joined hands in a circle, and intoned the Lord's Prayer.

Scott was invited to stay for coffee, but he slipped away, presumably with confidence that his secret was safe. And yet, "We are only as sick as our secrets" is another A.A. tenet.

But is murder covered by the 12-step formula? Apparently at least one precedent says no, because last year Paul Cox, a carpenter from Larchmont, N.Y. was convicted for a 1988 double slaying he revealed during an A.A. meeting five years later.

The Alcoholics Anonymous fifth step says to admit our wrongs "to God, to ourselves and to another human being." Another human being might be a priest or a doctor, but could "ourselves" mean a room full of strangers? How far does confidentiality go in a 12-step meeting? And are we really empowered to forgive on behalf of victims we don't even know? And who are we to decide a killer is no longer a threat?

Detective Porfiry inviting Raskolnikov, the murderer in Dostoyevsky's "Crime and Punishment, " to confess, said "it will be infinitely better for you." But there was a little matter of expiating the crime with a few years exile in Siberia.

Raskolnikov experienced the redemptive love of Sonya, as well as the understanding of the detective who trapped him for his own good. Sonya was willing to go with him to Siberia, but she never suggested that his solution was to hide his crime. "Go to the crossroads, " she told him, "bow down before the people, and kiss the ground, because you are guilty before them, and say aloud to all the world, ' I am a murderer! ' "

She does not tell Raskolnikov to say it to a group assured that his secrets will be kept. She says "to all the world." Let's hope Scott's not still a danger to others, but who am I to decide, particularly when justice these days seems to be as much a matter of popularity or social prestige as of guilt or innocence. When was the last time a rich man was executed?

For decades Klansmen walked out of Southern courtrooms with smirks on their faces, after justice was not done. Do we give the same blessing to those crimes we do not report? What right does a killer have to expect us to keep his secret? Recently in a Kansas City suburb at least a dozen teenagers kept the secret of a classmate who had been involved in a murder. All knew, none told.as if they were sworn to the Mafia code. And a friend told me he had not reported being mugged because he was afraid of retaliation.

"I don't owe it to society to get myself killed," he said.

"But you are society," I said. "If everyone makes that decision, we have anarchy. "

Perhaps we don't care enough about the victims - including Scott's nameless girlfriend, dead for nearly two decades. A minister has told me how he handles confessions like Scott's, He offers to go with the confessor to the authorities, to stand by him as he accepts accountability. A 47-year-old wives of doctors to zoologists who love too much. Alcoholics Anonymous, once heavily male and middle class, has experienced a huge influx of female and low-income members. Men, meanwhile, are streaming into the self-help movement at what is—considering the usual male reluctance to discuss intimate feelings—an absolutely astonishing rate.

Why is this happening? Because people have discovered that talking and listening to their fellow sufferers has a soothing effect on the psyche, sometimes more so than doing the same thing in the presence of a therapist. Support groups—a rather high-falutin name for what's usually nothing more than loosely structured gab sessions—salve psychological wounds, help destroy addictions and even extend the lives of other people suffering from cancer and other physical afflictions.

And how do they do all this? Well, let us first acknowledge that there are some doctors, psychiatrists and others who say that support groups do nothing of the sort—that they in fact represent a dangerous do-it-yourself approach to problems of the mind, body and spirit. Yet most professionals and, of course, support-group members themselves, see the meetings as an amazingly effective antidote to aloneness—something that, apart from being a problem in its own right, compounds every known condition brought on by late 20th century living, from compulsive hand-washing to AIDS. Though no academicians or researchers have yet studied the self-help movement, there seems to be something at once common-sensical and utterly mysterious about how the meetings work. "Just the sight of your fellow sufferers," says one self-help group organizer, "tends to make your pain a little more bearable."

And so there is a group for every season. Got the midwinter blues? (Call Depressives Anonymous.) Are you obese? (Overeaters Anonymous or the National Association to Aid Fat Americans.) A gay Episcopalian? (Integrity.) Consider yourself asexual? (Finding Our Own Way.) Feel certain that aliens are trying to transform you into George Jessel? (National Organization of Rare Disorders.) Wish that aliens would transform you into George Jessel? (True Potential Toastmasters.)

Cultural Upheaval: You could call this a trend of course, of course. But when there is a group for women whose daughters won't talk to them meeting weekly in Westchester County, N.Y.—and when the New York City Self-Help Clearinghouse has had several callers ask if there were meetings for people who, to quote a spokesperson, "drink a little too much but not way too much Coca-Cola"—then what you have, really, is a sea change, the kind of cultural upheaval that makes the fax machine look like mood rings, break-dancing or some other fleeting fad. Through it all, though—as the national registry of support groups has grown to include Compulsive Shoppers, Pedestrians First, the Trichotillomania Support Network (for people who pull their hair out, strand by strand), Hot Flashes ("support for women with menopausal problems") and numerous bereavement groups—two basic conditions have endured. The first is that participation in a true self-help meeting is limited to peers. That means there is no professional moderator to make Wise Pronouncements based on a purely academic understanding of the subject matter, to sell books or to collect fees. While some groups designate a leader who might be charged with making announcements or recognizing members who want to "share" an experience or observation, no true self-help organization can have a hierarchy, especially one headed by someone who doesn't share the members problems. To include such a person transforms the support-group meeting into group therapy, a standard psychiatric technique which tends, the self-help people say, to take the burden of recovery off the group member. "As soon as you have a therapist or someone like that running the meeting," says Marilyn Ng-A-Qui, director of the New York City Self-Help Clearinghouse, "the group members tend to dump their problems on the so-called expert. Their attitude becomes 'Here I am-fix me.' In a support group, though, the members know they can't be lazy. The responsibility for getting better is in each member's hands.

The second common trait among support groups is that they engender a near-religious fervor. Listen to a member of Schizophrenics Anonymous in Southfield, Mich.: "If I don't come to a meeting and I'm by myself for three or four days, I'll start getting weirder than I am now. I have to realize that I can't do it alone." Many members of Alcoholics Anonymous-the oldest and by far the largest support group, with an estimated membership of 1.73 million worldwide-strongly suggest that newcomers attend 90 meetings in as many days in order to break their bonds with the past.

Swirling blizzard: But many support-group members don't need encouragement to attend. "If people are feeling needy or going through a crisis," says a New York woman from Al-Anon, a group for relatives and friends of alcoholics, "they'll build their whole lives around the meeting schedule. They'll go 15 times a week." Fran Dory, now executive director of the California Self-Help Center, recalls that when she was organizing groups in New York, a bunch of senior citizens trudged through a swirling blizzard and then, when an elevator failed to function, climbed 14 flights rather than miss their weekly meeting.

There's nothing irrational, or spookily New Age, about this kind of devotion, which is usually born of sweet relief from years of suffering and isolation. Support groupies say their meetings tend to serve as much stronger mind medicine than an equal number of hours with the most expensive shrink. Regular attendance, they claim, allows them to sleep more soundly, eat heartier and, in the case of recovering sexaholics, finally have the time to read the collected works of Will and Ariel Durant and mow the lawn.

Lately there has even been some scientific data to support the continual stream of anecdotal evidence-put forth by members of such diverse groups as Cocaine Anonymous, stroke victims and Incest Survivors-that the meetings don't just improve life but prolong it as well. A 10 year study by researchers at Stanford University showed that terminally ill cancer patients who participated in weekly support group meetings in addition to receiving treatment lived nearly twice as long as those receiving only medical care.

Even if support groups didn't work, they would provide a very wit-it way to stay miserable. It's hard to open a local newspaper without seeing, on the once bland community-activities calendar, notices for child molesters, former convicts or gambling junkies. Likewise, every suburban supermarket bulletin board seems to have-push-pinned among the pleas for babysitters and promises of cheap firewood-announcements pertaining to cocaine addicts, teenage insomniacs and women who love too much. The settings vary-the folding chairs might be chintz-covered at a meeting of a short-lived group called Rich Kids Anonymous. But a quick flip through the Self-Help Sourcebook-Older Women In Relationships with Younger MenThe International Intractable Hiccups OrganizationProstitutes Anonymous.only proves that human problems know no geographic boundaries. And that Donahue, Oprah and Geraldo will probably never run out of topics.

Fashionable recovery: Indeed, steely-eyed guest hunters from some of those shows haunt the hallways outside support-group meetings, aware that transsexuals must be out by 9 because the bulimics have the room booked. "There's so much happening so quickly in this movement," says Frank Riessman, executive director of the National Self-Help Clearinghouse in New York, "that sometimes you just have to sit back and smile at it all." Of course, intense suffering is what brought every support group into existence-and every member, quaking, to his or her first meeting. In one sense, nothing about this movement is funny. Yet, if you look at it the other way, why not laugh a little? We the People have embraced this notion with a bit of a vengeance, no? Today, in fact, "the social climate is such," says Riessman, "that it has actually become fashionable to be `in recover' from everything from drug addiction to spouse abuse."

In big cities especially, many people now treat AA and organization like the Manic and Depressives Support Group as an extension of the singles scene. "There are women at my meeting who don't really have a problem with alcohol," says Belinda L., a New Yorker in A.A. "They're looking to latch onto some guy who got divorced, or never got married in the first place, because of his drinking."

What's equally remarkable, perhaps, is that the self-help movement has managed, despite its phenomenal growth, to avoid becoming a big business, or really any kind of business at all. "There's this explosion of interest," says Riessman, with a sly cackle, "and no one has figured out a way to make a dime off the whole deal."

The best news, though, is that group members usually make measurable progress-a seemingly unknown concept in many forms of psychotherapy-if they stick with the meetings. Cambodian refugees who attend a group in San Francisco often say during meetings that they have nightmares about the atrocities they themselves endured at the hands of Pol Pot. But when they arrive, neatly dressed and with children in tow, at the Tenderloin Self-Help

Center each week, the group members are often engaged in animated conversation, playing with their children and otherwise showing signs of recovery. As with other support-group members, relief, for the Cambodians, has come with a willingness to express intimate thoughts and experiences to one's fellow sufferers. "When I eat," said an older woman at a recent meeting, "I think of starving relatives and I cry." Hearing that, another woman tried to commiserate. "I know what you're thinking. Most of my family was executed and it is still too overwhelming for me. Yesterday I lost my way home. I forgot I was in San Francisco." A 39-year-old male refugee then spoke up, saying, "I feel happy in this group because I know the faces. It's been very helpful to realize I am not the only one who has trouble in my new life."

Marcia Colone, the director of social services at the University of Chicago's Hospitals, sees something uniquely American in the self-help movement's emphasis on tangible results (though other countries are now getting involved as well, most notably in Europe and the Mideast, where groups for victims of terrorist attacks have recently sprung up). "This supports America's values of marshaling resources, taking charge and solving the problem," she says. "There's no doubt that these groups help people make real changes in their lives."

Yes, power to the people, so the people may help themselves. The support-group movement may be the only advance in the area of social services that was possible in the era of Reaganomics. "At a time when we are faced with drastic government cutbacks," says Ng-A-Qui, of the New York City Self-Help Clearinghouse, "a lot of poor people and people of color have had to fall back on their tradition of banding together to help each other." Most people in poor areas, she says, prefer the relatively unstructured groups, which usually don't bother with such formalities as guest speakers and would never think of limiting the conversation to any one topic. Instead, says Ng-A-Qui, "people just get together and share experiences or exchange practical information."

Formal presentation: At the other end of the spectrum there are the 12-step "anonymous" groups. These stop short of employing parliamentary procedures, but they do usually begin with a formal opening statement defining the group and its goals and then proceed to announcements about schedule changes, new chapters and upcoming events such as lectures, films or picnics. After that, the leader often turns over the meeting to a group member who has prepared a 10-to 20-minute talk, either on one of the steps or a personally chosen topic. These groups usually round out their hour long meeting by allowing any of the other members to share a thought, feeling or experience that in some way relates to the speaker's presentation.

In both the more and less structured groups, cross talk and the giving of well-meaning but potentially dangerous advice such as "get a divorce," "tell that boss of yours to go to hell" and "send firetrucks and pizzas to her house" is usually discouraged. Members who do get too controlling are usually reminded by the group leader that it is the principles of the organization, and not one person's opinion of what another should do in a specific situation, that really matter.

Support groups are obviously based on the ancient concept of community, as strangers gather to help one another by telling stories. But in another sense they also represent a holdover from the Me Decade, since no one comes to a meeting for purely altruistic reasons. "The person who's sharing gets as much out of the experience as the listener, frequently more," says Riessman. Or as one Al-Anon member says, "This is a very selfish program. But what we've found is that the best way to feel better about ourselves is to help each other."

These days nothing is too personal, it seems, to share with a group of strangers. The sexually dysfunctional gather at Impotents Anonymous. Those who subsist unhappily among stacks of old Vogues and Ladies' Home Journals can call Messies anonymous-or maybe Crossroads, a group for male transvestites. As for women who continually fall in love with priests: Good Tidings. It doesn't matter if you're a member of Bereaved (a group of parents of children who died during autoerotic asphyxiation) or if you suffer from AIDS or from such strange-sounding afflictions as prune-belly syndrome, male breast cancer and maple-syrup urine disease. "The only thing you won't find in this whole movement," says Riessman, "Is someone waiting to judge you." "Why, there's even a Kleptomaniacs Anonymous. They meet.well, the list was here a minute ago.

Anyone who explores the self-help movement eventually winds up on a road heading towards Akron, Ohio. It was there, in 1935, that Dr. Robert Smith and a New York stockbroker named Bill Wilson-both heavy drinkers-held a historic discussion that led to the founding of A.A. Wilson and Smith made no breakthrough on the causes and cure of alcoholism; the world awaits that news. What they did discover that evening was that there was something about the presence of a fellow sufferer that was more powerful, as an aid to recovery, than any of the spouse-inflicted punishment, public humiliation or solitary pain they had previously endured.

Never mind that "something" was-the way to stop drinking was to get together and then, tomorrow, get together again. Wilson eventually took the notion of camaraderie and refined it into a program based on his now famous 12 steps. These emphasize such concepts as acceptance of one's addiction and the acknowledgment of a "power" in the universe greater than oneself. A.A. grew rapidly in the 1930s,'40s and `50s, though near as fast as it would grow in the `80s, when it doubled in size as women and minorities started joining in large numbers. The one thing it didn't do for a long time was inspire many offshoots or imitators. With the exception of Al-Anon, a program begun by Wilson's wife, Lois, in 1951, AA for all practical purposes was the support-group movement for many years. Which meant that if you didn't happen to be male, white, middle class and a drinker, there were no meetings at which you could feel comfortable.

That wasn't a big problem. In those days, many people had something that took the place of meetings: intact, functioning, extended families. You wanted some brotherly advice? You called-egad, how positively "Nick at Nite"-ish!-an actual brother. For a maternal perspective on things right there in the kitchen, she's all yours. And so on, down to street-wise Aunt Sophie and just-plain-wise Uncle John. Women who had problems too delicate to discuss with any of the faces around the dinner table could always turn to their coffee klatches or, as Leslie Borck Jameson, the executive director of the Westchester Self-Help Clearinghouse says, with a sweeping gesture toward her window, to "all those other mothers you always saw pushing baby strollers through the park."

Kiddie books: But of course that world now seems as distant as Freud's Vienna-or Donna Reed's Hillsdale. The traditional family started to come apart at the seams in the mid-`60s, as boomers began graduating from college and moving far away from home to find jobs. Divorce, drugs and the doomed Yuppie quest for perfection have sped along a process of deterioration that had been going on since the late 19th century. By the early `80s, there was a flourishing cottage industry of kiddie books and records that dealt in the "OK-ness" of having no dad, two moms, a step-this, a half that, a mysterious "uncle" and a grandma who's not talking to any of you lowlifes at the moment. But in fact there were problems, even more than before, and, for many people, only two places to bring them-the therapist's office and/or a self-help meeting.

Traditional "couch" therapy has certainly helped a lot of people, offering as it does the advantage of a professional caregiver and a greater focus on the individual patient. But even those who can afford the high cost of psychotherapy have sometimes grown dissatisfied with the open-ended nature of the process, and suspicious of advice that comes from someone who has never sparred with their particular demons. For those people, the only viable option is frequent support-group sessions.

It was the women's consciousness-raising movement that first extended the self-help concept, beyond alcoholism. For the most part, these oh-so-`60s "organizations" engaged in unstructured discussions that were as likely to concern drinking or drugs as they were sexual harassment, the military-industrial complex, lower back pain, Vietnam or anything else that wasn't groovy. What the get-togethers were mostly about, though, was getting together. The consciousness-raising groups set the tone for the self-help revolution of today, by giving people a chance to come out and see others who-despite having some very recognizable flaws and problems-were surviving, thriving and even smiling.

Support groups in the past few years seem to have sorted themselves into four basic categories: those that address problems of addictive behavior (Compulsive Shoppers, Workaholics and others that often follow a slight variation on A.A.'s 12 steps); those for physical and mental illness

(Parkinson's Support Group, Recovery, Inc.); those for dealing with a transition or some other crisis (Widowed Persons Service, Recently Divorced Catholics), and those for friends and relatives of people with a problem (Adult Children of Alcoholics, Parents of Agoraphobic Teenagers). Though it sounds sacrilegious, Borck Jameson and others think that a support group can be a better place to seek help than the traditional family. A dysfunctional family, after all, is often what brings people to support groups in the first place. Among strangers, people can be brutally honest. At one recent meeting of Batters Anonymous (sometimes called Forte) in Los Angeles, a member posed the rhetorical question, "Man, what am I supposed to do when my old lady tried to block my way out of the door? There's nothing left to do but remove her with my fist." Moments later, another member explained that being arrested for beating his wife only fueled his anger. "The last time we had a fight, I pulled a shotgun on her and it jammed," he said. "That's the only reason I'm here today. If it hadn't jammed, I'd be doing time."

The only reason a lot of guys are at Crossroads, the male cross-dressing group, is because they need to know where to get size 14EEEE high-heeled shoes or an extra-long string of pearls. For one married member, lounging around in a wig and a dress and listening to a guest lecturer discuss the best way to apply blusher, is, he says, one way to "get away from the tension of being a husband, the breadwinner and dealing with the factory, everyday life. Here I can just be Susie." Almost every problem left untreated can become debilitating or even life threatening. Ed Madara, the director of the New Jersey Self-Help Clearinghouse, points out, noting that at Speakeasy members tell stories of stutters whose affliction led them to suicide. At some meeting, such as those for women with endometriosis and other gynecological problems that are often mishandled by the male medical establishment, there is almost always a palpable sense of urgency-if not anger-in the air. Often, what support-group members are maddest about is the way they've been treated by their doctors and therapists. "The professionals are discouraging and negative toward recovery," says Joanne Verbanic, 45, an executive at Ford Motor Credit Co, in Detroit and the founder of Schizophrenics Anonymous. They put limits on us, saying we'll never get better. But sometimes that's not true."

The relationship between support groups and health care professionals is improving. There are, for example, few, if any, alcohol treatment centers in the United States that do not funnel their outpatients into A.A. At the same time, says Marion K. Jacobs, adjunct professor of psychology at UCLA and codirector of the California Self-Help Center, "there is still a huge amount of resistance in medicine to incorporating self-help as part of health care." Though there are probably more people involved in self-help than in any other single form of therapy, psychiatrists have "scant" training in support groups, according to Dr. Frederick E. Miller, director of the Adult Inpatient Psychiatry Unit at the University of Chicago. "It's a neglected area," he says. Professionals don't like the idea of self-help groups for two seemingly unassailable reasons: a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, and he who treats himself has a fool for a patient.

Margaux Hemingway to Tony Curtis have hit the lecture circuits to describe their battles with the bottle and/or drugs-and they're grabbing fees ranging from Hemmingway" lowball $5,000 a shot to Stacy Keach's $25,000 for his cocaine-to-prison tale. "There's a Cocaine Anonymous meeting in Santa Monica where you'll see more celebrities than at Spago," says a Westwood psychiatrist.

"You're nobody in Hollywood these days unless you are attending one of these groups," says Dr. Dickson Young, a past president of the Alcoholism Council of Los Angeles County and one of only 3,000 doctors in the country certified as an addictionologist, medicine's newest niche.

In a cover story last month, Newsweek estimated that the number of self-help support groups have quadrupled in the past 10 years. An estimated 16 million Americans-more than one million in the Los Angeles area-are in some kind of recovery program. But only a small percentage goes to the trendy private detox, counseling or weight-loss clinics that are making megabucks on the new asceticism. Most opt for one of the many anonymous groups. Most opt for one of the many anonymous groups. There are at least 27 such groups in L.A., all using some spin-off of AA's tried-and-true model. Groups range from Overeaters Anonymous, Gamblers Anonymous, Cocaine Anonymous, Narcotics Anonymous, Pills Anonymous, Divorce Anonymous, Prostitutes Anonymous and Debtors Anonymous to Artists Anonymous, Sex Anonymous, Parents Anonymous, Impotents Anonymous and Depressives Anonymous. There's Al-Anon, Adult Children of Alcoholics and Codependents Anonymous for the spouses, children, sweethearts and friends. There's even a Diazepam Support Group for people trying to kick a Valium addiction. And almost all of them began in Los Angeles.

There are groups that meet at members' homes for recovering doctors and attorneys, and there's one for actors and agents. Both ABC and CBS have weekly in-house meetings. Every Tuesday at 8a.m., there's an AA meeting in the United States Capitol for members of congress and their staffs. There's a meeting of Overeaters Anonymous-for nudists-every week at Elysian Fields. KIEV-AM radio airs a thrice-weekly talk show, The Recovery Show, aimed at addiction and dependency. Executives with recovery problems are ducking out during their lunch breaks to go to exclusive meetings attended by other execs and managers.

"Nowadays, the assumption is that if you aren't recovering from some addiction or another, you must be still practicing it," says Dr. Judith Stevens-Long, professor of psychology at California State University, Los Angeles.

"I tell my patients that abstinence is chic, they they're right in step," says Young, who treats alcoholics and other addictive personalities in private practice and serves as medical director of New Beginnings at Century City Hospital, where patients undergo a one-month detoxification and rehabilitation program. "Recovery is especially hot in Southern California, where everyone is so health-conscious. It fits right in. Everyone is drinking Evian."

Ironically, the anonymous meetings themselves have become social events, places where you work out your problems and also meet new friends and do some serious networking. For many, the groups have come to replace singles' bars. "Half of the guys here don't even have a weight problem," confides Gordon R., a longtime member of Overeaters Anonymous. "They just come to score."

"These groups are like any club," says an AA member. "During breaks, you start talking about what you're doing, sharing ideas—the kind of conversation you might have had at a cocktail party, except you're discussing things that really matter to you. Eventually it gets around to business."

It's not exactly the Knights of Columbus, but there's the same ripe environment for opportunity. "In many instances, members use their group connections much the same way guys used to attend church just to sell insurance policies," says the friend of one AA member. "I saw two people pitch an editor a story just last night," says a member of an AA meeting for writers. "I've seen guys show up with scripts in their hands. But even though these things happen, they're not the point of the group."

The first AA meeting in L.A. was held on December 19, 1939, four years after a New York stockbroker who called himself Bill W. and an Akron surgeon known as Dr. Bob Smith found that discussing their problems help to overcome them. They published a book called Alcoholics Anonymous—now known within the organization as the Big Book—in 1939. A nonalcoholic woman hosted the first West Coast meeting in her home on Benecia Street in West L.A. A second group was formed in South Pasadena, a third in a Masonic hall on Pico Boulevard. By November 1941, the L.A. chapter of AA had a post-office box, a listed telephone number and a newsletter. Soon, California had more members and groups than any other state, a distinction it has held ever since.

The AA formula had been proving itself successful for a decade before it spawned its first copycat group. Narcotics Anonymous was started in 1953 by four addicts and originally run out of a Sun Valley home. Then, also in keeping with the AA model, a compulsive gambler who called himself Jim W. (nobody uses last names in anonymous groups) formed the first chapter of Gamblers Anonymous in L.A. in 1957. In November 1958, an L.A. woman known as Rozanne S. and her husband escorted a friend they thought needed help to a GA meeting.

"I was a world saver," Rozanne says. "Although I didn't have a gambling problem myself, what I heard at that meeting made me realize that I was not alone, that the anger and resentment I felt, the lying and the cheating and the self-pity, that I was not the only one who felt that way."

Rozanne's problem was that she weighed 161 pounds, even though she was only five-foot-two. She realized her compulsive overeating and the resultant self-loathing was akin to what compulsive gamblers felt. "I went to GA founder Jim W. and asked him to help me form a group," she says. Thus, it was Rozanne and two friends who held the first meeting of Overeaters Anonymous on January 19, 1960—again based on AA's basic program and again based here in LA.

Initially operated out of Rozanne's dining room, Overeaters Anonymous has grown to 200,000 members attending 9,400 meetings each week in 50 countries. In contrast to Weight Watchers and other diet programs, Overeaters Anonymous does not promote any particular diet or eating plan. For years, OA did distribute a "gray sheet" diet plan but gave it up in the late 1980s when diet clubs and weight-loss plans such as Jenny Craig, Nutri/Systems and Optifast proliferated. They decided that OA's primary mission should be to free its members from their obsessions, rather than whittle off their excess pounds. "We try to get at the heart and soul of the compulsive nature more than we try to get thin," Rozanne says.

During the `60s and `70s, a variety of "consciousness-raising" self-help groups emerged, but most returned to AA's model to face the problems of the `80s. The first meeting of Cocaine Anonymous was held in rented space at the motion-picture health clinic on La Brea Avenue. Today there are more than 400 CA meetings a week in L.A. Codependents Anonymous is one of the newest spin-offs—and one of the few not founded in L.A.

Chris A. founded Divorce Anonymous with a friend shortly after a long-term relationship ended. Believing that the same 12- those in the throes of a failed relationship, step program pioneered by Alcoholics Anonymous could offer comfort and support to Chris held the first meeting at the Council House for Jewish Women in April 1987. Thirteen people showed up. Today, she is holding four DA meetings a week, averaging as many as 50 participants, throughout Southern California.

Like AA, all the anonymous groups stress a practical approach to maintaining good habits, a rational lifestyle, as well as spiritual renewal and a pride in self free from obsessions.

And though all anonymous meetings are run by the members themselves, with no professional therapists or facilitators in attendance, they follow strict routines and adhere to rigid rules.

There are two principles common to anonymous groups: the acceptance of individual responsibility for the problem—meaning readily identifying one-self as addicted—and the assurance of anonymity. Although within the group, members sometimes identify themselves by their full names—and frequently give identifying information about their lives and professions—it is a cardinal rule that nothing said inside the meeting be carried outside.

Oddly, in this day of tell-all reform, one of the reasons for the anonymity is to prevent anyone from using the group for their own self-aggrandizement. "it's really not so much to protect the reputations of the members—because often belonging to AA is the aspect of their lives for which they can be most proud-but to prevent them from exploiting the group," says one longtime member. And going public can backfire. When a Kitty Dukakis or Elizabeth Taylor backslides, it reflects poorly on the organization they have been touting.

But what really makes AA and its kin unique is the utilization of a 12-step recovery program called "12 Steps and 12 Traditions." Though the wording varies to fit the thrust of each group, the basic precepts are the same. The first of the 12 steps, for example, always involves admitting powerlessness over the addictive agent-whether it be alcohol, food or a relationship. Members are urged to find a sponsor-a mentor whom they can call if they feel the old temptation rise-and to choose one "home group" to attend on a regular basis, while visiting others as often as they feel the need.

New members are asked to take a personal moral inventory, to confess to their higher power and to another human being their past sins and to ask the higher power to remove all shortcomings. They are required to make amends where possible to anyone they have ever harmed. And just as important, they are charged with carrying the message to others who suffer the same addiction.

The only criterion for membership is the desire to join. There is no fee. Unlike many of the recovery clinics and diet programs so popular today, the anonymous groups are not run as money-making enterprises. Groups are supported by voluntary contributions that are placed in a collection basket passed at each meeting-know as the seventh tradition. Donations from outside organizations, corporations or government agencies are not accepted.

Similarities to a religious organization are not coincidental. As many point out, the anonymous groups function much like a church, and for many the 12-step program becomes more than a lifestyle: it becomes their religion.

Meetings are opened by a leader, who identifies himself and asks if there are others present who suffer from the same addiction. Those attending their first meeting are asked to stand and give their first name-"not to embarrass you but to allow us to get to know you during the social hour," says one member. Those within their first 30 days of abstinence are asked to raise their hands. Each time a person introduces himself by first name, the whole crowd calls out, "Hello, -----."

The 12 steps and the 12 traditions are read aloud, and portions of the Big Book are sometimes read. At so-called open meetings, there are speakers who tell what it was like when they were drinking or using or overeating or gambling-kind of a witnessing. The formula basically boils down to "Amazing Grace..that saved a wretch like me." Good speakers are in demand and often speak at many meetings. They become quite polished, and their accounts are larded with humor.

There is a common argot-much talk of "working the program" or "working the steps." Members say they "stuffed their feelings" or "played old tapes" when they lapse into unproductive patterns of relating. At a West Los Angeles meeting of codependents Anonymous, a young man says, "Like many of you, I lived in my head for years. But since I've been working the program, I've become much more present in my feelings." Everyone nods. They know where he's coming from. "Sayings such as 'We have to feel it in order to heal it' or 'The only way out is through' helps people express what recovery is all about," says member Janet M.

At the open meetings, members are encouraged to bring spouses, children or friends to hear the speakers and to share in the fellowship. There are dances, picnics and other social events for members and their families, as well as weekend conferences at resorts and hotels. "When you come into a recovery group, you have to make it the focus of your life," says Rozanne. "It replaces whatever activity you are trying to eliminate."

"A lot of people were reared with a strong religious background, and then as they grew up they got away from it," says Young. "For those people, AA can be like a rebirth of religious experience. The diagnosis of chemical dependency allows them to come back to their old spiritual roots. In other parts of the country people may go to church on Sunday and then go to AA, but in Southern California I think a lot of people use it for their church. They make AA their religion.

Although some members of Anonymous groups insist they are not religiously oriented, Cal State L.A.'s Stevens-Long says that, on the whole, one of the reasons the 12-step programs have been so successful is because of their similarities with religion.

"Twelve -step programs emphasize forgiveness," she says. "All successful religions forgive their followers for their wrongdoings, because if they didn't, there would be no reason to belong. Twelve-step programs allow for confession and atonement-basic premises in every ancient religion."

It is the dependency on the program that bothers some critics, who feel the groups can come to function as a cult. "Another factor the two have in common," says Stevens-Long, "is the feeling of members being helpless without the program, that they need it in order to combat their problem—that those who belong are in a state of grace and those who don't are not. They are urged to bring in other followers. And there is a provision of community and fellowship, a major tenet of most religions."

Tarzana psychiatrist John Hochman, however, says the groups, while "quasi-religious," do differ sharply from organized religion. "They talk about a higher power, they have a code of conduct, a kind of scriptures—they read the 12 steps at their meetings and they read from the Big Book—but they don't worship their founders. They don't impute miraculous powers to them. It's like people studying the teaching of Martin Luther King."

Hochman says anonymous groups "differ from cults in that cults are shrouded in secrecy. You don't know where the money is going. These groups are completely open. You can go in and check them out. Sure, they do pick up people who are helpless and demoralized, and they do make them dependent on the group, but that's better than whatever these people were dependent on before."

"In a very real sense, AA does the same thing as the church," says Clancy I., who founded the Pacific Group 26 years ago when there was a free night at the Ohio Avenue meeting hall in West Los Angeles. "Like the church, AA gets people to change their lifestyles so they wind up in a more comfortable, spiritual way of life. That's the goal of religion, and the goal of all movements. But the difference is that most don't work. What makes AA unusual is that it works."

Nevertheless, addiction is not an exact science, and long-term success can be problematic. Doctors now know it takes the brain three years to recover from a chemical dependency, and during that time the brain is changing, Young says. "The patient is going to have ups and downs. At predictable intervals—for five days every 4 to 6 weeks during the first year, every 6 to 8 weeks in the second year and every 10 to 12 weeks in the third year—the patient is more susceptible to relapse."

According to a survey of AA members in the United States and Canada, an alcoholic with less than a year of sobriety has less than a 50-50 chance of making it through the next year without a drink. With one to five years of sobriety, he has an 86 percent chance. If he can stay sober for more than five years, he has a 96 percent chance of not drinking during the next year.

"Most of you here won't keep coming back," an AA speaker at the Beverly Hills Presbyterian Church at the corner of Rodeo Drive and Santa Monica Boulevard told a Friday-night group recently. "Most of you will go back to drinking."

Clancy I., with 31 years of sobriety, is a member of the University Synagogue AA group and a coveted speaker at recovery meetings worldwide. His group had only 250 members when it moved to the temple 12 years ago. There are usually some celebrities in attendance, given the convenient and highfalutin location. Names are never dropped, of course, but actors and rock stars, some of whom have made their newfound sobriety or abstinence known, frequent the meeting, where the riffraff quotient is low.

"We have a lot of sobriety at our meeting," Clancy says. "There are other trendy groups in town, but they don't have a great deal of sobriety"

One meeting fitting that description is held Friday nights at the Beverly Hills Presbyterian Church. The attire is indeed trendy—leaning toward leather and chains. Unlike at the pristine Brentwood meeting, no one seems to be able to sit still during the proceedings. "This is certainly a busy meeting," the

from a prestigious job as a foreign correspondent in Paris to reporter on my newspaper's woman's page; my closest friend of recent years was gone.

My friend was the bottle. My employer had summoned me home to New York in 1975 because I seemed to be on the verge of a nervous breakdown. The truth was, my heavy drinking was finally beginning to damage my life and my work. But as I turned 50 the following year, I was thankful for a magnificent gift. It was nothing less than a renewed capacity for hope and joy. I had been treated for alcoholism and sober for eight months. After a long period of self-destructive drinking, dramatically accelerated by my husband's death, I had finally decided to be present and accountable for my own life.

Now I am 65. I am retired. I am still living alone. I am still sober. And I can look back on the 15 years since I marked my own half-century and say honestly-despite struggle and seriously illness and vanished friends-that these have been my quality years.

To be alcoholic at any age is a torment. Every one of us who escaped that misery remembers how isolated we were, how duplicitous, how secretly full of shame and guilt. And so I get angry when I hear, "It's the only pleasure Mom/Dad has left. Why deprive her/him of a little nip?"

I am not speaking of social drinking here. I am speaking of alcoholism: problem drinking that distorts the lives of an estimated two-and-a-half million to three-and-a-half million older Americans, estranging them from family and friends and trapping them in a fog of blurred reactions. Cantankerousness, confusion, memory gaps, depression, anxiety-all too often, both doctors and kin dismiss these afflictions as a "natural part of growing old." It is just as likely that alcohol is to blame, or, at the very least, has made the conditions worse.

To the "Why deprive them" question adult children of older alcoholics often ask, Daniel J. Anderson, Ph.D., president emeritus of Minnesota's Hazelden Foundation-the granddaddy of all alcoholism rehabilitation centers-answers: "You're an enabler by making up excuses for the drinking. You've given up on them; you've already got them in a casket. Take a chance on treatment. If you love your parents, you owe them that."

"The rationale is that they haven't got long to live," says Edith Lisansky Gomberg, Ph.D., a University of Michigan psychologist who has been studying alcoholics for more than 40 years and is a nationally known authority on drinking in old age. "But alcoholism is not a pleasure-it's weird to think it is. The consequences both medically and in interpersonal relationships are terrible."

Studies have estimated that 10 to 15 percent of all Americans over age 60 suffer from alcoholism-about the same percentage as the general population. This is true even though many older people drink less or abstain altogether, usually because drinking complicates their medical problems or simply makes them feel bad.

How do you tell who is alcoholic? One of the best answers comes from Alcoholics Anonymous—the oldest, most famous and arguably the most successful program devised to arrest the disease. AA gives this definition of alcoholism in Time to Start Living, a pamphlet for older people:

"Whether or not you are an alcoholic is not determined by where you drink, when you started drinking, how long you've been drinking what, or even how much. The true test is the answer to this question: What has alcohol done to you? If it has affected your relationships; if it has influenced the way you schedule your days; if it has affected your health, if you are in any way preoccupied with alcohol—then the likelihood is that you have a problem."

And remember, tolerance decreases with age because older bodies detoxify alcohol more slowly. What could be moderate drinking in a younger person—say, two drinks a day—can be dangerous in an older one.

Older alcoholics are divided into two groups. About two-thirds are "early-onset" drinkers who have abused alcohol much of their lives and have survived into an unhealthy, unhappy old age. The second group—about one-third of all drinkers over age 60—is unlike the general alcoholic population. This is the "late onset" group, which has an excellent chance for recovery.

"They are not as impaired physically, emotionally or cognitively as the early-onset drinkers," says Renee Zito, treatment director of the respected Smithers Alcoholism Rehabilitation Center in New York City. "With abstinence, proper diet and time, recovery can be complete."

Heavy drinking in the late-onset groups is usually triggered by traumatic loss. The deterioration is very rapid, covering in a year or two the progression in alcoholics who have been drinking for 20 to 40 years. They hit the bottle because their spouses have died, their children have moved far away, they have retired from their jobs, their health is not as robust as it once was. They are bored, lonely, invariably depressed. Alcohol takes the edge off those negative feelings—for a little while. But there is always the morning after, with remorse adding its sting to every bad emotion.

Le Clair Bissell, M.D., the founding director of Smithers and a recovered alcoholic who has been sober for 40 years, says it best: "There are no long-term chemical answers to life."

For many years alcoholism experts believed that isolated older adults were usually the problem drinkers. Then came a 1988 study of alcohol use in three retirement communities in the West. The study found that drinking was part of the communities' lifestyle, with 45 percent of the residents drinking on a regular basis and 27 percent of the heavy drinkers having increased their intake after moving there. While drinking was primarily social, the study found that those who drank socially also drank more when alone.

Older alcoholics are often hard to spot. Detecting the problem is difficult because the signs by which society and the law identify younger drinkers are usually not there. These include arrests for drunk driving (many older people have stopped driving), warnings from employers about tardiness, waning productivity, etc.

How, then, can you tell when something is wrong?

"You can't say the problem is definitely alcohol-related unless you have an eyewitness, the patient admits to it, or his or her physical condition has deteriorated noticeably," says Larry W. Dupree, Ph.D., clinical psychologist and associate research professor in the Department of Aging and Mental Health at the Florida Mental Health Institute, University of South Florida at Tampa.

If you are a friend, helper or relative of an older person, you might suspect alcohol abuse if you notice any of the following signs. (With the exception of bottle stashes, these could also indicate prescription drug abuse; in any event, the person demonstrating such symptoms is in trouble.)

Abrupt or significant changes in behavior: hostility, paranoia, disorientation, forgetfulness, unsteady gait, slurred speech or trembling hands.

Previously controlled (via medication) conditions now out of control (e.g., diabetes, hypertension).

Complaints of insomnia; frequent napping; an absence of restful sleep.

Deterioration in grooming, housekeeping and eating habits.

Falls, broken bones, bruises or burns.

Bottles stashed in the home. ("Home health aids report many bottles in homes visited," says Dupree.)

Once alcoholism is suspected, how do you get an older person to seek treatment? Alcoholics of all ages deny they have a drinking problem.

"There is a tremendous amount of guilt and embarrassment among older people about the `stigma' of alcoholism," says Jean Dunlop, R.N., M.A., and a certified chemical dependency counselor who runs an outpatient program for older alcoholics at St. Vincent Hospital in Portland, Oregon. "The disease concept of alcoholism was accepted by the American Medical Association back in 1956, but these people have never heard of it. When they were growing up, alcoholics were skid-row bums; immoral, weak people. You show them films and bring them to lectures and they say, `Well, it's very interesting, but I still think I was at fault: I had no will power.'"

Dunlop and others feel the number one motivator that gets an older person into treatment is a doctor who points out the medical problems drinking is creating. Zito and still others think the family network can best bring the older alcoholic into recovery. It is highly unlikely that older alcoholics will reach out for help on their own.

"Most of them weren't brought up to deal with their emotional problems, and they often view alcoholism as a sin," says Zito. To overcome this, intervention becomes necessary.

"Intervention involves presenting the facts about the alcoholism to the drinker in a tone that is nonjudgmental and shows concern," Zito explains. "ideally, all persons who are meaningful to the alcoholic, such as family, friends, neighbors, religious advisor, physician, should make clear and specific lists about events caused by drinking. The goal of intervention is to get the alcoholic to acknowledge the need for help, however reluctantly."

The suggested approach is to be loving and gentle. The use of words like "drunk," "drunkard" or "alcoholic" should be avoided. Those who treat older patients agree that the confrontational approach, though it often works well with younger patients, is absolutely wrong for older people. It is essential, says Zito, that the intervention be coordinated and conducted by a trained professional.

Once into treatment, the late-onset drinker usually responds well. But should the patient receive therapy in groups of only older people? Or are mixed-age groups better?

Those who vote for segregated age groups say that many older people are offended by and cannot identify with the younger people now pouring into treatment. The profanity, the talk about abuse of illegal street drugs that often accompanies alcoholism in the young, the horror stories told in gory detail—all of this turns off the older person, some experts say.

Dan Anderson of Hazelden is in the middle. "It depends on how dominate the young people are in the group," he says. "It is the duty of older people to defend the traditional culture and the duty of the young to tear it down. On the other hand, a lot of folks just don't want to be in a group where everybody else is also 70 years old."

Zito believes that after the initial shock, older patients are stimulated by daily contact with young alcoholics. She spoke of Virginia, a woman who came into treatment in her mid-70s after an intervention by her 45-year-old son. Virginia had been drinking almost suicidally since the death of her husband three years before. She immediately complained that she was older than the Street and Riverside Drive that is known in the neighborhood as the God box. One staff member reflected recently that the Age of the Founders was long gone - Bill Wilson, the New York stockbroker who led the movement for more than thirty years, died in 1971, and Bob Smith, the Ohio surgeon who founded it with him, had died twenty years earlier - and the Age of the Apostles was now ending. "There's practically no one alive today who was there when Bill and Bob met, or in that very first group," she said. "Pretty soon, there will be no early timers at all."

Standing like a crewcut cadet among fops, the Interchurch Centre is set between the ornate spire of Riverside Church, to the north, and a row of neo-baroque apartment houses, to the south. A reasonable facsimile of a midtown corporate fortress, it has revolving doors that spin you into a mopped marble floor, and a badged guard who eyes you from behind a security counter. In A.A.'s eleventh floor office - described by one staff member as "the visible clearing house of an invisible organization" - close to a hundred people are at work, filling orders for A.A.'s publications, referring callers to local groups, disseminating information to the public and to the medical and counseling professions. "We are a repository of group experience," he said. "People write us about a problem they're having in their group - an unruly member, a question about confidentiality. We share experience by telling them what's been done in similar situations in the past. We don't issue directives. We don't hand down rules."

Besides being the nerve centre for the more than fifty thousand registered A.A. groups in the United States, the General Service Office is a shrine. Its corridors are hung with poster-size photographs of the founders, and placards bearing their sayings; along one wall of an anteroom that leads into the organization's archive is a locked glass case containing the various editions of the Big Book - the basic A.A. text, which has sold thirteen million copies since it was first published, in 1939. I consider the Big Book an inspired text, written by Bill under the guidance of the spirit," another staff member said. "And I worry that I see a shrinking in our reading and studying of the Big Book. People paraphrase it incorrectly. Some do spot reading, or they don't read it at all."

Some people say that if the Big Book is losing its hold on new members, it may be because its image of the alcoholic is hopelessly cornball and exclusively male: he is a travelling salesman tempted by the hotel bar; he is compared in his desperation to a "gaunt prospector, belt drawn in over the last ounce of food;" or, in his drunken oblivion, to "the farmer who (comes) up out of his cyclone cellar to find his home ruined," looks around, and remarks to his wife, "Don't see anything the matter here, Ma. Ain't it grand the wind stopped blowing?" There is even a condescending chapter addressed "To Wives." Today, A.A. is more than a third women, and twenty-five percent of the membership is under thirty - people for whom prospectors and storm shelters are defunct metaphors.

Others think the integrity of the fellowship is being threatened by "people who come in because the courts or rehab centres send them," in the words of Dr. Marc Galanter, a New York psychiatrist who has written extensively about A.A. "Many of these people have to get a meeting card checked off to show that they're fulfilling the obligations of, say, their suspended sentence - and though A.A. welcomes them, this is something that's basically against what makes the fellowship work. Coming in is supposed to be voluntary - an act of spiritual surrender, not acquiescence to some legal requirement."

And others think that A.A. is becoming a social club where people show up casually, in order to make deals or dates. "It used to be that when someone talked about suffering, you could hear a pin drop," a retired advertising writer who has been in A.A. for sixteen years said. "But now people come to the meetings with a bottle of designer water in hand, and there's more talk about success. It kills the meeting. People get up to pee, or look for an ashtray." One member, a carpenter of about forty who lives near a posh New York suburb, put it this way: "We have actually become afraid of the still suffering alcoholic. If a drunk walked into a meeting in my town, people would be agast. We've become too nice for that." He still attends his home meeting, he said, but he goes once a month to a meeting in a man's shelter in a neighbouring town, to get "the real thing."

It is not only this squeamishness before the hardcore alcoholic that bothers A.A. veterans, but what they see as a growing expectation among some members that meetings will amount to a form of public coddling. Sometimes this expectation is met ("unconditional love" is how one member described what she encountered at her first meeting); but sometimes it is disappointment. When a young woman at a meeting we attended said in a private- schoolish whine that she, as a recovering alcoholic, deserved "more space" than she was getting from her non-drinking friends, a young man in dreadlocks, looked at her with a mischievous grin and said, "When I was drinking, I had the same problem you have now. I had not yet achieved low self- esteem.

The rebuke was a pure expression of "the real thing" - of the Big Book's principle that "self-delusion, self-seeking, and self-pity" are the root of our troubles, "that we "must be rid of this selfishness. We must, or it kills us!" But some veterans are troubled that this basic A.A. insight is invoked less often than it used to be. They worry that alcoholism, which was once a source of convicting shame in America, is being turned into an alibi. They mention the recent case of a Westchester man who confessed at an A.A. meeting, to a murder committed while he was on a binge, and then mounted a legal defence based on the claim that alcohol had led him to confuse his victims with the parents who had emotionally abused him as a child. And they laugh - though not with real amusement - about the case of Leonard Tose, the former owner of the Philadelphia Eagles, who responded to a suit to collect gambling debts brought by an Atlantic City casino a few years ago by countersuing and claiming that the casino had allowed him to gamble away his fortune while he was manifestly drunk. "A.A. is not about excuses," one longtime member said.

"It's about obligations. Bill, and Bob would be appalled."

A.A. came into existence at a time when Americans were introduced to fear and futility on a scale that had not been previously imagined and has not been managed since - a time when it was a common experience for a man to feel prosperous one day and to be reduced to nothing the next. When A.A. first took form, in the nineteen-thirties, it was not a place where one came to ventilate anxiety about the enervation of a stressful life. It was the last stop before the abyss.

For many Americans, Prohibition had been less an obstacle than a nuisance. (H.L. Mencken reported that he failed only twice during Prohibition to find a drink - once when he was travelling in Pennsylvania and did not realize that "seafood" was the local euphemism for beer.) During the "dry years," Bill Wilson had made his living as a kind of mobile industrial espionage agent, scouting out companies for his brokerage house by befriending research-and-development men in their local watering holes, and then stiffening his will with another drink before attempting to persuade investors of the truth of tips he only half believed himself. By the time of Repeal, in 1933, he had drunk himself out of his job.

He and his wife, Lois, who at that time worked as a salesclerk in Macys's joined the ranks of the depression vagabonds, living with her parents, with friends, or on their own in shabby apartments. Paul Lang, the archivist in charge of the Wilson family papers at Stepping Stones, their eventual permanent home, in northern Westchester County (it is now a historic site, maintained by a foundation established upon Lois's death), counts fifty-four addresses for the couple in the early nineteen-thirties. These were hellish years, during which three ectopic pregnancies ended Lois's hopes of bearing children and the pace of Bill's drinking grew in proportion to his shame. Bill would dry out periodically in a clinic on Central Park West called the Townes Hospital, then try to stay sober until the "small, cold ball of fear... in his stomach would surge up," and only a drink could mitigate his terror of its return. He promised abstinence and was meanwhile hiding his liquor from his wife "as a squirrel would cherish nuts...in the attic, on beams, underneath the flooring...in the flush box of toilets." The archive at Stepping Stones contains Lois's personal Bible, in which Bill wrote periodic pledges to stay sober - promises whose ingenuousness is matched by a fear legible in the handwriting itself, which becomes increasingly spidery as it moves down the page:

To my beloved wife that has endured so much let this stand as evidence of my pledge to you that I have finished with drink forever. Bill October 20, 1928.

Thanksgiving Day 1928. My strength is renewed a thousandfold in my love for you.

To tell you once more that I am finished with it. I love you. Jan. 12, 1929.

Finally and for a lifetime. Thank you for your love.

Sept. 3, 1930.

As Bill later wrote in the Big Book, he was locked in a cycle of resolution and relapse by his inveterate tendency to compensate for pain by finding someone or something to blame:

With the alcoholic...this business of resentment is infinitely grave. We found that it is fatal. For when harbouring such feelings we shut ourselves off from the sunlight of the Spirit. The insanity of alcohol returns and we drink again. And with us, to drink is to die.

It was in the detox hospital in 1934 that Bill first arrived at this difficult knowledge. The epiphany came as his doctors were putting him through the usual regimen: sedating him with belladonna and purging him with castor oil. (Medicine had - and has - made little progress in treating alcoholism since the eighteenth century, when the pioneer physician Benjamin Rush treated a man "habitually fond of ardent spirits" by mixing tartar emetic with his rum.) Left to endure the craving and the cramps in a room that had been cleared of potential suicide instruments, Bill had the experience that broke the cycle:

My depression deepened unbearably and finally it seemed to me as though I were at the bottom of the pit. I still gaged badly on the notion of a Power greater than myself, but finally, just for the moment, the last vestige of my proud obstinacy was crushed. All at once I found myself crying out, "If there is a God, let Him show Himself! I am ready to do anything, anything!"

Suddenly the room lit up with a great white light. I was caught up into an ecstasy which there are no words to describe. It seemed to me, in the mind's eye, that I was on a mountain and that a wind not of air but of spirit was blowing. And then it burst upon me that I was a free man. Slowly the ecstasy subsided. I was in another world, a new world of consciousness. All about me and through me there was a wonderful feeling of Presence, and I thought to myself, "So this is the God of the preachers!"

Bill left the hospital as a man possessed, roaming New York, in the words of his biographer, Robert Thomsen, "at all hours, indefatigable and incorrigible, totally convinced that if he could do it, could find a way out, (anyone) could do it." He literally dragged drunks home from the gutter, inflicting them on his wife, who fed and bunked them in their Brooklyn home while he pleaded that they consigned themselves to "the Presence." Mostly, what the Wilsons got in return was petty thievery and, sometimes vomit on the floor.

In the grip of his new obsession, Bill found himself ridiculed not as a drunk but as a fit successor to temperance fanatics like Carrie Nation. In the first decade of this century, Carrie Nation had toured the country from saloon to saloon, smashing - as her biographer Robert Lewis Taylor puts it - "Venetian mirror (s) with brickbats," ripping "candid and stimulating prints from the walls," and, on one notorious occasion, throwing "a billiard ball at what she mistakenly took to be Satan lounging behind the bar." She ended her life, in the words of the historian Norman Clark, as "a carnival freak...a sideshow for a series of country fairs, armed with hatchets and her Bible" - and to many who watched Bill on the prowl he seemed headed for the same oblivion. Yet however unavailing there efforts were for his "patients," they had the strange effect of somehow keeping him sober himself.

Bill did not come close to a "slip" until the spring of 1935, when he found himself in an Akron hotel lobby with nothing to do on a weekend afternoon. A business deal that had brought him to town had fallen through, and he was drawn by the sociable sounds of the bar. Retreating to a phone booth as if to a pocket of air in a room fast filling with smoke, he dialed all the church numbers he could find in the local directory, and when a clergyman answered he said - not knowing quite why - that he was a "rum hound from New York" who needed "to speak now" with another alcoholic.

He ended up visiting a local surgeon named Bob Smith, who was known around town as a hopeless boozier; and their encounter was, in effect, the first A.A. meeting. Dr. Bob never touched another drop for the remaining fifteen years of his life, going "dry into his casket," as the poet John Berryman wrote in his novel "Recovery," which is about his own A.A. experience. "Look up his life sometime, there must be stuff."

It took a while for the two men to identify the "stuff" that had saved them: the therapeutic value for oneself of helping another person stay sober, "Our talk was a completely natural thing," Bill recalled. "I had quit preaching. I knew that I needed this alcoholic as much as he needed me. This was it." Together, they began to visit patients in detox, telling their story, and inviting them to give the new talking therapy a try. Let us talk to you for our own sakes, they said, in effect, and then talk to us and we'll listen. Sometimes they were shooed away like pestering salesmen. But soon they had a success - with a businessman who was going through his eight detoxification in six months, the previous one having begun with his punching two nurses in the eye. At first he resisted, and railed at his wife for revealing his drinking to strangers. When she coaxed him into seeing them, he braced himself for another sales pitch. But he relented when he realized that "all the other people that had talked to me wanted to help me, and my pride prevented me from listening to them but I felt as if I would be a real stinker if I did not listen to a couple of fellows for a short time, if that would cure them" - and he became the third member of the new fellowship that called itself a "bunch of nameless alcoholics."

The principle on which the new group was based was that no one is responsible for the wreckage of the alcoholic's life except the alcoholic himself. No matter what has been done to you, you are responsible for what is done by you. They would refuse to project evil on to some blamable cause, even though they might speak of alcoholism as (in the Big Books words) an "illness" or "allergy," and of some people as alcoholics before they ever touched a drop, as if they were born tainted by a poison activated by the first drink.

Within Alcoholics Anonymous (the name was adopted in 1939), some people speak of its astonishing growth after the Akron meetings as the expansion of God's dominion. But there has always been a tension between what might be called the pietist and the rationalist wings of the movement; and traces of this division remain in the Twelve Steps, the list of principles that Bill Wilson drew up as he wrote the Big Book:

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God, as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.
12. Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

Although some members still speak of these steps as if they were brought down from Sinai or were revealed, like the Book of Mormon, by a messenger angel, they are in fact products of contention that is still discernible in them.

Their wording was under debate until just before the release of the Big Book, when the phrase "on our knees" was deleted from Step 7 and "as we understood Him" was inserted in Steps 3 and 11. Some regard such concessions as proof of the democratic genius of the fellowship - of its ability to modulate the idea of a personal deity into an abstraction that can accommodate all members, including non-Christians and agnostics. Others worry that God has become so vague a conception that he has disappeared. Evidently wearied of the term "self-help," one member complains, "We're not a self-help program. If we were helping ourselves, we'd be in trouble. We are a spirit-help program, a God-help program."

God has always been A.A.'s raw nerve. Bill confided in only a few friends about how "the Presence" had manifested itself to him, lest A.A. become linked in the public mind with crackpots and ranters. But shortly after that hospital experience a friend recommended to him William James's, "The Varieties of Religious Experience." Bill read that book with the gratitude one feels toward a respectable witness who confirms that he, too, has heard the disembodied voice or seen the ghost that has brought one under suspicion of madness. James (whom Bill came to refer to as "one of the founders") seemed to know at first hand the power of alcohol to make one feel uncontested at the center of the universe - to turn any party into your fete, any music into your serenade: Sobriety diminishes, discriminates, and says no; drunkenness expands, unites, and says yes. It is in fact the great exciter of the Yes function in man. It brings its votary from the chill periphery of things to the radiant core.

And when James wrote about the futility of mental effort he seemed to grasp exactly what Bill had undergone in Towns Hospital:

You know how it is when you try to recollect a forgotten name. Usually you help the recall by working for it, by mentally turning over the places, persons, and things with which the world was connected. But sometimes this effort fails: you feel then as if the harder you tried the less hope there would be, as though the name were jammed, and pressure in its direction only kept it all the more from rising. And then the opposite expedient often succeeds. Give up the effort entirely; think of something altogether different, and in half an hour the lost name comes sauntering into your mind, as Emerson says, as careless as if it had never been invited. Some hidden process was started in you by the effort, which went on after the effort ceased, and made the result come as if it came spontaneously.

James ratified the value of giving oneself up rather than "pulling oneself together" - an ineffably strange reversal for a man like Bill, whose life had once been all about seizing opportunities, looking for the main chance, training, disciplining, driving himself. When Bill read that "something must give way, a native hardness must break down and liquify," he recognized an account of what had happened to him.

This experience of giving way and breaking down remains the key to every A.A. meeting, as it was at one we attended on a rainy Saturday morning in a Boston mental-health center - one of those nineteen- sixties scored concrete buildings with all the charm of a highway trestle. On the steps, outside, men slept curled in the rain. Inside, the atmosphere was festive. A tidy- looking young man (polo shirt, pressed khakis) was telling a group of about forty men and women how he had stepped, for no apparent reason, in front of a mirrored column in a subway station. Walking around it, as if he had been suddenly vouchsafed the ability to see himself from without, he stared at his own face, yellow and jowly, really seeing it for the first time. For months, he said, he had been drinking two bottles of wine every night in between aperitifs and chasers. In that instant, he knew he would never drink again. But he had no idea why.

One hears as many metaphors for such an experience as there are members who speak. One member at the Boston meeting likened it to the feeling of a runner who gets a second wind - that eerie sensation when exertion suddenly subsides into limpid ease. Another compared it to what happens when you stop straining to find your balance and suddenly it's there. One young man at a New York meeting described the splitting away of his old self as if he had been a plank with a fault line running through it until a pressure came that made the board break.

The latter editions of the Big Book play down this expectation of "sudden and spectacular upheaval," and report instead that "most of our experiences are what the psychologist William James called the 'educational variety' because they develop slowly over a period of time." But, whether the release is sudden or slow, public testimony about the hell in which one lived before deliverance is indispensable for both speakers and listeners; and the talking therapy has no designated end.

Like cancer patients in remission, A.A. members think of themselves as "arrested," not "cured." With the possibility of backsliding never far out of mind, they regard each day of sobriety as an unmerited gift, and each A.A. meeting as a holding action -because "each lapse," as James wrote, "is like the letting fall of a ball of string which one is care- fully winding up; a single slip undoes more than a great many turns will wind again."

As A.A. took form, Bill and Bob had no historical model in mind. They were not bookish men. But it is uncanny how closely their new fellowship resembled the first American churches that had been "gathered" three centuries before. The founders of those churches, named Puritans because of their implacable objections to the rituals of England's state church, had instituted in America a practice of public confession, in which each member of the congregation spoke of his or her enslavement to sin and of how the bondage had been broken. The Puritans had called these testimonies "conversion relations" or "professions of faith." A.A. called them drunkalogues."

In the A.A. view, just as in that of the Puritans, salvation is not something one can possess by means of a penitential act now and then. Rather, it is a state of endless striving. The work of salvation, as the Puritan theologian Jonathan Edwards wrote in the seventeen-forties, must be, for each person, "not only...the business of Sabbath days, or certain extraordinary times, or the business of a month, or a year, or of seven years...but the business of his life... which he perseveres in through all changes, and under all trials, as long as he lives." The convert's obligation to his fellows is not satisfied by a coin in the Sunday collection basket. "Faith has to work twenty-four hours a day in us and through us," as the Big Book puts it, "or we perish." There is no evidence that Bill himself ever followed James back to Edwards (in whose writings James found an ("admirably rich and delicate description" of conversion), but if he had he would have found more than a congenial spirit. He would have experienced a shock of recognition when he came upon Edward's list of signs by which the anxious seeker tests the validity of his or her spiritual experience. Did it come from God, or was it hallucinatory? Edwards enumerated twelve signs by which one could tell. They do not match A.A.'s Twelve Steps with the exactness of a stencil, but they come close. Here is the Twelfth sign, which he called the "sign of signs" and "evidence of evidences" (the Big Book calls the Twelfth Step "the capstone" and "foundation stone" of all the rest):

Whatever pretences persons may make to great discoveries, great love and joys, they are no further to be regarded, than they have influence on their practice.

Substantially the same as A.A.'s Twelfth Step, this statement contains what James called the whole of Edwards's work. It is "an elaborate working out of (the) thesis (that) the roots of a man's virtue are inaccessible to us," James wrote. "No appearances whatever are infallible proofs of grace. Our practice is the only sure evidence, even to ourselves, that we are genuinely Christians." If, in other words, two people claim they are saved, and one sees Jesus' blood running down the bedroom wall, while the other sees only the swirls and cracks in the plaster, this difference between them has not the slightest significance. The only evidence that one's inner spiritual condition has changed is visible evidence of a new responsibility towards others in one's outward practice.

James repeated this point again and again, as if to rebuke his Harvard colleagues, who thought he had gone soft on God. The question of whether someone's conversion had a supernatural cause or could be explained in purely psychological terms held no interest for James. (Freud, working with the dualistic model of the mind, later described such events as an internal rupture in the psyche through which the unconscious pours into consciousness.) Like Edwards, James was not interested in causes - only in results. It matters not a whit if the convert is transformed by God or by the smile of a child. The only thing that matters is the result of the experience. "If the fruits for life of the state of conversion are good," James wrote, "we ought to idealize and venerate it... if not, we ought to make short work with it..."

When it comes to applying this standard of results to A.A., not much is known about its aggregate impact on American alcoholics. Most experts estimate the number of alcoholics in the United States at ten to fifteen million, and some believe that nearly one in ten adults has attended an A.A. meeting at some time in his life. In 1968, recognizing that "our communications to the professional community had very little credibility because of a lack of objective data," A.A. began to conduct periodic surveys of its members in order to assess its own efficacy. In a 1989 survey of almost ten thousand members chosen at random, thirty-five percent of the respondents reported less than a year of sobriety, thirty-six per cent between one and five years, and twenty-nine per cent more than five years.

But what such number mean is far from clear. For example, the survey also revealed that about half of the newcomers leave A.A. after less than three months, and that "after the first year... attrition continues, but at a much lower rate." If you try to adjust the numbers to reflect these facts, it is still difficult to come up with a true sobriety (or "salvation") rate. The best the editors of an exhaustive recent monograph on research on A.A. can do is conclude that "long term sobriety occurs within a select minority of those who initially attend A.A." For certain cancers, this would represent a good outcome. For most bacterial diseases, it would not. To the theological father of Puritanism, John Calvin, who wrote in 1536 that if "the same sermon is addressed to a hundred persons, twenty receive it with the obedience of faith; the others despise, or ridicule, or reject, or condemn it," a "select minority" would seem about right.

It was the test of results that clarified for Bill what had happened to him in Towns Hospital. It gave him a way to answer those who said he had simply substituted a new addiction - A.A. - for his old one. When he had been drinking, he had been "at the gates of insanity," he wrote, and other people were obliterated by the intensity of his narcissism. But when, first in Brooklyn and then in Akron, and then through A.A., his mind had been directed outward, he was restored to the world of persons. Edwards called this new engagement with other people "consent to being." A.A. calls it "Twelve Stepping."

Twelve-Stepping is based on the insight that altruism has selfish value, in that charity gives hope to the giver: "When the phone rings at two in the morning," one member told us, "and it's a member in my group who needs help, I get up and go. Anything else in my life I will negotiate. But in A.A. I just do it. It doesn't make any sense to get up at two on a snowy night. But you do it all the same."

In light of the fact that the religious dimension of A.A. has made many prospective joiners uneasy (newcomers sometimes have the self-conscious look of stragglers in the pews when everyone else is taking communion), it is striking how respectfully A.A. is regarded by even the most secular-minded experts in the field of addiction. We spoke with one such authority, Dr. Steven Hyman, who is the director of the Mind, Brain, Behavior Initiative, at Harvard University, in a squat brick building at the old Charlestown Navy Yard which used to be a storehouse for torpedoes but is now a research facility of the Massachusetts General Hospital, complete with atrium and cafe. Dr. Hyman, who looks like Pavarotti in fighting trim, does not initially impress one as likely to have much tolerance for a movement that began when a patient was seized in his hospital bed by "the Presence." In this respect he surprised us.

"The great A.A. insight was not just that alcoholism is a disease but that having this disease is not an excuse for anything - not for missing work, messing up your family, killing people in automobiles," he began. "In terms of cause, alcoholism does have genetic causes, cultural causes, circumstantial causes. But there's nothing deterministic about its consequences. That's the strange paradox A.A. understood, and it seems to be more and more difficult for people to accept."

Dr. Hyman added, "I have no problem with the A.A. method," and launched into an explanation of how a spiritual therapy could relieve a physiological affliction. Rummaging through the papers on his desk, he came up with an M.R.I. film of a rat's brain after the animal had been injected with cocaine. It showed a splatter of bright streaks on a dark background, like fireworks against the night sky. This picture, he said, revealed a neurological system that was more complexly developed in human beings but served basically the same function in people as rats. He described an experiment done in Canada in the nineteen-fifties, in which electrodes were affixed to a succession of sectors of a rat's brain. A lever was placed within reach of the animal so that it could send current into itself by depressing the switch. "In some places, the effect was highly aversive," Dr. Hyman said. "You can imagine the experience of feeling electrical sensations in your paws. But when the electrodes were attached to certain other locations, the rat would press the lever thousands of times to get more of it - until exhaustion supervened. "

Now, why do we have such a system - a brain that will light up when you charge it with electricity or drugs? Because such things are too important to leave to cognition. If you left them up to people to calculate, they'd get messed up. Nature's experience with sexual reproduction would have been a big failure unless sex were profoundly rewarding. So we have a neurological system that says, "That was good, let's do it again." A few natural substances, including alcohol, tap into this system in the brain that says, "That was good, let's do it again, and let's remember exactly how we did it." And, since you're bombarded every day by millions of sensations, the brain is organized in such a way that certain indispensable experiences, like sex, have the greatest effective valence, and become objects of desire."

Dr. Hyman's name for the process by which this system is captured by drugs is "adaptation," which is "a way of making long term changes in the way the brain works, so that you can remember experience." This kind of "learning" uses many of the same biological processes in the brain as in other parts of the body.

"Let's say you want to look like Schwarzenegger, and you went to a gym and started pumping iron," he said. "Your arms would really hurt. But eventually you would have an adaptive response. The genes in the nuclei in your muscle cells would start making more messenger RNA and then more protein to build up those muscles, and pretty soon - especially if you also took anabolic steroids - you would look like Schwarzenegger. These adaptive responses are helpful like bulking up, which is essentially a response to injury. Others are a problem - as when people develop a tolerance for their asthma medicine. In fact, they not only need stronger doses but become dependent. If they don't get their asthma medicine, they have worse asthma attacks.

"Addiction, in other words, is a form of adaptation. Our best current understanding of alcoholic addiction is that, in response to bombardment by the chemical ethanol, chronic adaptations occur in the brain's reward circuitry. There are individual genetic and developmental and environmental factors that help determine who will get addicted to alcohol or how soon - matters we know very little about. But in the context of individual vulnerability, adaptations will occur in the circuitry in response to the drug. Once this happens, the user becomes dependent on it for his world to be O.K. The brain says, 'That was good, I feel O.K.' If you're an alcoholic, you simply can't imagine a day without drinking. You need that hit. Your brain demands it." With almost reverent intensity, Hyman said, "If you understand addiction, you understand something very profound about the human brain - how it hijacks the cortex in the service of the primordial lizard brain." Hyman went on, "now, to help people with these molecular changes in their brain, we have to come up with things that will deliver compensatory pleasure - a requirement that it's tough to get the medical and scientific professions to accept. A.A. understood this. In fact, they're ahead of us. Most pharmacological research is still focussed on the development of drugs that block pleasure. An example is Naltrexone, a long-acting blocker of opiate receptors. If you take it every morning, and shoot up heroin later in the day, you will not get high. It looked terrific in the lab. The trouble is that, once it was approved for heroin users, the compliance rates were about fifteen per cent, because the addicts said it made them feel lousy. Naltrexone has just been approved as a drug for decreasing craving in alcoholism. My prediction is that it won't work because it doesn't give something back."

Hyman's account of addiction is an impeccably accurate rendition of the doctrine of original sin as Jonathan Edwards expounded it. What Hyman called "the reward-circuitry of the brain" Edwards called the "faculty of the soul...is inclined to. or disinclined from...sensible objects." Both regard it as inborn, and yet both insist that people are fully responsible for how they act on their inclinations. Edwards thought of this paradox as a war in the soul between the destructive desires that he called sin or self-love ("self-will run riot" is the Big Book's phrase) and the productive love that goes outward, asking no reward, to other people and, through them, to God. Hyman believes that you can actually see the war in a picture. "I suspect that if I could compare scans of the brain of an alcoholic person before and after treatment in a twelve step program, you would actually see changes. Of course, the altruistic activity affects the brain as much as a drug does," he said.

Edwards would have been delighted with this idea. It has been said, by the historian Perry Miller, that when Edwards preached he deployed words as an "engine against the brain" in order to stimulate in his hearers a "taste," or "relish," for what he called "divine excellency." The point was to use words to "let...light into the soul" by describing vividly the plenitude of nature or the charitable acts of saintly persons or the selfless love of Christ, and thereby to entice the imagination away from its usual focus on worldly glitter. And if Edwards would have linked Hyman's notion that one might actually see pictures of this battle within the soul, he would have loved the metaphoric picture of the lizard brain - of the reptile within getting hold of the leash.

"What A.A. understands is that the essence of dealing with alcoholism is not to blame people for having the disease, yet nevertheless to demand that they take responsibility for themselves," Dr. Hyman said, "That's a hard concept. It is hard to say to somebody, 'Yes, things are terrible, yes, getting to your present condition involved what was done to you, and it even has something to do with the body with which you were born, but from this day on we have identified the problem, and you have to be involved in the solution.'" Here is Edwards's formula of the same compatibility between helplessness and responsibility:

In order to form their notion of faultiness or blameworthiness, (people) don't wait till they have decided...what first determines the will...They don't take any part of their notion of fault or blame from the resolution of any such questions. If this were the case...nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand would live and die without having any such notion as that of fault ever entering into their heads, or without so much as once having any conception that anybody was to be either blamed or commended for anything.

Edwards believed that this idea accorded perfectly with common sense. And Bill Wilson, through his experience in Towns Hospital, came to the same conclusion - that "what first determines the will to drink has nothing to do with who bears responsibility for the consequences of drinking."

For much of American history, there seems to have been a consensus that this stringent principle should be applied broadly to the moral life. Among modern Western societies, America has been the country where human beings were most exposed to the possibility of advancement, and least protected from the prospect of decline. It was, in Emerson's phrase, the culture of "self-reliance," in which a man was supposed to take his chances and then collect the reward or pay the price for what he had done or had failed to do.

With the Great Depression, however, this kind of uncompromising individualism became insupportable. For millions of people whose best efforts had availed them nothing, the old doctrine of self-reliance was now experienced as a form of cruelty. At that moment - when the exigencies of the exposed life were judged to be intolerable, and the old stress on individual responsibility had come to seem out of balance with valid claims for individual rights - a profound change took place in America. It was a fusion of the old doctrine of the accountable self with a new kind of public responsibility for the fate of individuals. At the level of politics and public life, this new synthesis came to be known as the New Deal. Under that rubric, the government, mainly through programs that would today be called "workfare," undertook to provide work opportunities for those whom the private economy had abandoned. At the grassroots level, the most important and enduring expression of this self-help idea was the founding of A.A.

A.A. was a "church" in which the rights were kept in steady balance with responsibilities through the mechanisms of free expression and requisite community service. As such, it kept unflinchingly to the Edwardsian principle of what the theologian Reinhold Niebuhr called in 1939, "responsibility despite inevitability," and at the same time committed itself to providing the unconditional help that all suffering human beings have a right to expect from others. In this sense, A.A. was both a religious revival with roots in an earlier America and a spontaneous expression of the kind of balanced liberalism that emerged in the Roosevelt years.

But in the paradoxically symmetrical idea that lies at the heart of A.A. - that helplessness is a fact of human life, yet, at the same time, no one should be spared responsibility for his actions - has proved extremely difficult to sustain. The relation between rights and responsibilities within American liberalism seems to many people to have been thrown out of balance. In response to this apparent distortion, certain liberal institutions (welfare) and ideas (affirmative action) have been charged with misattributing suffering to circumstance rather than to responsible self. Such an approach to the alleviation of human suffering, its critics say, misleads people into thinking that the world owes them redress, and leaves them in a state of perpetual expectation for a reparation that will never come.

As part of the feeding frenzy on the corpse of Liberalism which now passes for political debate, this critique is often a pretext for mean-spirited attacks on "freeloaders" - people who are deemed unworthy beneficiaries of a misguided paternalism. Yet even some defenders of liberalism agree that, at least in such conspicuous areas as criminal law, regulated speech, and normative sexual behaviour, American society has moved too far towards rights and away from responsibilities. Some of the more spectacular "don't blame me" defendants who have entertained and disgusted Americans in recent years - Lorena Bobbit, the Menendez brothers - seemed to represent a moral decadence in which a once dignified liberalism has been reduced to the claim that maimers and murderers are entitled to sympathy and exoneration if only they can show that they were victims, too. "The architecture of (their) self-defense plea," as Elizabeth Hardwick has put it, is most often organized around the claim of having suffered sexual abuse - "as pertinent to the therapist," she says, "as a kidney to the urologist." These are people who claim, in contrast to Edwards, that "what determines the will" not only means something but means everything.

It is not surprising that, as this exculpatory idea of the coerced will grows rampant in American life, the balance within A.A. between rights and responsibilities has also shifted. "It's getting harder all the time just to find a volunteer for setting up the coffeepot before the meeting, or scrubbing it out after," one member told us. "The idea of helping others in order to help yourself is in trouble." And some members, pointing to circumstantial factors, remark that the practice of Twelve Stepping is on the decline. "In the days of Bill and Bob, everyone knew a drunk whom you could seek out and Twelve Step in what used to be your favourite bar," one member said. "But today they're hidden away in rehab centers and dealt with in a medical setting. The expectation that every A.A. member will seek out someone to help seems to be fading."

There are members who believe that the fellowship actually has begun to break apart into schisms. On one side, there are the proliferating victims groups ("Shoplifters Anonymous, Tight-Shoes Anonymous, Edsel-Owners Anonymous" was the list offered by Marc Galanter), a sort of endless Oprah Winfrey show that claims the A.A. Twelve Step method as its inspiration, but in which the real meaning of the Twelfth Step is lost amid an incessant whine about the injured self. "There's been an influx of double talk from these groups," one veteran remarked. "I've heard about an A.A. meeting in New Jersey where the old-timers have taken to yelling out "Tough shit, don't drink!" when the whiners get started."

On the other side there is a rival group called Rational Recovery, which began in 1986 and publishes a guide entitled "The Small Book," in which the addict is promised "sobriety...without depending on other people or Higher Powers to help you out." This diluted version of the original seems of A.A. true believers, a vestigial church, where members make no real commitment to helping others, yet refuse to face the irremediable loneliness of helping only themselves.

How A.A. will respond to these challenges remains an open - and for many members an urgent - question. It is a fellowship based on the proposition that human beings can overcome their existential fear only by recognizing their responsibility for themselves and their obligations to others. To contemplate the history and the destiny of this idea in a culture that seems to be losing responsible limit of tolerance?"

At A.A. meetings everywhere—in church basements, on campuses and in hospitals and prisons—certain basic principles hold. Under a cloak of strict anonymity the "Drunk," to use a popular A.A. word, often admits his alcoholism before the group, acknowledging that alcoholism is a disease for which abstinence is the only answer. Most adherents also believe they will never recover but instead will always be "in recovery." Though many who feel they have been saved by A.A. cannot explain exactly how or why A.A. works, they do believe they stay sober by helping others stay sober too.

For some A.A. veterans, this role becomes complicated when other kinds of highs are involved. Helen, a member for 21 years, recalls a young woman who told the group at a meeting a few years ago that her biggest thrill had been going to a "shooting gallery," buying drugs and injecting them. Hearing that, Helen told a friend that her biggest thrill had been going to the cocktail lounge at New York City's Sherry Netherland Hotel because they had great drinks and hot hors d'oeuvres. "The old-timers are being driven away by not being able to identify with the specifics of young people's drug stories," agrees Peter, a six-year veteran. "The issue isn't getting more people into A.A. but keeping the ones we have."

A number of younger members do not dispute that they are in A.A. for different reasons. "I definitely think there is a split," says Rusty, 27, who has been in the program eight years. "The difference is what it's like being sober between the ages of 19 and 27 instead of coming in at 50 with a marriage, a job and a mortgage. I don't know a lifetime of disappointment and pain. My friends who came in at 18 and 19 have had incredible success. They get better jobs, and they move on. [Older members make you] feel you're doing something wrong to go for it. But it's not their show anymore." And whether other members relate to her or not, Dezerie, a 19-year-old from Pasadena, California, cares only that A.A. works. "It's the people and the spirit at A.A.," she says. "This is a place where I come and I don't feel alone anymore the way I used to when I was drinking and doing drugs."

A.A.'s fundamental principles are also coming in for criticism. For some people, A.A.'s spiritual overtones present problems. (Step Two of the famous Twelve Steps requires recognizing "a Power greater than ourselves.") Rational Recovery, which began in 1986 as a secular alternative to A.A., claims groups in some 600 cities around the country, many of them filled with A.A. refugees. Other therapies, such as Moderation Management, hold that for some problem drinkers, abstinence from alcohol is not the answer.

A.A. has a longstanding policy of avoiding public debate. But the loosely structured organization, administered by a small staff in New York City and funded by donations and book sales, continues to expand, and now has about 700,000 members outside the U.S. In some places, its uniquely American flavor takes getting used to. "The first time I read the Twelve Steps, I thought,

"This is pure imperialism," says Slava, a Russian woman who has been sober for more than five years. A South African member who attended last weekend's San Diego convention said the only place there was no apartheid in South Africa during that brutal regime was at A.A. meetings. In Poland the first A.A. convention in 1984 attracted 27 groups from across the country; there are now 940 groups. Professor Wiktor Osiatynski, chairman of the Commission on Education on Alcoholism in Warsaw's Stefan Batory Foundation, says A.A.'s rapid rise in Poland can largely be attributed to the Solidarity trade-union movement. "Solidarity was the first event in Poland's history where people began to realize that they could tackle their problems by organizing themselves, instead of looking to their leaders, to someone else, to solve their problems," he says.

The ability of A.A. to thrive elsewhere in the world suggests that the organization is adaptive enough to absorb all these cultural shifts. For one thing, if a visitor does not like one meeting, there is often another somewhere else nearby. "People vote with their feet," says Peter. "At some point a lot of groups won't be A.A. groups anymore. I won't be in those meetings." Jim, a 30-year veteran who is a partner in a top-flight Boston law firm, remains sanguine. "Right from the beginning, A.A. was a cross section that reflected what was happening in society," he says. "A.A. is strong enough to survive."

-Reported by Sam Allis / Boston, Sylvester Monroe / San Diego, Tadeusz L. Kucharski / Warsaw, Jenifer Warner / Moscow.

Source: Time, July 10, 1995

|||||

+++Message 1127. Tradition 11
From: Troy P. 7/1/2003 10:25:00 AM

|||||

Good Morning,

I am looking for any information that shows when the General Population of AA decided to start identifying by First Name Only? What happened?

It is like that all over and is a direct violation of the 11 Tradition.

Do you Yahoo!?
SBC Yahoo! DSL - Now only $29.95 per month!
<http://sbc.yahoo.com>

|||||

a year ago, after numerous attempts to quit, James turned to a small but growing self-help organization called The Muckers Anonymous Inc. "My cravings went away and never returned," he says. "It was like someone with terminal cancer waking up one day to discover the disease was gone. It was remarkable."

There is, however, nothing remarkable about the Muckers' technique. According to a 52 year old recovered alcoholic named Jim who helped start the Toronto-based group in early 1995, the Muckers rely on intense study of the 57-year-old book Alcoholics Anonymous, known to A.A. adherents as the Big Book, and the Twelve Step approach outlined in the first 103 pages. Nevertheless, the group has become embroiled in a dispute with A.A. and several other self-help groups that resembles a battle between fundamentalists and mainstream Christians. Among other things, those groups say that the Muckers, so named because they frequently muck up the Big Book by underlining key passages and phrases, have a zealous approach to recovery from addiction that excludes anything but the twelve step method. "There's a huge backlash from the established groups," says James.

Last fall, A.A. representatives in Toronto removed the Muckers from their list of approved groups after discovering that their meetings covered various kinds of addictions, rather than just alcoholism. In May, A.A. ousted two members from elected positions as co-ordinators of treatment center meetings because they had been espousing the Muckers' philosophy. Representatives of A.A. are reluctant to comment on the Muckers or to discuss the relative merits of their approaches. "The Big Book hasn't changed," said Ron, a high-ranking official for eastern and central Ontario. "Its worked for almost sixty years."

Some treatment centers have also rejected the Muckers. Alpha House Inc., a rehabilitation facility treating various addictions, has instructed staff and residents to avoid the Muckers. "The bottom line is that Muckers seem to be obsessed with their way being the only way," stated a memo to employees. On the other hand, the Donwood Institute, a well established, Toronto recovery facility, has allowed the Muckers to hold weekly meetings, which Donwood clients can attend. "Some of them found it quite helpful," says Dennis James, vice-president of the Donwood health recovery program.

The Muckers contend that they are maintaining the original traditions of A.A. They charge that A.A. has drifted away from the Big Book and the 12-step approach that its founders, Bill Wilson, a New York City stockbroker, and Bob Smith, a physician from Ohio, developed in the mid-1930s to cope with their own alcoholism. According to the Muckers, many A.A. groups pay lip service to the sanctity of the Big Book but no longer insist that a recovering alcoholic must use it. "A.A.'s message has become broader and diluted," says John, a 35-year-old alcoholic, drug addict and staunch Mucker. "We stick to the original text."

The cornerstone of the Mucker approach is called "booking," in which a member of the group works one-on-one with a recovering alcoholic or addict. They spend up to three hours a day, usually over a two-to-three-week period, studying the Big Book, line by line and phrase by phrase. Among other things, the recovering addict must admit personal failings and weaknesses and make amends to people he has harmed through his addiction. Some Muckers who belonged to A.A. say they became disenchanted by that organization's move away from its original policy of one-on-one therapy in favour of personal or group study. And some longtime A.A. members confirm the trend. "You just don't see a lot of people going through the book one-on-one anymore," said Gord, who has belonged to A.A. for 35 years.

The Muckers have been booking about 100 people a month, according to Jim, and the fellowship now has about 2,000 members, almost all in the Toronto area. Some recently recovered addicts say they have experienced moments of profound spiritual contentment while being booked. "I had this sense of absolute peace," recalls Tory, a film-maker in his mid-30s who was battling alcoholism and heroin addiction. "I couldn't see anything or hear anything. It was almost like the first few seconds of a drug overdose." Since then, Tory says, he has not been tormented by his old cravings. And for that, he is both relieved and grateful.

D'Arcy Jenish

Source: Maclean's, October 21, 1996.

=====

+++Message 1132. ICYPAA history
From: erstwhile_erratic_aa 7/7/2003 5:22:00 PM

=====

I wanted to see if I can get some help here about ICYPAA's early history. Now while I would love to take the word of the many knowledgeable people here I will need proof of it if you can help me. Or perhaps a way to verify the information myself. As in, intergroups, flyers, etc., anything with written proof.

It seems that there is some confusion about the first six or so ICYPAA's and where the first young people's meeting started.

Current history and word of mouth says, the first ICYPAA was held in Niagara Falls in 1958. I have been told it was actually held in 1957. And that seems to affect the order and even location of the next 6 ICYPAA's. This past weekend in Portland, OR I attended the 46th ICYPAA, but was it actually the 47th? You can quickly see the reason for this post.

"Nothing at the moment, thank you," DeCarlo says, reaching for a water glass and draining it. She drinks two more glasses of water and waits for the food to arrive before ordering a good French pinot blanc. By the end of the night, she's had three glasses of wine; more than her usual two, but still within the limits of Moderation Management, the controlled-drinking self-help program she has followed for the past 16 months. A self-described problem drinker who used to pound down so much booze after a show she felt lousy the next morning, she had checked out Alcoholics Anonymous but was put off by the group's famous first step: "We admitted we were powerless over alcohol—that our lives had become unmanageable."

"If you choose to overdrink, you choose to overdrink and you know it," DeCarlo says. She was happily married; she had published two novels; she toured nationally. She didn't feel that her life was unmanageable, just that alcohol was taking up too much of it. Following Moderation Management guidelines, she quit drinking for 30 days and now takes no more than nine drinks a week, no more than three a day, and never drinks and drives. (The guideline's limit for men is 14 drinks a week, four on any given day.) "It's really a nice feeling to know I can have a drink and stop and feel fine the next day," she says. "It's made a tremendous difference. My life is too interesting to mess it up with a drinking problem."

DeCarlo's strategy is, depending on how you look at it, either the best hope for problem drinking in America or the most threatening form of self-delusion. She and other imbibers experimenting with controlled-drinking programs around the country have innocently stumbled into the most hotly contested issue in alcohol treatment: whether cutting back, as opposed to total abstinence, is an option for some people who drink too much.

Narrow path. There are 40 million problem drinkers in the United States—people whose drinking causes economic, physical, or family harm but who are not technically alcoholic (defined as being physiologically dependent on alcohol). But for the past six decades, beginning shortly after Prohibition was repealed in 1933, treatment for drinking problems in this country has focused almost exclusively on alcoholics, has offered abstinence as the sole cure for their problems, and has laid just two paths to that cure: Alcoholics Anonymous, the spiritual self-help group founded in 1935; and a variety of related 12-step programs, originally developed at the Hazelden Foundation and other Minnesota clinics in the 1950s, which combine psychological and peer counseling and AA attendance. (AA is the granddaddy of 12-step programs, but the two approaches are not synonymous. AA is a self-help group aimed at sobriety and spiritual renewal; 12-step alcohol-treatment programs adopt some of AA's tenets but include a wide array of secular treatments, from psychotherapy to acupuncture.)

A U.S. News reporter, querying a dozen treatment centers about her options as someone concerned about her drinking, was offered only abstinence-based programs. The Mayo Clinic told her she was welcome to try cutting back on her own and then to come back if she failed. At the Betty Ford center, a kindly woman answering the phone said, "For people like us, one drink always leads to another. You may be functional now, but it's progressive."

The problem with that advice is that for many people it's not true. For at least the past decade, researchers have known that the majority of people who drink heavily don't become alcoholics; some experts place that number as high as 75%. Other drinkers may meet the clinical criteria for alcohol dependence but can sustain controlled drinking for months, even years, before getting into trouble. And the majority of people who cut back or quit drinking do so on their own. Many of those people binge drank in their 20s at college parties, at after-work happy hours, or during Sunday afternoon football games, then got a good job, got married, got busy, and lost interest in getting smashed. In the researchers' lingo, they "matured out."

Moreover, alcoholism cannot be blamed for the majority of social ills linked to drinking in this country. Misuse of alcohol costs the nation dearly—$100 billion a year in quantifiable costs, in addition to untold emotional pain. Yet the bulk of those costs are incurred not by alcoholics but by problem drinkers, who are four times more numerous than alcoholics, are more active in society, and usually reject abstinence as a solution. Alcohol figures in 41 percent of traffic crash fatalities and is a factor in 50 percent of homicides, 30 percent of suicides, and 30 percent of accidental deaths. (Last week, a 20-year-old Louisiana State University student drank himself to death during fraternity pledge week; three other students were hospitalized.) Heavy drinking also increases the risk of cancer, heart disease, and stroke, long before people have to worry about cirrhosis of the liver, brain damage, or other skid-row ailments. A 1990 report by the Institute of Medicine, an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, concluded that the harmful consequences of alcohol could not be reduced significantly unless more options were offered to people with only "mild to moderate" alcohol problems.

Threats and firings. Public health experts recognized the social costs of alcohol abuse long ago and have responded with programs such as free soft drinks for designated drivers and free taxi rides home on New Year's Eve. But because of deeply held beliefs in the American alcohol-treatment community, this kind of pragmatic, public-health-centered approach has rarely been applied to individuals with drinking problems. Europe, Great Britain, and Australia long ago defined problem drinking as a public health concern and have established controlled-drinking programs to reduce its physical harm and social costs. Forty-three percent of Canadian treatment programs deem moderate drinking acceptable for some clients.

But in the United States, researchers and counselors who have championed—or even tried to investigate—moderation as a treatment strategy have been threatened, sometimes fired. "We've been accused of murder. That we're all in denial. That we're enablers," says Alan Marlatt, a professor of psychology and moderate-drinking proponent who is director of the University of Washington's Addictive Behaviors Research Center.

A big part of the problem is that it's hard to draw a clear line between alcohol dependency and problem drinking. According to a 1996 report by the University of Connecticut's Alcohol Research Center, 20 percent of American adults are problem drinkers, compared with 5 percent who are alcohol dependent. The National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, using much stricter criteria, puts the numbers at 3 percent alcohol abusers, 1.7 percent alcohol dependents, and 2.7 percent drinkers who exhibit characteristics of both. (Discrepancies in alcohol statistics abound.)

Briefly put, problem drinkers are people who have had problems because of drinking (a DUI arrest, marital discord, showing up late to work). But they usually don't drink steadily and don't go through withdrawal when they stop. By contrast, someone who is alcohol dependent (the medically preferred term for alcoholic) exhibits at least three of the following symptoms: tolerance, withdrawal; an inability to cut down; sacrificing work, family or social events to drink; devoting a lot of time to finding and consuming alcohol; or persistence in drinking despite related health problems.

Even so, the distinctions leave plenty of diagnostic wiggle room. The medical-and alcohol-treatment communities in the United States have dealt with this ambiguity by applying to all drinkers the advice appropriate for the most severe afflicted: abstinence. Any other strategy, they feel, is too risky. "Every alcoholic would like to drink moderately," says Douglas Talbot, a physician and president of the American Society of Addiction Medicine. "Ninety percent have tried. This just feeds into the denial of the alcoholic."

Moderate-drinking proponents concede that some alcoholics will seize upon controlled drinking as an excuse to avoid abstinence. But they say that they explicitly warn that the strategy is not for alcoholics, only for people with less severe drinking problems; that tests can evaluate the intensity of difficulties; and that they regularly refer dependent drinkers to AA. Controlled drinking, says Marc Kern, a Los Angeles psychologist, can "reduce harm" by reducing alcohol consumption" and can propel people who fail at moderation into abstinence.

Medical or moral? America's ambivalence toward alcohol is long standing. In the early days of the republic, we were a nation of lushes. Per capita consumption of alcohol was three times today's. The first temperance effort, led by Philadelphia physician Benjamin Rush in the 1780s, prescribed moderation: Rush urges people to switch from rum and gin to the more salubrious beer and wine.

Temperance soon moved from the doctor's office to the church. In 1826, the Rev. Lyman Beecher galvanized the movement with his Six Sermons on Intemperance, which hold that alcohol was a poison and that abstinence was the only answer. "This is the way to death!" Beecher said of the drinking life. Ever since, the nature of alcohol abuse has been debated, the arguments often mixing the medical and the moral. Is it a bad habit, a matter of will, or a disease?

The medical model that has dominated alcohol treatment for more than a half century holds that alcohol dependence is an ailment with biological and genetic roots. Recent research suggests there is a genetic predisposition toward alcoholism; identical twins, for instance, are more apt to share a drinking problem than fraternal twins, and adopted children whose birth parents were alcoholics are four times likelier than children adopted from nonalcoholic homes to become alcohol dependent. This disease approach is challenged by behaviorists, the primary advocates of controlled drinking, who say alcohol abuse is a behavior influenced by psychological, cultural, and environmental forces, not just physiology.

Science has yet to come up with enough information to resolve the disease vs. behavior argument. Odds are that alcohol abuse will prove to be a combination of both, the behavioral factors dominating in problem drinkers and biological factors weighing more heavily in people who are physically addicted. But in the meantime, the disease and behavior camps have been warring as if the evidence were absolute. A 1976 Rand report saying that a very small number of alcoholics successfully moderate their drinking was fiercely attacked. "It was like desecrating the alter," says Frederick Glasser, a psychiatrist at East Carolina University School of Medicine in Greenville, N.C., who was a researcher at the time. Mark and Linda Sobell, two psychologists who in the 1970s published similar findings, were accused of faking their results and were hauled up before a congressional committee. The Sobells were later vindicated.

Just say whoa! Though most people in the mainstream treatment community hold tightly to the disease concept of alcoholism, the treatment they offer is based on a combination of folklore and personal experience rather than on science. As Robin Room, a Canadian sociologist who is critical of American alcohol treatment, asks: "What kind of field is it that claims [alcoholism is] a disease, but the treatment is nonmedical?" Enoch Gordis, director of the NIAAA, wrote in 1987 of the nation's $3.8 billion alcohol-treatment effort: "In the case of alcoholism, our whole treatment system is founded on hunch, not evidence, and not on science."

A decade later, quality still varies widely, and anyone seeking solid data on what treatments work best is justified in feeling confused. In a comprehensive 1995 review of the effectiveness of treatment programs, New Mexico psychologists Reid Hester and William Miller concluded that, even for people with severe drinking problems, behavioral treatments (such as brief interventions, contracts governing drinkers' conduct, and coping-skills training) worked significantly better than the fare routinely offered by 12-step programs: group psycho-therapy, educational lectures, confrontational counseling, and referral to AA. The gap between those treatments shown to be effective and those that are widely used, they found, "Could hardly be larger if one intentionally constructed treatment programs from those approaches with the least evidence of efficacy." But the researchers cautioned that their analysis was a "first approximation," because the quality of the studies surveyed was uneven.

Not for everyone. Analyzing the effectiveness of Alcoholics Anonymous is even more difficult because of the nature of the organization. The self-help group keeps no membership records and does not participate in research. "We're not treatment," says Valerie O., an AA member who answered the phone in the group's New York office. "We just sit there and tell our stories to anyone who asks." Only three trials of AA's effectiveness have been performed, and all three used drunk drivers and others forced to attend the program, which violates the group's creed of voluntary membership. None of these trials rated AA as more effective than alternatives. In a 1990 survey, 65 percent of AA members said they had been sober for a year or more; the survey also found that the majority of people who start AA drop out within a year. When AA works, it works extraordinarily well: The testimonies of lives saved by AA are legion. But it's not for everyone.

Because alcohol treatment is so unscientific, some of the most basic and effective standards of care are ignored. Instead of adhering to the stepped-care protocol employed in other areas of medicine—where the least invasive treatment is used first—alcohol treatment starts with its most drastic remedy: lifetime abstinence, meetings, and, until recently, a 28-day residential stay in a substance-abuse clinic. As a result, many people who need help don't seek it. Others try AA but feel it doesn't meet their needs.

That's what happened to Moderation Management founder Audry Kishline. In her 20s, she was drinking five or six glasses of wine a night, drinking alone, drinking and driving. Diagnosed as an alcoholic, she was sent to detoxification, to residential treatment, and to AA. But Kishline didn't feel she had been alcohol dependent: She had no withdrawal symptoms, and she found it easy to abstain for months. She started researching alcohol treatment, and was outraged to find that alternatives common in Europe were never even mentioned here. "the public's not getting the full story," Kishline says. Now 40, married and raising two children, she occasionally has a glass of wine with dinner. Had she initially been offered less drastic treatment, Kishline believes, she would have reached this point of temperance years sooner.

Other veterans of the treatment system object to AA's explicitly spiritual focus, a reliance on God or a "higher power" that permeates many 12-step programs as well. Last year, the New York State Court of Appeals ruled that prisoners are constitutionally protected from being forced to participate in AA because of its religious orientation. Similar rulings have been made in California and other states. And several abstinence-based self-help groups, including Rational Recovery, Secular Organizations for Sobriety, and SMART Recovery Self-Help Network, have been founded by people critical either of AA's spiritual focus or the belief that they are powerless against alcohol.

Changing times. Gradually, however, the alcohol-treatment portfolio is diversifying. After expanding wildly in the 1970s and 1980s, residential 12-step programs are falling on hard times: Insurers and employers pressed by rising health care costs, find little benefit to justify the programs' considerable expense and are seeking cheaper, less intensive alternatives. Alcohol-treatment research is moving slowly toward a more scientific, empirically based approach. And a national trend away from heavy drinking-alcohol consumption has fallen by 15 percent since 1980, parallel declines in smoking and illegal drug use-makes it, oddly enough, more acceptable to treat those with only mild alcohol problems, not just Days of Wine and Roses - style luses.

Wisconsin offers a sense of what the future may hold. It is a big drinking state; 25 percent of its residents say they binge drink. "Every little town has a church and a bar," says Michael Fleming, a University of Wisconsin Medical School family physician. "Most of the patients in my practice drinking six drinks a day are not alcoholics. But if we can get them to cut down from six drinks to two, from a public-health perspective you've made a huge impact."

In April, Fleming published the first large U.S. study of brief interventions for problem drinkers in the Journal of the American Medical Association. The study, patterned on research over the past 20 years in Great Britain and Sweden, selected 774 problem drinkers from patients at 17 Wisconsin clinics. Half the patients met for 2 15-minute sessions, one month apart, with their physicians, discussed their current health behavior and the effects of alcohol, and signed a prescription-like drinking contract. A year later, the men had reduced their alcohol use by 14 percent; the women by 30 percent. (women are usually more successful than men at moderating.) The control group also reduced its drinking, but the brief intervention group was twice as likely to reduce it by 20 percent or more.

Other promising research is coming from Seattle, where University of Washington psychologist Marlatt is working with a notoriously immoderate population-college students. For the past seven years, he has followed 350 students who were identified while still in high school as high-risk drinkers. A year after half the students were given a one-hour, one-on-one educational session in their freshman year, 80 percent had reduced binge drinking substantially. Those who didn't were given more education and counseling with the intensity escalating each year. "It's a harm-reduction approach," Marlatt says, using a phrase more often applied to needle exchanges and other drug-abuse programs. "With young people, if you only offer abstinence, they're not going to sign up."

history.

ICYPAA archives

are just that...they are ICYPAA's. If they give something to GSO Archives they become the property of GSO.

Thanks,

Tom H.

-----Original

Message-----

From: J. Lobdell

[mailto:jlobdell54@hotmail.com]

Sent: Tuesday, July 08, 2003 8:11

AM

To:

AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers]

ICYPAA history

ICYPAA has an

Archivist and maintains full archives. I have been informed by ICYPAA that, for reasons presumably having to do with Bill W., the Archives at GSO has some kind of cooperative arrangement with the ICYPAA Archives -- at the very least you ought to be able to get an address. You should note, however (again as I have been told by ICYPAA), that other "-CYPAA's" are not subsidiaries of ICYPAA, which means that Australian or Great Lakes or New England "CYPAA" records may exist only locally or may not exist formally at all. -- Jared

>From:

"John Reid"

>Reply-To:

AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

>To: ,

>CC:

"QYPAA Planning Committee" , "Len

Steele" , "Trevor

Duffy" , "Lewis Shoard" , "CSO

Brisbane" ,,

>Subject:

Re: [AAHistoryLovers] ICYPAA history

>Date:

Tue, 8 Jul 2003 12:00:28 +1000

>

>Dear Tom

H,

>First

Convention of Young People in AA, in Australia was held in Newcastle

>NSW,

1979/80, then the Fedreal Capital, Canberra ACT; then Sydney NSW in the >following years. Some of the above can provide more details on when the name

>(if not the intent) was "changed" and the current history of young peoples >involvement

in AA in Australia. Kind Regards, John R.

>-----

Original Message -----

>From:

"erstwhile_erratic_aa"

>To:

>Sent:

Tuesday, July 08, 2003 8:22 AM

>Subject:

[AAHistoryLovers] ICYPAA history

>

>

>> I

wanted to see if I can get some help here about ICYPAA's early history. Now while I would love to take the word of the many knowledgeable people here I will need proof of it if you can help >> me.

>>

>>

Or perhaps a way to verify the information myself. As in, intergroups, flyers, etc., anything with written proof.

>>

>>

>> It seems that there is some confusion about the first six or so

>>

ICYPAA's and where the first young people's meeting started.

>>

>>

Current history and word of mouth says, the first ICYPAA was held in

>>

Niagara Falls in 1958. I have been told it was actually held in 1957. And that seems to affect the order and even location of the >> next

>>

6 ICYPAA's. This past weekend in Portland, OR I attended the

>>

46th ICYPAA, but was it actually the 47th? You can quickly see the reason for this post.

>>

>>

>>

Also, it seems the first young peoples groups started forming in 1945 with Los Angeles, Cleveland and Philadelphia receiving credit. But I have also been told (and once had a link to verify, now lost) that

>>

>>

>> the first young people's group appeared in Cleveland.

>>

>> It

would be wonderful to clarify and confirm the early history of

>>

ICYPAA. Thanks in advance for your help.

>>

>> Tom

H.

>>

>>

>>

>> To

unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:

>>

AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

>>

>>

>>

>>

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to <http://docs.yahoo.com/info/terms/>

>>

>>

>

>

>-----
Yahoo! Groups Sponsor ----->

>Get A Free Psychic Reading! Your Online Answer To Life's Important Questions.

><http://us.click.yahoo.com/Lj3uPC/Me7FAA/ySSF/AA/219olB/TM>

>----->

>

>To
unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:

>AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

>

>

>

>Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to <http://docs.yahoo.com/info/terms/>

>

>

Protect your PC - Click here [1] for McAfee.com VirusScan Online

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
"Courier New";color:black;">

AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to the Yahoo!

Terms of Service [2] .

The birth date is 1881 on the gravestone, though the shot in Dr Bob and the Good Old Timers doesn't show it well. Dick B. has the full date as June 3, 1881. -- Jared

>From: "Arthur Sheehan"
>Reply-To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
>To: "AA History Lovers"
>Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Fw: Anne Ripley Smith's Birth Year
>Date: Tue, 8 Jul 2003 14:41:25 -0500

>
>Hi Nancy - I tried posting this last week. Would like to try again - Cheers
>- Arthur

>----- Original Message -----

>From: Arthur Sheehan
>To: AA History Lovers
>Sent: Thursday, July 03, 2003 1:15 PM
>Subject: Anne Ripley Smith's Birth Year

>

>

>Hi All

>

>Anne Ripley Smith was born in the Chicago suburb of Oak Park, IL to Joseph & Joyce Pierce Ripley.

>

>Her birth month and day are reported as March 21.

>

>However, I cannot accurately pin down her birth year.

>

>Several books cite her birth year as 1891 but that appears erroneous and way off the mark.

>

>Several books also cite Dr. Bob and Anne as first meeting in 1898.

>

>Anne was a Wellesley student and Bob was getting ready to enter Dartmouth.

>

>Her cited birth year would put Anne as 8 years old when she and Bob first met.

>

>My guesstimate is that Anne's birth date is March 21, 1879 (the same year as Dr Bob or maybe 1878).

>

>Can anyone confirm or correct with a citation to a written reference source?

>

>Cheers

>

>Arthur

- 6) Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
- 7) Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
- 8) Made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all.
- 9) Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
- 10) Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
- 11) Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.
- 12) Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

THE HUMANIST ALTERNATIVE

- 1) We accept the fact that all our efforts to stop drinking have failed.
- 2) We believe that we must turn elsewhere for help.
- 3) We turn to our fellow men and women, particularly those who have struggled with the same problem.
- 4) We have made a list of the situations in which we are most likely to drink.
- 5) We ask our friends to help us avoid these situations.
- 6) We are ready to accept the help they give us.
- 7) We earnestly hope that they will help.
- 8) We have made a list of the persons we have harmed and to whom we hope to make amends.
- 9) We shall do all we can to make amends, in any way that will not cause further harm.
- 10) We will continue to make such lists and revise them as needed.
- 11) We appreciate what our friends have done and are doing to help us.

I received this message recently and thought it worth passing on to you. I have since learned that Traynor got sober in Harrisburg, PA, September 26, 1946, and died Absecon NJ, July 5, 2003. He was sober 56 years 9 months and 9 days.

Like Bill, I heard the Chief speak in Harrisburg in April, but did not have a chance to meet him.

Nancy Olson

Moderator

billyk4@comcast.net

To: NMOlson@aol.com

A beloved figure who inspired the admiration of multitudes of children, he was the host of the popular Philadelphia area children's show (The Chief Halftown Show). He was 86.

Airing on a mostly local station from 1951 to 1999, the Chief followed a variety format and featured him in full Native American dress along with stories, cartoons, lessons about Native American heritage, dancing and talent contests for the young. He entertained and educated millions of baby boomers and later endeared himself to subsequent generations with his regular appearances at schools and churches. He was also a weekend fixture at a local amusement park for more than 30 years. He would set himself up next to a teepee and kids of all ages would go over to meet him and get his autograph. He was the Indian version of Mr. Rogers.

A member of the Seneca tribe in upstate NY, Halftown was born in Buffalo, NY, and grew up in Jamestown, NY.

Among his closest TV friends/personalities, were the likes of Sally Starr, Pete Boyle, Gene London, and Captain Noah, all, whom had their own shows. He and Sally Starr were to baby boomers as Sesame Street is to kids today.

Chief Halftown paved the way for modern children's programming that incorporates cultural awareness but preserves innocent teaching. ...

Excerpted from a local newspaper.

Personal Note:

In 1981, after telling my family doctor that I was very nervous all the time

Aren't the Twelve Steps just a substitute addiction? People seem to have to go to meetings all the time and use them like a drug.

Certainly people in early recovery go to a lot of meetings and they may even substitute the Twelve Steps addictively. That is not the program. That is the addict, the program works.

I have seen people go to Twelve-Step meetings and not get better. How do you explain that?

I have seen people go to therapy, hospitals, and to all kinds of places and not get better. "Getting better" is up to the person. The program is not magic. It is a way. We have to do it ourselves. We do not have to do it alone.

Also, while some people get somewhat better by attending meetings, there is a great deal of difference between attending meetings and working a program. I have never seen someone actually working a program who did not get more sober.

Recovery is hard and sobriety is fragile. Recovery does not happen all at once, nor is it linear. It is a process, not a happening. Addiction is more "normal" for our society. The disease is always there lurking to invite us back in. Fortunately our healthy being-our sober self, our spirituality-is always there too. We have but to do our footwork. It is only when we accept and work with the broader picture that we can effectively work with addictions.

The meetings do not seem very clear to me. How can I recover there?

Of course they seem unclear at times-they are meetings of addicts, for heaven's sake! The issue is to take from the meeting what there is for you and leave the rest. What one takes home is often more of an indication to one's willingness and openness rather than what is or is not happening at the meeting. Judgmentalism is a characteristic of the disease.

People who attend Twelve-Step meetings leave their families and their old friends and make the program and program people the center of their lives. There must be something wrong with that.

This is often true. Early in recovery, one needs the support of other recovering people and the wisdom and modeling of those who have a good sobriety and long years of recovery. After recovery is better established, recovering people are not willing to be around those who choose to stay with addiction, and would rather be around recovering people willing to do Twelve-Step work. This choice is not out of disease: It is made out of health and recovery.

meetings and belief in 12-Step programs have probably helped great numbers of people to overcome their harmful addictions to alcohol and other substances and to lead happier and emotionally healthier lives. But, alas, the same thing can be said when disturbed people devoutly follow various dubious groups and cults, such as those promoted by the Christian flagellants, the Moslem dervishes, the Hebrew cabalists, and the Catholic Inquisition. Literally millions of people have made themselves less anxious and depressed by swearing allegiance to extremist religious and political gurus-ranging from Rasputin and Adolf Hitler to Jim Jones and Tammy Baker-who dogmatically believed that they could save the world for their fervent followers.

The point is that none of these prophets had magical curative powers; nor did the sacred views that they passionately promulgated to hordes of gullible followers. But the faith of their adherents obviously helped these troubled people to change themselves and to give up all kinds of harmful addictions. Similarly, people's intense belief in a wide variety of implausible creeds and nostrums frequently help them change their dysfunctional thoughts, feelings, and actions. Witness, for example, the fervent testimonials that innumerable people keep giving for cults, superstitions, and hoaxes like astrology, shamanism, psychic surgery, fortune telling, channeling, witchcraft, communications from ghosts, satanism, and demonism.

We have considerable testimonial evidence, therefore, that AA and other 12-step programs help a good number of people. But we do not know whether the content of these programs leads to their presumed benefits or whether those benefits stem from a new belief system their adherents adopt. Furthermore, we do not know whether greater benefits would be derived from alternate self-help programs. Just as soon as we acknowledge the possible effectiveness of 12-step programs, we had better also recognize their serious failings and lapses.

First of all, AA is clearly a religious organization, in spite of its allegations that its group members need only pray and meditate "to improve our conscious contact with God as we understand Him." Steps 2,3,5,6,7,11, and 12 of its 12-step program explicitly endorse God with a capital G, advocate allegiance to a Higher Power (capitalized again!), or call for a "spiritual awakening." And the other five steps, though they include some sensible advice to help addicts, strongly hint that only dependency on some supernatural entities and on Christian-like salvation, atonement, and redemption will enable one to stop and continue to desist from drinking.

Clearly, then, AA groups are no haven for millions of secular humanists, agnostics, atheists, feminists, and other nonreligionists-nor for many religionists who see that humans can help themselves without relying on any higher powers. Because AA often zealously proselytizes for its endorsement of divine intervention, it turns off thousands-and quite possibly millions-of potential adherents who might profitably join a self-help group to combat their harmful addictions. Almost every psychotherapist and physician encounters many alcoholics who attended AA groups for a few sessions, only to be turned off by their religious and spiritual approach, and who fought vigorously against attending more meetings even though some court or medical authority insists that they do so.

To make matters worse, AA subscribes to many rules and cannons about alcoholism that are controversial, questionable, and sometimes iatrogenic. The 12-step programs strongly state or imply these dubious points:

- Alcoholism is unquestionably a disease and takes a single, invariant course which ends in total abstinence or death.
- Addicts can never stop their addictions outside of 12-step programs.
- Once "alcoholics: stop drinking, a single drink will lead to total relapse and send them to skid row.
- Problem drinkers need a higher power to quit drinking; if they are not theists, they can use anything (beauty, justice, an ashtray, a tree, etc.) as the power to which to turn over their lives.
- Addicts can only properly be treated by other recovering addicts.
- Children of "alcoholics," even as adults, are invariably disturbed and have to go through 12-step programs themselves in order to lead sensible, happy lives.
- Spouses and close relatives of alcoholics are "codependents" who must be indoctrinated with 12-step programs and materials.
- AA members, to stay off booze, must attend regular AA meetings practically forever.
- All effective programs for addicts must have strong religious or spiritual elements. Faith-not reason-must prevail in these programs.
- "Alcoholics" who refuse to keep coming to AA meetings or who disagree with the 12-step program are seriously disturbed deniers.
- Addicts can overcome their emotional disturbances with AA meetings instead of with psychotherapy.
- "Alcoholics" never really recover from their addiction; they remain "recovering" addicts for the rest of their lives.
- "Alcoholics" who no longer drink but are still anxious, depressed, or manic are "drydrunks" who need still more 12-step treatment rather than psychotherapy.

- The use of psychotropic medication by addicts is wrong and almost certainly leads to readdiction.
- Endless cathartic confession at AA meetings is the best form of treatment for alcoholism.

While AA subscribes to a number of questionable ideas, it has many good points and has served hundreds of thousands of problem drinkers very well since it was founded in 1935. Many of its tenets and practices are quite sensible and practical and overlap with the rational-emotive therapy concepts that are used by Rational Recovery. Thus, like RET, AA includes the following rational ideas:

- It sometimes looks for and tries to combat compulsive drinkers' dysfunctional beliefs.
- It uses many educational and bibliotherapy procedures.
- It advocates some nondisturbing beliefs, such as "Make plans but don't think that you have to plan the results and have to achieve them."
- It uses many coping statements, such as "Live and let live."
- It follows many self-help procedures and urges active homework.
- It emphasizes the serenity prayer of Reinhold Niebuhr: "Give me the courage what I can change, the serenity to accept what I cannot change, and the wisdom to know the difference." Whereas RET, however, uses this as a philosophy and not as a prayer, AA uses it as an appeal to God.
- It believes that most conventional "past-oriented" therapies do not help people to stop drinking and maintain abstinence and that new thinking and changed behavior can aid these goals.

As can be seen, AA has many good (we could even say rational) philosophies and procedures. It never meant to coerce members and participants. Many of its limitations follow what humans do when their ideology is founded on religious faith-not on reality and experimentation-and is taken to devout extremes.

On both religious and nonreligious grounds, AA and other 12-step programs have limited value and sometimes, because of their devout orientations, can be said to lead to addiction to the 12-step process itself. So, despite its distinct advantages (and despite the likelihood that some substance abusers would not have stopped their addictions without its help), AA has distinct limitations. Consequently, several non-higher power groups have been established during the 1980s which serve as alternatives to AA. These include, in addition to Rational Recovery, the Secular Organizations for Sobriety, Methods of Moderation, and Men and Women for Sobriety.

As might be expected, I favor Rational Recovery because it is the only self-help group that not only has no religious or spiritual orientation but also solidly links its program to rational-emotive therapy and cognitive-behavior therapy. RR groups are educational rather than therapy groups and, although members pay no fees, each group tries to be closely connected with a professional consultant who is trained in RET. The consultant or advisor need not have a history of addiction or attend every single RR meeting. He or she tries to help the group members learn the basic principles and practices of RET and to apply them to disputing the irrational beliefs that were instrumental in driving them to drink and in blocking their achievement of sobriety.

RR holds that, although problem drinking and substance abuse have many biological and social origins, much of the thinking of "alcoholics" follows the famous ABCs of RET and CBT. According to RET theory, many (not all) problem drinkers first tend to bring about dysfunctional consequences (Cs), such as anxiety and depression, when unfortunate activating events or adversities (As) occur in their lives. They do this mainly by constructing irrational or self-defeating beliefs (Bs). Second, they then tend to construct additional irrational beliefs (iBs) about their feelings of depression and anxiety-especially "I must not be anxious! I can't stand this anxiety!"- and consequently take to drinking in order to allay their pain. Third, problem drinkers often take their secondary consequence-"alcoholism"- and create more irrational beliefs about that, such as "I must not be an alcoholic. What a worm I am for drinking too much!" This creates a tertiary consequence-self-damnation-that frequently drives them to drink even more. Also, because of their self-castigation for being addicted, problem drinkers frequently minimize their serious drinking problems and resort to many rationalizations and denials about their drinking.

In the course of RR meetings, the ABCs of alcoholism and its related emotional and behavioral disturbances are discussed and the RET techniques of actively, forcefully disputing (D) the members' dysfunctional beliefs are taught and practiced. Jack Trimpey's Rational Recovery from Alcoholism: The Small Book and other RET-oriented self-help books, pamphlets, cassettes, and materials are steadily used, examined, and applied to the members' addiction and to their other problems. A number of cognitive, emotive and behavioral techniques of RET are practiced, with the goal of showing the participants how to think, feel, and act more appropriately and to achieve their personal goals. Members are thereby helped preferably to make a profound philosophic change that will promote their continued sobriety and minimize their general disturbance. Ideally, they will become significantly less disturbable and, after being in RR for a while-though hardly forever!-will often prevent themselves from emotionally upsetting themselves in the future.

Rational Recovery, as can be seen, is more of a self-help than a support group and in this respect is much closer to Recovery Inc., than it is to AA. It differs from AAA in several other important aspects:

- It doesn't endorse the disease concept of "alcoholism."
- It sees its members' participation in RR as time-limited and discourages their perpetual dependence on RR meetings.
- It recommends lifetime abstinence when there have been repeated failures to exercise moderation but recognizes that some problem drinkers can and do learn to drink moderately and responsibly.
- It accepts the treatment of addicts by counselors and therapists who have never themselves been addicted.
- It doesn't see all children of alcoholics as emotionally disturbed, nor all their close relatives as disturbed codependents. Instead of Codependents Anonymous groups, it soon will sponsor generic self-help groups where members learn how to stop being too dependent upon anyone or anything, including RR meetings.
- It has no objection to its members using a religious or spiritual orientation to help themselves with their addiction and other problems, but it takes a completely pro-choice attitude and holds that problem drinkers do not need any support from a higher power and that they clearly have the ability to change themselves without any spiritual support. It encourages them to rely on their own capacities to make meaningful, existential, and philosophic alterations in their lives-and if they want to invoke gods or spiritual forces in the process, that is their prerogative rather than their necessitude.
- It recommends some form of intensive individual or group psychotherapy-especially RET or some other mode of cognitive-behavior therapy-as a highly important part of the anti-addictive process and encourages its members to explore and change the feelings and behaviors that led to their addiction and that keep them at risk for relapses.
- It recognizes that problem drinking and the emotional disturbances that frequently accompany it often have biochemical and biological, as well as psychological and social, aspects, and it therefore often encourages the combined use of psychotherapy and medication to help addicted persons.

Rational recovery is opposed to the one-party system for helping problem drinkers-meaning AA and its higher power indoctrination-and strongly favors a democratic multiparty system that may well include AA plus other anti-addiction groups which aim to provide a meeting ground for people who want nothing to do with any kind of higher power and who want to rely on themselves and other humans to achieve and maintain sobriety. RR particularly opposes the unconstitutional stand of many courts and public agencies that now force alcoholics to join religiously oriented 12-step programs and dictatorially give them no nonreligious choice.

RR, unlike AA, welcomes research on the effectiveness of self-help groups, including RR itself, in helping addicts stop their substance abuse and stay stopped and is therefore cooperating in studies to evaluate its therapeutic results-studies such as are now in progress at the Harvard University Medical School and the New York University Medical School.

Following the theory of RET, RR teaches its participants unconditional acceptance of themselves and others and shows them how to evaluate their thoughts, feelings, and actions, but not to measure or devalue their self or personhood.

Rational Recovery-and the other addiction recovery groups that are without any religious or spiritual tenets-are by no means the only answer to the problem of helping people to overcome their serious addictions. The 12-step programs obviously have some excellent results and are not likely, in the near future, to go out of business. But as RR continues to grow and to serve large numbers of participants, it will be valuable to discover just how effective an anti-addictional program is that places no emphasis on a higher power and that attempts to incorporate in its self-help procedures specific rational-emotive and cognitive-behavioral therapeutic methods.

Here's a selection of material that you might find helpful:

- The Essential Albert Ellis by Windy Dryden (New York: Springer Publishing Company, 1990).
- The Practice of Rational-Emotive Therapy by Albert Ellis and Windy Dryden (New York: Springer Publishing Company, 1987).
- Rational-Emotive Therapy with Alcoholics and Substance Abusers by Albert Ellis, John McInerney et al. (New York:Pergamon, 1988).
- "Divine Intervention and the Treatment of Chemical Dependency," by Albert Ellis and Eugene Schoenfeld, Journal of Substance Abuse (1990) 2:459-468.
- When AA Doesn't Work For You: A rational Guide for Quitting Alcohol by Albert Ellis and Emmett Velten (New York: Barricade Books).
- The Truth About Addiction and Recovery by Stanton Peele and Archie been tried before, although with very little success. We are not seeking pioneer credit in writing this letter, but rather, constructive criticism. We hope to hear from other groups throughout the country, giving us the benefit of your experience with young people and with such organizations as ours if they have been attempted.

We were slow in getting started with our group and we are still proceeding with caution since it is apparent that our abilities lie more in the realm of prevention than in cure. Most young people have not been hurt badly enough or often enough, so they think, to feel that they are in any need of what we in A.A. have to offer.

It is feared that for this reason we will experience more than a normal number of relapses, and that our progress will of necessity be slow. However, many of our later members have admitted that had it not been for this young group they would not have stuck to A.A. So, we are doing some good.

Let's hear from other groups. We would like your suggestions, advice, criticism and opinions on what we are trying to do.--B.D.Mc.

also:
April 1948, Grapevine -- Pittsburgh Young People's Group listed in 'New Groups' Column

Apologies to Nancy about including links below
... just don't see a need to re post the following

Additional Info on Young People's Groups

Several good posts in archives of AAHistoryLovers
<http://groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/messages>

begin some serious 12-stepping?

You'd think so. Twelve -step recovery programs have been sweeping the nation, and an estimated 15 million to 45 million of us now participate in them. Book on codependency top best-seller lists, and in April, a cable station all about recovery, the Recovery Network, began airing two hours a day and already reports to have 15 million viewers. Even President Clinton and Vice President Al Gore use recovery lingo in some of their speeches.

It all began in 1935, when stockbroker Bill Wilson, struggling to stay sober, sought help from a fellow drinker. Wilson found that the mutual support, mixed with spirituality, was effective in keeping him sober, and he went on to write Alcoholics Anonymous (aka "The Book") which spells out the 12-step program he created.

In many ways, The Book shaped our current views of addiction by pointing out that, whether physical or psychological, it is not a contemptible moral defect; it's the product of a tragic, incurable disease. The best alcoholics can hope for is remission, which only comes with abstinence, because even a sip can trigger craving and abuse.

According to 12-step philosophy, you must get support by attending meetings with other recovering addicts for the rest of your life. The meetings are free and enforce anonymity, in part to encourage honesty: Hence the famous introduction, "Hi, my name is (first names only) and I'm an alcoholic."

A.A. Meets the '90s

By the late 1950s, applications of the 12-step model had spread from chemical dependency to compulsive behaviors (Gamblers Anonymous in 1957 and Overeaters Anonymous in 1960, for example). But in the past decade, the term addiction has ballooned to mean any activity or emotion we feel powerless to control: work, sex, shopping, love, moods, you name it. At the same time, "codependent" has expanded from its original meaning - family members of alcoholics only - to include anyone involved in, or dependent on, any unhealthy relationship, regardless of whether alcohol is involved. By the new definitions, it seems that nearly everyone suffers from or is affected by, some sort of addiction.

Today, 12-step philosophy is pervasive. Many therapists refer patients to such programs, and courts often order convicted drunken drivers to attend A.A. Millions who struggle with destructive behavior have found healing in the 12 steps. "Try it," says Laura, a thirteen-year member of Emotions Anonymous. "If you don't like it, we'll refund your misery."

But There's a Plot Twist

New research is starting to cool the 12-step fervor. A recent study by the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism indicates that A.A. is no more successful in curbing alcoholism than behavioral or motivational psychotherapy treatments. Other studies suggest that A.A.'s strict insistence on abstinence sometimes backfires.

According to Reid Hester, Ph.D. director of division of the research Behavior Therapy Associates in Albuquerque, N.M., ex-drinkers who equate "one slip" with "relapse" end up bingeing more often than those who are more tolerant of their lapses. In fact, European alcoholic treatment programs generally encourage moderation rather than abstinence.

When it comes to drugs, studies have begun to challenge the assumption that one hit of an addictive substance begins a lifelong downhill spiral of dependency that only 12-step or professional intervention can control. Most of the soldiers addicted to heroin during the Vietnam War got over their addiction simply as a result of returning home. Of those who used heroin on their return, only 12 percent became addicted again. What's more, research suggests that by age 35, most substance abusers "mature out" of the abuse and become moderate users or abstainers, without intervention.

Critics also are concerned about the psychological impact of the 12-step philosophy. Addiction often is symptom of other problems, and fellow sufferers, while often offering precious support, don't have the training to treat such problems, says Stan J. Katz, M.D., and Aimee E. Liu in their book The Codependency Conspiracy: How to Break the Recovery Habit and take Charge of Your Life (Warner, 1991). In addition, the authors point out that we can become hooked on the recovery programs themselves, substituting one addiction for another.

The recent codependency craze also troubles some experts. Several codependency theorists contend that the modern family is dysfunctional, leaving more than 95 percent of us with a starved "inner child" and a personality primed for dependency. Many argue that the terms codependent and dysfunctional become meaningless when they include so many of us, and this viewpoint encourages us to perceive ourselves as victimized or diseased.

In fact, 12-step thinking may lead us to interpret potentially harmful behavior - like drinking a glass of wine every night - as an addiction. Some experts believe this label is counterproductive at best. Stanton Peele, Ph.D., author of Diseasing of America: Addiction Treatment out of Control (Lexington, Books, 1989), suggests that the A.A. message is dangerous because it implies that we don't have the willpower to change without help from others.

Happily Ever After

Culturally, 12-stepping may fill a deep need. "It's really a religious movement," says Harry Levine, Ph.D., professor of sociology at Queen's beings. In religion, belief may be more highly valued than a direct experience of a Divine Presence. With spirituality it is just the opposite. The direct experience and relationship with a Higher Power are primary, and belief systems are secondary, or may even be considered an impediment, to developing the relationship. The Big Book, Alcoholics Anonymous, states that to make use of spiritual principles one need accept nothing on faith but only ask, "Do I now believe, or am I even willing to believe, that there is a power greater than myself?" Only this provisional belief is required to open the door to a radical shift in experience.

In addition to the confusion between spirituality and religion, there is another aspect to the resistance to the possibility of God. Western society is heir to the Freudian or naturalistic mind-set that maintains that if it can't be measured or analyzed it doesn't exist. Until 12 years ago, I was convinced that all spiritual experiences were illusions reflective of an underlying neurosis, and until five years ago, never having read Carl Jung, I was convinced that he was a woolly-headed mystic who was out of touch with reality. My experience since then has persuasively demonstrated to me a reality that I once thought was just wishful thinking, and my prior presuppositions have been called into question.

It's as if they divorced-Freud getting custody of the neuroses, Jung getting custody of spirituality and its application to the addictions-and there has been a family split ever since. Freud's heroic stoicism in the face of the suffering associated with his cancer, his attitude that "my head is bloody, but unbowed...I am the master of my soul," is simply inappropriate for the addicted person whose task is to stop attempting to control by exerting willpower and open up the discovery of a Higher Power. An alcoholic has to give up willfulness in favor of willingness.

Many alcoholics are sure that if they just change their thinking or act differently, they will be able to control their drinking. Initially they are often profoundly repelled by the "God stuff." Similarly, many therapists don't understand why conventional therapeutic techniques are not enough to resolve a serious drinking problem, and, after trying to apply such conventional approaches, will dismiss the alcoholic or family as "Unmotivated," not realizing that the task of recovery is to discover a new way of being that is not based upon conventional motivation or willpower.

Alcoholics Anonymous is ingeniously arranged to generate what might be called a planned spontaneous remission. One does not know when it will occur, but one knows that it will occur if the drinker participates in the AA program.

AA is designed so that a person can stop drinking by either education, therapeutic change, or transformation. A small percentage of people who attend AA may be able to stop just by hearing the information presented about alcoholism as a disease. The majority will go through a second-order change similar to changes brought about in therapy. They bond to the group and use it as a social support and a refuge to explore and release their suppressed and repressed feelings. AA serves them as a "protective wall of human community." A distinct minority will have a full-fledged transformative shift or "real religious insight."

Our world had become polarized between a doubting, self-willed secular humanism and a dogmatic, repressive fundamentalism. This century has been marked by erratic oscillations between fragmented individualism and totalitarian collectivism. What Buber called the genuine third alternative, the context of I-Thou relationships, or the "between," has been almost totally occluded in our time. Recovery from life-threatening addiction may be necessary to see that there is a reality that cannot be reduced to individual fantasy or to collective dogma.

The AA book Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions states: "Everywhere...people [are] filled with anger and fear, society breaking up into warring fragments. Each fragment says to the others, 'We are right and you are wrong.' Every such pressure group, if it is strong enough, self-righteously imposes its will upon the rest....Therefore, we who are alcoholics can consider ourselves fortunate indeed. Each of us has had his own near-fatal encounter with the juggernaut of self-will, and has suffered long enough under its weight to be willing to look for something better. So it is by circumstances rather than by any virtue that we have been driven to AA, have admitted defeat, have acquired the rudiments of faith, and now want to make a decision to turn our will and our lives over to a Higher Power."

"Turning our will and our lives over to a "Higher Power" needn't inspire visions of the abdication of responsibility, of religious cults, or Jonestown. If we look more deeply, we can see that Alcoholics Anonymous is perhaps unique among organizations in our culture in that it has been able to tap into the human thirst for oneness and belonging, while respecting individual dignity and avoiding coercive tactics, exploiting its members, or relying upon external support. Surrender by AA members to a Higher Power, in fact, consistently leads to expanded, not diminished, responsibility for self and others. AA serves as proof that it is possible to surrender to a Higher Power without giving one's individual power away.

-David Berenson

-Family Therapy Networker

Excerpted with permission from The Family Therapy Networker (July/Aug. 1987). Subscriptions: $20/yr. (6 issues) from The Family Therapy Networker, 8528 Bradford Rd., Silver Springs, MD 20901. Back issues $4 from same address.

Source: Utne Reader (4) Nov.-Dec.-1988 volunteered for the Army as an officer candidate. One night, Second Lieutenant Wilson attended a party in New Bedford, Massachusetts, and took what several biographers say was his first serious adult drink. Suddenly, magically, he felt release from the tensions that had plagued him for so long. Recalling the moment years later, he made it sound like a religious experience: "Lo, the miracle!..I belonged to the universe; I was a part of things at last."

Bill Wilson got plastered that night and soon began indulging in drinking bouts that ended with vomiting and passing out. However, Wilson's Army buddies didn't worry much about his boozefests. Nor did his fiancée Lois Burnham who felt confident that after their marriage she could transform him into a teetotaler once again. They wed in early 1918, but Bill kept drinking. In July, he sailed for Europe, where he performed well as an Army officer in World War I while discovering the joys of French wine. After the war, back in the States, he earned good money in several Wall Street investment jobs and, after work each day, made the rounds of speakeasies, searching for that elusive feeling of exhilaration.

He knew he had a drinking problem. He tried to quit many times. In those days, alcoholism was seen as a weakness and a disgrace rather than a disease, and the accepted wisdom was that the people could stop drinking if they summoned adequate willpower. ON Christmas Day in 1923, Bill promised Lois "no liquor will pass my lips for one year," but this pledge, like many others he made, was quickly broken.

Wilson's troubles deepened in autumn 1929 when the stock market crashed and the nation entered a depression. As his income shrank, his ego took a beating and his drinking increased. As a result, he lost his job, spent days in booze-induced blackouts, got into fights, and hid at home in frightened seclusion with a bottle of gin. By late 1934 he was scraping the bottom of the emotional barrel.

A complex series of events would follow-and gradually help him find a way out of his misery.

The first came in November 1934, when a man named Ebby Thatcher visited Bill at the Wilson residence in Brooklyn, New York. Ebby and Bill were old drinking buddies; Bill offered his visitor a snort, and was stunned at Ebby's reply: "No, thanks, I don't want any." Ebby, it turned out, had found religion, was sober, and was interested in helping Bill get sober too. Wilson was leery, but Ebby's visit showed him the value of one alcoholic talking to another about recovery and gave him a sliver of solace and hope.

In December, hospitalized after a bender, Wilson prayed. To his amazement, an intense spiritual experience followed: A "great white light" spread through his room and a feeling of peace came upon him. Some observers dismiss this as the result of toxic psychosis, but regardless of the medical explanation, something important happened.

A short while later, still hospitalized, Wilson read The Varieties of Religious Experience, a 1902 book by philosopher and psychologist William James. Wilson concluded that a spiritual experience did not necessarily have to come from traditional religious channels; one could still embrace it and use it to generate robust change in one's life.

Another influence in the evolution of Wilson's thinking was the Oxford Group, a Christian evangelical body to which Ebby Thatcher belonged. The group practiced such ideas as surrender to a higher power, confession before fellow members, absolute honesty, and unselfish service to others.

Wilson was released from hospital on December 18, 1934. He was 39 years old. He never took another drink. He had found his life's purpose: helping people get and stay sober by using the tools he'd recently discovered. He went to work with the tremendous unlocked energy of a man who had set aside his ego and his dreams of personal glory.

One more step was key to the formation of Alcoholics Anonymous. In May of 1935, Wilson traveled to Akron, Ohio, to do some business with a machinery company, and there, through a chain of coincidences, he met an alcoholic physician named Bob Smith. Their six-hour meeting confirmed to Wilson the extraordinary value of one alcoholic telling his story to another honestly, without preachiness or condescension. Wilson not only helped Smith; Wilson helped Wilson. Smith stopped drinking and the two men became brothers in spirit. Working together, they pooled their knowledge about liquor and healing and formed what would become Alcoholics Anonymous.

At first, A.A. was a tiny fellowship of spiritual explorers "groping in the dark," as one member put it, for a simple, effective way to create a satisfying life without alcohol.

Slowly the organization caught on. Press coverage helped, as did Bill Wilson's 1939 book Alcoholics Anonymous, which presented the famous Twelve Steps - a cornerstone of A.A. and one of the most significant spiritual/therapeutic concepts ever created. Wilson wrote the first draft of the Twelve Steps one night in bed; A.A. members helped refine the approach. Among the steps: "We admitted that we were powerless over alcohol, that our lives had become unmanageable," and "We made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care and direction of God as we understood Him." (Today, the Twelve-Steps concept is used by a variety of recovery groups.)

The book became A.A.'s primary text, and eventually it gave Bill and Lois a comfortable income. They lived the rest of their lives in Bedford Hills, New York, just outside New York City, with Bill working full time as leader of A.A. and Lois helping to found Al-Anon, an organization for families of alcoholics. (Their home later became the Stepping Stones Foundation, which holds Wilson's personal papers and archives). The Wilson marriage lasted 53 years (they had no children) until Bill's death. Lois was loyal to Bill through thick and thin. And the thin moments were legion - not only Wilson's drinking in the early days, but his probable womanizing in later years.

By the 1950s Wilson was "the messiah of sobriety," in the words of biographer Matthew J. Raphael, traveling widely for A.A., speaking to thousands, and writing hundreds of articles. He was famous yet unknown - many people knew him only as "Bill W.," in keeping with A.A.'s commitment to anonymity.

As A.A. grew, he continued to seek deeper truths about human existence. He read voraciously, saw a therapist, and studied Roman Catholicism (though he never joined any church). He shocked the A.A. board of trustees by experimenting with LSD and by conducting seances in his home. And he developed a strong interest in vitamin therapy for alcoholism and mental/emotional problems.

Bill Wilson survived tremendous hard-ship and emerged a better man. As is the case in many remarkable lives, his suffering put him on the path to greatness. He could reasonably have felt a sense of satisfaction with his accomplishments in his later years, although-restless soul that he was-he surely knew how much work still needed to be done, how many people still needed help through A.A.'s basic formula: "Don't drink, a day at a time. Go to meetings."

A long term smoker, Wilson developed emphysema, eventually complicated by pneumonia. He died in Miami on January 24, 1971, at age 75. Lois lived until 1988.

Membership in A.A. has grown and grown; today, it stands at 1.1 million people in the U.S. and 2.2 million in more than 150 countries around the world.

Sidebar: A Look Inside Alcoholics Anonymous

People who have not been personally touched by alcoholism (either their own or a loved one's) may have heard of the "12 Steps" approach devised by Bill Wilson, but know little else about the philosophy of the Alcoholics Anonymous "fellowship." Here are some facts from the official Web site, www.aa.org:

- A.A. does not recruit or solicit members-the only requirement to join is a desire to stop drinking. There is no application form, no age or education minimums, or any set dues or fees. A group might "ass the hat" at a meeting for members to contribute what they wish toward the cost of the rental space or food served, or for A.A.'s national services.

From the rubble of a wasted life, he overcame alcoholism and founded the 12-step program that has helped millions of others do the same

Second Lieut. Bill Wilson didn't think twice when the first butler he had ever seen offered him a drink. The 22-year-old soldier didn't think about how alcohol had destroyed his family. He didn't think about the Yankee temperance movement of his childhood or his loving fiancé Lois Burnham or his emerging talent for leadership. He didn't think about anything at all. "I had found the elixir of life," he wrote. Wilson's last drink, 17 years later, when alcohol had destroyed his health and his career, precipitated an epiphany that would change his life and the lives of millions of other alcoholics. Incarcerated for the fourth time at Manhattan's Towns Hospital in 1934, Wilson had a spiritual awakening—a flash of white light, a liberating awareness of God—that led to the founding of Alcoholics Anonymous and Wilson's revolutionary 12-step program, the successful remedy for alcoholism. The 12 steps have also generated successful programs for eating disorders, gambling, narcotics, debting, sex addiction and people affected by other's addictions. Aldous Huxley called him "the greatest social architect of our century."

"I had to be first in everything because in my perverse heart I felt myself the least of God's creatures.

Bill Wilson, describing his alcoholism

William Griffith Wilson grew up in a quarry town in Vermont. When he was 10, his hard-drinking father headed for Canada, and his mother moved to Boston, leaving the sickly child with her parents. As a soldier, and then as a businessman, Wilson drank to alleviate his depressions and to celebrate his Wall Street success. Married in 1918, he and Lois toured the country on a motorcycle and appeared to be a prosperous, promising young couple. By 1933, however, they were living on charity in her parent's house on Clinton Street in Brooklyn, N.Y. Wilson had become an unemployable drunk who disdained religion and even panhandled for cash.

Inspired by a friend who had stopped drinking, Wilson went to meetings of the Oxford Group, an evangelical society founded in Britain by Pennsylvania Frank Buchman. And as Wilson underwent a barbiturate-and-belladonna cure called "purge and puke," which was state-of-the-art alcoholism treatment at the time, his brain spun with phrases from Oxford Group meetings, Carl Jung and William James' Varieties of Religious Experience, which he read in the hospital. Five sober months later, Wilson went to Akron, Ohio, on business. The deal fell through, and he wanted a drink. He stood in the lobby of the Mayflower Hotel, entrance by the sounds of the bar across the hall. Suddenly he became convinced that by helping another alcoholic, he could change himself.

Through a series of desperate phone calls, he found Dr. Robert Smith, a skeptical drunk whose family persuaded him to give Wilson 15 minutes. Their meeting lasted for hours. A month later, Dr. Bob had his last drink, and that date, June 10, 1935, is the official date of A.A., which is based on the idea that only an alcoholic can help another alcoholic.

"Because of our kinship in suffering," Bill wrote, "our channels of contact have always been charged with the language of the heart."

The Burnham house on Clinton Street became a haven for drunks. "My name is Bill W., and I'm an alcoholic," he told assorted houseguests and visitors at meetings. To spread the word, he began writing down his principles for sobriety. Each chapter was read by the Clinton Street group and sent to Smith in Akron for more editing. The book had a dozen provisional titles, among them The Way Out and The Empty Glass. Edited to 400 pages, it was finally called Alcoholics Anonymous, and this became the group's name.

But the book, although well reviewed, wasn't selling.

Wilson tried unsuccessfully to make a living as a wire-rope salesman. A.A. had about a hundred members, but many were still drinking. Meanwhile, in 1939, the bank foreclosed on the Clinton Street house, and the couple began years of homelessness, living as guests in borrowed rooms and at one point staying in temporary quarters above the A.A. clubhouse on 24th Street in Manhattan. In 1940 John D. Rockefeller Jr. held an A.A. dinner and was impressed enough to create a trust to provide Wilson with $30 a week-but no more. The tycoon felt that money would corrupt the group's spirit.

"In the wake of my spiritual experience there came a vision of a society of alcoholics."

Bill Wilson, writing to Carl Jung in 1961

Then, in March 1941, the Saturday Evening Post published an article on A.A., and suddenly thousands of letters and requests poured in. Attendance at meetings doubled and tripled. Wilson had reached his audience. In Twelve Traditions, Wilson set down the suggested bylaws of Alcoholics Anonymous. In them, he created an enduring blueprint for an organization with a maximum of individual freedom and no accumulation of power or money. Public anonymity ensured humility. No contributions were required; no member could contribute more than $1,000.

Today more than 2 million A.A. members in 150 countries hold meetings in church basements, hospital conference rooms and school gyms, following Wilson's informal structure. Members identify themselves as alcoholics and share their stories; there are no rules or entry requirements, and many members use only first names.

you from making some of the mistakes I made.

Don't get me wrong. Just because I'm an alcoholic doesn't mean you're going to be one. A special sensitivity to alcohol isn't passed on from a parent to a child. No, I haven't any particular fears for you-only those that trouble any father whose son or daughter reaches the age when it is hard to stay out of the way of a potent chemical called alcohol.

Okay, you're probably thinking:"Here it comes-the old man's got religion, and now he's going to start preaching." I promise: no sermons. I had plenty of them before I found the answer to my problem in Alcoholics Anonymous.

Holidays-what a wreck I used to make of them! Remember Thanksgiving, 1959? I'm sure you do, even though your mother shooed you out of the house before the shouting started. Now I can finally let you know that "I got the message" when you slouched through the kitchen to the back door. You knew exactly what was going on , and you stopped for a second and turned toward me. I was standing by the refrigerator-or, more accurately, propping myself up with it. You didn't say anything. You didn't have to. Your disappointment, resentment, disgust, just plain hatred-it all burned in your eyes.

So what can I possibly tell you that you don't already know about what alcohol can do when it takes control of someone? You lived through too much of it-the nightmarish months before the divorce, then a household without a father, the times when you didn't hear from me and wondered why, the times when you did hear from me and wished you hadn't.

What I want to point out, what is so necessary for you to understand, is that what you saw happen in our home, and what happened to me after I left-the fleabag hotel rooms, the psycho wards-was only the last act of my love affair with the bottle. It all began before you were born; in fact, it began about the time I was your age, which is why you need to be thinking about alcohol and alcoholism right now.

We in Alcoholics Anonymous spend a lot of time sitting over coffee talking about our experiences, and one thing we've learned is that it isn't easy to predict what boy or girl is going to turn up with a drinking problem. As children, some of us went to bed every night in the security of well-knit families. Others were pulling the covers over their heads to shut out the hell of their homes. Some have Phi Beta Kappa keys; others didn't get past the ninth grade. None of us fit any alcoholic "type" as far as background is concerned.

Then how did we get to be drunks? Some people think we became alcoholics from drinking too much. I think we drank too much because we had something else wrong with us in the first place and used alcohol as a crutch. We had the equivalent of a broken leg in our inner selves- a weakness, a fear, a sense of guilt or anxiety, a shadow of uncertain outline that dogged our steps. This is not unusual in itself, especially among young people as they are becoming adults. What was unusual for us was how we reacted when we discovered alcohol and the way it could help us. Its effect was sheer magic. It rid us of that shadow.

The trouble is, our crutch began to play tricks on us. At times it would slip and we'd fall down. By the time we decided that it was bringing us more trouble than help, we made a startling discovery: we couldn't let go of it.

Quite a few of us began drinking regularly because alcohol gave us a deceptive sort of courage to meet situations that scared us. The more we relied on this artificial courage, the less genuine courage we could muster. If we drank to feel more comfortable around people, for instance, the result was that we felt all the more awkward and self-conscious and tongue-tied when we weren't drinking. If we drank to fight off boredom or loneliness, the more bored and lonely we became when we had no glass at our side.

I picked up my crutch in the most innocent way, not really knowing that I was slipping it under my arm. There were half a dozen of us kids who knew the secret of acquiring a chilled keg of beer on a Saturday afternoon. There was a little glen on a farm about five miles out outside of town that was made to order for our midsummer nonsense. With the right amount of beer under our belts-and not necessarily a dangerous amount-we could laugh ourselves silly at jokes that weren't really funny, and there was a warmth and conviviality that certainly couldn't be condemned.

Human beings have been amusing themselves this way for thousands of years, and I suppose that they always will, whether they gather around a beer keg at a picnic or the cocktail bar in a hotel. This is what is called "social drinking" and it is hard to make a case against it. As far as I know, I am the only one of that group I used to drink beer with who went the route of an alcoholic. It was the only kind of drinking I did for a long time. I had no idea that my fondness for alcohol was out of the ordinary. But in the most subtle and gradual way the occasions which called for my drinking began to multiply.

In the office where I had my first job after getting out of school there was a girl named Judy. She was bright and she had a sense of humor and, as you would put it, she "turned me on." I asked her for a date, and took her to a place I couldn't afford for dinner and dancing. I wanted to impress her.

That evening I discovered that Judy didn't like to drink. She didn't disapprove of drinking-it just didn't appeal to her. But we enjoyed each other, and when I took her home she said good-night in a way that made me think she would like to go out with me again.

The significant thing is that I never asked Judy for that second date. I dropped her flat, and scouted around for another girl. As much as I liked and admired Judy, as much as I wanted to get something going between us, I couldn't face the prospect of spending a lot of time with a girl who didn't like to drink. Some kind of subconscious "radar" told me that I could not have Judy and also drink as much as I wanted to. I made my choice.

I was to make the same kind of choice time and again. I picked companions who liked to spend their spare time-as I did-on a bar stool or nursing a fifth through an evening of cards. I doubt that I would have found their company very stimulating if it hadn't been for the liquid refreshment that was always in the picture. And all of this while I was developing two skills that you find in most alcoholics: the ability to conceal from others how much I was drinking, and the ability to conceal from myself how indispensable my alcoholic crutch was becoming.

Your mother didn't recognize this side of my character until after we were married. Our courtship was a whirl of bar-hopping and parties. Unlike Judy, she enjoyed drinking, or at least I always thought she did. She made a game attempt to keep up with me at first, and then she found herself on that bobsled ride so familiar to wives of alcoholics. From enjoying our life together she shifted to tolerating it and then to rebelling against it. She tried to understand me, to help me, and her only reward was a kick in the teeth. The divorce itself was an anti-climax. Our marriage had ended long before. I was just an overgrown adolescent.

As much as I recoiled at what I saw happening, I couldn't do anything about it. I made promises, sincere ones, time and again, and broke them. Once I left a hospital after a week of treatment for acute intoxication-intravenous feeding, sedatives, vitamins, a sweating-out and shaking-out that brought me back from the brink of delirium tremens-and within 48 hours I was drunk again. It was the same suicidal process, and it took me back to the same hospital in worse shape than before.

From what I've written, you might guess that I'm going to tell you to steer clear completely of demon rum. No, I'll be practical and assume that you have the same curiosity about alcohol that I did when I was your age, and that many occasions may arise when you'll either want to drink or be expected to.

First, test yourself with alcohol in a sensible way. There are wrong times and right times to fool around with beer or liquor. With a bunch of kids in a car is a wrong time; at a party where there are responsible adults is a right time. The best time is in your own home, if you can persuade your mother to cut you in on the action when she's having some friends in.

If you're like the majority of people, you'll find that first drink an interesting experience. You may dislike the taste, but like the effect, or vice versa. You may barely be able to "feel" one drink, or one drink may knock you for a loop. Just remember that no matter how mature and responsible you may consider yourself to be when you lift that glass, you're dealing with what is, for all practical purposes, a drug.

Alcohol is a depressant, and the first thing it depresses or slows down is the higher center of your brain, your faculty of self-criticism, judgment and restraint. Remember, too, that in spite of what you see in the movies, in spite of the beer and whiskey ads, it is not necessary to drink to be sociable, to be a success in a business or profession, to sweep a girl off her feet.

Next, if the crowd you are running around with is drinking when you don't want to, or is drinking more than you care to, don't hesitate to say no when the next round is offered, to cut out, or to go home. It's stupid enough to get drunk; it's twice as silly to drink too much simply because that's what "everybody else" is doing.

Finally, and perhaps most important, there is always a chance that you have within you the characteristics of an alcoholic, a seed that is hidden but now waiting for circumstances that will let it grow and flower. If you should come to recognize in yourself a fondness for alcohol that seems to be greater than you observe in others—especially in people who impress you as competent, well-adjusted human beings—then the red flag of danger is up.

If you do any amount of drinking in the next few years, there is a simple test I wish you would take from time to time: Try doing without alcohol for a while and see what happens. This way you can get an idea of how much alcohol means to you, and how much you value what it does for you. You'll probably find that being "on the wagon" means no more than a moment of awkwardness when one of your buddies suggests having a drink. But if you find that removing alcohol from the picture makes a serious difference in the way you feel, if you are drawn back to it against your own resolve not to drink, this may tell you that alcohol does, indeed, hold a special danger for you, as it did for me. Then there is only one safe course: avoid the use of alcohol altogether.

You will have problems in life. You will have disappointments, doubts, fears. Never try to make the mistake of seeking an artificial, temporary solution to these problems through alcohol, pills or narcotics. A way of life cannot be built on such flights from reality. My prayer for you is not so much that you will find every happiness you seek, but that you will accept with clear-headed fortitude the times of trial that are sure to come your way, and receive with gratitude the love and good fortune that are always close behind.

Source: Reader's Digest, November 1966

thinking about such mundane subjects as how to pay the rent or what to feed the children, thinking about - would you believe it? - of what the neighbors are saying when the dear alcoholic staggers up the front steps in broad daylight.

One alcoholic writes a whole book on the subject, blaming the ordinary natural family affection, the indulgence and praise of his mother, as the cause. Don't praise your children too much, he solemnly warns, well, that sounds logical. Most drinkers seem inordinately fond of praise; but the next authority says profoundly, "People drink because of an inferiority complex. Parents should praise their children for every effort."

Yet all around, you see people with inferiority complexes of the most painful natures who never take to drink, who either endure or overcome their feelings of inferiority, and in many cases lug an alcoholic along with their complexes. When will the learned people start looking for the cause at its source - alcohol?

But you mustn't be bitter. These people are trying to help you. All you have to do now is tell Johnny and Suzie that papa is sick. "Why doesn't papa have treatment?", little simple Suzie asks. Papa doesn't want treatment. I mean, what fun would paps have when Joe Doakes drops in, if he had treatment - what fun would papa have on his business trips, at his class reunion, at the bar?

No, on second thought, better not tell Suzie he is sick. Better not say anything to Suzie, To Johnny, maybe, Johnny has been acting morose lately, embarrassed when the gang sees papa not quite himself.

Tell Johnny, "Papa is sick. He is an alcoholic. You mustn't be ashamed of him any more than Jim is ashamed of his father's heart trouble." If Johnny cries out, "But Jim's father stays in bed with his heart trouble. He doesn't say and do foolish and bad things because of his heart trouble. He is not allowed to drive and knock down fence posts because of his heart trouble!" - but he won't, being Johnny, and 14.

THAT SYMPATHY LOOK

He will squirm uncomfortably and change the subject. He'll become quieter and meet the gang down the street a way, and sometimes you will catch him, with sympathy in his eyes, looking at you.

Thank goodness Suzie is different! She is gay and is never bothered by papa's actions. But the little demon, memory, whispers, "Johnny was like that a few years ago too." Suzie will get quiet and ashamed, and will look at you with pity, and do little kindness' far beyond her years - which will hurt you more than any childish thoughtlessness ever hurt. But you smile until your face aches, and you swear that no one will ever see you looking like a drunkard's wife.

You dress becomingly, and keep the children looking nice and the home homelike. By rigid economy you manage fine - that is, on a good week you can save just about as much by all your economies and mendings as papa spends in a day. BUT KEEP THAT SMILE ON! Drunkards wives are apt to let their faces sag to scowl, to let their hair hang down their necks. You will never come to that!.

So you extol papa's virtues to the children and to outsiders. You are old-fashioned. You still can't talk about papa being a drunkard - excuse it, an alcoholic. You know that everyone knows, and that they know you know it, but it saves your face a little to pretend you don't. This wins you some admiration but not much. Mostly it brings you scorn. "Why doesn't she admit he drinks too much? Wouldn't it be better?" Better by far, a hundred times better, but you can't. It hangs over you every waking minute, eating into your vitals, coloring, or discoloring your life; but you can no more talk about it than you can undress on Main Street.

As the years go by it gets harder to keep your resolution not to look like a drunkard's wife, not to let the children know, not to invite sympathy. You don't give a damn how you look some days, but habit is strong (even a good habit) and you keep up appearances. You don't care what the children think of papa, but secretly you hope they think the worst. You long to win sympathy on the street car and in the stores by your look of patient long-suffering - to let your hair down and tell all to the "girls" - to hear their cluck-cluck of sympathy, their words of praise - or just to get it out of your system.

YOU DON'T CARE

Above all, some days you don't care what becomes of papa. Better have him come to some harm than to harm someone else, you say grimly or philosophically, according to your mood. The quick sympathy, the feeling of tenderness, when he becomes sober and penitent, is gone. It seems kind of good. Enough to feel sorry for yourself and the children without feeling sorry for papa. You tear out of your heart the image of the man he might have been - the man he was. Like having a tooth pulled, it's hard, but a relief.

You read some more. "Only an alcoholic can help another alcoholic. He alone understands his problem." Only an alcoholic's wife can understand another alcoholic's wife, you paraphrase. And they are not always sympathetic, you think sourly, they can always see how the other wife is to blame, but not themselves. You wouldn't confide in them anyway. Instead you hold aloof and don't associate with them. What snobs we drunkard's wives are!

You lose control more easily. You sob and cry and pound the table, and heap curses on the heads of the liquor interests, and maledictions on anyone who hands out a drink of liquor; but the next time papa gets out the drinks for the guests, you adjust your wooden smile and help. Never must the alcoholic's wife openly disapprove of liquor. That will always be seized upon as a reason for his drinking, by relatives, by friends, by papa!

In fact, you learn early that alcohol is a Sacred Cow. To help food saving you eat up all the crusts so obediently that there is nothing left with which to stuff the Sunday chicken. You feel guilty to have the chicken, even, and well you might, the papers tell you; but only the most courageous - or foolhardy - editor will suggest, once in a while, that perhaps some of the grain that goes into alcohol might better go to feed a starving world. Leave that Sacred Cow alone!

You hear that there is a comedy at a downtown theatre, and you all go, including your husbands' maiden aunt. Monty Woolley portrays, in equally divided parts, a mixture of Monty Woolley, Alexander Woollcott, George Bernard Shaw, and the village bum - with an endearing character! He plays a gifted actor who never holds a job, an alcoholic, well pleased with his status. His daughter is a cripple because he drunkenly dropped her when she was a baby. You can see what a riot it is! She waits on him and worries over him and has no social or romantic life. Devastatingly funny, of course! Monty is selfish, rude, lazy - and full of charm. Hired to be a store Santa Claus, he becomes inebriated, insults the customers, and burps. The children force a laugh, but presently you all leave, voting it the worst picture of the year.

What is your amazement to find, in a respected magazine, a review of this picture, citing its humor, and adding, gratuitously, that everyone will delight in it but bluenosed prohibitionists. You boil. You contemplate writing a scathing letter to the editor and pointing out to her that the one who disliked it the most was not the maiden aunt, not the children, not the wife, but the alcoholic himself. But you don't - you don't. No Carrie Nation you, to lift up the tongue against the Sacred Cow.

Many a night you go to bed sobbing hysterically, to be brought up short by the thought of the children. What will become of them if you break down? You have been a father and mother to them for years. You settle down to sleep. Surprisingly enough, you sleep long and soundly, and awake amazed at your own resiliency. This is another day. Be thankful you can take care of the children.

Occasionally the day ends with you feeling encouraged and hopeful, but perversely, the next morning the pall is thick around you, and it seems almost impossible to go on. It's a relief to get the children off to school, and no longer have to pretend before their searching, sympathetic eyes; and on this day life stretches before you without a ray of hope, with no release this side of the grave. The one thing you are thankful for on one of these days is that there is no gas stove in the kitchen, no gas jets on the walls.

And the week ends, the horror of the week ends! No school to send them off to, Suzy's friends in and out, Johnny spending more time than is good for him at the movies and bowling alleys to avoid seeing his father celebrate. The "new leisure," the long weekend, beginning Friday afternoon and lasting until Monday morning.

Oh, for the good old days when drunkards had to wait until Saturday night to start the week- end celebration! But Sunday you get up and start the dinner. You rouse the children in time for Sunday School. You dress carefully, and put on your new hat for church. How flattering the color is with your silver hair. You can wear a lot of colors now you never wore before. You must remember that when you shop for clothes. All these things help in keeping up appearances.

And once again, you vow eternally that you will never look like a drunkard's wife - no, not even like an alcoholic's wife.

Source: Maclean's Magazine, December 15, 1946

|||||

+++Message 1153. Rule 62

From: ny-aa@att.net 7/18/2003 8:59:00 AM

|||||

Hi, History Lovers:

Page 149 of the Twelve and Twelve talks about all of the rules that differrent central offices had in the early days. There were requirements for being an A.A. member. There were requirements on what constituted an A.A. group. In some cities there were rival central offices with different sets of rules.

I have found little or no documentation on the web of what was on these lists. Without getting into discussion or opinions, does anyone have actual qualification rules lists from early A.A. let's say pre-1955 or so? There seems to be a gap in this part of our history.

En2joy! Tom En2ger

|||||

+++Message 1154. Re: Rule 62

From: Arthur Sheehan 7/18/2003 5:17:00 PM

myself-and so damn mad at her.

Six weeks later, following the operation, the doctor told me that her knee was all right. "But the malnutrition is so bad that her skin kept tearing when I sutured. The blood tests show that her liver is shot. She's going to be dead in six months at this rate."

Walking to the elevator, I was totally depressed. I knew that, as soon as she got home, we would be right back on the same old merry-go-round. It all seemed so futile! And then I bumped into a former business associate, a recovered alcoholic, who for years had been helping people who had alcohol problems.

"What are you doing here?" he asked. "Nothing serious, I hope."

Right there in the hospital hall, I told him the whole bloody mess.

"You know," he said, after I'd finished, "if it's as serious as you say, you need help, too. Living with an alcoholic can be an impossible load."

I know. I know.

And then he told me about Al-Anon-an organization for people whose lives are affected by someone else's drinking problem. He went on to say that Al-Anon provides information and help for these people whether or not the alcoholic seeks help, and he suggested that I go to a local meeting. I was too filled with resentment, though, to really listen. I tried to be courteous but, even as he talked, I was wondering why I should go to meetings. She has the problem-not I.

But the idea wouldn't go away. "An impossible load," he had said. As time passed, I began to realize how warped my life was becoming. I became aware of a whole litany of destructive emotions-anger, anxiety, disgust, embarrassment-that were beginning to overwhelm me. I should try Al-Anon.

One January evening, I got up nerve and went. In the meeting room were 15 or 20 adults of both sexes and miscellaneous ages. I sat down next to a woman in her 60s who introduced herself as Beatrice. "May I give you this?" she asked, handing me a folded card. "It's the whole thing on the head of a pin."

On one side was the famous prayer: "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change; the courage to change the things I can; and the wisdom to know the difference." On the other side were the 12 Steps of Alcoholics Anonymous. The first step: "We admitted that we were powerless over alcohol-that our lives had become unmanageable."

Now the meeting was starting. George, the moderator, asked us to observe confidentiality, to use first names only; and he explained the purpose of Al-Anon, as a separate fellowship from AA, designed to meet the needs of families and friends of alcoholics. He pointed out that the Al-Anon program is based on AA's 12 Steps and is designed to guide its members into personal awareness of their role in relation to the alcoholic. Then he suggested that we take turns trying to figure out, aloud, how far each of us had gotten with Step 1.

I felt confused. "We admitted that we were powerless over alcohol." I thought, That's my wife's decision, not mine. But then, as I listened, I understood. The question for us was: "How well have we learned that we cannot control our spouse's alcoholism? What progress have we made in learning to control our own anxieties and anger in the face of the problem we live with?"

A pretty young woman with heavy circles under her eyes said, "I've learned not to cover up for him anymore. If he's too drunk to go to work, I don't call up and say he's sick. He may get canned, I know, but that's his problem to deal with."

Others spoke up: "As long as he can count on you to protect him, he won't change. Don't forget, you're powerless over his drinking. Don't let him make you anxious"...."I used to look for the bottles and pour them out, until I realized he'd just buy more and hide them better"...

"When she's too drunk to cook dinner, I take the kids out. We try to make it fun."

And then it was my turn. Was I in any position to say anything? My palms were wringing wet, and I didn't know how to start. Then the words really came: torrents of bitter words, words of resentment, confusion and anger. It must have sounded like a verbal boil being lanced, but the moderator was matter-of-fact when I finally shut up. "Thank you," he said. "I guess we've all felt that way at one point or another. That's why we're here. Keep coming. If you don't hear something tonight that will be helpful, you will next time."

During the next several days, I read everything the moderator had given me about Al-Anon. I learned that a spouse, having accepted intellectually that he or she cannot solve the alcoholic partner's problem, must take the big step of accepting it emotionally as well. For his own preservation, dignity and peace of mind, he must "let go"-detach from the drinking problem. He must refuse to worry; he must accept what he cannot change; he must seek serenity by avoiding the arguments and anxieties created by alcoholics. It seems so selfish to ignore someone, but as one woman in our program explained, "That's not what Al-Anon means by detachment. It's really `tough love' we're talking about; to protect our own sanity, we turn away from the drinking problem and the crazy behavior it causes."

The second meeting I attended brought new dimensions. I felt the beginning of fellowship with the group and a clearer understanding of what we were trying to do. I learned that in "working the program," as Al-Anoners call it, one is required to examine one's own motivations carefully-to make an honest self-appraisal of virtues and weaknesses. Contempt, scorn and sarcasm are common personality defects of the alcoholic spouse. And a determination to run things-to control the alcoholic, to hide the bottles, to keep a stubborn grip on everything "because the alcoholic can't do anything"-is often the most serious personality defect of all.

"Swell," I said. "But what do I do when I come home and find the sink full of dishes, the hamper full of dirty diapers, and the kids not fed?"

"First, you try not to get angry-but to remember that you are dealing with the symptoms of an illness. Then you do the minimum necessary for cleanliness and health."

And what about the children who have to live with an alcoholic parent? You level with them, even if it makes you feel guilty at first. You explain that their mother or father is as truly sick as a diabetic, and you get them to Alateen-the offshoot of Al-Anon for teen-agers-where they can rap with their peers about their problems.

My 13-year-old daughter was becoming increasingly tense about the problem at home. One day, she broke down at school. Her teacher called me at the office. I had toyed with the idea of Alateen for Beth, and had even talked with her about it. Up to that point, she had not wanted to try it.

But there was an Alateen meeting scheduled for that night, and Beth agreed to go. I sat across the hall at the Al-Anon meeting with a lump the size of a watermelon in my stomach. Would it help my daughter? Scare her? What were those ten kids talking about? I couldn't concentrate on a thing in our meeting.

When I asked her later how it had gone, she broke into a smile. "Great, Dad! Can I come back next week?"

As I write this, it has been 19 months since that first January night. Taking it a step at a time, I'm still with Al-Anon. It offers no magic solutions, but rather a whole new philosophy of living, to be learned slowly and patiently. There is a spiritual aspect to the program that can be a stumbling block for some people. It requires that one submit his personal will to that of a higher power and stop trying to play God in his own house.

In my case, I am learning to put things in perspective. I have two wonderful children, a good job and the ability again to enjoy a sunset, a good laugh, a pleasant meal. I am no longer consumed by that part of my life that I cannot do anything about.

My wife is wrestling privately with her alcoholism. She may yet reach out for help. I do not know. But I do know that I no longer blame myself or her. Our home is a happier place now that my children and I have learned about the disease of alcoholism. The problem is in its place, not pervading everything as it did before-because I, like many thousands before, have found an oasis called Al-Anon.

For further information about Al-Anon and Alateen, consult your local telephone directory or write to: Al-Anon Family Group Headquarters, Inc. (or Alateen), P.O. Box 182, Madison Square Station, Dept. D, New York, N.Y. 10010.

Source: Reader's Digest, September 1976

|||||

++++Message 1156. Special Interpretations
From: bbfreeaa 7/19/2003 9:40:00 AM

|||||

Does anyone have a historical perspective of Dr. Bob's comment on page 227 of of Dr Bob and the Good Oldtimers where he states while talking about our 12 Steps "Their simplicity and workablilty are such that no special interpretations and certainly no reservations, have ever been necessary."

I wonder if they were already being hit with what we have today -- special workbooks, books, tapes, etc purporting to be AA that are nothing more than shameless attempts to profit from AA or someone's messiah complex that they know even more than the Big Book wrote and without their "special interpretations", one cannot maximize their Spiiritual Awakening (e.g. "Back to Basics", "Big Book Awakening", and many others) I read this line from his book anytime I am speaking on the Steps. I think it says it all.

|||||

++++Message 1157. Re: Special Interpretations
From: Jim Blair 7/19/2003 12:40:00 PM

|||||

bbfreeaa wrote

> Does anyone have a historical perspective of Dr. Bob's comment on page 227 of of Dr Bob and the Good Oldtimers where he states while talking about our instruction classes conducted by veteran members of AA.

The Twelve Steps are the logical process by which an alcoholic finds and maintains sobriety and becomes rehabilitated. It has been the history of AA that any alcoholic who has followed this program without deviation has remained sober. Those who have tried to cut corners, skip over steps, have eventually found themselves in trouble.

This has been the rule rather than the exception.

Upon being asked which is the most important of the Twelve Steps, one of the early members once replied with another question: "Which is the most important spoke of a wheel?" If a wheel has twelve spokes and one is removed, the wheel will probably continue to support the vehicle, but it will have lost strength. Removal of another spoke weakens it even more, and eventually the wheel will collapse. So it is with AA.

Removal of any of the Steps will eventually result in a collapse.

It is important that the newcomer be introduced to the Twelve Steps at as early a date as possible. On these rules depend his full recovery. If you feel that the Steps are a bit too complicated at first, you can introduce them to your "baby" in a simplified form, going into the complete program later. The condensed form:

1. We honestly admitted we were powerless over alcohol and sincerely wanted to do something about it. In other word we admitted we were whipped and had a genuine desire to QUIT FOR GOOD.

2. We asked and received help from a power greater than ourselves and another human (NOTE: In almost all cases that power is called God. It is, however, God as WE UNDERSTAND HIM. For purposes of simplification, the word God is used in this pamphlet, meaning whatever higher power you choose to accept. In the case of

the agnostic, the atheist or any unbeliever it is only necessary that he recognize some power in the universe greater than he is. He can call it God, Allah, Jehovah,
the Sun, a Cosmic Force, or whatever he chooses. He is almost certain to admit that
we live in an orderly world, a world where night invariably follows day, where spring follows winter, where corn ripens at a certain season, where the young are born on an invariable schedule, where the planets and other heavenly bodies maintain an orderly course. So it is only logical that there is some greater power behind this orderliness. Such an admission is all that is necessary.)

3. We cleaned up our lives, paid our debts, righted wrongs.

4. We carried our new way of life to others desperately in need of it.

The Twelve Steps follow a logical sequence, one that has been used almost universally by successful members of AA. They were carefully thought out by the founders of the organization and are as true and as necessary to successful recovery
from alcoholism today as they were when they were written.

. . . .

FIRST STEP

We admitted we were powerless over alcohol -- that our lives had become unmanageable.

WITHOUT the first step there is no chance of recovery., It has been demonstrated over and over again that a person becomes sober and stays sober only when he is doing so for himself and himself alone. He may become sober temporarily for the sake
of
some person, fear of some sort, because of his job, but unless he is sincerely, genuinely determined to sober up for himself, his days of sobriety are numbered.

It is a difficult step to take. It is a step in which no assistance from an outside source is possible. the prospect must make it alone. It is not easy

to admit defeat. For years we have said, "I can stop drinking any time I want to."

For
years

we have believed that sobriety was "just around the corner." tragically enough,

we never rounded that corner; and we suddenly discovered, much to our dismay,

that
we could not quit. We were like rabid baseball fans who still hope for a miracle

when

the home team goes into the final inning trailing by half a dozen runs.

So we finally came to the fork in the road. We either honestly admitted that

we had a problem or we continued sinking deeper and deeper into the bog of alcoholism, resulting in loss of mind or death. Until the admission is made, to ourselves,

that our alcoholic problem has gone our to control we have on inspiration to stop drinking. But once that admission has been made the was is cleared.

It is at this point that Alcoholics anonymous can step in and lend a helping hand

in the remainder of the program. The remaining steps are automatically made easier.

The symptoms of alcoholism are clearly defined. There are scores of them,

but

among the major ones are:

The inability to stop drinking after taking one drink.

The necessity for a drink in the morning to "straighten up," that morning drink

developing into another drunk.

Getting drunk at the wrong time. That is, getting drunk when every instinct tells us that the occasion is one calling for sobriety.

Inability to sleep without the use of alcohol.

Loss of memory during a drunk and the deadening of memory even when sober.

The prospect will doubtless recognize many symptoms as his own when he listens to the stories of members of the group. When he recognizes them, it is imperative
to impress on him that even if he isn't an out and out alcoholic he is studying hard to be one, and the time when he will be in serious trouble is not too far away.

There is no known cure for alcoholism. Once a person becomes an alcoholic
(he won't recognize it when he crosses the border line) he is an alcoholic for life.
He
may go years and years without touching intoxicants, yet when he does, he will be back in the same old squirrel cage again. Strangely enough, case histories prove
that he will be worse than he was before.

So it is not only important that we admit that we are powerless over alcohol,
but that we CONTINUE to bear in mind at all times that we are alcoholics. Only complete sobriety can make us and keep us normal.

If, as a newcomer, you can honestly say to your AA friend, "I have an alcoholic problem; I am certain that I am an alcoholic; I want to do something about it,"
half of the battle is won. You are then open to teaching. Your mind is prepared to receive instructions in the AA way of life.

...

SECOND STEP

Came to believe that a power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.

HAVING taken the first step we naturally ponder what we can do to receive assistance.

Looking into the past we discover that our attempts to give up alcohol through our own will power have always failed. It is comforting to know, however, that many great minds are agreed that trying to use will power is like trying to lift yourself by your bootstraps. The sincere efforts of our families and friends to help us have been unsuccessful. We have fancied ourselves as rugged individualists. We have liked to think "I am master of my fate, I am captain of my soul." A little honest thinking convinces us that we have been miserable failures as captains and masters.

Many of us tried doctors and hospitals. Some of us tried religion. We found deep sympathy, but we did not find sobriety. The results were always the same -- we got drunk again.

Will power, help from families and friends, medicine, and formal religion having failed, there is but one place to turn. That is to God as we understand Him. This is not as difficult as it might seem. You are not asked to go to church. You are not asked to seek the advice of a clergyman. You are only asked to quit trying to run your own life, and to keep an open mind. You are asked to accept teaching from a group of men who have ironed out the same problem that is bringing you deep trouble.

Perhaps the easiest approach to the Second Step is to think back to our childhood. When we got into trouble we ran to our mother or father, knowing there was complete safety in their arms. We told them our troubles and our minds were relieved.

Picture, then, God as a universal Father, ready to listen to your troubles, ready to give
you
the same understanding and protection you received from your parents in childhood.

If your faith is not too strong at first try solving it this way: Look around
at your new friends in AA. The program has worked for them. Their troubles were as great as yours. They were down and-outers morally and in many cases physically.
Yet
they have followed the rules and have managed to keep sober. It is just a matter
of following the advice of your new friends. Follow the program they lay out for
you.
Have faith in that program. It has worked for them. It can work for you.

...

THIRD STEP

Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understand Him.

ONCE having come to believe there is a Power greater than ourselves, it is not too
difficult to turn our lives over to that Power.

It was explained in the Second Step that as rugged individualists we were rank failures. Forever looking into the future, we were forever disappointed when our plans failed. It is at this point that the Day by Day, or the Twenty-Four Hour plan
comes to our assistance.

We have found that by giving up planning, by letting each day take care of itself
-- and it always will -- we have been able to keep sober. We can't control

the future. The past is done and can't be returned. And so if we can do a good job
this day we are doing the best we possibly can. We start the day by deciding to stay sober
for just twenty-four hours. We ask assistance from God to stay sober for that brief period. And when the day ends we thank God for the help He has given us. And on
the next day and the next we follow the same program.

This is the first step in turning our will and our lives over to God as we understand Him. From this small beginning we develop until we find we are no longer headstrong, we are no longer trying to run our own lives and making a sorry job
of it.

. . .

FOURTH STEP

Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.

AGAIN we come to a step that requires courage. One of our chief reasons for drinking was to escape from ourselves. We were afraid of our own thoughts and knew we could escape from them through alcohol. We were afraid to face facts. We were afraid of our jobs, afraid of our families, afraid of responsibility. And we were afraid
of thinking about them.

So having fortified ourselves by taking the major hurdles embodied in the first three steps,, we find the time has come to actually do something definite about
our problem. So very much like a bather diving into an icy lake we plunge into an inventory of ourselves.

And what do we find? We have been dishonest. We have lied. We have cheated.

We have broken hearts. We have stolen. We have slandered others. We have indulged
in extra-martial activities. We have cursed God and man. We have broken faith.
We
have smashed most of the laws of God and man. In all, we find that we are pretty sorry, miserable individuals. and every one of these facts can be traced back to alcohol.

To continue the inventory, we consider our physical selves, finding that health is impaired, memory is faulty, appearance is becoming more careless and slovenly, finances are at a low ebb. And having honestly taken ourselves apart we wonder how on earth people have put up with us all this time.

It is a brave act to dissect ourselves thus. But we are fully compensated in
the great feeling of satisfaction we experience in having at last squarely faced
an issue. No man in his right senses wants to continue in this manner when he finds out
what is wrong with him, so we logically come to the Fifth Step.

...

FIFTH STEP

Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.

HERE again we find a very logical sequence. Having analyzed ourselves we find it makes sense to do something toward righting what we have found wrong. If we have taken the Fourth Step we have already fulfilled the first and second parts
of
the Fifth Step requirements. For a calm diagnosis of ourselves brings our defects.
So we come to one of the oldest truths in the world -- a trouble shared is a trouble

cut in half.

To admit our wrongs to another person may sound like an insurmountable obstacle, but actually it is very easy if we go about it in the right way. And any good AA can show the path. It does not mean that we formally sit down with someone and say:
"I have done wrong in the following manner: First, I have been, etc. etc." If that were
the method used, AA would not be the great organization it is today.

The AA member will pave the way by first telling his story. The newcomer will
be amazed at his frankness, at the ease with which he tells of usually unmentioned escapades. He will tell how rotten he has acted toward his family, or how he spent weeks of his life in jail or institutions; of dishonesties; of lies and subterfuges;
the whole sorry picture.

One or two conversations like this and the newcomer will begin to unburden himself. Things that he thought he would never tell a living soul start to come out.

And as he shares his secrets his mind becomes unburdened of the terrific weight
he has been carrying.

He literally gets his troubles off his chest, and one reason for drinking -- drinking to forget -- immediately disappears. It is at this point that real sobriety begins. Nor can an alcoholic be safe until he has unburdened himself. He begins
to feel that he "belongs." And after he has stood up in public, leading his first meeting, he then feels that he is a full-fledged member.

The newcomer is definitely progressing, and is ready for the next two steps,
which are grouped together for explanation and interpretation.

...

SIXTH STEP

We're entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character

SEVENTH STEP

Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.

IT IS VERY likely that we will willingly take the Sixth Step. As we scan the faces of our new friends in AA we see something we want. We see contentedness, freedom
from fear, happiness, serenity and peace. We have been harassed by fear of losing
our jobs, fear of divorce, fear of creditors, in fact, fears without end. We want to be like our new friends. And so, remembering back that no human agency has helped us
before, we are willing to have God remove all defects of our characters.

But how do we ask Him to do it?

In the first place, we must remember at all times that we cannot bargain
with God.
In our drinking days we would get into trouble and pray something like this:
"Oh
God,
if you will get me out of this jam I'll never get in trouble again."

But whether or not we got out of that particular jam, you were right back into another one.

Instead of asking for outright help, ask for guidance. Ask merely to be shown
the way, so that you can do your own part. As we said earlier in this booklet, ask
for guidance for one day at a time. The days will grow into weeks, into months
and

into
years. Yet it has been but one day at a time.

Do this humbly. Humility is sometimes difficult to attain. In our cups we were big shots. They were all out of step but Jim. Try to remember that regardless of who
you are, you are but a tiny cog in the great universe. Look at a distant star at night.

Remember that it took the light from that star a century or more to reach
the earth.

Remember the star on which you gaze could probably swallow the sun without noticing
it. Consider that the earth is one of the lesser planets. And then consider your own physical insignificance. It will make you feel small and humble. And it is with
that attitude that you should ask God to remove your shortcomings.

To be humble is not to grovel before men. It is not to become a doormat for society.

Yet while in the flesh we are but infinitesimal specks, always remember that
the very essence of the Christian religion is that the soul of man is eternal.
It is
the most precious thing in the world. ?In the very least of us is a little spark
of
the divine. It is that divinity that makes us rise above the lower animals.

Humility is based on the recognition that we are the children of God. It is
the consciousness of the need of a power greater than our own and a willingness to let that power control our lives.

Very simply put, humility is teachability, an open mind to the truth.

And when we can bring ourselves to this state, our recovery is well under way.

. . .

EIGHTH STEP

Made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all.

NINTH STEP

Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.

THESE TWO steps are in such direct relation to each other it is simpler to discuss them as one.

It is at this point that we begin the physical act of rehabilitation. Here
is something physical that we can do. It is where we clean up the book of our lives
and start a brand new ledger.

Our debts are of two kinds, the physical and the moral. A very satisfactory way to square accounts is to take a piece of paper and list your debts.

As you square accounts check off each one. It is comforting process to watch
the list grow smaller and smaller until it disappears. This is not an easy step.
We
would prefer to forget the past and its debts. But as long as we owe them, they are impossible to forget. They come back to haunt us. And an alcoholic can't afford to be haunted by the past.

So we set about paying back our physical debts. There are those long-neglected bar bills what have driven us from some of our favorite haunts. There is the doctor,
and the butcher, and the baker, and the friend who loaned us money. There is the vase we broke on a drunken party at a friend's home. perhaps our financial condition does not permit us to clean up our debts all at once. Do not hesitate to pay a dollar

here and a dollar there. It is remarkable how soon they are cleared up, and we will find
we have gained new friends. Or perhaps a bank or other financial institution will lump all your debts together and pay them off, taking your note. By all means pay off
this note as rapidly as possible.

It is not so easy with the moral debts. Some of these we can never repay.

There is your employer who has given you chance after chance -- many more than you actually deserved. It would be well to let him know, not only by word but by deed that you are doing something to solve your drinking problem. He will be skeptical at first,
perhaps, but he is going to admire you more and more as time passes.

There are your friends whom you have let down. A few apologies are in order here.

There are those you have maligned, ridiculed, or slandered. As you make amends
you will find yourself increasing in strength and stature.

Finally there are your dear ones who tried so hard to love you, to help you.

How many times have you broken their hearts? How many times have you disappointed
them?
How many times have you promised to quit drinking, only to break the promise within a few hours or a few days? How many times have you let them down in a crisis?
And
yet they have stood by you. They have nursed you back to health when the worst thing wrong with you was a bad hangover. They have paid your debts. They have protected your names and reputation. They have fought for you when you could not fight
for yourself. They have put up with your lies, your subterfuges, your wanderings into

extra-martial excursions, your dishonesties, your vile morning-after disposition. And they still love you.

Here is a debt that cannot be repaid by words -- even though you apologize until the very moment of death. This moral debt can never even fully be repaid by deeds.

But it can be reduced to a minimum. The history of AA sparkles with families reunited and happily living together. But don't expect this miracle to happen overnight.

Always remember, it took you years to become an alcoholic. Full rehabilitation cannot be expected in a day or a week or a month. The road to rehabilitation is not as long as the road to alcoholism, but neither is it as tough. If you have successfully made the Sixth and Seventh Steps you will fully understand this. Always remember, easy does it. We must take life and its problems a single thing at a time. The longest journey starts with but a single step.

Do not minimize the importance of the Eighth and Ninth Steps. Without having taken them you will never be on firm ground. Having conscientiously taken the, your future is more assured.

TENTH STEP

Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.

WE FIND in AA that after a few months of sobriety, after the alcohol is completely out of our systems, our problems are more mental than physical. It is very likely that a psychic quirk scarred us on our drinking careers in the first place.

It
has been the rule rather than the exception in AA that as long as a person thinks straight he remains sober. When he goes back to the old alcoholic way of thinking, he gets drunk.

There are certain luxuries common to the average person that an alcoholic cannot afford. He cannot afford resentment, nor self pity. He cannot afford envy nor greed.
He cannot afford dishonesty of any kind. He cannot afford procrastination, putting off till tomorrow what should be done today. He cannot afford to do anything
that will cause him regret or disturb his peace of mind later. And so we must keep
our thinking straight and clear. We must recognize that our enemy is alcohol, and
that enemy is lurking to slay us on the slightest excuse, at the slightest opening.

And so it is important that we continue to take personal inventory. Perhaps
we find ourselves criticizing some other member's method of staying sober.
Instead, admire him for doing a fine job, whatever his method. Perhaps you resent something a leader has said. Forget it, it will be your turn to lead before long, and you
will probably offend someone yourself. Perhaps you don't think your boss is advancing
you fast enough. Just how long have you deserved to be advanced?

This list could be prolonged by thousands of words. But by this time you
have advanced far enough in this new way of living to recognize what is good and what
is harmful to you.

So, take time off occasionally to check up. Are you doing your best? If you
are,
don't worry. You are making progress.

ELEVENTH STEP

Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry it out.

WHAT HAVE I to meditate about? This will be answered within a very few days after you have become associated with AA. For the first time in your life you are giving of yourself, and for the first time in your life you will find that good is repaid with good. You will waken in the morning with clear head and eye. You will not be tortured with fears of what you did the night before. People will go out of their way to be cordial, kind and helpful. Happiness will shine in the faces of your loved ones. You will be free from fear, each day will add to your contentedness, you will not be dodging into alleys and crossing streets to avoid moral and physical creditors, you are beginning to have the power to help others. Surely, you have much for meditation.

When you meditate on this new way of living you cannot but realize that there is a God above, guiding you through each successive day and night. As you become more conscious of this you will seem to better understand this Guiding Power. Before long you will find it is easy to pray. But if it doesn't come easily, don't let it worry you.

Even churchmen will admit that prayer as we commonly hear it is phrased in language stilted and archaic. The Thee and Thou form has been used since the days of King James when the present version of the Bible was written. If you don't like

it don't use it. It is not hard to say before retiring, "Thank you, God, for keeping me sober today." Nor is it hard to say in the morning, "Please, God, guide me in
the path of sobriety and decent and useful living this coming day." Make your talks
with your Guiding Power a personal thing. Give thanks for help and ask for assistance
as though you were addressing your earthly father. Your sincerity is what counts,
not the form of language you use. And be certain that the God to whom you pray will make it easier for you to work out your own salvation.

...
TWELFTH STEP

Having had a spiritual experience as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to other alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

NOW YOU ARE on your own. Your AA friends have given you your tools and showed you how to use them. From now on it is YOUR job to fashion YOUR life.

In the first place, don't be thrown by the phrase "Spiritual experience." It may bring to mind something supernatural -- perhaps the lightning flashing, the thunder resounding. Or as in the case of Saul of Tarsus, a blinding flash of light.

A sudden spiritual experience or awakening is extremely uncommon. Perhaps a score out of
the thousands in AA have experienced it. But it is a slow process for the average person.

We are inclined to confuse spirituality with theology, dogma, creed and ritual.

Just

remember that most of us are pretty new to this useful, decent way of living, so

we must learn the spiritual side of the picture slowly and simply.

Remember this simple thing: The entire structure of the Christian religion

is built on Love. The word has many synonyms, such as Charity, Grace,

Good-will,

Tenderness, Generosity, Kindness, Tolerance, Sympathy, Mercy, and others.

When

we help a fellow being, when we are kind to one another we are performing a completely

spiritual act. Spirituality is simply the act of being selflessly helpful.

If

you will start with this simple explanation you will find that the green light

has been

flashed on. Christ taught that there are two great commandments: to love

God;

and to love your neighbor as yourself. If you can follow these you will have no trouble.

What you don't understand don't worry about. It will all become clear in a short while. If anything puzzles you, consult an older member of the group. He most likely

will straighten out your thinking in a few words.

If you have gone through the first Eleven Steps you have come far. It is now time

that you are carrying on the work. You owe your sponsor and your group one thing

--

to carry the blessings of AA to some other alcoholic in need. You will be asked

to call on a prospective member. Don't lose any time in doing so. Tell him your story.

Tell him what you are trying to do. Tell him what AA has done for others. If

you think you are too new, just remember that he is even newer, and if you have been sober only one day, he will look on you as a veteran.

Before long you will have a "baby" of your own. Then you will really have something to live for. You will worry about him, you will try to keep sober for him, you will guide him to the best of your ability, you will almost suffer with him as he comes out of his alcoholic fog. In doing this you will be giving of yourself, and you will find new joy in living.

Always keep it before you that the more you put into this work the more you will take out of it. The harder you work, the more activities you get into, the easier will be your road to sober living. There is no excuse for missing a meeting. There is no excuse for not helping someone when asked to. Always bear in mind that your alcoholic problem is the FIRST THING in your life. It comes before everything else.

For without sobriety you will have nothing -- no family, no job, no friends. And before too long you will have no sanity -- and will lose life itself. Share this new life with others. It will repay you then thousand-fold.

In conclusion, practice these steps in all your affairs. The Twelve Steps are not something to be gone through once and then forgotten. They are a set of rules for living that must be practiced at all times, never forgotten.

Remember that you are an alcoholic, and but one drink away from drunkenness again.

Remember that you are completely dependent on God as you understand Him.

Remember to keep your thinking straight.

years, has brought recovery to around 2,000 men and women, a large percentage of whom had been considered medically hopeless. Doctors and clergymen, working separately or together, have always managed to salvage a few cases. In isolated instances, drinkers have found their own methods of quitting. But the inroads into alcoholism have been negligible, and it remains one of the great unsolved public-health enigmas.

By nature touchy and suspicious, the alcoholic likes to be left alone to work out his puzzle, and he has a convenient way of ignoring the tragedy which he inflicts meanwhile upon those who are close to him. He holds desperately to a conviction that, although he has not been able to handle alcohol in the past, he will ultimately succeed in becoming a controlled drinker. One of medicine's queerest animals, he is, as often as not, an acutely intelligent person. He fences with professional men and relatives who attempt to aid him and he gets a perverse satisfaction out of tripping them up in argument.

There is no specious excuse for drinking which the troubleshooters of Alcoholics Anonymous have not heard or used themselves. When one of their prospects hands them a rationalization for getting soused, -they match it with half a dozen out of their own experiences. This upsets him a little, and he gets defensive. He looks at their neat clothing and smoothly shaved faces and charges them with being goody-goodies who don't know what it is to struggle with drink. They reply by relating their own stories: the double Scotches and brandies before breakfast; the vague feeling of discomfort which precedes a drinking bout; the awakening from a spree without being able to account for the actions of several days and the haunting fear that possibly they had run down someone with their automobiles.

They tell of the eight-ounce bottles of gin hidden behind pictures and in caches from cellar to attic; of spending whole days in motion-picture houses to stave off the temptation to drink; of sneaking out of the office for quickies during the day. They talk of losing jobs and stealing money from their wives' purses; of putting pepper into whiskey to give it a tang; of tipping on bitters and sedative tablets, or on mouthwash or hair tonic; of getting into the habit of camping outside the neighborhood tavern ten minutes before opening time. They describe a hand so jittery that it could not lift a pony to the lips without spilling the contents; drinking liquor from a beer stein because it can be steadied with two hands, although at the risk of chipping a front tooth; tying an end of a towel about a glass, looping the towel around the back of the neck, and drawing the free end with the other hand, pulley fashion, to advance the glass to the mouth; hands so shaky they feel as if they were about to snap off and fly into space; sitting on hands for hours to keep them from doing this.

These and other bits of drinking lore usually manage to convince the alcoholic that he is talking to blood brothers. A bridge of confidence is thereby erected, spanning a gap which has baffled the physician, the minister, the priest, or the hapless relatives. Over this connection, the troubleshooters convey, bit by bit, the details of a program for living which has worked for them and which, they feel, can work for any other alcoholic. They concede as out of their orbit only those who are psychotic or who are already suffering from the physical impairment known as wet brain. At the same time, they see to it that the prospect gets whatever medical attention is needed.

Many -doctors and staffs of institutions throughout the country now suggest Alcoholics Anonymous to their drinking patients. In some towns, the courts and probation officers cooperate with the local group. In a few city psychopathic divisions, the workers of Alcoholics Anonymous are accorded the same visiting privileges as staff members. Philadelphia General is one of these. Dr. John F. Stouffer, the chief psychiatrist, says: "The alcoholics we get here are mostly those who cannot afford private treatment, and this is by far the greatest thing we have ever been able to offer them. Even among those who occasionally land back in here again, we observe a profound change in personality. You would hardly recognize them."

The Illinois Medical Journal, in an editorial last December, went further than Dr. Stouffer, in stating: "It is indeed a miracle when a person who for years has been more or less constantly under the influence of alcohol and in whom his friends have lost all confidence, will sit up all night with a drunk and at stated intervals administer a small amount of liquor in accordance with a doctor's orders without taking a drop himself."

This is a reference to a common aspect of the Arabian Nights adventures to which Alcoholics Anonymous workers dedicate themselves. Often it involves sitting upon, as well as up with, the intoxicated person, as the impulse to jump out a window seems to be an attractive one to many alcoholics when in their cups. Only an alcoholic can squat on another alcoholic's chest for hours with the proper combination of discipline and sympathy.

During a recent trip around the East and Middle West, I met and talked with scores of A.A.'s as they call themselves, and found them to be unusually calm, tolerant people. Somehow, they seemed better integrated than the average group of nonalcoholic individuals. Their transformation from cop fighters, canned-heat drinkers, and, in some instances, wife beaters, was startling. On one of the most influential newspapers in the country, I found that the city editor, the assistant city editor, and a nationally known reporter were A.A.'s, and strong in the confidence of their publisher.

In another city, I heard a judge parole a drunken driver to an A.A. member. The latter, during his drinking days, had smashed several cars and had had his own operator's license suspended. The judge knew him and was glad to trust him. A brilliant executive of an advertising firm disclosed that two years ago he had been panhandling and sleeping in a doorway under an elevated structure. He had a favorite doorway, which he shared with other vagrants, and every few weeks he goes back and pays them a visit just to assure himself he isn't dreaming.

In Akron, as in other manufacturing centers, the groups include a heavy element of manual workers. In the Cleveland Athletic Club, I had luncheon with five lawyers, an accountant, an engineer, three salesmen, an insurance man, a buyer, a bartender, a chain-store manager, a manager of an independent store, and a manufacturer's representative. They were members of a central committee which coordinates the work of nine neighborhood groups. Cleveland, with more than 450 members, is the biggest of the A.A. centers. The next largest are located in Chicago, Akron, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, Washington, and New York. All told, there are groups in about fifty cities and towns.

In discussing their work, the A.A.'s spoke of their drunk-rescuing as "insurance" for themselves. Experience within the group has shown, they said, that once a recovered drinker slows up in this work he is likely to go back to drinking himself. There is, they agreed, no such thing as an ex-alcoholic. If one is an alcoholic--that is, a person who is unable to drink normally--one remains an alcoholic until he dies, just as a diabetic remains a diabetic. The best he can hope for is to become an arrested case, with drunk-saving as his insulin. At least, the A.A.'s say so, and medical opinion tends to support them. All but a few said that they had lost all desire for alcohol. Most serve liquor in their homes and when friends drop in, and they still go to bars with companions who drink; The A.A.'s tipple on soft drinks and coffee.

One, a sales manager, acts as bartender at his company's annual jamboree in Atlantic City and spends his nights tucking the celebrators into their beds. Only a few of those who recover fail to lose the feeling that at any minute they may thoughtlessly take one drink and skyrocket off on a disastrous binge. An AA. who is a clerk in an Eastern city hasn't had a snifter in three and a half years, but says that he still has to walk fast past saloons to -circumvent the old impulse; but he is an exception. The only hangover from the wild days that plagues the A.A. is a recurrent nightmare. In the dream, he finds himself off on a rousing whooper-doooper, frantically trying to conceal his condition from the community. Even this symptom disappears shortly, in most cases. Surprisingly, the rate of employment among these people, who formerly drank themselves out of job after job, is said to be around ninety percent.

One-hundred percent effectiveness with non-psychotic drinkers who sincerely want to quit is claimed by the workers of Alcoholics Anonymous. The program will not work, they add, with those who only "want to want to quit," or who want to quit because they are afraid of losing their families or their jobs. The effective desire, they state, must be based upon -enlightened self-interest; the applicant must want to get away from liquor to head off incarceration or premature death. He must be fed up with the stark social loneliness which engulfs the uncontrolled drinker, and he must want to put some order into his bungled life.

As it is impossible to disqualify all borderline applicants, the working percentage of recovery falls below the 100-percent mark. According to A.A. estimation, fifty percent of the alcoholics taken in hand recover almost immediately; twenty-five percent get well after suffering a relapse or two; and the rest remain doubtful. This rate of success is exceptionally high. Statistics on traditional medical and religious cures are lacking, but it has been informally estimated that they are no more than two or three percent effective on run-of-the-mine cases.

Although it is too early to state that Alcoholics Anonymous is the definitive answer to alcoholism, its brief record is impressive, and it is receiving hopeful support. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., helped defray the expense of getting it started and has gone out of his way to get other prominent men interested.

Rockefeller's gift was a small one, in deference to the insistence of the originators that the movement be kept on a voluntary, nonpaid basis. There are no salaried organizers, no dues, no officers, and no central control. Locally, the rents of assembly halls are met by passing the hat at meetings. In small communities, no collections are taken, as the gatherings are held in private homes. A small office in downtown New York acts merely as a clearinghouse for information. There is no name on the door, and mail is received anonymously through a post-office box. The only income, which is money received from the sale of a book describing the work, is handled by the Alcoholic Foundation, a board composed of three alcoholics and four nonalcoholics.

In Chicago, twenty-five doctors work hand in hand with Alcoholics Anonymous, contributing their services and referring their own alcoholic patients to the group, which now numbers around 200. The same cooperation exists in Cleveland and to a lesser degree in other centers. A physician, Dr. W. D. Silkworth, of New York City, gave the movement its first encouragement. However, many doctors remain skeptical. Dr. Foster Kennedy, an eminent New York neurologist, probably had these in mind when he stated at a meeting a year ago: "The aim of those concerned in this effort against alcoholism is high; their success has been considerable; and I believe medical men of goodwill should aid."

The active help of two medical men of goodwill, Drs. A. Wiese Hammer and C. Dudley Saul, has assisted greatly in making the Philadelphia unit one of the more effective of the younger groups. The movement there had its beginning in an offhand way in February, 1940, when a businessman who was an A.A. convert was transferred to Philadelphia from New York. Fearful of backsliding for lack of rescue work, the newcomer rounded up three local barflies and started to work on them. He got them dry, and the quartet began ferreting out other cases. By last December fifteenth, ninety-nine alcoholics had joined up. Of these, eighty-six were now total abstainers--thirty-nine from one to three months, seventeen from three to six months, and twenty-five from six to ten months. Five who had joined the unit after having belonged in other cities had been nondrinkers from one to three years.

At the other end of the time scale, Akron, which cradled the movement, holds the intramural record for sustained abstinence. According to a recent checkup, two members have been riding the A.A. wagon for five and a half years, one for five years, three for four and a half years, one for the same period with one skid, three for three and a half years, seven for three years, three for three years with one skid each, one for two and a half years, and thirteen for two years. Previously, most of the Akronites and Philadelphians had been unable to stay away from liquor for longer than a few weeks.

In the Middle West, the work has been almost exclusively among persons who have not arrived at the institutional stage. The New York group, which has a similar nucleus, makes a sideline specialty of committed cases and has achieved striking results. In the summer of 1939, the group began working on the alcoholics confined in Rockland State Hospital, at Orangeburg, a vast mental sanitarium which gets the hopeless alcoholic backwash of the big population centers. With the encouragement of Dr. R. E. Blaisdell, the medical superintendent, a unit was formed with the walls, and meetings were held in the recreation hall. New York A.A.'s went to Orangeburg to give talks, and on Sunday evenings, the patients were brought in state-owned buses to a clubhouse which the Manhattan group rents on the West Side.

Last July first, eleven months later, records kept at the hospital showed that of fifty-four patients released to Alcoholics Anonymous, seventeen had had no relapse and fourteen others had had only one. Of the rest, nine had gone back to drinking in their home communities, twelve had returned to the hospital, and two had not been traced. Dr. Blaisdell has written favorably about the work to the State Department of Mental Hygiene, and he praised it officially in his last annual report.

Even better results were obtained in two public institutions in New Jersey, Greystone Park and Overbrook, which attract patients of better economic and social background than Rockland, because of their nearness to prosperous suburban villages. Of seven patients released from the Greystone Park institution in two years, five have abstained for periods of one to two years, according to A.A. records. Eight of ten released from Overbrook have abstained for about the same length of time. The others have had from one to several relapses.

Why some people become alcoholics is a question on which authorities disagree. Few think that anyone is "born an alcoholic." One may be born, they say, with a hereditary predisposition to alcoholism, just as one may be born with a vulnerability to tuberculosis. The rest seems to depend upon environment and experience, although one theory has it that some people are allergic to alcohol, as hayfever sufferers are to pollens. Only one note is found to be common to all alcoholics--emotional immaturity. Closely related to this is an observation that an unusually large number of alcoholics start out in life as an only child, as a younger child, as the only boy in a family of girls or the only girl in a family of boys. Many have records of childhood precocity and were what are known as spoiled children.

Frequently, the situation is complicated by an off-center home atmosphere in which one parent is unduly cruel, the other overindulgent. Any combination of these factors, plus a divorce- or two, tends to produce neurotic children who are poorly equipped emotionally to face the ordinary realities of adult life. In seeking escapes, one may immerse himself in his business, working twelve to fifteen hours a -day, or in sports or in some artistic sideline. Another finds what he thinks is a pleasant escape in drink. It bolsters his opinion of himself and temporarily wipes away any feeling of social inferiority which he may have. Light drinking leads to heavy drinking. Friends and family are alienated and employers become disgusted. The drinker smolders with resentment and wallows in self-pity. He indulges in childish rationalizations to justify his drinking: He has been working hard and he deserves to relax; his wife does not understand him; his nerves are jumpy; everybody is against him; and so on and on. He unconsciously becomes a chronic excuse-maker for himself.

All the time he is drinking, he tells himself and those who butt into his affairs that he can really become a controlled drinker if he wants to. To demonstrate his strength of will, he goes -for weeks without taking a drop. He makes a point of calling at his favorite bar at a certain time each day and ostentatiously sipping milk or a carbonated beverage, not realizing that he is indulging in juvenile exhibitionism. Falsely encouraged, he shifts to a routine of one beer a day, and that is the beginning of the end once more. Beer leads inevitably to more beer and then to hard liquor. Hard liquor leads to another first-rate bender. Oddly, the trigger which sets off the explosion is as apt to be a stroke of business success as it is to be a run of bad luck. An alcoholic can stand neither prosperity nor adversity.

The victim is puzzled on coming out of the alcoholic fog. Without his being aware of any change, a habit has gradually become an obsession. After a while, he no longer needs his rationalizations to justify the fatal first drink. All he knows is that he feels swamped by uneasiness or elation, and before he realizes what is happening, he is standing at a bar with an empty whiskey pony in front of him and a stimulating sensation in his throat. By some peculiar quirk of his mind, he has been able to draw a curtain over the memory of the intense pain and remorse caused by preceding stemwinders. After many experiences of this kind, the alcoholic begins to realize that he does not understand himself; he wonders whether his power of will, though strong in other fields, isn't defenseless against alcohol. He may go on trying to defeat his obsession and wind up in a sanitarium. He may give up the fight as hopeless and try to kill himself. Or he may seek outside help.

If he applies to Alcoholics Anonymous, he is first brought around to admit that alcohol has him whipped and that his life has become unmanageable. Having achieved this stated of intellectual humility, he is given a dose of religion in its broadest sense. He is asked to believe in a Power that is greater than himself, or at least to keep an open mind on that subject while he goes on with the rest of the program. Any concept of the Higher Power is acceptable. A skeptic or agnostic may choose to think of his Inner Self, the miracle of growth, a tree, man's wonderment at the physical universe, the structure of the atom, or mere mathematical infinity. Whatever form is visualized, the neophyte is taught that he must rely upon it and, in his own way, to pray to the Power for strength.

He next makes a sort of moral inventory of himself with the private aid of another person--one of his A.A. sponsors, a priest, a minister, a psychiatrist, or anyone else he fancies. If it gives him any relief, he may get up at a meeting and recite his misdeeds, but he is not required to do so. He restores what he may have stolen while intoxicated and arranges to pay off old debts and to make good on rubber checks; he makes amends to persons he has abused and, in general, cleans up his past as well as he is able to. It is not uncommon for his sponsors to lend him money to help out in the early stages.

This catharsis is regarded as important because of the compulsion which a feeling of guilt exerts in the alcoholic obsession. As nothing tends to push an alcoholic toward the bottle more than personal resentments, the pupil also makes out a list of his grudges and resolves not to be stirred by them. At this point, he is ready to start working on other, active alcoholics. By the process of extroversion, which the work entails, he is able to think less of his own troubles.

The more drinkers he succeeds in swinging into Alcoholics Anonymous, the greater his responsibility to the group becomes. He can't get drunk now without injuring the people who have proved themselves his best friends. He is beginning to grow up emotionally and to quit being a leaner. If raised in an orthodox church, he usually, but not always, becomes a regular communicant again.

Simultaneously with the making over of the alcoholic goes the process of adjusting his family to his new way of living. The wife or husband of an alcoholic, and the children, too, frequently become neurotics from being exposed to drinking excesses over a period of years. Reeducation of the family is an essential part of a followup program which has been devised.

Alcoholics Anonymous, which is a synthesis of old ideas rather than a new discovery, owes its existence to the collaboration of a New York stockbroker and an Akron physician. Both alcoholics, they met for the first time a little less than six years ago. In thirty-five years of periodic drinking, Dr. Armstrong, to give the physician a fictitious name, had drunk himself out of most of his practice. Armstrong had tried everything, including the Oxford Group, and had shown no improvement. On Mother's Day, 1935, he staggered home, in typical drunk fashion, lugging an expensive potted plant, which he placed in his wife's lap. The he went upstairs and passed out.

At that moment, nervously pacing the lobby of an Akron hotel, was the broker from New York, whom we shall arbitrarily call Griffith. Griffith was in a jam. In an attempt to obtain control of a company and rebuild his financial fences, he had come out to Akron and engaged in a fight for proxies. He had lost the fight. His hotel bill was unpaid. He was almost flat broke Griffith wanted a drink.

During his career on Wall Street, Griffith had turned down some sizable deals and had prospered, but, through ill-timed drinking bouts, had lost out on his main chances. Five months before coming to Akron, he had gone on the water wagon through the ministrations of the Oxford Group in New York. Fascinated by the problem of alcoholism, he had many times gone back as a visitor to a Central Park West detoxicating hospital, where he had been a patient, and talked to the inmates. He effected no recoveries, but found that by working on other alcoholics he could stave off his own craving.

A stranger in Akron, Griffith knew no alcoholics with whom he could wrestle. A church directory, which hung in the lobby opposite the bar, gave him an idea. He telephoned one of the clergymen listed and through him got in touch with a member of the local Oxford Group. This person was a friend of Dr. Armstrong's and was able to introduce the physician and the broker at dinner. In this manner, Dr. Armstrong became Griffith's first real disciple. He was a shaky one at first. After a few weeks of abstinence, he west East to a medical convention and came home in a liquid state. Griffith, who had stayed in Akron to iron out some legal tangles arising from the proxy battle, talked him back to sobriety. That was on June 10, 1935. The nips the physician took from a bottle proffered by Griffith on that day were the last drinks he ever took.

Griffith's lawsuits dragged on, holding him over in Akron for six months. He moved his baggage to the Armstrong home, and together the pair struggled with other alcoholics. Before Griffith went back to New York, two more Akron converts had been obtained. Meanwhile, both Griffith and Dr. Armstrong had withdrawn from the Oxford Group, because they felt that its aggressive evangelism and some of its other methods were hindrances in working with alcoholics. They put their own technique on a strict take-it-or-leave-it basis and kept it there.

Progress was slow. After Griffith had returned East, Dr. Armstrong and his wife, a Wellesley graduate, converted their home into a free refuge for alcoholics and an experimental laboratory for the study of the guests' behavior. One of the guests, who, unknown to his hosts, was a manic depressive as well as an alcoholic, ran wild one night with a kitchen knife. He was overcome before he had stabbed anyone. After a year and a half, a total of ten persons had responded to the program and were abstaining. What was left of the family savings had gone into the work. The physician's new sobriety had caused a revival in his practice, but not enough of one to carry the extra expense. The Armstrongs, nevertheless, carried on, on borrowed money. Griffith, who had a Spartan wife, too, turned his Brooklyn home into a duplicate of the Akron menage. Mrs. Griffith, a member of an old Brooklyn family, took a job in a department store and in her spare time played nurse to inebriates. The Griffiths also borrowed, and Griffith managed to make odd bits of money around the brokerage houses. By the spring of 1939, the Armstrongs and the Griffiths had between them cozened about one hundred alcoholics into sobriety.

In a book which they published at that time, the recovered drinkers described the cure program and related their personal stories. The title was "Alcoholics Anonymous." It was adopted as a name for the movement itself, which up to then had none. As the book got into circulation, the movement spread rapidly.

Today, Dr. Armstrong is still struggling to patch up his practice. The going is hard. He is in debt because of his contributions to the movement and the time he devotes gratis to alcoholics. Being a pivotal man in the group, he is unable to turn down the requests for help which flood his office.

Griffith is even deeper in the hole. For the past two years, he and his wife have had no home in the ordinary sense of the word. In a manner reminiscent of the primitive Christians, they have moved about, finding shelter in the homes of A.A. colleagues and sometimes wearing borrowed clothing.

Having got something started, both the prime movers want to retire to the fringe of their movement and spend more time getting back on their feet financially. They feel that the way the thing is set up, it is virtually self-operating and self-multiplying. Because of the absence of figureheads and the fact that there is no formal body of belief to promote, they have no fears that Alcoholics Anonymous will degenerate into a cult.

The self-starting nature of the movement is apparent from letters in the files of the New York office. Many persons have written in saying that they stopped drinking as soon as they read the book, and made their homes meeting places for small local chapters. Even a fairly large unit, in Little Rock, got started in this way. An Akron civil engineer and his wife, in gratitude for his cure four years ago, have been steadily taking alcoholics into their home. Out of thirty-five such wards, thirty-one have recovered.

Twenty pilgrims from Cleveland caught the idea in Akron and returned home to start a group of their own. From Cleveland, by various means, the movement has spread to Chicago, Detroit, St. Louis, Los Angeles, Indianapolis, Atlanta, San Francisco, Evansville, and other cities. An alcoholic Cleveland newspaperman with a surgically collapsed lung moved to Houston for his health. He got a job on a Houston paper and, through a series of articles which he wrote for it, started an A.A. unit which now has thirty-five members. One Houston member has moved to Miami and is now laboring to snare some of the more eminent winter-colony luses. A Cleveland traveling salesman is responsible for starting small units in many different parts of the country. Fewer than half of the AA. members have ever seen Griffith or Dr. Armstrong.

To an outsider who is mystified, as most of us are, by the antics of problem-drinking friends, the results which have been achieved are amazing. This is especially true of the more virulent cases, a few of which are herewith sketched under names that are not their own.

Sarah Martin was a product of the F. Scott Fitzgerald era. Born of wealthy parents in a Western city, she went to Eastern boarding schools and "finished" in France. After making her debut, she married. Sarah spent her nights drinking and dancing until daylight. Her husband had a weak stomach, and she became disgusted with him. They were quickly divorced. After her father's fortune had been erased in 1929, Sarah got a job in New York and supported herself. In 1932, she was informed that she had tried to throw herself out a window. During another bout, she did jump or fall--she doesn't remember which--out of a first-floor window. She landed face first on the sidewalk and was laid up for six months for bonesetting, dental work, and plastic surgery.

In 1936, Sarah Martin decided that if she changed her environment by returning to the United States, she would be able to drink normally. This childish faith in geographical change is a classic delusion which all alcoholics get at one time or another. She was drunk all the way home on the boat. New York frightened her and she drank to escape it. Her money ran out and she borrowed from friends. When the friends cut her, she hung around Third Avenue bars, cadging drinks from strangers. Up to this point, she had diagnosed her trouble as a nervous breakdown. Not until she had committed herself to several sanitariums did she realize, through reading, that she was an alcoholic. On advice of a staff doctor, she got in touch with an Alcoholics Anonymous group. Today, she has another good job and spends many of her nights sitting on hysterical women drinkers to prevent them from diving out of windows. In her late thirties, Sarah Martin is an attractively serene woman. The Paris surgeons did handsomely by her.

Watkins is a shipping clerk in a factory. Injured in an elevator mishap in 1927, he was furloughed with pay by a company which was thankful that he did not sue for damages. Having nothing to do during a long convalescence, Watkins loafed in speakeasies. Formerly a moderate drinker, he started to go on drunks lasting several months. His furniture went for debt, and his wife fled, taking their three children. In eleven years, Watkins was arrested twelve times and served eight workhouse sentences. Once, in an attack of delirium tremens, he circulated the rumor among the prisoners that the county was poisoning the food in order to reduce the workhouse populations and save expenses. A mess-hall riot resulted. In another fit of D.T.'s, during which he thought the man in the cell above was trying to pour hot lead on him, Watkins slashed his own wrists and throat with a razor blade. While recuperating in an outside hospital, he swore never to drink again. He was drunk before the final bandages were removed. Two years ago, a former drinking companion got him into Alcoholics Anonymous, and he hasn't touched liquor since. His wife and children have returned, and the home has new furniture. Back at work, Watkins has paid off the major part of $2,000 in debts and petty alcoholic thefts and has his eye on a new automobile.

At twenty-two, Tracy, a precocious son of well-to-do parents, was credit manager for an investment-banking firm whose name has become a symbol of the money-mad twenties. After the firm's collapse during the stock-market crash, he went into advertising and worked up to a post which paid him $23,000 a year. On the day his son was born, Tracy was fired. Instead of appearing in Boston to close a big advertising contract, he had gone on a spree and had wound up in Chicago, losing out on the contract. Always a heavy drinker, Tracy became a bum. He tumbled on canned heat and hair tonic and begged from cops, who are always easy touches for amounts up to a dime. On one sleety night, Tracy sold his shoes to buy a drink, putting on a pair of rubbers he had found in a doorway and stuffing them with paper to keep his feet warm.

He started committing himself to sanitariums, more to get in out of the cold than anything else. In one institution, a physician got him interested in the A.A. program. As part of it, Tracy, a Catholic, made a general confession and returned to the church, which he had long since abandoned. He skidded back to alcohol a few times, but after a relapse in February, 1939, Tracy took no more drinks. He has since then beat his way up again to $18,000 a year in advertising.

Victor Hugo would have delighted in Brewster, a heavy-thewed adventurer who took life the hard way. Brewster was a lumberjack, cowhand, and wartime aviator. During the postwar era, he took up flask-toting and was soon doing a Cook's tour of the sanitariums. In one of them, after hearing about shock cures, he bribed the Negro attendant in the morgue, with gifts of cigarettes, to permit him to drop in -each afternoon and meditate over a cadaver. The plan worked well until one day he came upon a dead man who, by a freak of facial contortion, wore what looked like a grin. Brewster met up with the A.A.'s in December, 1938, and after achieving abstinence, got a sales job which involved much walking. Meanwhile, he had got cataracts on both eyes. One was removed, giving him distance sight with the aid of thick-lens spectacles. He used the other eye for close-up vision, keeping it dilated with an eye-drop solution in order to avoid being run down in traffic. Then he developed a swollen, or milk, leg. With these disabilities, Brewster tramped the streets for six months before he caught up with his drawing account. Today, at fifty, still hampered by his physical handicaps, he is making his calls and is earning around $400 a month.

For the Brewsters, the Martins, the Watkinses, the Tracys, and the other reformed alcoholics, congenial company is now available wherever they happen to be. In the larger cities, A.A.'s meet one another daily at lunch in favored restaurants. The Cleveland groups give big parties on New Year's and other holidays, at which gallons of coffee and soft drinks are consumed. Chicago holds open house on Friday, Saturday and Sunday--alternately, on the North, West, and South Sides--so that no lonesome A.A. need revert to liquor over the weekend for lack of companionship. Some play cribbage or bridge, the winner of each hand contributing to a kitty for paying entertainment expenses. The

P.O. Box 91648

Tucson, AZ. 85752

Copyright 1997, 1998 by Wally P.

website: www.aabacktobasics.com

ISBN: 0-9657720-1-2

3) The Steps We Took

by Joe McQ

Copyright 1990 by Joe McQ

Published by August House, Inc.

P.O. Box 3223

Little Rock, Arkansas 72203

501-372-5450

ISBN: 0-87483-115-2

4) Searcy's Book

Two Different Proven Methods on How to Experience the Twelve Steps of AA

by Searcy W.

P.O. Box 35865

2523B Bomar St.

Dallas, TX. 75235

214-357-1478

5) The Primary Purpose Group BIG Book Study

Copyright 2000

by Clifford B. and Myers R.

email: CBBB164@aol.com

6) The Little Red Book

Hazelden

ISBN: 1-56838-149-2

7) An Unofficial Guide to the Twelve Steps

Written by A.A. Members in Texas

Edited by Paul O.

31352 Flying Cloud Dr.

Laguna Niguel, California 92677

8) Father Fred and the Twelve Steps

A Primer for Recovery

Copyright 1996

Published by Ambassador Books, Inc.

71 Elm Street

Worcester, MA. 01609

1-800-577-0909

ISBN: 0-9646439-8-7

Hope this is helpful. Take it easy & God bless!

Just Love,

Barefoot Bill

-----Original Message-----

From: Travis, Trysh [mailto:ttravis@mail.smu.edu]

Sent: Sunday, July 20, 2003 2:47 PM

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Subject: Special Interpretations and Guides

For a book I am writing that talks about the role of books and reading within 12 Step fellowships, I am interested in the history of these "interpretations" and "guides"-- both those published by AA individuals and groups (like the Akron "Guide to the 12 Steps"), and those published by

That was as far as their courtship went. With the exception of two hard working years as an intern, he was seldom sober. Still, Anne, waiting for a miracle, married no one else.

The miracle happened, apparently, after a year-long period of heavy drinking left him terrified and on the wagon. In 1915 when he was 35 years old and some 17 years after he had first met her, he married Anne and brought her to Akron with him as his bride. They were happy for several years - until the Eighteenth Amendment was passed.

The Grapevine, the official magazine of Alcoholics Anonymous, explains in the weird logic of the alcoholic what happened then. Dr. Bob figured that since he'd soon be unable to get any more alcohol, he might as well drink up what there was. Despite prohibition, he never found it difficult to get more. From then on, he had a regular pattern. He began drinking every afternoon at four. Every morning he'd quiet his tortured nerves with sedatives and, trembling, go to work to make enough money to buy alcohol for four o'clock.

That went on for 15 years.

In the meantime, a New York broker who had drunk himself out of prominence discovered that when he was trying to talk drunks into going on the wagon, he had less craving for liquor. This broker, known to A.A.'s as Bill W., went to Akron on a business deal in 1935. The deal fell through and Bill found himself once more a failure, with only 2$ in his pocket. He knew right away that he had his choice: find a drunk to talk to, or get drunk himself.

Fortunately, he found a drunk, Dr. Bob.

Bill moved in with Dr. Bob and straightened him out. When he and Dr. Bob wanted a drink, they'd go out and find a drunk to talk to. They sobered up a number of habitual drinkers in Akron that way and then their fame began reaching out to other cities. Slowly, gradually, the idea spread.

Almost before Dr. Bob and Bill, the co-founders, were aware of it, Alcoholics Anonymous was a going concern.

The book, Alcoholics Anonymous, was written. It is now in its 13th printing. People began to write in from all over the world. Some were alcoholics themselves, some were mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, husbands, wives or friends of alcoholics. They all got an answer.

Dr. Bob, who had devoted half his life to drinking, still found himself a slave to alcohol - only now it was on the other fellow's breath. He personally visited some 5,000 alcoholics in Akron hospitals, encouraging them. As his period of sobriety increased, more and more patients came to him, and it looked as though one part of his ambition, to own a convertible, might not be impossible after all.

As far back as 1930, interest in the study of alcohol began at Yale in the Laboratory of Applied Physiology with the issuance of scientific papers and the collection of information amassed in previous years. Biochemists, researchers in sociology, economists and psychologists began to make surveys and to seek scientific answers to the many questions people were asking about the use and effects of alcohol.

In 1943 the pressure of public interest led to the establishment of a summer school of studies at Yale which has been operating ever since. It is usually attended by representatives of the distilling and brewing industries, five or six professional temperance people, a dozen physicians, and about the same number of nurses, 25 to 30 ministers, 30 to 40 social workers and probation officers, 30 to 40 who are engaged in education, a few judges, and a few members of "Alcoholics Anonymous" who are engaged in teaching or in industrial personnel work.

More than 1,600 have graduated from the school and a large proportion is making use of this training in State and local, voluntary and governmental agencies dealing with problems of alcohol and alcoholism. At least 75 have become executive directors of such groups.

With the co-operation of the Connecticut Prison Association, an outpatient clinic just for alcoholics was begun in 1944, and a year later the first State Commission on Alcoholism was established by Connecticut and Dr. Bacon has been its chairman ever since. In 1940 the Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol was started. The Center also published a series of 15-page pamphlets that have been in unusual demand for such technical material.

The Yale Center now has six major divisions and is primarily interested in popular education on the subject of alcohol and research in certain areas of social and health problems, such as drunken driving, the problem drinker in industry and related subjects.

The interview with Dr. Bacon follows:

Q: Is yours the only center of scientific studies on alcohol in this country, Dr. Bacon?

A: It is the only one. We think it would be a healthier thing if there were two in the country. We had hoped that one would start down in Texas. Dr. Jellineck left us to go there and start such a center, but it finally broke up. He has since become the head of the World Health Organization Committee on Alcoholism.

Q: What is the alcohol problem?

A: There are several types of problems. There are scientific problems, there are group problems, and there are individual problems. But it is pretty impossible to separate them. Take, for example, the particular problem of alcoholism: If anybody wants to say it is a mental problem, I'd say they are absolutely correct; if anybody wants to say it's a legal problem, they are absolutely correct--or an economic problem or a medical problem or a social problem.

Q: Most people are not alcoholic, are they?

A: We would say that there are approximately 60 to 70 million drinkers out of a population of 110 million people of 15 years of age and over. We would suggest that there are just short of 4 million out of that 60 to 70 million who are patently losing, or have lost, their control, and their lives are beginning to show, or have already shown, damage in one or more aspects.

Q: Then the difference between the heavy drinker and the alcoholic is that the alcoholic has lost control?

A: Yes, but there is no real line between them, no clear-cut example.

Q: But only 1 person out of 16 who drinks is an alcoholic, is that right?

A: Yes.

Q: Is that proportion rising?

A: The best-known estimate is that developed by Dr. Jellinek which shows that between 1940 and 1948 there seemed to be a rather regular increase, and that in '49 and '50 it reached, so to speak, a plateau, and may show some indication of going down. However, remember this, that it takes from 6 or 7 to 20 years for alcoholism to develop, so if you are trying to think of a rise between 1940 and 1947 don't think of what happened between 1940 and 1947 alone, although what happened then might have speeded it up.

Q: It could go back to the depression years?

A: Yes.

Q: Does your research show that alcohol is injurious to the human body?

A: Alcohol oxidizes when it gets into the human system. It oxidizes at the rate of an ounce in two or three hours. For 100-proof whisky, which is 50 per cent alcohol, that means that 8 ounces of whisky would be all gone from the system in less than 12 hours, most of it breathed away, some lost through sweat or urine. This proportion would vary with an individual's weight and also with the amount of food he had in his stomach. Then the alcohol is gone. Even in the most pronounced binges, you lose it all in 48 hours. Chemical tests show that.

Q: What does it do to the body? Why cirrhosis of the liver and so on?

A: The actual answer to cirrhosis is not known, but I think the most prevalent theory is this: The liver under certain circumstances will tend to develop what is called "fatty tissue." In other words, you get fat mounting up there, which cuts down the function of the liver. Now there is an agent--probably this is over simplified--that counteracts this tendency, so that the fatty tissue doesn't last and finally take over the whole organ.

Some of us have stronger counteragents and some of us have weaker counteragents. Those who have weaker counteragents are very likely to develop cirrhosis of the liver--and they may never have had a drop of alcohol in their lives! Or they could be persons who take a drink once or twice a year, at wedding ceremonies or something, and they get cirrhosis.

Some have very strong counteragents and they can drink the alleged fantastic amounts that they say they do--a quart and a half every day of their lives, and so on.

Anyway, when you take a person who may be just below average in his counteragent effect, alcohol does--this is one theory--so reduce the effect of this weaker counterpart that this fatty tissue begins to form a little more and a little more, especially in the case of people who drink a great deal and continuously.

It may take 10 years before it begins to show up. Then you begin to get hobnail liver and the like so that just by palpation (touching the body from the outside) you can feel these hard spots where this fatty tissue has developed.

Q: What do you mean by "a great deal"?

A: You have to consider the person's weight and so on, but let's say he is drinking pretty regularly a pint of whisky every day. It will vary with the liver, of course. Even with the weakest liver in the world, you are not going to get cirrhosis automatically.

Q: What about the heart?

A: I am no expert on that, but I will leave some suggestions on it. Your question is out of my field and this answer certainly should not be regarded as authoritative from a medical viewpoint. But there is an action on the arteries from alcohol which will make it easier for blood to flow. So that if you begin to get a condition similar to, let's say, arteriosclerosis a certain amount of alcohol--and I don't recommend alcohol as the best way of doing this--may grant one a certain amount of relief from the hardening-artery situation, and there will be a little less effort on the part of the heart to pump and keep the blood going.

Diseases of Alcoholism

Q: Is that why patients with a heart condition are given alcohol?

A: I don't think so. I don't think many physicians know much about alcohol as such, anyway. Why should they? They don't get any training on it. It isn't mentioned in medical schools, except for the alcoholic diseases which are found in probably less than 25 per cent of the alcoholics in some countries and I think a smaller proportion in this country.

Delirium tremens, alcoholic hallucinosis, chronic avitaminosis, chronic gastritis, other things--and these are recognizable conditions, illnesses that would be discovered and labeled by any competent physician--which follow upon years of excessive drinking--are called the diseases of alcoholism. If you find delirium tremens in 18, 19 or 20-year-olds, I think you have good grounds for suspecting a psychotic condition set off or merely aggravated by alcohol.

Q: From the ordinary use of alcohol, what would you say is the effect on the heart? Is it helpful or harmful?

A: I wouldn't say that it was particularly one or the other until you get into conditions relating to certain ages, as, say, 50 beyond, in which it may serve a useful function.

Q: Doesn't it cause an immediate palpitation of the heart? Doesn't a drink cause the heart to beat faster?

A: I can't answer that question. By the way, you can see almost any bad reaction you want to see after the injection of alcohol following certain situations, but whether that is caused by alcohol or not--

Where Textbooks Mislead

Q: Physiology books in school used to warn against the use of alcohol, and one of the ways they did it was to tell you that it caused immediate stimulus and as soon as the stimulus had worn off you would have a certain fatigue and a certain reaction. Therefore, alcohol, in stimulating the heart, was harmful. That was in the textbooks in the old days. Is the modern theory any different?

A: We made a survey in 1940 of all the textbooks being used. I think what was done was to pick out 10 common fallacies--such as alcohol is a stimulant, alcohol causes certain diseases, alcohol does something to the brain tissue, drinking causes shortening of life, and so forth--all beliefs that have been disproved by objective and empiric evidence that could be repeated in any laboratory--and checked the tests against these fallacies.

Q: This was a survey you conducted on those fallacies?

A: Well, first, we know the fallacies. We had worked on them in our own laboratory. Then we went out and, as far as we could, -studied every text that was used in a school system, whether parochial or State, all the manuals put out by the State bureaus on alcoholic education, all the temperance stuff and checked to see how widespread these fallacies were. And about 98 per cent of the books had these fallacies.

Q: What does alcohol supply? What is it that people seek?

A: There is one very good answer: Alcohol--and I don't care in what form you get it as long as it's ethyl alcohol--is what is called a "sedative." I am merely repeating their statements of the pharmacologists, the physiologists and the biochemists. Under the sedatives they would subclassify it as a "depressant." This means that it tends to produce sleep finally. But it does so in a very special way--namely, that you can take just a little bit and it will have a slight depressant action. No matter how little you take, it will hit certain central nervous functions.

Incidentally, the outward behavior of the person may seem just the opposite of being "depressed"; what happens is that certain controls are reduced; it is more like releasing a brake; it is not a stimulant, not stepping on an accelerator.

Then you drink a little more and it hits the central nervous structure more; a little more, it hits still more; and finally you will go to sleep. If somebody should then inject more while your are asleep finally the heart would "forget," if you like, and you would drop dead. You already will have been dropped, however, before that takes place.

It's lucky, shall we say, that it is very difficult to drink yourself to death. You could do it, but it takes quite a few minutes for the alcohol to get into operation. Drinking at any ordinary speed would result in one's passing out before a fatal amount was consumed. But if you drank a quart or a quart and a half just as fast as you could, possibly injecting it into your system, you might kill yourself.

Q: Alcohol is a poison?

A: On the basis that any substance you take can kill you, yes. But this is also true of mashed potatoes.

Why People Drink

Q: Well, why do people drink? If it is a sedative, why would people go through all this just to go to sleep?

A: In the early stages, alcohol has this reaction: You relax, you operate more slowly, or you operate with less efficiency and exactitude and discrimination. This takes place first in those areas in which "learning" is recent or difficult or painful. Now as to this learning, if we had an experiment here and sat here and went around learning the names of the States or 15 varieties of flowers, that might be interesting and prove the point. If you were tested on this learning you might get a score of 95. After one or two small drinks, however, you would only score perhaps 85. If geography or the study of flowers had always been painful or difficult for you, your sober score might be 88, but after one or two small drinks it might drop to 65.

But for human beings, this sort of learning is not too important.

Learning that is important for us in the sense that it affects our daily lives and carries heavy emotional impact would concern such things as, perhaps, one's perception of one's self. "Am I a pretty reasonable sort of guy? Do most people think I'm a stinker? Am I weak? Am I stupid? Am I sexually rather impotent, so that no woman would ever be interested in me?" --or, if a woman--"Would any man ever look at me," and "I can never be a mother." This sort of learning is very painful. It may take over 15 to 20 years to learn, and it is horrible to live with. Or there is the matter of not being able to assert one's self, to stand up in competition with others.

We know of people who are frightened in these ways. They may have the capacity, the ability, and so forth, to live adequately and happily--but they can't exercise it.

Q: So they take to alcohol to forget all this?

A: Well, this is what happens--this is the sort of learning that is first realized: Here's a fellow who is very shy in a group. He has a couple of drinks and loses some of that very painful learning (shyness or exhibitionism are learned modes of behavior) temporarily, so that now he can talk a little more freely. He suddenly forgets that he is incompetent or frightened.

Q: His inhibitions are gone?

A: They are not gone--they are temporarily reduced.

Q: Would you consider, then, to that extent that alcohol can serve a useful purpose?

A: Well, you selected the word "useful." I didn't. Let's take an example: This man on my left may be my boss. I think he is an awful stuffed shirt and I want to punch his face in and tell him he's an old jackass. However, I have learned to control such impulses. But now I have a few drinks and say, "You're an old jackass." Well, that probably didn't turn out very useful.

Q: But couldn't it be the opposite? Couldn't it relax the fellow who is too shy to stand up and address a group and help him to forget about his shyness?

A: Well, here is a classic example: There was the man in Germany in 1888 or so who moved to a new town. He was quite a shot, and they have a rifle club there and they go out to see Herr von What's-his-name and ask him if he can shoot. He says, "Sure," and goes boom, boom, boom, and gets 20 bull's eyes out of 20 shots. So they ask him if he would like to join the team when they go over and play Von Sedlitzville. All right. So they make him anchor man down there, but old Boom-boom-boom gets 12 on the bull's eye, 6 on the outside, and so forth. "Oh, well. He was upset, he was new." So they try him again, and again he's a failure. But in the interim he is out on the range practicing and hitting 20 out of 20. One day somebody by mistake or something happened upon this: "Just before the meet we will give him a couple of drinks." He goes up and, instead of hitting only 12 out of 20, he gets 17.

How Score Can Rise, But Ability Fall

Now what has happened is this: The alcohol has reduced his acuity, his reaction time, his discrimination, so that he could not get 20 out of 20, but it has also reduced his inhibition, his fear, or whatever it was that was bothering him in competitive situations, so that he doesn't drop way down to 12. Alcohol actually seems to improve his ability, but it has also actually brought his abilities down. Is it useful?

The problem here is not the answer. It is the question. Americans always want black-and-white, or yes-and-no, answers to questions concerning good and bad, or true and false. Most questions, unfortunately, cannot realistically be answered in such simplicity. Alcohol is not either useful or nonuseful. It is clearly both, depending on the person, situation, amount and many other variables.

What Makes An Alcoholic

Q: What is your answer to the question as to what makes an alcoholic? Most people don't know what the word means. Most people don't understand why, since they can take a drink every day in their homes and never get drunk, all of a sudden somebody comes along and takes one drink and he's under the table. Why is that?

A: I can't accept the example of one drink and under the table. An alcoholic might pass out after taking one drink while you watched him. He would have had 20 drinks previously without your knowledge. Sometimes people who are utterly inexperienced will act, following a drink, in ways they think to be "tight" or "high." Adolescents experimenting with alcohol may show behavioral responses utterly inexplicable from the action of the small amounts they have consumed.

However, it's hard to believe that even they would fall under a table with one drink.

Q: What about the difference between the person who takes a drink every day and is not an alcoholic and the person who drinks a little now and then and is an alcoholic?

A: We would say that there are probably two important criteria to distinguish the alcoholic from what might be termed the "heavy drinker." One of them is this: the lack of control exhibited by the individual over, first, when or if he will drink. That is, "Will I drink this afternoon, or not?" Of course, he is going to drink sometime. Second is the loss of control over the extent to which he will drink. That is, sometimes he has decided he will sit down for two and suddenly finds he is having his sixth drink. And when I say, "decided," I mean that this can even be announced. It is not only internal, which can be discovered by an objectively trained observer, but he may even say, "I've got this meeting coming up," or "My kid's having a birthday party and I'm not going to take a drink." Then to his own amazement, shock and horror, he finds himself having drinks.

The other is that he plans to have three drinks but--not every time, but with increasing frequency--he takes 30 or 40 and is drinking to oblivion. He's out of control. That is one aspect.

The other we would say--and this must happen eventually--is that this excessive drinking, through drunken behavior, begins to create problems of itself--remorse, anger toward others, guilt, feelings of inferiority, helplessness, and so forth, within the individual, and manifest signs appear of trouble in his relations with his social environment, that is with friends, family, on the job and the like.

This man is having his "status quo" as an individual regularly damaged because of this drinking. Now, it is those two things--chronic and increasing damage directly related to drinking, and the lack of control over drinking--which mark the alcoholic from the "heavy drinker."

Q: Do you think that a person who is a chronic drinker inevitably becomes an alcoholic?

A: No, that isn't so. There are millions of regular drinkers who aren't and won't become alcoholics.

Q: Well, then, what is it that encourages the chronic drinker into the alcoholic stage?

A: But the alcoholic doesn't have to be a chronic drinker. Of course, if I could give you the answer just like ABC, we wouldn't have to be here, because it would be something we would know how to fix. We have some ideas about it,

however.

Let's say that we have a number of people who meet these two criteria--they are out of control, which has gone on over some period of time, and some socially or emotionally significant aspect of their lives has been damaged thereby. I think we will find that there are quite a few different types.

Major Problem for Some is Psychotic

One type I would call "adjunctive" alcoholism. That is not a technical term; I just use it. Here is a man who from the point of view of the depth of his condition, the difficulty of treating it, and its impact on his whole life is more importantly affected by something other than his drinking problem. He is what the psychiatrists call psychotic or protopsychotic, if there is such a term. And he has found, or thinks he has found, that getting drunk relieves the horrible feelings of psychosis. His psychotic symptoms are not extreme, so the manifestations don't strike you or the man on the street or the cop on the corner, except in rare instances.

But he gets drunk 30, 40, 50 times a year, and the "drunkenness" behavior is noticeable. This, if you like, is a facade, the appearance of the condition. He may well be called a "damned drunk" or "inebriate," or whatever the term happens to be. He is haled into court, the social worker will see him, the minister will see him, his wife will scream, his boss will fire him, and so forth, and he will be called an alcoholic. And maybe he is developing alcoholism, but his major problem is something else. We find this with certain types of psychotics.

Q: Are there quite a few of that type?

A: I would say that, although our figures are not too good, there are quite a few. I would say that a number of epileptics can be found here, because alcohol apparently reduces the strength of the trigger mechanism that sets off the epileptic seizure.

People who have brief epileptic seizures like that--3-second attacks, so that all you notice is that sometimes the person doesn't seem to be paying attention to you--may gain some relief from using alcohol. The man may not understand it, but he drinks and he feels better. And he had better look out. Because the day one starts using alcohol as a medicine for a chronic condition, he is using a sedative for privately defined purposes.

Q: Then aren't you finding that mental-hygiene problems are closely related to alcoholism?

A: Very.

Q: So that some people who have mental or emotional aberrations of one kind or another become alcoholics?

A: Yes, they might try to find relief in this way. However, I would say that the larger number of people who are neurotic--and I mean here psychiatrically determined neurosis--although they have the opportunity to drink, do not become alcoholic. While excessive drinking may have relieved some emotional pain, it was not acceptable to them for a variety of reasons. Maybe their own neurotic pattern was functional enough for them to meet their troubles. Maybe they were brought up to believe that getting drunk is a horrible evil, far worse than their neurotic pain.

Let me say that the likelihood of a woman who is neurotic becoming regularly and often rather drunk, perhaps even developing into an alcoholic, is much less likely than in the case of a man, because the social pressures on drunkenness are much heavier against a woman than a man in our society. As a result, it is a less likely sort of adjustment to problems for women in our society.

Mental Problems

Q: Let's take it in reverse. Aren't the people who are trying to cure alcoholism aware today of the fact that they have to cure the mental problems as well?

A: This calls for a lot of comment. First, Let me say none of us accepts the word "cure."

That is one of these words I would like to eliminate because we say that no alcoholic is ever cured--it is merely an arrested condition.

Q: Does that mean that alcoholism is a disease?

A: Only to this point--that to our knowledge it cannot be helped to the extent that the person can relearn how to become a social, temperate, moderate drinker.

Q: He must give it up completely?

A: Absolutely, forever, in any form, in any amount. We have cases of people who had stopped for 15 years and who thought it was safe, or some naive doctor told them a beer isn't really drinking, and so they go on again--

Q: And it takes very little quantity--

A: It's the alcohol. The quantity doesn't matter, no. If they are unaware that they are taking alcohol, if they don't even know about it, or in some circumstances if the ingestion is interpreted in so ritualized a fashion that it has nothing whatsoever to do with "drinking" as that is interpreted by the individual, then there might--and I emphasize the "might"--be no effect. I still wouldn't be surprised if it did start him off again.

Take the Catholic priest who is a recovered alcoholic. At Mass, as I understand it, nobody gets any wine at all except the priest; sometimes he may have to take quite a little because it all has to be used. I have heard, and I would believe that in the case of certain priests who were recovered alcoholics, that this ingestion of alcohol--because chemically that is what it is--did not cause the man to revert to alcoholism. Certainly a sincere priest would not interpret this act as "drinking." However, it would seem a great risk to run.

Alcoholism in Feeble-Minded

Q: Well, do you think that if we make progress with mental hygiene in America we will tend to reduce alcoholism?

A: We will reduce that proportion that I was speaking of. I started off with the worst, the psychotics and pronounced neurotics.

Q: What are some of the others?

A: There is a certain proportion that are feeble-minded. We would say that the proportion of alcoholism in the feeble-minded is much higher than it is in the general population. But, altogether, it's a small number. The feeble-minded, the psychotic and the epileptic are three categories in what I termed adjunctive alcoholics. The person who begins to act like an alcoholic at 17, 18 or 19 presents at least a strong suspicion of a major neurotic or approaching psychotic situation, perhaps schizophrenia.

Ordinarily alcoholism will take anywhere from 7 to 15 years to develop from the early -symptoms to the final full-blown appearance. But with major neurotic conditions the development may take less than a year.

Q: Are these the only groups who are likely to turn from social drinking to excessive drinking?

A: On, no. This is just one small segment. I would say that we have some people that are called "neurotic." Now, what I mean by "neurotic" is approximately this: His peer group--we will say "his" and not "her" because we run 5 1/2 males to one female--thought at the time, say during the teens, that the individual was clearly peculiar.

They are "screwballs," or whatever the popular word is among their group, and they are known as that by the others. They're frightened, they're shy, they don't get along well in interpersonal relationships, they don't know how to fight, they don't know how to date, they don't know how to dance, they don't know how to dress, and so forth. They may study excessively, they may be highly overcompensating athletes who are terrified of other people, they may be "mother's boys." And the others recognize it, and it is noticeably interfering with their day-to-day life. This person at 16, 17 or 18 may discover alcohol. He may not even know that he has discovered it. He may go to his first party and have some drinks and simply know that, "Gee, when I go to the Joneses on Saturdays I have a wonderful time!"

But after several experiences he can't help making the correct discrimination because he went to Green's house and it was Thursday and there were drinks and he had a wonderful time, and the next Saturday he went to the Joneses, had no drinks and he felt awful. This person, then, begins to find that with drinks he can act more like a human being, that he is accepted by others, and there is this tremendous relief--"My God, I can be a human being after all!"

The group of alcoholics with this background, I would say, is more sizable than the psychotics. But I would not say that they are all the alcoholics by any means. Anybody who tries to explain alcoholism entirely in terms of basic or character neurosis faces an impasse.

Preventing Neurosis

Q: If we should make more progress in mental hygiene will we make more progress in the field of alcoholism?

A: As mental hygiene is able to do something about the prevention of psychosis, for this percentage, yes. As it is able to do something for the prevention of neurosis, or social or emotional deviation, obviously for a bigger percentage, yes.

But, then, take this even large group of alcoholics who don't give evidence of early neurosis. You only discover them when they are 40. You go back through their life histories and you can't find in the school record any evidence that they were peculiar--they were just like everybody else.

Now everybody--and this is pertinent to the mental-hygiene question--everybody has personality difficulties. We all of us have stronger and weaker spots in emotional and social adjustment by definition. Some of us are quite well adjusted in relationships with the opposite sex on a series of levels, whether it refers to actual sexual intercourse or whether it refers merely to talking to secretaries. Some of us are average and some of us are a little more or a little less well adjusted. Some of us in the matter of competition and assertion and dominance are stronger or weaker. All of us have certain weak spots. We are not robots.

Let's say that I am weak when it comes to asserting myself with people in a higher status or with older men. Maybe it has something to do with early experiences with my father or my older brother. Anyway, it is a common thing.

It is found in personnel problems all the time. You promote a good man and he collapses. Why? He cannot give orders on a higher level.

A boy is, let us say, now 23, 24, 25, and he has all the ambitions that most young American men have, and he feels a little more at ease, a little more relaxed, and loses a little of this restraint after a few drinks. Well, he says to himself, so do a lot of other people. So what!

Along about age 25, 26, 27, this particular problem becomes even more significant to him. The boy is no longer in the school or college situation and can't fall into one of those nicely defined categories where this is the faculty, these are my elders, these only lower classmen, and begins to realize that he is a competitive person, too.

He, too, can get up there and can even disagree with those people. In fact, the situation demands that he compete. This makes him somewhat ill at ease, but over the week end when he has a cocktail, some highballs, or whatever it may be, he loses some of his fears and anxieties on this score, and this loss becomes highly important.

There would seem to be a point, as we recapture the life experience of the alcoholic, where there suddenly is an increase in the intake. Let's say that in his group they usually have, say, three cocktails two nights a week and on Saturday nights. This man's intake jumps up

50 percent--

When Drinking Gets Serious

Q: Is this suddenly?

A: It would seem so. At least the man remembers it, and so do some of his friends. Then he begins to show all sorts of symptoms, but I will skip all of them and go right into the possible mental-hygiene aspect of it. He begins to increase the time of drinking and may have a couple in the afternoon. He may even shift jobs so that he may get into a position where this sort of thing is more possible. He may shift friends so that he associates frequently with those among whom heavier drinking is socially acceptable.

And we will find that he is making certain decisions and is meeting certain people particularly at the times when he can have a few drinks--not that he is going out and hanging on to lampposts. He may tie one on now and then if the people in his group tie one on. But he is regularly drinking more. Perhaps he is meeting problems with his wife or his kids that have made him very uneasy. He can't stand the kids at supper time, and he is afraid his wife expects him to do things he can't do, but if he has two cocktails every night he no longer notices their criticisms, their requests for his attention. He may be abrupt and even a little sarcastic with them, and doesn't know that he is doing it.

This is a very slow, gradual process. We call it the "pampering effect" of alcohol. There was a weak spot in his personality armament and, instead of trying something new and learning through variation, no, he protects himself more and more by alcohol. The needs for the personality go on and new needs come up, especially in the weakest areas, and this fellow is not learning, he is not growing, he is not changing, but more and more is covering it up.

Then, if the situation develops whereby he is put under some special pressure, he may--and it is three o'clock in the afternoon--say, "If only I had a couple of drinks!" And he's right--because he has those couple of drinks and it doesn't bother him so much. Then occasionally begins to get drunk. Now, when he gets drunk, he has not only the remorse that any might have who experience a -hang-over, but also has this awful remorse about the situation which he didn't resolve and about what he did while drunk, plus the fact, "I've done it before and before and before, and I can't stop it!" He experiences a monumental psychological effect from the hang-over.

A vicious-circle process can now be seen. As the individual more and more depends on alcohol to meet certain situations--and for a while he is successful, for it does work--he is, through lack of exercise, so to speak, reducing his basic equipment to meet other people and particular types of situations effectively. As this happens, he needs a little more. As he begins to take a little more, he begins to make "drunkenness" mistakes. In other words, he could be overly aggressive and doesn't even know it; you can be critical of him, and he doesn't even notice.

Pretty soon the liabilities of drinking -overtake the assets. Furthermore, occasionally he oversteps and really gets drunk and does things that create new, major difficulties, so he has to get over this additional problem. To cover up this new problem created by the excessive use of alcohol, he uses more alcohol, and so the nice little vicious circle becomes a bigger vicious circle.

It may be that a definition of psychological addiction" would be the use of alcohol to overcome the effects of alcohol, whereas when you are merely using alcohol to overcome situational problems or neurotic problems, this is not the case. Then you are drinking to overcome shyness or inferiority feelings, which are not created by alcohol.

Q: Now, where does mental hygiene fit in?

A: We would say two things. First, let's note this fact. Over the past 50 years, which is at longest the reign of modern psychiatry--and perhaps you would prefer 25 years--psychiatrists have been peculiarly unsuccessful with alcoholics. The psychiatrists know this and dislike the alcoholics; the alcoholics know this and dislike the psychiatrists. And so the hope of doing anything, one with the other is, of course, very low. Psychiatrists are not alone in that, however--it covers everybody else, too.

Slips In Psychiatry

Q: But why have the psychiatrists, if this is a mental-hygiene problem, not done better?

A: One answer to that would be that the psychiatrist, quite correctly, sees that this person has personality difficulties and in some instances they see a long-lasting character neurosis, one that's been in the developmental stages for years, perhaps since the age of 4 or 5. So the psychiatrist says that, unless we get rid of this thing at the bottom, we are just playing games with the thing at the top.

So the alcoholic comes into the office and the psychiatrist starts needling back into this, perhaps, adolescent problem, and then back to the 7 or 3-year-old period. The alcoholic looks at the psychiatrist and wonders, "Which one of us is screwy?" Here he is; his wife is going to toss him out on his ear, he can't hold food on his stomach, his glasses are smashed, he has lost his papers, he is going to lose his job. He has this horrible feeling of fear, of additional worry about this alcohol business, and here this weird character is asking him what dreams he had about his great-grandmother when he was 4 years old.

Q: That's an exaggeration, of course--

A: Yes it is, but it is significant of a very important thing: The psychiatrist, very correctly, proceeds on the premise that there were underlying difficulties much more significant than the actual effect of the alcohol. And so they begin to talk about alcohol as a symptom, but I would suggest to you that, as the alcoholic has gone through alcoholic experiences for many years, he is no longer merely a neurotic type B or a neurotic type C. He may once have fitted such a label, but now he has added alcohol-dependency and has fused the two into something new. He has problems, demanding problems, problems that have gone so deeply into his insides that this alcohol will trigger him off even 15 to 20 years later, even if he never takes a drink in the interim. The alcohol dependence is terribly important in itself. It is a new thing. It is what we call "alcoholism."

Q: So you do have your original problem in personality and mental hygiene?

A: Yes--and perhaps you can tie this original to poor neighborhoods, unresolved Oedipus complexes, lack of affection, and so forth, yes. But, unless there is also understanding of the impact of excessive and chronic alcohol ingestion and what it can do to an emerging, growing personality, therapy won't get very far.

In the first place, you will have a lot of alcoholics who won't have what you would call a neurosis, and yet they are just as bad as the other fellows in the end. When you get the one who has this real neurotic problem you probably can't reach him by the usual psychiatric technique because, as the psychiatrist would put it, he is an objectionable, un-co-operative person--and that is right.

Heredity

Q: Is there any inherent tendency to become an alcoholic? You hear of people referred to as a natural for alcoholism--

A: Let's put it this way: Acquired characteristics are not inherited--that is, you cannot inherit a taste for alcohol. You do not inherit drinking. Alcoholism? There is an inherited structure which is closely related to one's potentiality to develop an effective personality. So, since weaker personalities are prone to maladjustments of all sorts, including alcoholism, yes.

We say that alcoholism is found to a higher degree among the feeble-minded than the rest of the population. Certain of the feeble-minded probably have a structured, organic deficiency which can be inherited. However, they inherit feeble-mindedness, not alcoholism.

Q: I want to clear up this heredity question a little bit. Do I understand you to say that, while there is no acquired taste, if a parent has a personality defect, and that defect is reproduced in the child--

A: It couldn't be personality--it would have to be an organic defect.

Q: Well, does that cause the child to take to drink?

A: The organic defect does not cause the individual to drink. The organic defect has an effect on their ability to intellectually or in reaction time or in emotional spasms or in certain diseases, say, tuberculosis.

Q: If that is reproduced in the child, then the child will be susceptible to the same thing?

A: It will be susceptible to personality disorders, sometimes alcoholism, sometimes delinquency or neuroses. Now, I should add one more thing--that alcoholism runs in families.

Q: What is the reason that it runs in families?

A: Because the father or the mother who is an alcoholic finds it almost impossible to give love and affection and attention and responsibility to anybody, especially to a child, who may well make him feel guilty and the like. This is, of course, particularly true of the mother. The situation in which the alcoholic's children live, the way they are brought up, just everything, tends to make them upset people. Sometimes they will become extreme, wild "drys," ascetics; sometimes they will become extreme drunks. Sometimes they may be moderate drinkers. But they experience hardships of an emotional nature during infancy, childhood and adolescence if the parent is an alcoholic.

I might add something else here. Alcoholism cuts across all social groups, all educational groups, all occupational groups. It is limited to certain age groups, yes, largely because it is a slowly (10-15 years) developing condition; it is most common between 35 and 55. It differs by sex, yes--5 or 6 men to 1 woman.

And in ethnic, cultural background--we find that the Mediterranean people--the Italians and the Greeks, for example--will tend to have low rates. The Jews, almost all of whom use alcoholic beverages, have an extraordinarily low rate, a fact which has been recognized for over three centuries.

The so-called native white American group will have quite a high rate, as will the Irish, Scandinavian, English, and Polish people.

One noticeable thing is the difference between the sexes. In this country the ratio is about 5 1/2 or 6 to 1; in England for many years, 1890 to 1940, it was running about 2 men to 1 woman; in Scandinavia at the same time it was about 27 men to 1 woman. But it is interesting to note that, after three generations in this country, the Scandinavian rate began to descend to about 11 or 12 to 1, the English to come up to about 4 to 1. Those Jews who have more and more become secularized, gotten away not only from the Orthodox but also from the Conservative or the Reformed--especially if their parents have also--their rate has begun to go up.

In other words, the Americanization process is gradually working in this sphere as well as others.

Symptoms

Q: What are the prealcoholic symptoms?

A: Well, there's an increase in intake--we have the man who is drinking just like the other people in his group. The quantity doesn't matter--it may be six sherries a week, or two highballs a night. This man starts increasing his intake, and he begins to show some of these behaviors--and remember it is the repetition of these behaviors and their patterning with the others, not just their occasional appearance.

The first thing it suggests is an increase in gross, drunken behavior--that is, when he has a little too much, instead of acting the way he used to act when he had a little too much, he begins to be more out of control in his immediate behavior.

You all know that inhibitions go down with drinks--one forgets the immediate worries, the immediate fears. For instance, you're all being very polite here, but if we were at a cocktail party, I couldn't get all this attention. I'd have to talk a little louder; my jokes aren't really very funny, but after two or three drinks they really begin to seem to me to have that particular flavor that would make Noel Coward jealous, and even you may forget a bit and laugh at some of my jokes.

But this is still within the range of social acceptance of that group. This man, however, begins to go beyond that. He starts to be a big shot--spends a lot of money, sets them up for the boys in the back room; he get noisy; certain words which are limited perhaps to times when I hit myself with a hammer begin to come out more and more in general conversation. In a variety of ways this man's behavior more and more often becomes obvious, irritatingly obvious, to the other members of the group when he is drinking.

Dangers in a Blackout

Another thing of considerable significance is the appearance, often very early in the game, of what is called "the blackout" or "pulling a blank"--this is sort of temporary amnesia. The man is drinking along about 7, 7:30 or 8. Now the blackout begins, but, if you're the man you don't know it--You're still around, you're having drinks, you're talking--you may get in a car, and drive 50 miles, you may take a room at a hotel, but memory has stopped completely and one cannot recall anything that has taken place since 8:30.

You can imagine the terrific impact this will have on women in our society, because there is immediately the thought: "I may have had a sexual experience--or other people will think I have, which is just as bad." It is terrifying--less terrifying for a man.

You get situations where a man has a blackout which lasts 36 to 48 hours--he ends up in another city, he doesn't know where he is. He learns to have a newspaper sent up to his room to discover the date and what town he's in. I now of one man who when he came out of the blackout remembered that he was to have signed a $400,000 contract the previous day at 10 a.m. Quickly making himself presentable, he rushed in to the corporation president with whom he was to have closed the deal, made some lame apologies, and hoped the whole thing wasn't off. The corporation president looked at him rather strangely and then stated: "Mr. C., you were here yesterday at 10 a.m. and we signed the agreement." Not all blackouts have this type of surprise for the end of the story.

Then there is the gulping and sneaking--this is an indication that it is not social drinking any more--the fellow has to do more than the social pattern will allow. He needs to get this personality jolt or lift through acquiring a significant and rapid concentration of alcohol in his system--just a little bit doesn't get him started. He begins to know that at the Jones house he will only get a couple of martinis, so before he goes to the Joneses' he usually has a couple of quick ones--he's the fellow who has to help the hostess, and incidentally get a few slugs on the side. He is learning that he must have more.

Now, these are early symptoms.

Q: Can they be corrected? Can he stop?

A: Yes.

Q: Could you give him some rules, Dr Bacon?

A: To know that next he goes into alcoholism--that that is the next step--the first great crucial point, the loss of control. He meant to have two drinks, he winds up drunk. We find that he begins to need special rationalizations to explain his drinking, because people begin to notice he is drinking more. And these rationalizations cover the waterfront--everything you have ever heard of.

At this time he may show a few instances of drinking alone. Drinking alone can be all right under a doctor's prescription, or some people use it to go to sleep, or there may be a religious ritual. But I'm not talking about any of those. He begins to drink alone and likes it. He doesn't need all these other people pressing in on him, he may become a "loner." This is quite usual with women alcoholics for whom social conventions don't allow as many socially acceptable opportunities for drinking. Not all alcoholics are "loners."

Somewhere along in here--it may wait until the later stages--some dear, dear friend or even a physician may advise him during a hang-over--and he gets more hang-overs than others and they hurt him far more than they do other people--that a "quick one" at the beginning of the day will help. Many, many times it becomes humanly impossible for him to think of getting up and going to work and so on without this fortification.

We begin to find some asocial behavior. I am not talking about anything marked. But we do find a little trouble on the job, a little trouble at home, a little trouble here and there, automobile trouble, or what not. It's more than he had been having in the past. It is reported on--quietly. But most of his friends tend to hush up comments about it. Trying to be helpful perhaps, many people try to cover up for him. Of course, he tries to do so also. Naturally, the day of reckoning gets worse as it is postponed. And about this time he may say, "I've got to do something about this." So he tries to change the pattern--a little shift from rye to gin, or he will stop drinking before 5 in the afternoon, or he will only drink at home, never in a commercial place.

Q: Does that help?

A: No. It isn't drinking patterns that are his trouble; it is the excessive ingestion of alcohol. And he can fit that into any pattern of drinking. Being an alcoholic, he will. Pretty soon--and it will be the end of what we call "the early stages"--he may go to get help from a minister, friend or someone outside the family, or he may even go to a sanitarium or a doctor or a hospital. He tries them all out.

The Binge

Now we come to the beginning of the last stage, which is the "binge." We have our own way of talking about a "binge." A person can be completely "blotto" for 48 hours or for a week and we might not call it a binge if this fellow, let's say, is drunk over the week end, but on Monday morning he gets to the job. He may be on a two-week vacation and he is "blotto" for three or four days, but perhaps he has not completely disrupted social expectancy and social habit of his group. But this bird, who has started his week-end drinking about Friday at 2 p.m. and slowly slides off only about Monday noon and doesn't get around to the office till Tuesday--this four days is much more significant than six days on a vacation. The man begins to go on binges which clearly disrupt and insult the society.

At this point, the alcoholic may start getting secretive about his drinking. By now he will have surely learned the morning drink business, and he learns to keep a supply for the morning. He starts hiding his supply and he may develop all the tricky, tricky habits of the confirmed alcoholic and waste extraordinary ingenuity on protecting his secret supply. I call it wasted--sometimes the mental exercise equals Thomas Alva Edison at his best.

I might say that one of the most tragic things in the world is to see an alcoholic who has a half bottle left for the morning which he puts away where the little woman isn't going to find it--only to discover in the morning that he had been in a blackout when he did the hiding.

What a frantic, maddening search will follow!

Finally, a Breakdown

We finally begin to see a social breakdown which is really manifest. His friends, if they are still in that category, find it harder and harder to cover up. Now he loses the second or third job, and even though he got in to the office first and resigned, too many people know he was fired. Trouble with the wife and kids begins to come out in the open, and so on. Social difficulties mount rapidly. He begins perhaps to show some physical symptoms, tremors; more and more often he's in a physically run-down condition, which was perhaps present earlier in an acute fashion but over in two days--now it becomes chronic. And his rationalizations to himself--no longer can he find explanations in the culture that will satisfy even him, to say nothing of others. He is beginning to give up. His fears and his guilt and his remorse, instead of being pinpointed to what he did last night, or to his attitude toward his wife over 6 years, or 16 years, now become generalized without definition.

There is undefined fear, undefined remorse that he can't even explain--he has this black depression. It is called the blues sometimes--the real blues because you can't identify it. That's the difference between the real blues and a sentimental blues--you can always say it's because Mama went away--but with the real blues you can't identify what it is that is so painful, so threatening. That's what's so horrifying. And at this point the fellow may give up socially on the grand scale, may slip down into Skid Row. Now the "DT's" may appear, and so on.

Q: What can you do to help--in the early stages particularly?

A: I would like to answer that in the first instance by pointing out that the behaviors called "early symptoms" are not by themselves symptoms. They have been ridiculed by some newspaper commentators, and if they are considered as separate instances, such ridicule may be O.K. It is when they are patterned and repetitive and increasing that they are early symptoms. For instance, among your friends may be some who have had a blackout. Does that mean they're alcoholics? No. It may have to do with the improper utilization of alcohol by the body. Your friend may have gotten drunk several times, he may have sneaked drinks once in a while, he may have said at parties a couple of times, "Let's have one for the road," or he may stop at your house to have a nightcap, or he may stop at a tavern on the way to a party.

Taken by themselves, these need not be symptoms. It is only when these things get into a pattern and become repetitive, that they make sense as early symptoms of alcoholism. Naturally, drunkenness may occur many times without any of these things being present at all.

Giving Up Drink

Q: What can be done about it?

A: For the people in the later stages you need almost a re-forming of life--particularly in social adjustments--and, for some people, also in the emotional sphere. Drinking will have to be given up permanently. Some may need physiological care beyond remedies for temporary acute ills. Originally, some 10 years and more back, it was the late-stage alcoholics who came looking for help, and so rather drastic steps were needed.

Now, as "Alcoholics Anonymous" and our clinics began to be more widely known, some of the frightened people in the middle and earlier stages came in. In fact, today they are the largest groups we see.

Q: What are you going to do for them?

A: First, we began to find they are different types. Some of them were way back in the first stages, some of them needed a little knowledge and a little guidance from a neutral and a respectable source; when they could see where they were and could be given a little support. If they could have some of the situational factors--such as the wife, who has been doing the wrong thing even with the best motives, triggering the guy into his alcoholism--when they could receive just a little help, they could help themselves quite effectively.

If you could relieve those pressures and give this man just a little support, a little hope, a little help, then he didn't have such a hard time.

Q: Could the people in the middle stages, who had lost control, stop drinking?

A: So far as we know, they can't stop permanently without help. Now, there is going to be a case here and a case there where they can. Ordinarily we don't know in such cases whether they really were alcoholics before they stopped--just that they said so or their doctor, or Aunt Mathilda or the judge said that they were alcoholics. Then you may find out that this judge or mother-in-law thinks anybody who has two beers a week is an alcoholic.

Q: In that group he isn't out of control, then?

A: That very control is the crucial point in getting into alcoholism.

Q: Can he stop at that point' and later on be a moderate drinker?

A: So far as we know he cannot become a controlled drinker. There may be some people who manifest some of these behaviors for a variety of reasons and later on drop the variant behavior without dropping the drinking. However, to date there is no well-recorded case that has been followed over as little as seven months, of a person who had--by consent of two or three outside observers going over the record--been an alcoholic, no matter what the stage, who was later on, say for a period of roughly a year, found to have been a controlled drinker.

Q: What about before he loses control and sees some symptoms, what does he do in that period?

A: He can keep control.

Q: How does he do it?

A: As a matter of advice, I would say to him: "Buster, you'd be awfully smart to play it safe. The safe way is for you to have a look around at your life, find out what you're getting amusement from, where your job is, where your and again. What's the professional explanation? "He's a psychopath."

These are both ways of saying, "I don't know," and "I'm not to be blamed." The answer that he isn't ready yet isn't an answer--it's merely a restatement of a problem.

At certain times, at certain places, with certain people, under certain situations, this man is more ready or less ready--and the need of the therapist, "AA" psychiatrist, or other, is to be able to recognize and manipulate these more favorable situations. There are certain ways of dealing with certain alcoholics so that the readiness can be brought further forward. And this is what I was coming to when you asked me about stopping the condition.

Originally the Yale Clinic and the "AA's" were getting the real McCoy. In the late '30s and early '40s you hit the "AA's" with a wham. The candidate did not have shoes that matched, had been in 12 jails, 6 workhouses, reform schools, State hospitals, sanitariums, had lost his wife, etc.--the works. "Alcoholics Anonymous" started about 1934. About 1938 or 1939 two things happened--they got some people who hadn't gotten that far--they still had a necktie, a job, a wife. And the answer was: "Go on, go back out, you're not an alcoholic--you don't know what drinking is--scram."

But some of the others said: "No, that attitude is bad as far as "AA" is concerned. Maybe you're right--maybe this guy isn't a real alcoholic, but he should have a chance. We cannot determine who is and ain't. We have got to help." So they tried it.

Exactly the same thing happened when a woman showed up. This was a man's organization and the idea of women brought in the idea of pink ladies, that sort of drinking, and brought in fears that, having women around, even if they had been real luses, would ruin the whole fellowship. But they said, "We've got to try it." And just as in the case of the men who hadn't hit real rock bottom as drunks, it worked in an amazing proportion of the cases.

It was noticed that these people with a milder, shorter history (a) probably had just had a binge, and (b) that they probably had just had a nasty shock--mother died, for which they blamed themselves indirectly, or they had been kicked off their job, or they had been divorced, or they had had their first jail experience. It was a shock to them. And so, they talked about that shock as a bottom, and called it a "high bottom."

And, lo and behold, by 1950 the high bottoms in "AA" almost certainly outnumbered the low bottoms.

In the clinics we've had the same thing. In the early days we got the real ones, the men who had touched low, low bottom. Then we got more and more who were in the middle stages and then some in the earlier stages.

Here's something else. When people began to come to "AA" who were 25, 26, 29 years of age, they came in all right, but some couldn't stand it--they liked the "AAs," they liked the philosophy, they liked the program, they know they had been helped, but they couldn't stand going in two nights a week to listen to these old timers yack-yack-yack about "what I did at Armentiers" or about their 25 years of wild drinking, or something of the sort.

Development of `Junior AA's'

This was far from their own experience. So you begin to have a development in the larger cities of so-called "Junior AA's." A different sort of re-socialization or modified socialization was needed. The "AA" are very flexible and very empiric, and they found that for many of the youngsters this worked. They picked up a lot more screwballs in this group--that is, youngsters who were deeply neurotic, perhaps psychopathic, who were also drinking excessively, and who got a terrific bang out of "AA" and went along beautifully for six weeks.

group over, and going wild.

So they have had some difficulty with such groups, but there is no question that they have helped a great many of them. The significant thing is the change from late-stage alcoholics to middle and early-stage alcoholics, from helping alcoholics averaging 45 years of age to those averaging 36 or 38 years of age.

Q: What have you found in the clinics?

A: We have found the same thing in the clinics. Because of the availability of help, because of the anonymity, because of the lowering of the stigma around alcoholism people are willing to come in and ask for help. This is a hard thing for the alcoholic to do, partly because in the back of his mind is just what was in your psychology textbook--the horrible implications of this disease and the moralizing that accompanied it. But now there are places where they don't believe in these horrors and don't preach at you. In fact, in "AA" there may be many who think drinking is just dandy, but that they're sick and they can't take it--it's like diabetes, "I can't take sugar," or "I've got an allergy to sweets so I can't take them." This is making the condition respectable and the possibility of seeking help less painful. So they come in.

Student Interest

Q: Do you find that young people are interested in the work of the "AA" and the clinics?

A: Yes. The high-school and young college people who had suddenly gotten very interested in "AA" speakers or those from clinical centers. We note at the Yale Center that our people get an almost fascinated response from these youngsters. The students even ask to have them come, and no one has to take attendance. Their reaction would appear strikingly different from that shown to classical temperance lectures.

Now, some of these students need what I would call intellectual knowledge and guidance. They're not personality-problem kids, they're not alcoholics, but they've been receiving this nonsense--that is the way they look at it--about alcohol. For instance, they've been told: "The first drink--it's the first drink that's the dangerous one--you're one drink away from a drunk. A little beer here and there, and this horrible social drinking will lead to death, disgrace, disease. The liver will turn purple, the brain shrink, and so on."

The students, to be sure, know this is not true. I say that they know this for the following reason--some 60-odd million people, most of them parents, use alcoholic beverages. These beverages are in the icebox or they're in the cupboard or they're at the party, and the youngsters know that their dad drinks, and so on. They also know that he isn't drunk and he isn't crazy and he isn't going to be. Furthermore, I don't think kids care much about warnings which refer to the senile part of the population--those who are past 32 or 33. Alcoholics are usually portrayed as being even older than this.

A certain proportion of teenagers, let's say 20 per cent, do not consider these classic temperance talks to be nonsense. In their families, their neighborhood and their church and so on they have always heard these beliefs and assertions, and the message fits into their life; it may reinforce their belief. Of course, 99 per cent of this particular group weren't going to drink anyway.

But the others--and this is a very regrettable point--may react so negatively to the unrealistic part of the classical temperance talk that they reject all notions of any danger in drinking and even become intolerant of abstainers. I would go to the extent of saying that, though it may be -unconscious on the part of these very sincere well-meaning "drys," they are doing something which is unmoral. I criticize the "drys" and not the "wets" on this point, because the "drys" have a program and the "wets" don't have anything--they just have "shhhh" when anyone mentions that there are real problems.

But the "drys," by over exaggeration, by saying things that are utter nonsense, unfortunately get across the idea to the nonabstainers, who happen to be the majority, that everything they say is unrealistic. There happen to be some very real dangers attached to drinking and anybody who doesn't think so is affected by certain biases of an antidry philosophy.

But very little factual information about alcohol is given to the younger people. They would really like to know something about alcohol, but what they want to know, and what the "drys" are anxious to tell them are two different things. The younger people would like to know the difference between drinks.

They would like to know: "What does this drinking do as far as athletics are concerned? Is it necessary to take drinks on a date? And how many drinks should you take, and what, and where and under what situations? How is it going to hurt me?"

What to Tell Youth

Q: What do they want to know?

A: I think what a good many of them have in the back of their minds--the girls won't ask the question but they want to know--is what happens from a certain number of drinks, does one get sexually excited? Is drinking on dates necessary, is it wrong, and so on? But what they hear about from the classic temperance speakers are the general things, crime, divorce, bad housing, the fall of Pearl Harbor, murder--they see pictures of deaths on the highway where the kids are drunk.

But the people who give these talks and make these pictures often know so little about drinking and alcohol that they make ridiculous mistakes--the youngsters know better than the "drys" do; sometimes they show a person taking three drinks and then acting like a maniac. There must be, in a group of one hundred 16 and 17-year-olds, 30 persons who have had three drinks several times. They know that nothing like that took place at all. And another 30 who have had only one drink or so look at the three-drink fellows and begin to think "Well, I guess I can take three drinks too." Kids don't like the morally superior person looking down at them saying, "Don't, don't, don't."

Q: What should you tell them?

A: I think they want to know something. Probably most interesting to them would be knowledge of the psychological effects of drinking. I think they should be given the physiological facts of alcohol. I think they should be told something about the customs of drinking. There are some groups in which the drinking of alcohol starts at about the time of weaning. There are some groups in which drinking is a normal, expected and in some ways a socially significant aspect of life--you've got to be able to know the difference between certain types of wines, how many cocktails to serve, etc., etc.

In this group the person who says that he doesn't drink--especially if he says he doesn't drink and indicates that you shouldn't either--is going to be such a deviant in that group that he is going to build social problems for himself, just as the drinker in the abstaining group is going to do.

To try to repress this person is to suggest certain social disabilities of all sorts. However, there are obviously points at which certain types of ingestion of alcohol go beyond any customs for an individual and are frightfully dangerous for that individual, to say nothing of this future, family, job, etc., which is only theoretical.

Any drinking may be bad for some. Other things being equal, I see no advantages to drinking by teenagers that couldn't be gained in other ways. However, what I personally think and what millions of teen-agers do may be two different things. Telling them nothing, telling them nonsense, or talking down to them with nothing but negative commands--these are all ineffective and rather escapist types of education, especially since the students want education on the matter.

Q: What do the students say about the "AA" speakers?

A: The student loves the "AA" presentation because that is the "Horatio Alger" story amid blood and amid tears, and so forth, and you come out of the slime as Sir Galahad and rise to the top--and that goes big in this country. And the "AA's" laugh at the negative authorities who are pressing on the kids. They are real, experienced "he-man" drinkers, and at the same time they seem to have achieved a morality. And this the teenagers like, too. And when they have this message with its emotional, sincere feeling--and often the "AA" speakers are a little exhibitionistic anyway and so they are often magnificent speakers--the students love it. For that matter so do a lot of adults.

But I don't think that fundamentally knowledge about alcoholism is a major need in an educational program. Of course, it is important to learn that, if one has an alcoholism problem there is hope--but I think the students should learn something about alcohol and about drinking, just as they should learn something about oxygen and carbon tetrachloride or the form of government in Idaho, or something else.

In addition, drinking is something that hits across more aspects of life than carbon tetrachloride or government in Idaho--it affects marriage, birth and death--it can be involved in almost all social phenomena except the activities demanding immediate, high-tension discrimination and responsible action. Drinking, for example, is not related to tight-wire walking or piloting an airplane, at least not on American lines.

All the students are going to have to make a decision about drinking--as to their own behavior, also with their wife, their neighborhood, their kids, their religion, their government, and so on. And in 90 per cent of our educational institutions they learn nothing except what 8 out of 10 of them recognize is silly.

Drinking Habits of Students

In this connection, I'd like to mention our recently completed study of the drinking habits and attitudes of about 16,000 college students the country over--private, parochial, and State colleges, co-ed and man or woman only colleges, big and little, and so on. Here we report on who drinks, what they drink, when, where, with whom, when they started, what they think about drinking and about abstainers and about sex activity and drinking, what problems they may have experienced, what their parents, their church, the college authorities, their friends and others say and do, and so on. It is the first objective study of drinking habits ever made in this country, and it may well help to build a better foundation for teachers and teaching materials. We certainly hope so.

Q: Could you tell us something about it?

A: Most assuredly, but it is covered comprehensively in a book, entitled "Drinking in College," by Professor Robert Strauss and myself, just out.

Alcohol In Business

Q: What about the alcohol problem particularly in industry and business?

A: There is the same feeling there as in other parts of the society. They want to cover it up and hide it and so on. It has a stigma. But there is getting to be a gradual perception by an increasing number of companies that "Yes, there is a problem and why don't we do something about it?" Of course, it doesn't show in their records, it's always hidden, but the problem is there. And there are now techniques of dealing with it.

Q: Is it a growing problem?

A: I don't think we can say that it is a growing problem, but we can say this--that the age range is 30 to 50. Industry and business and agriculture employ 60 million, of whom a large proportion must be in that age group, and so they have a great number of them. But most of them are back in the early stages. They don't have any drunks. Oh, they have them now and then, but they are fired. They don't have the psychotics, the "Skid Row" bums, and so forth. They may have had them when they were 23, but they got rid of them. What they do have is the slowly developing, carefully hidden condition, usually hitting a man as he gets to be about 40 and is just reaching his peak productivity in the company, a peak he never achieves.

Q: How does absenteeism stand with these people?

A: We have a few clinics started in some industries, and their records show that the alcoholic's absenteeism rate runs a little better than twice that of the average of the whole plant.

Q: Would you call that high or low?

A: Twice as high as the rest of the whole plant. For instance, if the absenteeism runs 4 per cent for the whole plant, it will run 8 or 9 per cent among the alcoholics in that plant, among the early problem drinkers or incipient alcoholics in that plant.

Fortunately for business and industry, therapy is easier with this group than with any other. Success expectancy is fantastically high, partly explained because the motivation for recovery among these men is tremendous. In one plant, the absenteeism rate after a year and a half with the first 100 alcoholics who went through--and they had success with 100 out of 120--was cut to about 2.3. The average absenteeism rate of the plant was 4.8, and for three years before they came in for help it was running for these 100 alcoholics at about 10.

Q: How do they help them? What does an industrial establishment do?

A: The first thing to do, briefly, is to get top management to recognize that there is a problem and not to be scared of it and to be looking into what can be done about the problem. The second thing is to decide to give responsibility to a department, probably industrial health or personnel, to do something. Next, the thing to do is to appoint a man to get special training in addition to his already acquired training. We have four or five-day training sessions just for this purpose.

Q: What are they trained to do?

A: These people go back and do two things. First, they offer counseling, often making referrals to already existing resources in or outside the plant. They must go out in the community and find out what resources there are in the plant--the plant probably already has resources to take care of this, but it has never been done.

Then they start helping a few people. The first ones they get are often going to come from the disciplinary board and are going to be the worst cases and have to be sold the idea. When they find that this has helped six or seven fellows--and you know two of them and you know three of them and so on--the word goes out and management says, "Now, look. Our policy is not coddling--this is not a home for drunks--but when we think alcoholism is involved, we are going to treat it as any other problem. We are going to try to help this person and give him every possible chance. If he won't live up to it, then--out. We will change our retirement, our disability, our pension policy--we are going to keep an open, flexible mind on this."

The man in charge will try to change negative attitudes in the medical and other departments. Something can be done, and this is shown most clearly through the successful cases. Then the man will try to get to some of the foremen or the floor supervisors, because they are the men who know just who the problem drinkers are. If they will co-operate, cases will be gotten sooner, the therapy success rate will rise, a lot of cases will never get to the disciplinary committee, and so on.

But the supervisors and foremen have to be shown that something can be done, that this will be more effective than hiding the cases, that it is not a snooping, "dry" movement, that it is not a sentimental, coddling program, that it will not result in firing the man nor in interfering with production, and so on.

This problem drinker is almost never at the plant when drunk' by the way. He's there in a rather late hang-over, beautifully masked, doing nothing or sometimes making mistakes, a horrible public-relations liability. His friends cover up, and nobody says anything.

So we suggest certain ways of talking with the supervisors, maybe giving them one or two pages of statements, showing them a 10 or 12-minute movie, giving them some idea of the problem and the program. Maybe half of them will catch on and will start sending a couple of people in--anonymously, quietly, and not even connected with the records.

Q: Where does a company find out all the things necessary to institute a program like this?

A: We at the Yale Center run special 3 and 5-day courses just for industrial people.

Q: Can this be found anywhere else in the United States?

A: No, but certain plants are doing their own work.

Q: Then you are the center of information on this whole subject. Can anyone get literature from you?

A: Yes.

Prohibition?

Q: Should we do away with alcohol? Can we do away with it?

A: "If we should" is a question that has to be answered from the point of view of a particular ethical system. One ethical system will say, "Yes," another will say, "No."

Q: Do you have a personal opinion on that?

A: I don't have any great opinion on that because I think your second question makes the first one--for our society in this century, particularly--academic.

Q: You mean it is impossible to get rid of it?

A: I would say at this time we don't know of any technique by which you can get rid of it.

Q: Looking at the thing in its broadest possible angle, we've developed in America two points of view about the liquor problem. One is frequently expressed under the word "prohibition," and the other one under the heading "moderation." In your studies, do you feel that we would solve this liquor problem by complete prohibition, the extinction of the manufacture of alcohol?

A: Let's put it this way: If there were no alcohol, there would be no problems related to alcohol--period. There is no question about that. If you could eliminate alcohol, there couldn't be such a thing as an alcohol problem.

Q: Do you mean that you would really remove all the problems related to alcohol, or do you mean the problems that people think they solve by alcohol?

A: I mean that you would eliminate any function that alcohol plays in crime, poverty, disease, death, disgrace, alcoholism, and so forth--by definition.

Q: But you wouldn't remove those problems, would you?

A: Oh, no. In some of them I would say that the use of alcohol plays a larger role than in others. For instance, I would say that you would eliminate the biggest crime of all--drunkenness. That is the single biggest crime in the United States except for traffic violations.

I think that among the others you would unquestionably eliminate a certain amount of disorderly conduct, and you would eliminate a considerable amount of petty assault. For example, you and I get mad at each other, and we were probably going to get mad at one another, alcohol or not alcohol, but with a few drinks in us, or in either one of us, it is more likely that we are going to get into physical violence, because the inhibition or control of aggression is reduced. Instead of just swearing at you, I throw something at you--perhaps I won't throw with any great accuracy, perhaps you won't duck with usual speed or accuracy. But the emotion and behavior that went into a fight, let us say, could have been dissolved through more socially acceptable avenues than those opened up by alcohol.

Traffic Accidents

Q: What would you say the effect of successful elimination of alcohol would be on traffic accidents?

A: Granted that no substitute came in--like bootleg liquor--I would say that all sorts of accidents would be cut down. For instance, you would eliminate the effect of fatigue as it lowers acuity and discrimination. You would reduce the expression of aggression in driving. Alcohol, so to speak, allows extended fatigue and aggression in driving and these are major factors in auto accidents.

Q: Are there statistics that show that traffic accidents are primarily due to alcohol?

A: I would not say "primarily."

Q: Would you say that they are incidentally due to alcohol?

A: I would like it larger than that. Figures have been put out fairly regularly by the National Safety Council from which it would be fair to state that alcohol is involved in 20 per cent of all fatal automobile accidents. I would say that is a gross underestimate.

Q: What can be done about this, or is anything being done?

A: This is one of the problems related to alcohol about which a great deal could be done. A start in this direction can be seen, although -this particular cloud is still little bigger than a man's hand.

We have had two major problems blocking greater control and growing prevention of this problem: lack of quick, easily administered, reliable tests to establish how much alcohol is in a person's system at the time of the accident and the general tendency to lump all alcohol problems together as just one, simple problem. The first barrier had to be overcome so that police, courts, legislators and lawyers would have a means to allow concrete distinction between the driver under the influence and the person who was not. Walking a straight line, the odor of the breath, and disorganized behavior after an accident are not good evidence of "being under the influence." Until a useful means was developed, the courts and police were effectively blocked from efficient enforcement.

We now have means for gaining factual, undeniable evidence of the amount of alcohol in the brain. The best of these techniques--I might be a little biased on this--was developed by Dr. Greenberg at our laboratory, and is being increasingly used by courts and police. Its use will not only end the "two beers, Judge" alibi, but will also protect the innocent, such as the man with concussion or the diabetic in insulin shock who is arrested for drunk driving or anything else and is tossed in the police lockup--sometimes to die--because he acts and looks like a drunk.

Distinguishing this problem from the other alcohol problem is, I believe, on the way. It is not the "Skid Row" bum or the late-stage alcoholic who is involved in these automobile accidents.

Tests for Drunken Drivers

Q: Who is?

A: No one has ever reported just what the social and personality characteristics of this category consist of. The public is probably 99 per cent united against driving under the influence. However, they are far from 99 per cent against drinking. Once we can separate these two, so that the public can attack the specific problem without getting involved in the old "wet-dry" fight, then the way will be much clearer to overcome this menace.

Some legislative changes are needed in, perhaps, 30 States. The real need today is to give the facts to the driving public so that they can realize in ordinary language just what "under the influence" means and how one gets to that point. The insurance companies could play a big part in developing such information, as could driving schools, automobile associations and, after the program was set up, the police and courts. Without such education, mere use of the new gadgets is not likely to be too effective.

Q: What's blocking use of the new devices?

A: Well, time is needed for the police and courts to try out the new techniques and learn application problems. So far, their experience has all been highly favorable. Then, lawyers and doctors interested in these cases must learn that none of their rights or privileges is being hurt. General education, plus experience, is needed. I think that an enormous reduction of this really unnecessary death, destruction and misery could be achieved in as short a period as five years if people got behind the police and courts, supported studies and helped in dissemination of the facts. Further, I think the motivation for this sort of progress is good. At that moment it needs leadership. This one of the alcohol-related problems is in large measure susceptible to successful attack here and now.

What Stimulates Drinking

Q: What would you say is the greatest stimulus to the drinking of alcohol? Is advertising a major factor?

A: We can show that advertising has had little or no effect on large segments of the population and never has had.

Q: For purposes of stimulation in extreme cases?

A: For any purposes. In extreme cases it has no effect whatsoever. For those people who are susceptible to be affected, yes, it may have some effect. And then if those people become extreme uncontrolled drinkers, I cannot tell you what proportion that ad played, for, once they have become extreme drinkers, I don't care if you have a sign on every window in the city or if there isn't a sign within a thousand miles, they are going to go on being extreme drinkers--period. Advertising isn't going to change alcoholics one way or another.

It might affect them in that, if you keep saying a certain brand name, the next time they go in and ask for a shot they may ask for that brand. I doubt it will have much effect, because after they have had a considerable amount of alcohol, 75 per cent of them will be short of cash.

Q: Then you would say that the stimulus for drinking would have to be looked for somewhere else than the advertising of the product?

A: Yes.

Q: How would you list the order of stimuli? For instance, are social gatherings and social customs the primary thing today?

A: Well, I will start off with the word "custom" --but then remember that I am one of these academic specialists, so I will want to hedge on what I define as "custom." There are certain groups in which there has been a custom of drinking for generations. Now, when the father and the mother and the close friends of the father and mother--they may be in the neighborhood or not--when they ordinarily drink and their drinking is fitted into the daily routine of their life (not the "whoopie-whoopie--aren't-we-being-daring" type of drinking), then their kids, other things being equal, are going to use alcoholic beverages.

If you go to the other extreme, where father and mother not only do not drink but also have expressed strong, negative feelings about drinking and, to make it stronger, these are backed up by the church and the school and the social clubs, then that person is not going to drink until, and unless, he gets away from that social milieu. If he does drink, he will be rebelling from or simply moving away from his group. His drinking, by the way, when he starts is going to be more experimental, less well modeled, characterized by more mistakes, just because he has no background for it. He is not fitted for a drinking society any more than you or I are fitted for an Eskimo society.

Effects of Religion

Q: Is he more intemperate in his drinking then?

A: Let's take two extreme groups to make it simple: For example, the Mormon group, which is a very well-integrated group with a religious system penetrating right through family, government, economics, neighborhood, everything; and then orthodox Jewry, which is also very strong with an all-penetrating religion so that we don't know quite whether to call it a religion as such--it is a total way of life.

In the Jewish group, more than 90 per cent will use alcoholic beverages and will use them certainly more than 50 times a year. They will probably use wines, distilled spirits, beer. In the other group, the Mormon group, a very large percentage (compared with all other such groups in the country) will not touch the stuff.

I would say that, of the drinkers in the Mormon group, which will be a small number, you will find a high percentage of problem drinkers and later on alcoholics. Amongst the Jewish group, with almost all being drinkers, you will find a very, very low percentage of problem drinkers and alcoholics.

Now you shouldn't jump from this and say, "Well, let's start everybody drinking at the age of three!" That doesn't follow at all.

Q: Do you think the segment of society in which the inhibition is great due to religious and other environmental factors produces a greater number of rebels, or is the number incidental who go out and deviate late from their teachings?

A: Rather than the number of inhibitions, I would say that whether these sanctions worked, were acceptable, were easily adopted by the individual, was the more pertinent question. For example, it is an inhibition that none of us here may go around without clothes, but I don't think it bothers one person here. Maybe it would bother one out of a hundred. Where inhibitions are not putting the person in a position of conflict, where his life is satisfying enough so that he wouldn't call them inhibitions, then inhibitions are not creating rebels.

To most of us, inhibitions are strong, unconscious controls against actions we think we might like to perform. Actually, the term refers to all the controls we have adopted--whether we approve or not, or even recognize them or not. But where the inhibitions, the taboos, the restraints don't upset more than 5 or 6 per cent of the group, I don't believe it would follow that mere numbers of inhibitions would create rebellion.

However, if you have a series of different groups in a society (and this means there would be differences in the patterns of learned controls in each) and where there is mobility for individuals, as in the case of war when all the young men may go out from home and meet others, then you may have people suddenly finding out, "By golly, I am inhibited." They may become, though not necessarily, very bothered about this.

A lot of young men, 17 or 18 years old, may think: "Here I am in a uniform, but I am not really a man. All these others in the camp think I'm a damned sissy and maybe I am."

Q: And then he may take a drink?

A: He may feel that he has to show off, one way or another, but he doesn't know how. He may, like any young person taking on a new pattern (whether it's dancing or bowling or getting a job), overshoot the mark or do things differently from everyone else, and then may have superguilt.

Here's the fellow who has come up in a society where drinking is quite ordinary. When he starts drinking, he might overdo and even get drunk. He will be punished one way or another. However, this experience does not have a terrific impact on him. He doesn't feel that he has been singled out by God to be cursed, that he is essentially evil. Another fellow from the Mormon society, where drinking is held a sin, if he experiments and gets drunk, he may well feel super-guilty, he may feel that Satan is responsible. So that it is not only that he drank too much, it is his reaction, his interpretation of the event. It may mean he feels: "Now I am through with my family, my religion, I can never go back." His response to the act is just as important as the act itself.

`Wets' and `Drys'

Q: I can understand why the "drys" don't like your work, but why is it that the "wets" don't like it?

A: We have been discussing here at length alcoholism, drunkenness. When stories. On alcoholism, drunken driving, excess drinking and the like appear in the papers, everybody in the industry shudders--

Q: Afraid it is going to lead to prohibition" again?

A: Yes. It is implied that discussion of such subjects is nasty--there probably isn't any such problem; it has been vastly exaggerated, in fact, alcohol binds the family together, etc., etc. Then one of the companies about 6 or 7 years ago, to the shock and horror of the rest of the industry, came out and said some people should not drink. Wow! Well, it turned out to be all right: they're still in business. Doing very well, I understand.

Q: Have you any facts as to whether conditions in States where they have full State control are any better than in the States where they license retail distribution?

A: You get what might be called a "lip reading" or "false correlation" on this. The difference between the monopoly and the licensed States is not particularly great. When you take the States in which local option is very widespread--like North Carolina where of 100 counties perhaps are dry--or take the two dry States, from our estimates there is a lower degree of alcoholism and there are fewer drinkers. However, we would call this a false correlation. The reason you have prohibition is obviously because you have social groups and categories who are "agin" drinking--

Q: They wouldn't be drinking even if it were there?

A: Right. And their numbers are significant enough so that they get political action. But if you go into Kansas or Mississippi or Oklahoma, you will find the "AA" groups everywhere.

Q: What about the tax situation? Do you find that the bootleg liquor creates worse conditions?

A: It may result in there being worse liquor, but alcohol is alcohol. It is a chemical, and goodness and badness doesn't enter into it. As for bootleg liquor, there is no question that it is produced in the most unsanitary circumstances, that it gets very little attention, you get it loaded with who-knows-what. It has in some places a most mysterious sacred character, however--"I know Old Joe up in the hill over there and he makes the original white mule," and things like that' and everybody around there starts buying it and feeling, "Wow, that's wonderful stuff," and if the market goes up, they start producing it faster and they are under pressure of being caught, so there has to be a rapid turnover. There are no `controls by health authorities or otherwise.

When the situation gets really tough, you may be getting half water, one quarter ethyl alcohol and who-knows-what else. It is an irresponsible group operating without controls, without the law, in business for the sole purpose of making dough and making it fast, with no necessity of figuring out "Will my customers like me five years from now?"

The big liquor people are under a tremendous pressure from that alone. The bonded people have to start, say, in 1950 to decide what they are going to make. By 1951 or `52 it is whisky, but then goes into a warehouse for five years and then they can sell it. Imagine the pressure they are under to maintain good relations with their customers. Their capital is tied up in the customer's response five years in the future.

Q: Do you think the bootleg situation is getting worse?

A: I really don't know.

Q: The argument in Congress is, of course, that the high taxes will drive the country into bootlegging--

A: And, theoretically, I believe that it is a good argument. Whether in practice it is true or not, I can't say. To my mind this is one of those little conflicts way off in left field, just as in my mind the advertising issue is way off in left field. They happen to be the two things that the "wets" and "drys" are fighting about--one about one, the other about the other.

I would like to see a check on the bootlegging matter from an unbiased source, through the revenue reports. But in my memory, and this is most casual--for the revenue records have figures on how much illegal stuff was seized, the size of the place, the amount of the alcohol, the potential production per day--it seems to me that for some places, like New England, there is no striking change.

But this is not a conclusive argument, because the size of the agency and its finances for going out and making the arrests has not gone up, so maybe they're just operating to full capacity and their records have reached a top. But I am very suspicious of the liquor industry's statistics, just as I am very suspicious of the statistics of the "drys."

Q: What about clinics?

A: In 1944 we decided to start an outpatient clinic just for alcoholics. We had had laboratory and library studies, but no clinical studies of our own. With the co-operation of the Connecticut Prison Association, we were able to set up two such clinics, one in Hartford and one in New Haven. These were to be research clinics, but in about five weeks it was obvious that a different purpose was being served. They weren't research clinics--they were service clinics. They were mobbed, mobbed by what we would -call "late-stage alcoholics."

How Clinics Progressed

Q: Seeking relief---

A: Yes, willing to try anything new to escape the pain of the alcoholic life. This began to be pretty successful from the point of view of service. But from the point of view of research--well, I can't say they accomplished "nothing," but it was a very minimum. However, by the end of that year people in the Connecticut Legislature approached us with a bill, which we strongly opposed, setting up an alcoholism program, which was to be operated in the form of a specialized hospital for long-term care of committed alcoholics.

This legislation was changed to allow a program emphasizing voluntary outpatient clinics, and Connecticut' in 1945, established the first commission on alcoholism. Today it has six outpatient clinics, an inpatient facility, an education program with schools, and so on. Also, since then about 40 of the States developed some type of alcoholism program--there was nothing prior to this.

In 1946, some of the people who had been at the School, and others interested in alcoholism, said to us: "Look. You people are trying awfully hard, but you can't effectively get your information out to a wide public. The scientific journal is just dandy, but who reads scientific journals? And how many will read these lay pamphlets or the popular book of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, 'Alcohol Explored'? We need community organizations to educate the public about alcoholism Will you help?"

We created the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism.

Soon we found ourselves to be a popular health movement, like mental hygiene or cancer associations. Once this got started, we pulled out of it, since this sort of work is not an appropriate function of a university research department.

It is now called the National Committee on Alcoholism and is an independent organization. The clinic movement was more and more taken over by an increasing number of State commissions, and they soon started a National States' Conference on Alcoholism.

Q: How many years have you been studying in this problem?

A: I got interested in it because I was a potential criminologist; I've been with the Laboratory since 1942.

Q: You've been exposed to all phases of this in 10 years or so--has it made you a teetotaler?

A: We at the Yale Center are kind of rigid on answers to this question--maybe a little unnecessarily so--I don't know. However, we feel that either the facts, researches and conclusions are right or are not--and are effective or not on their own merits. And the fact of our own drinking or nondrinking we feel, doesn't make any difference. Certainly no one on the staff is an extreme teetotaler or an extreme drinker.

Alcoholics Anonymous

Q: How extensive is the "AA" movement in America?

A: There is no organization to this group.

There are no officers. There is no treasury. There are no minutes. For each group there is a chairman, theoretically revolving every month or two. But they find that as soon as you set up a typically American hierarchy with "Mr. Big" at the top, then some of the boys, as soon as they get up there, fall over into the bottom again. This matter of being the big man, big ideas, big expansion, responsibilities, building this clique up and that clique down--that has been found a nice way to get back to alcoholism, not a way of recovery from it.

Q: Do you have statistics on how extensive a group it is?

A: Their figure can be determined from their paid-up membership--I think theoretically each local group is supposed to give a dollar per person per year to the central agency for the publication of the book, information, intergroup service and the like. They pass the hat at meetings to pay for the rent of the hall and for the coffee and cokes and stuff. Some feel they must be drinking something, and sweets seem to be necessary for some.

This paid-up membership of groups amounts to about 130,000. Their membership--I don't know what a member is--is a man a member the moment he walks in? Does he have to be in one month, two months, three months? There is no definition. I would say there may be in the neighborhood of 175,000---

Q: Out of about 4 million alcoholics in the U.S.?

A: Yes.

Q: How many groups are there?

A: I would say that in this country there are, perhaps, 3,000.

Q: Then is this same movement true of other countries?

A: They will show you groups in 40 or more other countries. As a wild guess, I would say that in 20 of those 40 other countries they are Americans who happen to be over there. This business of clubs and voluntary associations--Elks, Chamber of Commerce, or the like--is an American phenomenon. It clicks pretty well in the British Isles and in Scandinavia, Australia and New Zealand. But you get over into France--well, I think there is one French member. Of course, there are Americans in Paris who are permanent fixtures. But the French and Italians simply don't have such organizations. There is no feel for it. It is a typically American thing.

Q: Do the other countries have the alcoholism problem at all?

A: Oh, sure.

Significant Role of `AA'

Q: If the psychiatrist has been stymied treating the alcoholic, what has "Alcoholics Anonymous" been able to do?

A: Now, I think the psychiatrist can play a significant role. I think that "Alcoholics Anonymous" can--in fact, anybody that knows them at all knows that they do--play a most significant role.

Q: Then why is it that "AA" can succeed and the psychiatrist can't?

A: Take a certain alcoholic who is pretty well along in his alcoholism. He shows certain acute physiological problems. They will usually pass away in four or five days. He also has psychological problems. By the time he's gotten into this whirlwind he is frightened, in a world of pain, sometimes beginning to act in a very immature fashion, usually very egocentric, interested only in himself as though a wall had grown up to separate him from others. Let's say that there is a wall within all of us protecting our ego, but there are doors and windows through which you go out to people and people come in to you.

With the alcoholic it seems those doors and windows are getting smaller and smaller--he isn't interested in other people. And if an alcoholic begins to show interest in you or your job or what you are doing, all I can say is "Look out!" He's going to touch you pretty shortly--for a drink, for money, or something. He is not interested in you. He is not interested in ideas and things or people. He tends more and more--many of them--to become an isolated drinker, often a lone drinker. He has terrific ambivalences and many of them show as incompatible drive, like, "I want to be Napoleon," or "I want to be Casanova," or "I want absolute dominance," and at the very same moment, "I want to be like a little baby in its mother's arms, loved because I should be loved."

These are absolutely incompatible needs, and yet that incompatibility can be resolved temporarily in alcohol because discrimination, judgement, self-criticism fall down and the man gets to live more and more in a world of his own, unhindered and unfrightened by ordinary -people, ideas and situations.

In addition to physiological and psychological troubles, there are social problems also. The man gives up ways of doing things and does less and less. He is less and less interested in attitudes, ideas, beliefs, intellectual questions and problems around the community and he becomes increasingly afraid of close, emotionally meaningful, interpersonal groups, such as a friendship group, a marital group, parental group, and that sort of thing. And it is from such groups, of course, that we get our major stimuli to do things, our major punishments for doing wrong. From and inside such groups we get our very reasons for living. With the decrease in activities, in ideas and in primary group membership, the man becomes desocialized, so to speak.

And, by the way, those social and psychological characteristics are just the reverse sides of the same coin. The man who feels he is going to be the greatest writer, who is going to make the biggest sale, who is going to swear off liquor for life, or who is excessively cynical or aggressive, is just the man who can't long remain a member of a primary group. Membership in such groups punishes wild activity or non-activity, punishes extreme idealism or cynicism.

So you have these physical, social and psychological problems, and the drinking problem itself that have to be met.

Differences in Treatment

Q: What does the psychiatrist do and what does "Alcoholics Anonymous" do?

A: The psychiatrist goes back to the psychological roots. He may or may not give the man some immediate physiological help which means rest, food, some sort of sedation so that he can get over the hang-over. And it doesn't work' because he is only trying to hit one wheel out of a five-wheel vehicle or a four-wheel vehicle--except in extraordinary cases.

"Alcoholics Anonymous" does a series of things. One of the psychological, social, personality problems of the alcoholic in the later stages is that he gives up hope--hope in himself, hope in people, hope in the world, hope in God. It seems to him all useless.

And it is impossible for him to get out of it unaided. He has tried everything. He has tried a hospital, he has tried three doctors, he has tried a sanatorium. He has been to ministers, priests, judges, and they have all given such "damned fool" advice as "Look, old boy, why don't you be a man; look what you're doing to your wife. Why don't you control your drinking?"

This man knows what he had done! He has cursed himself more vitriolically than anyone else could. He had been cursing himself for years. But the "AA" from the very first contact, expresses to this man the feeling that he, too, was there. Charlie cannot only match him story for story but he has been in 10 jails that this new fellow never even heard of. He has had everything this guy has had and more, and here he is--his coat matches his pants, he has shoes on, and all that. But, most significantly, he seems to be happy. He seems to be amused about the whole thing. There are some who aren't, of course.

I am building up an ideal picture. There may be a few "AA's" who are just like the old sawdust-trail boys. But the new candidate for "AA" begins to see that he can do it. Here's a man who did it. "It can be done!"

Q: In other words, the approach varies dramatically from the psychiatrist's?

A: Yes, the "AA" talks to the man. This approach is often the opposite to the nondirective therapy of the psychiatrist--the psychiatrist must keep his mouth shut and the patient must let out. The "AA" violates that principle. He just sits down and says, "Well, let me tell you about me," and may not let the other fellow get a word in edgewise.

But it is convincing to some that there is hope--and this he never got from a psychiatrist because the psychiatrist doesn't know about alcoholism as this "AA" knows it. The recovered alcoholic may not know about Oedipus complexes being resolved, but he does know about drunks and butterflies tromping around in your stomach and all that. He has had bigger butterflies and has conquered them and is happy about it.

The "AA" doesn't tell the potential new member that he must go through a terrific regime, he must control himself, he must fight the good fight, and so forth. No, this "AA" has more fun out of life than the candidate has ever had and even has dough in his pocket, his wife likes him again, and so do his kids. The thought that "Maybe I could do the same" can strike the potential new member very realistically. Now that is one aspect of it.

Another is that the psychiatrist is inevitably talking downhill. He is on one side of the desk and the alcoholic is on the other side. He is well dressed, professional, of tremendously high status, and authoritative, and the alcoholic is very often scared to death of authority and so forth.

Finding Pals in `AA`

Q: The "AA" is more like an equal?

A: Yes. He could be a recovered banker or a ditchdigger, though ordinarily a banker will work with a banker and a ditchdigger with a ditchdigger. There is hope; there is a certain amount of happiness; there is this interplay. That personality wall has been broken down a little. Remember, this alcoholic had to let the "AA" talk to him. The "AA" is not going down the street to find a drunk and help him. He may try that a few times, but after he has been rejected regularly he will quit that process and will go only when asked and when he sees that there is really some hope of doing something. He can help only when the man has, so to speak; tentatively, partially temporarily surrendered a little and said, "All right, I'm licked. Can you help me?" That's a horrible thing to have to say for a frightened, egocentric alcoholic, and he may only half say it.

The "AA" gives him something to help him immediately, right now--none of this claptrap about "Can you come around next Tuesday at 4 p.m.?" That is perfectly ridiculous.

Any time we get people trying to come into our clinic from New Mexico, or somewhere far away--they all have long-distance telephonitis--if we don't want them, or can't take them or see that they are half potted anyway, we tell them, "Now, you come around next Thursday at 3 p.m." They won't show up.

The alcoholic's problem is for him tremendously immediate, and his feeling of "I would accept help if I could get it" is right here, now, 4 p.m. Tuesday afternoon. By 6 p.m.--"the hell with them!"

But the psychiatrist has to give them a future appointment. He can't just say, "I am here any time for you boys." Both his professional and personal life would be smashed. But the "AA" is ordinarily there at the time and he offers some immediate, practical support. He knows some techniques of helping out a hang-over--at least he thinks they work.

The physiologist may look at such techniques and say, "This does not change the oxidation rate of alcohol by 10 seconds." But this "AA" thinks that it does, and helps this guy and thus gives him the kind of magic that makes him feel better. He then gives him something to do--and this is tremendously important, because here's a man who has been holding himself away from everybody and everything--"Come on over to the meeting tonight!"

This alcoholic is terrified, but he goes to the meeting and he sees 15, 25, 50 fellows--and they all seem happy! They look at him and say, "Come on in, boy!"

Friendship, Not Rejection

Q: It's a different treatment?

A: Why, he hasn't had that sort of treatment--maybe ever. Anyway, for a long time it has been: "Look at that drunk! Get him out of my office! Out! Out! Out!" Nothing but arrogance, holier-than-thou business--even by those who have been trying to help and be sympathetic.

These "AA" people seem happy. He may hear something about the "God stuff," but a lot of the boys will tell him: "Don't you worry now about the `God stuff.' Some of us are having hot flashes and messages from mountain tops. But some of us just don't seem to get it, so don't let it worry you." The only thing is this: "Do you think you could keep from taking one til 6 o'clock tomorrow?"

Ah! He has heard about six-week deals, swearing off for life, and all that sort of thing. "Well, I don't know--" "Now, wait a minute. Here are some ways." And so they force chocolate bars or coffee or some pet remedy down the man and give him something to do during the day. They ask: "Where are you going to sleep tonight?"

He hasn't any place to sleep at all--or, worse, he has a place to sleep--home. He has to go home to the little woman and this is going to make him drink.

So maybe they will find some place for him, just for that 24 hours, and he will come back the next day. The haze has been partially lifted, and these people were friendly. Now he has friends and he has hope--a very glimmer of a hope, perhaps also a: "These fellows may have something. I'll get it in about six weeks and then I will be able to drink like a gentleman again. `

The other boys will know he may feel this because they went through the same deal, and hey accept it. All right. So they help him in very simple, material ways. They know a fellow who knows a fellow and so he may be able to get a job, a bed, somebody who will hold his wife and kids off of him for a while, whatever it may be. And there is something for him to do at night.

Now, this man has sworn off before. He has been on the wagon once or twice before, and what did he do? He couldn't go around with his usual friends. Should he go to the church social a couple of nights a week? He wasn't the kind of fellow who would fit into that. He wasn't interested in what they talked about, what they did, or what they looked like. Where else could he have gone--the club?

Q: The Salvation Army?

A: For a few, perhaps, but this man probably regards Army shelters as a place for drunken bums who are religiously a little peculiar. He does not consider himself a bum, doesn't want organized charity, and is very scared of religious appeals. Where can he go? He is all too apt to land in a hotel room looking at the four walls and feeling greater and greater need for a drink. And getting the drink, perhaps after a great struggle, is a pretty sure thing for a drunk because self-pity is going to get bigger and bigger and bigger and the personality walls separating him from society and its values will get higher and higher.

But with "AA" he has a place where he can go, where there is a bunch of fellows sitting around batting the breeze--some of them are shooting craps, some are talking about the last six hopefuls they picked up, and it may even look like a barroom with cokes and coffee, with his kind of people standing and sitting around. Some of this prayer stuff comes, but that is a small price to pay--it only lasts three or four minutes. He sees a lot of men who look just like him, and he can go there seven nights a week. And if, when he's home, he suddenly gets that feeling, "I've got to have a drink," he has two or three phone numbers and somebody will come over to him and use one of hundreds of techniques. They talk, plead, curse them, slap them, coddle them--some kind of help to get over that feeling they have to have a drink.

Pretty soon this alcoholic begins to get some new ideas in addition to immediate help, something to do and association with friendly people.

Because this "AA" program suggests that there are certain things that he has to do about himself mentally and emotionally. They tell him to look at himself and to take inventory. "What's wrong with you, anyway?"

A Power Greater than Self

The 12 steps of "AA," by the way, only mention alcohol or alcoholism twice. Once they say, "I admit that alcohol has come to dominate my life," or something like that. "I admit" is the first. The last step suggests, "I will go out and help other alcoholics." Other than that, the word "alcohol" does not appear, and that last is pretty incidental as you can see. "I've got to look at myself. I've got to study myself. I've got to do it as honestly as I can. I've got to try to find out what are the forces that seem to be, impinging on me."

As many "AA's" will say: "We think that finally all these forces can be stated in terms of a power greater than the self, which many of us call God. Galt it what you will, but there is this power; it affects you; and you have to learn how to manipulate it. The first thing you have to do is to study yourself. Get some other member to sit down with you, probably your sponsor, and try to figure it out. How many people have you hurt, for instance?"

Oh, boy, here he can flatter himself with self-pity and guilt and make himself out the biggest alcoholic of the bunch. He can take a telephone book and check off almost every name all the way through. "Do you think you can make amends to these people without hurting anybody?" And here is another chance for this self-pity, exhibitionism, grandiosity. But it is a controlled, positively useful way for the man to capitalize on certain personality weaknesses--of course, not all alcoholics will have these particular problems.

Other steps concern getting into more effective contact with this higher power, which some of them call God, and with furthering self-understanding. Finally, the 12th step suggests that, after having had a spiritual experience, or a basic change in thinking and feeling, they will try to carry the new principles into all aspects of their lives and, also, extend them to help other alcoholics.

Well, some of them, of course, jump from step 1 to 12 and they are out there beating the drum to save other alcoholics too soon, but that is understandable.

Q: The first method of approach of the "AA's" then, is to be friendly on an equal footing?

A: Yes, to give realistic evidence that there is hope of recovery, to help with, immediate problems, if possible, to present the newcomer with a possible place to go, things to do, and a program. Let's note that "AA" doesn't preach, doesn't ask for pledges, doesn't blame, doesn't ask for conversion, doesn't postpone, doesn't interview or take records, doesn't offer charity, or ask for dues. It does offer a sponsor, a man to lean on during the first days or weeks. But pretty soon "AA" requires a man to do more than receive and lean--not that there are any written specifications.

The new man has to make a self- analysis with another man. He listens at meetings, is encouraged to speak with the others at closed meetings. Then he is asked to speak at an open meeting and to help another candidate. These things are helping to break down the old self-protective walls. And in the process he may get some very real awards. Now he is not only leaning on his sponsor, but another fellow is leaning on him. He is moving back slowly into emotionally meaningful group membership and doing it without his alcohol crutch.

He is also getting new ideas, not only from mixing with others while sober, but from the self-analysis and from figuring out how to help his new baby (candidate) and what to say at the meeting. He may even read the "big" book called "Alcoholics Anonymous." He is gradually refinding ways of doing things, ideas and primary group membership. Also he is getting the benefits of sober living in health, jobs, etc. He has change in his pocket, his wife is beginning to think that she has a human being for a husband again. Some people note, "Gee, George is sober; he even seems to have fun doing things he never had fun doing before."

Help at Any Time

Q: Can the alcoholic always find the "AA's"?

A: "AA" isn't 24-hour a day therapy, but it is always available. Then, when the man begins to get the idea of living again and begins to like some other people and is going out to help Joe and identifies himself with Joe, then all of a sudden his whole psychological picture has changed. As Dr. Harry M. Tiebout has pointed out, instead of just complying with "AA," he accepts "AA." He may never have gotten down to the basic psychiatric problems; however, I would say--just for an arbitrary figure--that for 50 per cent of the alcoholics, deep psychotherapy is probably contraindicated and might well trigger off more troubles than there were during the alcoholism. He needs to stop drinking. He needs support. He needs psychological help. He often needs physiological help. He needs resocialization.

How Alcoholism Starts

Q: Of several alcoholics I have known, I asked one of them what it was that got him -started after a long period of years during which time he didn't touch liquor, and he told me that he had been employed as an assistant sales manager and was making great progress. Then all of a sudden one day he came in and they had changed his office, removed his name from the door and put him at the end of the hall and demoted him. He went right out and got drunk and attributed it entirely to the disappointment. Is that a typical cause for this return to alcoholism?

A: Tension, shock, or sudden changes for some of these people is too much and they are less able to adjust or adapt themselves to painful stimuli. However, I would want to ask a lot of questions about the case you cite. Who stated that he had "been making great progress"? What had he been doing the previous weeks, which led to the demotion? Why had he been acting that way? Was his demotion a great surprise to others? Was it really a surprise to him? Was it a useful excuse to get drunk? Did he get drunk because he was shocked, or because this was his way of getting back at the boss? Anything can serve as an excuse. It is worth noting that a great many people have been demoted, and even though they are regular drinkers they don't go out and get drunk. By itself a demotion cannot explain drunkenness.

Q: Could any physiological deficiency cause it?

A: I don't know just what that would be. There have been some experiments with rats, by the way, to discover whether physiological differences would accompany differences in acquiring a taste for alcohol. But a rat having no culture can't be called neurotic. They have no personality problems, although some of them are more aggressive and others more pliable and all that. Well, these tests were made to find out if any would show a preference for alcohol over water. They put the rats on a very limited, almost starvation diet to allow testability. Some of the rats went for the alcohol and then seemed to want to go on with it. Some persons drew the conclusion from this experiment that some rats were physiologically "set" to like alcohol. This was sufficiently challenging to the physiologists in our laboratories, Greenberg and Lester, to make them check such a conclusion.

We happen to know that there are no vitamins in alcohol. Vitamins don't pass over the distillation process. But alcohol is full of calories. These rats were on a starvation diet. Greenberg and Lester said: "Let's run that test over again and give them a little bit more choice." So we gave them water, another liquid with calories in it, but not alcohol, then just alcohol. Then the rats were put through the same tests as in the earlier experiment.

The original conclusion was shot to pieces. The rats were hungry! They took the material loaded with calories. This time there were two choices with calories. They took the non-alcoholic type, perhaps because it didn't have the sharp taste-effect of alcohol. What was there in the alcohol itself in the first experiment? It had calories and so the rats could drink their meals. That is what many alcoholics are doing.

Q: But why are they usually emaciated, then?

A: That is because of the life they lead, not alcohol, although since alcohol is by itself a most unbalanced food for human diet and since for some, during binges, nothing but alcohol is ingested, they are undernourished. But this is not true of all. In fact, I don't think you'd know an alcoholic when you saw one, unless (a) you'd known him over a good period of time, or (b) he was on a binge.

Q: We've all known some persons who seem to have a compulsion--if they take one drink, they have to keep on, so that they themselves have said, "Well, I've just got to lay off the stuff altogether." Now is that compulsion psychological?

A: There have been those who tried to figure out that this uncontrolled drinking did have a physiological base. I would say that they may some day discover such a base. But to date they have not. Their evidence, we would say, is not evidence. One or two may have gotten a lot of publicity--anything which comes along in this field is publicized. When people are very run down, as during a binge, they show a lot of maladjustments, some physiological. Dr. X sees one thing that seems to look awfully consistent, appears in all his cases, for example, a certain type of glandular action.

Now Dr. X begins to compare the alcoholics who come into his clinic with other people, and he finds that 99.4 per cent have a tremendous glandular deficiency--or imbalance--for example, an adrenalin deficiency. The alcoholics he sees have an adrenalin deficiency, much more so than nonalcoholics. I know some other things about adrenalin deficiencies--they have a way of making people depressed, tired, unhappy and weak. The major trouble with the obvious conclusion to this finding is itself rather obvious: Does the alcoholic have an adrenalin deficiency because he has been out on a binge, or has he been out on a binge because of the adrenalin deficiency?

Suppose we go back and look at the population age 15 and separate between the greater and lesser adrenal-structural people. Then observe all those who drink for the next 40 years and see if the alcoholics among them were all or chiefly from the weak-adrenal group. Some people have alleged adrenal disfunction to be the cause, and also alleged that correcting this condition is the cure.

I must admit we have to laugh a little at some of these reports, because they state: "Yes, we fix the alcoholics up and they go out of here sober and in good health, saying, 'We'll never have a drink again.'" Well anybody who has ever known alcoholics is not peculiarly impressed by that. Practically all alcoholics have sobered up and sworn they would never drink again--done so many, many times. We like to see them six months later. We like to see them a year later. We like to see them four years later.

Now I don't doubt that we may find a physiological difference in function, in structure, in growth, which will be different from many alcoholics compared to the nonalcoholic population. But I would also make this forecast--that if we do, we will also find that there will be a considerable proportion of people who have this lower X factor who drink and who do not become alcoholics, and that we will find a large number of alcoholics who do not have this "X" factor. In other words, it may be significant, but it will not be a sufficient cause!

Aid From Drugs

Q: Is there some drug you can give people to stop their drinking?

A: One of our great problems has been to get increasing segments of the public to discriminate a little more. They have a tradition of 100 years in which a highly organized, very sincere, emotionally powerful, beautifully effective organization has told people again and again that alcohol, drinking, drunkenness, the other problems related to drunkenness and alcoholism are all the same thing. And we say: "This is not so."

You ask: "Can you get a drug to stop drinking?" Yes, you can--I don't know whether the word "drug" is quite correct. Take "disulfiram"--most popularly known under the trade name of "Antabus"--I don't believe there is complete acceptance as to just what the physiological process is, but, anyway, you take this pill and any time within the next 24 hours if you take even a small amount of alcohol you are going to approach death--the eyes begin to bulge out, the face becomes horribly flushed, the blood count goes down to zero, and so on, and you know pretty soon you are going to stop kicking.

Q: That's a conditioned reflex, isn't it?

A: No, it is a direct chemical effect which will occur the first time. Whether there is in addition a conditioned response following one or two experiences is a very moot point. But let me assure you of this: If just by chance you forget to take the pill and start drinking and then take a pill or two, there will be a most unpleasant result. There is a difference between drinking and alcoholism. "Antabus" affects the drinking--not the alcoholism.

Q: Oh, yes, but I thought the main idea was that these alcoholics wanted to stop the drinking--

A: Yes, they may decide, "My life is being ruined by drink' so I will stop drinking." That sort of rational control is just what an impulsive drinker can't accomplish. That's why he's called "impulsive" or "uncontrolled."

Doctor's Care Needed

Q: But does this mean that a person who gets started in alcoholism can't stop?

A: There are certain so-called "prealcoholic symptoms." In that phase we know people can stop themselves. But once this "control" factor is lost, they cannot stop themselves without help.

Q: They can use this drug, "Antabus," can't they?

A: Yes, but there is no question but that it can be a dangerous thing. Let's say you go to, the doctor and he gives you a supply of 12 of the tablets, and you go back six weeks later and get some more, and now you have this little horde. There are two or three things that may happen here. Knowing the alcoholic's guilt, remorse, and so forth, he forgets, on purpose -or not, to take his "Antabus," and he suddenly finds himself in a bar and he has had two drinks, maybe three. He is very upset, he's got alcohol in him now. He rushes home and says, "I'd better take three of the things." And he's going to drop dead.

Or there is somebody else in the house, too--old Aunt Mathilda, who has nice fifteen-year-old Ann guidance in a topsy-turvy world. It has been rightly said that alcohol addiction damages not only the compulsive drinker himself but everyone in his household.

On a recent rainy Saturday afternoon I met sparkling-eyed Ann on the steps of a small church. I followed her inside to the room where a dozen teen-aged youngsters awaited us.

"Until I joined Alateen," said Ann, "I was busy feeling sorry for myself and couldn't think straight. I was so ashamed of my father's boozing and so mad at my mother for not stopping him I spent hours in my bedroom where I could brood in privacy. I pleaded with my mother to get a divorce so we could raise our shades, live like normal happy people."

Every youngster present at the meeting had an alcoholic parent. Each knew at first hand how uncontrolled drinking can wreck marriages and devastate families.

Alateen now has 150 branches scattered through 50 states. It is an offspring of Alcoholics Anonymous and an allied organization, Al-Anon, to which wives, husbands and friends of alcoholics belong. Alateen accepts the principles and philosophy of AA and the basic AA tenet that alcoholism is an illness that can be arrested but never cured. With this acceptance comes understanding and, more often than not, a sharp reduction in self-pity.

Things are better now," said Ann. "Oh, I don't mean that dad has quit drinking. He hasn't. Just the same, things are better. I've learned from these other kids that my case isn't unique. Lots of them are worse off than I am."

The meeting opened with a prayer for serenity and courage. In the hour that followed, the boys and girls--members range in age from twelve to nineteen--exchanged bits of hard-won information, shared common experiences. In the main, typical teen-age dilemmas were explored. Yet it was meetings like this, Mrs. Miller told me, that helped to save her marriage. A wiser, calmer Ann eventually urged her mother to the final decision not to seek a divorce.

PRACTICAL ANSWERS . . . Alateens are not evangelistic groups dedicated to the reform of erring elders. One rule the new member learns at once: you cannot scold, plead, reason or threaten an alcoholic into sobriety; such an approach only makes matters worse. The best approach is the approach of toleration. An understanding that a drunken father is a sick father (one Alateen tells another) will not only help you to live with him but help him to live with you and with himself.

I met Fred, a skinny, fourteen-year-old, in an industrial section of Brooklyn. His mother, who holds the family together, is a department-store clerk. His father is a part-time accountant.

"It is pretty tough," said Fred, "to feel respect or affection for anybody like my old man. When I came home the other day he was slumped on the sofa and I knew he was hitting the bottle again. I didn't say a word, just looked at him and started upstairs. Maybe he read my mind. Anyway, he pulled a table lamp out of its socket and threw it at me. I was used to ducking and I wasn't hurt. But what does a kid do when his dad becomes violent?"

Alateen has a practical answer to that frequently asked question:

"Get completely out of his way until he is rational again. Then talk it over with someone who has the knowledge and experience to assist you. This may be an AA member, your clergyman, doctor or a close relative.

"An alcoholic can become irritable, over-emotional, brutal to the people he loves most. If you cannot avoid or ignore violent incidents, try your best to believe they would not have happened if your father were himself."

Some of the youngsters at the meetings I attended had never had a close friend. They needed and desperately craved companionship-for misery not only loves company but profits by it. They feared to invite acquaintances to homes where an unpredictable parent might be silly or outrageously drunk. Loneliness usually results in a distorted sensitivity, and many chip-on-the-shoulder young people had shunned company because of snubs that existed only in their imaginations.

HAPPIEST HARVEST... The friendships which grow out of Alateen are perhaps its happiest harvest. Some of the chapters hold picnics, dances, hi-fi get-togethers. But these are kept separate from the regular weekly meetings, which have serious purpose and are conducted on that level. The members, who are in search of moral support and counsel, want it that way.

Those within the family circle of an alcoholic always live in a climate of anxiety and suspense. They feel beaten and hopeless. Out of frustration there may arise convictions of personal guilt; because of the very elusiveness of the malady, they become convinced that in some way they must be responsible for the loved one's condition. This is a misconception children frequently bring to Alateen discussions. As soon as members become aware that their feelings of personal guilt are without foundation, they have already taken a long step toward mental health.

The primary function of Alateen is to help bewildered young people solve their own problems. Its strongest partisans, however, are mothers (or fathers) who are attempting, under almost insuperable difficulties, to rebuild or maintain marriages shadowed by alcoholism. As they see their children gain in self-knowledge, self-confidence and self-respect, they feel a lightening of the unequal burdens that are inevitable in an unequal partnership. An imperfect home, Alateens told me frankly, is better than a broken home.

school of studies at Yale which has been operating ever since. It is usually attended by representatives of the distilling and brewing industries, five or six professional temperance people, a dozen physicians, and about the same number of nurses, 25 to 30 ministers, 30 to 40 social workers and probation officers, 30 to 40 who are engaged in education, a few judges, and a few members of "Alcoholics Anonymous" who are engaged in teaching or in industrial personnel work.

More than 1,600 have graduated from the school and a large proportion is making use of this training in State and local, voluntary and governmental agencies dealing with problems of alcohol and alcoholism. At least 75 have become executive directors of such groups.

With the co-operation of the Connecticut Prison Association, an outpatient clinic just for alcoholics was begun in 1944, and a year later the first State Commission on Alcoholism was established by Connecticut and Dr. Bacon has been its chairman ever since. In 1940 the Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol was started. The Center also published a series of 15-page pamphlets that have been in unusual demand for such technical material.

The Yale Center now has six major divisions and is primarily interested in popular education on the subject of alcohol and research in certain areas of social and health problems, such as drunken driving, the problem drinker in industry and related subjects.

The interview with Dr. Bacon follows:

Q: Is yours the only center of scientific studies on alcohol in this country, Dr. Bacon?

A: It is the only one. We think it would be a healthier thing if there were two in the country. We had hoped that one would start down in Texas. Dr. Jellineck left us to go there and start such a center, but it finally broke up. He has since become the head of the World Health Organization Committee on Alcoholism.

Q: What is the alcohol problem?

A: There are several types of problems. There are scientific problems, there are group problems, and there are individual problems. But it is pretty impossible to separate them. Take, for example, the particular problem of alcoholism: If anybody wants to say it is a mental problem, I'd say they are absolutely correct; if anybody wants to say it's a legal problem, they are absolutely correct--or an economic problem or a medical problem or a social problem.

Q: Most people are not alcoholic, are they?

A: We would say that there are approximately 60 to 70 million drinkers out of a population of 110 million people of 15 years of age and over. We would suggest that there are just short of 4 million out of that 60 to 70 million who are patently losing, or have lost, their control, and their lives are beginning to show, or have already shown, damage in one or more aspects.

Q: Then the difference between the heavy drinker and the alcoholic is that the alcoholic has lost control?

A: Yes, but there is no real line between them, no clear-cut example.

Q: But only 1 person out of 16 who drinks is an alcoholic, is that right?

A: Yes.

Q: Is that proportion rising?

A: The best-known estimate is that developed by Dr. Jellineck which shows that between 1940 and 1948 there seemed to be a rather regular increase, and that in '49 and '50 it reached, so to speak, a plateau, and may show some indication of going down. However, remember this, that it takes from 6 or 7 to 20 years for alcoholism to develop, so if you are trying to think of a rise between 1940 and 1947 don't think of what happened between 1940 and 1947 alone, although what happened then might have speeded it up.

Q: It could go back to the depression years?

A: Yes.

Q: Does your research show that alcohol is injurious to the human body?

A: Alcohol oxidizes when it gets into the human system. It oxidizes at the rate of an ounce in two or three hours. For 100-proof whisky, which is 50 per cent alcohol, that means that 8 ounces of whisky would be all gone from the system in less than 12 hours, most of it breathed away, some lost through sweat or urine. This proportion would vary with an individual's weight and also with the amount of food he had in his stomach. Then the alcohol is gone. Even in the most pronounced binges, you lose it all in 48 hours. Chemical tests show that.

Q: What does it do to the body? Why cirrhosis of the liver and so on?

A: The actual answer to cirrhosis is not known, but I think the most prevalent theory is this: The liver under certain circumstances will tend to develop what is called "fatty tissue." In other words, you get fat mounting up there, which cuts down the function of the liver. Now there is an agent--probably this is over simplified--that counteracts this tendency, so that the fatty tissue doesn't last and finally take over the whole organ.

Some of us have stronger counteragents and some of us have weaker counteragents. Those who have weaker counteragents are very likely to develop cirrhosis of the liver--and they may never have had a drop of alcohol in their lives! Or they could be persons who take a drink once or twice a year, at wedding ceremonies or something, and they get cirrhosis.

Some have very strong counteragents and they can drink the alleged fantastic amounts that they say they do--a quart and a half every day of their lives, and so on.

Anyway, when you take a person who may be just below average in his counteragent effect, alcohol does--this is one theory--so reduce the effect of this weaker counterpart that this fatty tissue begins to form a little more and a little more, especially in the case of people who drink a great deal and continuously.

It may take 10 years before it begins to show up. Then you begin to get hobnail liver and the like so that just by palpation (touching the body from the outside) you can feel these hard spots where this fatty tissue has developed.

Q: What do you mean by "a great deal"?

A: You have to consider the person's weight and so on, but let's say he is drinking pretty regularly a pint of whisky every day. It will vary with the liver, of course. Even with the weakest liver in the world, you are not going to get cirrhosis automatically.

Q: What about the heart?

A: I am no expert on that, but I will leave some suggestions on it. Your question is out of my field and this answer certainly should not be regarded as authoritative from a medical viewpoint. But there is an action on the arteries from alcohol which will make it easier for blood to flow. So that if you begin to get a condition similar to, let's say, arteriosclerosis a certain amount of alcohol--and I don't recommend alcohol as the best way of doing this--may grant one a certain amount of relief from the hardening-artery situation, and there will be a little less effort on the part of the heart to pump and keep the blood going.

Diseases of Alcoholism

Q: Is that why patients with a heart condition are given alcohol?

A: I don't think so. I don't think many physicians know much about alcohol as such, anyway. Why should they? They don't get any training on it. It isn't mentioned in medical schools, except for the alcoholic diseases which are found in probably less than 25 per cent of the alcoholics in some countries and I think a smaller proportion in this country.

Delirium tremens, alcoholic hallucinosis, chronic avitaminosis, chronic gastritis, other things--and these are recognizable conditions, illnesses that would be discovered and labeled by any competent physician--which follow upon years of excessive drinking--are called the diseases of alcoholism. If you find delirium tremens in 18, 19 or 20-year-olds, I think you have good grounds for suspecting a psychotic condition set off or merely aggravated by alcohol.

Q: From the ordinary use of alcohol, what would you say is the effect on the heart? Is it helpful or harmful?

A: I wouldn't say that it was particularly one or the other until you get into conditions relating to certain ages, as, say, 50 beyond, in which it may serve a useful function.

Q: Doesn't it cause an immediate palpitation of the heart? Doesn't a drink cause the heart to beat faster?

A: I can't answer that question. By the way, you can see almost any bad reaction you want to see after the injection of alcohol following certain situations, but whether that is caused by alcohol or not--

Where Textbooks Mislead

Q: Physiology books in school used to warn against the use of alcohol, and one of the ways they did it was to tell you that it caused immediate stimulus and as soon as the stimulus had worn off you would have a certain fatigue and a certain reaction. Therefore, alcohol, in stimulating the heart, was harmful. That was in the textbooks in the old days. Is the modern theory any different?

A: We made a survey in 1940 of all the textbooks being used. I think what was done was to pick out 10 common fallacies--such as alcohol is a stimulant, alcohol causes certain diseases, alcohol does something to the brain tissue, drinking causes shortening of life, and so forth--all beliefs that have been disproved by objective and empiric evidence that could be repeated in any laboratory--and checked the tests against these fallacies.

Q: This was a survey you conducted on those fallacies?

A: Well, first, we know the fallacies. We had worked on them in our own laboratory. Then we went out and, as far as we could, -studied every text that was used in a school system, whether parochial or State, all the manuals put out by the State bureaus on alcoholic education, all the temperance stuff and checked to see how widespread these fallacies were. And about 98 per cent of the books had these fallacies.

Q: What does alcohol supply? What is it that people seek?

A: There is one very good answer: Alcohol--and I don't care in what form you get it as long as it's ethyl alcohol--is what is called a "sedative." I am merely repeating their statements of the pharmacologists, the physiologists and the biochemists. Under the sedatives they would subclassify it as a "depressant." This means that it tends to produce sleep finally. But it does so in a very special way--namely, that you can take just a little bit and it will have a slight depressant action. No matter how little you take, it will hit certain central nervous functions.

Incidentally, the outward behavior of the person may seem just the opposite of being "depressed"; what happens is that certain controls are reduced; it is more like releasing a brake; it is not a stimulant, not stepping on an accelerator.

Then you drink a little more and it hits the central nervous structure more; a little more, it hits still more; and finally you will go to sleep. If somebody should then inject more while your are asleep finally the heart would "forget," if you like, and you would drop dead. You already will have been dropped, however, before that takes place.

It's lucky, shall we say, that it is very difficult to drink yourself to death. You could do it, but it takes quite a few minutes for the alcohol to get into operation. Drinking at any ordinary speed would result in one's passing out before a fatal amount was consumed. But if you drank a quart or a quart and a half just as fast as you could, possibly injecting it into your system, you might kill yourself.

Q: Alcohol is a poison?

A: On the basis that any substance you take can kill you, yes. But this is also true of mashed potatoes.

Why People Drink

Q: Well, why do people drink? If it is a sedative, why would people go through all this just to go to sleep?

A: In the early stages, alcohol has this reaction: You relax, you operate more slowly, or you operate with less efficiency and exactitude and discrimination. This takes place first in those areas in which "learning" is recent or difficult or painful. Now as to this learning, if we had an experiment here and sat here and went around learning the names of the States or 15 varieties of flowers, that might be interesting and prove the point. If you were tested on this learning you might get a score of 95. After one or two small drinks, however, you would only score perhaps 85. If geography or the study of flowers had always been painful or difficult for you, your sober score might be 88, but after one or two small drinks it might drop to 65.

But for human beings, this sort of learning is not too important.

Learning that is important for us in the sense that it affects our daily lives and carries heavy emotional impact would concern such things as, perhaps, one's perception of one's self. "Am I a pretty reasonable sort of guy? Do most people think I'm a stinker? Am I weak? Am I stupid? Am I sexually rather impotent, so that no woman would ever be interested in me?" --or, if a woman--"Would any man ever look at me," and "I can never be a mother." This sort of learning is very painful. It may take over 15 to 20 years to learn, and it is horrible to live with. Or there is the matter of not being able to assert one's self, to stand up in competition with others.

We know of people who are frightened in these ways. They may have the capacity, the ability, and so forth, to live adequately and happily--but they can't exercise it.

Q: So they take to alcohol to forget all this?

A: Well, this is what happens--this is the sort of learning that is first realized: Here's a fellow who is very shy in a group. He has a couple of drinks and loses some of that very painful learning (shyness or exhibitionism are learned modes of behavior) temporarily, so that now he can talk a little more freely. He suddenly forgets that he is incompetent or frightened.

Q: His inhibitions are gone?

A: They are not gone--they are temporarily reduced.

Q: Would you consider, then, to that extent that alcohol can serve a useful purpose?

A: Well, you selected the word "useful." I didn't. Let's take an example: This man on my left may be my boss. I think he is an awful stuffed shirt and I want to punch his face in and tell him he's an old jackass. However, I have learned to control such impulses. But now I have a few drinks and say, "You're an old jackass." Well, that probably didn't turn out very useful.

Q: But couldn't it be the opposite? Couldn't it relax the fellow who is too shy to stand up and address a group and help him to forget about his shyness?

A: Well, here is a classic example: There was the man in Germany in 1888 or so who moved to a new town. He was quite a shot, and they have a rifle club there and they go out to see Herr von What's-his-name and ask him if he can shoot. He says, "Sure," and goes boom, boom, boom, and gets 20 bull's eyes out of 20 shots. So they ask him if he would like to join the team when they go over and play Von Sedlitzville. All right. So they make him anchor man down there, but old Boom-boom-boom gets 12 on the bull's eye, 6 on the outside, and so forth. "Oh, well. He was upset, he was new." So they try him again, and again he's a failure. But in the interim he is out on the range practicing and hitting 20 out of 20. One day somebody by mistake or something happened upon this: "Just before the meet we will give him a couple of drinks." He goes up and, instead of hitting only 12 out of 20, he gets 17.

How Score Can Rise, But Ability Fall

Now what has happened is this: The alcohol has reduced his acuity, his reaction time, his discrimination, so that he could not get 20 out of 20, but it has also reduced his inhibition, his fear, or whatever it was that was bothering him in competitive situations, so that he doesn't drop way down to 12. Alcohol actually seems to improve his ability, but it has also actually brought his abilities down. Is it useful?

The problem here is not the answer. It is the question. Americans always want black-and-white, or yes-and-no, answers to questions concerning good and bad, or true and false. Most questions, unfortunately, cannot realistically be answered in such simplicity. Alcohol is not either useful or nonuseful. It is clearly both, depending on the person, situation, amount and many other variables.

What Makes An Alcoholic

Q: What is your answer to the question as to what makes an alcoholic? Most people don't know what the word means. Most people don't understand why, since they can take a drink every day in their homes and never get drunk, all of a sudden somebody comes along and takes one drink and he's under the table. Why is that?

A: I can't accept the example of one drink and under the table. An alcoholic might pass out after taking one drink while you watched him. He would have had 20 drinks previously without your knowledge. Sometimes people who are utterly inexperienced will act, following a drink, in ways they think to be "tight" or "high." Adolescents experimenting with alcohol may show behavioral responses utterly inexplicable from the action of the small amounts they have consumed. However, it's hard to believe that even they would fall under a table with one drink.

Q: What about the difference between the person who takes a drink every day and is not an alcoholic and the person who drinks a little now and then and is an alcoholic?

A: We would say that there are probably two important criteria to distinguish the alcoholic from what might be termed the "heavy drinker." One of them is this: the lack of control exhibited by the individual over, first, when or if he will drink. That is, "Will I drink this afternoon, or not?" Of course, he is going to drink sometime. Second is the loss of control over the extent to which he will drink. That is, sometimes he has decided he will sit down for two and suddenly finds he is having his sixth drink. And when I say, "decided," I mean that this can even be announced. It is not only internal, which can be discovered by an objectively trained observer, but he may even say, "I've got this meeting coming up," or "My kid's having a birthday party and I'm not going to take a drink." Then to his own amazement, shock and horror, he finds himself having drinks.

The other is that he plans to have three drinks but--not every time, but with increasing frequency--he takes 30 or 40 and is drinking to oblivion. He's out of control. That is one aspect.

The other we would say--and this must happen eventually--is that this excessive drinking, through drunken behavior, begins to create problems of itself--remorse, anger toward others, guilt, feelings of inferiority, helplessness, and so forth, within the individual, and manifest signs appear of trouble in his relations with his social environment, that is with friends, family, on the job and the like.

This man is having his "status quo" as an individual regularly damaged because of this drinking. Now, it is those two things--chronic and increasing damage directly related to drinking, and the lack of control over drinking--which mark the alcoholic from the "heavy drinker."

Q: Do you think that a person who is a chronic drinker inevitably becomes an alcoholic?

A: No, that isn't so. There are millions of regular drinkers who aren't and won't become alcoholics.

Q: Well, then, what is it that encourages the chronic drinker into the alcoholic stage?

A: But the alcoholic doesn't have to be a chronic drinker. Of course, if I could give you the answer just like ABC, we wouldn't have to be here, because it would be something we would know how to fix. We have some ideas about it, however.

Let's say that we have a number of people who meet these two criteria--they are out of control, which has gone on over some period of time, and some socially or emotionally significant aspect of their lives has been damaged thereby. I think we will find that there are quite a few different types.

Major Problem for Some is Psychotic

One type I would call "adjunctive" alcoholism. That is not a technical term; I just use it. Here is a man who from the point of view of the depth of his condition, the difficulty of treating it, and its impact on his whole life is more importantly affected by something other than his drinking problem. He is what the psychiatrists call psychotic or protopsychotic, if there is such a term. And he has found, or thinks he has found, that getting drunk relieves the horrible feelings of psychosis. His psychotic symptoms are not extreme, so the manifestations don't strike you or the man on the street or the cop on the corner, except in rare instances.

But he gets drunk 30, 40, 50 times a year, and the "drunkenness" behavior is noticeable. This, if you like, is a facade, the appearance of the condition. He may well be called a "damned drunk" or "inebriate," or whatever the term happens to be. He is haled into court, the social worker will see him, the minister will see him, his wife will scream, his boss will fire him, and so forth, and he will be called an alcoholic. And maybe he is developing alcoholism, but his major problem is something else. We find this with certain types of psychotics.

Q: Are there quite a few of that type?

A: I would say that, although our figures are not too good, there are quite a few. I would say that a number of epileptics can be found here, because alcohol apparently reduces the strength of the trigger mechanism that sets off the epileptic seizure.

People who have brief epileptic seizures like that--3-second attacks, so that all you notice is that sometimes the person doesn't seem to be paying attention to you--may gain some relief from using alcohol. The man may not understand it, but he drinks and he feels better. And he had better look out. Because the day one starts using alcohol as a medicine for a chronic condition, he is using a sedative for privately defined purposes.

Q: Then aren't you finding that mental-hygiene problems are closely related to alcoholism?

A: Very.

Q: So that some people who have mental or emotional aberrations of one kind or another become alcoholics?

A: Yes, they might try to find relief in this way. However, I would say that the larger number of people who are neurotic--and I mean here psychiatrically determined neurosis--although they have the opportunity to drink, do not become alcoholic. While excessive drinking may have relieved some emotional pain, it was not acceptable to them for a variety of reasons. Maybe their own neurotic pattern was functional enough for them to meet their troubles. Maybe they were brought up to believe that getting drunk is a horrible evil, far worse than their neurotic pain.

Let me say that the likelihood of a woman who is neurotic becoming regularly and often rather drunk, perhaps even developing into an alcoholic, is much less likely than in the case of a man, because the social pressures on drunkenness are much heavier against a woman than a man in our society. As a result, it is a less likely sort of adjustment to problems for women in our society.

Mental Problems

Q: Let's take it in reverse. Aren't the people who are trying to cure alcoholism aware

today of the fact that they have to cure the mental problems as well?

A: This calls for a lot of comment. First,

Let me say none of us accepts the word "cure."

That is one of these words I would like to eliminate because we say that no alcoholic is ever cured--it is merely an arrested condition.

Q: Does that mean that alcoholism is a disease?

A: Only to this point--that to our knowledge it cannot be helped to the extent that the person can relearn how to become a social, temperate, moderate drinker.

Q: He must give it up completely?

A: Absolutely, forever, in any form, in any amount. We have cases of people who had stopped for 15 years and who thought it was safe, or some naive doctor told them a beer isn't really drinking, and so they go on again--

Q: And it takes very little quantity--

A: It's the alcohol. The quantity doesn't matter, no. If they are unaware that they are taking alcohol, if they don't even know about it, or in some circumstances if the ingestion is interpreted in so ritualized a fashion that it has nothing whatsoever to do with "drinking" as that is interpreted by the individual, then there might--and I emphasize the "might"--be no effect. I still wouldn't be surprised if it did start him off again.

Take the Catholic priest who is a recovered alcoholic. At Mass, as I understand it, nobody gets any wine at all except the priest; sometimes he may have to take quite a little because it all has to be used. I have heard, and I would believe that in the case of certain priests who were recovered alcoholics, that this ingestion of alcohol--because chemically that is what it is--did not cause the man to revert to alcoholism. Certainly a sincere priest would not interpret this act as "drinking." However, it would seem a great risk to run.

Alcoholism in Feeble-Minded

Q: Well, do you think that if we make progress with mental hygiene in America we will tend to reduce alcoholism?

A: We will reduce that proportion that I was speaking of. I started off with the worst, the psychotics and pronounced neurotics.

Q: What are some of the others?

A: There is a certain proportion that are feeble-minded. We would say that the proportion of alcoholism in the feeble-minded is much higher than it is in the general population. But, altogether, it's a small number. The feeble-minded, the psychotic and the epileptic are three categories in what I termed adjunctive alcoholics. The person who begins to act like an alcoholic at 17, 18 or 19 presents at least a strong suspicion of a major neurotic or approaching psychotic situation, perhaps schizophrenia.

Ordinarily alcoholism will take anywhere from 7 to 15 years to develop from the early -symptoms to the final full-blown appearance. But with major neurotic conditions the development may take less than a year.

Q: Are these the only groups who are likely to turn from social drinking to excessive drinking?

A: On, no. This is just one small segment. I would say that we have some people that are called "neurotic." Now, what I mean by "neurotic" is approximately this: His peer group--we will say "his" and not "her" because we run 5 1/2 males to one female--thought at the time, say during the teens, that the individual was clearly peculiar.

They are "screwballs," or whatever the popular word is among their group, and they are known as that by the others. They're frightened, they're shy, they don't get along well in interpersonal relationships, they don't know how to fight, they don't know how to date, they don't know how to dance, they don't know how to dress, and so forth. They may study excessively, they may be highly overcompensating athletes who are terrified of other people, they may be "mother's boys." And the others recognize it, and it is noticeably interfering with their day-to-day life. This person at 16, 17 or 18 may discover alcohol. He may not even know that he has discovered it. He may go to his first party and have some drinks and simply know that, "Gee, when I go to the Joneses on Saturdays I have a wonderful time!"

But after several experiences he can't help making the correct discrimination because he went to Green's house and it was Thursday and there were drinks and he had a wonderful time, and the next Saturday he went to the Joneses, had no drinks and he felt awful. This person, then, begins to find that with drinks he can act more like a human being, that he is accepted by others, and there is this tremendous relief--"My God, I can be a human being after all!"

The group of alcoholics with this background, I would say, is more sizable than the psychotics. But I would not say that they are all the alcoholics by any means. Anybody who tries to explain alcoholism entirely in terms of basic or character neurosis faces an impasse.

Preventing Neurosis

Q: If we should make more progress in mental hygiene will we make more progress in the field of alcoholism?

A: As mental hygiene is able to do something about the prevention of psychosis, for this percentage, yes. As it is able to do something for the prevention of neurosis, or social or emotional deviation, obviously for a bigger percentage, yes.

But, then, take this even large group of alcoholics who don't give evidence of early neurosis. You only discover them when they are 40. You go back through their life histories and you can't find in the school record any evidence that they were peculiar--they were just like everybody else.

Now everybody--and this is pertinent to the mental-hygiene question--everybody has personality difficulties. We all of us have stronger and weaker spots in emotional and social adjustment by definition. Some of us are quite well adjusted in relationships with the opposite sex on a series of levels, whether it refers to actual sexual intercourse or whether it refers merely to talking to secretaries. Some of us are average and some of us are a little more or a little less well adjusted. Some of us in the matter of competition and assertion and dominance are stronger or weaker. All of us have certain weak spots. We are not robots.

Let's say that I am weak when it comes to asserting myself with people in a higher status or with older men. Maybe it has something to do with early experiences with my father or my older brother. Anyway, it is a common thing. It is found in personnel problems all the time. You promote a good man and he collapses. Why? He cannot give orders on a higher level.

A boy is, let us say, now 23, 24, 25, and he has all the ambitions that most young American men have, and he feels a little more at ease, a little more relaxed, and loses a little of this restraint after a few drinks. Well, he says to himself, so do a lot of other people. So what!

Along about age 25, 26, 27, this particular problem becomes even more significant to him. The boy is no longer in the school or college situation and can't fall into one of those nicely defined categories where this is the faculty, these are my elders, these only lower classmen, and begins to realize that he is a competitive person, too.

He, too, can get up there and can even disagree with those people. In fact, the situation demands that he compete. This makes him somewhat ill at ease, but over the week end when he has a cocktail, some highballs, or whatever it may be, he loses some of his fears and anxieties on this score, and this loss becomes highly important.

There would seem to be a point, as we recapture the life experience of the alcoholic, where there suddenly is an increase in the intake. Let's say that in his group they usually have, say, three cocktails two nights a week and on Saturday nights. This man's intake jumps up 50 percent--

When Drinking Gets Serious

Q: Is this suddenly?

A: It would seem so. At least the man remembers it, and so do some of his friends. Then he begins to show all sorts of symptoms, but I will skip all of them and go right into the possible mental-hygiene aspect of it. He begins to increase the time of drinking and may have a couple in the afternoon. He may even shift jobs so that he may get into a position where this sort of thing is more possible. He may shift friends so that he associates frequently with those among whom heavier drinking is socially acceptable.

And we will find that he is making certain decisions and is meeting certain people particularly at the times when he can have a few drinks--not that he is going out and hanging on to lampposts. He may tie one on now and then if the people in his group tie one on. But he is regularly drinking more. Perhaps he is meeting problems with his wife or his kids that have made him very uneasy. He can't stand the kids at supper time, and he is afraid his wife expects him to do things he can't do, but if he has two cocktails every night he no longer notices their criticisms, their requests for his attention. He may be abrupt and even a little sarcastic with them, and doesn't know that he is doing it.

This is a very slow, gradual process. We call it the "pampering effect" of alcohol. There was a weak spot in his personality armament and, instead of trying something new and learning through variation, no, he protects himself more and more by alcohol. The needs for the personality go on and new needs come up, especially in the weakest areas, and this fellow is not learning, he is not growing, he is not changing, but more and more is covering it up.

Then, if the situation develops whereby he is put under some special pressure, he may--and it is three o'clock in the afternoon--say, "If only I had a couple of drinks!" And he's right--because he has those couple of drinks and it doesn't bother him so much. Then occasionally begins to get drunk. Now, when he gets drunk, he has not only the remorse that any might have who experience a -hang-over, but also has this awful remorse about the situation which he didn't resolve and about what he did while drunk, plus the fact, "I've done it before and before and before, and I can't stop it!" He experiences a monumental psychological effect from the hang-over.

A vicious-circle process can now be seen. As the individual more and more depends on alcohol to meet certain situations--and for a while he is successful, for it does work--he is, through lack of exercise, so to speak, reducing his basic equipment to meet other people and particular types of situations effectively. As this happens, he needs a little more. As he begins to take a little more, he begins to make "drunkenness" mistakes. In other words, he could be overly aggressive and doesn't even know it; you can be critical of him, and he doesn't even notice.

Pretty soon the liabilities of drinking -overtake the assets. Furthermore, occasionally he oversteps and really gets drunk and does things that create new, major difficulties, so he has to get over this additional problem. To cover up this new problem created by the excessive use of alcohol, he uses more alcohol, and so the nice little vicious circle becomes a bigger vicious circle.

It may be that a definition of psychological addiction" would be the use of alcohol to overcome the effects of alcohol, whereas when you are merely using alcohol to overcome situational problems or neurotic problems, this is not the case. Then you are drinking to overcome shyness or inferiority feelings, which are not created by alcohol.

Q: Now, where does mental hygiene fit in?

A: We would say two things. First, let's note this fact. Over the past 50 years, which is at longest the reign of modern psychiatry--and perhaps you would prefer 25 years--psychiatrists have been peculiarly unsuccessful with alcoholics. The psychiatrists know this and dislike the alcoholics; the alcoholics know this and dislike the psychiatrists. And so the hope of doing anything, one with the other is, of course, very low. Psychiatrists are not alone in that, however--it covers everybody else, too.

Slips In Psychiatry

Q: But why have the psychiatrists, if this is a mental-hygiene problem, not done better?

A: One answer to that would be that the psychiatrist, quite correctly, sees that this person has personality difficulties and in some instances they see a long-lasting character neurosis, one that's been in the developmental stages for years, perhaps since the age of 4 or 5. So the psychiatrist says that, unless we get rid of this thing at the bottom, we are just playing games with the thing at the top.

So the alcoholic comes into the office and the psychiatrist starts needling back into this, perhaps, adolescent problem, and then back to the 7 or 3-year-old period. The alcoholic looks at the psychiatrist and wonders, "Which one of us is screwy?" Here he is; his wife is going to toss him out on his ear, he can't hold food on his stomach, his glasses are smashed, he has lost his papers, he is going to lose his job. He has this horrible feeling of fear, of additional worry about this alcohol business, and here this weird character is asking him what dreams he had about his great-grandmother when he was 4 years old.

Q: That's an exaggeration, of course--

A: Yes it is, but it is significant of a very important thing: The psychiatrist, very correctly, proceeds on the premise that there were underlying difficulties much more significant than the actual effect of the alcohol. And so they begin to talk about alcohol as a symptom, but I would suggest to you that, as the alcoholic has gone through alcoholic experiences for many years, he is no longer merely a neurotic type B or a neurotic type C. He may once have fitted such a label, but now he has added alcohol-dependency and has fused the two into something new. He has problems, demanding problems, problems that have gone so deeply into his insides that this alcohol will trigger him off even 15 to 20 years later, even if he never takes a drink in the interim. The alcohol dependence is terribly important in itself. It is a new thing. It is what we call "alcoholism."

Q: So you do have your original problem in personality and mental hygiene?

A: Yes--and perhaps you can tie this original to poor neighborhoods, unresolved Oedipus complexes, lack of affection, and so forth, yes. But, unless there is also understanding of the impact of excessive and chronic alcohol ingestion and what it can do to an emerging, growing personality, therapy won't get very far.

In the first place, you will have a lot of alcoholics who won't have what you would call a neurosis, and yet they are just as bad as the other fellows in the end. When you get the one who has this real neurotic problem you probably can't reach him by the usual psychiatric technique because, as the psychiatrist would put it, he is an objectionable, un-co-operative person--and that is right.

Heredity

Q: Is there any inherent tendency to become an alcoholic? You hear of people referred to as a natural for alcoholism--

A: Let's put it this way: Acquired characteristics are not inherited--that is, you cannot inherit a taste for alcohol. You do not inherit drinking. Alcoholism? There is an inherited structure which is closely related to one's potentiality to develop an effective personality. So, since weaker personalities are prone to maladjustments of all sorts, including alcoholism, yes.

We say that alcoholism is found to a higher degree among the feeble-minded than the rest of the population. Certain of the feeble-minded probably have a structured, organic deficiency which can be inherited. However, they inherit feeble-mindedness, not alcoholism.

Q: I want to clear up this heredity question a little bit. Do I understand you to say that, while there is no acquired taste, if a parent has a personality defect, and that defect is reproduced in the child--

A: It couldn't be personality--it would have to be an organic defect.

Q: Well, does that cause the child to take to drink?

A: The organic defect does not cause the individual to drink. The organic defect has an effect on their ability to intellectually or in reaction time or in emotional spasms or in certain diseases, say, tuberculosis.

Q: If that is reproduced in the child, then the child will be susceptible to the same thing?

A: It will be susceptible to personality disorders, sometimes alcoholism, sometimes delinquency or neuroses. Now, I should add one more thing--that alcoholism runs in families.

Q: What is the reason that it runs in families?

A: Because the father or the mother who is an alcoholic finds it almost impossible to give love and affection and attention and responsibility to anybody, especially to a child, who may well make him feel guilty and the like. This is, of course, particularly true of the mother. The situation in which the alcoholic's children live, the way they are brought up, just everything, tends to make them upset people. Sometimes they will become extreme, wild "drys," ascetics; sometimes they will become extreme drunks. Sometimes they may be moderate drinkers. But they experience hardships of an emotional nature during infancy, childhood and adolescence if the parent is an alcoholic.

I might add something else here. Alcoholism cuts across all social groups, all educational groups, all occupational groups. It is limited to certain age groups, yes, largely because it is a slowly (10-15 years) developing condition; it is most common between 35 and 55. It differs by sex, yes--5 or 6 men to 1 woman.

And in ethnic, cultural background--we find that the Mediterranean people--the Italians and the Greeks, for example--will tend to have low rates. The Jews, almost all of whom use alcoholic beverages, have an extraordinarily low rate, a fact which has been recognized for over three centuries.

The so-called native white American group will have quite a high rate, as will the Irish, Scandinavian, English, and Polish people.

One noticeable thing is the difference between the sexes. In this country the ratio is about 5 1/2 or 6 to 1; in England for many years, 1890 to 1940, it was running about 2 men to 1 woman; in Scandinavia at the same time it was about 27 men to 1 woman. But it is interesting to note that, after three generations in this country, the Scandinavian rate began to descend to about 11 or 12 to 1, the English to come up to about 4 to 1. Those Jews who have more and more become secularized, gotten away not only from the Orthodox but also from the Conservative or the Reformed--especially if their parents have also--their rate has begun to go up.

In other words, the Americanization process is gradually working in this sphere as well as others.

Symptoms

Q: What are the prealcoholic symptoms?

A: Well, there's an increase in intake--we have the man who is drinking just like the other people in his group. The quantity doesn't matter--it may be six sherries a week, or two highballs a night. This man starts increasing his intake, and he begins to show some of these behaviors--and remember it is the repetition of these behaviors and their patterning with the others, not just their occasional appearance.

The first thing it suggests is an increase in gross, drunken behavior--that is, when he has a little too much, instead of acting the way he used to act when he had a little too much, he begins to be more out of control in his immediate behavior.

You all know that inhibitions go down with drinks--one forgets the immediate worries, the immediate fears. For instance, you're all being very polite here, but if we were at a cocktail party, I couldn't get all this attention. I'd have to talk a little louder; my jokes aren't really very funny, but after two or three drinks they really begin to seem to me to have that particular flavor that would make Noel Coward jealous, and even you may forget a bit and laugh at some of my jokes.

But this is still within the range of social acceptance of that group. This man, however, begins to go beyond that. He starts to be a big shot--spends a lot of money, sets them up for the boys in the back room; he get noisy; certain words which are limited perhaps to times when I hit myself with a hammer begin to come out more and more in general conversation. In a variety of ways this man's behavior more and more often becomes obvious, irritatingly obvious, to the other members of the group when he is drinking.

Dangers in a Blackout

Another thing of considerable significance is the appearance, often very early in the game, of what is called "the blackout" or "pulling a blank"--this is sort of temporary amnesia. The man is drinking along about 7, 7:30 or 8. Now the blackout begins, but, if you're the man you don't know it--You're still around, you're having drinks, you're talking--you may get in a car, and drive 50 miles, you may take a room at a hotel, but memory has stopped completely and one cannot recall anything that has taken place since 8:30.

You can imagine the terrific impact this will have on women in our society, because there is immediately the thought: "I may have had a sexual experience--or other people will think I have, which is just as bad." It is terrifying--less terrifying for a man.

You get situations where a man has a blackout which lasts 36 to 48 hours--he ends up in another city, he doesn't know where he is. He learns to have a newspaper sent up to his room to discover the date and what town he's in. I now of one man who when he came out of the blackout remembered that he was to have signed a $400,000 contract the previous day at 10 a.m. Quickly making himself presentable, he rushed in to the corporation president with whom he was to have closed the deal, made some lame apologies, and hoped the whole thing wasn't off. The corporation president looked at him rather strangely and then stated: "Mr. C., you were here yesterday at 10 a.m. and we signed the agreement." Not all blackouts have this type of surprise for the end of the story.

Then there is the gulping and sneaking--this is an indication that it is not social drinking any more--the fellow has to do more than the social pattern will allow. He needs to get this personality jolt or lift through acquiring a significant and rapid concentration of alcohol in his system--just a little bit doesn't get him started. He begins to know that at the Jones house he will only get a couple of martinis, so before he goes to the Joneses' he usually has a couple of quick ones--he's the fellow who has to help the hostess, and incidentally get a few slugs on the side. He is learning that he must have more.

Now, these are early symptoms.

Q: Can they be corrected? Can he stop?

A: Yes.

Q: Could you give him some rules, Dr Bacon?

A: To know that next he goes into alcoholism--that that is the next step--the first great crucial point, the loss of control. He meant to have two drinks, he winds up drunk. We find that he begins to need special rationalizations to explain his drinking, because people begin to notice he is drinking more. And these rationalizations cover the waterfront--everything you have ever heard of.

At this time he may show a few instances of drinking alone. Drinking alone can be all right under a doctor's prescription, or some people use it to go to sleep, or there may be a religious ritual. But I'm not talking about any of those. He begins to drink alone and likes it. He doesn't need all these other people pressing in on him, he may become a "loner." This is quite usual with women alcoholics for whom social conventions don't allow as many socially acceptable opportunities for drinking. Not all alcoholics are "loners."

Somewhere along in here--it may wait until the later stages--some dear, dear friend or even a physician may advise him during a hang-over--and he gets more hang-overs than others and they hurt him far more than they do other people--that a "quick one" at the beginning of the day will help. Many, many times it becomes humanly impossible for him to think of getting up and going to work and so on without this fortification.

We begin to find some asocial behavior. I am not talking about anything marked. But we do find a little trouble on the job, a little trouble at home, a little trouble here and there, automobile trouble, or what not. It's more than he had been having in the past. It is reported on--quietly. But most of his friends tend to hush up comments about it. Trying to be helpful perhaps, many people try to cover up for him. Of course, he tries to do so also. Naturally, the day of reckoning gets worse as it is postponed. And about this time he may say, "I've got to do something about this." So he tries to change the pattern--a little shift from rye to gin, or he will stop drinking before 5 in the afternoon, or he will only drink at home, never in a commercial place.

Q: Does that help?

A: No. It isn't drinking patterns that are his trouble; it is the excessive ingestion of alcohol. And he can fit that into any pattern of drinking. Being an alcoholic, he will. Pretty soon--and it will be the end of what we call "the early stages"--he may go to get help from a minister, friend or someone outside the family, or he may even go to a sanitarium or a doctor or a hospital. He tries them all out.

The Binge

Now we come to the beginning of the last stage, which is the "binge." We have our own way of talking about a "binge." A person can be completely "blotto" for 48 hours or for a week and we might not call it a binge if this fellow, let's say, is drunk over the week end, but on Monday morning he gets to the job. He may be on a two-week vacation and he is "blotto" for three or four days, but perhaps he has not completely disrupted social expectancy and social habit of his group. But this bird, who has started his week-end drinking about Friday at 2 p.m. and slowly slides off only about Monday noon and doesn't get around to the office till Tuesday--this four days is much more significant than six days on a vacation. The man begins to go on binges which clearly disrupt and insult the society.

At this point, the alcoholic may start getting secretive about his drinking. By now he will have surely learned the morning drink business, and he learns to keep a supply for the morning. He starts hiding his supply and he may develop all the tricky, tricky habits of the confirmed alcoholic and waste extraordinary ingenuity on protecting his secret supply. I call it wasted--sometimes the mental exercise equals Thomas Alva Edison at his best.

I might say that one of the most tragic things in the world is to see an alcoholic who has a half bottle left for the morning which he puts away where the little woman isn't going to find it--only to discover in the morning that he had been in a blackout when he did the hiding.

What a frantic, maddening search will follow!

Finally, a Breakdown

We finally begin to see a social breakdown which is really manifest. His friends, if they are still in that category, find it harder and harder to cover up. Now he loses the second or third job, and even though he got in to the office first and resigned, too many people know he was fired. Trouble with the wife and kids begins to come out in the open, and so on. Social difficulties mount rapidly. He begins perhaps to show some physical symptoms, tremors; more and more often he's in a physically run-down condition, which was perhaps present earlier in an acute fashion but over in two days--now it becomes chronic. And his rationalizations to himself--no longer can he find explanations in the culture that will satisfy even him, to say nothing of others. He is beginning to give up. His fears and his guilt and his remorse, instead of being pinpointed to what he did last night, or to his attitude toward his wife over 6 years, or 16 years, now become generalized without definition.

There is undefined fear, undefined remorse that he can't even explain--he has this black depression. It is called the blues sometimes--the real blues because you can't identify it. That's the difference between the real blues and a sentimental blues--you can always say it's because Mama went away--but with the real blues you can't identify what it is that is so painful, so threatening. That's what's so horrifying. And at this point the fellow may give up socially on the grand scale, may slip down into Skid Row. Now the "DT's" may appear, and so on.

Q: What can you do to help--in the early stages particularly?

A: I would like to answer that in the first instance by pointing out that the behaviors called "early symptoms" are not by themselves symptoms. They have been ridiculed by some newspaper commentators, and if they are considered as separate instances, such ridicule may be O.K. It is when they are patterned and repetitive and increasing that they are early symptoms. For instance, among your friends may be some who have had a blackout. Does that mean they're alcoholics? No. It may have to do with the improper utilization of alcohol by the body. Your friend may have gotten drunk several times, he may have sneaked drinks once in a while, he may have said at parties a couple of times, "Let's have one for the road," or he may stop at your house to have a nightcap, or he may stop at a tavern on the way to a party.

Taken by themselves, these need not be symptoms. It is only when these things get into a pattern and become repetitive, that they make sense as early symptoms of alcoholism. Naturally, drunkenness may occur many times without any of these things being present at all.

Giving Up Drink

Q: What can be done about it?

A: For the people in the later stages you need almost a re-forming of life--particularly in social adjustments--and, for some people, also in the emotional sphere. Drinking will have to be given up permanently. Some may need physiological care beyond remedies for temporary acute ills. Originally, some 10 years and more back, it was the late-stage alcoholics who came looking for help, and so rather drastic steps were needed.

Now, as "Alcoholics Anonymous" and our clinics began to be more widely known, some of the frightened people in the middle and earlier stages came in. In fact, today they are the largest groups we see.

Q: What are you going to do for them?

A: First, we began to find they are different types. Some of them were way back in the first stages, some of them needed a little knowledge and a little guidance from a neutral and a respectable source; when they could see where they were and could be given a little support. If they could have some of the situational factors--such as the wife, who has been doing the wrong thing even with the best motives, triggering the guy into his alcoholism--when they could receive just a little help, they could help themselves quite effectively.

If you could relieve those pressures and give this man just a little support, a little hope, a little help, then he didn't have such a hard time.

Q: Could the people in the middle stages, who had lost control, stop drinking?

A: So far as we know, they can't stop permanently without help. Now, there is going to be a case here and a case there where they can. Ordinarily we don't know in such cases whether they really were alcoholics before they stopped--just that they said so or their doctor, or Aunt Mathilda or the judge said that they were alcoholics. Then you may find out that this judge or mother-in-law thinks anybody who has two beers a week is an alcoholic.

Q: In that group he isn't out of control, then?

A: That very control is the crucial point in getting into alcoholism.

Q: Can he stop at that point' and later on be a moderate drinker?

A: So far as we know he cannot become a controlled drinker. There may be some people who manifest some of these behaviors for a variety of reasons and later on drop the variant behavior without dropping the drinking. However, to date there is no well-recorded case that has been followed over as little as seven months, of a person who had--by consent of two or three outside observers going over the record--been an alcoholic, no matter what the stage, who was later on, say for a period of roughly a year, found to have been a controlled drinker.

Q: What about before he loses control and sees some symptoms, what does he do in that period?

A: He can keep control.

Q: How does he do it?

A: As a matter of advice, I would say to him: "Buster, you'd be awfully smart to play it safe. The safe way is for you to have a look around at your life, find out what you're getting amusement from, where your job is, where your friends are, and see in what areas drinking seems to press itself, socially, upon you, and start manipulating those situations a little. Maybe you can control it."

Here is a typical way to find out--I've never proven this, but it sounds reasonable and was suggested to me by a member of "Alcoholics Anonymous," or "AA's," as they are called. To find out if one is an alcoholic or not, you get the is-he-or-isn't-he person to tell you what he thinks sort of average, social, moderate drinking is. Let's say he decides a highball every night and two cocktails three times a week. You say, "O.K., that's what it is. Now, every night for one month you're to have one highball--never more, never less. And Thursday, Friday and Saturday you have two cocktails--never more, never less." If he can keep that up for 30 days, the chances are he is not an alcoholic.

This is, of course, a rule-of-thumb thing, and I can see where some wiseacre alcoholic would do it and get away with it. I've known alcoholics to go through the aversion treatment--and a horribly painful course it is--they go right through the treatment, kidding the doctor the whole way through. Going out in between sessions and drinking and drinking till they can take it without becoming sick to their stomach, and then going back for the next treatment, because they are showing off. They're showing that the doctor is a damn fool. They're showing Aunt Martha, and they are showing themselves how clever they are, and so on. Of course, they're fooling no one but themselves, but with a motivation like that I suppose, some alcoholic could pass this 30-day test. It would be a terrific strain on him.

Help For 'Early' Cases

Q: You can't reach any of these people unless they want to be helped, can you?

A: As far as therapy is concerned, I think this is a potential excuse for failure that is very dangerous for progress in this field. Even "AA's" use this excuse. For example, they try to help Joe over here. A couple of weeks go by, and then, flop, Joe's drunk again. Well, they try again and he flops again--and the answer is "Joe wasn't ready."

I don't want to throw any blame in one direction alone. Let's say that a psychiatrist works with an alcoholic, or a clinic that really knows something about alcoholics--they work with Charlie. And he flops, not once, but again and again. What's the professional explanation? "He's a psychopath."

These are both ways of saying, "I don't know," and "I'm not to be blamed." The answer that he isn't ready yet isn't an answer--it's merely a restatement of a problem.

At certain times, at certain places, with certain people, under certain situations, this man is more ready or less ready--and the need of the therapist, "AA" psychiatrist, or other, is to be able to recognize and manipulate these more favorable situations. There are certain ways of dealing with certain alcoholics so that the readiness can be brought further forward. And this is what I was coming to when you asked me about stopping the condition.

Originally the Yale Clinic and the "AA's" were getting the real McCoy. In the late '30s and early '40s you hit the "AA's" with a wham. The candidate did not have shoes that matched, had been in 12 jails, 6 workhouses, reform schools, State hospitals, sanitariums, had lost his wife, etc.--the works. "Alcoholics Anonymous" started about 1934. About 1938 or 1939 two things happened--they got some people who hadn't gotten that far--they still had a necktie, a job, a wife. And the answer was: "Go on, go back out, you're not an alcoholic--you don't know what drinking is--scram."

But some of the others said: "No, that attitude is bad as far as "AA" is concerned. Maybe you're right--maybe this guy isn't a real alcoholic, but he should have a chance. We cannot determine who is and ain't. We have got to help." So they tried it.

Exactly the same thing happened when a woman showed up. This was a man's organization and the idea of women brought in the idea of pink ladies, that sort of drinking, and brought in fears that, having women around, even if they had been real luses, would ruin the whole fellowship. But they said, "We've got to try it." And just as in the case of the men who hadn't hit real rock bottom as drunks, it worked in an amazing proportion of the cases.

It was noticed that these people with a milder, shorter history (a) probably had just had a binge, and (b) that they probably had just had a nasty shock--mother died, for which they blamed themselves indirectly, or they had been kicked off their job, or they had been divorced, or they had had their first jail experience. It was a shock to them. And so, they talked about that shock as a bottom, and called it a "high bottom."

And, lo and behold, by 1950 the high bottoms in "AA" almost certainly outnumbered the low bottoms.

In the clinics we've had the same thing. In the early days we got the real ones, the men who had touched low, low bottom. Then we got more and more who were in the middle stages and then some in the earlier stages.

Here's something else. When people began to come to "AA" who were 25, 26, 29 years of age, they came in all right, but some couldn't stand it--they liked the "AAs," they liked the philosophy, they liked the program, they know they had been helped, but they couldn't stand going in two nights a week to listen to these old timers yack-yack-yack about "what I did at Armentiers" or about their 25 years of wild drinking, or something of the sort.

Development of `Junior AA's'

This was far from their own experience. So you begin to have a development in the larger cities of so-called "Junior AA's." A different sort of re-socialization or modified socialization was needed. The "AA" are very flexible and very empiric, and they found that for many of the youngsters this worked. They picked up a lot more screwballs in this group--that is, youngsters who were deeply neurotic, perhaps psychopathic, who were also drinking excessively, and who got a terrific bang out of "AA" and went along beautifully for six weeks.

group over, and going wild.

So they have had some difficulty with such groups, but there is no question that they have helped a great many of them. The significant thing is the change from late-stage alcoholics to middle and early-stage alcoholics, from helping alcoholics averaging 45 years of age to those averaging 36 or 38 years of age.

Q: What have you found in the clinics?

A: We have found the same thing in the clinics. Because of the availability of help, because of the anonymity, because of the lowering of the stigma around alcoholism people are willing to come in and ask for help. This is a hard thing for the alcoholic to do, partly because in the back of his mind is just what was in your psychology textbook--the horrible implications of this disease and the moralizing that accompanied it. But now there are places where they don't believe in these horrors and don't preach at you. In fact, in "AA" there may be many who think drinking is just dandy, but that they're sick and they can't take it--it's like diabetes, "I can't take sugar," or "I've got an allergy to sweets so I can't take them." This is making the condition respectable and the possibility of seeking help less painful. So they come in.

Student Interest

Q: Do you find that young people are interested in the work of the "AA" and the clinics?

A: Yes. The high-school and young college people who had suddenly gotten very interested in "AA" speakers or those from clinical centers. We note at the Yale Center that our people get an almost fascinated response from these youngsters. The students even ask to have them come, and no one has to take attendance. Their reaction would appear strikingly different from that shown to classical temperance lectures.

Now, some of these students need what I would call intellectual knowledge and guidance. They're not personality-problem kids, they're not alcoholics, but they've been receiving this nonsense--that is the way they look at it--about alcohol. For instance, they've been told: `The first drink--it's the first drink that's the dangerous one--you're one drink away from a drunk. A little beer here and there, and this horrible social drinking will lead to death, disgrace, disease. The liver will turn purple, the brain shrink, and so on."

The students, to be sure, know this is not true. I say that they know this for the following reason--some 60-odd million people, most of them parents, use alcoholic beverages. These beverages are in the icebox or they're in the cupboard or they're at the party, and the youngsters know that their dad drinks, and so on. They also know that he isn't drunk and he isn't crazy and he isn't going to be. Furthermore, I don't think kids care much about warnings which refer to the senile part of the population--those who are past 32 or 33. Alcoholics are usually portrayed as being even older than this.

A certain proportion of teenagers, let's say 20 per cent, do not consider these classic temperance talks to be nonsense. In their families, their neighborhood and their church and so on they have always heard these beliefs and assertions, and the message fits into their life; it may reinforce their belief. Of course, 99 per cent of this particular group weren't going to drink anyway.

But the others--and this is a very regrettable point--may react so negatively to the unrealistic part of the classical temperance talk that they reject all notions of any danger in drinking and even become intolerant of abstainers. I would go to the extent of saying that, though it may be -unconscious on the part of these very sincere well-meaning "drys," they are doing something which is unmoral. I criticize the "drys" and not the "wets" on this point, because the "drys" have a program and the "wets" don't have anything--they just have "shhhh" when anyone mentions that there are real problems.

But the "drys," by over exaggeration, by saying things that are utter nonsense, unfortunately get across the idea to the nonabstainers, who happen to be the majority, that everything they say is unrealistic. There happen to be some very real dangers attached to drinking and anybody who doesn't think so is affected by certain biases of an antidry philosophy.

But very little factual information about alcohol is given to the younger people. They would really like to know something about alcohol, but what they want to know, and what the "drys" are anxious to tell them are two different things. The younger people would like to know the difference between drinks. They would like to know: "What does this drinking do as far as athletics are concerned? Is it necessary to take drinks on a date? And how many drinks should you take, and what, and where and under what situations? How is it going to hurt me?"

What to Tell Youth

Q: What do they want to know?

A: I think what a good many of them have in the back of their minds--the girls won't ask the question but they want to know--is what happens from a certain number of drinks, does one get sexually excited? Is drinking on dates necessary, is it wrong, and so on? But what they hear about from the classic temperance speakers are the general things, crime, divorce, bad housing, the fall of Pearl Harbor, murder--they see pictures of deaths on the highway where the kids are drunk.

But the people who give these talks and make these pictures often know so little about drinking and alcohol that they make ridiculous mistakes--the youngsters know better than the "drys" do; sometimes they show a person taking three drinks and then acting like a maniac. There must be, in a group of one hundred 16 and 17-year-olds, 30 persons who have had three drinks several times. They know that nothing like that took place at all. And another 30 who have had only one drink or so look at the three-drink fellows and begin to think "Well, I guess I can take three drinks too." Kids don't like the morally superior person looking down at them saying, "Don't, don't, don't."

Q: What should you tell them?

A: I think they want to know something. Probably most interesting to them would be knowledge of the psychological effects of drinking. I think they should be given the physiological facts of alcohol. I think they should be told something about the customs of drinking. There are some groups in which the drinking of alcohol starts at about the time of weaning. There are some groups in which drinking is a normal, expected and in some ways a socially significant aspect of life--you've got to be able to know the difference between certain types of wines, how many cocktails to serve, etc., etc.

In this group the person who says that he doesn't drink--especially if he says he doesn't drink and indicates that you shouldn't either--is going to be such a deviant in that group that he is going to build social problems for himself, just as the drinker in the abstaining group is going to do.

To try to repress this person is to suggest certain social disabilities of all sorts. However, there are obviously points at which certain types of ingestion of alcohol go beyond any customs for an individual and are frightfully dangerous for that individual, to say nothing of this future, family, job, etc., which is only theoretical.

Any drinking may be bad for some. Other things being equal, I see no advantages to drinking by teenagers that couldn't be gained in other ways. However, what I personally think and what millions of teen-agers do may be two different things. Telling them nothing, telling them nonsense, or talking down to them with nothing but negative commands--these are all ineffective and rather escapist types of education, especially since the students want education on the matter.

Q: What do the students say about the "AA" speakers?

A: The student loves the "AA" presentation because that is the "Horatio Alger" story amid blood and amid tears, and so forth, and you come out of the slime as Sir Galahad and rise to the top--and that goes big in this country. And the "AA's" laugh at the negative authorities who are pressing on the kids. They are real, experienced "he-man" drinkers, and at the same time they seem to have achieved a morality. And this the teenagers like, too. And when they have this message with its emotional, sincere feeling--and often the "AA" speakers are a little exhibitionistic anyway and so they are often magnificent speakers--the students love it. For that matter so do a lot of adults.

But I don't think that fundamentally knowledge about alcoholism is a major need in an educational program. Of course, it is important to learn that, if one has an alcoholism problem there is hope--but I think the students should learn something about alcohol and about drinking, just as they should learn something about oxygen and carbon tetrachloride or the form of government in Idaho, or something else.

In addition, drinking is something that hits across more aspects of life than carbon tetrachloride or government in Idaho--it affects marriage, birth and death--it can be involved in almost all social phenomena except the activities demanding immediate, high-tension discrimination and responsible action. Drinking, for example, is not related to tight-wire walking or piloting an airplane, at least not on American lines.

All the students are going to have to make a decision about drinking--as to their own behavior, also with their wife, their neighborhood, their kids, their religion, their government, and so on. And in 90 per cent of our educational institutions they learn nothing except what 8 out of 10 of them recognize is silly.

Drinking Habits of Students

In this connection, I'd like to mention our recently completed study of the drinking habits and attitudes of about 16,000 college students the country over--private, parochial, and State colleges, co-ed and man or woman only colleges, big and little, and so on. Here we report on who drinks, what they drink, when, where, with whom, when they started, what they think about drinking and about abstainers and about sex activity and drinking, what problems they may have experienced, what their parents, their church, the college authorities, their friends and others say and do, and so on. It is the first objective study of drinking habits ever made in this country, and it may well help to build a better foundation for teachers and teaching materials. We certainly hope so.

Q: Could you tell us something about it?

A: Most assuredly, but it is covered comprehensively in a book, entitled "Drinking in College," by Professor Robert Strauss and myself, just out.

Alcohol In Business

Q: What about the alcohol problem particularly in industry and business?

A: There is the same feeling there as in other parts of the society. They want to cover it up and hide it and so on. It has a stigma. But there is getting to be a gradual perception by an increasing number of companies that "Yes, there is a problem and why don't we do something about it?" Of course, it doesn't show in their records, it's always hidden, but the problem is there. And there are now techniques of dealing with it.

Q: Is it a growing problem?

A: I don't think we can say that it is a growing problem, but we can say this--that the age range is 30 to 50. Industry and business and agriculture employ 60 million, of whom a large proportion must be in that age group, and so they have a great number of them. But most of them are back in the early stages. They don't have any drunks. Oh, they have them now and then, but they are fired. They don't have the psychotics, the "Skid Row" bums, and so forth. They may have had them when they were 23, but they got rid of them. What they do have is the slowly developing, carefully hidden condition, usually hitting a man as he gets to be about 40 and is just reaching his peak productivity in the company, a peak he never achieves.

Q: How does absenteeism stand with these people?

A: We have a few clinics started in some industries, and their records show that the alcoholic's absenteeism rate runs a little better than twice that of the average of the whole plant.

Q: Would you call that high or low?

A: Twice as high as the rest of the whole plant. For instance, if the absenteeism runs 4 per cent for the whole plant, it will run 8 or 9 per cent among the alcoholics in that plant, among the early problem drinkers or incipient alcoholics in that plant.

Fortunately for business and industry, therapy is easier with this group than with any other. Success expectancy is fantastically high, partly explained because the motivation for recovery among these men is tremendous. In one plant, the absenteeism rate after a year and a half with the first 100 alcoholics who went through--and they had success with 100 out of 120--was cut to about 2.3. The average absenteeism rate of the plant was 4.8, and for three years before they came in for help it was running for these 100 alcoholics at about 10.

Q: How do they help them? What does an industrial establishment do?

A: The first thing to do, briefly, is to get top management to recognize that there is a problem and not to be scared of it and to be looking into what can be done about the problem. The second thing is to decide to give responsibility to a department, probably industrial health or personnel, to do something. Next, the thing to do is to appoint a man to get special training in addition to his already acquired training. We have four or five-day training sessions just for this purpose.

Q: What are they trained to do?

A: These people go back and do two things. First, they offer counseling, often making referrals to already existing resources in or outside the plant. They must go out in the community and find out what resources there are in the plant--the plant probably already has resources to take care of this, but it has never been done.

Then they start helping a few people. The first ones they get are often going to come from the disciplinary board and are going to be the worst cases and have to be sold the idea. When they find that this has helped six or seven fellows--and you know two of them and you know three of them and so on--the word goes out and management says, "Now, look. Our policy is not coddling--this is not a home for drunks--but when we think alcoholism is involved, we are going to treat it as any other problem. We are going to try to help this person and give him every possible chance. If he won't live up to it, then--out. We will change our retirement, our disability, our pension policy--we are going to keep an open, flexible mind on this."

The man in charge will try to change negative attitudes in the medical and other departments. Something can be done, and this is shown most clearly through the successful cases. Then the man will try to get to some of the foremen or the floor supervisors, because they are the men who know just who the problem drinkers are. If they will co-operate, cases will be gotten sooner, the therapy success rate will rise, a lot of cases will never get to the disciplinary committee, and so on.

But the supervisors and foremen have to be shown that something can be done, that this will be more effective than hiding the cases, that it is not a snooping, "dry" movement, that it is not a sentimental, coddling program, that it will not result in firing the man nor in interfering with production, and so on.

This problem drinker is almost never at the plant when drunk' by the way. He's there in a rather late hang-over, beautifully masked, doing nothing or sometimes making mistakes, a horrible public-relations liability. His friends cover up, and nobody says anything.

So we suggest certain ways of talking with the supervisors, maybe giving them one or two pages of statements, showing them a 10 or 12-minute movie, giving them some idea of the problem and the program. Maybe half of them will catch on and will start sending a couple of people in--anonymously, quietly, and not even connected with the records.

Q: Where does a company find out all the things necessary to institute a program like this?

A: We at the Yale Center run special 3 and 5-day courses just for industrial people.

Q: Can this be found anywhere else in the United States?

A: No, but certain plants are doing their own work.

Q: Then you are the center of information on this whole subject. Can anyone get literature from you?

A: Yes.

Prohibition?

Q: Should we do away with alcohol? Can we do away with it?

A: "If we should" is a question that has to be answered from the point of view of a particular ethical system. One ethical system will say, "Yes," another will say, "No."

Q: Do you have a personal opinion on that?

A: I don't have any great opinion on that because I think your second question makes the first one--for our society in this century, particularly--academic.

Q: You mean it is impossible to get rid of it?

A: I would say at this time we don't know of any technique by which you can get rid of it.

Q: Looking at the thing in its broadest possible angle, we've developed in America two points of view about the liquor problem. One is frequently expressed under the word "prohibition," and the other one under the heading "moderation." In your studies, do you feel that we would solve this liquor problem by complete prohibition, the extinction of the manufacture of alcohol?

A: Let's put it this way: If there were no alcohol, there would be no problems related to alcohol--period. There is no question about that. If you could eliminate alcohol, there couldn't be such a thing as an alcohol problem.

Q: Do you mean that you would really remove all the problems related to alcohol, or do you mean the problems that people think they solve by alcohol?

A: I mean that you would eliminate any function that alcohol plays in crime, poverty, disease, death, disgrace, alcoholism, and so forth--by definition.

Q: But you wouldn't remove those problems, would you?

A: Oh, no. In some of them I would say that the use of alcohol plays a larger role than in others. For instance, I would say that you would eliminate the biggest crime of all--drunkenness. That is the single biggest crime in the United States except for traffic violations.

I think that among the others you would unquestionably eliminate a certain amount of disorderly conduct, and you would eliminate a considerable amount of petty assault. For example, you and I get mad at each other, and we were probably going to get mad at one another, alcohol or not alcohol, but with a few drinks in us, or in either one of us, it is more likely that we are going to get into physical violence, because the inhibition or control of aggression is reduced. Instead of just swearing at you, I throw something at you--perhaps I won't throw with any great accuracy, perhaps you won't duck with usual speed or accuracy. But the emotion and behavior that went into a fight, let us say, could have been dissolved through more socially acceptable avenues than those opened up by alcohol.

Traffic Accidents

Q: What would you say the effect of successful elimination of alcohol would be on traffic accidents?

A: Granted than no substitute came in--like bootleg liquor--I would say that all sorts of accidents would be cut down. For instance, you would eliminate the effect of fatigue as it lowers acuity and discrimination. You would reduce the expression of aggression in driving. Alcohol, so to speak, allows extended fatigue and aggression in driving and these are major factors in auto accidents.

Q: Are there statistics that show that traffic accidents are primarily due to alcohol?

A: I would not say "primarily."

Q: Would you say that they are incidentally due to alcohol?

A: I would like it larger than that. Figures have been put out fairly regularly by the National Safety Council from which it would be fair to state that alcohol is involved in 20 per cent of all fatal automobile accidents. I would say that is a gross underestimate.

Q: What can be done about this, or is anything being done?

A: This is one of the problems related to alcohol about which a great deal could be done. A start in this direction can be seen, although -this particular cloud is still little bigger than a man's hand.

We have had two major problems blocking greater control and growing prevention of this problem: lack of quick, easily administered, reliable tests to establish how much alcohol is in a person's system at the time of the accident and the general tendency to lump all alcohol problems together as just one, simple problem. The first barrier had to be overcome so that police, courts, legislators and lawyers would have a means to allow concrete distinction between the driver under the influence and the person who was not. Walking a straight line, the odor of the breath, and disorganized behavior after an accident are not good evidence of "being under the influence." Until a useful means was developed, the courts and police were effectively blocked from efficient enforcement.

We now have means for gaining factual, undeniable evidence of the amount of alcohol in the brain. The best of these techniques--I might be a little biased on this--was developed by Dr. Greenberg at our laboratory, and is being increasingly used by courts and police. Its use will not only end the "two beers, Judge" alibi, but will also protect the innocent, such as the man with concussion or the diabetic in insulin shock who is arrested for drunk driving or anything else and is tossed in the police lockup--sometimes to die--because he acts and looks like a drunk.

Distinguishing this problem from the other alcohol problem is, I believe, on the way. It is not the "Skid Row" bum or the late-stage alcoholic who is involved in these automobile accidents.

Tests for Drunken Drivers

Q: Who is?

A: No one has ever reported just what the social and personality characteristics of this category consist of. The public is probably 99 per cent united against driving under the influence. However, they are far from 99 per cent against drinking. Once we can separate these two, so that the public can attack the specific problem without getting involved in the old "wet-dry" fight, then the way will be much clearer to overcome this menace.

Some legislative changes are needed in, perhaps, 30 States. The real need today is to give the facts to the driving public so that they can realize in ordinary language just what "under the influence" means and how one gets to that point. The insurance companies could play a big part in developing such information, as could driving schools, automobile associations and, after the program was set up, the police and courts. Without such education, mere use of the new gadgets is not likely to be too effective.

Q: What's blocking use of the new devices?

A: Well, time is needed for the police and courts to try out the new techniques and learn application problems. So far, their experience has all been highly favorable. Then, lawyers and doctors interested in these cases must learn that none of their rights or privileges is being hurt. General education, plus experience, is needed. I think that an enormous reduction of this really unnecessary death, destruction and misery could be achieved in as short a period as five years if people got behind the police and courts, supported studies and helped in dissemination of the facts. Further, I think the motivation for this sort of progress is good. At that moment it needs leadership. This one of the alcohol-related problems is in large measure susceptible to successful attack here and now.

What Stimulates Drinking

Q: What would you say is the greatest stimulus to the drinking of alcohol? Is advertising a major factor?

A: We can show that advertising has had little or no effect on large segments of the population and never has had.

Q: For purposes of stimulation in extreme cases?

A: For any purposes. In extreme cases it has no effect whatsoever. For those people who are susceptible to be affected, yes, it may have some effect. And then if those people become extreme uncontrolled drinkers, I cannot tell you what proportion that ad played, for, once they have become extreme drinkers, I don't care if you have a sign on every window in the city or if there isn't a sign within a thousand miles, they are going to go on being extreme drinkers--period. Advertising isn't going to change alcoholics one way or another.

It might affect them in that, if you keep saying a certain brand name, the next time they go in and ask for a shot they may ask for that brand. I doubt it will have much effect, because after they have had a considerable amount of alcohol, 75 per cent of them will be short of cash.

Q: Then you would say that the stimulus for drinking would have to be looked for somewhere else than the advertising of the product?

A: Yes.

Q: How would you list the order of stimuli? For instance, are social gatherings and social customs the primary thing today?

A: Well, I will start off with the word "custom"--but then remember that I am one of these academic specialists, so I will want to hedge on what I define as "custom." There are certain groups in which there has been a custom of drinking for generations. Now, when the father and the mother and the close friends of the father and mother--they may be in the neighborhood or not--when they ordinarily drink and their drinking is fitted into the daily routine of their life (not the "whoopie-whoopie--aren't-we-being-daring" type of drinking), then their kids, other things being equal, are going to use alcoholic beverages.

If you go to the other extreme, where father and mother not only do not drink but also have expressed strong, negative feelings about drinking and, to make it stronger, these are backed up by the church and the school and the social clubs, then that person is not going to drink until, and unless, he gets away from that social milieu. If he does drink, he will be rebelling from or simply moving away from his group. His drinking, by the way, when he starts is going to be more experimental, less well modeled, characterized by more mistakes, just because he has no background for it. He is not fitted for a drinking society any more than you or I are fitted for an Eskimo society.

Effects of Religion

Q: Is he more intemperate in his drinking then?

A: Let's take two extreme groups to make it simple: For example, the Mormon group, which is a very well-integrated group with a religious system penetrating right through family, government, economics, neighborhood, everything; and then orthodox Jewry, which is also very strong with an all-penetrating religion so that we don't know quite whether to call it a religion as such--it is a total way of life.

In the Jewish group, more than 90 per cent will use alcoholic beverages and will use them certainly more than 50 times a year. They will probably use wines, distilled spirits, beer. In the other group, the Mormon group, a very large percentage (compared with all other such groups in the country) will not touch the stuff.

I would say that, of the drinkers in the Mormon group, which will be a small number, you will find a high percentage of problem drinkers and later on alcoholics. Amongst the Jewish group, with almost all being drinkers, you will find a very, very low percentage of problem drinkers and alcoholics.

Now you shouldn't jump from this and say, "Well, let's start everybody drinking at the age of three!" That doesn't follow at all.

Q: Do you think the segment of society in which the inhibition is great due to religious and other environmental factors produces a greater number of rebels, or is the number incidental who go out and deviate late from their teachings?

A: Rather than the number of inhibitions, I would say that whether these sanctions worked, were acceptable, were easily adopted by the individual, was the more pertinent question. For example, it is an inhibition that none of us here may go around without clothes, but I don't think it bothers one person here. Maybe it would bother one out of a hundred. Where inhibitions are not putting the person in a position of conflict, where his life is satisfying enough so that he wouldn't call them inhibitions, then inhibitions are not creating rebels.

To most of us, inhibitions are strong, unconscious controls against actions we think we might like to perform. Actually, the term refers to all the controls we have adopted--whether we approve or not, or even recognize them or not. But where the inhibitions, the taboos, the restraints don't upset more than 5 or 6 per cent of the group, I don't believe it would follow that mere numbers of inhibitions would create rebellion.

However, if you have a series of different groups in a society (and this means there would be differences in the patterns of learned controls in each) and where there is mobility for individuals, as in the case of war when all the young men may go out from home and meet others, then you may have people suddenly finding out, "By golly, I am inhibited." They may become, though not necessarily, very bothered about this.

A lot of young men, 17 or 18 years old, may think: "Here I am in a uniform, but I am not really a man. All these others in the camp think I'm a damned sissy and maybe I am."

Q: And then he may take a drink?

A: He may feel that he has to show off, one way or another, but he doesn't know how. He may, like any young person taking on a new pattern (whether it's dancing or bowling or getting a job), overshoot the mark or do things differently from everyone else, and then may have superguilt.

Here's the fellow who has come up in a society where drinking is quite ordinary. When he starts drinking, he might overdo and even get drunk. He will be punished one way or another. However, this experience does not have a terrific impact on him. He doesn't feel that he has been singled out by God to be cursed, that he is essentially evil. Another fellow from the Mormon society, where drinking is held a sin, if he experiments and gets drunk, he may well feel super-guilty, he may feel that Satan is responsible. So that it is not only that he drank too much, it is his reaction, his interpretation of the event. It may mean he feels: "Now I am through with my family, my religion, I can never go back." His response to the act is just as important as the act itself.

`Wets' and `Drys'

Q: I can understand why the "drys" don't like your work, but why is it that the "wets" don't like it?

A: We have been discussing here at length alcoholism, drunkenness. When stories. On alcoholism, drunken driving, excess drinking and the like appear in the papers, everybody in the industry shudders--

Q: Afraid it is going to lead to prohibition" again?

A: Yes. It is implied that discussion of such subjects is nasty--there probably isn't any such problem; it has been vastly exaggerated, in fact, alcohol binds the family together, etc., etc. Then one of the companies about 6 or 7 years ago, to the shock and horror of the rest of the industry, came out and said some people should not drink. Wow! Well, it turned out to be all right: they're still in business. Doing very well, I understand.

Q: Have you any facts as to whether conditions in States where they have full State control are any better than in the States where they license retail distribution?

A: You get what might be called a "lip reading" or "false correlation" on this. The difference between the monopoly and the licensed States is not particularly great. When you take the States in which local option is very widespread--like North Carolina where of 100 counties perhaps are dry--or take the two dry States, from our estimates there is a lower degree of alcoholism and there are fewer drinkers. However, we would call this a false correlation. The reason you have prohibition is obviously because you have social groups and categories who are "agin" drinking--

Q: They wouldn't be drinking even if it were there?

A: Right. And their numbers are significant enough so that they get political action. But if you go into Kansas or Mississippi or Oklahoma, you will find the "AA" groups everywhere.

Q: What about the tax situation? Do you find that the bootleg liquor creates worse conditions?

A: It may result in there being worse liquor, but alcohol is alcohol. It is a chemical, and goodness and badness doesn't enter into it. As for bootleg liquor, there is no question that it is produced in the most unsanitary circumstances, that it gets very little attention, you get it loaded with who-knows-what. It has in some places a most mysterious sacred character, however--"I know Old Joe up in the hill over there and he makes the original white mule," and things like that' and everybody around there starts buying it and feeling, "Wow, that's wonderful stuff," and if the market goes up, they start producing it faster and they are under pressure of being caught, so there has to be a rapid turnover. There are no controls by health authorities or otherwise.

When the situation gets really tough, you may be getting half water, one quarter ethyl alcohol and who-knows-what else. It is an irresponsible group operating without controls, without the law, in business for the sole purpose of making dough and making it fast, with no necessity of figuring out "Will my customers like me five years from now?"

The big liquor people are under a tremendous pressure from that alone. The bonded people have to start, say, in 1950 to decide what they are going to make. By 1951 or '52 it is whisky, but then goes into a warehouse for five years and then they can sell it. Imagine the pressure they are under to maintain good relations with their customers. Their capital is tied up in the customer's response five years in the future.

Q: Do you think the bootleg situation is getting worse?

A: I really don't know.

Q: The argument in Congress is, of course, that the high taxes will drive the country into bootlegging--

A: And, theoretically, I believe that it is a good argument. Whether in practice it is true or not, I can't say. To my mind this is one of those little conflicts way off in left field, just as in my mind the advertising issue is way off in left field. They happen to be the two things that the "wets" and "drys" are fighting about--one about one, the other about the other.

I would like to see a check on the bootlegging matter from an unbiased source, through the revenue reports. But in my memory, and this is most casual--for the revenue records have figures on how much illegal stuff was seized, the size of the place, the amount of the alcohol, the potential production per day--it seems to me that for some places, like New England, there is no striking change.

But this is not a conclusive argument, because the size of the agency and its finances for going out and making the arrests has not gone up, so maybe they're just operating to full capacity and their records have reached a top. But I am very suspicious of the liquor industry's statistics, just as I am very suspicious of the statistics of the "drys."

Q: What about clinics?

A: In 1944 we decided to start an outpatient clinic just for alcoholics. We had had laboratory and library studies, but no clinical studies of our own. With the co-operation of the Connecticut Prison Association, we were able to set up two such clinics, one in Hartford and one in New Haven. These were to be research clinics, but in about five weeks it was obvious that a different purpose was being served. They weren't research clinics--they were service clinics. They were mobbed, mobbed by what we would -call "late-stage alcoholics."

How Clinics Progressed

Q: Seeking relief---

A: Yes, willing to try anything new to escape the pain of the alcoholic life. This began to be pretty successful from the point of view of service. But from the point of view of research--well, I can't say they accomplished "nothing," but it was a very minimum. However, by the end of that year people in the Connecticut Legislature approached us with a bill, which we strongly opposed, setting up an alcoholism program, which was to be operated in the form of a specialized hospital for long-term care of committed alcoholics.

This legislation was changed to allow a program emphasizing voluntary outpatient clinics, and Connecticut' in 1945, established the first commission on alcoholism. Today it has six outpatient clinics, an inpatient facility, an education program with schools, and so on. Also, since then about 40 of the States developed some type of alcoholism program--there was nothing prior to this.

In 1946, some of the people who had been at the School, and others interested in alcoholism, said to us: "Look. You people are trying awfully hard, but you can't effectively get your information out to a wide public. The scientific journal is just dandy, but who reads scientific journals? And how many will read these lay pamphlets or the popular book of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, 'Alcohol Explored'? We need community organizations to educate the public about alcoholism Will you help?"

We created the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism.

Soon we found ourselves to be a popular health movement, like mental hygiene or cancer associations. Once this got started, we pulled out of it, since this sort of work is not an appropriate function of a university research department.

It is now called the National Committee on Alcoholism and is an independent organization. The clinic movement was more and more taken over by an increasing number of State commissions, and they soon started a National States' Conference on Alcoholism.

Q: How many years have you been studying in this problem?

A: I got interested in it because I was a potential criminologist; I've been with the Laboratory since 1942.

Q: You've been exposed to all phases of this in 10 years or so--has it made you a teetotaler?

A: We at the Yale Center are kind of rigid on answers to this question--maybe a little unnecessarily so--I don't know. However, we feel that either the facts, researches and conclusions are right or are not--and are effective or not on their own merits. And the fact of our own drinking or nondrinking we feel, doesn't make any difference. Certainly no one on the staff is an extreme teetotaler or an extreme drinker.

Alcoholics Anonymous

Q: How extensive is the "AA" movement in America?

A: There is no organization to this group.

There are no officers. There is no treasury. There are no minutes. For each group there is a chairman, theoretically revolving every month or two. But they find that as soon as you set up a typically American hierarchy with "Mr. Big" at the top, then some of the boys, as soon as they get up there, fall over into the bottom again. This matter of being the big man, big ideas, big expansion, responsibilities, building this clique up and that clique down--that has been found a nice way to get back to alcoholism, not a way of recovery from it.

Q: Do you have statistics on how extensive a group it is?

A: Their figure can be determined from their paid-up membership--I think theoretically each local group is supposed to give a dollar per person per year to the central agency for the publication of the book, information, intergroup service and the like. They pass the hat at meetings to pay for the rent of the hall and for the coffee and cokes and stuff. Some feel they must be drinking something, and sweets seem to be necessary for some.

This paid-up membership of groups amounts to about 130,000. Their membership--I don't know what a member is--is a man a member the moment he walks in? Does he have to be in one month, two months, three months? There is no definition. I would say there may be in the neighborhood of 175,000---

Q: Out of about 4 million alcoholics in the U.S.?

A: Yes.

Q: How many groups are there?

A: I would say that in this country there are, perhaps, 3,000.

Q: Then is this same movement true of other countries?

A: They will show you groups in 40 or more other countries. As a wild guess, I would say that in 20 of those 40 other countries they are Americans who happen to be over there. This business of clubs and voluntary associations--Elks, Chamber of Commerce, or the like--is an American phenomenon. It clicks pretty well in the British Isles and in Scandinavia, Australia and New Zealand. But you get over into France--well, I think there is one French member. Of course, there are Americans in Paris who are permanent fixtures. But the French and Italians simply don't have such organizations. There is no feel for it. It is a typically American thing.

Q: Do the other countries have the alcoholism problem at all?

A: Oh, sure.

Significant Role of `AA'

Q: If the psychiatrist has been stymied treating the alcoholic, what has "Alcoholics Anonymous" been able to do?

A: Now, I think the psychiatrist can play a significant role. I think that "Alcoholics Anonymous" can--in fact, anybody that knows them at all knows that they do--play a most significant role.

Q: Then why is it that "AA" can succeed and the psychiatrist can't?

A: Take a certain alcoholic who is pretty well along in his alcoholism. He shows certain acute physiological problems. They will usually pass away in four or five days. He also has psychological problems. By the time he's gotten into this whirlwind he is frightened, in a world of pain, sometimes beginning to act in a very immature fashion, usually very egocentric, interested only in himself as though a wall had grown up to separate him from others. Let's say that there is a wall within all of us protecting our ego, but there are doors and windows through which you go out to people and people come in to you.

With the alcoholic it seems those doors and windows are getting smaller and smaller--he isn't interested in other people. And if an alcoholic begins to show interest in you or your job or what you are doing, all I can say is "Look out!" He's going to touch you pretty shortly--for a drink, for money, or something. He is not interested in you. He is not interested in ideas and things or people. He tends more and more--many of them--to become an isolated drinker, often a lone drinker. He has terrific ambivalences and many of them show as incompatible drive, like, "I want to be Napoleon," or "I want to be Casanova," or "I want absolute dominance," and at the very same moment, "I want to be like a little baby in its mother's arms, loved because I should be loved."

These are absolutely incompatible needs, and yet that incompatibility can be resolved temporarily in alcohol because discrimination, judgement, self-criticism fall down and the man gets to live more and more in a world of his own, unhindered and unfrightened by ordinary -people, ideas and situations.

In addition to physiological and psychological troubles, there are social problems also. The man gives up ways of doing things and does less and less. He is less and less interested in attitudes, ideas, beliefs, intellectual questions and problems around the community and he becomes increasingly afraid of close, emotionally meaningful, interpersonal groups, such as a friendship group, a marital group, parental group, and that sort of thing. And it is from such groups, of course, that we get our major stimuli to do things, our major punishments for doing wrong. From and inside such groups we get our very reasons for living. With the decrease in activities, in ideas and in primary group membership, the man becomes desocialized, so to speak.

And, by the way, those social and psychological characteristics are just the reverse sides of the same coin. The man who feels he is going to be the greatest writer, who is going to make the biggest sale, who is going to swear off liquor for life, or who is excessively cynical or aggressive, is just the man who can't long remain a member of a primary group. Membership in such groups punishes wild activity or non-activity, punishes extreme idealism or cynicism.

So you have these physical, social and psychological problems, and the drinking problem itself that have to be met.

Differences in Treatment

Q: What does the psychiatrist do and what does "Alcoholics Anonymous" do?

A: The psychiatrist goes back to the psychological roots. He may or may not give the man some immediate physiological help which means rest, food, some sort of sedation so that he can get over the hang-over. And it doesn't work' because he is only trying to hit one wheel out of a five-wheel vehicle or a four-wheel vehicle--except in extraordinary cases.

"Alcoholics Anonymous" does a series of things. One of the psychological, social, personality problems of the alcoholic in the later stages is that he gives up hope--hope in himself, hope in people, hope in the world, hope in God. It seems to him all useless.

And it is impossible for him to get out of it unaided. He has tried everything. He has tried a hospital, he has tried three doctors, he has tried a sanatorium. He has been to ministers, priests, judges, and they have all given such "damned fool" advice as "Look, old boy, why don't you be a man; look what you're doing to your wife. Why don't you control your drinking?"

This man knows what he had done! He has cursed himself more vitriolically than anyone else could. He had been cursing himself for years. But the "AA" from the very first contact, expresses to this man the feeling that he, too, was there. Charlie cannot only match him story for story but he has been in 10 jails that this new fellow never even heard of. He has had everything this guy has had and more, and here he is--his coat matches his pants, he has shoes on, and all that. But, most significantly, he seems to be happy. He seems to be amused about the whole thing. There are some who aren't, of course.

I am building up an ideal picture. There may be a few "AA's" who are just like the old sawdust-trail boys. But the new candidate for "AA" begins to see that he can do it. Here's a man who did it. "It can be done!"

Q: In other words, the approach varies dramatically from the psychiatrist's?

A: Yes, the "AA" talks to the man. This approach is often the opposite to the nondirective therapy of the psychiatrist--the psychiatrist must keep his mouth shut and the patient must let out. The "AA" violates that principle. He just sits down and says, "Well, let me tell you about me," and may not let the other fellow get a word in edgewise.

But it is convincing to some that there is hope--and this he never got from a psychiatrist because the psychiatrist doesn't know about alcoholism as this "AA" knows it. The recovered alcoholic may not know about Oedipus complexes being resolved, but he does know about drunks and butterflies tromping around in your stomach and all that. He has had bigger butterflies and has conquered them and is happy about it.

The "AA" doesn't tell the potential new member that he must go through a terrific regime, he must control himself, he must fight the good fight, and so forth. No, this "AA" has more fun out of life than the candidate has ever had and even has dough in his pocket, his wife likes him again, and so do his kids. The thought that "Maybe I could do the same" can strike the potential new member very realistically. Now that is one aspect of it.

Another is that the psychiatrist is inevitably talking downhill. He is on one side of the desk and the alcoholic is on the other side. He is well dressed, professional, of tremendously high status, and authoritative, and the alcoholic is very often scared to death of authority and so forth.

Finding Pals in `AA'

Q: The "AA" is more like an equal?

A: Yes. He could be a recovered banker or a ditchdigger, though ordinarily a banker will work with a banker and a ditchdigger with a ditchdigger. There is hope; there is a certain amount of happiness; there is this interplay. That personality wall has been broken down a little. Remember, this alcoholic had to let the "AA" talk to him. The "AA" is not going down the street to find a drunk and help him. He may try that a few times, but after he has been rejected regularly he will quit that process and will go only when asked and when he sees that there is really some hope of doing something. He can help only when the man has, so to speak; tentatively, partially temporarily surrendered a little and said, "All right, I'm licked. Can you help me?" That's a horrible thing to have to say for a frightened, egocentric alcoholic, and he may only half say it.

The "AA" gives him something to help him immediately, right now--none of this claptrap about "Can you come around next Tuesday at 4 p.m.?" That is perfectly ridiculous.

Any time we get people trying to come into our clinic from New Mexico, or somewhere far away--they all have long-distance telephonitis--if we don't want them, or can't take them or see that they are half potted anyway, we tell them, "Now, you come around next Thursday at 3 p.m." They won't show up.

The alcoholic's problem is for him tremendously immediate, and his feeling of "I would accept help if I could get it" is right here, now, 4 p.m. Tuesday afternoon. By 6 p.m.--"the hell with them!"

But the psychiatrist has to give them a future appointment. He can't just say, "I am here any time for you boys." Both his professional and personal life would be smashed. But the "AA" is ordinarily there at the time and he offers some immediate, practical support. He knows some techniques of helping out a hang-over--at least he thinks they work.

The physiologist may look at such techniques and say, "This does not change the oxidation rate of alcohol by 10 seconds." But this "AA" thinks that it does, and helps this guy and thus gives him the kind of magic that makes him feel better. He then gives him something to do--and this is tremendously important, because here's a man who has been holding himself away from everybody and everything--"Come on over to the meeting tonight!"

This alcoholic is terrified, but he goes to the meeting and he sees 15, 25, 50 fellows--and they all seem happy! They look at him and say, "Come on in, boy!"

Friendship, Not Rejection

Q: It's a different treatment?

A: Why, he hasn't had that sort of treatment--maybe ever. Anyway, for a long time it has been: "Look at that drunk! Get him out of my office! Out! Out! Out!" Nothing but arrogance, holier-than-thou business--even by those who have been trying to help and be sympathetic.

These "AA" people seem happy. He may hear something about the "God stuff," but a lot of the boys will tell him: "Don't you worry now about the `God stuff.' Some of us are having hot flashes and messages from mountain tops. But some of us just don't seem to get it, so don't let it worry you." The only thing is this: "Do you think you could keep from taking one til 6 o'clock tomorrow?"

Ah! He has heard about six-week deals, swearing off for life, and all that sort of thing. "Well, I don't know--" "Now, wait a minute. Here are some ways." And so they force chocolate bars or coffee or some pet remedy down the man and give him something to do during the day. They ask: "Where are you going to sleep tonight?"

He hasn't any place to sleep at all--or, worse, he has a place to sleep--home. He has to go home to the little woman and this is going to make him drink.

So maybe they will find some place for him, just for that 24 hours, and he will come back the next day. The haze has been partially lifted, and these people were friendly. Now he has friends and he has hope--a very glimmer of a hope, perhaps also a: "These fellows may have something. I'll get it in about six weeks and then I will be able to drink like a gentleman again. `

The other boys will know he may feel this because they went through the same deal, and hey accept it. All right. So they help him in very simple, material ways. They know a fellow who knows a fellow and so he may be able to get a job, a bed, somebody who will hold his wife and kids off of him for a while, whatever it may be. And there is something for him to do at night.

Now, this man has sworn off before. He has been on the wagon once or twice before, and what did he do? He couldn't go around with his usual friends. Should he go to the church social a couple of nights a week? He wasn't the kind of fellow who would fit into that. He wasn't interested in what they talked about, what they did, or what they looked like. Where else could he have gone--the club?

Q: The Salvation Army?

A: For a few, perhaps, but this man probably regards Army shelters as a place for drunken bums who are religiously a little peculiar. He does not consider himself a bum, doesn't want organized charity, and is very scared of religious appeals. Where can he go? He is all too apt to land in a hotel room looking at the four walls and feeling greater and greater need for a drink. And getting the drink, perhaps after a great struggle, is a pretty sure thing for a drunk because self-pity is going to get bigger and bigger and bigger and the personality walls separating him from society and its values will get higher and higher.

But with "AA" he has a place where he can go, where there is a bunch of fellows sitting around batting the breeze--some of them are shooting craps, some are talking about the last six hopefuls they picked up, and it may even look like a barroom with cokes and coffee, with his kind of people standing and sitting around. Some of this prayer stuff comes, but that is a small price to pay--it only lasts three or four minutes. He sees a lot of men who look just like him, and he can go there seven nights a week. And if, when he's home, he suddenly gets that feeling, "I've got to have a drink," he has two or three phone numbers and somebody will come over to him and use one of hundreds of techniques. They talk, plead, curse them, slap them, coddle them--some kind of help to get over that feeling they have to have a drink.

Pretty soon this alcoholic begins to get some new ideas in addition to immediate help, something to do and association with friendly people.

Because this "AA" program suggests that there are certain things that he has to do about himself mentally and emotionally. They tell him to look at himself and to take inventory. "What's wrong with you, anyway?"

A Power Greater than Self

The 12 steps of "AA," by the way, only mention alcohol or alcoholism twice. Once they say, "I admit that alcohol has come to dominate my life," or something like that. "I admit" is the first. The last step suggests, "I will go out and help other alcoholics." Other than that, the word "alcohol" does not appear, and that last is pretty incidental as you can see. "I've got to look at myself. I've got to study myself. I've got to do it as honestly as I can. I've got to try to find out what are the forces that seem to be, impinging on me."

As many "AA's" will say: "We think that finally all these forces can be stated in terms of a power greater than the self, which many of us call God. Gall it what you will, but there is this power; it affects you; and you have to learn how to manipulate it. The first thing you have to do is to study yourself. Get some other member to sit down with you, probably your sponsor, and try to figure it out. How many people have you hurt, for instance?"

Oh, boy, here he can flatter himself with self-pity and guilt and make himself out the biggest alcoholic of the bunch. He can take a telephone book and check off almost every name all the way through. "Do you think you can make amends to these people without hurting anybody?" And here is another chance for this self-pity, exhibitionism, grandiosity. But it is a controlled, positively useful way for the man to capitalize on certain personality weaknesses--of course, not all alcoholics will have these particular problems.

Other steps concern getting into more effective contact with this higher power, which some of them call God, and with furthering self-understanding. Finally, the 12th step suggests that, after having had a spiritual experience, or a basic change in thinking and feeling, they will try to carry the new principles into all aspects of their lives and, also, extend them to help other alcoholics.

Well, some of them, of course, jump from step 1 to 12 and they are out there beating the drum to save other alcoholics too soon, but that is understandable.

Q: The first method of approach of the "AA's" then, is to be friendly on an equal footing?

A: Yes, to give realistic evidence that there is hope of recovery, to help with, immediate problems, if possible, to present the newcomer with a possible place to go, things to do, and a program. Let's note that "AA" doesn't preach, doesn't ask for pledges, doesn't blame, doesn't ask for conversion, doesn't postpone, doesn't interview or take records, doesn't offer charity, or ask for dues. It does offer a sponsor, a man to lean on during the first days or weeks. But pretty soon "AA" requires a man to do more than receive and lean--not that there are any written specifications.

The new man has to make a self- analysis with another man. He listens at meetings, is encouraged to speak with the others at closed meetings. Then he is asked to speak at an open meeting and to help another candidate. These things are helping to break down the old self-protective walls. And in the process he may get some very real awards. Now he is not only leaning on his sponsor, but another fellow is leaning on him. He is moving back slowly into emotionally meaningful group membership and doing it without his alcohol crutch.

He is also getting new ideas, not only from mixing with others while sober, but from the self-analysis and from figuring out how to help his new baby (candidate) and what to say at the meeting. He may even read the "big" book called "Alcoholics Anonymous." He is gradually redefining ways of doing things, ideas and primary group membership. Also he is getting the benefits of sober living in health, jobs, etc. He has change in his pocket, his wife is beginning to think that she has a human being for a husband again. Some people note, "Gee, George is sober; he even seems to have fun doing things he never had fun doing before."

Help at Any Time

Q: Can the alcoholic always find the "AA's"?

A: "AA" isn't 24-hour a day therapy, but it is always available. Then, when the man begins to get the idea of living again and begins to like some other people and is going out to help Joe and identifies himself with Joe, then all of a sudden his whole psychological picture has changed. As Dr. Harry M. Tiebout has pointed out, instead of just complying with "AA," he accepts "AA." He may never have gotten down to the basic psychiatric problems; however, I would say--just for an arbitrary figure--that for 50 per cent of the alcoholics, deep psychotherapy is probably contraindicated and might well trigger off more troubles than there were during the alcoholism. He needs to stop drinking. He needs support. He needs psychological help. He often needs physiological help. He needs resocialization.

How Alcoholism Starts

Q: Of several alcoholics I have known, I asked one of them what it was that got him -started after a long period of years during which time he didn't touch liquor, and he told me that he had been employed as an assistant sales manager and was making great progress. Then all of a sudden one day he came in and they had changed his office, removed his name from the door and put him at the end of the hall and demoted him. He went right out and got drunk and attributed it entirely to the disappointment. Is that a typical cause for this return to alcoholism?

A: Tension, shock, or sudden changes for some of these people is too much and they are less able to adjust or adapt themselves to painful stimuli. However, I would want to ask a lot of questions about the case you cite. Who stated that he had "been making great progress"? What had he been doing the previous weeks, which led to the demotion? Why had he been acting that way? Was his demotion a great surprise to others? Was it really a surprise to him? Was it a useful excuse to get drunk? Did he get drunk because he was shocked, or because this was his way of getting back at the boss? Anything can serve as an excuse. It is worth noting that a great many people have been demoted, and even though they are regular drinkers they don't go out and get drunk. By itself a demotion cannot explain drunkenness.

Q: Could any physiological deficiency cause it?

A: I don't know just what that would be. There have been some experiments with rats, by the way, to discover whether physiological differences would accompany differences in acquiring a taste for alcohol. But a rat having no culture can't be called neurotic. They have no personality problems, although some of them are more aggressive and others more pliable and all that. Well, these tests were made to find out if any would show a preference for alcohol over water. They put the rats on a very limited, almost starvation diet to allow testability. Some of the rats went for the alcohol and then seemed to want to go on with it. Some persons drew the conclusion from this experiment that some rats were physiologically "set" to like alcohol. This was sufficiently challenging to the physiologists in our laboratories, Greenberg and Lester, to make them check such a conclusion.

We happen to know that there are no vitamins in alcohol. Vitamins don't pass over the distillation process. But alcohol is full of calories. These rats were on a starvation diet. Greenberg and Lester said: "Let's run that test over again and give them a little bit more choice." So we gave them water, another liquid with calories in it, but not alcohol, then just alcohol. Then the rats were put through the same tests as in the earlier experiment.

The original conclusion was shot to pieces. The rats were hungry! They took the material loaded with calories. This time there were two choices with calories. They took the non-alcoholic type, perhaps because it didn't have the sharp taste-effect of alcohol. What was there in the alcohol itself in the first experiment? It had calories and so the rats could drink their meals. That is what many alcoholics are doing.

Q: But why are they usually emaciated, then?

A: That is because of the life they lead, not alcohol, although since alcohol is by itself a most unbalanced food for human diet and since for some, during binges, nothing but alcohol is ingested, they are undernourished. But this is not true of all. In fact, I don't think you'd know an alcoholic when you saw one, unless (a) you'd known him over a good period of time, or (b) he was on a binge.

Q: We've all known some persons who seem to have a compulsion--if they take one drink, they have to keep on, so that they themselves have said, "Well, I've just go to lay off the stuff altogether." Now is that compulsion psychological?

A: There have been those who tried to figure out that this uncontrolled drinking did have a physiological base. I would say that they may some day discover such a base. But to date they have not. Their evidence, we would say, is not evidence. One or two may have gotten a lot of publicity--anything which comes along in this field is publicized. When people are very run down, as during a binge, they show a lot of maladjustments, some physiological. Dr. X sees one thing that seems to look awfully consistent, appears in all his cases, for example, a certain type of glandular action.

Now Dr. X begins to compare the alcoholics who come into his clinic with other people, and he finds that 99.4 per cent have a tremendous glandular deficiency--or imbalance--for example, an adrenalin deficiency. The alcoholics he sees have an adrenalin deficiency, much more so than nonalcoholics. I know some other things about adrenalin deficiencies--they have a way of making people depressed, tired, unhappy and weak. The major trouble with the obvious conclusion to this finding is itself rather obvious: Does the alcoholic have an adrenalin deficiency because he has been out on a binge, or has he been out on a binge because of the adrenalin deficiency?

Suppose we go back and look at the population age 15 and separate between the greater and lesser adrenal-structural people. Then observe all those who drink for the next 40 years and see if the alcoholics among them were all or chiefly from the weak-adrenal group. Some people have alleged adrenal disfunction to be the cause, and also alleged that correcting this condition is the cure.

I must admit we have to laugh a little at some of these reports, because they state: "Yes, we fix the alcoholics up and they go out of here sober and in good health, saying, `We'll never have a drink again.'" Well anybody who has ever known alcoholics is not peculiarly impressed by that. Practically all alcoholics have sobered up and sworn they would never drink again--done so many, many times. We like to see them six months later. We like to see them a year later. We like to see them four years later.

Now I don't doubt that we may find a physiological difference in function, in structure, in growth, which will be different from many alcoholics compared to the nonalcoholic population. But I would also make this forecast--that if we do, we will also find that there will be a considerable proportion of people who have this lower X factor who drink and who do not become alcoholics, and that we will find a large number of alcoholics who do not have this "X" factor. In other words, it may be significant, but it will not be a sufficient cause!

Aid From Drugs

Q: Is there some drug you can give people to stop their drinking?

A: One of our great problems has been to get increasing segments of the public to discriminate a little more. They have a tradition of 100 years in which a highly organized, very sincere, emotionally powerful, beautifully effective organization has told people again and again that alcohol, drinking, drunkenness, the other problems related to drunkenness and alcoholism are all the same thing. And we say: "This is not so."

You ask: "Can you get a drug to stop drinking?" Yes, you can--I don't know whether the word "drug" is quite correct. Take "disulfiram"--most popularly known under the trade name of "Antabus"--I don't believe there is complete acceptance as to just what the physiological process is, but, anyway, you take this pill and any time within the next 24 hours if you take even a small amount of alcohol you are going to approach death--the eyes begin to bulge out, the face becomes horribly flushed, the blood count goes down to zero, and so on, and you know pretty soon you are going to stop kicking.

Q: That's a conditioned reflex, isn't it?

A: No, it is a direct chemical effect which will occur the first time. Whether there is in addition a conditioned response following one or two experiences is a very moot point. But let me assure you of this: If just by chance you forget to take the pill and start drinking and then take a pill or two, there will be a most unpleasant result. There is a difference between drinking and alcoholism. "Antabus" affects the drinking--not the alcoholism.

Q: Oh, yes, but I thought the main idea was that these alcoholics wanted to stop the drinking--

A: Yes, they may decide, "My life is being ruined by drink' so I will stop drinking." That sort of rational control is just what an impulsive drinker can't accomplish. That's why he's called "impulsive" or "uncontrolled."

Doctor's Care Needed

Q: But does this mean that a person who gets started in alcoholism can't stop?

A: There are certain so-called "prealcoholic symptoms." In that phase we know people can stop themselves. But once this "control" factor is lost, they cannot stop themselves without help.

Q: They can use this drug, "Antabus," can't they?

A: Yes, but there is no question but that it can be a dangerous thing. Let's say you go to, the doctor and he gives you a supply of 12 of the tablets, and you go back six weeks later and get some more, and now you have this little horde. There are two or three things that may happen here. Knowing the alcoholic's guilt, remorse, and so forth, he forgets, on purpose -or not, to take his "Antabus," and he suddenly finds himself in a bar and he has had two drinks, maybe three. He is very upset, he's got alcohol in him now. He rushes home and says, "I'd better take three of the things." And he's going to drop dead.

Or there is somebody else in the house, too--old Aunt Mathilda, who has nice strong ideas about this. She might think: "What a clever idea it would be if George were to stop drinking, too. It is helping Harry." So she is not by itself a sufficient remedy for decides to give the pills secretly to George. And a death can follow from that.

The use of "disulfiram" is a little dangerous, but under a doctor's care it is not. However, it is not by itself a sufficient remedy for alcoholism. It can help toward a remedy by aiding the individual to stop drinking. Without other changes in the individual, it can do little.

Source: U.S. News & World Report, October 2, 1953

14, looked forward to having a father again. Now he was 17 and it had not worked out that way.

After a few months of marriage Mr. Daniels began coming home for dinner in an exhilarated and voluble condition. Phil had never seen anything like it. His stepfather seemed terribly happy and good-humored, but he could undergo sudden changes, turning into a glowering, unreasonable tyrant. It not only -frightened Phil but gave him a permanent feeling of uneasiness. What had he done or said that was wrong? And what could he do to make things right?

He asked his mother about it. "Oh, you mustn't pay any attention," she told him with a bright, worried smile. "He's just been drinking. He'll be all right."

But he wasn't. Phil found himself being lectured or reprimanded or even punished without reason. Home became a place of sudden threats and dangers against which he could not defend himself. His mother explained that his stepfather had once been an alcoholic but had given up all drinking for a year before they were married. On the night of the wedding reception drinks had been served, and he had had some. He had been drinking occasionally ever since. She tried to explain -what alcoholism was, but Phil could not understand her explanation. If drinking made you ill and also irrational, why drink?

Phil is a serious, slender, dark-haired boy with a scientific bent. He hopes to be a doctor perhaps a psychiatrist. As his stepfather's behavior got worse, Phil found it hard to study or to feel any deep interest in school work--or in anything else. He stopped inviting school friends to his home because he never knew when his father might start haranguing them. He became ashamed of his father's appearance--his red face, rambling speech and shambling gait. Phil began to withdraw into himself--"you just shut up tight inside."

His father drank almost constantly now but especially on weekends. On Mondays he was sometimes too "sick" to go to work, but somehow he hung on to his job. Evenings were especially bad. Then he roamed the house, often until 2 or 3 a.m., bellowing imprecations, seeking an argument with anyone who dared talk back to him. Phil was determined to help and protect his mother as best he could, but he did not know exactly how. He grew nervous and apprehensive. His school work got worse, but he didn't care.

Once in a while he would plead with his father not to drink. Sometimes the only answer Phil got was a cold stare, sometimes it was a stumble-tongued denial of drinking, sometimes it was a genial promise that he would stop after just one more. Phil and his mother, a remarkably patient and religious woman, often talked it over trying to decide what to do. "If it gets much worse, we may have to leave," she would say quietly. Phil wondered how much worse it would have to get.

Phil never saw his father actually take a drink. He and his mother found bottles around the house. Often there was one under Daniels' bed and sometimes under his pillow, and always under the cushion of the large easy chair from which he watched television, but Mr. Daniels was never seen drinking from them. With the sly secrecy typical of many alcoholics, he drank only when he was alone. It was hard for Phil to explain to other kids in school, who invited him to parties, why he could not invite them back. In time he grew used to the knowledge that his classmates were aware his father was an alcoholic, and he became calloused, if not reconciled. But he could not become calloused to the fresh embarrassment he felt every time someone came to the house and met his father or saw the house itself.

In two years its carpets had become stippled with bums from half-smoked cigarets dropped heedlessly on the floor. The kitchen and dining room bore nicks and drip marks where his father had suddenly hurled his plate or glass in a drunken tantrum. One night Phil came home to find a milk bottle lodged halfway through a screen in a front window. His father angered at his wife's failure to come at once when he called her, had thrown the bottle at the TV screen, missed it and hit the window. The broken window and the stain on the paint outside stung Phil. "Makes the house look neat, doesn't it?" he said to a friend.

The wall-to-wall carpeting in his mother's bedroom, of which Phil was so proud, had become blotched from knocked-over glasses. The family car was a mess, filled with forgotten insurance literature in the back, the fenders dented by uncertain driving, the seat covers filthy, the glove-compartment door rickety from being banged open to get the bottle always stored there. Lying in bed nights, tapping his foot almost uncontrollably from tension, Phil thought of what other kids had and what he was missing. He and his mother could never plan a family outing because his father's condition was too unpredictable. The best they could expect was an infrequent barbecue in the back yard.

As the months passed Phil's father got worse. Once he tried to throttle his wife and Phil had to wrestle him to the floor. Another time Phil had to tie his hands with a necktie and hold him, fuming and cursing, until he finally passed out. Still another time Phil had to knock him down, no great feat because of his father's condition.

Mr. Daniels began to display spells of grandiosity. "They ask me to take a bigger job," he would declaim to the empty living room at 3 a.m. "They come to me on their knees, begging. I don't want another job, and I tell 'em so."

One afternoon a girl he knew in high school called Phil to ask him to a dance. His father answered the phone. Loudly and obscenely he cursed out the young girl, then hung up. Phil would not stay in the house that night. He slept at a friend's and next day went over to the girl's house and mumbled a red-faced apology for his father. It was one of the hardest things he ever had to do.

Mr. Daniels' health steadily deteriorated. At times he needed hospitalization, and occasionally his physical condition so alarmed him that he himself tried to slow down and "taper off." In this he had the advice of the family doctor who gave him various drugs to discourage drinking. None worked for long because Mr. Daniels went back to the bottle as soon as he began feeling better. Some nights he would burst into Phil's room, wake him up by turning on the light, and launch on a long, incoherent lecture. Phil finally arranged the light so that it could not be turned on at the door. His father continued to fling in whenever he felt like it, but it no longer really awakened Phil. "It's like the noise of the planes passing overhead," Phil says. "I just don't hear it anymore."

But he still carried the tension inside himself. His foot twitched steadily at night as he tried to go to sleep. On weekends he stayed away from the house as much as he could. He tried to keep up his studies, but it was hard to get up in front of the class to give a book report, knowing what they all knew about him. He was morbidly self-conscious about his appearance and about what the other kids might be thinking about him.

Another boy named Jerry, who lived down the street, had a similar problem. His father and mother both drank heavily and steadily, although more peaceably. Common problems, including poorer clothes and less spending money than other kids had, brought Phil and Jerry together. Occasionally they met to compare notes on the behavior of their parents. One day Jerry said he had heard there was some sort of juvenile branch of Alcoholics Anonymous, not for youthful drinkers but for the children of heavy-drinking parents. They called up the local "AA," got some literature and enlisted a third boy who had an alcoholic father.

The three boys met whenever they could and talked over their problems. After months of hiding his shame, it was a wonderful release for Phil to talk openly. It made him feel better to learn that other kids had the same problems he did and could even suggest some solutions. Soon the three boys were joined by the pretty blond daughter of an alcoholic, and the meetings acquired a little social atmosphere.

As news of the small movement spread, other youngsters joined up, and this attracted the attention of the local chapter of Al-Anon, a companion organization of Alcoholics Anonymous. AA is the league of alcoholics who have joined forces to help each other fight their mutual disease. Al-Anon is an organization of wives, relatives and friends of alcoholics who also meet to exchange suggestions and compare notes. Alateens, made up of the children of alcoholics, is a ward of the two main organizations. Phil's group decided to form an Alateen chapter. A kind-faced woman named Margaret Wells, with long experience in Al-Anon, volunteered to serve as guide and sponsor, but the youngsters conducted their own meetings. In a year Phil's and Jerry's frail partnership grew to 60 members, one of the largest Alateen groups in the U.S.

No easy cures

Alateen meetings do not solve the basic problems and certainly do not propose cures for alcoholic parents. They do, however, help members live with problems they cannot solve. They do this by offering a version of the Alcoholics Anonymous approach, which is a mixture of nonsectarian religious faith and personal psychological counseling. Alcoholics Anonymous gets its members to admit to themselves that they cannot control their disease alone but need the help of a "Greater Power," to whom they must turn over their lives. In the same way the members of Alateens are encouraged to face the fact that they cannot overcome their parents' alcoholism, but by putting their problems in God's hands and by practicing understanding and forbearance, they are taught to achieve an inward calm during a stormy adolescence.

The new Alateen member is taught the AA Serenity Prayer and the AA philosophy of trying to live one day at a time. One of the most striking features of the movement is the quietly spiritual attitude of the veteran Alateen member who, even though he may not be a member of any religious faith, lives closely and intimately with a God of his own choosing. This unusually frank reliance on the "Greater Power" pervades most Alateen meetings.

At the recent meeting of Phil's group, Phil invited members to step up to the podium and discuss their experiences. A rebellious dark-haired girl of 15 stood up and said:

"I know everybody says you ought to turn it over to God. But I can't." She paused, then spoke haltingly. "Maybe I should. I guess He brought me here to this meeting . . . in a way. But tonight Dad was going to take us to a show.

He got provoked and pulled one of his stunts. He took off by himself. I-I tried to get my brother to go to the show anyway by himself, but he wouldn't . . . I've learned here to try to be nice to people. But it takes time."

Phil asked for comment. A boy told the girl, "You can't just call on God when you're in a jam. You have to turn your whole life over to Him. My dad and I are a lot closer now since I did that. Last night we worked together fixing his bureau, and he doesn't come home drunk when he knows my pal is going to stay overnight with us. Probably your father is under great tensions, like mine is. You can always pray and hope it might come out all right."

Phil called on another girl, Annabelle. As is customary at Alateen meetings, only first names were used and the parent was often referred to simply as "my alcoholic." Annabelle took the podium to report on her progress. "I've got a temper," she said, "and when I said my prayers last night, I told God what my problem was today, that I had to work in the kitchen at home and I didn't want to. But I said I'd do my best because I wanted to help others."

A boy of 15 with a bristly red haircut raised his hand. "I've got a temper too. My mother is our alcoholic, and I have to do a lot of the housework. When they get to arguing, my father involves me in it. But when they start yelling at me I just say the Serenity Prayer to myself."

Mrs. Wells said, "I'd like to add a word to this. You all look healthy and happy and well fed to me. Maybe your parents don't always do as you think they should. But they did well to get you this far. They are doing the best they are mentally capable of at the moment. They love you but they are almost afraid to love you. They don't dare. They don't understand their children well enough."

A thin six-foot boy with a long face went to the podium. He was a newcomer and very nervous. "Maybe some of you have got your problems solved. I haven't. I--I just haven't. I can't take it any longer, and I'm not going to. I have a chance to go into a foster home and--and--I'm saying goodbye to my family."

He was close to tears.

Phil looked around for hands. Mrs. Wells said, "Dig into your hearts. What can we tell him that will really help?" There was silence.

"You've got to turn your problem over to God," a boy in the back said.

"You'll get a better deal out of it that way" said another. "He knows what we don't."

"Foster homes are no good," said a girl.

"They're too regulated."

"You've got to try to help yourself," said the boy who had warned against calling on God only when you are in a jam.

"And be courteous, and don't argue."

"What happens if he sends you out for a bottle for him?" asked the boy at the podium.

"You don't go," said Phil firmly. "We've talked that over. Lots of people have that problem. But you just politely refuse. If you do it once, he'll ask you to do it again."

"Yeah," the boy at the podium considered. "But I like to have friends over, and I never know. . . "

"Oh, golly," said another boy, raising his hand. "Never invite friends over without first reconnoitering. If your dad's drinking, just keep out of the way as much as you can."

'I used to feel abused, too'

The boy at the podium was replaced by a pretty, fair-haired girl. "You can come here with any sort of problem," she said, addressing the newcomer. "That's what I like about it. I used to feel abused too. Sometimes one of my friends would say, 'We all went out to dinner last night,' and I'd lie. 'I went out to dinner with my family, too,' I'd say. And my friend would say, 'No, you didn't. I know your father's drinking now.' But I found out that if I don't worry about tomorrow or the bad things that happened today but think of the good things, then--well, tomorrow can be another day to be happy with."

Another girl raised her hand. "I know what you mean about lying. I've got two alcoholics, both my parents. There were lots of things I couldn't have. So I began boasting to the other kids. I'd say we were getting a new car or a new dog or were going to Florida for a vacation. I told terrible lies. Then I started Alateens. I went back to the people I'd lied to and told the truth. I'm a new person. I'm getting along better in school and I'm an officer of my class."

The meeting was now more than an hour old, and the entire discussion had dealt with parental drinking problems. Few Alateens have drinking problems of their own. Some of them are led through everyday association to experiment with alcohol, and because they have seen how destructive it can be, they sometimes believe that they have a "drinking problem." This is almost always juvenile self-consciousness.

At the podium Phil said that if there were no other matters, the social hour would begin. Coffee and cookies were produced. After a collection was taken up for next week's cookies, the audience broke up into groups, chattering as though at a dance intermission. The tall, thin newcomer was surrounded by a knot of others, anxious to welcome him and help.

"Everyone's nervous getting up at first," someone told him, "but after a few times they won't be able to stop you from talking." "That's right," said Phil. "And you'd be surprised how much it helps you in school when you have to get up and make a talk to the class."

Soon they took their leave by ones and twos. Mrs. Wells drove several of them home. It had been a typical Alateen meeting, a new phenomenon in American life.

Less than four years old, the Alateen movement is still in its infancy. Ninety-seven groups are registered, and another 75 are believed to be in the formative stages. The total membership is perhaps 2,000 members--"perhaps" because communication between the groups and the parent AA or Al-Anon headquarters is often scanty. Alateen is certain to expand, for it gives the teen-aged child of an alcoholic something he can get nowhere else: a chance to hold up his head and talk about his troubles with others who suffer the same way. He acquires friends who he can telephone at night for encouragement or advice when the going gets tough, and he also gets a chance to talk openly about other problems. "I'm too shy" is a common complaint. "I'm always nervous" is another problem readily understood by more experienced Alateens who know the cause of the nervousness.

Above all, the Alateen member achieves depth of understanding rare in youth, and he helps to spread a new spirit of understanding to his whole family. Even the alcoholic parent, after a few guilty misgivings ("Do you actually talk about me at those meetings?"), becomes more serene and in time may even decide to seek help himself.

So far that has not happened to Phil's alcoholic. He still shakes the house with his occasional falls, wants to be waited on, never apologizes. He still bellows his challenges to nonexistent adversaries and occasionally goes berserk.

Phil has learned to "live around" the problem. His grades in school have again risen to a B average, and he is determined to stick it out with his mother until he enters college 18 months from now. He is still tense and -nerve-ridden. When he speaks, his hands dart in quick, finger-tapping gestures, and some nights he wriggles about uncontrollably in bed before he can go to sleep. But he says, "I don't really have any problems any more. They're there, but I don't fight them. No one can beat alcoholism by himself. So I just try to be polite and helpful, and let God take care of things."

The illustrations for this article [as it appeared in Life] were drawn by Franklin McMahon, who attended Alateen meetings in different sections of the country and sketched the teen-agers as they discussed their problems. Their own words, spoken at these meetings, serve as captions for the drawings:

"When Mom and I came home, Dad was hanging up a noose on the landing. When he's drunk he sometimes acts suicidal."

"I have learned to keep my mouth shut by saying the Serenity Prayer to myself." "I have to keep telling myself over and over again that the monster we were up against Tuesday night was nothing but a great big bottle."

"I come here with my older brother because he said I'd learn how not to get excited. Now when Daddy gets drunk, I just go on with my business."

"Some day we'll have all this behind us. I keep telling myself, I only have to take this for the next 24 hours."

Source: Life, February 10, 1961

P.O. Box 35865

2523B Bomar St.

Dallas, TX. 75235

214-357-1478

A Program For You: A Guide to the Big Book™s Design for Living (1991, Hazelden)

<http://hazeldenbookplace.org>

Joe K., 12 Steps to Happiness (revised edition, 1993, Hazelden)

<http://hazeldenbookplace.org>

Father Fred and the Twelve Steps: A Primer for Recovery (1996, Ambassador Books, Inc.) ISBN: 0-9646439-8-7

71 Elm Street

Worcester, MA. 01609

1-800-577-0909

Wally P., Back to Basics: The Alcoholics Anonymous Beginners' Meetings: "Here are the steps we took..." in Four One-Hour Sessions (1997, ©1998, Faith With Works Publishing Company) ISBN: 0-9657720-1-2

P.O. Box 91648

Tucson, AZ. 85752

website: www.aabacktobasics.com <<http://www.aabacktobasics.com>>

Clifford B. and Myers R., The Primary Purpose Group BIG Book Study (2000)

CBBB164@aol.com <<mailto:CBBB164@aol.com>>

A.A. Members in Texas, An Unofficial Guide to the Twelve Steps (Edited by Paul O.)

31352 Flying Cloud Dr.

Laguna Niguel, California 92677

Tapes [all available from <http://www.glennkaudiotapes.com/>
<<http://www.glennkaudiotapes.com/>>]

Vannoy S - Los Angeles, CA: Al-Anon 12 Step Study

sku#: A051

4 Tape Album

unit: US$18.95ea.

RAY O'K MIAMI, FL: TAPE 1 OF 6

12 STEP STUDY - STEPS 1 & 2 ARCH CREEK GROUP, N MIAMI, FL

DOT: 8/4/1986

sku#: 1460

unit: US$4.95ea.

SANDY B, ARLINGTON, VA 1 & 2 STEP

12 STEP STUDY BETHESDA, MD

DOT: 1/1/1994

sku#: 9740

unit: US$4.95ea.

12 x 12 Study - At Marymount College, Tarrytown, NY 1992

sku#: A060 (Clancy I, Willie B, John W and Richard B)

12 Tape Album

unit: US$48.95ea.

John W & Jim L - both of Pompano Beach, FL 12 x 12 Study

@ Wilson House, VT

sku#: A029W/H'95

Includes the evolution and history of AA.

12 Tape Album

unit: US$48.95ea.

Willie B & John W - Boca Raton, FL 12 x 12 Study

(Most Recent)

sku#: A029

Includes the evolution and history of AA.

12 Tape Album

unit: US$48.95ea.

Internet

<http://www.aabacktobasics.com> <<http://www.aabacktobasics.com>>

For a variety of printed, tape, and internet materials.

year, her book will appear as a motion picture in October. The following article was written especially for Coronet by Miss Roth in collaboration with Gerald Frank, co-author of her book and a senior editor of Coronet. - The Editors.

I do not set myself up as an authority on religion. What I know, what I am certain of, the faith that is now mine, I have learned the hard way.

Atheist, agnostic, unbeliever-I have been all of these. In the depths of my anguish, when I saw myself relentlessly destroying what had once been a happy, successful girl, I cried out to God. When I was not answered, I wept, God does not exist.

Where was God, and of what use were prayers, if He could allow even one human being to make such a wreck of her life and to drag down with her in shame and despair those who loved her and had sacrificed so much to bring her to fame and success?

I was wrong. Out of my life, out of the lives of others and out of that conviction which comes to all of us when we face ourselves in absolute honesty, I have come to know God. I can prove there is a God. Not by theological proof, such as you would receive from a priest, minister or rabbi, for I am not qualified. Nor by scientific means, because I am not a scientist.

My proof is based not alone on my humble studies in science and religion but also on belief in the value of the human being. And it rests upon the realization of the infinite wonder and glory of the universe.

Too many people cry out: "I don't believe! How can you believe?" And this before they have even studied to see what it is they don't believe.

To me, the basic approach to proof of God's existence is first to recognize there are powers- that there is a Power-greater than ourselves and beyond ourselves. Many people dismiss this as supernatural. They find it hard to accept.

It was difficult for me, too-at first. It came to me slowly in my first days in Alcoholics Anonymous, an organization of former alcoholics to whom I had turned in my extremity when I had nowhere else to turn.

I came there as a woman of 34, who had earned more than a million dollars, and was now penniless. Behind me lay 16 years of alcoholic horror which not even treatment in a mental institution had cured. I had been married four times-and each marriage had failed. I had nearly committed suicide. I had forsaken virtually everyone who had known me, while virtually everyone who had known me had given me up-save my mother.

"Forget your daughter," friends pleaded with her, watching her slowly destroying herself in vain attempts to save me. "You have no daughter. She would be better off dead."

I knew all this-and yet I was helpless. If there were a God, I used to think in my lucid moments, would He not take pity on me?

But at AA they told me, again and again: "You can believe in a power greater than yourself, no matter what you call that power for the moment. You can turn your will over to a greater Power."

I could not, I said to them. Once, as a little girl, I had dreamed of becoming a nun. I had had some spiritual contact with God. But now I had lost God. I did not believe in an outside power.

I shall never forget the words of the AA member who said to me: "Lillian, look about you. There are 200 of us here, men and women, and each one of us was a helpless, hopeless drunk. Now we are sober. Will you believe in that power, whatever it is, that keeps us sober?"

Somewhere deep in the depths of my alcoholic-fogged brain, this touched whatever was left of my sanity. Yes, they were sober, and they had been as I. I could believe in that power. I could turn and pray to it, and pull myself up toward it.

That was the beginning: to admit that a greater Power-no matter what name you give it-existed. And when I reached sobriety and could live and think again as a human being, I began to understand that there is much we must accept because reason tells us to accept, because the evidence is such that it is a denial of reason to refuse to accept.

After all, we cannot account for electricity or the electron. Why will people not struggle against the mystery of the electron, which they cannot touch or see, but will deny the mystery of God because they cannot touch or see it?

Is it harder, for example, to accept the mystery that God exists than it is to accept the mystery that enough energy is imprisoned in a pebble to blow a city apart? In a universe where such things can be, God also can exist.

But because we are reasoning beings, we constantly seek a simpler answer. A friend who once discussed how to build a train of reasoning at whose end even the doubter must find God put it this way.

"Lillian, you think of God. Why? Because God exists. If He did not exist, you could not have thoughts of Him."

Before I could protest that I couldn't quite follow this, he went on: "I challenge you - I challenge anyone - to think of anything that does not exist. Try it."

I looked at him. It was true. You cannot imagine anything completely non-existent. No matter what you think of, however bizarre or fantastic - a five legged man, a mind composed of mist and echo, an impossible creature from another planet - you discover that part of your concept is based on reality. So it is with God: for if any part of the concept of God is real, then God is real.

When I report this conversation to some, they shake their heads. "A trick of reasoning," they say. "That argument has a fallacy somewhere...you still have to show me."

Then I think of the small wristwatch I am wearing. I place it on the table before me. If I were to take it apart, I wouldn't expect to reassemble itself, would I? And looking at all its amazing intricacy, I know as surely as I know the sunshines, that someone made that watch.

Those fine, almost invisible gears meshing with such perfection, the fragile hairspring with just the exact amount of tension, the extraordinarily minute wheels and cogs, each planned to play its role in a microscopic little universe no bigger than my thumbnail - surely all this did not just "happen." It was not the result of chance.

No. An outside intelligence with a plan put it together. I need not see the watchmaker to know he exists. My evidence is the watch.

Now, move from the watch to the human eye. Iris, pupil, lens, retina, the image cast, caught, registered in the space of a heartbeat...How wonderfully delicate and intricate the human eye! Can I really believe that it threw itself together, that it just "happened"?

No. As with the watch, an outside Intelligence with a plan was at work. Not faith, not fear of the unknown, not superstitious belief, but reason makes it as impossible for me to believe that the eye was the product of chance as it is to believe that the watch was an accident.

I cannot conceive that the wonder about us-the timing of the seasons, the marvelous rhythm of the planets, the magnificent achievement that is man, forever aspiring upward and outward toward something higher than himself-I cannot conceive that all this is the result of chance, coincidence and chaos.

I ask, how can there be such universal hunger for God without the existence of God? Could we hunger for food if food did not exist?

Everywhere I look, everywhere I go, every emotion that shakes me, every thought that stimulates me, every dream that inspires me-from where do these come? Why should you and I be so driven by something outside ourselves to achieve something beyond ourselves?

I say it is impossible to believe that this faith that exists everywhere in the world, the faith of millions of Christians and Jews, Moslems and Buddhists and all the religions of man, is absolutely meaningless. If so, then all humanity is a grotesque mockery. No one who believes in man" dignity can accept the conclusion that all is senseless and without meaning, that the overpowering wonder of the universe is nothing but a cosmic freak!

Shall I give you another reason which to me is proof of God? It is one that grows out of my life. Because I have, with God's help, come back from the dark places of the soul, and once more can walk with dignity-spirituality dignity, some are good enough to say my example has given them strength to surmount their tragedies. Others are good enough to believe that what I say encourages and helps them.

They have written this to me in thousands of letters I have received since "I'll Cry Tomorrow" appeared, and they tell it to me when I come off stage in nightclubs where I sing or in halls where I lecture.

I know that of myself I haven't the strength to have done this. I haven't the intelligence, nor the education, nor the power, to have said what I have said, unless God gave me this strength and put these words and thoughts in my mind.

Often I have talked and written to people and there has been a cure of some kind, mental or physical. Is this not proof of the power of a positive faith? When I am asked, "Where does faith come from?" what other answer can I give but that it comes from above.

In Philadelphia, there is a polio patient who has forced herself, since reading my book, to walk, on crutches to be sure-but to walk for the first time in years. She did this herself through her renewed belief in God.

In Denver, there is a muscular dystrophy victim who has begun again to take an interest in life, although she knows that her disease is progressive and incurable. She writes me of the gay dresses she buys, and asks my advice about style and describes the adorable new shoes she has ordered "even though I'll never stand up in them."

In Los Angeles there are 25 boys in a correctional school who have written me, each signing his name to the letter: "Knowing the problem you met and defeated, we know how minor our problems are, and that we'll lick them too.

And each week hundreds of letters pour in to me from men and women who have had terrible alcoholic problems and tell me that my example has brought them to sobriety and keeps them sober now.

I do not cite these examples as something for which I should be thanked. Should I be thanked for saving my own life? But in all this I see the

"This guy acts like a pansy. What gives?"

His friend's reply was lost in the applause which greeted an especially clever line from the speaker, But the neophyte had unwittingly touched upon a very sensitive point which is causing more and more of New York City's estimated 50,000 practicing AA's to complain bitterly about the changes in their unique brotherhood of necessity.

"It is high time," said one veteran AA member, "That we give AA back to the drunks."

Though AA has not seen fit as yet to make any official comment on the matter, it is common knowledge throughout the organization that there is an alarming influx of homosexuals which some feel will eventually change the brotherhood into a sisterhood, the fraternity into a sorority.

On Manhattan's East Side, where comedian Henny Youngman has said World War III will be won by "fags with rolled umbrellas," homosexuals have admittedly "taken over" one large Park Avenue group, even to dominating the actual election of officers and at several others are in danger of becoming predominately "gay" groups.

A Wall Street broker, active in AA for nearly twenty years, claims it is only within the past decade that the change has become really noticeable. "There have always been a few effeminate men around and a few masculine women, but I can't recall that they were this obvious. Now when a guy introduces himself at the coffee session after a meeting I think twice before becoming involved in a conversation.

AA, founded 28 years ago in Akron, O., by two alcoholics who started out simply to help each other stop drinking, now claims a membership of 300,000 men and women in 87 countries who are "arrested" alcoholics. It is undoubtedly the most widely successful method of rehabilitating drunks which had yet been devised.

However, its apparent appeal to the homosexuals of our society-of which there are undoubtedly many more than there are alcoholics-lies in the basic concepts of the organization.

"We have no dues or fees," AA boasts quietly, "The only requirement for membership is a desire to stop drinking."

"Live and let live," reads one AA slogan. There but for the grace of God go I," suggests another.

Thus the homosexual was welcomed at first as simply another unfortunate victim of alcoholism by an organization which has been notoriously blind to the fact that in a great many cases of alcoholism drinking is but a minor manifestation of a serious emotional or psychiatric problem.

One admitted homosexual interviewed by CONFIDENTIAL, gave the following account of his entry into AA and his feeling about it:

"My drinking became uncontrolled about two years ago. When you have the other problem, you know, you haven't the opportunities for meeting someone nice that you would if you were straight. Where can a fellow go to meet another fellow and get acquainted? They don't have any over-28 clubs for us. You go to gay bars.

"The trouble with frequenting gay bars is the danger of being blackmailed or beaten up by someone you pick up and take home with you. This happened to me twice and the second time I was involved with the police and subsequently lost my job. I heard about AA through a gay friend about this time and consented to attend a meeting with him."

Here he toyed with his coffee cup, a smile playing about his lips when he recalled the incident.

"What a marvelous revelation that first meeting was to me! Here were all these people—mostly men—and all so friendly and eager to help me. Nobody seemed to feel that I was 'different' and before the evening was over a nice older man, who later turned out to be gay too, offered to be my sponsor and help me get started in the program.

"I soon learned that there was another group nearer to where I lived which had an even larger percentage of gay people, so I began alternating between the two groups, four meetings a week, and it was heaven. Absolute heaven."

This young man, who claims not to have had a drink since coming into AA claims he has made many friends in the fellowship and that regular meetings and outside association with them occupies most of his time. The gay group, he maintains, is rather a 'club within a club' and the homosexuals keep mainly to themselves.

The only segment of the AA rank and file which seemingly sees no threat in the current invasion of inverts—in fact even welcomes it—are the middle-aged and elderly women of the upper economic groups.

"To this type of woman," a psychiatrist said, "an attractive young homosexual is a social asset, almost a status symbol. He is usually better-than-average in looks, manners and education and is often in some artistic pursuit—a hairdresser, an antique dealer, an interior decorator or hat designer.

"The alcoholic divorcee or widow in this situation sees this attentive, amusing and understanding young man as the combination of the ideal son, satisfying her natural female instinct to mother someone, and also the ideal

Gracias! Sally

Rev. Sally Brown 1470 Sand Hill Rd., 309
United Church of Christ Palo Alto, CA 94304
Board Certified Clinical Chaplain, Ret Phone: (650) 325-5258
FAX: same

Yahoo! Groups Sponsor
ADVERTISEMENT

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to the Yahoo! Terms of Service.

=====

+++Message 1178. Re: Swedenborgian roots in AA?
From: Mel Barger 7/30/2003 1:52:00 PM

=====

Hi Sally:

They must be thinking of Lois Wilson as Swedenborgian. Her grandfather, Nathan Clark Burnham, was a Swedenborgian minister in Lancaster, PA. We can assume that some of this influenced Lois. The connection is mentioned on page 2 of "Lois Remembers," published in 1979 by Alanon.

Mel Barger

~~~~~
Mel Barger
melb@accesstoleado.com

----- Original Message -----

From: Sally Brown

To: AA History Lovers

Sent: Tuesday, July 29, 2003 12:31 PM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Swedenborgian roots in AA?

Today I met a chaplain who is a Swedenborgian. When I gave her some material about the Marty Mann bio, she said, "Oh! The wife of one of AA's founders was a Swedenborgian." She couldn't recall the woman's name. I was guessing Anne Smith.

None of my AA histories or biographies say anything about either Anne Smith or Lois Wilson having Swedenborgian backgrounds. Can any of you enlighten me?

Gracias! Sally

Rev. Sally Brown 1470 Sand Hill Rd., 309
United Church of Christ Palo Alto, CA 94304
Board Certified Clinical Chaplain, Ret Phone: (650) 325-5258
FAX: same

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to the Yahoo! Terms of Service [2] .

=====

+++Message 1179. . . . . Re: Swedenborgian roots in AA?
From: Glenn Chesnut . . . . . 7/30/2003 1:18:00 PM

=====

Dear Sally,
Hmmm. I wouldn't be surprised if all four of them (Bill W., Lois, Dr. Bob, and Ann) had read some Swedenborgian material at some point, because they were all fascinated with unconventional religious movements, spiritualism, and so on -- it's a possibility, but I've never run across any specific references. Perhaps someone else in the AAHistoryLovers could come up with a specific reference? But I wonder if your Swedenborgian chaplain got something a little garbled here, and left out a step or two in the transmission process. William James, author of The Varieties of Religious Experience, had a profound effect on the founders of A.A. -- we all know that. William James' father was a Swedenborgian theologian, and I should imagine that a Swedenborgian would notice many things in The Varieties of Religious Experience (some of the questions asked, and the kind of data that James was looking at, and some of the interpretations) that were the product of a Swedenborgian upbringing. And the Swedenborgians may still claim William James as "one of their own," which may have been why the chaplain made that statement.
So it is possible that all that the chaplain was really referring to was the heavy use which Bill and Bob and Lois and Ann made of The Varieties of Religious Experience and the ideas of William James.
On the other hand, there may have been more involved -- which would be very groups. This column started in the first issue of the Grapevine with the name 'Along the Metropolitan Circuit', then in January 1945 issue it became 'A.A.s Country-Wide News Circuit' and was later shortened to just 'News Circuit'. My plan is to just work my way through some of the early issues month by month, posting one each day. When I get it worked up to 1946, I may also start posting the 'New Groups' columns to go along with these.

-----
From Grapevine, June 1944

ALONG THE METROPOLITAN CIRCUIT

BROOKLYN. Well, you know how Brooklyn is. Trees grow there, and so does A. A., but they don't talk so much about it. We think it bears repeating that A. A. started there, right on Clinton St. in Bill's house. There are still plenty of A. A.'s around who attended their first meeting there. Then Bill and Lois moved and for a long time there were no meetings in Brooklyn. Two years ago last February, A. A. in New York had grown enough so that split-offs were becoming common. And there was Brooklyn, big enough all on its own to have been having meetings at the home of one of its members--now big enough to "hire a hall". The St. George Hotel is the present "hall", where an open meeting is held every Friday at 8: 30 P. M. Closed meetings (for alcoholics only) on Wednesday evenings at the home of one of its members. Brooklyn is growing!

ELIZABETH, N. J. The group is one of many that started in South Orange. Captain Gus Steffens of the Elizabeth Police Dept. started trying to rehabilitate some local drunks known as the "Bottle Gang". Then A. A. stepped in. Result: a growing group.

The Mayor and other officials furnished a perfect meeting place gratis. Now there is also the PLAINFIELD), N. J. group -- an outgrowth of Elizabeth. So A. A. grows.

FLUSHING. Formerly an integral part of the Forest Hills group, the Flushing group held its first meeting in Flushing on March 4, 1943, and has enjoyed a steady and healthy growth since. There are now about 35 names on the roster. The group meets Thursday evenings at the Good Citizens League Hall, corner of Union St. and Sanford Ave. promptly at 8: 30 (A. A. time).

FOREST HILLS. Among the eight or ten shaky characters who attended the first meeting of the Forest Hills Group some three years ago, an A. A. dry six months was an absolute authority on all twelve steps and a "one yearer" was a complete phenomenon. With their small membership there was little chance of not bearing the same speakers at least every two weeks, so these men became very well acquainted indeed. In two years this group had grown so there were enough Nassau and Suffolk residents to launch their own group in Hempstead. Shortly thereafter, the Jackson Heights-Flushing folks commenced their meetings in Flushing. So 1944 sees three well-established groups on Long Island with, at a rough count, a total membership of 125, all offspring of that first little Forest Hills group, who, incidentally, along with new members still meet in the Fountain Room of the Forest Hills Inn every Monday at 8: 30 P. M.

THE NEW MANHATTAN GROUP. A meeting of all Manhattanites and other A. A. s living in the Metropolitan area, but affiliated with no suburban group, was called at the 24th Street clubhouse on Thursday, April 13th. New York's senior representatives on the Inter Group Committee presided. The chair read a comprehensive history of the expansion of A. A. in the Metropolitan area, from the time of the meetings at Bill's house in Brooklyn until today. The Manhattan Group was then formed to co-ordinate the work of A. A. on this little Island. The members participating then elected a Chairman, to serve six months; a Deputy Chairman, to serve a year and to automatically succeed the Chairman; a Secretary, and a Treasurer. The name "Manhattan Group of Alcoholics Anonymous" was adopted--and the newest A. A. Group in this area was in business for itself.

MOUNT VERNON. Early in 1943 about fifteen members of the While Plains Group, residing in southern Westchester County, decided there was need for a Group in that area.

The first meeting was held February 4, 1943, at the Westchester Women's Club, 110 Crary Avenue, Mount Vernon, where weekly Monday evening meetings have since been held.

The Group now has eighty active members, exclusive of those on duty with the armed services and those who since have established residences elsewhere. Recently separate open meetings were held with the Medical Associations of Mount Vernon and Yonkers.

THE NASSAU-SUFFOLK group started holding its meetings in Hempstead about a year ago.

The group originally started with about 15 members from the Forest Hills group.

At a closed meeting last night the Secretary reported that we have 63 members on the list.

Hempstead is now meeting on Monday night, instead of Tuesday (open meetings).

At the request of a Long Island Veterans' hospital, we are sending a delegation to talk with some World War No. 2 veterans. The letter from the hospital authorities says that they have heard of A. A., and t h a t they would like to know more about it.

Six new members have come in, in the last two weeks. Hempstead group meets at 177 Jackson St., Monday and Friday.

NORTH. JERSEY NOTES. As we went to press, bright prospects of a sell-out attended the South Orange group's spring dance which was held May 13 at the Maplewood Women's Club. Four such social affairs a year are on the Jerseyites' schedule. The others include an uproarious Hallowe'en party, a New Year's Eve dinner-dance and a shindig on St. Patrick's Day. which is always a dangerous time for 'slips'. They also run other socials, like the all-day summer picnic out in the country and the Christmas Day reception. In recent weeks North Jersey members have spoken before several luncheon clubs, such as the South Orange Rotary, the Newark and Irvington Kiwanis and the Trenton Optimist clubs. An A. A. group among the inmates of the State Reformatory for Women at Clinton, N. J., has been undertaken under the direction of the Morristown Group. The entire operation is handled by the inmates, the A. A. people assisting with literature, counsel and advice. Similarly, a group within the New Jersey State Prison at Trenton is in the experimental singe. This unit was suggested by a prisoner who wrote in to the Foundation office. Literature, etc. has been provided and North Jersey A. A. members have contacted the prison authorities with offers of help.

WHITE PLAINS. Wednesday, May 17th, marks the third anniversary of A. A. in White Plains, N. Y. The whole thing started back in 1941 when a handful of 24th Street members held a dinner meeting in Howard Johnson's to discuss plans for a Westchester Group. We feel that the cooperation of 24th Street and the Central Office has aided immeasurably in our growth. The Grapevine should go far in this direction, too, and should be a tremendous aid in cementing metropolitan group relations. In unity there is strength! Good luck and keep 'em rolling! (We mean the presses. ) Open meetings,

But to return to Former Alcoholics Now Anonymous. They have been cured of excessive drinking through the use of their will, aided by various other helps, particularly by systematic efforts of others, formerly inebriates. Sympathetic help is their outstanding characteristic. The movement, however, is not confined to the services of former alcoholics. It welcomes and fully recognizes the help of medicine and religion. Thus we are told by Genevieve Parkhurst in an enlightening article, "Laymen and Alcoholics" (Harper's, September, 1941), that doctors who once, in their own words, looked on the movement as composed of "dangerous meddlers in a dangerous province" now welcome the help given by the group of Alcoholics Anonymous. Further, the Research Council on Problems of Alcohol was told recently that "physicians in general are admitting that the lay healers are doing remarkable work." The speaker, Dr. Merrill Moore, Associate in Psychiatry, Harvard Medical School, later developed his rather startling statement:

"We know that if we are going to make any real advance we must tap every source of knowledge and healing there is....Not only lay therapists, but lawyers, clergymen, and social workers are successfully helping and treating the alcoholic....This means treating someone who is emotionally sick or hurt or down or sometimes weak. Certainly physicians have no corner on it. There is no magic to it. And no royal road."

A full paraphrase of the above might place together simultaneously and succinctly 1) sympathy, 2) medical science, 3) the Grace of God. The Supernatural, we know, builds on the natural, and many lay students of inebriety have long thought that its psychological as well as biological sides have not been sufficiently considered.

Alcoholics Anonymous stress the psychological element involved. With them sympathy is the fundamental approach. Doubtless they know from experience the value of this virtue, whose generic nature is after all that of charity. A kindly mode of expression is most important. Human nature objects to any show of paternalism in charity; but to fraternalism in good deeds, there is always a ready response. The St. Vincent de Paul Society has followed this human technique in accomplishing its noble results.

A patient, as well as a penitent, appreciates anonymity when his self-revelation involves deep humiliation. But his will power is thus strengthened, and without it, there can be no diametrical change of life. Statistics might be called negative in the following more generic enunciation by Genevieve Parkhurst: "Nor is there any record of a reformed drunkard who was ever able to drink moderately without going the whole way down hill again." The view is confirmed in the practice of Catholic Temperance Societies and, I believe, in the advice given by Catholic priests in the confessional.

While Alcoholics Anonymous have not printed any Manual of Instructions, and I guess are not likely to do so, the approach of the individual member is something as follows.

He has been told of or knows a person who lacks self-control in drinking. The latter is sought out, preferably in his favorite place of over-indulgence. A casual conversation is begun. Quickly it leads to the subject of intemperance, with the A.A. freely admitting that he had been a victim of inebriety, but through his own determination has overcome the malady, not the first time, likely, but the fifth or sixth!

The essential point of the cure is total abstinence: "To take a few drinks without getting drunk" does not work, according to the principles of the A.A.'s. After establishing a sympathetic approach to the individual's peculiar personality, the A.A. works to secure a doctor's checkup and the establishment of regular meals, physical exercise and employment, if this last is lacking. "If he can be kept healthy in body and contented in mind, he has a far better chance of complete recovery than in an environment where he is constantly on the defensive" concludes Genevieve Parkhurst.

"Freed slaves of drink, now they free others" was the sub-title of Jack Alexander's article on Alcoholics Anonymous in the Saturday Evening Post. The following brief excerpts are characteristically objective.

"A band of ex-problem drinkers who make an avocation of helping other alcoholics to beat the liquor habit.... They (the A.A.'s) would leave their work or get up in the middle of the night to hurry where he was.... In the past six years (the A.A.'s) have brought recovery to around 2,000 men and women, a large percentage of whom had been considered medically helpless.... Alcoholism.... remains one of the great unsolved public-health enigmas.... The alcoholic likes to be left alone to work out his puzzle."

Characteristic of the honesty of the movement in addition to its anonymity is its forthright admission of being no "cure-all" nostrum. But it has been the occasion for certain human beings to retrieve their native dignity.

I have not found any physical requirements for the work of Alcoholics Anonymous. There may be some to judge from the following taken from an editorial in the sober (no pun intended) Illinois Medical Journal, December 1940.

"It is indeed a miracle when a person who for years has been more or less constantly under the influence of alcohol and in whom his friends have lost all confidence, will sit up all night with a 'drunk' and at stated intervals will administer a small amount of liquor in accordance with a doctor's order without taking a drop himself."

Or, as Mr. Alexander puts it: "Only an alcoholic can squat on another alcoholic's chest for hours with the proper combination of discipline and sympathy!"

Aside from these not essential feats, is there any reason why Catholics should not be interestedly active in the cause of Temperance, a supernatural virtue? A certain amount of success seems assured from a natural point of view. But prevention should be first. I have ventured the opinion that there is less effort in this than in pre-prohibition days. Surely there is not less need. Secondly, we must deal with the great problem of cure. Here Mr. Alexander's statement in his article is encouraging:

"One-hundred-per-cent effectiveness with nonpsychotic drinkers who sincerely want to quit is claimed by the workers of A.A." Further, "A.A.... is a synthesis of old ideas rather than a new discovery."

The virtue of Temperance, of self-denial, is not a new idea. Does it need more American Catholic Action for a neglected harvest?

Undoubtedly. But let us learn from prohibition kindness, not violence; the Good Shepherd, not the Pharisee, is needed.

|||||

+++Message 1185. . . . . Pattie Wild Alanon and great supporter of AA
From: John Reid . . . . . 8/2/2003 6:54:00 PM

|||||

Dear All, We have been advised of the passing of Pattie W, long time member of Alanon and partner of Berry W for over 56 years.

Some of you may not have known her all that well but Pattie was probably one of the longest active members still involved in Alanon since virtually its conception. Pattie and Berry had many trips DownUnder and a lot of you would have visited with them in Hawaii and on Mainland USA. While we had meet Lois a few times and spent one to one valuable time with Lois, Pattie knew Lois W the co-founder of Alanon-well. Pattie use to share lots of very humours antidotes about the beginnings of Alanon. She will be surely missed by all who came in contact with her or who have had the opportunity to listen to her tapes, etc.

Please advise anyone who you might feel should know, of the passing of Pattie W

Kind Regards, John R.

|||||

+++Message 1186. . . . . Along the Metropolitan Circuit - July 44
From: t . . . . . 8/3/2003 2:25:00 AM

members have articles to contribute. Thursday night meetings continue to be interesting, enlightening and well attended; a goodly number are newcomers.

Closed

meetings are usually held on the second Friday of the month at the home of one of the members. A closed meeting for the ladies was held in the home of Violet S. in Jackson Heights, Wednesday, May 31st. Several nights a week one of our talented members visits Veterans Hospitals and sketches wounded boys and presents them with their portraits. This has a salutary effect on their morale. Happily, our Secretary has located a new apartment, a difficult feat in these days. Mrs. L. would like to hear from anyone having knitting wool of any color or weight or in any quantity, with which to make squares, which in turn are made into afghans and donated to the wounded boys at St. Albans Hospital. At a recent meeting the Group was delightfully regaled by the story of "Sandy Hook," greatest of all A.A. cats. What did he do? For complete details, get in touch with Fred S., care of this station.

MANHATTAN. The newly-formed Manhattan Croup got under way with a bang at the 24th Street Club House, Thursday, June 8th, at 8:30 p.m. (Same place, same time every week.) It was a closed meeting with a difference, and the reaction was extremely favorable. More stimulating, was the consensus. Instead of devoting the entire time to open discussion, there were two speakers--Bob W. and Clay F. Then the chairman, Tom

B., gave over the evening to questions and answers. "What does a drunk do to overcome his terrific response to those terrific liquor ads?" This from a shaky male in the last row, attending his first A.A. get-together. Up front a man turned quietly around in his seat. "I write those ads!" he said. "They no longer bother me." That man

has been coming regularly to meetings, talking about alcohol and alcoholism, hearing about it. As the subject became more intellectualized for him, his emotional response gradually diminished, dissolved completely in time. At least, he said, where his work was concerned!

MOUNT VERNON CROUP NEWS. A special open meeting to which the clergy, medical profession, court and probation officers, and social workers were invited, was held on May 22nd. It was very successful and the interest aroused has brought us a deluge of inquiries for further information. Invitations have been received for guest speakers to the Rotary, Kiwanis, and Lions Club luncheons. The cooperation we have received from the Courts has been most gratifying. Our A.A. Night Club staged a gala performance on May 27th. Every table was taken and we enjoyed refreshments served by an efficient staff of waiters, and dancing to music by a celebrated swing orchestra. A dazzling floor show was staged by our local talent. The bevy of graceful dancing beauties were the hit of the evening. A third generation of A.A. was born in Westchester County on June 4th. We, an offspring of White Plains, regret the loss of some of our most active members who have formed the new NEW ROCHELLE GROUP. We do, however, wish them success. Their departure will leave a few vacant seats at our meetings, so we invite all you Inter Groupers to pay us a visit.

NASSAU-SUFFOLK GROUP. The June issue of The Grapevine reported that open meetings were held at Hempstead, every Monday night. Open meetings are now held every Friday night and closed meetings on Monday nights, at 177 Jackson St., Hempstead, L. I., 8:30 p.m. Every meeting shows the steady, healthy growth of the group. Our secretary added three more names at last Friday's meeting. A number of birthdays have been celebrated during the past few months. Volume #1 of The Grapevine was a sell-out; our Treasurer, Waller A., exhausted our (quota of copies "pronto." Walter offered to autograph the first edition at fifty cents per copy, but found no buyers.

NEW JERSEY GROUPS. All the Jersey groups held a general open meeting on

"Membership in this city is in excess of 1,500, comprising more than 30 groups meeting once a week. We use five hospitals, including Catholic Charity. The first hospital used was a Catholic hospital, one in a nearby city. It is unfortunately true that about 75 per cent of our cases are Catholic. Our greatest successes have been with those of our own faith. In our own group we have deleted the expression "power greater than ourselves" and substituted God. The first members, so I am told, were loath to believe in a Supreme Being; hence the other expression."

The statement that "75 per cent are Catholic" is, I hope, to be restricted and explained by the fact that the writer's group is Catholic and hence has come into contact with Catholics rather than non-Catholics. But at its worst calculations, the assertion would underline emphatically the points I tried to make previously, namely, the need of more instruction on the cardinal virtue of Christian temperance and the field of zeal open especially to the Catholic laity in being good shepherds who bring back to the fold victims of intemperance, especially of our own Faith. Great praise is due to this Cleveland group because it has made itself Catholic in principle. Whether it is the first such among Alcoholics Anonymous, I cannot say, though the general Cleveland chapter of A.A.'s is seven years old.

In the hope that this movement and similar ones for temperance may grow among Catholics, I am adding some pertinent facts about Alcoholics Anonymous. They declare quite frankly that their approach to the disease is based on their own drinking experience and on what they have learned to expect from the help of medicine and psychiatry. To this the Catholic groups, at least, would add: from the grace of God. The latter Alcoholics Anonymous can say in all humility with Saint Paul: "By the grace of God, I am what I am."

In fact, the group might take St. Paul as their patron. One of their fundamental requisites is sympathy, and surely this Apostle had that quality in an outstanding degree. Among Cardinal Newman's most typically appealing sermons, there is one entitled "Saint Paul's Gift of Sympathy." In it he skillfully develops the Apostle's manifestation of this winning virtue. Dr. W.D. Silkworth, Chief Physician at the Charles B. Towne Hospital, New York, writing of Alcoholics Anonymous in the Journal Lancet, stresses this point of sympathy: "This peculiar ability, which an alcoholic who has recovered exercises upon one who has not recovered, is the main secret of the unprecedented success which these men and women are having." Sympathy begets sympathy. As Dr. Silkworth expresses it: "Then, too, the patient's hope is renewed and his imagination is fired by the idea of membership in a group of ex-alcoholics where he will be enabled to save the lives and homes of those who have suffered as he has suffered."

It is encouraging to note that Dr. Silkworth, in his summary of the essential features for the cure of drunkenness, insists explicitly: "That he (the patient) recommit himself daily, or hourly if need be, to God's care and direction, asking for strength." In fact, the Doctor urges several points of Catholic moral theology: "try to adjust bad personal relationships;" that he make reparation for the past, "setting right, so far as possible, such wrongs as he may have done in the past;" that he "pray daily, or hourly if need be," a laudable practice in Catholic asceticism, known among us these long centuries past as "renewing one's morning intention."

I mention these obvious practices to show that our Catholic laity is well prepared to engage in and to supernaturalize this movement of Alcoholics Anonymous as a means of true Catholic Action. The same has been done in many similar movements whose beginnings were not religious, in our understanding of that necessary element. Dr. Silkworth, who evidently is held in high esteem by Alcoholics Anonymous, seconds this position, if, as I trust, he uses "Deity" in the Catholic meaning: "Newcomers have been unable to stay sober when they have tried the program minus the Deity."

A.A.'s rightly insist on modern medical means placed at their disposal by Providence. Hospitalization under a competent physician is essentially the first step for an alcoholic on his return journey to normality, and even to a saintly life. (Matt Talbots are always possible with the grace of God.) But delirium tremens, a "wet brain" and similar calamities are to be feared in the case of heavy drinkers, who do not receive at once the physical readjustment to be had ordinarily only in a hospital;

I shall be indebted to Dr. Silkworth for two further points. In speaking of the textbook as it may be called, of the A.A. movement, a volume of 400 pages and entitled Alcoholics Anonymous, he makes the following observation, part of which I am italicizing: "There is a powerful chapter addressed to the agnostic, as the majority of the present members were of that description." This confirms the view of my Cleveland correspondent. It may also show that inebriety is had in corresponding proportions among non-Catholics as among Catholics, as I suggested above.

Doctor Silkworth then straightforwardly faces the question which arises in regard to any comparatively new treatment of a world-old problem: "Will the movement spread? Will many of these recoveries be permanent? No one can say. Yet, we at this hospital, from our observation of many cases, are willing to record our present opinion as a strong 'Yes' to both questions."

The medical profession is rightly conservative in giving its imprimatur to new cures, medicines and matters properly within its field. Such approval, in general, has been given to Alcoholics Anonymous. The most recent instance I have at hand is from Dr. Merrill Moore, Director of Research at the Washingtonian Hospital for Alcoholism, Boston, Mass. I had quoted from him in my above-mentioned article, and he was kind enough to send me additional matter on the treatment of this disease.

The strongest chapters of the A.A.'s are in Cleveland, New York City and Akron, Ohio. Claim is made for vigorous beginnings in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Denver, Kansas City, Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., Richmond, Va., Houston, Tex. An original agnostic touch was accidental to the movement. In fact, belief in God and His Providence for the weakest of His children is now, apparently, a fundamental desideratum in the A.A. technique. Does not then such a movement deserve our heartiest cooperation as Catholics?

The work has also the human appeal of success. There is no claim of a "sure-cure," but the cures freely placed on record are an incentive to zealous but hesitant workers in this field of Christian temperance. I quote in illustration from an editorial in the Houston Press, entitled "Alcoholics Anonymous."

"People of independent spirit like to settle (liquor) for themselves... (others) inclined to reform come to the front with suggestions...even for its abolition. But Alcoholics Anonymous...have taken to the wagon by a technique of their own...They say their cure works. They show as witnesses hundreds of lives restored...The press thinks their...unusual success so important that it begins a series of articles on Alcoholics Anonymous, written by one of them ....even the liquor industry... would wish success to a technique that promises much to men and women who cannot handle their drinks."

I have read this series of articles. Naturally, as their author notes, they turn quite often into the autobiographical. He insists that alcoholics are definitely sick. It is the difference between them and other normal people who are able to "hold their liquor." The disease is mental as well as physical. For the alcoholic to recognize this is essential to his cure. The admission is hard. It has been made easier by the wide publicity given to medicine's discoveries in allergy, which fundamentally is the old proverb that one man's meat is another man's poison. "With true alcoholics," the writer declares, "it is never a question of control or moderation. Their only out is absolute abstinence." To a layman, this is medicine's sane advice on any allergy. To a moralist, it is "avoiding the occasions of sin."

Alcoholics Anonymous are not, as far as I can judge, Manichaeans. Liquor in its various forms and in its medicinal and social purposes is a gift from the Author of all nature, they know. But just as sugar is a similar bounty and yet fatally destructive for a diabetic, so is alcohol in any form, except by a doctor's prescription, for certain men and women. Subterfuges abound for the real alcoholic: to switch from scotch to beer, wine I rum, gin; to drink whiskey only in milk; only post-meridian (standard time!); only in the company of others; only at home; never on an empty stomach; to take more physical exercise, etc. All these may be a great help to temperance for the ordinary person, but not for the individual who is alcoholic, according to those who freely confess they should know, viz., Alcoholics Anonymous. Hence their insistence on total abstinence for those who are by nature irresponsibly allergic to liquor. This physical and even mental predisposition implies no sometime in August. There's nothing quite like having a quarterly round-up of the 400 to 600 members and their families!

ELIZABETH. The Group added two new members to its roster this month and two wandering lambs returned to the fold ... In the past month there have been two weiner roasts, one lake party that was a wow, one A.A. picnic at the Preakness Pool which was attended by 145 A.A. girls and boys who know how to enjoy their sobriety. Even the rain cannot dampen the spirits of an A.A. picnic.

FLUSHING FLASHES: Thursday night meetings are very well attended despite the torrid weather. Scarcely a week goes by that is not somebody's 1st or 2nd anniversary and before long a group of 3 year olds should come into being. The Flushing Group, 21 strong, visited Montclair early in the month. The exchange was completed by the Montclair Group, July 13th, when they visited Flushing. Closed meetings have been discontinued for the summer but will be resumed in the fall.

FOREST HILLS. For the past two and one half years. Father Griffin, pastor of St. Nicholas of Tolentine Church in Jamaica and Chaplain at Queens General Hospital, has been feeding prospective A.A. to the Forest Hills Group, and, since its inception a year or so ago, to the Flushing Group. It is indeed readily understandable that both groups have met the announcement of Father's transfer to Staten Island with a deep sense of personal loss. Incidentally, secretaries of both groups, Mary C. of Forest Hills and Kitty R. of Flushing, both first heard of A.A. through Father Griffin. However, it's an ill wind that blows no good, and we are sure many alcoholics in Staten Island will be directed to A.A. by this very good friend.

MANHATTAN. Earl O., a member of this group, really went to town in the way of outstandingly fine publicity in his series of three articles which appeared during June in the N. Y. Telegram. Being one of us. Earl knows his booze and he knows his his A.A. And so there were no faux pas, none of those unfortunate slip-ups that the the non-alcoholics sometimes make when writing about alcoholism. Earl's articles had had bites aplenty--and the nibbling is still going on. The pictures --so sober, sane sane and and intelligent--accompanying the articles were taken by Bill (Red) F, of the the Flushing Flushing Group. The Walnut Room of the Capitol Hotel isn't exactly overcrowded these these tropical tropical Tuesdays, many of our people having retreated to the mountains or the seashore for for the summer. Bless their cool hides. With its wide-open windows, its fans and the the wellstocked Coca Cola contraption, the 24th Street Clubhouse continues to pack pack 'em 'em

in--at the closed meetings Thursdays, the open ones Sundays.

MOUNT VERNON. At every meeting there are always some new faces. They are are wondering, wondering, hopeful, doubtful, curious. What is here to help them that they have not tried tried before? We want them to feel at ease and to know that they become a part of part of this this great movement as soon as they decide to give the A.A. program a chance. To to get get the the individual and personal contact with new members. Mount Vernon is using using "Sponsor Sponsor Cards." This card is in two parts. One part has the list of inter-group group meetings meetings on on one side and on the reverse the names, addresses, and phone numbers of three three older older members. This is given to the new member, he is introduced to his sponsors, sponsors, and and it is it is suggested that he keep in touch with them when he gets that lonesome feeling feeling or or if if the butterflies start fluttering. This begins his address list which we all all find find so so helpful. The other part of the card has the new member's name, address, etc, etc, and and is is given to the first sponsor with the instruction that he keep this person under his wing for a few weeks until he has some understanding of the program. This keeps the older members working on the twelfth step, and is a life saver for the new member who has difficulty at first and might drift away hopeless, helpless, and licked. These cards are bringing excellent results, and if other groups are interested in them and will write P.O. Box 328. Grand Central Annex, we will gladly send them a sample.

NASSAU-SUFFOLK GROUP. Bouquets to the Editorial Staff, for the excellent work on edition #2. Comments were most complimentary. Noses of two-year dries recently counted in this group, and--Hurrah, we find that six are entering their third. Visits from other groups are always welcome. Trains leave Flatbush Ave. Station, Brooklyn, or. L.I.R.R. Station, 33rd Street, New York, at 7:23 P.M., arriving at Hempstead. 8:16 P.M. Add two minutes from nation to 177 Jackson Street. Meetings 8:30 P.M., Monday and Friday.

NEW ROCHELLE. As a result of the rapid and constant growth of A.A. in southern Westchester County, a new group, an outgrowth of Mount Vernon, has been formed in New Rochelle. Truly characteristic of A.A., the Mount Vernon members were magnanimous in their wishes for the success of the New Rochelle Group and as an expression of their continued friendship and good-will, presented the new group with an inscribed gavel. At the first meeting held on Sunday, June 4th, there were about seventy persons on hand, with representatives present from Mount Vernon, Yonkers, Pelham, New Rochelle, White Plains, Larchmont, Mamaroneck, Rye, and Greenwich. Regular meetings are held every Sunday at the New Rochelle Y.M.C.A.. 185 Division Street, at 7:30 P.M.

NEW JERSEY NOTES. A comedy-drama written around A.A. was presented on July 25

As Dr. Braceland pointed out, Alcoholics Anonymous claim that they appeal to a man's religious sense but do not interfere with his belief. That distinction is, I think, too fine for practical experiment. It seems to be an impossibility to work in the vague realm of religious sense and still leave a man's faith strictly alone. The thing smacks of Protestant endeavors like the YMCA.

Alcoholics Anonymous say officially that they have no connection with any organized religion, and there is no reason for thinking they are not sincere in this statement. Whether they realize it or not, their methods are shot through with the methods of Buchmanism or the Oxford Peace Movement or whatever you care to call that much publicized revival movement that swept across the country several years ago and finally blew itself out some miles west of Hollywood. Buchmanism, also, appealed to a man's religious sense and did not interfere with his belief - as long as he believed in Buchmanism.

The fact that Alcoholics Anonymous is a group of reformed alcoholics who, without even the reward of publicity, work with others who have fallen victim to this disease, is well known. Their program of rehabilitation is not so well known. When their patient is painfully recovering from his latest spree and when, finally admitting that he has failed to cure himself, he sincerely desires help from this group, the following program is outlined to him.

1. You cannot cure yourself. You must have supreme confidence in some Power greater than yourself. How you define this Power does not matter at all. You must effect a conscious relation with this God, as YOU understand Him, whether it be as a Creative Intelligence or as a Spirit of the Universe or whatever you care to make Him. As soon as you do this you will find that a new power, a new peace and sense of direction will flow into you. You will find this God deep within you, for in the last analysis that is only where He may be found. He will restore you to sanity.
2. You must make a searching and fearless moral inventory of yourself, listing all your faults and grievances.
3. You must admit to God, to yourself, and to another human being the exact nature of your faults, and must humbly ask God to help you remove these defects of character.
4. You must make a list of all persons you have harmed, have the intention of making amends to all, and whenever possible make these amends.
5. You must completely renounce alcohol in any form.
6. You must continue, through prayer and meditation, to improve your contact with God, praying for knowledge and for power to continue carrying out His will.

7. Once reformed, you must work with alcoholics in effecting their renovation.

The priest should be especially wary of the dangers that lie hidden in points 1,3, and 7. They are not insurmountable, but they are very real dangers.

The Catholic who is striving to recover from alcoholism is at a definitely critical point in his career. If, with the help of his religion and the sacraments, he conquers this vice, he is well on the way to becoming a staunch, active Catholic. But if at that critical time he is told again and again, as he will be told by the Alcoholics Anonymous, that it makes absolutely no difference what he believes as long as he believes in some Power greater than himself, and then recovers, he is not going to have a great deal of use for Catholic dogma and what will appear to him to be the Catholic boast of, "we have God's grace on our side."

This difficulty might be obviated if the priest himself, or better yet, a Catholic member of Alcoholics Anonymous, work with the alcoholic, leave out the generalities of "Power greater than himself," and fed him the strong Catholic stuff of "God, the loving Father, Jesus Christ, the God man and model, the Holy Spirit, the source of strengthening grace."

Secondly, the confession required can be a source of grave scandal if made to a private individual or to a group. Here again the Catholic can be offered the Sacrament of Penance and the consequent sacramental grace in addition to psychiatric healing. The danger does not cease once the alcoholic is cured. He is then advised to attend informal meetings of Alcoholics Anonymous, and there discuss quite frankly his former sorry state and consequent vagaries.

Thirdly, the reformed alcoholic's work with patients, while it has proved highly successful in keeping him on the straight and narrow, is for the Catholic bristling with dangers to his faith. No man, even one well grounded in his faith, can argue long and earnestly with an agnostic or a heretic, assuring him constantly that it makes no difference what he believes as long as he puts himself in the hands of one stronger than himself, and still stand fast to the doctrine of the One True Church. Temptations to faith are one of the two temptations where the best defense is hasty flight.

The very essence of the technique of this organization is the surrendering of the will to some Superior Being in order that He or It may direct their whole lives. When the Catholic sees that the Universal Intelligence of the Pantheist or the Inspiration of the Christian Scientist seems to be doing just as good a job as his own God, the doubt will easily arise, "Perhaps it doesn't make any difference just what you believe."

The antidote might be for the priest to recommend Catholics to work with other Catholics. Here he would be up against the organization's recommendation of helping anyone whenever that help is needed, which at first blush looks much like true Christlike charity.

of the Bronx Group; Earl S., the Creedmore potentate; and a surprise speaker, the very popular Stewart (Stony) S. of Jersey.

BROOKLYN REVIVES OLD CUSTOM ... At our closed meetings we have revived an old
A.A.
custom: discussing only one step at each meeting. The members know in advance
which step will be under discussion. The result is a highly informative and interesting evening. We now have in our group about 50 members who have been sober for more than a year. . . . We are happy to report that Tommy M., one of our oldest members, has recovered from a recent operation and is back in circulation again. . . . Our P.
O.
is #91, Brooklyn, N. Y.

EAST ORANGE HITS THE NEWS . . . The East Orange Record gave some decidedly favorable publicity to Alcoholics Anonymous in their August 3rd issue. At the following Sunday night meeting, 3 prospects appeared for the first time. Bob C. will be host to
the entire membership at Lake Hopatcong over a forthcoming week-end. Doc M. has been asked by the Kiwanis to talk to their membership on A.A. J. Hudson C., Jr., chairman of our group, in addition to his activities at the "Brook," believes his efforts
will produce a team of bowlers to join the league now in the making.

FLUSHING SNIFFS OLD CROW . . . The climax of the hilarious Group anniversary party at Mike D.'s July 22nd, was the minute inspection--and one sniff--of a bottle of Old Crow, part of the family medicine cabinet. Two of our members, Jimmy S. and Emmet F.,
who were ill, are all recovered now.

FOREST HILLS GOES TO PHILADELPHIA ... A number of us went to Philadelphia
August
11th, dined there, conducted a meeting in the charming clubhouse of that group,

and returned home on the 11:30 p.m. train. Altogether a delightful evening. Our representatives were Mary C., Henry Z., Earl S., Mel C., Dave R., and Jim Y.
Soon the Philadelphia A.A.s will complete the exchange and come to us for an evening.

MANHATTAN REPORTER PIONEERS FROM THE SEASHORE ... A few weeks ago, no one in this isolated Long Island village had ever heard of A.A. The villagers had always looked on drinking as sinful. One day a native discreetly spoke of a former vacationer.
Seems the man had been losing job after job. After much prodding, we learned that the man . . . drank. Shocking. "Please don't ever mention it to a soul," said the woman.
The man and his wife live in New York. Soon they'll know about A.A. Another acquaintance had left her husband, or vice versa. This year their summer home
was vacant. The wife was in a sanitorium because "she had been drinking too much."
That
woman has now received A.A. literature. Thinking a little pioneer work wouldn't be amiss, we invited to tea a dozen men and women, some natives, some summer residents.
Some of the natives looked at us wonderingly after that tea. But not the summer residents. On the beach we were besieged with questions about A.A. No longer is
this isolated village ignorant on the subject of alcoholism.

MT. VERNON INTER Group CIRCUITING . . . The closed meetings we are now holding every Thursday will, we hope, prove helpful. In the Yonkers, Bronxville and Mt.
Vernon sections 3 closed meetings are held each week. Next month we're going to have a picnic for our members and their families. The soft-ball men are out every night
for practice. A new series of Inter-Group meetings was inaugurated at Mt. Vernon
in August. We were host to New Rochelle, While Plains and Greenwich.

NASSAU-SUFFOLK SENDS THANKS . . . As a group We extend to J. M. and T. K. our sincere thanks and congratulations for the excellent talk on A.A. given at the Garden City Rotary Club, August 7th, 1944.

NEW ROCHELLE THINKS OF THE RETURNING SOLDIER . . . In September we plan to include in our program one closed meeting a week. Ways of aiding men and women returning from our armed services will be discussed. The accent will be, of course, on the alcoholics among them. In the meantime, each member is to acquaint at least one potential prospect with the benefits of A.A. . . . Aside from the exchange meetings with the other 3 southern Westchester County groups (Greenwich, Mt. Vernon, White Plains), we are looking forward to interchange meetings with the Brooklyn Group in September . . . Bowling teams will soon be exchanging matches . . . Sept. 10th we'll be joint-picnicking with Mt. Vernon and White Plains... Our meeting night is Sunday, 7:30, at the Y.M.C.A. Building, 185 Division Street, New Rochelle--a short walk from the New Haven R. R. station.

NORTH JERSEY MEASURES FOB V-DAYING DRUNKS . . . On V-Day all members of the North Jersey Groups will rush to the Community House in South Orange for a dry but hilarious celebration. The entire building has been engaged for that date. There'll be coffee and cokes and food galore. A practical, preventive measure. Everybody welcome. As a result of persistent plugging by A.A.s, the Newark City Hospital alcoholic wards, male and female, are now open to the organization. Meetings are conducted there 4 evenings a week: Mondays, Montclair Group; Tuesdays, Newark; Wednesdays, East Orange; Thursdays, Irvington. The State Hospital at Greystone Park permits patients to attend A.A. meetings under escort at Morristown. At Essex County's Overbrook Hospital, A.A. meetings are held every Monday night. Dr. Reynolds of the Bonnie Burns Sanitorium in Scotch Plains, N. J., has been approached with the idea of opening an A.A. group in the sanitorium. The South Orange and North

By Daniel M. O'Connell

That the spirit and practice of Alcoholics Anonymous offer a fertile field of Catholic Action to Catholic laymen and women has been the consensus of the letters received in response to two articles of mine on this subject in America (December 6, February 14). Perhaps the most interesting question raised came from an outstandingly zealous member of our clergy. He is pastor of a large parish in a metropolitan city. He tells me that he knows some of the leaders in Alcoholics Anonymous in his city of over a million inhabitants, and has made a study of their work and accomplishments. He inclines to the theory that Alcoholics Anonymous are "particularly interested in the rich and those who have good jobs and who have fallen by the wayside of temperance."

Convinced of the good that can be done by Alcoholics Anonymous, I trust that this observation of my worthy confrere is not countrywide. For men of good will, for Catholics with zeal among them, I can see no reason why Alcoholics Anonymous should be limited to economic royalists; why these A.A.'s could not and should not work for temperance among the less well-to-do. Of course the organization could confine its efforts, if it wished, to the financial upper third of our citizens, and be praised for its good deeds in this limited scope.

But I can find nothing in the literature of Alcoholics Anonymous which even hints at their zeal for promoting temperance being restrained to the well to do. If their field of activity, unfortunately, has been thus narrowed in particular places, it is, I believe, accidental, and can be matched by their work among the two percenters, the $15 a week people. As for those who average less than fifteen dollars a week in salary and are perhaps in the worse need of ministrations for alcoholism, I grant that there is greater difficulty, even for a follower of the Good Shepherd, in caring for them. No greater difficulty, however, than has been overcome by members of the St. Vincent de Paul Societies in their ministrations for a number of generations, or by a "Brother" Dutton among lepers or a Saint Peter Claver in his ministrations to afflicted slaves.

In fact, here is a challenge to Catholic members of Alcoholics Anonymous; make your work thus distinctive, as is that of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, by dealing principally, or in a fifty-fifty proportion, among the poorer of alcohol's victims.

A Catholic lay member of Alcoholics Anonymous recently wrote to me in zealous words concerning his five years of work in the organization. His silence on the subject of any discrimination against or neglect of persons in the lower brackets of taxpayers gives encouragement to the hope that they are not excluded. I quote him:

"I agree with a prominent priest who is familiar with the results of this organization that Alcoholics Anonymous can be the greatest living force in the Church for abstinence, if properly guided. Its basic principles are sound, practical Catholicism, and it has been the means of bringing back many fallen away Catholics."

"If properly guided" surely embraces "the poor you always have with you" in this all-out commendation. Accordingly I would stress this point at the moment to him and his Catholic fellows that if the movement is "properly guided" by "basic principles of Catholicism" it will not exclude but, on the contrary, seek out the begger as well as Dives.

Another principle for Catholic workers among the Alcoholics Anonymous ever to hold fast is the old one in the Catholic Total Abstinence Union and similar organizations among Catholics, viz., the complete return of the alcoholic to the practice of the Faith. This is fortunately stated by my correspondent in his testimony that it has been the means of bringing back many fallen away Catholics."

Alcoholics Anonymous have accomplished a striking amount of good. For it they deserve praise and encouragement. The first serious objection to them was that they were tinged with a streak of agnosticism. Without doubt that has been disclaimed in theory and disproved in practice. If the second objection were valid -namely, that their efforts were only for the wealthy - the A.A. would limit their good work.

In the hope that these two reflections on the A.A.'s are not essential to their principles, I have perused carefully their latest bit of literature to reach me. It is a pamphlet published by the Cleveland branch of the A.A.'s, entitled A Way of Life, and republished from articles by Elrick B. Davis in the Cleveland Plain Dealer. The brochure is published at P.O. Box 1638, Station C, Cleveland, Ohio, but there is the request that non-Clevelanders write for information, etc., to The Alcoholic Foundation, Box 658, Church Street Annex Post Office, New York City. I mention this address, as I have received several requests for it.

At the end of the pamphlet, Twelve Essential Steps Leading to a New Way of Life are printed in prominent type. Seven of these refer to "I a Power greater than ourselves," "to the care of God as we understood Him," "Admitted (confessed) to God," "ready to have God remove these defects of character," "humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings," "sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out," "having had a spiritual experience as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs."

The expressions at times are not those of carefully defined Catholic theological propositions but an ordinary well instructed layman should have no difficulty in translating the Catholic sense into catechetical language. A Christian could sum them up in Saint Paul's words: "By the grace of God I am what I am." The practices advocated are charitable; one member reported that he "made a list of all persons he had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all." And "made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others."

But are the A.A.'s exclusive? Do they shun the poor? A statistical reply is difficult. Certainly their general set-up is not such. The A.A.'s rather boast that there is no graft in their organization, no chance for any "muscling-in," no money-making in it. The members pay no dues. It pays no staff. Its meetings are informal; its parties are "Dutch" treats. It makes the statement that hospitalization, the usual first step to a cure, must be paid by the patient either directly or through his family or an advance from his employer or credit from his friends. I can see a difficulty here for a poor patient. It is not insoluble, as arrangements can be made for payments or credit through any Catholic hospital.

At its worst, though, granting that the A.A.'s in the past, through accident I should hope, have confined, their praiseworthy efforts to the class of Dives, rather than to that of the beggar at his table, there is open to the Catholic A.A.'s a distinct field of zeal for Catholic Action. I am sure Catholic A.A.'s will agree with me that they would seek a supernatural as well as a natural reward for their strenuous, self-denying labors. The former, they know, is greater when it is had from doing good to the least of Christ's brethren.

From the pamphlet of the A.A.'s mentioned above, I find the following respectful use of Scripture: "Did you ever hear 'Freely ye have received, freely give?'" To it may I add another question.

Did you ever hear "As long as you did it to the least of My brethren"?

Very similarly to the series of tornadoes which recently roared through six Southern and Midwestern States, alcoholism leaves untold wreckage behind it. In both cases the poor suffer the most. In alleviating misery resulting from "acts of God," American charity knows no distinction between Jew and Gentile, white and black, rich and poor. So when the work of a comparatively new organization, for the rehabilitation of human wrecks due to the abuse of alcohol became known to the American public, especially through the splendid article of Jack Alexander in the Saturday Evening Post, our newspapers and magazines were most generous in their praise and encouragement of the movement. They surely could not envision the poor being excluded from such relief work.

For one, I am at least naive enough to believe that the A.A.'s do not exclude deliberately the least of Christ's brethren. As a young organization, perhaps its forces have not been sufficiently consolidated; its numbers not large enough to open up a new offensive. But its amazing victories to date arouse the hope that it will in due time extend its ministrations wherever possible

Whether this let-down period between first getting truly sober and getting yourself adjusted to life and living. Work like a beaver with an extra spurt of effort in, for and with A.A. That's the solution. I am sure of it. I had to write this because I'm so grateful again to A.A. for seeing me through these "growing pains."

Felicia G.

-----
October 1944

MARTY INTERVIEWED ON COMMITTEE

A new Committee has been formed. It's to be nationwide in scope. Although it's not an A.A. baby, it's to have a lot to do with A.A. The name of it is The National Committee for Education on Alcoholism, and its executive director is Marty Mann, one of our leading A.A.s in the New York Group, and one of our finest speakers. Marty plans to go all over the country lecturing on alcoholism, and more than this she hopes to help get local committees started wherever she goes. These local committees in turn will educate their communities on the problem of the alcoholic, and teach the whole public, throughout the country, what we in A.A. already know. That alcoholism is a disease, and a public health problem. That the alcoholic needs to be brought out in the open and helped, not hidden away in shame.

As you see by this article, Marty has shed her anonymity. She talked it over with a great many other A.A.s, and they all felt that in view of this larger non-alcoholic field she was entering, she'd have to.

As Marty said in an interview with us yesterday: "I'm going to lecture to non-alcoholics about alcoholism. I could be much more convincing, and give them much more understanding, by speaking as an alcoholic from the inside and they would be much more likely to listen and believe. That left me with two choices. To say that I was an alcoholic and had recovered, period. And not mention A.A. Or to give A.A. full credit for my recovery and break the anonymity rule. I couldn't conceive of not publicly giving A.A. all the credit."

We then started to ask Marty questions. Our first question as an A.A. was: "How much has A.A. got to do with all this?"

Marty answered that this way: "In the five and a half years I've been in A.A., I know that a lot of us have wondered and worried about this idea of general education of the public, that goes beyond A.A.'s specific job. "I'll talk about myself for a minute, and that'll show what I mean. In the last five years of my drinking, before I came into A.A., I didn't know what was wrong with me. And neither did anyone else. No one knew what had happened to me, why the quality of my drinking had changed. I thought I was having a nervous breakdown, and that that was making me drink too much. I didn't know what an alcoholic was. I didn't find out until I came into A.A. And all of us A.A.s have found the same thing, over and over: that people, on the whole, still don't know anything about alcoholism. Although A.A. has been in existence ten years, and although many authorities on this subject, including doctors, have told me we've done the best education job of all to date, still our first job isn't education of the public. It's work with individual alcoholics.

For a long time, I've felt the way lots of us older members feel. Namely, that there was a need for a wider program of education. To teach not only individuals, who've hit bottom and come to us in desperation—but to teach everybody in the whole country that this is not a moral issue, but a health problem. By the way, it's Public Health Problem No. 4. Did you know that?"

"Yes," we said, "But it's true that most people don't. Tell us how you got into all this." "An old friend of mine deserves the credit for that," Marty said. "Grace Bangs. She's director of the Club Service Bureau of the Herald-Tribune, That means she has one of the top jobs dealing with clubwomen all over the country. Some time ago I ran into her, and she hadn't seen me, since my drinking days. She didn't recognize me. I told her about A.A. and what had happened to me. She asked me and several of us to help her with a relative of hers, a young man. Well, he's just, not ready for us yet. But she was terribly impressed with A.A. She felt that more people ought to know about it. She felt they ought to know about alcoholism as a disease. She said, 'Marty, there are lots of women all over the country, mothers who've unwittingly helped make their children alcoholics, who invariably did all the wrong things about them, and who don't know what to do for them now. Wives who don't know what to do about their husbands. Even women alcoholics themselves, who are often harder to reach than men, because they feel guiltier than the men do. Now can't you do something for them? Can't you think of some way to reach these women? I'll back you up and help you any way I can.' She kept after me, and finally I worked out a plan, based on going out and speaking to organized women's groups all over the country."

Ques. "What did you do then?"

Ans.. "Well, we knew we needed scientific backing. We went to Dr. Jellinek. A lot of you know who he is: Director of the Section on Alcohol Studies at Yale University. Now I want to stop and explain a little. Doctor Haggard is director of the Laboratory of Applied Physiology at Yale. For years he's been studying the physiological problems of alcohol. He realized that was only part of the picture, and he started Dr. Jellinek's department to go into all phases of the problem. What interests us A.A.s as much as anything they're doing are the Yale Plan Clinics. Because these clinics are working on alcoholism in the individual. And they're also sending a lot of new A.A.s to their nearby groups. "Now to go back to Dr. Jellinek. He read the plan. He seemed to like it. He said he thought it would work. He said that educating the country on alcoholism is the next step. All the research that's been done, all that Yale is doing, all that A.A. is doing, adds up to this: now there are plenty of real facts to tell people. Perhaps most valuable of all these, from the human point of view, is A.A. For A.A. has proved that great numbers of alcoholics can get well.

"When we started talking about the National Committee, we discovered that interest was more widespread than we had dared to hope. Grace Bangs found it very easy to form her Women's Organizing Committee — many women, each one important in her field, were immediately interested. When we formed the Advisory Board, it went the same way. And I found an A.A. in the New York Group, Marian M., to be my secretary.

Ques. "Can you tell us now, exactly what your job is, what the Committee's job is, and what A.A.s can do in all this?"

Ans. "My first job is to lecture on alcoholism in general. I'll try to arouse enough interest so that people will want to form a local committee. This committee should include representatives of all groups who have to struggle with this problem. People like doctors, ministers, social workers, magistrates, and above all, A.A.s."

Ques. "What is this local committee going to do?"

Ans. "It's going to carry on the work of education. We'll do everything to help them. (By we I mean the National Committee.) We'll give them plenty of literature, and it will cover every phase of alcoholism. That includes our A.A., pamphlets. When they're ready, we'll help them set up an information center or a clinic."

Ques. "How are you going to do that?"

Ans. "We'll train anyone this local committee selects to run their information center. They'll go to the Yale Clinics for this training. If they want to set up a clinic, we'll send an expert organizer to help them."

Ques. "But how are you going to get your speaking engagements in the first place?"

Ans. "Grace Bangs and her Women's Committee will handle most of that."

Ques. "Why, Marty, what about us A.A.s helping? I should think that a special open meeting would be just the place. We ask all the people you mentioned to our big open meetings anyway. I should think that any A.A. group that has open meetings, and is interested in this idea, would be a natural — I mean a starting point for a local committee."

Ans. "There's no reason why they shouldn't be. It's my hope that they will,

recently.

The masculine element predominates. "More women," says Joe. "We need more women at our meetings." Meeting night is Wednesday at 8:15. Beginning October 4th, our meetings will be at 2500 Marion Avenue, Bronx, just off East Fordham Rd. The building is a school, with an auditorium for big get-togethers and kitchen facilities available for parties. . . . Ed T., the Manhattan member who assisted at the opening meeting, was erroneously reported as having joined the Bronx Group.

BROOKLYN CLOSED MEETINGS GROWING . . . Because of constantly increasing membership, our Wednesday closed meetings are now held at the Hotel St. George, 51 Clark Street, Brooklyn--same place as the Friday open meetings. Hour: 8:30 P.M. . . . Our Group exchanges visits with New Rochelle the first week in October. . . . Mail address; G.P.O., Box 91, Brooklyn, N. Y.

EAST ORANGE INVITES CIRCUITING . . . The meeting room at 507 Main Street is henceforth unavailable every second Wednesday. Therefore, on those Wednesdays, we shall be glad to send speakers to other New Jersey groups.. . . THE KEARNEY GROUP will in future conduct its meetings at the Odd Fellows Hall, 30-32 Beech Street, Arlington, N. J.

FLUSHING RESUMES CLOSED SESSIONS . . . At a recent business meeting it was decided to resume closed meetings, to be held on the second second Friday of each month at the Good Citizens League, corner of Union Street and Sanford Avenue, Flushing, L. I . . . .
. Nowadays all Flushing meetings close at 10 P.M. sharp so that visitors desiring to leave early may do so. Those wishing to remain for coffee are always welcome.

.
..

Many members attended the funeral of Tom C., who died recently.

FOREST HILLS MEMBER CELEBRATES 2ND YEAR IN A.A. . . . Mel C. was chairman of the September 18th meeting. On that date he was two years old--according to the A.A. calendar. . . . Closed meetings, heretofore held at the Forest Hills Inn, are now taking place at the various members' homes. . . . The Thursday A.A. meetings at Creedmore State Hospital, instituted by Earl S., are having an increasingly large attendance.

MANHATTAN MEMBER 12TH-STEPS ON CORNER . . . John B. can be found every Sunday around noon at the corner of 207th Street and Broadway. Hard by are several gin mills. In his own words, John was for years "one of the worst rummies" of that 95 per cent Irish district. He knows everybody, everybody knows him and that he is now sober because he is in A.A. John stands and waits. He never approaches any of the jittery men waiting for the bars to open at I P.M. He waits for them to come to him. They do. Many of them. Result: John gets all the 12th-step work he can handle--right there on that corner. . . . Jack N., listed on the Y.M.C.A. bulletin board as "John Doe," recently spoke before a large audience at Sloane House on West 34th Street. The subject of his lecture was A.A. . . . The hurricane that hit Manhattan September 14th flooded home early those dauntless members who had come to the West 24th Street clubhouse for the Thursday closed meeting.

MOUNT VERNON SLIGHTLY BRUISED . . . The soft ball game for the championship of Westchester County was won by us. There were lame backs and sore arms--but no hangovers. Our first annual picnic a few Sundays ago was a terrific success. Not so long ago none of us would have believed it was possible to have that much fun sober.

NASSAU-SUFFOLK HAS WEDDING . . . The night following the "big wind," undaunted by blocked roads, fallen wires, no lights, etc., 21 showed up at the open Friday meeting--at 177 Jackson Street, Hempstead, L. I. . . . We had a recent A.A. wedding. Isabel is the bride and Hurry D. the groom.

NEWARK AND ENVIRONS AID SERVICE MEN . . . The proceeds from the Irvington Group dance held at the Service Men's Club, October 1st, were turned over to the service men-- whose plan it is to buy the building and convert it into a combination clubhouse and hospital. Ted F. and Elmer K., in charge of the dance arrangements, did a bang up job of it. . . . The Elizabeth Group moved on October 1st to larger quarters at the Masonic Hall in Elizabeth. . . . Tom M. and Captain John Stephans, the latter a member of the Elizabeth police force, are working with the authorities of several New Jersey hospitals to receive permission for A.A. to send alcoholics into the hospitals. It's a job that necessitates a lot of talk with persuasive power behind it.

NEW ROCHELLE PLANS MORE SOLDIER AID . . . Our Group, which branched off from Mount Vernon, is now over three months old and growing constantly. Meetings are held every Sunday at 7:45 P.M., at the Y.M.C.A., 185 Division Street. Plans to aid the alcoholics among the returning military forces are going forward.

NORTH JERSEY CONSIDERS BIG CLUBHOUSE . . . We are strongly considering the purchase of the Roseville Athletic Association clubhouse, 7th Street and 7th Avenue, Newark, as general headquarters for all Jerseyites. The four-story building, where we have been holding our meetings for three years, is equipped with bowling alleys, billiard tables and what-have-you. The main room seats 400. If this deal goes through, we'll be settled--and very comfortably--for years to come.

WHITE PLAINS BRAVES HURRICANE . . . The second Westchester-Greenwich Inter-Group

thumbed over a pamphlet enumerating the 12 steps. I had read over the 12 steps many times, and had marveled at their economy of means, their adherence to essentials. But suddenly I saw their higher and wider significance.

Those 12 steps really are a masterful abridgment of the only possible ultimate international peace program. It has often been said the highest and clearest truth is given men only when they are at the brink of an abyss of final despair. The splendid truth given to a half-crazed drunk who fell to his knees and asked God for light may some day deliver all mankind from chaos just as it delivered him. The mustard seed may become the tree.

Just as this truth came to one man only when long and acute suffering had made him ready to receive it, so it may come to nations of men when all are crazed with suffering to a point of such mad confusion that statesmen will fall on their knees and beg a forgotten God for light toward a true peace.

Let me set down the 12 steps of the Alcoholics Anonymous program of recovery, asking that you substitute the word materialism for the word alcohol in considering the 1st. step, and the word materialists for the word alcoholics in pondering the 12th.

Also, remember that drunks meet in the Alcoholics Anonymous groups to help one another. They remodel their lives cooperatively. They could not do it alone. Note that the word we is used and not the word I in the steps:

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. We came to believe that a power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. We made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. We admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. We were entirely ready to have God remove these defects of -character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. We made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. We made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.

understanding which is indescribably wonderful. We are like the passengers of a great liner the moment after rescue from shipwreck, when camaraderie, joyousness and democracy pervade the vessel from steerage to captain's table.

Highly competent psychiatrists have sometimes found it impossible to persuade an alcoholic to discuss his situation without reserve. Strangely enough, we are usually more unapproachable to wives, parents and intimate friends than to doctors.

But the ex-alcoholic who has found our solution, who is properly armed with facts about himself, can generally win the entire confidence of another alcoholic in a few hours. Until such an understanding is reached, little or nothing can be accomplished.

That the man who is making the approach has had the same difficulty, that he obviously knows what he is talking about, that his whole deportment shouts at the new prospect that he is a man with a real answer, that he has no attitude of holier than thou, nothing whatever except the sincere desire to be helpful; that there are no fees to pay, no axes to grind, no people to please, no lectures to be endured - these are the conditions we found most effective.

Moderate drinkers have little trouble in giving up liquor entirely if they have a good reason. They can take it or leave it alone.

Then we have a certain type of hard drinker. He may have the habit badly enough to gradually impair him physically and mentally. It may cause him to die a few years before his time. If a sufficiently strong reason - ill health, falling in love, change of environment, or the warning of a doctor - becomes operative, this man can also stop or moderate, although he may find it difficult or troublesome and may even need medical attention.

But what about the real alcoholic? He may start off as a moderate drinker; he may or may not become a continuous hard drinker; but at some stage of his drinking career he begins to lose all control of his liquor consumption, once he starts to drink.

Here is the fellow who has been puzzling you, especially in his lack of control. He does absurd, incredible, tragic things while drinking. He is a real Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. He is seldom mildly intoxicated. He is always more or less insanely drunk. His disposition while drinking resembles his normal nature but little. He may be one of the finest fellows in the world. Yet let him drink for a day, and he frequently becomes disgustingly, and even dangerously, antisocial. He has a positive genius for getting tight at exactly the wrong moment, particularly when some important decision must be made or engagement kept. He is often perfectly sensibly and well balanced concerning everything except liquor, but in that respect is incredibly dishonest and selfish. He often possesses special abilities, skills, and aptitudes, and has a promising career ahead of him. He uses his gifts to build up a bright outlook for his family and himself, then pulls the structure down on his head by a senseless series of sprees. He is the fellow who goes to bed so intoxicated he ought to sleep the clock around. Yet, early next morning he searches madly for the bottle he misplaced the night before. If he can afford it, he may have liquor concealed all over his house to be certain no one gets his entire supply from him. As matters grow worse, he begins to use a combination of high-powered sedative and liquor to quiet his nerves so he can get to work. Then comes the day when he simply cannot make it and gets drunk all over again. Perhaps he goes to a doctor, who gives him morphine or some sedative with which to taper off. Then he begins to appear at hospitals and sanitariums.

The idea that somehow, some day he will control and enjoy his liquor drinking is the great obsession of every abnormal drinker. The persistence of this illusion is astonishing. Many pursue it through the gates of insanity and death.

We of Alcoholics Anonymous have learned that we had to fully concede to our innermost selves that we were alcoholics. This is the first step in recovery: the delusion that we are like other people has to be smashed.

We alcoholics are men and women who have lost the ability to control our drinking. We know that no real drinking ever recovered control. All of us felt at times that we were regaining control, but such intervals, usually brief, were inevitably followed by still less control, which led in time to pitiful and incomprehensible demoralization. We are convinced to a man that alcoholics of our type are in the grip of a progressive illness. Over any considerable period we get worse, never better.

We are like men who have lost their legs; they never grow new ones. Neither does there appear to be any treatment which will make alcoholics of our kind become like other men. We have tried every imaginable remedy. In some instances there have been brief recovery, followed always by still worse relapse. Physicians who are familiar with alcoholism agree there is no such thing as making a normal drinker out of an alcoholic. Science may one day accomplish this, but it has not done so yet.

Despite all we can say, many who are real alcoholics are not going to believe they are in that class. By every form of self-deception and experimentation, they will try to prove themselves exceptions to the rule, therefore non-alcoholic. If anyone who is showing inability to control his drinking can do the right-about-face and drink like a gentleman, our hats are off to him. Heaven knows, we have tried hard enough and long enough to drink like other people!

Here are some of the methods we have tried: drinking beer only, limiting the number of drinks, never drinking alone, never drinking in the morning, drinking only at home, never having it in the house, never drinking during business hours, drinking only at parties, drinking only natural wines, agreeing to resign if ever drunk on the job, taking a trip, not taking a trip, swearing off forever (with and without solemn oath), taking more physical exercise, reading inspirational books, going to health farms and sanitariums, accepting voluntary commitment to asylums - we could increase the list ad infinitum.

For one who is unable to drink moderately, the question is how to stop altogether - assuming, of course, he desires to stop. Whether such a person can quit on a nonspiritual basis, depends upon the extent to which he has already lost the power to choose whether he will drink or not. Many of us felt that we had plenty of character. There was a tremendous urge to cease forever. Yet we found it impossible. This is the baffling feature of alcoholism as we know it: this utter inability to leave it alone, no matter how great the necessity or the wish.

But there was always the curious mental phenomenon that parallel with our sound reasoning there inevitably ran some insanely trivial excuse for taking that first drink. Our sound reasoning failed to hold us in check. The insane idea won out. The next day we would ask ourselves, in all earnestness and sincerity, how it could have happened.

In some circumstances we have gone out deliberately to get drunk, feeling ourselves justified by nervousness, anger, worry, depression, jealousy or the like. But even in this type of beginning we are obliged to admit that our justification for a spree was insanely insufficient in the light of what always happened. We now see that when we began to drink deliberately, instead of casually, there was little serious or effective thought during the period of premeditation of what the terrific consequences might be.

Our behavior is as absurd and incomprehensible with respect to the first drink, as that of an individual with a passion, say, for jaywalking. He gets a thrill out of skipping in front of fast moving vehicles. He enjoys himself a few years in spite of friendly warnings. Up to this point you would label him as a foolish chap having queer ideas of fun. Luck then deserts him and he is slightly injured several times in succession. You would expect him, if he were normal, to cut it out. Presently he is hit again and this time gets a fractured skull. Within a week after leaving the hospital a fast-moving trolley car breaks his arm. He tells you he has decided to stop jaywalking for good, but in a few weeks he breaks both legs.

On through the years this conduct continues, accompanied by his continual promises to be careful or to keep off the streets altogether. Finally he can no longer work, his wife gets a divorce, he is held up to ridicule. He tries every known means to get the jaywalking idea out of his head. He shuts himself up in an asylum, hoping to mend his ways. But the day he comes out he races in front of a fire engine, which breaks his back. Such a man would be crazy, wouldn't he?

You may think our illustration is too ridiculous. But is it? We, who have been through the ringer, must admit that, if we substituted alcoholism for jaywalking, the illustration would fit us exactly. However intelligent we may have been in other respects, where alcohol has been involved, we have been strangely insane. This is strong language; but isn't it true?

Some of you are thinking: "Yes, what you tell us is true, but it doesn't fully apply. We admit we have some of these symptoms, but we have not gone to the extremes you fellows did, nor are we likely to, for we understand ourselves so well after what you have told us that such things cannot happen again. We have not lost everything in life through drinking and we certainly do not intend to. "

That may be true of certain nonalcoholics who, though drinking foolishly and heavily at present, are able to stop or moderate, because their brains and bodies have not been damaged as ours were. But the actual or potential alcoholic, with hardly an exception, will be absolutely unable to stop drinking on the basis of self-knowledge. This is a point we wish to emphasize and re-emphasize, to smash home upon our alcoholic readers as it has been revealed to us out of bitter experience. Let us take another illustration.

Fred is a partner in a well-known accounting firm. His income is good, he has a fine home, is happily married and the father of promising children of college age. He has so attractive a personality that he makes friends with everyone. If ever there was a successful business man, it is Fred. To all appearances he is a stable, well-balanced individual. Yet, he is an alcoholic. We first saw Fred about a year ago in a hospital where he had gone to recover from a bad case of jitters. It was his first experience of this kind, and he was much ashamed of it. Far from admitting he was an alcoholic, he told himself he came to the hospital to rest his nerves. The doctor intimated strongly that he might be worse than he realized. For a few days he was depressed about his condition. He made up his mind to quit drinking altogether. It never occurred to him that perhaps he could not do so, in spite of his character and standing. Fred would not believe himself an alcoholic, much less accept a spiritual remedy for his problem. We told him what we knew about alcoholism. He was interested, and conceded that he had some of the symptoms, but he was a long way from admitting that he could do nothing about it himself. He was positive that this humiliating experience, plus the knowledge he had acquired, would keep him sober the rest of his life. Self-knowledge would fix it.

We heard no more of Fred for a while. One day we were told that he was back in the hospital. This time he was quite shaky. He soon indicated he was anxious to see us. The story he told us is most instructive for here was a chap absolutely convinced he had to stop drinking, who had no excuse for drinking, and who exhibited splendid judgement and determination in all his other concerns, yet he was flat on his back.

Let him tell you about it: "I was much impressed with what you fellows had to say about alcoholism, but I frankly did not believe it would be possible for me to drink again. I somewhat appreciated your ideas about the subtle insanity which precedes the first drink, but I was confident it could not happen to me after what I had learned. I reasoned I was not so far advanced as most of you fellows, that I had been usually successful in licking my other personal problems, that I would therefore be successful where you men had failed. I felt I had every right to be self-confident, that it would be only a matter of exercising my will power and keeping on guard.

"In this frame of mind, I went about my business and for a time all was well. I had no trouble refusing drinks, and began to wonder if I had not been making too hard work of a simple matter. One day I went to Washington to present some accounting evidence to a government bureau. I had been out of town before this particular dry spell, so there was nothing new about that. Physically, I felt excellent. Neither did I have any pressing problems or worries. My business came off well, I was pleased and knew my partners would be, too.

"I went to my hotel and leisurely dressed for dinner. As I crossed the threshold of the dining room, the thought came to mind it would be nice to have a couple of cocktails with dinner. That was all. Nothing more. I ordered a cocktail and my meal. Then I ordered another cocktail. After dinner I decided to take a walk. When I returned to the hotel it struck me that a highball would be fine before going to bed, so I stepped into the bar and had one. I remember having several more that night and plenty the next morning. I have a shadowy recollection of being in an airplane bound for New York, of finding a friendly taxicab driver at the landing field instead of my wife. The driver escorted me about for several days. I know little of where I went, or what I said and did. Then came the hospital with unbearable mental and physical suffering.

"As soon as I regained my ability to think, I went carefully over that evening in Washington. Not only had I been off guard, but I had made no fight whatever against that first drink. This time I had not thought of the consequences at all. I had commenced to drink as carelessly as though the cocktails were ginger ale. I now remember what my alcoholic friends had told me, how they prophesied that if I had an alcoholic mind, the time and place would come: I would drink again. They had said that though I did raise a defense, it would one day give way before some trivial reason for having a drink. Well, just that did happen, and more. What I had learned of alcoholism did not occur to me at all. I knew from that moment that I had an alcoholic mind. I saw that will power and self-knowledge would not help in those mental blank spots.

"Two of the members of Alcoholics Anonymous came to see me. They grinned, which I didn't like so much, and then asked me if I thought myself alcoholic and if I were really licked this time. I had to concede both propositions. They piled on me heaps of evidence to the effect that an alcoholic mentality, such as I had exhibited in Washington, was a hopeless condition. They cited cases out of their own experience by the dozen. This process snuffed out the last flicker of conviction that I could do the job myself.

"Then they outlined the spiritual answer and program of action which one hundred of them had followed successfully. Though I had only nominally connected with religion, their propositions were not, intellectually, hard to follow. But the program of action, though entirely sensible, was pretty drastic. It meant I would have to throw several lifelong conceptions out of the window. That was not easy. But the moment I made up my mind to go through with the process, I had the feeling that my alcoholic condition was relieved, as in fact it proved to be.

"Quite as important was the discovery that spiritual principles would solve all my problems. I have since been brought into a way of living infinitely more satisfying and, I hope, more useful than the life I lived before."

Fred's story speaks for itself. We hope it strikes home to thousands like him. He had felt only the first nip of the wringer. Most alcoholics have to be pretty badly mangled before they really begin to solve their problems.

Many doctors and psychiatrists agree with our conclusions. One of these men, staff member of a world-renowned hospital, recently made this statement to some of us, "What you say about the general hopelessness of the average alcoholic's plight is, in my opinion, correct. As to two of you men, whose stories I have heard, there is no doubt in my mind that you were 100% hopeless, apart from divine help. Though not a religious person, I have profound respect for the spiritual approach in such cases as yours. For most cases there is virtually no other solution."

Once more: the alcoholic at certain times has no effective mental defense against the first drink. Except in a few rare cases, neither he nor any other human being can provide such a defense. His defense must come from a higher Power.

|||||

+++Message 1196. . . . . More by or about Felicia Gizycka from the Grapevine
From: NMOlson@aol.com . . . . . 8/7/2003 9:47:00 AM

|||||

Courtesy Tony C., here is another article by Felicia and an article written for the Grapevine by her daughter.

Nancy

December 1945 Grapevine:

No Double Standard In Alcoholism or A.A.

I sat jittering in Bill's office. My psychiatrist had sent me to see Bill.

I had said to her: "Good. I'd like to meet him. Wouldn't it be fun to get him to take a drink?"

She laughed a nice easy laugh. She said, "You couldn't get him to take a drink."

I heard that. It stayed with me. You couldn't get him to take a drink.

So I, the girl who was going to get Bill to take a drink, now sat here, talking to Bill.

He told me a few things, the fundamentals. I heard all of those things, too. Then he made a phone call. He wrote a name and an address on a slip of paper.

"Here is an alcoholic girl, " he said. "Why don't you go and see her? Now?"

I fell for that. I said, "Is she still drinking?"

"No, " he said, "but she will always be an alcoholic just the same. Just as I am; just as you say you are."

I didn't know where I was going, or what to expect. I didn't expect an attractive apartment.

I didn't expect the girl who answered the door — Helen, a friend of Marty's — to be like that. [Note: This may be an attempt at protecting anonymity. The woman was not named "Helen" but "Priscilla." Priscilla was Marty's lesbian partner. Nancy] I was a sight and a mess. She didn't notice it. She talked, to me as though I were an acquaintance who had dropped in. Time passed. Marty came in.

"I spent six months in Bellevue and a year in Blythewood, " she announced. "I used to go to cheap bars on Third Avenue, when my money ran out. If I had no money, I could always 'borrow' drinks from men. "

Marty had sized me up. To another newcomer, she might have talked gently, asking questions. She knew that for me this would be wrong. She talked and talked. She didn't stop. I, who had feared to speak, couldn't get a word in edgewise. I tried a couple of times. No soap. She was a girl with my sort of background. She and Helen both had my tastes and interests (that is, what I still fondly considered my tastes and interests. I really had none but liquor and self abasement).

I sat there and listened. Two women like myself. They were like me. They drank the way I did. Especially Marty. Marty, who like me, had gone to cheap bars. At last, someone else who was as "horrible" as I was. And she was horrible no longer.

I heard every word Marty and Helen said. In that short hour something was lifted from my heart, never to return. Three psychiatrists had failed to do it over a long period of years.

"You are sick," Marty and Helen said. "You are sick, not wicked. See, it is a pattern. You have followed this pattern. We, too, behaved in just this way. It is a pattern and you are not alone. You are not the only woman who has been like this. Thousands and thousands of men and women have been like this. And now they are sober. See, it is an illness, a disease--with symptoms that we all have. Not a private sin that you alone have invented."

And so this is the end of my story and the beginning of it.

For years I thought I was the only one. The only "nice" woman who behaved this way. The worse I felt, the worse I got. One doctor said to me: "Remorse has contained within it the intention to do it again." This was a brilliant and wise saying. But I could not quit being remorseful. I could not stop doing it again, getting drunk again and again. It's a progressive disease. Hut I didn't know that. I just thought I was becoming a worse and worse person. I avoided my "respectable" friends more and more. My "unrespectable" friends, with whom I had cast my lot (in order to drink all I wanted to in company)â€"even these friends criticized me more and more. They, who had thought at first that I was such fun, now avoided me. They told me not to come around when I was drinking. And I was always drinking.

I, who, like most neurotics, had a high ideal, an unattainable ideal of the person I should be, now found myself unwanted everywhere. I, who had meant to be the wittiest, the prettiest, the most desirable of women. The woman whom everybody would he just crazy to have around. (You note here that I wanted to be liked and loved, but didn't want to like or love anybody in return. )

I was now reduced to going to a cheap bar for my social life, I happen to have a small income. I never cadged drinks from strangers because I didn't have to. I never was robbed, assaulted, beaten up. But I might have been. The difference between the "protected" woman alcoholic (even the woman who drinks secretly in her room and never goes out) and the panhandler on the Bowery is economic. Are you shocked? But this is so. A drunk, man or woman, will do anything to get a drink. Anythingâ€"eventually. Perhaps the men, more than the women, know that this is true.

I didn't hit the gutter economically, but in spirit I was there. I spent every night in that cheap bar. I was able to drink there "safely" but I was despised by everyone.

Lots of people think that anything goes in a gin mill, that you can get as drunk as you like and behave any way you like. Not so. Women, especially, are expected to behave. A lady lush creates disturbances. Men are bound to want to pick her up. If she doesn't want to be annoyed, as the saying goes, the bartender has to protect her. If, on the other hand, she encourages advances from men, there may be trouble with the police.

The little bar I frequented was what is known as a family bar. There was a little group that dropped in regularly. They were as gossipy and moralistic as a country club set. They were not alcoholics.

So I, who planned to be the most beautiful, witty, charming and sought-after woman in all New York, was spending my evenings annoying the customers in a gin mill. The customers moved their barstools when they saw me coming.

But this place was my last refuge. Here was the last spot on earth to search for "It." The joy of living. Fulfillment. I called it pleasure. I went there every night looking for pleasure, the pink balloon. Something sick and hungry in me set up an inquiry for this elusive thing. "I will drink, and It will come," I said. "This thing I have never had, and never found anywhere in all my life. A few drinks, and I'll get it." But during the disappointment of those first drinks, I knew I didn't have It. This was a boring gin mill. Sordid. What could I find here? And I would drink more to overcome this terrible emptiness. I did not know that the lack was in myself. That joy, fulfillment, pleasure and love were chronically absent from me; that all the pleasure I had from my drinking was anticipatory.

I was so sick mentally, now, that I was afraid to drink alone. I was going toward my death, and somehow I knew this. I stayed in that bar till it closed.

"Remorse has contained within It the intention to do it again. "

Yes, Every morning (or afternoon) I'd swear never to do It again. I must stop, I'd say. I must taper off. I must swear off. It was not only the hangovers that bothered me, I did not have the ordinary remorse of someone who has merely gotten drunk. It was as though I had some inner skin disease, something awful and sore, eating away at the fabric of myself. And then, at night, this fabric would reverse itself into the bright, joyful excitement, the anticipation. I would think, I'm going to the bar tonight. I'm going to get drunk. Not too drunk. Just enough.

This is a common experience. In A.A. you hear this story told over and over. But I know how all the women in the world feel who have had, and are having this grief and misery; and shame and guilt. More and more women are coming into A.A. But there are still countless women who are afraid to come. They are afraid to admit they need help. Sometimes they won't admit it to themselves. They have applied the double standard to themselves. They think that they are worse than men.

And they do not know that they are just sick people who need help. A woman who has TB doesn't think she is worse than a man who has TB. It's the same thing.

Many people all over this country, indeed all over the world, still think the same way. They think all drunks are a disgrace. They think women are doubly disgraceful. But now, at last, through the press, through the more widespread knowledge of A.A. and of alcoholism generally, these old witcheries and taboos are breaking down.

More and more people are understanding that alcoholism is a disease; that the alcoholic, whether man or woman, can be helped and is worth helping.

And as for me, who felt so terrible, I now feel wonderful. I am getting well as a person. I, who did not believe in anything except myself, and who cared for no one but myself — I think that, a Higher Power must have sent my psychiatrist to hear Bill talk just at that time. It was around the time that my last chance was at hand. I was very near death. And I, who was going to get Bill to take a drink, I have learned what the word humility means. I have learned what the words love and understanding mean. I have a long way to go, but A.A. is like that. You keep going. You never stop. A.A. is a constant restatement of a few simple things that we must all have if we are to keep sober, to be happy or to live at all.

— Felicia G., Manhattan

---

The Children Say What AA Means To Them

I Hate to Think Where Mother Would Be . . .

The first time I encountered Mother under the influence of liquor (and I do mean influence), I was rather taken aback by the surprised shock I received at discovering her in such a stew. I had heard vaguely of people getting drunk, but never had I dreamt of my sweet Mother in such disgrace. I soon found this first shock to be only the beginning of the end. After a while, I became shockproof, and my Mother drunk was second nature to me. Without her so, life and the home would have been extremely dull, and out of place. One fine day, Mother announced that never again would she hit the bottle. I laughed up my sleeve at her and said, "Really, Mother, and just where have I heard that before?" But she insisted firmly that I was just to wait and see if she didn't. Well, I waited and I see that she didn't, all right. Ah me! I do hate to think where Mother would be now, had she not discovered A.A. (or A.A. had pioneering. As a result of their talks before local organizations in Montpelier

East Fordhum Road. P. O. Box 19, Morris Heights Sta., Bronx, N. Y.

EAST ORANGE ET AL INVADE VERMONT . . . Ruth and Joe F., and Francis M., of the Morrystown Group, along with Hal R. of East Orange, lately did some New England

A.A.

and

Burlington, Vermont, groups were created in both towns. With continued cooperation of

A.A.ers generally, it is expected that these newly established groups will soon be thriving.

FLUSHING CORRECTS WQXR ... A guest speaker on Charlotte Adams' WQXR program, "The Run of the House," stated that there was no help for alcoholics. Mrs. Frank L., non-alcoholic wife of our member Frank L., immediately wrote to Mrs. Adams, enclosing our A.A. pamphlet and the reprint of nonalcoholic Jack Alexander's excellent Saturday Evening Post article. Over a later broadcast Mrs. Adams very graciously corrected the erroneous impression she had given to her listeners: she read over the air excerpts from Mrs. L.'s clarifying letter. . . . We'll be exchanging meetings with the Patterson Group, Nov. 14th. . . Johnny W. has recovered from his recent appendectomy.

. . . We have three new members--all men.

FOREST HILLS ALSO MOURNS GEORGE T. . . . We, too, greatly feel the loss of George T., who was originally a member of our Group. . . . The Jim Y.'s have a new baby boy. . .

. Charlie S., from Buffalo, now living in Jamaica, N. Y., is one of our newest acquisitions. . . . Mount Vernon conducted a splendid meeting for us in October.

..

. With guests from eight neighboring groups, our Monday night attendance has been between 100-160 . . . in the fountainless "Fountain Room" of the Forest Hills Inn. We begin promptly at 8:30.

MANHATTAN CLUBHOUSE STIRRING . . . We go to press before a report can be given on the last business meeting held at the 24th Street clubhouse in late October. But

at
the previous turbulent meeting in September it was voted that three committees should be formed, participants to be chosen by Chairman Ernest M. On the Club-Searching committee are Dan C., Eugene K., Thomas C., and Jack N. On the Hospital committee are Marty M., Jack N., and Bert T. In the next issue we'll report on their findings.
Astrid L. is in charge of the new entertainment committee which has evolved an already popular program: three nights a week, Monday, Wednesday, Friday, hosts
and hostesses are now at the clubhouse to welcome new and old members alike. Every Saturday is open-house night, with other groups invited to take over whenever they wish--as did the Brooklyn Group so delightfully in October. . . . The Hallowe'en party was tremendously successful, thanks to Astrid L. and her assistants, including
our cooperative custodian, Tom M. It means a lot of extra work for Tom, and we are grateful to him for his excellent assistance. . . . Our hot-trumpet player, best known as "Muggsy," is dedicating at Nick's Greenwich Village nightclub a song entitled "The A.A. Blues." . . . The newly-weds, Mr. and Mrs. Reginald McH.,
and
Henry M., were recent visitors from the Baltimore Group.

MONTCLAIR REORGANIZES . . . Unable to operate effectively without committees,
we
have finally come around to having some. One of the most active, which includes Ed S.
and Harry T., is the entertainment committee. Our hilarious Hallowe'en party was
the first of a series to be given at Thanksgiving, Christmas, the New Year, etc.
We
are also planning to have dances, dinners, and various sorts of entertainment the last
Saturday in every month.... We have a new Secretary--DAVE R.

MOUNT VERNON HAS TWO ADDRESSES . . . Welcome to our Saturday Open House in our new Club Rooms at 4 Fourth Avenue. Cards, checkers and chess in the afternoon and plenty of fun at night. Each week a host and hostess will be delegated to arrange the program for the evening. No chance for the Saturday night gremlins these days.

.
..

We will also hold a closed meeting in the rooms every Thursday at 8:30 P.M. .

.

. But

the open meetings on Monday night continue to be held at the Westchester Women's Club, as before. . . . Secretary Nobby is arranging for one exchange meeting every month.

NEWARK STORY, PAGE 1 ... On that page you will read an account of the new clubhouse recently bought by various members of a number of North Jersey groups. We're so busy with last-minute details that all other news must wait for the next Grapevine issue.

As stated in the article, our Group will continue to hold meetings there.

NORTH JERSEY STORY, PAGE 1 . . . The above applies to us also. In one week's time we formed the corporation, put up a neat sum of cash as option on the clubhouse, and got the deal well under way. It keeps us hopping--those of us members involved in the proceedings. Members of all groups throughout the United States who happen to be visiting in this area are invited to come and see us in our new home.

WHITE PLAINS SALUTE . . . Greetings to The Grapevine and our fellow groups!

We,
in central Westchester, are just muddling happily along in typical A.A. fashion--one slip last week, while two newer members graduated to the speaking stage. So it goes--with one step backward we take at least two forward. . . . The latch-string is out every Wednesday night at the Westchester Republican Headquarters (party affiliation unnecessary), corner of Martine and Mamaroneck Avenues, at 8:30. We heartily welcome all visitors, whether they are of the A.A. variety or interested friends.

INTER GROUP MEETING IN MANHATTAN; Capitol Hotel, 51st Street and 8th Avenue, Walnut Room; every Tuesday evening at 8:30. Room open from 5:30. For all other meeting difficult or troublesome and may even need medical attention.

But what about the real alcoholic? He may start off as a moderate drinker; he may or may not become a continuous hard drinker; but at some stage of his drinking career he begins to lose all control of his liquor consumption, once he starts to drink.

Here is the fellow who has been puzzling you, especially in his lack of control. He does absurd, incredible, tragic things while drinking. He is a real Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. He is seldom mildly intoxicated. He is always more or less insanely drunk. His disposition while drinking resembles his normal nature but little. He may be one of the finest fellows in the world. Yet let him drink for a day, and he frequently becomes disgustingly, and even dangerously, antisocial. He has a positive genius for getting tight at exactly the wrong moment, particularly when some important decision must be made or engagement kept. He is often perfectly sensibly and well balanced concerning everything except liquor, but in that respect is incredibly dishonest and selfish. He often possesses special abilities, skills, and aptitudes, and has a promising career ahead of him. He uses his gifts to build up a bright outlook for his family and himself, then pulls the structure down on his head by a senseless series of sprees. He is the fellow who goes to bed so intoxicated he ought to sleep the clock around. Yet, early next morning he searches madly for the bottle he misplaced the night before. If he can afford it, he may have liquor concealed all over his house to be certain no one gets his entire supply from him. As matters grow worse, he begins to use a combination of high-powered sedative and liquor to quiet his nerves so he can get to work. Then comes the day when he simply cannot make it and gets drunk all over again. Perhaps he goes to a doctor, who gives him morphine or some sedative with which to taper off. Then he begins to appear at hospitals and sanitariums.

The idea that somehow, some day he will control and enjoy his liquor drinking is the great obsession of every abnormal drinker. The persistence of this illusion is astonishing. Many pursue it through the gates of insanity and death.

We of Alcoholics Anonymous have learned that we had to fully concede to our innermost selves that we were alcoholics. This is the first step in recovery: the delusion that we are like other people has to be smashed.

We alcoholics are men and women who have lost the ability to control our drinking. We know that no real drinking ever recovered control. All of us felt at times that we were regaining control, but such intervals, usually brief, were inevitably followed by still less control, which led in time to pitiful and incomprehensible demoralization. We are convinced to a man that alcoholics of our type are in the grip of a progressive illness. Over any considerable period we get worse, never better.

We are like men who have lost their legs; they never grow new ones. Neither does there appear to be any treatment which will make alcoholics of our kind become like other men. We have tried every imaginable remedy. In some instances there have been brief recovery, followed always by still worse relapse. Physicians who are familiar with alcoholism agree there is no such thing as making a normal drinker out of an alcoholic. Science may one day accomplish this, but it has not done so yet.

Despite all we can say, many who are real alcoholics are not going to believe they are in that class. By every form of self-deception and experimentation, they will try to prove themselves exceptions to the rule, therefore non-alcoholic. If anyone who is showing inability to control his drinking can do the right-about-face and drink like a gentleman, our hats are off to him. Heaven knows, we have tried hard enough and long enough to drink like other people!

Here are some of the methods we have tried: drinking beer only, limiting the number of drinks, never drinking alone, never drinking in the morning, drinking only at home, never having it in the house, never drinking during business hours, drinking only at parties, drinking only natural wines, agreeing to resign if ever drunk on the job, taking a trip, not taking a trip, swearing off forever (with and without solemn oath), taking more physical exercise, reading inspirational books, going to health farms and sanitariums, accepting voluntary commitment to asylums - we could increase the list ad infinitum.

For one who is unable to drink moderately, the question is how to stop altogether - assuming, of course, he desires to stop. Whether such a person can quit on a nonspiritual basis, depends upon the extent to which he has already lost the power to choose whether he will drink or not. Many of us felt that we had plenty of character. There was a tremendous urge to cease forever. Yet we found it impossible. This is the baffling feature of alcoholism as we know it: this utter inability to leave it alone, no matter how great the necessity or the wish.

But there was always the curious mental phenomenon that parallel with our sound reasoning there inevitably ran some insanely trivial excuse for taking that first drink. Our sound reasoning failed to hold us in check. The insane idea won out. The next day we would ask ourselves, in all earnestness and sincerity, how it could have happened.

In some circumstances we have gone out deliberately to get drunk, feeling ourselves justified by nervousness, anger, worry, depression, jealousy or the like. But even in this type of beginning we are obliged to admit that our justification for a spree was insanely insufficient in the light of what always happened. We now see that when we began to drink deliberately, instead of casually, there was little serious or effective thought during the period of premeditation of what the terrific consequences might be.

Our behavior is as absurd and incomprehensible with respect to the first drink, as that of an individual with a passion, say, for jaywalking. He gets a thrill out of skipping in front of fast moving vehicles. He enjoys himself a few years in spite of friendly warnings. Up to this point you would label him as a foolish chap having queer ideas of fun. Luck then deserts him and he is slightly injured several times in succession. You would expect him, if he were normal, to cut it out. Presently he is hit again and this time gets a fractured skull. Within a week after leaving the hospital a fast-moving trolley car breaks his arm. He tells you he has decided to stop jaywalking for good, but in a few weeks he breaks both legs.

On through the years this conduct continues, accompanied by his continual promises to be careful or to keep off the streets altogether. Finally he can no longer work, his wife gets a divorce, he is held up to ridicule. He tries every known means to get the jaywalking idea out of his head. He shuts himself up in an asylum, hoping to mend his ways. But the day he comes out he races in front of a fire engine, which breaks his back. Such a man would be crazy, wouldn't he?

You may think our illustration is too ridiculous. But is it? We, who have been through the ringer, must admit that, if we substituted alcoholism for jaywalking, the illustration would fit us exactly. However intelligent we may have been in other respects, where alcohol has been involved, we have been strangely insane. This is strong language; but isn't it true?

Some of you are thinking: "Yes, what you tell us is true, but it doesn't fully apply. We admit we have some of these symptoms, but we have not gone to the extremes you fellows did, nor are we likely to, for we understand ourselves so well after what you have told us that such things cannot happen again. We have not lost everything in life through drinking and we certainly do not intend to. "

That may be true of certain nonalcoholics who, though drinking foolishly and heavily at present, are able to stop or moderate, because their brains and bodies have not been damaged as ours were. But the actual or potential alcoholic, with hardly an exception, will be absolutely unable to stop drinking on the basis of self-knowledge. This is a point we wish to emphasize and re-emphasize, to smash home upon our alcoholic readers as it has been revealed to us out of bitter experience. Let us take another illustration.

Fred is a partner in a well-known accounting firm. His income is good, he has a fine home, is happily married and the father of promising children of college age. He has so attractive a personality that he makes friends with everyone. If ever there was a successful business man, it is Fred. To all appearances he is a stable, well-balanced individual. Yet, he is an alcoholic. We first saw Fred about a year ago in a hospital where he had gone to recover from a bad case of jitters. It was his first experience of this kind, and he was much ashamed of it. Far from admitting he was an alcoholic, he told himself he came to the hospital to rest his nerves. The doctor intimated strongly that he might be worse than he realized. For a few days he was depressed about his condition. He made up his mind to quit drinking altogether. It never occurred to him that perhaps he could not do so, in spite of his character and standing. Fred would not believe himself an alcoholic, much less accept a spiritual remedy for his problem. We told him what we knew about alcoholism. He was interested, and conceded that he had some of the symptoms, but he was a long way from admitting that he could do nothing about it himself. He was positive that this humiliating experience, plus the knowledge he had acquired, would keep him sober the rest of his life. Self-knowledge would fix it.

We heard no more of Fred for a while. One day we were told that he was back in the hospital. This time he was quite shaky. He soon indicated he was anxious to see us. The story he told us is most instructive for here was a chap absolutely convinced he had to stop drinking, who had no excuse for drinking, and who exhibited splendid judgement and determination in all his other concerns, yet he was flat on his back.

Let him tell you about it: "I was much impressed with what you fellows had to say about alcoholism, but I frankly did not believe it would be possible for me to drink again. I somewhat appreciated your ideas about the subtle insanity which precedes the first drink, but I was confident it could not happen to me after what I had learned. I reasoned I was not so far advanced as most of you fellows, that I had been usually successful in licking my other personal problems, that I would therefore be successful where you men had failed. I felt I had every right to be self-confident, that it would be only a matter of exercising my will power and keeping on guard.

"In this frame of mind, I went about my business and for a time all was well. I had no trouble refusing drinks, and began to wonder if I had not been making too hard work of a simple matter. One day I went to Washington to present some accounting evidence to a government bureau. I had been out of town before this particular dry spell, so there was nothing new about that. Physically, I felt excellent. Neither did I have any pressing problems or worries. My business came off well, I was pleased and knew my partners would be, too.

"I went to my hotel and leisurely dressed for dinner. As I crossed the threshold of the dining room, the thought came to mind it would be nice to have a couple of cocktails with dinner. That was all. Nothing more. I ordered a cocktail and my meal. Then I ordered another cocktail. After dinner I decided to take a walk. When I returned to the hotel it struck me that a highball would be fine before going to bed, so I stepped into the bar and had one. I remember having several more that night and plenty the next morning. I have a shadowy recollection of being in an airplane bound for New York, of finding a friendly taxicab driver at the landing field instead of my wife. The driver escorted me about for several days. I know little of where I went, or what I said and did. Then came the hospital with unbearable mental and physical suffering.

"As soon as I regained my ability to think, I went carefully over that evening in Washington. Not only had I been off guard, but I had made no fight whatever against that first drink. This time I had not thought of the consequences at all. I had commenced to drink as carelessly as though the cocktails were ginger ale. I now remember what my alcoholic friends had told me, how they prophesied that if I had an alcoholic mind, the time and place would come: I would drink again. They had said that though I did raise a defense, it would one day give way before some trivial reason for having a drink. Well, just that did happen, and more. What I had learned of alcoholism did not occur to me at all. I knew from that moment that I had an alcoholic mind. I saw that will power and self-knowledge would not help in those mental blank spots.

"Two of the members of Alcoholics Anonymous came to see me. They grinned, which I didn't like so much, and then asked me if I thought myself alcoholic and if I were really licked this time. I had to concede both propositions. They piled on me heaps of evidence to the effect that an alcoholic mentality, such as I had exhibited in Washington, was a hopeless condition. They cited cases out of their own experience by the dozen. This process snuffed out the last flicker of conviction that I could do the job myself.

"Then they outlined the spiritual answer and program of action which one hundred of them had followed successfully. Though I had only nominally connected with religion, their propositions were not, intellectually, hard to follow. But the program of action, though entirely sensible, was pretty drastic. It meant I would have to throw several lifelong conceptions out of the window. That was not easy. But the moment I made up my mind to go through with the process, I had the feeling that my alcoholic condition was relieved, as in fact it proved to be.

"Quite as important was the discovery that spiritual principles would solve all my problems. I have since been brought into a way of living infinitely more satisfying and, I hope, more useful than the life I lived before."

Fred's story speaks for itself. We hope it strikes home to thousands like him. He had felt only the first nip of the wringer. Most alcoholics have to be pretty badly mangled before they really begin to solve their problems.

Many doctors and psychiatrists agree with our conclusions. One of these men, staff member of a world-renowned hospital, recently made this statement to some of us, "What you say about the general hopelessness of the average alcoholic's plight is, in my opinion, correct. As to two of you men, whose stories I have heard, there is no doubt in my mind that you were 100% hopeless, apart from divine help. Though not a religious person, I have profound respect for the spiritual approach in such cases as yours. For most cases there is virtually no other solution."

In
this way the new members quickly learn the method of working with prospects; in no time at all the older members are sitting back and listening to the newer ones take over. Our "combat teams" are bringing great results, for our membership is growing by leaps and bounds. . . . Also, recent publicity of our Group activity in The Bronx Home News has brought in quite a number of new people. . . . We meet Wednesdays, 8:15 p.m., at 2500
Marion Avenue, Bronx, just off East Fordham Road.

EAST ORANGE GOES CHINESE . . . Our meeting room at 507 Main Street being unavailable
the second Wednesday of each month, we are having dinner, followed by a meeting,
at the local Cantonese on those evenings. . . . Hal R.'s role as Financial Secretary of the new clubhouse in Newark, N. J. is keeping him so busy that he doesn't have much time left for extra-curricular activity.

FLUSHING IS HOST TO MANY . . . Our Group was host to over 100 A.A.s at the Manhattan clubhouse, 334½ W. 24th Street, November 11th. It was quite a jam-session but lots of fun, besides serving to get people acquainted with each other. . . . We were guests at Paterson, N. J., November 14th, where we conducted a well-attended meeting.

.
. .
New members are coming in in droves.

FOREST HILLS SPEAKS AT FORUM . . . Upon the request of the pastor of "All Angels"
Church, West 80th Street, several of our Group recently spoke at a Sunday Forum
there
thus spreading to non-alcoholics the word of A.A. and an understanding of the disease, alcoholism. . . . We agree entirely with the newspapermen who, in writing of the 10th Anniversary A.A. dinner, spoke of our member, Mary C., as a young woman
of

"great charm and wit." . . . Maybelle G., attending a meeting of the Norwalk, Conn. Group a short while ago, was delighted to note a big jump in membership. . . . Bob M., who used to be a constructive part of our Forest Hills Group and now is a member of Mount Vernon, gave us a very enlightening talk, shortly after his first A.A. anniversary.

IRVINGTON SENDS GREETINGS . . . As a fairly new group in New Jersey one of many such springing up all around us we wish to send our best wishes for the New Year to all A.A.s everywhere. . . . Two members who strayed away for a time are now back with us, and this time we think they're here to stay. So do they.

MANHATTAN HAPPENINGS?! ... At a recent Manhattan business meeting there was talk of the Manhattan Group renting or buying a new clubhouse of its own. Some of the outlying groups seemed to want to share as co-owners of said clubhouse, whenever rented or purchased. But the consensus among the Manhattanites was that their group should be the sole owner, thus avoiding entanglements in policy, etc., that might very likely ensue, if the as yet hypothetical new clubhouse were owned by other groups as well. Of course, when the Manhattan Group does get a clubhouse of its own, every A. A., regardless of what group he belongs to, shall be welcome at all times. . . . Charlie H., who was appointed to head a Program Committee, has already begun closed meetings for newcomers only upstairs in the club, at 7:45 p.m. Thursdays. These new members descend to the larger closed meeting downstairs, beginning at 8:30. . . . Olive O., lying ill with a cardiac disturbance in St. Luke's Hospital, was responsible for the furtherance of A.A. among doctors. Olive talked so much and so well to Dr. Dwight Griswold of the hospital staff about A.A. that he gladly accepted an invitation to the 10th Anniversary A.A. dinner at the Commodore Hotel, November 8th. Dr. Griswold was so tremendously impressed that he chose A.A. as the subject of the paper he was going to read before the New York County Medical Association.

MOUNT VERNON INVITES DOCTORS . . . By having as our guests several doctors from the Westchester County Psychiatric Hospital at the 10th Anniversary A.A. dinner, we are increasing the interest, respect, and cooperation of the public authorities toward A.A. This is an important step in our endeavor to impart to the authorities a better knowledge of alcoholism, and of the treatment of alcoholics especially the police court cases.

MONTCLAIR BOOMING ... In line with other changes in organization, we have a new treasurer, Van V. Van replaces Harry C., who did a swell job for us during his 8 months in office. . . . Harold S., in his travels last month, went to an A.A. meeting in Chicago, where he encountered, along with old-timers he has known, flocks of new people. . . . Plainfield (N.J.) gave us a pair of fine speakers and a generous delegation of visitors on November 12th, a return engagement being kept by our Group the following week. . . . We are going great guns in Montclair nowadays.

NORTH JERSEY GROUPS . . . Don L. and Ed E., from the Orange Group, visited our new A.A. clubhouse in Newark last month and brought with them subscriptions to the club from over 90 per cent of its members. That's what we call cooperation. . . . On November 29th the Elizabeth Group, having outgrown its former meeting place, had its first meeting in its new quarters at the Elizabeth Country Club. They are planning for the near future a get-together with all the civic leaders and welfare

Neither liquor nor the liquor business is new. In fact, they are probably as old as man. One of the keenest insights into the whole alcohol problem - an insight just now receiving due appreciation - comes to us from a sixteenth century reformer named Sebastian Franck.

Franck lived in a small Bavarian town. He was a historian, a philosopher, a folklorist, a minister and a religious writer. And since none of these occupations provided much in the way of worldly income, he was also a soap maker. He knew his people. In 1531 he published a book entitled The Horrible Vice of Drunkenness. Although he expressed the opinion that "Bacchus has killed more men than Mars" and that "more men get drowned in the glass than in the sea," he was not as concerned as most temperance advocates of that day with the bodily effects of drinking. He deplored the physical effects of intemperance, but he realized that the real significance of drinking lay elsewhere. He concluded:

"Much has been tried against drinking among Germans, but nothing much has been achieved. The legislators have failed, although they have made promises...It (drinking) is too deeply rooted and sin has become a habit. All would have to be reborn and receive new heads. Yes, a new world would have to come."

"All would have to be reborn and receive new heads." Although it was written more than three hundred years ago, this is true in the best modern scientific sense. For today doctors and psychiatrists alike agree that the only salvation for the alcoholic is to be reborn - to "receive a new head." There is little or nothing that medicine can do for him - a new world will have to come! We are not going to make much progress against the Fortress Bacchus until we realize this and reorient our temperance education to take account of it. Fortunately, there are abundant signs that we are doing this.

A RELIGIOUS PROBLEM

We are beginning to see more clearly than ever that the problem of the alcoholic is a religious problem, that is, a problem of the whole personality. And we are beginning to see, too, that our approach to the problem of the alcoholic has not been as Christlike as it might have been. Our greatest mistake has been in condemning the alcoholic as a sinner and treating him as an outcast. The truth, as Dwight Anderson has said in the Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol, is that alcoholism is a result "not of sin but of sickness... not a sign of moral degradation but the pathological expression of an inner need, a deeper lying mental trouble which requires professional treatment like any physical disease."

Alcoholism is not a sin, for the essence of morality is choice and the alcoholic has no choice in the matter. He has to drink. It is a psychological necessity. He cannot be healed by treating him as an outcast, for what he most needs is to feel himself a part of the community. Would we throw a diabetic or a tubercular person into jail? Of course not. Instead of treating the alcoholic as an outcast and differentiating between him and other people, we should identify ourselves with him in the realization that we and all men bear some measure of responsibility for the maladjustment of which his condition is so appalling a symptom.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS

It has remained for an organization quite outside the church to hold out to the wretched alcoholic the hand of fellowship and to recall him to the faith in God that alone can give him what old Sebastian Franck called a "new head." Alcoholics Anonymous, an organization of ex-alcoholics, has put faith at the very center of its program of rehabilitation. Over the fireplace of the Alcoholics Anonymous clubhouse in New York is an inscription expressing what ought to be at the very center of the church's attitude toward the alcoholic: "There, but for the grace of God."

As Franck realized, the effect of alcohol on the body is not nearly so important as the motive for drinking. It is why a man drinks that matters, not how or what or how much. In other words, the drinking is a symptom of some kind of personality trouble, some kind of inner inadequacy. "Most men," says Thoreau, "live lives of quiet desperation." That is true, as every minister knows, and as long as it is there will be an alcohol problem with which the church, as well as other social agencies, must reckon.

In his classic Varieties of Religious Experience, William James puts it this way: "Not through mere perversity do men run after it (liquor). To the poor and unlettered it stands in the place of symphony concerts and literature; and it is a part of the deeper mystery and tragedy of life that whiffs and gleams of something that we immediately recognize as excellent should be vouchsafed to so many of us only in the fleeting earlier phases of what in its totality is so degrading a poisoning. The drunken consciousness is one bit of the mystic consciousness, and our total opinion of it must find its place in our opinion of that larger whole."

"Not through mere perversity do men run after it!" If we have fallen down in our temperance program in the past, it is at this point. We have not tried to understand why people drink or what liquor does for them to make them keep on drinking. We have not realized that drinking is a symptom.

HOW CAN THE CHURCH HELP?

So we see that religion really has more to do with the alcohol problem than science, for religion deals with motive. Just how can religion - the church - help the alcoholic? Remember, I have been talking here not about the so-called "moderate" drinker, nor about the unprincipled liquor business, but about the alcoholic, the drunk. The "moderate" drinker and the liquor business constitute related, but distinct, problems. How can the church help the man who has gone so far in drink that he has lost the power of choice?

First, it seems to me, the church can exert itself to the utmost to end the fatal tensions in modern society, tensions which are at the bottom of much of the maladjustment of which alcoholism is the symptom. "A new world would have to come," says Franck. We help the new world to come when we fight injustice, unemployment, poverty, war, racism. The church helps the alcoholic when it seeks first the Kingdom of God on earth.

Second, the church can give men faith in God. "God" says Tolstoy, "is he without whom we cannot live." This is true for all men, but it is especially true for the alcoholic. He cannot win his fight without God. Medicine has about given up on him. God never gives up on anybody. The church can show the alcoholic the "expulsive power of a new affection." Here is a conversation between Dr. Jung, the famous psychiatrist, and an alcoholic patient, which E. Stanley Jones quotes in his Abundant Living:

Dr. Jung: You are suffering from a loss of faith in God and in a future life.

Patient: But, Dr. Jung, do you believe those doctrines are true?

Dr. Jung: That is no business of mine. I am a doctor, not a priest. I can only tell you that if you recover your faith you will get well. If you don't, you won't.

Truly, for the alcoholic, faith is the victory that overcomes.

Third, the church can help in a practical way by setting up body, mind and soul clinics for as many churches as can be staffed with trained psychiatric-ministerial personnel. Church-related hospitals can set up alcoholic clinics, working closely with the Research Council on Problems of Alcohol of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. Church-related colleges and universities can follow the example of Yale and set up schools of alcohol studies, and perhaps clinics in conjunction with them, as is now being done at Yale.

Fourth, the church can build the inner disciplines that hold a life together and keep it from flying apart beneath the centrifugal pressure of the modern world. Here is where religion is vital.

CONTINUE PRESENT PROGRAM

And it goes without saying that the church can continue the kind of educational and legislative program now promoted by its official temperance organization.

The alcohol problem will not be solved easily or by superficial methods. It will not be solved by hysteria, either wet or dry, by deceptive advertising, by quack "cures" or by legal fiat. It can and will be solved by men of good hundred and fifty new men during the summer. Retaining his delightful sense of humor, Nate said just before returning to his home in North Carolina, "But Ah told 'em they needn't expect me to make an example out of myself every spring. "

NORTH HOLLYWOOD A. A. s are going to build a clubhouse of their own. They already have the blueprints, and are underwriting their venture through the sale of "Sobriety Bonds. " . . . Peter J. Hampton, Associate Professor of Psychology at Western College, in his study on alcoholism during the past year, has conducted hundreds of personality tests on alcoholics. In a big public meeting in CINCINNATI, Prof. Hampton recently discussed "the wonderful organization that is Alcoholics Anonymous, " and told something of the series of tests he is at present making in conjunction with members of the Cincinnati A. A. group . . . . A PHILADELPHIA newspaper, commenting on the forthcoming film, "The Lost Week-End, " makes this statement: "Strangely enough, the W. C. T. U. has damned the picture, while A. A. believes it will have a good effect on behavior of cinema addicts in general. "

Veterans' hospitals all over the country are writing into the New York Central Office for A. A. literature, and in quite a few hospitals groups have already been formed. WASHINGTON, in fact, is looking more and more to A. A. as a way to aiding alcoholic men and women of our Armed Forces, both at home and abroad. Letters of inquiry are pouring in from all over the world--from France, Ireland, Scotland, Cuba, the Aleutians, etc. Some of these are from the Red Cross and other organizations, some from the G. I. s themselves. No wonder that in one month alone the Central Office sent out 3,385 letters. A feature of the program celebrating the second anniversary of the SCHENECTADY (N. Y. ) A. A. s in late November was the playing of a transcription of the State Health Department's "Health Hunters" radio program, previously heard over a number of stations, dealing with the work of A. A.

Columnist William P. Frank of the Wilmington, DELAWARE, Journal is typical of the favorable reaction of most newspapermen to A. A. He writes: "If the drink problem worries you--and you want to know something about kicking Old Man Alcoholism in the face, why not attend the public meeting of A. A. tonight in the Delaware Academy of Medicine. And if you have friends who are all tangled up with alcohol and can't get rid of the old devil, you ought to go there, too--and learn for yourself what this organization is doing. " Frank comments on the members' sense of humor as one of the interesting features of A. A.

Examining the jurors for a trial coming up in MIAMI, Fla., the D. A. asked if any of them ever belonged to a temperance organization or had been members of A. A. None had. What, we wonder, would have happened if they had? . . . Los ANGELES now has a Central Office, functioning as a clearing house for all the A. A. groups in that area, with a paid secretary . . . . Speaking of paid secretaries, Bill made mention the other day of what is erroneously referred to as "professional A. A. s. " He emphasized the fact that these people are not being paid to be A. A. s but to work in various secretarial and executive capacities.

High Watch Farm at Kent, Conn., has undergone a transformation in organization and is now being run by an Operating Board which has representatives from the CONNECTICUT A. A. groups and Yale. An increasing number of alcoholics are availing themselves of the good food and comfortable home surroundings at the farm, also the beautiful Connecticut countryside.

From MICHIGAN comes word that the conclusion of a survey assembled for the American Hospital Association by the Committee on Hospital Treatment of Alcoholism was that hospital facilities for the care and treatment of alcoholics in the United States are scanty and inadequate. In Russia, the survey states, all alcoholics are registered and their personal and social histories filed in accordance with a comprehensive scheme of control which has been developed by the State. Acutely intoxicated persons are taken to the regional sobering-up stations. Persons suffering from alcoholic psychoses, etc., are committed to psychiatric hospitals where treatment is carried out under the supervision of skilled specialists.

An audience comprised chiefly of East Bay physicians listened intently at the SAN FRANCISCO Century Club as members of A. A. spoke before them at a recent meeting.

Among subjects discussed were the psychological phases of alcoholism, and its spiritual and family repercussions.... The Moline, ILLINOIS, Dispatch says that a number of persons have called Magistrate Ralph Stephenson and Geneva Dunderberg, Moline policewoman, to express interest in their suggestions, published previously in the Dispatch, that a chapter of A. A. be organized in Moline. Stephenson said some who called him were alcoholics and some were persons having close friends or relatives victimized by alcohol. "I believe we may get somewhere with this, " Magistrate Stephenson remarked, "and I should like to reiterate the belief that such an organization is needed in Moline. " . . . Not only doctors and magistrates but clergymen of all denominations are coming nationally to recognize the benefits of A.

A. A short time ago, in Richmond, VIRGINIA, the Catholic Father T. E. O'Connell was guest speaker at the monthly public meeting of the Richmond group. He had been designated by Bishop Peter L. Ireton, who has approved the principles of A. A.

"Not to bore you good people who have, never been tempted by the cup that drunk in the past, before; whom I behaved badly, and be able to say: Look. I am an alcoholic. That's why I acted the way I did. Now I don't have, to act that way any more. For this load is now lifted. This awful load of shame, fear and guilt. Instead of avoiding people's eyes, instead of wondering what they think of me, instead of crossing the street when I see them coming, I can keep on walking down the street, say hello, shake hands, and smile.

My other reasons stem from this one, and yet they are more important reasons. For I feel that my own unembarrassed attitude, my own frankness and freedom in the matter, affects everyone with whom I come in contact, and with whom I talk. Freedom from guilt and embarrassment is the only attitude that we alcoholics can have. If we want to "forget" about our drinking and conceal our past and pretend or wish we weren't, in A.A., then we have not yet forgiven ourselves. It is highly important that we forgive ourselves, utterly, or others won't forgive us. They will continue to sense in us shame and fear. Then they in turn will feel uneasy. They will continue to think of the subject as a moral issue, censurable, objectionable. We must be ready to say to people what we say to ourselves. That our past is our sick behavior, and that our present and our future is our convalescent and our well behavior. That we are living from day to day, in our new present, which is our strong secure future, forever. Herein lies all the hope of our lives.

I think that this altitude within ourselves is most contagious. Over and over I have heard from other A.A.s how they have, gone to a frightening boss, and talked to him, only to find him friendly and helpful. How they have won over stiff-necked relatives, or a narrow-minded community, in the most magical and wonderful way. For seldom does anyone, lose a job, a friend, the esteem of his neighbors because of not drinking. It is drinking and getting drunk that bothers friends, relatives, neighbors. And even this is being looked on with more and more understanding, thanks to the frank attitude of the average A.A. For the more people learn about A.A., the more they understand what alcoholism is, the more lenient they become toward the alcoholic and his problems. And the easier it is for the alcoholic to shed his fears, and face himself.

[But] there are plenty of people around these United States (not to say a few in Europe) who ... wish I were pushing up buttercups this very minute. I have not gotten them all to forgive me. I'll be doing well if I get half of them to do so before I'm through. Yet I think that as I progress in A.A., I will be able to get a few of them to realize that I'm not responsible for what I did then. That I am trying, to the best of my ability, to make amends, through 12th step work, and in all other possible ways, and that I, like everybody else who is working at A.A., have undergone a change that is a miracle.

This brings me to my last reason for telling the world. When I say to friends and strangers, I'm an alcoholic, I belong to Alcoholics Anonymous, I am saying something wonderful, something good. I am saying: Look at me now. Look at what I was. Maybe I'm not much now. But I am well. I am happy. Happier than I've ever been in my life. ... I can work. I can love people. I have hundreds of sense. For today doctors and psychiatrists alike agree that the only salvation for the alcoholic is to be reborn - to "receive a new head." There is little or nothing that medicine can do for him - a new world will have to come! We are not going to make much progress against the Fortress Bacchus until we realize this and reorient our temperance education to take account of it. Fortunately, there are abundant signs that we are doing this.

A RELIGIOUS PROBLEM

We are beginning to see more clearly than ever that the problem of the alcoholic is a religious problem, that is, a problem of the whole personality. And we are beginning to see, too, that our approach to the problem of the alcoholic has not been as Christlike as it might have been. Our greatest mistake has been in condemning the alcoholic as a sinner and treating him as an outcast. The truth, as Dwight Anderson has said in the Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol, is that alcoholism is a result "not of sin but of sickness... not a sign of moral degradation but the pathological expression of an inner need, a deeper lying mental trouble which requires professional treatment like any physical disease."

Alcoholism is not a sin, for the essence of morality is choice and the alcoholic has no choice in the matter. He has to drink. It is a psychological necessity. He cannot be healed by treating him as an outcast, for what he most needs is to feel himself a part of the community. Would we throw a diabetic or a tubercular person into jail? Of course not. Instead of treating the alcoholic as an outcast and differentiating between him and other people, we should identify ourselves with him in the realization that we and all men bear some measure of responsibility for the maladjustment of which his condition is so appalling a symptom.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS

It has remained for an organization quite outside the church to hold out to the wretched alcoholic the hand of fellowship and to recall him to the faith in God that alone can give him what old Sebastian Franck called a "new head." Alcoholics Anonymous, an organization of ex-alcoholics, has put faith at the very center of its program of rehabilitation. Over the fireplace of the Alcoholics Anonymous clubhouse in New York is an inscription expressing what ought to be at the very center of the church's attitude toward the alcoholic: "There, but for the grace of God."

As Franck realized, the effect of alcohol on the body is not nearly so important as the motive for drinking. It is why a man drinks that matters, not how or what or how much. In other words, the drinking is a symptom of some kind of personality trouble, some kind of inner inadequacy. "Most men," says Thoreau, "live lives of quiet desperation." That is true, as every minister knows, and as long as it is there will be an alcohol problem with which the church, as well as other social agencies, must reckon.

In his classic Varieties of Religious Experience, William James puts it this way: "Not through mere perversity do men run after it (liquor). To the poor and unlettered it stands in the place of symphony concerts and literature; and it is a part of the deeper mystery and tragedy of life that whiffs and gleams of something that we immediately recognize as excellent should be vouchsafed to so many of us only in the fleeting earlier phases of what in its totality is so degrading a poisoning. The drunken consciousness is one bit of the mystic consciousness, and our total opinion of it must find its place in our opinion of that larger whole."

"Not through mere perversity do men run after it!" If we have fallen down in our temperance program in the past, it is at this point. We have not tried to understand why people drink or what liquor does for them to make them keep on drinking. We have not realized that drinking is a symptom.

HOW CAN THE CHURCH HELP?

So we see that religion really has more to do with the alcohol problem than science, for religion deals with motive. Just how can religion - the church - help the alcoholic? Remember, I have been talking here not about the so-called "moderate" drinker, nor about the unprincipled liquor business, but about the alcoholic, the drunk. The "moderate" drinker and the liquor business constitute related, but distinct, problems. How can the church help the man who has gone so far in drink that he has lost the power of choice?

First, it seems to me, the church can exert itself to the utmost to end the fatal tensions in modern society, tensions which are at the bottom of much of the maladjustment of which alcoholism is the symptom. "A new world would have to come," says Franck. We help the new world to come when we fight injustice, unemployment, poverty, war, racism. The church helps the alcoholic when it seeks first the Kingdom of God on earth.

Second, the church can give men faith in God. "God" says Tolstoy, "is he without whom we cannot live." This is true for all men, but it is especially true for the alcoholic. He cannot win his fight without God. Medicine has about given up on him. God never gives up on anybody. The church can show the alcoholic the "expulsive power of a new affection." Here is a conversation between Dr. Jung, the famous psychiatrist, and an alcoholic patient, which E. Stanley Jones quotes in his Abundant Living:

Dr. Jung: You are suffering from a loss of faith in God and in a future life.

Patient: But, Dr. Jung, do you believe those doctrines are true?

Dr. Jung: That is no business of mine. I am a doctor, not a priest. I can only tell you that if you recover your faith you will get well. If you don't, you won't.

observed:

"We are not failing to treat the alcoholic as he should be treated because we do not have time, nor because there aren't enough psychiatrists, but because we don't know how." A second doctor remarked that there is still a slight moral stigma attached to drinking and society doesn't want the alcoholic treated as a sick man, it wants him punished. A third doctor agreed that, in the eyes of society, the alcoholic, like the person who acquires a venereal disease, is somehow "having fun."

Society will pour out millions to treat cancer and infantile paralysis because the victims are obviously not "having fun," nor is their disease sort of a just price they are paying for fun previously had. As Dr. Myerson put it, the key word for science is research; the key word for the public is education--chiefly in the idea that the alcoholic is not enjoying himself and deserves to be treated seriously.

The final conclusion of the symposium was that the key word for the alcoholic himself is "will"--will rooted in a positive belief that he can win his fight, and that the fight is worth winning. . . . A.A.s, we t h i n k , are apt to question strongly that word "will"--when the enemy is alcohol.

The Monday and Thursday luncheons at the Cafe Loyale on New York's Fifth Avenue are beginning to take on a national aspect, with A.A.s, both men and women, from all parts of the country dropping in from time to time. Mount Vernon, which recently celebrated its second anniversary with a dinner, has given birth to its second off-spring, Yonkers, N. Y.

Two old friends met by accident the other evening, the first time in 35 years. One was Frank L. of Flushing,, the other, John M. of the A.A. Seamen's Group. Both were attending a meeting at t h e Seamen's Club.

The Hartford, Connecticut, group broadcast three times over the radio:
December 20 and 27, and January 3; on each program there was a prominent guest and several
A.A.s.

The New York clubhouse, 405 W. 41st St., was the scene of a rousing business
meeting
in January, ending in a new charter and election of officers: President, Charlie
H.
of the Manhattan Group; Vice-President, Dave R. of Forest Hills; Treasurer, Bob
W. of Manhattan; Secretary, Cesar T. of Flushing. Including these officers, the Board
of Directors are: Tom M. and George R. of Brooklyn; Horace C. of Bergen County; Joe
H.
of the Bronx; Bob D. of Hempstead; Marion M., Jack N., Dick AT., and John D.
of Manhattan. . . . A couple of lawyers, leaving the meeting, shrugged their shoulders eloquently. One looked at the other. "Astonishing!" he said to his colleague
and fellow A.A. The second lawyer, his eyes questioning, replied, "You said it, brother!"
Could their cryptic words refer to the wonderful facility with which A.A.s outflank
the knotty legal technicalities that drive non-A.A. barristers to drink?

The Cleveland groups--there are many of them--go in for sponsorship in a big way, as evidenced by a late issue of their Central Bulletin : "The book on sponsorship should be studied and fully understood by every member of A.A. . . if everyone reads
it
and applies what he reads the prospect is successful and happy and so is the sponsor."

The A.A. Tribune, from Des Moines, Iowa, refers to a former member of their
group,
now manager of a radio station in Chicago: ". . . that kid sure does a lot of work and, funny thing, the call of the station is THE VOICE OF SERVICE."
A.A.

In The Viewpoint, an excellent bi-monthly review written by the inmates of the New Jersey State Prison in Trenton, a member of the prison's A.A. wrote an inspiring article in which he told of the splendid work being done not only in Trenton but in San Quentin, Chini, and Folsom, where the authorities are cooperating fully with the A.A. groups.

Referring to Bob Benchley's famous crack that the only cure for a hangover is death, a New York columnist writes that this is no longer true "now that A.A. is with us and going strong." Which reminds us that Dr. Bob S., in his short talk at the New Year party given by the Akron, Ohio, group (with over 400 present), pointed out that four out of the five who attended the first A.A. meeting in Akron, nine years ago were present.

A small boy in grammar school, after listening to a moralizing teacher hold forth on the horrors of drink, rose to his feet and said he didn't agree. "My papa is a member of A.A." The child proceeded to define alcoholism as a disease and in an easy, natural manner, without any sense of shame, told how sick his father used to be, pre-A.A. And, "If any of you other kids have papas or mamas who are drunks, you just come and see me after school."

If the human race thinks it has sole claim to alcoholism, guess again. Increasingly the animal kingdom is becoming addicted to the disease. But with a difference. Theirs is an enforced addiction--man-enforced. Not long ago, in the scientist's search for an understanding of alcoholism, rabbits were made to reel around. Now it's cats. In his

CATHOLIC DIGEST, Vol. 8(6): 43-45, APRIL, 1944.

A LOOK AT ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS

By a Catholic Member of the Eau Claire, Wis., Group of A.A.

What is an alcoholic, Catholic or otherwise? How does one know whether he is a victim of the disease of alcoholism? The simplest definition of an alcoholic is an uncontrolled drinker. A man knows well when he is an uncontrolled drinker, on the incontrovertible evidences of his own actions. And the voice of conscience speaking awesomely in the darkness of his remorse tells him clearly that he is a victim of a self-imposed madness. Alcoholism is not a matter of the amount one drinks, but of what that amount does to one's personality and character. Some alcoholics drink two quarts of liquor a day; some do not drink that in a month. Both are equally gripped by the disease and obsession. Then there are those who can drink every day without becoming alcoholic. An honest personal diagnosis will inerrantly reveal the disease.

An alcoholic is a person who is allergic, physically and mentally, to alcohol. The allergy is manifested in a pattern of drinking opposed to one's experience and common sense and opposed to his deepest instincts of right. If a man can go into a bar, have two or three drinks, then willingly stop, and do this day after day; if he can willingly stop drinking any time he desires, he is not an alcoholic. But if, intending to take only two or three drinks, he usually remains to take a dozen, he is alcoholic. If he drinks for sociability and conviviality, he is not alcoholic. If he drinks to get drunk, he is.

To a large extent the motive, the reason why a man drinks, determines whether he is an actual or potential alcoholic. If a man drinks in the morning; if he drinks at any time when it is folly beyond question, he is alcoholic. If he is shy, cunning and furtive about his drinking; if he lies to his wife, friends, employer about his drinking, he is obsessed. If he drinks because he feels the need of alcohol either to excite his brain or quiet his nerves; if he spends more than a nominal part of his income for booze which he drinks himself; if he loses any time from his employment, work or obligations because of liquor, definitely he is alcoholic.

A man's alcoholic obsession becomes manifest when he takes the first drink. Gone then is control, even desire for moderation. Because of his peculiar physical and psychical make-up, all of the defenses which the nonalcoholic drinker possesses are useless in him. That is so because he is different, physically, mentally, and emotionally, from the controlled drinker. Yet, despite his certain knowledge that he cannot stop after taking the first drink, the alcoholic, five minutes after giving his solemn word not to drink that day, is banging on a bar demanding whisky! Why does he do this in the very teeth of repeated disaster? Because he will not honestly face his problems and seek the only menu under heaven for its solution.

He says, "Not my will, but Thine be done." But does he mean it? He does not. Not so far as liquor is concerned. Not so long as he continues to drink. What he asks in effect when he prays is that in his behalf the laws of compensation be suspended; that God arrest the dicta of nature, and rescind the natural and spiritual law so that he may indulge in what he will not admit is defiance of God's will, for him.

But God is always deaf to the dumb. He made us all eloquent in the language of the heart, and He hears only its honest pleadings. Is the Catholic alcoholic who continues to drink while he petitions God for help conscious of the duality of his nature and the duplicity of his prayers? He is. He knows, where another may not, that he cannot touch the hand of God so long as he retains the bottle. He knows by spiritual instinct and by religious training that there is no compromise with God.

He will do anything, anything to solve his drinking problem, but stop drinking! He flatly refuses to accept the fact, for fact it is, that this and this alone is the price God demands for his release from the hell of alcoholism; for his restoration to physical, mental, and spiritual health; and for restoring to him his courage and self-respect.

This one simple act of unconditional surrender will spark into action all the surging power of the miracle of release. The very instant a man unconditionally surrenders his alcoholic problem to God, in that very moment, God puts into his hands the weapons of victory. How quickly he will experience the exhilaration of complete freedom depends, in my opinion, upon the degree of faith with which he makes his surrender. We of Alcoholics Anonymous believe that a man must crave a spiritual experience if he is to be rid of his obsession and disease. To the Catholic with his rich background of spirituality, religious heritage, and intimate knowledge of the love and mercy of Christ, this vitalizing, transforming experience should not be difficult to realize. It can be astoundingly easy. As for myself; first having admitted that I could not drink as others, that I could never again drink anything, I went to my knees in unconditional surrender, for the first time in my life. Then with instantaneous clarity I saw the almost incredibly simple method wherein I could find the power to convert my utter defeat to magnificent victory. This method, this technique is so utterly simple that many, I fear, will refuse to believe that anything so obvious can produce it. Yet it did for me. It did for many I know.

In our colossal conceit, many of us scornfully reject the simple. But God's law in the Ten Commandments and Christ's teachings in the Gospels, the profoundest truths under heaven, are expressed in the simplest of terms. One needs not an educated mind, but an uneducated heart, to comprehend the promises of God. The greatest mind on earth cannot read into Christ's invitation and guarantee more than the most illiterate can take out of it. "Come to Me, all you that labor, and are burdened, and I will refresh you." This is Christ's promise.

discussed the alcoholic problem and A.A. openly, in one of the "soap-operas."
The
drunken heroine of the story, sorely in need of help to patch up her emotionally ragged home, was informed of A.A. by her doctor and advised to try it. She did; she got sober--and of course she lived happily ever after.

Here's another date to remember: St. Patrick's day, March 17. Rudy P., French horn player of the New York Philharmonic, together with some of his generous-spirited symphonic friends, will give on St. Patrick's day at the A.A. Cosmopolitan clubhouse,
405 W. 41st St., New York City, a program of chamber music, to begin at 8:45
P.M.
Beethoven's septette and some woodwind quintettes will be played.

The Middle West has two new, thriving groups--with a Before and After sound -- one in Painsville, Ohio, and the other in Blissfield, Michigan. . . . Among Los Angeles' more than 20 groups is one that probably rates as the most exclusive of any in the U.
S. A. Only the alumni of Skidrow and jail are eligible. . . . The smallest group
in the country is in Casanovia, New York, a suburb of Syracuse, with only two
members.
Some time ago a drunk airplaned to New York for a visit with Bill; he then returned home and soon sobered up another drunk; then he had a slip himself and was in turn sobered up by his neophyte. Now they're both dry and intent on recruiting more members in the Syracuse area. Their address: Box E, Casanovia, New York. . . .
A.A.s of the lush, bayou country of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, wisely stress the lack
of
"moral lecturing" in their publicity.

. . . A columnist of the Atlanta, Georgia, Journal says that once in a great while a newspapermen happens upon a group of sincere people, and that once makes up for all the "uplift" organizations which have plagued his journalistic life. "Such a group is Alcoholics Anonymous, who the other night appeared before 103 chronic alcoholics

at the Atlanta City Jail to explain the A.A. program--to give them hope for the day
of their release". . . . Tulsa, Oklahoma, will soon welcome a new member--an inmate
of
McAlester Prison, who has been corresponding with Tulsa A.A.s.

This country at large seems to be delightfully astonished by the St. Louis dinner given Marty Mann, executive director of the National Committee for Education
on Alcoholism, and A.A.'s First Lady, judging by the reprints in countless newspapers, which unanimously refer to the evening as "the strangest ever." The hosts were
the combined A.A. groups of Greater St. Louis, the guests prominent St. Louisans.
While
the guests--all except Marty--drank Scotch, bourbon, and gin, the hosts slaked
their thirsts with soft drinks and gayly watched the guests being transformed into many stages of hilarity. . . . Latest highlight of the Montpelier, Vermont, group was
the 150-mile plane and bus trip through a blizzard, taken by several members to meet
Marty and hear her talk in Montreal.

Walter Winchell lately devoted his entire Broadway column to current folklore about Manhattan's bars, of which he contends there are more than street corners. The Lost
Weekend, which, according to Winchell, has bestsold a nation into cautionary drinking, caused "a lot more pity than the real sight usually does." The smash-hit
Harvey makes "drinking a good deal funnier than it always is." And "Alcoholics Anonymous, who've been shouting so loud they are fast becoming as familiar as
a hangover, have been there before". . . . Apropos of hangovers, here's one to pass on to your non-A.A.-needing pals. A marvellously simple cure for a hangover is reported by people doing much transatlantic hopping these days. The victim of an allnight party has only to board a long-distance plane and put on an oxygen mask. Four hours

later, arriving in, say, Newfoundland, he feels fine.

"The Water Wagon Gets New Stall" is one of the titles of a series of six wonderfully instructive, sometimes uproariously funny stories, with accompanying cartoons, by Elgar Brown of Chicago's Herald-American. Beginning with the fictitiously-named

J.

Buffington Nutmeg as a lush-about-town, then putting him through his paces as a drunk desperately wanting to stop drinking, Mr. Brown shows Nutmeg being introduced to

A.A.

But Nutmeg has tried to "swear off" so many times and has sought help from so many sources that he is plagued by recurrent doubts. We see him reading the book, going to meetings, doing 12th step work. In the last of the series Nutmeg is entering his ninth month of sobriety, whereas never previously in the past decade of his fruity career had the old boy laid off the liquor for one consecutive week, He went on the wagon once in 1931 and it was the dreariest day of his life. Clinging to the 24-hour system of operating, Nutmeg today ventures no predictions as to the dry spell's duration. He hopes it's permanent, but all he knows, for sure, is that he is sober this day.

The A.A. seamen's group is doing a fine job with their weekly meeting at the New York

Seamen's Institute (the dog house), 25 South St., and new members are constantly coming to their clubhouse at 334½ W. 24th St., Manhattan. . . . The Kansas City, Kansas, group has bought and moved into a 12-room clubhouse. . . . The Hollywood

A.A.s have just leased new headquarters at 2560 North Beechwood Drive, complete with large hall, club rooms, and kitchen.

stop kidding yourself and admit that you are at the end of your tether; alcohol has become your master. Then you have to hand over your situation to a power greater than yourself. You let that power manage your life, knowing that yourself cannot. Last of all, when you receive help, you automatically assume responsibility to help someone else. It is understood that you will try to make amends for any wrong you have done.

A refreshing thing about this fellowship is its freedom from glumness, cocksureness and cant. The reinforcement of being active in the group is indispensable, a little like the agape of early Christians. Many find themselves needing to pray, naturally and sincerely.

=====

++++Message 1210. . . . . Gv April 1945 - News Circuit
From: t . . . . . 8/13/2003 5:08:00 AM

=====

Grapevine, April 1945

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

The role which A.A. can take in curbing absenteeism in industrial plants due to excessive drinking was recently outlined before the Chattanooga, Tennessee, Industrial Personnel Club. Stanley Davis of Cincinnati, analyst of the Ohio Personnel Testing Laboratories, displayed personnel tests showing the qualifications of a normal worker and the marked deviation by alcoholics from the norm. He also showed how alcoholics "come back," even passing the norm, after joining A. A. The program was arranged by a prominent businessman, who is a member of the non-alcoholic advisory board for the Chattanooga A. A. g r o u p . . . . Can anything be done for the valuable employee whose drinking is out of control? To some employers this is still a baffling question. The Delaware A. A. groups have distributed a booklet, "What About the Alcoholic Employees?" to personnel directors in organizations throughout the state. The booklet contains a reprint of the chapter in the A. A. book describing the experiences of an employer in dealing with alcoholism.

Norwalk is the latest to join the A. A. ranks in Ohio. At their first open meeting were Judge Edgar Martin of the Common Pleas Court, Judge Luther Van Horn of Probate Court, Prosecuting Attorney Herbert K. Freeman and County Welfare Chairman George W. Lawrence.

Another new group has been formed in Stockton, California, and Pennsylvania has a new one in Uniontown. As for Iowa, you may take the word of its members that A. A. is ticking there. They have watched it grow from a meager beginning with five members in October, 1943, to nine groups with a present total membership of more than 260 persons. So far, there have been few women members: two in the Ottumwa group, two in Des Moines, and one at Waterloo. With the Tampa A. A. s as the sponsoring body, there's now another group in Florida, in the town of St. Petersburg . . . . Oklahoma's expanding A. A. has now reached to McAlester.

Judge Karl V. King of Salt Lake City, Utah, has recommended to the city commission the establishment of a clinic for alcoholics. The judge would then commit alcoholics who have been arrested four or five consecutive times to the care of the clinic for a period not to exceed six months. They would receive the necessary medical care, and services of psychiatric workers. When released they would be paroled to A. A. It is proposed that this clinic be financed through the federal, state, county and city governments. Which reminds us that Austin R., author and member of the Eau Claire, Wisconsin A. A. group, recently spoke on A. A. before the Eau Claire State Teachers College.... According to the Chicago Municipal Court records, the sex ratio of alcoholic addicts has changed from one female to four or five males in 1931, to one female to two males in 1943, as reported by Dr. D. B. Totman, director of the psychiatric institute of the Municipal Court of Chicago in a late issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association.

Our school system is gradually being instructed in A. A. Paul C. Young of the Louisiana State University faculty was recently quoted in the state newspapers for his enthusiastic support of our program.... Dr. Charles L. Outland, medical director of Richmond Public Schools, was the principal speaker at a meeting of the Richmond, Virginia group . . . . Adhering to wartime needs, A. A. s throughout the country are establishing swing shift groups, some meeting in the morning, some in the afternoon. Flint, Michigan is flourishing on its new swing shift basis.

A. A. groups of Westchester County, New York, are beginning a plan of co-operation with Grasslands Hospital authorities, under which volunteer attendants will be supplied for night duty in the hospital's psychiatric building. The announcement was made in connection with the organization of a Yonkers (N. Y. ) group at a recent open meeting. Other participating groups are Mount Vernon, New Rochelle, White Plains and Peekskill. The emergency plan, by which the A. A. members will meet a serious manpower shortage, was worked out in a conference with Dr. John G. Lynn, chief psychiatrist at Grasslands, and Mrs. Blanche P. Mack of Scarsdale (N. Y. ), director of volunteer service at the hospital. Effective since the latter part of March, the Westchester groups are supplying three volunteers a night to serve as attendants at the psychiatric building. The plan is an outgrowth of a continuing program of cooperation between Grasslands and A. A. in helping alcoholics in Westchester to recover.

Here are some more statistics, not the usual boring kind but dynamically alive.... 600,000 chronic alcoholics were institutionalized last year, of whom New York's Bellevue Hospital took care of 8,562.

An overseas letter from Lt. Don Aho of Fairport Harbor, Ohio, reprinted in the Fairport Harbor Beacon, with favorable editorial comment, says "I have been reading about the Alcoholics Anonymous in various periodicals with keen interest. I am really glad to see it branch out. It uses the best psychology of education and leadership that I have ever seen applied.... A. A. is setting a fine example for our educators to follow. Perhaps the day will come when all graduates will emerge from school trained and prepared to meet life's problems without fear of failure."

Lunching in the Senate dining room the other noon with Dr. E. M. Jellinek, director of the Section on Alcohol Studies of the Laboratory of Applied Physiology at Yale, were a significant collection of people. Discussing with Dr. Jellinek the establishment of clinics for alcoholics in Washington, D. C., were Senators Arthur Capper and Theodore G. Bilbo of the Senate District Committee; Representatives Jennings Randolph, chairman of the House District Committee; and Representative Karl Stefan, member of the House Appropriations Committee for the District.... A step toward co-operation with A. A. is being taken at Washington's District Jail, Howard B. Gill, superintendent, announced a few days ago, with a Committee from the Washington A. A. group visiting the jail regularly. Statistics show a majority of the 12, 000 alcoholics passing through the District Jail each year are old offenders. Most frequent visitor is a man now on his 157th sentence.

Ted Le B., a member of one of the many groups on Long Island, New York, gave a talk in Buffalo a while ago that has been widely written up in newspapers throughout the country. Ted said that "these 12 A. A. steps really are a masterful abridgement of the only possible ultimate international peace program . . . . The splendid truth given to a halfcrazed drunk who fell to his knees and asked God for light may some day deliver all mankind from chaos just as it delivered him. The mustard seed may all that they are drunks, who can't handle their liquor. Then they are advised to analyze their own personalities and find out what made them that way; adjust their personal relations to normal life; depend upon some power outside themselves to help them stay sober; work with other alcoholics, to help cure the latter and help stabilize themselves.

This matter of depending upon some outside power, that gets some of them down; it sounds like religious evangelism. But it isn't anything of the kind. These are not religious fanatics nor zealots. They are men and women of the world for the greater part, some of whom had been much too blase. They know the score.

There isn't anybody around the joint sprouting wings. The "testimonials" that are given are intended only to add point to the A.A. program, to show that it really works. And there is no doubt that it does.

Social workers speak highly of the movement. The section on neurology and psychiatry of the New York State Medical society has run articles in its official journal about the work of A.A. Prominent psychiatrists have given it their endorsement. And, of course, religious leaders have blessed it. All have agreed that Alcoholics Anonymous is the McCoy.

There are more than 300 branches all over the country, about 30 in the New York metropolitan area alone, and a headquarters in Hollywood, too. At the 41st St. clubhouse there are billiard and card rooms, a library and a writing room where members can relax, good fellowship, and all the appurtenances of any good club, except a bar. For one thing is insisted upon by A.A.: don't come to the club drunk or with liquor on your breath. A.A. knows that some of the members slip some times; these are helped to get back to 'dryness again. But they may not come to the club until they have stopped drinking, no matter how recently.

The evening spent with the A.A. was exhilarating. You wonder: would these people care to have you talk about their work? You decide to ask the secretary. A woman near by, an actress hears the inquiry. The secretary let her answer: "Yes, do talk about our work. Show people will read it in Variety. They'll know we're neither crackpots nor zealots, but just people, including people from show business who have licked an important personal problem, and want to help others."

=====

+++Message 1212. . . . . Gv May 1945 - News Circuit
From: t . . . . . 8/14/2003 12:04:00 AM

=====

Grapevine, May 1945

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

It may be that women fear their anonymity will not be respected, and therefore they are more reluctant than men to come into A.A. Society is more scathing in its condemnation of a woman alcoholic. No doubt about that. Nor is there, any doubt that, whatever the reason, there are proportionately few women in A.A. A coast-to-coast review brings out this salient fact: it isn't until about four years after the inception of a group that women begin arriving in any numbers, and even then the process is slow and painful for quite a while.

In a huge impersonal city like New York-- which leads the nation in the number of A.A. women--anonymity doesn't play the big bugaboo role that it does in the small towns where usually everybody from the kids on the street corner to the town dowager is either thinking or saying--"My dear, did you see Mrs. Smith today? Disgusting! . . . "It's just criminal the way she neglects her poor little children!"... "Why, they say she's drunk all the time!" And on and on. And yet that same Mrs. Smith is afraid to go to A.A. for fear people might learn she is having difficulty with alcohol!

But it is encouraging to note that everywhere in the country, paralleling the steady increase in general knowledge that alcoholism is a health problem, not a moral one, women from smaller communities as well as large are beginning to come into A.A. a little less spasmodically and haltingly. In these past years, women have been largely responsible for the establishment of groups--to name only a few -- in Chicago, Dallas, Fort Worth, San Antonio and it was a woman who first brought A.A. to the Pacific Coast, in 1940. Many of our women are in the WACS, WAVES and Nurses Corps, while others are contributing to the war effort by working as Nurse's Aides, director

of blood banks, etc.... Enterprising Nancy S., lone A.A. member wintering in Palm Beach,
Florida, who ran a bookshop, ordered five copies of the A.A. book, listed them
under several headings in her catalogue (Psychiatry, Medicine, Biography, etc. ) and put them in a window display under "Health, " "How to Relax, " and "Be Glad You're Neurotic. " They went like hot-cakes. She ordered twenty-five more, hasn't been able to keep up with the demand. Curious fact about the buyers--the books were always
for
"somebody else. " . . .

Another A.A. woman who had recently moved to Springfield, Missouri, and hadn't yet found a way to start a group, one day read in a Springfield paper a story about
Marty Mann and her work with the NCEA (National Committee for Education on Alcoholism). The woman promptly took a P. O. box and wrote a letter to that same paper saying she
was an A.A. and would be glad to help anyone interested. Within a week she had nine prospects.

Apropos of Marty, who in private life is an A.A. member and in public life is paid by the NCEA to teach the general public the facts about alcoholism and to try to awaken their interest in doing something about this great public-health problem, we see
from many newspaper stories all over the country that, aside from her regular NCEA lectures, she often takes time out from her strenuous work schedule to speak before
A.A. groups wherever she may be. The full story of the NCEA and its aims was published in the October, 1944 issue of The Grapevine, and the NCEA office at 2
E.
103rd Street, New York, will gladly forward copies of that issue upon request
.

. . .

Since we're on the subject of women and their work, we must mention, at least in passing, the splendid and consistent work of Bobby B., five years in A.A.

Though

Bobby works--and how!--here in Manhattan, she is perhaps even better known to the thousands with whom she corresponds all over the country, in her capacity as National

Secretary of the Central (A.A. ) Office in New York, since 1942. Before that she

was secretary of the Manhattan Group, and before that, as Bobby herself puts it,

"I

was just a drunk."

Station WTIC of Hartford, Connecticut, has been awarded a 1944 "Variety" plaque

for

"Contributing to the Public Health of the Community. " The competition, which

was open to all the radio stations in the United States and Canada, was won by

WTIC

for the Alcoholics Anonymous series originated over the station last year. The citation reads: "WTIC learned that alcoholism was health problem No 4 and particularly aggravated in wartime. Not a moral depravity but a disease. WTIC decided to awaken and educate its listeners to its causes and cures . . . . " These programs are continuing, and the Hartford Group has notified The Grapevine that they have had tremendous response, most of it from women in the interest of husbands and brothers.

"Variety"

Ruth H. T. of Scotia, New York, a volunteer Red Cross worker, was delighted the

other day when a returned veteran, "with a drink problem, " was sent by the Red Cross

to the Scotia A.A. Group. This was the group's first experience with a veteran,

and

it is Ruth's suggestion that every A.A. group in the nation call on the nearest

Red

Cross Chapter with some A.A. literature and offer their services....

The House of Representatives recently debated a bill to construct a $200,000 hospital for alcoholics. "I don't think we should build a mansion for a bunch of drunks, said Rep. Carl Gibson, while Rep. Hugh Caserne commented, "We just sober up our ordinary drunks in three or four days in jail down in Marion County, " and Rep.

"

Charlie Higgins reported: "The people who contribute millions in liquor taxes ought to get a little something back."

A.A. has come to Broadway. Leading off with "Alcoholics Anonymous Doing Great Job in Its New Times Sq. Clubhouse," the entertainment world's weekly paper Variety, of March 28, says that A.A. pulls no punches, and that "honesty is the quality that stands out among these people.... These are not religious zealots. These are sensible people, men and women of the world for the greater part . . . . They know the score.

They're hep. They don't try to tell you what God to worship, or how--they don't really care whether you worship any.... There isn't anybody sprouting wings around the joint

. . . . The evening spent with A.A. was exhilarating.... "

M a n h a t t a n and surrounding groups have bought out the 48th Street Theatre

for

"Harvey" the night of June 15.... A resident of North Little Rock, Arkansas, charged with cashing a Federal check, who was placed on temporary probation, after pleading guilty, was placed on two years probation by Federal Judge Trimble. The defendant joined A.A. in the meantime and the report made on his conduct was favorable.

"You

come of a good family and you committed this crime of illegally cashing the check while drunk, " Judge Trimble admonished the defendant. "In giving you

way

April

1. At that time 8 beds were assigned to alcoholics. The hospital was so pleased with the service that on May 1 they increased the number to 12.

The charge is $10 per day, plus an overall doctor's fee of $10. Those who have hospital insurance are covered thereby and pay only the doctor's fee. The alcoholics at Knickerbocker are under the expert supervision of Dr. W. D. Silkworth, for many years an enthusiastic supporter of A.A.

Here's the procedure for hospitalizing an alcoholic: Phone Knickerbocker to make certain a bed is available, then haul your patient up there--or down or over, as the case may be. Only members of A.A. may hospitalize an alcoholic.

The A.A. Rehabilitation Fund lends to responsible sponsors the wherewithal to hospitalize a patient who is broke. If you are 12th stepping with such a patient, call the Manhattan Clubhouse, 405 W. 41st St., and the secretary will put you in touch with a member of the A.A. Hospital Committee who will determine if the loan is to be made. Besides Manhattan, the secretaries of Brooklyn, Bronx, Flushing and Forest Hills, which groups are represented on the Committee, will do likewise for you.

In addition to availing themselves of Knickerbocker's splendid facilities when working with on alcoholic in need of hospitalization, A.A.s are invited to visit the alcoholics at any time from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. Jack N., Chairman of the Hospital Committee, urges that more A.A. women make a point of calling on the women patients at Knickerbocker. The men have been doing a bang-up 12th-step job, with frequent calls on the men patients.

It isn't necessary to know the name of an alcoholic under hospitalization when you are planning a visit.

Since every alcoholic bedded at Knickerbocker is sponsored by an A.A., obviously he or she is interested in A.A., and both wants and needs visits from our members. Out-of-towners, too, are welcomed as callers. As patients, too, if necessary.

Indiana's latest A.A. venture, a clinic for alcoholics, also appears to be headed for success. The newly instituted Indiana Home, in Muncie, with an 18-bed capacity, had 6 patients during its first week of operation. Managed by A.A., the clinic not only gives alcoholics a six-day treatment but, like the Knickerbocker Hospital in New York, serves as a focal point for A.A. members to do 12th-step work, via visits to the patients who are being relieved of the jitters, and interesting them in the philosophy of A.A.

Over Station WWJ -- The Detroit News, a series of A.A. stories is being voiced from Detroit, little dramas written from the real life stories of A.A. members. The program is scheduled for each Saturday at 7 p.m. The series began as an experiment several weeks ago with the dramas programmed for every other Saturday at 11:15 p.m. WWJ has now moved the program forward to its present early evening spot, every Saturday. . . . The March of Time recently broadcast dramatized excerpts from Eliot Taintor's book, September Remember. . . As further evidence that A.A. is becoming increasingly known in the educational field, Willard Waller, Professor of Sociology at Barnard, the women's college of Columbia University, recently gave to his students an illuminating and comprehensive lecture on Alcoholics Anonymous. . . . Reporting on the progress of the group in Montreal, Canada, a Buffalo member who led the first open meeting, writes that Montreal has two meetings a week, one closed and one open, the latter being for "members and their wives." What!--no women alcoholics in Montreal?

Regular A.A. meetings are held by the alcoholic patients at Howard State Hospital, Howard, R. I., since members of the Boston Group visited the hospital several months ago, and received the encouragement of Drs. Vera and Friz Berhendt. . . . A new group in Providence, R. I., an outgrowth of the Akron, Ohio, group, is receiving the cooperation not only of the doctors of Howard State Hospital but of the State Welfare Department, social workers and clergy alike.

Judge E. J. Shea, as guest-speaker at a recent meeting of the Springfield (Vermont) group, spoke about the number of highway accidents in which the contributing factor was intoxication. He said the increase in arrests in the past few years for drunkenness has brought out more and more the interest of the people in the A.A. movement.

The latest of the new groups in this hemisphere is in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

.
..

Under a Massachusetts legislative recess-commission recommendation made in May, the state's liquor drinkers would pay $2 a year for a "personal license" and a state hospital would be established with the money to treat alcoholics. A 448-page report declared that crime, mental illness and charity costs from inebriety in the state totaled $60,000,000 annually, compared with liquor revenues of $13,139,266 in 1943. Licenses would be revoked for abuse. The commission also recommended labeling liquor with "directions" for moderation and a warning against over-indulgence.

Dr. Laurence L. Cross, a clergyman of Berkeley, California, as guest-speaker at the fourth anniversary meeting of the East Bay Group in Oakland last month, praised the group for "not only wanting to cure itself, but knowing how to do it." Dr. Cross declared he "wouldn't want to improve on your Twelve Steps of recovery any more

than

I would want to improve on the Ten Commandments." Over 350 people attended the meeting of the East Bay Group, which includes members from Alameda, Albany, Berkeley, El Cerrito, Hayward, Oakland and San Leandro.

In Marshalltown, Iowa, the A.A.s are starting a library of their own. . . . At the 5th annual banquet of the Little Rock, Arkansas Group, with over 350 present, a clergyman member told his interesting story The Glendale-Burbank, California, women's group which began with four women seven months ago now numbers 20. . . . Of 18 talks on miscellaneous topics at the Springfield, Mass. Speakers Club, one of the two chosen as best by a guest critic was on Alcoholics Anonymous.

Webster gives the definition of "lovelorn" as "forsaken by one's love." So it's not surprising to find alcoholics discussed every now and then in the Beatrice Fairfax syndicated column "Lovelorn," always accompanied by a lucid exposition of some phase of A.A. A late column cites Edgar Allan Poe as one tragic case of an alcoholic who was also a genius. And Stephen Foster, who wrote "Way Down Upon the Swanee River," and many of our cherished songs, drank up a fortune and died in a Broadway flophouse. A realist, the writer of "Lovelorn" doesn't fail to mention, along with the geniuses and near-geniuses, us common mortals who make up the majority of alcoholics--among whom are many returning veterans taking the short cut of alcoholic relief from battle fatigue and bomb neurosis; and the home-keeping men and women who have rushed to drink to blunt the raw anguish of the death of loved ones.

|||||

+++Message 1215. . . . . Gv July 1945 - News Circuit
From: t . . . . . 8/16/2003 5:20:00 AM

|||||

Grapevine, July 1945

A.A. 's Country-Wide News Circuit

It was a big night at New York's 48th Street Theatre, June 15, when A. A. s bought out the house and intermittently laughed with delight or felt strangely nostalgic, as Frank Fay of "Harvey" fame subtly put one Elwood P. Dowd through his teetering paces.

Frank Fay read his lines like an angel, imbuing every word he spoke with the magic of an artist. And he pantomimed so vividly his physically non-existent friend Harvey
that we felt the presence of the six-foot-tall rabbit with ears that big, right
there on the stage before us. Together with the ebullient Josephine Hull, Frank Fay makes
"Harvey" the fascinating, amusing play it is.

We, a member of A. A., went to see a play about a drunk--or in the polite language of medicine, an alcoholic--and his imaginary animal, Harvey. We saw instead a lovable, divinely wistful tippler who might be a potential, but he's far from being an actual alcoholic. And as for Harvey, well, if we alcoholics could have conjured up such
a wonderfully understanding pal as Harvey, we'd probably still be at the bottle.

Elwood P. Dowd's life hasn't at all become unmanageable from alcohol, though
the lives of his sister and niece do grow hilariously complicated. The road that lies between the peaceloving Elwood and an honest-to-goodness drunk is long and laborious, to put it mildly. And by the time the end of that road is reached an alcoholic is far from having fun with his drinking.

"No one ever brings small things into a bar," Elwood says in a chef d'oeuvre
of
a scene where the A. A. audience sat and breathed and lived Frank Fay's soft-spoken words, communicating as they did a very real sensation of the nostalgic yearning

that floats along with the transcending of reality, the fleeing beyond reality into
a beautiful world of one's own imagining. This is something every alcoholic has experienced, to the depth of his being. It is a state of mind which we alcoholics
longed in vain to achieve and to sustain, and failed. Only the Elwood P. Dowds
of fiction can do it.

In his witty curtain speech Frank Fay, who is off the stuff these days, made
it quite clear that Elwood's antics are all in fun, whereas too much booze is in reality
no
fun at all. "If I could have been as nice as Elwood P. Dowd," Frank Fay said,
"I don't know as I would ever have given it up."

We don't know what sort of a fellow Frank Fay was in his drinking days, but he impressed this reporter, in a backstage chat after the show, as being quite as nice as Elwood ever was. "The A.A. s were a swell audience, you tell them for me, "
he said, grinning happily.

The 25 "squads, " which the groups in Minneapolis, Minn, are called, keep track
of each other's activities via their printed news bulletin Hi and Dri.... The Des Moines, Iowa, A.A.s display an admirable confidence, as evidenced by this item
in their news bulletin AA Tribune: "In the event that anyone is downtown at any hour the club isn't open, you can always get the key at the Travelers' Aid Society next door,
by asking them, and, being sober. "

Also from Iowa, as reported in the Marshalltown group's Camel Club Chronicle, comes this story. A drunk who had just lost his home, waiting for a trolley in St.
Louis,
Mo., picked up a stray alley cat, took it aboard the trolley, and sold it as a pedigreed animal to a fellow seated next to him who also had one too many.

Moral: The cat got a home and the drunk got plastered.

Raymond J. McCarthy, field investigator of the Yale Plan Clinic, was guest speaker at a meeting of the Ansonia, Conn., group at the Veteran's Memorial Home in that city .

. . . There'll soon be a new group in Mt. Morris, N. Y., where a Rochester A. A. has been doing some speaking at various clubs, aided by Dr. Kirby Collier, psychiatrist of Rochester.

Mississippi has a brand new group in Greenwood. The flourishing Jackson group was formed five months ago . . . . The Saginaw, Michigan, A.A.s have grown sufficiently numerous to branch out on their own, independent of the Bay City group of which they are an offshoot . . . . Wisconsin is another state that is rapidly expanding, with its latest group in Kenosha. A. A. s from Milwaukee, Racine, Evanston and Chicago have been cooperating to get the Kenoshians started . . . . The South Shore members of New York's Nassau County group now hold their closed meetings apart from the Mineola, N. Y., group, due to growth in attendance.

Decatur, Illinois, reports that its growth is slow but sure, and the same goes for Springfield.... The Toss Pot, an inter-group news bulletin of Charleston, Virginia, reporting also for Huntington, Parkersburg, Logan, Wheeling, Beckley, and Gauley Bridge, salutes two members who commute regularly to Huntingdon meetings from Ohio, one from Gallipolis, the other from Sciotoville.

Municipal Judge William Shane, of Ashtabula, Ohio, who long has been active in promoting A. A., spoke at a meeting in Conneaut, Ohio, with members attending from Meadville, Erie and Ashlabula g r o u p s . . . . Adelaide Hawley's radio program from Manhattan lately featured a talk by Marty Mann on the work of the NCEA, Marty, as always, announcing herself as a member of A. A.

No Repeaters!

To avoid possible disadvantage to the hospital, New York's Knickerbocker Hospital service for A.A. -sponsored alcoholics (The Grapevine, June, 1945) provides for acceptance of an alcoholic patient only once. No repeaters.

|||||

+++Message 1216. . . . . Rel. & AA - The Sign, July 1946

From: Jim Blair . . . . . 8/16/2003 8:40:00 AM

|||||

The Sign, Vo1.25: 14-16, July 1946.

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS

By James P. Timmins

It was Fred who, nearly three years ago, introduced me to the Alcoholics Anonymous, one of the greatest social movements of modern times, a movement whose implications have not even begun to be realized by the world at large.

In the early evening of that far-off day, the doorbell of St. Bridget's Rectory rang. I didn't know that something new was entering into my life. I didn't even know it when I opened the door and found there a old friend, but a friend in what a state! He was bedraggled, down-at-the-heels, clothed in a ancient sweater and a pair of pants which had long ago seen their best days. And he was drunk. Not stupidly or staggering, but excitedly drunk. More than that, in the midst of his drunkenness he was ashamed. I could sense the thought passing through his mind. For five years I had not seen him or even heard of him, save rarely, and now, down and out, he was in the sorry position of standing on my doorstep seeking help. Fred who, a few years back, had often welcomed me into his pleasant home.

I could hardly believe my eyes. Was this friend the clean-cut, affable, ambitions young businessman whom I once had known? I knew that he drank in the old days, but not, to my knowledge, to excess, I knew too, that he had never been and was not now anything like the classical conception of the weak-willed, heedless, and irresponsible drunkard. He loved his home, his lovely wife, and their child, a bright, intelligent boy. He was ambitious and able, diplomatic and efficient in his work of selling. But something had happened to him in the years during which we had lost contact, in the years when he drifted away not only from me but from every friend that he ever knew. Something had torn him loose from everything bright and beautiful in life and dropped him into an abyss where all was sordid and mean and ugly. What was it?

Fred himself didn't know. He came into my rectory, sat down with me in the office, and poured into my ears such a tale of bewilderment, confusion, and utter despair as I have never before heard. That night I looked into the mind of a man in hell. For two hours, in broken, stumbling words, he poured out his story of the wracking, futile, hopeless struggle with the demon of alcohol that possessed him and drove him further and further into the dark and devastating loneliness of the pit. Now he was nearly at the end. He could no longer stand the utter desolation, the panic fear that alcohol itself was not capable of taking from him save in the hours of complete unconsciousness. With tears streaming down his face, this drunk begged of me to give him the answer. Was it death? Or was there some secret which I possessed, some lifeline which I could throw to him by which he could lift himself out of the monstrous inferno in which he found himself. I had to answer him that I did not know. I assured him that suicide was not the solution. Beyond that I had nothing to offer. Before my friend, who I would have given anything to help, I sat troubled and helpless.

All that I might have suggested he had already done. A good Catholic, with a well-founded and strong faith, he told me of wild prayers before the altar, begging God to take away this devil that drove him to drink against his will, this devil that was robbing him of everything that he held dear in life. He told me of the business he had wrecked, of the final job from which he had resigned before he was fired. He told me of the shame and misery of 'dependence on his wife, compelled to work to support him and hold their home together. All meant nothing. Week after week after week, and month after month, he drank with only the intervals of nauseating physical sickness and shaky recovery to interrupt. He told me, among other things, one of the saddest stories of futile appeal to the better self of an alcohol addict that I have ever heard.

His mother-in-law lay dying. She knew that her end was near, but, forgetful of herself, good, religious woman that she was, she thought this was the opportunity to bring back Fred to his senses and to restore him to a normal life. She summoned him to her sick chamber, and there, in the presence of his wife, she asked him to kneel by her bedside, put his two hands in hers, and promise, before God, that he would reform his life and be the husband and father that he should. Shocked and moved as he had never been before, he knelt beside the dying woman, and with his hands in hers, promised with all the sincerity in his soul that he would never touch another drop of liquor, and he walked out of her presence, and with her words and his own promise ringing in his ears, got drunk.

To this man, my friend, I could give nothing. All that I could think of was, "This is no ordinary drunk. This man is abnormal. Maybe he is crazy." I thought an able psychiatrist might be able to tell Fred what was the matter with him. If it were a mental illness, maybe it might be curable by some therapy which a layman would not know.

The next day I saw his wife and heard from her the usual story of worry, uncertainty, insecurity, and anger at her husband for his apparently willfully senseless course, and a gnawing fear of what the future might bring. She was willing to do anything. Fred himself had not come back. Following what she said was a regular custom, he had disappeared, moved by some vague desire of not annoying his family by his drinking. But he had come back late that night. She called me and told me he, too, was willing to do anything. An appointment with a Hartford psychiatrist was arranged for the following Monday afternoon, by which time Fred, it was hoped, would be reasonably sane and sober. The three of us went in, and the able doctor, an unsuspected angel in disguise, examined my friend alone for a long time. Afterward, he sat down with the three of us and told us in plain, blunt terms, "This man is physically all right, and he is mentally all right; he is not crazy, but he has a disease. He is an alcohol addict. As far as I am concerned, the case is hopeless."

Thank God that was not final. It might have been except for what the doctor added: "There is, perhaps, one chance for him. Here in Hartford, there is a group of people called the Alcoholics Anonymous, alcohol addicts who are trying to help each other to stay sober. In some cases they have been quite successful. I have the telephone number of one of them here. I suggest that you get in touch with him." Right there and then, in the doctor's office, we did. This man urged Fred to waste no time, to attend the meeting that night at the Blue Plate Restaurant on Farmington Avenue in West Hartford. Fred went, but not without the company of his wife, who was afraid to trust him out of her sight. At that, he had to fortify himself with a couple of drinks before venturing into the strange, unknown territory of an A.A. meeting; and here comes the marvel, the joyous, unbelievable marvel. Those were the last drinks that Fred, the hopeless, irreclaimable drunk, has had from that day to this. I was confronted by the miracle of the A.A.

Oh, I was incredulous enough at first. A week went by, and Fred stayed sober. But anyone, even an alcoholic addict, might be able to do that by strenuous effort. Then other weeks went by, stretching into months, and Fred still was sober. I began to ask myself, "What is this thing called Alcoholics Anonymous? What is its secret?" There must be some very powerful remedy in it when it could halt a hopeless drunkard in his tracks and put him on the road to reason and a new life. I got the book and read it, and I went to a meeting to see, and I was conquered.

Now, subject to the proviso that all I say is my own opinion, I will try to trace the A.A. pathway to success.

When Fred came to me, he was, even in his drunkenness, battered and beaten down until he had reached his bottom. There was no more pride, no more egotistical self-reliance left in him.

He was willing to accept help from anybody or anything. He had acquired what I consider the basic virtue necessary for any man who wants to work the A.A. program successfully, the virtue of humility.

It is neither an abject nor a crawling virtue. It is, as the word itself from the Latin humus, the earth, signifies, a down-to-earth, realistic view of one's self, not as the center of the universe and the lord of the world, but as a very small and insignificant unit in the vast sea of humanity. When one looks at the matter objectively, and not through the veils of self-deceit with which the alcohol addict beclouds reality, he sees that humility is an active, common-sense admission of the hard fact that nobody can shape the world to his liking or ever walk the ways of the world successfully in lonely independence. But the alcoholic, isolated by his terrible pride, must try it, and he is hurt, deeply hurt, when the world rolls on, indifferent to his needs and his demands, careless of his independence, rubbing raw his self-esteem. No wonder he seeks the solace of the anesthetic, alcohol, to him release from the painful proddings of his own intelligence constantly reminding of his actual inadequacy, of his failure to live up to the lofty concepts of his egotistical self-appraisal. With his intellect deadened, plunged into the realms of alcoholic illusion, he can set up a dream world where, paraphrasing the words of Henley, he can be the imaginary master of his fate and the pretended captain of his soul. But the real world forever crumbles the dream, and the illusion is harder to seize as the years go on. And finally there is little left but wrath and horror and degradation, and the refuge of oblivion. Yet, even at that stage, when the anesthetic has lost its power to give anything but a living death, there are alcoholics who cling with devilish persistence to their pride, who will not admit to themselves " I am powerless over alcohol - my life has become unmanageable, and I need help."

Who can depict that soul-searing loneliness of the alcoholic? He lives in the bosom of his family; he eats and drinks with them; but he is as removed from them as the inhabitant of another planet. They do not understand him, nor he them. They look upon him as a heedless and irresponsible destroyer of their peace, a shirker of duty, and a willful devotee of the dreadful vice of drunkenness. They argue with him. They reproach him. They strive in every way possible to get him to stop drinking. To them, it seems a simple matter of using his common sense and will power, but the alcoholic knows it is not. He knows that he is driven by some incomprehensible compulsion, so his sensitive soul shrinks into itself. He lies and evades and cheats to protect it from the painful wounds inflicted on it not only by his family, but by his friends and his associates in the business or social world. Even in the midst of those who love him, he lives alone with no remedy against the stark terrors of isolation save the old enemy, the anesthetic, alcohol.

In the companionship of the A.A. what a remedy for loneliness the alcoholic finds! He cannot deceive these people. He cannot evade them. They know him through and through. They have endured his sufferings, borne his terrors, and felt his remorse. In short, they talk his language.

With humility and hope, Fred proceeded on his road into the A.A. By example he learned the value of relaxation. "Easy does it," he heard repeated again and again. He learned to narrow his problem down to manageable proportions. He learned, in the words of Sir William Osler, "The load of tomorrow added to that of yesterday, carried today, makes the strongest falter."

He came to the core of the Alcoholics Anonymous way of life, the religious element. That, for him, was not too difficult. Born and brought up a good Catholic, holding on to his faith even in the worst days of his addiction, he believed in God and the necessity of God's grace if he was to live soundly and sanely. Not all alcoholics have as much when they enter the A.A. Self-centered as they are, making idols of themselves, they shy like frightened horses at the bare mention of a higher Power. How many times the addict has said, "I like the Alcoholics Anonymous; but this God business, I will have none of it." Yet there it is. Seven of twelve steps in the A.A. way of life refer to God. How can one get around that fact? All that I can say is that the higher Power in those seven steps of the A.A. grows upon the alcoholic, even if he has little religion or no religion at all. I have seen it grow, even in Catholics. For they, too, by their addiction, withdraw themselves from the God in whom they believe, from the Church which is their mother. It is as if, even against the father of the family of the Faith they build for themselves the same wall which separates them from their wives, their children, and their friends. In rare cases like that of the holy and devout Matt Talbot, potential saint of the alcoholic, the battering ram of a great and all-absorbing devotion breaks down the wall and frees the alcoholic from the domination of his obsession, but not too often.

A single instance will suffice to show what I mean by the growth of faith in a Catholic member of the A.A. A Catholic member who is a resident of a city not far from Hartford, sober now and happy in his sobriety, went to a church to pray. "I had no particular thought in doing so," he said, "save to make a visit to the Blessed Sacrament. Yet as I knelt before the altar, there came over me a peace which passes understanding, and I felt the presence of God as I never felt it before. I found myself praying, not for any gifts from God, but that He would walk with me and direct my will and my life so that I might continue in this way of happiness I had found. And I thought of myself as I was a year ago, kneeling in front of that same altar, praying wildly that God would get me out of this drunken debauch, that He would not let me lose my job, that I wouldn't have the jitters too bad, that He would keep my wife from bawling me out when I came home. That was not a prayer. That was the screaming of a soul in torment, as remote from God as the devil in hell. I thank God that through the A.A. my faith has been restored to me to be my solace and my strength instead of my reproach."

In the A.A., if the addict does his work well and sincerely, something happens. The self-god is toppled from its pedestal, and in its place a new image begins to take form. It is the shape of a Power beyond himself, whose nature he may not even be able to formulate in words, but which, nevertheless, becomes an ever-increasing reality in his life. I can put that remarkable and beautiful experience into no better words than those said to me by a one-time suspicious, cynical, self-centered alcoholic. "Father, I can hardly believe what has come over me. You know that less than a year ago, I told you that I could take everything in A.A. except its spiritual angle. I simply didn't and couldn't believe in any kind of a God. This morning, by the Lord Harry, I find myself driving through the sunlight, looking at the grass and the trees, and the blue sky like a sentimental sap, happy as a lark, and feeling, mind you, feeling that in back of it all was Someone or Something bigger than I am, and that I needn't worry about anything as long as that Someone or Something was with me. I must be nuts but it is a nice way to be nuts." There, put crudely, is the spiritual experience of the A.A., the experience of the birth of a living faith.

Out of faith and hope in the heart of the addict are born charity, not John Boyle O'Reilly's "organized charity, scrimped and iced, in the name of a cautious, statistical Christ," but rather the virtue of which St. Paul tells: "Charity is patient, is kind: charity envieth not, dealeth not perversely; is not puffed up, is not ambitious, seeketh not her own, is not provoked to anger, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth with the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." With that charity, which is essentially nothing but the love of God and the love of neighbor, the whole way of a man in the A.A. becomes easy, and not only easy I but happy. If he has true charity, how can he help searching out his own defects and with the aid of God, trying to remove them? How can he help making amends for wrongs done? How can he help praying that he may conform with the will of God who has become his rod and his staff? God and my neighbor are now the watchwords of his life. In those watchwords is a challenge to the world.

The A.A. itself challenges nobody, has no quarrel with anybody. Its sole aim, its single purpose, is to give the alcohol addict the tools with which, if he wants to use them, he may rise from the slough of addiction, become sober, and be happy about it.

Its seed was formed a decade ago in the mind of a despairing drunk whose black shell of isolation was shattered into bits by an actual grace of God, and whose hope was reborn in the sunlight of God's presence. The seed germinated in the warmth of companionship between that drunk and another, sitting in a room together, talking of their problem. Out of the seed has grown a strong tree made up of the approximately twenty thousand addicts who have attained sobriety through the A.A. It will continue to grow without diversion and toward one end only, the salvation of the alcoholic addict. Yet, still I say the A.A. offers a challenge to the whole modern world.

The Church, of course, always has and always will preach a way of life which is opposed to the way of the world. She must forever teach that the true

of renovating it for their clubhouse--and "we are going to be very proud of our new home. " The address is 1925 North 11th Street.

And the first A.A. clubhouse, as such, is to be built by the North Hollywood
group.
Ground has already been broken on the Chandler Boulevard property that is now theirs, and a modern one-story $10, 000 building, with lots of windows for sunlight
and fresh air, will soon be erected.

The wilds of Alaska have been penetrated by A.A. Well, not exactly the wilds,
for Alaska's first group is in Skagway--a town known historically as the landing place of large quantities of supplies and thousands of people during the 1897-98
"Klondike
Rush" to reach the gold mines in the upper (Canadian) Yukon . . . .
Australia's
first group, in Sydney, reports good progress--and another one is now under way 50 miles distant . . . . The Hawaiian A.A.s, in Honolulu, are going strong, their numbers ever increasing.

An out-of-town member, addressing his fellow alcoholics in Memphis, Tenn., explains
A.A.'s success this way: "A psychiatrist talks to a hopelessly afflicted alcoholic at one time, and does him good. A physician attends to him at another time, and does him good. A minister talks with him at still another time, and does him good. The assistance each of these three agencies offers is needed deeply. But they come
at different times. In A.A. I have found all three influences exerted in the same program. " . . . In Fargo, N. D., a pastor speaking before a businessmen's club,
said
the basis for A.A.'s effectiveness was "spiritual. "

Over a year ago Eleanor L. started a daytime group in the Los Angeles area for housewives and mothers, or just men and women who for various reasons couldn't get to night meetings. On May 3, 1944, Eleanor "presided" over an attendance of 1. Today she is presiding over an attendance of about 30 each week. She sees significance in the fact that women predominate the membership--women who are not employed outside their homes. There are also some working women and a few swingshift men. But the influx of A.A. women from the homes has convinced Eleanor that soon there'll be need of a group for them exclusively, a group pointed to deal more specifically with their distinct problems. She is preparing to meet this need as it becomes more apparent.

The Atlanta, Ga., Group has been successful in sobering up a home-town lad stationed in China--writing him long letters, sending him the A.A. book, the reprint of Jack Alexander's Saturday Evening Post article of 1941, and pamphlets. This achievement brought much spontaneous publicity. Result: the group is being flooded with mail from eligibles, friends and relatives who think if A.A. s in the U. S. A. can sober up a drunk in China, maybe they've really got something.

In a late issue of The Christian Science Monitor, on the editorial page, speaks a man who doesn't mind letting the world know he has a drinking problem. John C. of Boston, Mass., writes of his inability to stay sober by himself, but since he "connected with A.A. and with God's help" he hasn't had a drop. "Strangest thing of all for one who loved his drink, I have no desire for it. "

A recent fourth-birthday party in Dallas, Texas, was widely commented on by nonalcoholics as "the strangest party ever held in Dallas. " It was the fourth year of dryness for Esther, the "New Orleans drunk, " as she is affectionately called by Whence this saga of salvaged soaks? The A.A. answer included:

1. The program.
2. The A.A. book, and other literature including a well edited and cartooned monthly magazine, "Grapevine."
3. The group.

The Program

The program consists of twelve suggested steps:

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol, that our lives have become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our short comings.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.
12. Having had a spiritual experience as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

All twelve steps are suggestions only. None is told which steps to work first, nor at what rate of progression. The sole requirement for A.A. membership is a desire to attain sobriety as the result of having a drinking problem.

The A.A. Book

The A.A. book is the four hundred page Bible of the ex-drinking class. The first half has eleven chapters on the disease of alcoholism. Here is the "distilled" wisdom of many bottle scarred veterans with years of combat duty against John Barleycorn. Come ye of the early morning shakes, the palsied hand, the throbbing aspirin-defying noggin, the "reverse-english" digestive system: read these pages and the twenty-six thumbnail biographies of A.A. case history lusher in the book's second section. Even within the compass of these "jagiographies" tis clear that alcoholism is no respecter of I persons. They are rich and poor, young and old, Catholic and Protestant and agnostic, all giving testimony how A.A. brought them out of the hard-sauce fog back to sanity.

The Drunkard's Dilemma

Comes a time when the alcoholic is faced with a terrible dilemma: to attain permanent abstinence, or go along with the progressive deterioration of alcoholism. For an alcoholic, there is no regaining the status of sociable drinker. Once an alcoholic always an alcoholic. A.A. groups instruct and re-instruct in this harsh truth, which kills the self-deception of the alcoholic that he will some time, some how be a controlled drinker. This is a very cruel truth, akin to the no sugar edict to diabetics or the physical exertion taboo of the tubercular. Most A.A.'s are beaten into A.A. by booze. No alcoholic welcomes his classification "alcoholic." Nor does e a life sentence to sobriety. But the A.A. group shows an alcoholic how he can attain sobriety twenty-four hours at a time, in a pleasant, sociable, useful way.

The A.A. Group

The A.A. group is an enormous ingredient in the A.A. recoveries. Groups meet at least once a week and vary in size from three persons to forty or fifty. They include young and old, men and women. Meetings last an hour or two, located in homes, stores, rectories, community houses, hotel rooms, lodge halls. The meeting opens with a brief quiet time of recollection or silent prayer. The theme of the meeting varies, but usually includes personal histories of drunks, illustrative taproom dramas, elucidation on some of the twelve steps, and considerable advice to the novices. Though fundamentally serious, the dialogue supplies a full quota of laughs and banter. The A.A. fellowship is not grim but very mirthful. When the Tyro abstainer realizes he is surrounded with his own kind he overcomes his feelings of guilt and shyness and after a meeting or two gives forth uninhibitedly his past and present struggles for sobriety. A secret of the fine fellowship of A.A. is that each is both teacher and student, both speaker and listener. Education is blended with self-expression. Talk is releasing and creative. The weekly meeting which in the beginning seems an obligatory measure soon becomes a gladly anticipated opportunity for growth and friendship. Everybody is both patient and doctor; meetings conclude with the group recitation of the Lord's Prayer.

Other A.A. Weapons

Besides the three major weapons of the twelve steps, the group meetings and the A.A. book, there are other items of defense against the next drunk. Each A.A. has an A.A. sponsor, as Catholics do in Confirmation. Any day the going is rough and the craving tortuous, the member phones or visits his sponsor. A heart to heart talk generally kills the compulsive urge to drink. New members are urged to carry candy bars because chocolate cuts the whiskey yen. Various A.A. literature is procurable; short pamphlets; reprints of A.A. speeches; and a monthly magazine, "The Grapevine." In some cities there are A.A. clubs to which members may go; they sit in for cards, talk, or absorb a few coffees and cokes and take recess from the pressure of daily life. Many members, long years drunks, resume their religious affiliations when on the path to sobriety. Catholics, of course, enjoy profound and rich advantages on the spiritual steps of the program because we have all the sacraments, masses, and prayers of the Church to use in maintaining sobriety. Religious differences are never stressed in A.A. The common desperate need for sobriety is the heart and soul of A.A. We Catholics supply our full share of alcoholics in the U.S.A. and are also a sizeable fraction of the A.A. membership. Through A.A. any Catholic alcoholic can attain sobriety and in good time help others now in alcoholic drunkenness and despair. Let it be understood, A.A. is not a "cure." No alcoholic is cured in a final sense any more than any Christian is "saved" in a final sense while alive. A.A. is a way of life whereby sobriety for alcoholics is made possible, and palatable. Every twenty-four hours (or oftener) the A.A. man or woman re-dedicating himself or herself to one more day of sobriety, with God's help. This daily rededication should be very familiar to, and easy for Catholics who practice it in all walks of ordinary life as well as in the strictest monastic orders. A.A. like the good life is only for those who sincerely desire it. For an alcoholic, A.A. may well be the instrument of his salvation in this life and the next. In A.A. an alcoholic's recovery chance is better than 50-50. Outside A.A. the individual alcoholic is generally a poor risk, a long shot, a casualty with a slim chance of permanent recovery.

The address nationally is:

The Alcoholic Foundation

Grand Central Annex, Box 459,

New York City 17.

Mitchell, S. D.; Spirit Lake, Iowa; Rapid City, S. D., and Pender, Neb.

The Ohio towns of Sandusky, Fremont, Bellevue, Monroeville, Norwalk, Milan and Wakeman were represented at a dinner of the Bellevue and Norwalk groups in Norwalk.

Among the guests were clergymen, city, industrial and police officials.

The Northwest is rapidly expanding, with, Washington stepping out in the foreground.

Seattle now has two groups; Spokane is developing so swiftly that the members are now seeking a large home suitable for a permanent clubhouse; and Everett A.A. s

are

the latest to join the ranks and hold their own meetings.

Gov. Chauncey Sparks of Alabama has appointed members of a state commission "for education on alcoholism," which was created by the 1945 legislature under the sponsorship of A.A. The commission is charged "with the power to prepare and administer a program for the rehabilitation of alcoholics and the education of the public with respect to dealing with alcoholism as a disease."

Speaking before the year-old Orlando, Fla., group, Lt. Col. John N. Cotton, chief of neuropsychiatry, Welsh Convalescent Hospital, Daytona Beach, accented A.A.'s contribution to individual communities and thus to the nation as a whole, from

a sociological point of view.

The Kansas press has been having some good-natured fun writing about the Topeka group and its new clubhouse. The Sunflower state has been legally dry since 1880.

A. A.

Today, the only legal beverages have no more than 3.2 per cent alcoholic voltage

to induce consumption. Topeka, home of 67, 833 persons, bastion of state dry laws

and

lawmakers, has had an A.A. group since 1943 and, says one journalist, "Adding to doubts of Topekans who have seen whiskey bottles tossed on the statehouse grounds and lying along Kansas Avenue, A.A. has now moved into the finest clubrooms in the city.

" The newsmen carefully mention the fact that A. A. isn't at all interested in whiskey from a prohibition angle, that it is dedicated to the rehabilitation of alcoholics who honestly want to recover.

Kansas City, Kan., is another of the groups to buy its own clubhouse. Located at 1925 North Eleventh Street, the former mansion has had partitions ripped out downstairs, reducing the once many-roomed house into a meeting hall, while upstairs four rooms remain for general use.

Last month the Rome-Utica (N. Y. ) group with 31 regular members was 18 months old and fittingly celebrated the occasion with a dinner and meeting at the Hotel Utica which drew an attendance of about 75. As reported by Jim C., chairman of the event, 14 groups were represented among the people attending, with guests from as far as Cleveland and Louisville. Dick S., Cleveland, was the principal speaker. Commenting editorially on the meeting, the Utica Observer-Dispatch said in part: "That gathering of Alcoholics Anonymous in Utica is significant. Members of the organization are against alcohol but unlike most campaigns against the beverage, the opposition is wholly an individual problem. The member aims to help himself and to assist others only as they desire to be helped on a purely voluntary basis. This movement is widespread, for members came from two states and a dozen or more cities."

In Tonawanda, N. Y., the non-alcoholic wives of A.A. s have organized under the name of Alcoholics Anonymous Auxiliary; these A.A.A.s are proving of tremendous help to nervous wives of new A.A. members . . . After representatives of New England A.A.s had talked with him, Mayor Albert W. Glynn of Haverhill, Mass., stated that the "splendid success of A.A. these past 10 years prompts me to offer every encouragement to the group now forming in Haverhill"... "Their Work and Ours" was the title

of
an address given by a Jacksonville, Fla., member before the Council of Social Agencies.

The Des Moines, Iowa, A.A.s are making preparations for their second anniversary meeting to be held Oct. 28. Marty M. is scheduled as principal guest speaker.
But,
according to the A.A. Tribune., written by "Hildagarde; " there's one cause
for worry. Scaling capacity of the place where the speaking program will be held
is 800, and that may not be enough . . . . A recent issue of the Camel Club Chronicle, printed in Marshalltown, Iowa, was given over to quotes from a talk by one of
the members of the Waterloo group, including these words : . . . "I like to feel that . .
. we A.A. s are the individuals chosen by God to learn all the symptoms of the disease so that we have the personal knowledge to successfully apply the remedy
for the many thousands who will need our assistance in the future. It's been a long
and tough course, and it all will have been worthwhile only if we go forth to apply its principles just as the doctor, the lawyer, the minister or the priest would do
in his own field . . . . " Says The Toss Pot, printed in Charleston, W. Va., "What we need is more brain and less brayin'. " From the same publication, the reader learns
that Charleston is now booming along with several closed group meetings and one central group open meeting a week, with still another new group about to get started.

During the war, A.A. meetings were held in many industrial plants; trade journals wrote about the thousands of man-hours salvaged through A.A. At one of the Henry
Kaiser shipyards on the West coast one A.A. alone was responsible for saving 8, 000 man-hours per ship by suggesting improved methods of doing work. Three-fourths
of the

Meanwhile his family suffered the privations of a fatherless and poverty-stricken home. Joe's wife with a brood of young children made heroic efforts to be breadwinner and mother and father and housekeeper. As the children grew up they did their part to keep the home together. Difficult as it was, all managed to finish high school and some went on to college. They were a family any father could be proud of.

This brief glimpse of Joe's background is not by way of biography. It is the necessary preface toward understanding a mistake I made in trying to help him. While he was on the way to making good, though not yet united with his wife and children, I wrote a letter, pointing out all he had to gain by keeping sober and all he had to lose by crashing. His reply was a succinct explanation of Alcoholics Anonymous philosophy, which showed how unrealistic and dangerous my ideas had been. For this I was grateful. But I was no less astonished at the apologetic attitude Joe took toward the motive of keeping sober for one's own sake.

"Speaking of Alcoholics Anonymous philosophy," Joe wrote, "I reminded James yesterday of one of its first and foremost precepts: that is, to stay sober for ourselves and ourselves alone. It was always for someone else and I always failed in the end. The theory has been proved time and again that when an alcoholic stops drinking for his wife's sake or for the children or in order to get a job or gain someone's favor, it never succeeded permanently. When the family's good will was restored, the job secured or favors received, invariably the person returned to the habit.

"As you know Alcoholics Anonymous is not a pressure plan; in fact, pressure is like emery in its smooth design. We promise nothing, we take each day as it comes and resolve simply to avoid that first drink that day, never anticipating tomorrow's trials, much less next week's, month's or year's. I am sober today for myself, not because I might disappoint James or anyone else, and although I am fully aware of how many chips are at stake, I am not to consider the risk, but leave the whole matter in God's hands when I commit my will and desire to avoid drink that day.

"There is no doubt that pressure from the outside works inversely on the alcoholic. To remind him constantly of his tremendous undertaking (which is really nothing more difficult than avoiding the first drink for one day) and continue to point the terrible consequence of failure, is like having a man walk across a mine shaft over a six inch timber and let him see the certain destruction which awaits below if he falls. Whereas if he can be distracted from the danger by even some flimsy covering to hide the specter below he is more apt to retain his balance and cross successfully.

"When I remain sober for myself I risk nothing and have everything to gain. That is a pleasing, comfortable thought, and puts me completely at ease. But when I consider I am doing it for James, for you and others, for my job, I find I am risking everything with nothing to gain and everything to lose. Soon

I am teetering precariously, with a tight apprehensive feeling and a constant specter of defeat. I am robbed of my easy comfort and begin to look around for some distraction, finally winding up perhaps by getting drunk again, the very thing to make my fears materialize.

"So as I told James, if you think that reminding me of the consequences is to strengthen my resolve, don't believe it. That could be as bad as sympathy. Rather accept my daily program for what it is worth, and believe that I will succeed that day at least, and tomorrow - well, tomorrow is another day.... I am convinced that the Almighty is lending aid to this movement, but there are no natural or spiritual laws being violated, and a man still has to be willing to do his part in the age-old way. It works simply because it is extremely practical and because God is a friend."

I was happy to have such a helpful exposition of Joe's philosophy. However his statement that keeping sober simply for oneself was harsh rather astonished me. Discussing it with him later on I got the impression that such a motivation needed an apology. This seemed likewise to be the attitude of the organization. The psychology seemed correct in the sense that it worked. But apparently many members were a bit ashamed of it as being on the selfish side, and thought it needed an apology. Emphatically it does not.

The reason for this attitude is not hard to find. It stems from the false altruism which characterized many earnest and unselfish thinkers and writers of the nineteenth century and which has carried over into our own day.

An instance of this occurred not so long ago. To the question of whether it was right or wrong for a man to drink to intoxication in his own room without hurting anybody else, an astonishing number of students thought it was all right. They reasoned that as long as the man hurt no one but himself his conduct was not evil.

It need not be emphasized that to love one's neighbor, to do good to him, to aid him in his physical and material and intellectual and spiritual needs, to think and speak well of him certainly is virtuous. But the pro-social character of the conduct is not the sum total of virtue.

Contrariwise, to hurt one's neighbour in his property or person or good name or in his family is evil and vicious - but the anti-social aspect of the crimes is not the essence of their moral evil. In other words, moral goodness and moral evil are not simply factors of the loving or unloving character of a man's dealings with his fellow man.

In the last analysis the motive for a man's leading a good life must be sought in his personal relation with the ultimate goal of his existence.

Man's destiny is not just to serve as a tool for social betterment in general nor for the welfare and happiness of some human beings in particular. He has the obligation of self-fulfillment untainted by selfishness.

Selfishness is not self-love. The two are opposed as vice and virtue. For a man to give his life for his friend is self-love. For him to benefit himself to the injury of his neighbor is the vice of selfishness. Self-love is the obligation a man has to conduct himself relative to himself and to his neighbor in such a way that his conduct will conform to his destiny, which is his inherent and over-all perfection measured in terms of his highest and most truly human ideals.

If a man strives for these ideals, he is bound to fit into the social pattern. For by his nature man is a personal as well as a social being - not two things artificially sandwiched together, but one thing with an intricate dual aspect. True human perfection implies development along all truly human lines.

Consequently man's first duty is to provide for that development which can not be divorced from himself. True self-love means that he will strive to attach himself to such things and conduct as will advance him along the path of his truest good. Unlike selfishness which draws man away from his perfection, self-love urges a man toward true and complete personal moral goodness and his ultimate goal, a share .in God's infinite goodness.

Man's destiny, then, is personal-not, of course, in the sense that it is exclusively centered in himself, but in the sense that it is primarily related to his own person. There is absolutely no reason for a man's feeling apologetic about clinging to sobriety for his own sake. It accords perfectly with a reasonable view of life.

If along with reason, revelation is appealed to, it is evident that Jesus Christ never condemned self-love in its proper meaning as opposed to selfishness. Far from castigating self-love or subordinating it to love of neighbor, even if the neighbor be wife or husband, son or daughter, friend, acquaintance or enemy. Christ made self-love the standard of loving others. Love thy neighbor as thyself is the way the Savior put it.

No one, certainly, can accuse Christ of favoring a selfish way of life or of encouraging His followers not to love and to do good to their fellow human beings. Rather He was simply expressing the due order which should characterize love of self and love of neighbor. What does it profit a man to gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his own soul? is another expression of the Savior's message, that salvation is personal. And to want to be saved means to love oneself properly. The Brotherhood of Man is a profound reality. But all the reality it has comes as the consequence of the Fatherhood of God.

From a practical point of view the best argument for the motive of keeping sober for one's own sake is that it works. This is not to suggest that it works alone or that it is something which all by itself can bring a man or woman to forgo that first drink day after day. In no instance does the motive of self-love stand solitary. Clustered about it with more or less clarity are any number of motives. The important thing about this motive of keeping sober for one's own sake is that being dominant it fits into the psychological needs of the alcoholic.

To agree with Joe's analysis of the alcoholic's state of mind is not in the least to minimize the terrific importance of motive. It is merely to select the motive which experience has proved to be the most helpful and involving the least risk and which should be cultivated most carefully.

Joe's example of a man walking a narrow plank over a deep mine shaft illustrates the psychological situation perfectly. Now add to the facts of self-consciousness the special problems of the alcoholic who is trying to reform. He knows with all the sharpness of heartbreaking memories what a fall will involve. He remembers what it is to lose the respect and perhaps love of wife and children, to lose his job and home. He knows as the non-alcoholic can never know the semi-conscious existence of alcohol-sodden days and weeks. He knows the misery of coming to and finding himself dirty and hungry and sick and alone - with the damning knowledge of what he has done to those he loves. That memory with the thought of its possible repetition is the abyss the alcoholic is crossing on the narrow plank of his not taking a drink. To remind him of the chasm is to weaken him and invite disaster.

All this is clear to me now as it was not when I wrote Joe that letter. The motive of self-love has philosophy and theology as well as solid empirical and psychological considerations in its favor. For all things which it does not need is an apology. But of all things that it does need and most needs is humility. Self-love is not selfishness. It is not pride. It is a just appraisal of a difficult situation and on one's own worth and weakness. All this involves humility.

Humility is not weakness any more than pride is strength. It is not weakness which leads a man to a just estimate of his own resources before he begins building a house or meeting an opponent on the golf course or challenging an expert bridge player or meeting the disastrous attraction of drink. Humility is just plain honest common sense.

As such it plays a tremendous influence in the program of Alcoholics Anonymous. Most alcoholics have tried to recover but for the most part it has been on the assumption that they were not alcoholics, that they were men who "could take it or leave it alone." Until they are prepared to admit that they are not men who can take it or leave it alone, there is not much hope for them. Hope begins to shine when they admit they cannot meet the challenge of alcohol, when they admit they are not as other men, when they confess they have drunk up their privilege to drink and are sick and weak and cannot cure themselves. It is the truth; it is humility. Humility is one of the consequences of truest self-love.

numbers

an even dozen active members. The group was founded last February . . . . The Troy,

N.

Y., Group will be host Oct. 14 to the inter-city meeting of the Albany,

Schenectady,

Glen Falls, Utica and Troy Groups. The program now being arranged will include

both

local and downstate speakers.

Members of the Philadelphia Group have opened up a new outlet for diffusing information about A.A. by enlisting the interest of E. G. Budd, Jr., of the Edward G.

Budd Manufacturing Co. As the result of a letter to Mr. Budd, from an A.A.

employe

(F. H. C. ), a series of articles on A. A. has been appearing in the company's magazine, Buddgette.

Another new A. A. clubhouse has been opened, this one in Schenectady, N. Y . .

.

.

Twenty-five members from Barre, Stowe and Waterbury, their cars also rolling once more, attended a meeting of the Montpelier, Vt., group.

One of Manhattan's newer gatherings is a dinner-discussion meeting held every

other

Wednesday night at 135 Broadway by business and professional men. These meetings

are serving to acquaint key business men in New York with A.A. and thus widen our sphere of influence. . . . Besides a talk by Marty M., a big social evening and a banquet,

Des Moines, Iowa, A.A.s will feature on their second anniversary program Oct.

27

and

28 a discussion meeting for all Iowa groups. "Propositions" to be hashed over

will include sponsorship, "sliperoo department, " publicity, and club management.

The Archbishop of Boston, His Excellency, Most Reverend Richard J. Gushing,

was principal speaker at the first anniversary meeting of the original Dorchester

Group.

Since the founding of this group, two others have been started in Dorchester, giving

this large residential section of the city of Boston three A. A. units in operation.

New Jerseyites' band made its debut on V-J Day at the big A. A. clubhouse in Newark while 500 dancing, singing, rumless revelers consumed 2,500 bottles of soft drinks, 40 gallons of ice-cream and an unmeasured quantity of coffee. The celebrants came from Irvington, Trenton, Morristown, Maplewood, East Orange, Plainfield and other groups representing Essex, Morris and Union counties . . . . The Newark Group also recently conducted a unique meeting titled "Information Please. " A. A. questions were fired at a panel of experts made up of four older A. A. members with a fifth playing the role of Clifton Fadiman.... A New Jersey member recently outlined the A. A. program before the Summit Rotary Club, as did a Massachusetts member in Salem, with A.A.s and Rotarians alike attending from Beverly, Danvers, Ipswich, Lynn, Marblehead, Peabody, Somerville, Waltham and North Adams . . . . And a Burlington, Vt. A.A. addressed the congregation of the Congregational Church in Waterbury.

The growing Peekskill, N. Y. Group, outgrowth of the flourishing one in White Plains, was told by guest speaker, City Judge Thomas C. Macpherson, that courts for the most part consider alcoholics as "sick men and not as criminals, " that he could see no help for alcoholics by sending them to jail, and that "A. A; is doing a splendid job by providing the law enforcing agencies and the penal institutions with such an organization. " . . . The young man who started the Albuquerque, N. M. Group which includes many ranchers as well as business and professional men and women, says a sponsor from Denver, Colo., showed him how to start the ball rolling . . . . A Greenwood, Miss., member reports that for a year he and another man made the 95-mile trip to Memphis meetings, as did others from the neighboring countryside, emaciated to start the cycle all over again.

Meanwhile his family suffered the privations of a fatherless and poverty-stricken home. Joe's wife with a brood of young children made heroic efforts to be breadwinner and mother and father and housekeeper. As the children grew up they did their part to keep the home together. Difficult as it was, all managed to finish high school and some went on to college. They were a family any father could be proud of.

This brief glimpse of Joe's background is not by way of biography. It is the necessary preface toward understanding a mistake I made in trying to help him. While he was on the way to making good, though not yet united with his wife and children, I wrote a letter, pointing out all he had to gain by keeping sober and all he had to lose by crashing. His reply was a succinct explanation of Alcoholics Anonymous philosophy, which showed how unrealistic and dangerous my ideas had been. For this I was grateful. But I was no less astonished at the apologetic attitude Joe took toward the motive of keeping sober for one's own sake.

"Speaking of Alcoholics Anonymous philosophy," Joe wrote, "I reminded James yesterday of one of its first and foremost precepts: that is, to stay sober for ourselves and ourselves alone. It was always for someone else and I always failed in the end. The theory has been proved time and again that when an alcoholic stops drinking for his wife's sake or for the children or in order to get a job or gain someone's favor, it never succeeded permanently. When the family's good will was restored, the job secured or favors received, invariably the person returned to the habit.

"As you know Alcoholics Anonymous is not a pressure plan; in fact, pressure is like emery in its smooth design. We promise nothing, we take each day as it comes and resolve simply to avoid that first drink that day, never anticipating tomorrow's trials, much less next week's, month's or year's. I am sober today for myself, not because I might disappoint James or anyone else, and although I am fully aware of how many chips are at stake, I am not to consider the risk, but leave the whole matter in God's hands when I commit my will and desire to avoid drink that day.

"There is no doubt that pressure from the outside works inversely on the alcoholic. To remind him constantly of his tremendous undertaking (which is really nothing more difficult than avoiding the first drink for one day) and continue to point the terrible consequence of failure, is like having a man walk across a mine shaft over a six inch timber and let him see the certain destruction which awaits below if he falls. Whereas if he can be distracted from the danger by even some flimsy covering to hide the specter below he is more apt to retain his balance and cross successfully.

"When I remain sober for myself I risk nothing and have everything to gain. That is a pleasing, comfortable thought, and puts me completely at ease. But when I consider I am doing it for James, for you and others, for my job, I find I am risking everything with nothing to gain and everything to lose. Soon I am teetering precariously, with a tight apprehensive feeling and a constant specter of defeat. I am robbed of my easy comfort and begin to look around for some distraction, finally winding up perhaps by getting drunk again, the very thing to make my fears materialize.

"So as I told James, if you think that reminding me of the consequences is to strengthen my resolve, don't believe it. That could be as bad as sympathy. Rather accept my daily program for what it is worth, and believe that I will succeed that day at least, and tomorrow - well, tomorrow is another day.... I am convinced that the Almighty is lending aid to this movement, but there are no natural or spiritual laws being violated, and a man still has to be willing to do his part in the age-old way. It works simply because it is extremely practical and because God is a friend."

I was happy to have such a helpful exposition of Joe's philosophy. However his statement that keeping sober simply for oneself was harsh rather astonished me. Discussing it with him later on I got the impression that such a motivation needed an apology. This seemed likewise to be the attitude of the organization. The psychology seemed correct in the sense that it worked. But apparently many members were a bit ashamed of it as being on the selfish side, and thought it needed an apology. Emphatically it does not.

The reason for this attitude is not hard to find. It stems from the false altruism which characterized many earnest and unselfish thinkers and writers of the nineteenth century and which has carried over into our own day.

An instance of this occurred not so long ago. To the question of whether it was right or wrong for a man to drink to intoxication in his own room without hurting anybody else, an astonishing number of students thought it was all right. They reasoned that as long as the man hurt no one but himself his conduct was not evil.

It need not be emphasized that to love one's neighbor, to do good to him, to aid him in his physical and material and intellectual and spiritual needs, to think and speak well of him certainly is virtuous. But the pro-social character of the conduct is not the sum total of virtue.

Contrariwise, to hurt one's neighbour in his property or person or good name or in his family is evil and vicious - but the anti-social aspect of the crimes is not the essence of their moral evil. In other words, moral goodness and moral evil are not simply factors of the loving or unloving character of a man's dealings with his fellow man.

In the last analysis the motive for a man's leading a good life must be sought in his personal relation with the ultimate goal of his existence.

Man's destiny is not just to serve as a tool for social betterment in general nor for the welfare and happiness of some human beings in particular. He has the obligation of self-fulfillment untainted by selfishness.

Selfishness is not self-love. The two are opposed as vice and virtue. For a man to give his life for his friend is self-love. For him to benefit himself to the injury of his neighbor is the vice of selfishness. Self-love is the obligation a man has to conduct himself relative to himself and to his neighbor in such a way that his conduct will conform to his destiny, which is his inherent and over-all perfection measured in terms of his highest and most truly human ideals.

If a man strives for these ideals, he is bound to fit into the social pattern. For by his nature man is a personal as well as a social being - not two things artificially sandwiched together, but one thing with an intricate dual aspect. True human perfection implies development along all truly human lines.

Consequently man's first duty is to provide for that development which can not be divorced from himself. True self-love means that he will strive to attach himself to such things and conduct as will advance him along the path of his truest good. Unlike selfishness which draws man away from his perfection, self-love urges a man toward true and complete personal moral goodness and his ultimate goal, a share .in God's infinite goodness.

Man's destiny, then, is personal-not, of course, in the sense that it is exclusively centered in himself, but in the sense that it is primarily related to his own person. There is absolutely no reason for a man's feeling apologetic about clinging to sobriety for his own sake. It accords perfectly with a reasonable view of life.

If along with reason, revelation is appealed to, it is evident that Jesus Christ never condemned self-love in its proper meaning as opposed to selfishness. Far from castigating self-love or subordinating it to love of neighbor, even if the neighbor be wife or husband, son or daughter, friend, acquaintance or enemy. Christ made self-love the standard of loving others. Love thy neighbor as thyself is the way the Savior put it.

No one, certainly, can accuse Christ of favoring a selfish way of life or of encouraging His followers not to love and to do good to their fellow human beings. Rather He was simply expressing the due order which should characterize love of self and love of neighbor. What does it profit a man to gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his own soul? is another expression of the Savior's message, that salvation is personal. And to want to be saved means to love oneself properly. The Brotherhood of Man is a profound reality. But all the reality it has comes as the consequence of the Fatherhood of God.

From a practical point of view the best argument for the motive of keeping sober for one's own sake is that it works. This is not to suggest that it works alone or that it is something which all by itself can bring a man or woman to forgo that first drink day after day. In no instance does the motive of self-love stand solitary. Clustered about it with more or less clarity are any number of motives. The important thing about this motive of keeping sober for one's own sake is that being dominant it fits into the psychological needs of the alcoholic.

To agree with Joe's analysis of the alcoholic's state of mind is not in the least to minimize the terrific importance of motive. It is merely to select the motive which experience has proved to be the most helpful and involving the least risk and which should be cultivated most carefully.

Joe's example of a man walking a narrow plank over a deep mine shaft illustrates the psychological situation perfectly. Now add to the facts of self-consciousness the special problems of the alcoholic who is trying to reform. He knows with all the sharpness of heartbreaking memories what a fall will involve. He remembers what it is to lose the respect and perhaps love of wife and children, to lose his job and home. He knows as the non-alcoholic can never know the semi-conscious existence of alcohol-sodden days and weeks. He knows the misery of coming to and finding himself dirty and hungry and sick and alone - with the damning knowledge of what he has done to those he loves. That memory with the thought of its possible repetition is the abyss the alcoholic is crossing on the narrow plank of his not taking a drink. To remind him of the chasm is to weaken him and invite disaster.

All this is clear to me now as it was not when I wrote Joe that letter. The motive of self-love has philosophy and theology as well as solid empirical and psychological considerations in its favor. For all things which it does not need is an apology. But of all things that it does need and most needs is humility. Self-love is not selfishness. It is not pride. It is a just appraisal of a difficult situation and on one's own worth and weakness. All this involves humility.

Humility is not weakness any more than pride is strength. It is not weakness which leads a man to a just estimate of his own resources before he begins building a house or meeting an opponent on the golf course or challenging an expert bridge player or meeting the disastrous attraction of drink. Humility is just plain honest common sense.

As such it plays a tremendous influence in the program of Alcoholics Anonymous. Most alcoholics have tried to recover but for the most part it has been on the assumption that they were not alcoholics, that they were men who "could take it or leave it alone." Until they are prepared to admit that they are not men who can take it or leave it alone, there is not much hope for them. Hope begins to shine when they admit they cannot meet the challenge of alcohol, when they admit they are not as other men, when they confess they have drunk up their privilege to drink and are sick and weak and cannot cure

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

Expanding its activities, the San Bernadino Valley group, which got under way five years ago and now includes residents of Colton, Riverside, Fontana and Redlands, held a large open meeting recently which was attended by several hundred A.A.s from various Southern California sections.... Out in Hollywood, where the group owns a brand new clubhouse, the press agent of a movie actress who paints her dog to match her clothes, wrote in his publicity blurb: "It's a matter of record that this actress converted three men to A.A. when she walked down Vine Street with her green dog."

. . . Boise is the first town in Idaho to start a group. And Seattle sends in a Can-You-Top-This report: Their membership has grown from 32 to nearly 100 in the past two months! . . . Besides Boise, other new groups are now going in Livingston, N. J., an outgrowth of Morristown's which started barely a year ago with 8 members and now has over 70, with attendance often reaching 100; Mt. Kisco, N. Y.; Redona Beach, Cal.; Lynn and Woburn, Mass.

The story of a man who wanted sobriety so much that he made a round trip of 200 miles twice a week for six months was told at the testimonial dinner and meeting of tribute held Sept. 5 in Springfield, Mass., for Dr. D., founder of the Springfield group. Before starting the group, Dr. D. drove twice a week to the meetings in Boston. Attending the testimonial dinner were 66 A.A.s and friends from Hartford and Manchester, Conn., and Boston.

Wilmington, Del., A.A.s had the largest crowd yet at the open meeting in the DuPont Community Y. M. C. A., with borough officials, representatives of several churches, and executives of the DuPont plants attending . . . . Speakers from Wilmington and Philadelphia addressed the new Perms Grove, N. J., group at their first open

meeting

. . . . The Binghamton, N. Y., group will celebrate its first anniversary this month

. . . . Both Uphams Corner, Dorchester, Mass., and Upper Darby, Pa., new groups,

are beginning their open meetings.... Staten Island, N. Y., A.A.s are rapidly increasing in numbers.... Establishment of a clinic for alcoholics in Erie County, N. Y., is under discussion by A.A. groups, the county Medical Society, the Board of Health, and other social agencies.

The Portland, Ore., A.A.s now have their own club rooms in the heart of the city.

Although the first Portland group was founded less than two years ago, two active groups are now functioning there and holding regular bi-weekly sessions. In a note from one of the members, headed "Handshake across the Rockies, " it is reported

that the groups have rented 2,000 square feet of space on the second floor of a building directly across the street from the public library.

"The Saga of the Fish," favorite drinking anecdote of a member of the Louisville, Ky., Group, given its initial boost by an Indianapolis, Ind., traveling A.A. in 1941,

tells of his leaving the office one afternoon for his home in the country.

Already

considerably soused as a result of nips from a desk-drawer bottle, he stopped at

a seafood market and bought a tremendous fish, with an oldfashioned fishfry in mind. It occurred to him that his purchase might meet with disfavor on his customary bus ride,

so he took a taxi. He soon found the taxi had a distinct advantage over busses;

it could be ordered to stop at bars en route. He promptly availed himself of this service at every tavern, storing the three-foot marine specimen in the proprietor's refrigerator wherever he stopped. Along his dazed itinerary he often forgot the fish, and had to taxi back for it, which naturally meant another snifter. "It took me two days to get home 10 miles, and cost $100 in cab fares. When I finally arrived, the fish was as bad off as I was," he grins when telling the story. "We both reeked, and I was only slightly more alive."

Two Chicago members were instrumental in starting the group in Minneapolis during the blizzard of November, 1940. Marooned in Minneapolis, they succeeded in sobering up one man. From that humble beginning A.A. has spread in Minnesota to St. Paul, Duluth, Hibbing, Rochester, Stillwater, and to Eau Claire, Wis . . . . In future alcoholics placed on probation in Ramsey County, Minnesota, will be advised by Frank Valesh, deputy probation officer, who attended the Yale Summer School of Alcohol Studies, to get in touch with A.A. He reports that 65 per cent of the persons who appear in probation court in the county are there because of drinking . . . . South Bend, Ind., A.A.s are preparing to establish a group in Culver . . . . A.A.s from all over the Midwest were present in Des Moines, Iowa to help that group celebrate its second anniversary.... At the fourth anniversary meeting of the Palo Alto, Cal., group a San Francisco physician, Dr. Frederick Niemand, described many people as "psychic suicides" in that they refuse to face life and its problems squarely. A.A.s, he pointed out, who have found rehabilitation through the 12 Steps have faced the biggest problem of their lives squarely and proceeded to solve it by "rebirth".

The Hartford, Conn., group, where Dr. Norman Vincent Peale will be a guest speaker November 5, are using the means of two or three rehearsals of their own

speakers
prior to big open meetings as an effective means of running a smooth program.
The nearby New Haven A.A.s have started a series of instruction class meetings....
The
program and benefits of A.A. were discussed at a recent meeting of the W. C.
T.
U. in Glens Falls, N. Y.

Delegations of the Clearwater and Tampa, Fla., groups attended the first Tri-City group meeting at St. Petersburg.... While continuing to attend the co-educational meetings, the A.A. women of Birmingham, Ala., have formed a group for women only
..
. . The first entry in the Buffalo, N. Y., telephone book is A.A. -- Parkside 1321.

Observing its first anniversary, the State Prison, Trenton, N. J., A.A. group notes in the current issue of the institutional publication, The Viewpoint, that the membership has grown to 100 during the year, and that the weekly meetings in
the prison auditorium "help a man to step out of maximum security into a society
of maximum liberty with the assurance that he will complete his parole and take his place in society. " About a year ago an A.A. woman of the Manhattan group, while doing volunteer war service, met a non-alcoholic woman who spoke of the dire necessity for helping women alcoholics in the Clinton (N. J. ) Reformatory for women.
As a result of their conversation, a group now functions in the reformatory.

Greenwich Village in New York City is now to be found on the A.A. map. The Villagers, at a meeting in that well-known landmark, the Brevoort Hotel, formed a group
with about 40 present and are planning weekly sessions.

A.A.s from White Plains, New Rochelle, Mount Vernon, Peekskill and Yonkers, N, Y., have given timely aid to Grasslands Hospital, White Plains. Awaiting admission was a long list of alcoholics, but an inadequate staff to care for them. Thirty A.A.
women

After a prolonged and particularly outrageous spree, a kindhearted employer who had been trying to help Bill to his feet gave up the attempt and threw him out. He disappeared and was gone for months. One evening what was left of him - a blear-eyed scarecrow - slunk to the door of a relative and begged for help. The relative got him into his car and deposited him in a state institution. After six or eight months under strict surveillance, the alcohol had pretty well evaporated and Bill looked a little cleaner and brighter. He was very anxious to be released, but it was plainly useless to go through the horrible farce again.

Matters stood like this when the relative read in the paper an account of a meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous. At the end of the article there was a phone number which interested persons were invited to call. He called it and was answered by a friendly voice which responded to a rapid sketch of the situation with a cheerful: "Yes, I think we can help you and your man. I'll come and see you whenever and wherever you say." If the relative had called up an insurance agent or ordered a new refrigerator, he couldn't have been greeted more cordially. Puzzled but hopeful, he set a place and an hour for a meeting.

Exactly at the appointed time a handsome young business man walked into the relative's office. "My name's Herbert S____," he said. "I was one of the worst drunks in the state before Alcoholics Anonymous pulled me out of it. But I might not stay pulled out if I didn't stand ready at any hour of the day or night to help pick some other poor devil out of the gutter. When you called me to help Bill, you did me the greatest favor you could have thought of. We'll shoo John Barleycorn off him if we can. But we can't shoo worth a cent if Bill doesn't want us to and won't cooperate. Tell us how to reach him, and we'll be there double quick."

The relative relayed the information to Bill. Bill wasn't enthusiastic; said he could quit without anybody's help. But finally he consented to see Herbert. Two of the A.A.'s went to call on him. They won his heart at the first meeting. A few months later Bill was released from the institution. Now he is one of the engineers at the same place where a year ago he was an inmate. He has joined a church. (The A.A.'s discreetly leave confessional religion alone. They are members of any church or no church. But I have attended several of their open meetings and I noticed that they always, recite the Lord's Prayer together.)

So far as I know, Bill never touches even the milder liquors. I once heard an A.A. say that one swallow may not make a spring but it's pretty sure to make a booze-fighter out of an A.A. Bill looks you in the face now as he never looked anybody in the face in the twenty-five years I have known him. I don't know that he couldn't backslide, but there is something fundamentally different between this Bill and the Bill who used to peep at you out of the corner of his eye and calculate how soon he could spring a hard-luck story and panhandle you again for the price of a trip to Barleycorn heaven.

That's Bill's story. How it is different from the story of John B. Gough and other reformed drunkards of the past? I am not an A.A., so I cannot give a completely satisfactory answer. But I see important differences very clearly.

Before the days of Alcoholics Anonymous, the churches, the doctors and the psychiatrists among them are said to have reclaimed two or three per cent of the drunkards who tried to quit. Approximately 80 per cent of the membership of A.A.; (it has been in existence something like 12 years and has in the neighborhood of 50,000 members) have stuck. Bill's chances for pulling loose from the devil are a good many times greater than they would be if there were no such organization behind him - a band of the saved with their arms around him and each other, like a tug-of-war team. These ex-drunks understand him because they are just like him. They don't despise him or patronize him, because they have been just as ridiculous and just as low as he has. They love him for what he has done for them and quite as much for what they have done for him. They will never let him down because they know that if they shirk their duty to him they are pretty sure to fall flat on their faces again themselves. There is something in their situation psychologically very close to the way Napoleon's Old Guard clung together. One could do a lot of psychologizing about the amazing loyalty which holds together this band of bruised, hopeful ex-slaves of King Alcohol. But after all was said there would still be a touch of the miraculous about it.

"When a man joins the A.A. without any strings attached," one serious fellow said to me, "something happens to him. He belongs to the A.A. soul and body. He'd get up in the middle of the coldest night and cross the country in a blizzard to sit with another A.A. who felt the thirst on him and couldn't fight it alone. He'd have to. There wouldn't be any question about it, any more than about reaching for food if he was starving. He wouldn't just have to, he'd want to. He wouldn't and couldn't do anything else. I guess getting to be a real, honest-to-goodness A.A. is like getting religion. Only it means a million times more than getting religion seems to mean to most people."

II

There is a strong emotional element in the movement which borders on mysticism; indeed I have heard educated A.A.'s use that word more than once. For there are educated and prosperous A.A.'s just as there are very humble and ignorant A.A.'s. Such differences don't count among them. There may be some friction in the groups sometimes, but if there is, outsiders don't know much about it. When the Athenians were driving back the Persian invaders at Marathon, they did not waste much time and energy fighting each other.

There is a touching lot of kindness and helpfulness among the A.A.'s. One day a faithful, hard-working member whose funds were low met a fellow member, a clothing store clerk, in an eating house. "Come over to the store when you're through eating, Bob," said the clerk. "I've got something for you." Bob ate his hamburger and went over. "I've been paid," said the clerk, "for a Stetson hat, a suit of clothes, a pair of shoes, a white shirt, a pair of socks and a necktie - all your size. I'm not allowed to tell you who's footing the bill." Bob went out of the store a good deal less shabby than he went in. To this day he doesn't know who his Santa Claus was, but he can make a pretty safe guess that Santa was an ex-alcoholic or a group of ex-alcoholics, with more cash than he but with exactly the same determination to fight liquor to a standstill and back up anybody else who is fighting the same enemy.

The A.A.'s have regular meetings, weekly or oftener. The spirit of comradeship that develops among them is so strong that they often spend a great deal of time in each others company. Most of them give a good fraction of their time to A.A. work. I know a group in a fairly large city which has about 300 members. A dozen or two miles away in every direction are small towns each of which has an organization with 20 or 30 members. Thus there are a score or more of groups within easy driving distance of each other, and they are constantly holding combined meetings, taking a ride out to help a handful of alcoholics start a new group and collecting new data on possible new members.

III

They don't proselytize, for they have found that if a man joins because he lacks sales resistance instead of because he sees that he is on his way to disease, insanity, poverty and early death, he won't last long as an A.A. and will make himself a nuisance while he is pretending to be one. A young buck who is proud of getting soused occasionally has nothing in common with the A.A.'s. In a college town where there is an A.A. group, a bunch of students have a drinking fraternity which they call "Alcoholics Unanimous." The A.A.'s laugh at it, because they are good sports and because they know better than anybody else what a funny fool a drunkard is. But any youngster who sees the light and decides to transfer from the Unanimous to the Anonymous will find a band of decent citizens who were once poor idiots like him, ready to grasp his hand and haul him out of the quicksand.

What are A.A. meetings like? The regular meetings are naturally secret. In these the members presumably thrash out their common problems. They are incomparably closer together than a group of Presbyterians or Masons or college fraternity brothers. But they have frequent public meetings which everyone is welcome to attend and at which invited speakers who have special knowledge of alcoholism - physicians, ministers, psychiatrists, social workers and members of other A.A. groups - discuss alcoholism and related matters. I have attended a number of these meetings. The A.A.'s themselves are almost always amazingly frank, straightforward, humble, and wise with the wisdom that comes from ghastly experience. Nobody can tell you as much about hell as the soul that has suffered torment. And no matter who is speaking or how well or how inadequately he gets across, the A.A.'s listen as though their lives

The Glass Crutch; the Biographical Novel of William Wynne Wister

By Jim Bishop (Doubleday, Doran & Co., $2.50)

"The True Story of A Man Who Conquered Alcoholism and Found The Keys to Its Cure."

This book is a mixed pleasure. Very much so. The story, as written by Jim Bishop, gets off to a slow start, but soon it's going at high speed. I think that most A.A.s will read this with great interest. For me it had all the excitement of The Lost Weekend. Moreover, you see how this particular alcoholic got that way. Bill Wister was a spoiled rich Philadelphia boy. His mother overindulged him, overprotected him. He never grew up. His whole drinking career, complete with jails, sanitariums, weeks of semi-coma, attempted suicide, a ruined marriage, an inability to keep jobs—this is a wonderful piece of writing and wonderfully true. Mr. Wister has been honest and courageous to tell it.

The part about Peabody is swell. Peabody was a lay therapist, who had been an active drunk. Much of what he taught Bill Wister sounds like A.A. There is no mention of God or the Higher Power. There is a lot of talk about cure. The word appears not only in the blurb on the jacket, it comes up repeatedly in the book. Bill Wister got "cured" under Peabody. It took a year.

We A.A.s don't use that word. We think we have a good reason not to. But I, for one, would not say that any other method of sobering up us drunks is wrong. If it works, fine. Peabody helped a great many people. So, for a while, did Wister.

But by September, 1943, Wister had had a series of difficulties with the medical profession. No one would recognize him or let him work with them. He spent a short time in one New Jersey sanitarium, but the war closed that. In California, where he went, hoping to become associated with some hospital or sanitarium, he had a serious slip. In September he returned east and "vowed he would never practice psychotherapy again."

Now comes the epilogue, written by Wister. He is quite dogmatic about what makes an alcoholic. Alcoholics are all spoiled children. Or this is the impression he gives. He lays down the law about how alcoholism should be "cured." He says: "An alcoholic must of absolute necessity have the help of "a psychiatrist, an accredited psychologist or a psychotherapist." A footnote says, "These three terms are not in any way to be confused with a psychoanalyst whom I most emphatically do not recommend."

As a confuser of terms, Mr. Wister is not to be beat. See the footnotes on page 302. It shows Mr. Wister to be an accredited "psychotherapist in alcoholism," and both Mr. Strecker and Mr. Chambers vouch for him. But then, quick as a flash, he turns himself into a psychiatrist, too. "Hereafter the use of the name 'psychiatrist' includes in its meaning an accredited psychologist and a psychotherapist endorsed by a psychiatrist." This makes everything legal. But in the world outside Mr. Wister's book, which is, after all, most of the world, a psychiatrist is an M.D., who is able to give physical treatment such as shock therapy. Mr. Wister is no M.D. At one time he was an enthusiastic 12th Stepper in his own way. Right now, he seems to have run into a couple of conflicts. I don't think he's any farther away from a drink than most of us. The word cure may look good. Butâ€"watch it, Mr. Wister.

-- Felicia G., Manhattan

-----
May 1946

The Pleasures of Reading

Wasteland, by Jo Sinclair (Harper and Brothers, $2.50)

This is another novel about psychoanalysis, and this is a first novel, which has won the Harper Prize. A psychoanalytic process is one of the hardest things to put into fiction form. And yet this author has succeeded where more brilliant and skillful writers have failed.

Miss Sinclair is utterly simple and unselfconscious. You feel that she, too, knows what it is to have been mentally sick and misunderstood by the worldâ€"to have been a wretched misfit, loveless and insecure. And you feel that through analysis she has gained insight into her problems and is now in a position to be kind to others, helpful and understanding.

Jake Brown comes to the doctor, because his sister has suggested it. She, too, had been at the breaking point. She, too, had sought help.

Jake is subject to backaches. He drinks too much, and while the word alcoholic is mentioned, I would say that alcohol was not the big problem. Far more sinister are his hatred for and shame toward his family, and his inability to get away from them. He never tells outsiders that he is Jewish; both he and his sister have bettered themselves. They have risen above the ignorant Jewish immigrant father and mother, the other children. Jake fears that somebody on his newspaper will run into his family some day. He shares the tenement apartment with his family, although he could afford to live elsewhere.

All his adult life, Jake has been a weakling, shirking spiritual and economic responsibility. He has helped force his younger sister into the man's role. During the depression it was she who went on WPA. It was she who carried the burden, and in so doing, she had become too much like a man. Jake both admires and hates her.

The book is an emotional reliving of Jake's life, as told to the analyst, and as presented in the analyst's own notes. You see the beginnings: Jake's father and mother in Europe, their wanderings. The father, who is selfish and greedy, and lazy, the mother, who has been beaten down till she is no good to anyone. The children, all reacting in different ways to this lovelessness and insecurity, which is framed in poverty, ignorance, failure. And a breakdown in the Jewish tradition and religious strength. Jake realizes this, when as a boy of fifteen, he is playing an important role in the family Seder, a Passover observance. In the middle of his father's prayer, he looks around the table "and sees his family as they really are."

At last Jake grows up emotionally and learns to understand his family, to love his sister, and be proud of her, to help his nephews, and save them from the wasteland and insecurity into which they had all strayed.

Whereas the book is the picture of a Jewish boy in psychological difficulties, I felt, on reading it, that these same neuroses could have developed in this same family, even if they had lived on Park Avenue. We in A.A. know by experience that emotional insecurity is no respecter of race, color or creed. And to me, this very moving account of Jake Brown's illness and getting well, is about the lack of love, and the regaining of it, rather than about the lack of economic and social security.

Miss Sinclair has done a very sympathetic and interesting job on the sister. At last you have a homosexual who is neither a villain nor a figure of fun, but a person who learns for herself that "there is room in the world for me." Indeed The sister is the heroine much more than Jake is the hero. It is through her, really, that Jake and the whole family get a new lease on life.

â€" Felicia G., Manhattan.

|||||

+++Message 1227. . . . . Walter Cronkite and AA
From: James McGovern . . . . . 8/20/2003 12:35:00 PM

|||||

at a meeting recently someone shared the following story re former CBS news anchor, Walter Cronkite. When asked 'what was the most positive thing that happened in the 20th century?', Cronkite responded, 'the fellowship of Alcoholics Anonymous.' Can anyone confirm the when, where (or if) of this statement?

Fort Wayne, Ind., A.A.s observed their third anniversary with a dinner; among the 75 men and women present were guests representing the clergy, hospitals, medical profession and press. Dick S., formerly of the Cleveland Group and now of Chicago, was one of the speakers... The Ottumwa, Iowa, A.A.s observed their first anniversary with a large open meeting and banquet . . . A member of the Wilmington, Del., Group recently spoke on A.A. during a broadcast by the American Legion Auxiliary... The Albany, N. Y. Group entertained at a dinner several up-state groups . . . A story of his flight from alcoholism, in which he mentioned that he'd been jailed in 38 states, was told by an A.A. of Springfield, Mass., before the Springfield Exchange Club

. . .

The newly-formed Lynn, Mass., Group reports rapid growth, with members from Lynnfield, Salem, Peabody, Marblehead, Gloucester, Wenham, Saugus, Beverly, Danvers and Nahant often coming to the meetings; among the guests are clergymen, doctors, police, probation officers, personnel managers and others engaged in public service . . . Two A.A.s of the Waterbury, Conn., Group addressed the Beth-El Men's Club in the Synagogue, presided over by Rabbi William P. Greenfeld.

A.A.s of Ann Arbor, Mich., in an open letter to one of the local papers, pointed out some behind-the-scenes facts which alcoholics and nonalcoholics alike invariably ask.

Their letter gave the following information: The Central Office of Alcoholics Anonymous is located in New York City. The mailing address is The Alcoholic Foundation, P. O. Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York 17, N. Y.

The Central Office is maintained by the trustees of the Alcoholic Foundation as A.A.'s national headquarters. The trustees are nine (previously seven) in number: five are interested professional and businessmen, and four are members of A.A. As trustees, none receives compensation for his services. The Central Office writes

replies to hundreds of inquiries monthly, sends out A.A. literature and interviews many people who call in person. Besides supervising this correspondence center,

the trustees have charge of national publicity and consult with the A.A. groups on matters of policy. They are, in effect, A. A. 's National Service Committee.

The Central Office is supported by voluntary contributions from the groups and from the income of the book Alcoholics Anonymous, which, through Works Publishing, Inc., is wholly owned by the Alcoholic Foundation.

Inspired by the NCEA and A.A., establishment of a clinic for alcoholics in Erie County, N. Y., is now assured. The Council of Social Agencies in Buffalo has approved a plan to create the clinic, as recommended to it by a sub-committee including A.A.s

from Erie County, and other social agencies; the sub-committee recommended an annual budget of $25, 000.

An all A.A. orchestra and several A.A. vocal soloists were among the special attractions at the 11th anniversary banquet of the A.A. at the Hotel Commodore,

New

York, Nov. 7. The orchestra played all during the dinner hour. It is an outgrowth of

New Jersey groups. The musicians get together and practice after meetings.

A group was recently formed in Greenville, S. C., at a meeting attended by A.A.s

from

Asheville, Hendersonville, Shelby, Charlotte, Atlanta and Rock Hill . . . The Toledo,

Ohio, Group -- which advertises regularly in the Toledo Times: "Alcoholics Anonymous, 241½ Superior Street; 8: 30 p. m." -- celebrated its fifth anniversary with a dinner and dancing; present were many from various sections of the state. Toledo now has over 300 members... A drunk in Knoxville, Tenn., who hasn't yet encountered the group flourishing there, after repeatedly facing drunkenness charges, pulled released from the Army, told of A.A. work in Army hospitals throughout the country. .

A.A.

. . The first anniversary of the Oberlin, Ohio, Group was celebrated by a big get-together, which included many friends and relatives. . . . A new group has been launched in Falmouth, Mass., with speakers coming from Worcester, New Bedford, and Boston for the first meeting.

Pueblo, Colo., now has a second group, composed of alcoholic State Hospital patients.

Handling organization details were several members of the original Pueblo Group, which was formed about seven months ago; these members will attend the initial meetings to help the new members with their interpretation of the program. The older group now has a membership of twenty. . . The Jackson, Miss., Group, organized in January, 1945, turned over the clubrooms at 416½ George Street for a meeting conducted by Memphis A.A.s. The rapidly growing Jackson Group now totals forty-five men and women. . . . An A.A. of Carmel, N. Y., addressed the Criton Valley Ministers Association. . . . The Binghamton, N. Y., Group has acquired clubrooms at 89 State Street. Their as yet unlisted telephone number is 4-1690.

The Exchange Club of Jacksonville, Fla., where A.A.s are steadily increasing in number, was addressed on "Alcoholism and Its Allied Problems," by Dr. A. C. L., local physician. Judge Charles Miller of Jacksonville stated that in 34,000 cases before the Municipal Court annually, alcoholism is involved in approximately eighty per cent. . . Kansas City, Kans., papers carried pictures of that city's A.A. hilltop clubhouse, a two-story brick structure with a Norman tower on one corner and the letters "A.A." in red and white over the door. When the old house was purchased early last spring, The plumbing was out of kilter and the plaster falling off the walls. Today it is clean and pleasant, painted and well maintained, with cooking and bathroom facilities on both floors. "Anything we have done for the house," said of the members, "has been done with money which otherwise would have been spent

one
on liquor. It looks to us like pretty good economics."

A blind A.A., who spoke from notes written in Braille, was one of the speakers at a joint meeting held by Salt Lake City and Ogden, Utah, Groups, in the former city.

Over 100 members were present; guest speakers were Governor Herbert B. Maw;
the

Most

Reverend Duane G. Hunt, Bishop of the Catholic Diocese of Salt Lake, and Dr.
H.

L.

Marshall, acting dean of the University of Utah medical school, all of whom gave high praise to A.A. Ogden now has two thriving groups. . . . Thirty-eight Flint, Mich..

A.A.s chartered a bus to attend a meeting in Detroit recently.

Baton Rouge, La., A.A.s, at their first anniversary meeting, were hosts to representative groups from New Orleans, Covington, Bogalusa, Hammond, Franklinton,

Gonzales, Plaquemine, and Tylertown, Miss. One of the guest speakers was the Rev.

Henry A. Rickey of Bogalusa, who attended the Yale School of Alcohol Studies last summer; another was Dr. Glenn J. Smith, superintendent of the East Louisiana Hospital

at Jackson, who spoke of how much the people of the state were being benefited by the work of A.A. . . . The 400 members of the eight St. Louis, Mo., Groups have held their fifth anniversary meeting. . . . An A.A. of Mount Morris, N. Y., a psychiatrist

and a clergyman, spoke on alcoholism before the Penn Yan Rotarians in that city.

..

. The Greater Lawrence Youth Forum was addressed by a member of A.A. from Lawrence,

Mass. . . . The Lions Club of Marshfield, Wis., was startled when an A.A., invited to speak at one of their meetings, tossed out the fact that alcoholism was the fourth

major health problem in the United States.

Louisville, a physician from Argentina, and many more. Some were curious, some were desperate, but all had come to learn the facts on this most explosive issue. For here was a department of 26 scientists who were experimenting, probing, analyzing and recording fact on fact without bias or prejudice. They had no ax to grind; there was no piper to call the tune. With severe objectivity they not only turned new light on this ancient problem but were using their knowledge to achieve results with the so-called "hopeless" alcoholic.

Outline of the Yale Course

The course consisted of 65 or more lectures and seminars with ample additional time for questions and discussion. The coldly methodical Prof. Seldon Bacon analyzed drinking patterns and attitudes of racial and national groups. The keen and capable Dr. Giorgio Lolli interpreted the physiological reaction to alcohol. Dr. Fritz Redlich probed into the machinery of the alcoholic's mind. Jurists, educators, alcoholics, social service workers, pastors and social analysts contributed. Cementing each fragment in place so that the mosaic formed a coherent pattern was the task of Dr. E.M. Jellinek, the genial head of the school, who has dedicated his life to the pursuit of many still elusive mysteries in the field of alcohol research.

I came away from New Haven with startling quantities of precious facts distilled from experiments, tabulation and analysis. I learned that alcohol is not a stimulant but a depressant, a sedative and a mild anaesthetic. Because it is absorbed directly through the walls of the stomach, it quickly reaches every tissue of the body. Its effect on the central nervous system is almost immediate. Sense perception sharply decreases and response to stimuli requires a greater time lapse. Inhibitions and mental barriers are lowered, permitting the drinker to do things which he would not be likely to do normally.

But most types of alcohol wear off rapidly, usually at the rate of one hour per ounce. The use of small amounts of alcohol (one to two ounces per day) over a period of many years leaves no damaging effects on the average body. In our country today there are about 65 million users of alcoholic beverages. Most of these are controlled drinkers who will never get into serious difficulty from their drinking. But many will overstep the bounds of moderation and from time to time find themselves in conflict with friends, families and employers.

The Alcoholic

A small number, not more than five per cent of all drinkers will go down the road to addiction. Science has not been able to detect any type which is likely to become alcoholic, nor is any type immune. Any person who drinks may become an alcoholic. He may originally have been a problem drinker trying to escape reality, or a congenial social drinker trying to be a good sport in his crowd. But somewhere along the line the pattern changes. He finds himself refusing parties where there are no drinks or taking a few extras before going. He does more solitary drinking but manages to confine his sprees to week ends and escapes general criticism. Farther along the path he cares little for the opinions of others and drinks in greater quantities and at any time.

Now he runs into serious difficulty. Soon he finds himself without friends, without a job, without a family. He cannot understand the way people are treating him. He feels grossly misjudged and maltreated and finds escape in the stupor of more drinking. There is more trouble ahead. He must go through the tunnels of partial amnesia known as "blackouts," experience deep mental and physical pain, suffer delirium tremens, endless aching hangovers and grim fear of physical deterioration. Eventually he plunges into a vicious circle; the alcohol has created symptoms which can be removed only by more alcohol which, in turn, creates more symptoms. This is the sub-basement level known as alcoholism.

When All Else Fails

We know that alcoholism is a disease and must be treated as such. The victim can no more control his drinking than a patient with measles can keep his rash from breaking out. Law enforcement agencies have failed to solve the alcoholic's problem. Imprisonment merely increases his frustration and drives him to more drink. Doctors have generally regarded him as a nuisance. Most hospitals refuse to allow him a bed. The sociologist claims to understand the causes of drinking but has nothing to offer by way of a cure. The psychoanalyst can achieve a few cures but he requires three to five years of treatment at a prohibitive cost. Medicine has nothing to offer save occasional substitute sedatives during his high-tension periods.

What, then, is to be done with our nation's 3,750,000 alcoholic men and women? They have been abused, concealed, condemned, punished, ridiculed-but they have not been helped. When no one came forth with a cure, these pitiful outcasts had to find one themselves. Experts had failed them, so these amateurs had to resolve their own dilemma. Looking to a power greater than themselves, and leaning heavily on each other for support, they were lifted out of the morass and found a way back to the respect of friends and family. Thus was founded Alcoholics Anonymous. It did what science could not do by using a power greater than science.

Pastors and Alcoholics Anonymous

Here, truly, there opened a field in which the pastor could be of service. He had no more right to pose as an amateur psychiatrist than he would have to write a prescription for medicine. But alcoholism has been discovered to be out of bounds for medicine and too difficult for the psychiatrist. A.A. has demonstrated that this is a spiritual problem. The alcoholic must first admit that he has failed, then must turn to a power greater than himself, admit his mistakes, seek out those who have wronged him and set their relations right. In the stock terms of religion this means humility, worship, confession, and forgiving our debtors so that our debts may be forgiven. The A.A. member seeks help for one day at a time, even as our Lord prayed for bread day by day, and sets out to help other alcoholics with the real old-time personal evangelism. The A.A. movement, today claiming more than 65,000 members, is the greatest revival and practical application of religion in our generation.

The wise pastor does not try to replace A.A. but to supplement it. This organization has carefully refrained from any denominational entanglements, although about half its members are now active in churches. Pastors can serve as counselors, helping the alcoholic establish contact with that power greater than himself. But no church fellowship or social group can replace the incentive and inspiration which the alcoholic receives from the camaraderie of fellow alcoholics.

Results on the Local Level

It is the significant that clergymen make up the largest professional group at the Yale school, constituting almost a quarter of the enrollment. They are now back in their scattered communities, cooperating with public health officers, instituting educational programs and undergirding the work of A.A. More ambitious pastors are establishing community clinics for the chronic addict and securing the confidence of police and judges. They may be persuading local hospitals to release a bed or two for alcoholic patients or bombarding state legislatures for a grant from liquor license fees to help in the program of rehabilitation. Many have opened their parish halls to A.A. meeting, and by wise counseling and dissemination of facts have checked excessive drinkers before they hit bottom. Above all, the pastor who has been at the Yale school is learning not to condemn nor judge nor criticize, but to use the potent instruments of his time-tested faith to restore a portion of those lost souls to usefulness and honor in their communities.

|||||

+++Message 1231. . . . . Gv Jan 46 - news circuit
From: t . . . . . 8/23/2003 1:12:00 AM

|||||

Opps, skipped this one

-----

Grapevine, January 1946

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

A three-year-old dream has come true at last --with the official housewarming of the Miami Group's new club rooms at 23 North West South River Drive. The club, overlooking the Miami River, is equipped with a bar--where hot coffee and soft drinks are on tap at all times.

The Tulsa, Okla., Group, which will be two years old next April and which now numbers 70 members, has opened new club rooms at 114½ North Denver Avenue; about 100 attended the opening festivities, including members from Oklahoma City and Muskogee, and Wichita and Topeka. . . . Arizona, with large membership in Phoenix and Tucson, has two new groups, in Mesa and Chandler. . . . Greenville, S. C., A.A.s are helping to organize groups in Anderson and Greer. . . . Four weeks after its inception, the Lynn, Mass., membership had grown from 5 to 50! . . . An Edinburg, Ind., A.A. addressed a directors meeting of the Lions Club. . . . The Allentown, Pa., Group (P. O. Box 532, Allentown) reports excellent progress, with its 20 members doing progressively effective work. One of their members spoke at the Optimist Club, an organization of civic-minded citizens interested in the formation of good character in the boys and men of the community.

A member of the Honolulu Group, addressing Baton Rouge, La., A.A.s, told of the rapidly increasing membership not only in Honolulu, but in Pearl Harbor as well, with new members coming from other sections of Hawaii. . . . Pearl Harbor Day, December 7, 1945, was the first anniversary date of the Manchester, Conn., Group. . . . Speaking at the first anniversary gathering of the Peekskill, N. Y., Group, Rev. Mr. McKinney, chaplain of the Wallkill Prison, told of the fine A.A. work being done by the inmate members. . . . The Memphis, Tenn., Group, founded in April, 1944, has expanded from 3 members to 150, and plans to buy a large home, with an assembly hall and hospital facilities. . . . Benton Harbor, Mich., A.A.s entertained a large delegation of members from LaPorte, Ind., at the regular Sunday morning breakfast; one of the speakers was from Chicago.

To do away with the frantic phoning sometimes necessary to locate a meeting, the Buffalo, N. Y., Group has given meeting schedules to the information boards of hotels, Y.M.C.A.s and police headquarters; the latter say they receive quite a few calls. . . . At the first anniversary shindig of the Wichita, Kans., Group, which brought members from Kansas City, Topeka, Oklahoma City and Tulsa, guest speakers were Father Fred Mann, Catholic priest from Wichita, and the Rev. Raymond E. Dewey, a Methodist clergyman from McPherson. . . . Two A.A.s of the San Pedro, Calif., Group, which originated in January, 1944, recently spoke before the Sun Pedro Rotary Club . . . as did Cincinnati members in their city. . . . The fifth annual dinner of the Pittsburgh, Pa., Group brought several hundred members, including two speakers, man and wife, from Morristown, N. J.

The A.A. radio program, sponsored by the Hartford, Conn., Group, which last year won Hartford's WTIC Variety plaque for "contributing to the public health of the community," has returned to the air, over WTIC. The program dramatizes case histories to show that there is hope for the alcoholic. . . . The secretary of the Leavenworth Prison A.A.s reports that their group, formed in April, 1945, now has 55 members, and that "it has been said by officials that the group is the most constructive movement in the institution, and we are proud of our record." . . . The Seattle, Wash., Group had as guest speaker Major B. F. Ellison, manager of the men's social service of the Salvation Army. . . . The nearby Tacoma A.A.s meet every Monday evening at the

The Pleasures of Reading

The Crack Up: F. Scott Fitzgerald, edited by Edmund Wilson (New Directions Publishing Co., $3. 50).

Contrary to popular legend, it is not good to stay young forever. Immaturity in the adult is a trouble maker. One of the great things about A. A. is that we learn to grow up.

Scott Fitzgerald was chronically immature. He wrote about the Jazz Age, the prohibition era, when so many of us started to drink. It was the age of the child who refuses to grow up and who grows into a sick adult instead. At 23, Fitzgerald was at the height of his fame and success. He wrote This Side of Paradise at the end of a long drinking bout. At 28 he began to decline, both as a writer and a human being. It was all part of the same thing.

Edmund Wilson has called this book The Crack Up, taking the title from Fitzgerald's own description of himself during a nervous breakdown. This is Wilson's only comment. He was one of Fitzgerald's many friends, and the book is edited with sympathy, if perhaps not a complete understanding of what makes an alcoholic tick. The book is not a biography, but a life story, as revealed through Fitzgerald's own writings, his brief, thin pleasures, his childish aspirations, and his really agonized self searching. A few short article, and notes and letters, two pieces written with his wife about a prolonged spree-like honeymoon, letters from friends, and articles on Fitzgerald written by friends (most of them writers), and last of all, his letters to his daughter, who wants to be a writer, too.

In one of these he says, "I am of course not drinking, and haven't been for a long time. But my illness is liable to have a toxic effect on the system and you may find me depressing, over nervous about small things and dogmatic"all these qualities more intensified than you have previously experienced in me. "

Fitzgerald had a recurrent TB, and in 1940, at the age of 44, he died. But it is not this that seems so tragic.

To an alcoholic, the whole book is reminiscent. It is one big spree, and one long, heartbreaking hangover. It is a brilliant account of a very sick man. The chapters, Sleeping and Waking, about his insomnia, and The Crack Up, about his crisis, are hair-raisingly familiar to many of us, who like myself, will sit up all night reading it.

His thinking and self questioning move from childish day dreams, with himself the hero, to petulance and tantrums against fate. But the dreams dissolve into: "Horror and waste. What I might have been and done, that is lost, spent, gone, dissipated, unrecapturable. "

Most tragic of all was the fact that he knew he was sick, but he never knew why. He didn't know how to find out about himself. He hardly knew what his own symptoms were. This book is about a man who never got well, and never knew how to. Indeed it sounds like all of us when we first came to A. A.

And reading it, I for one, thought: "I am lucky. Wonderfully lucky. "

â€"F. G., Manhattan

Alcoholics Anonymous (Works Publishing Co., Box 459, Grand Central Annex, N. Y. 17, price $3. 50).

(Editor's Noteâ€"Alcoholics Anonymous was out of stock for several weeks but is now available in a "wartime" edition. The contents of the new edition are the same, of course, and the book has the same number of pages as before. The only difference is that it is printed on different paper stock, the weight previously used being unavailable "for the duration. ")

-----
October 1946

The Pleasures of Reading

THE FALL OF VALOR by Charles Jackson

(Rinehart; and Company, Inc., $2.75)

It might have been better if Charles Jackson had written this book first and The Lost Week-End second. That is, as far as his own career is concerned. As for the good of our country, nothing could have been more timely than The Lost Week-End. It stirred into life a great public awareness of the problem of alcohol. It made people everywhere ready and willing to read more and to learn more about the problem, and unquestionably made it easier for many alcoholics to seek help.

But perhaps it's unlucky for most writers to write a first novel that's a howling success. The second so often falls short of the first. This is the case here. In The Lost Week-End Mr. Jackson gets outside Don Birnam and looks at him dispassionately, and at the same time he is Don Birnam, experiencing each agony and each delusion. The whole job is a sleight-of-hand extraordinary and a piece of writing that's nobody's business. But here, in The Fall of Valor, one is drawn too close to the hero on the one hand, and on the other, one scarcely sees him at all. And so this book about a poor guy who goes haywire sexually at a fairly late age is an uneven piece of work; on the whole a disappointment.

John Grandin is a successful college professor. His first novel is about to be published. He is married, and has two sons. All should be rosy. But the marriage is not altogether a success. And, too, John Grandin feels a nameless apprehension. "There was nothing he had done. Nothing to feel guilty about." But guilty he is. He thinks of the word "crime." As the story unfolds, as John Grandin and his wife start their summer holiday at Woods Hole, the plot begins to give you hints of what the crime (so-called) is to be. But it is as though the author held his eyes too close to the page while writing, and that makes you, too, lean too close to the book. Thus you get a poor perspective, which, unlike The Lost Week-End, doesn't quite let you see the hero from inside looking out, nor yet from the outside looking in. You learn about the sexual attitudes and sensations of both Grandins and of the other couple in the book, but almost nothing about how they really tick. And thus the sensation-sexuality of the writing, and this absence of real feeling, makes you think you are swimming in a school of spawning adolescence.

John Grandin's strange preoccupation with young men in uniform (which verges on necrophelia) begins to grow clear when the Grandins strike up a holiday acquaintance with a very handsome young Marine captain and his bride, a former college student of Grandin's. From here on, the story contains some very beautiful writing, but is increasingly annoying. There is even less feeling, even more sensation, and more signs are put up for you in case you miss the meaning, which seems a sad and poor affair, and left me, in the end, with a feeling that I had peeked through just another keyhole.

But then the thing boils down to a sexual peccadillo, with horrible consequences for John Grandin, that seem to spring from some Methodist Right and Wrong in the author's mind. You rather get that idea that John Grandin knew in his unconscious mind that he would be punished, and that he sinned in order to be punished.

Since the book is emotionally sterile, the story is of necessity incomplete. For instance, there is John Grandin's wife, Ethel, and how she really feels about her husband. There is the whole emotional pattern between him and her. There is the psychological puzzle of John Grandin himself, and the fact that neither he nor the author ever go deeply into what or why he feels.

â€"F.G., New York.

-----
May 1948

Pleasures of Reading

If A Man Be Mad by Harold Maine

(Doubleday, $3)

To say that there is a treat in store for you, when you read this book, is a strange way of putting it. I myself often shun what is called "strong reading." But I have read this book twice and I find it the most moving and thrilling of all the "alcoholic" and "psycho" books, except possibly The Lost Week-End.

Like The Lost Week-End, it launches a very unusual writing talent on the world. But whereas The Lost Week-End is a fragment of a sick man's life, a thing that does not resolve itself, If A Man Be Mad is a complete and true autobiography. It is the whole of Harold Maine's bitter and tragic career as "an alcoholic who becomes psychotic when drunk," a man who can't help flying off into a dream world, even when sober. It is the story of how he tries to get well, how in spite of everything, he insists on getting well, and how he finally succeeds.

Harold Maine is a pseudonym. Quite a few old timers in A.A. know the author by his real name. There was a short period of desperation when he hung around the 24th Street Clubhouse, trying his best to get the Program, going all out on the 12 Steps and finally giving way to a wild and almost fatal pill jag. His own sick mind stood between him and A.A. Thus his observations are not altogether flattering, nor altogether sane. But here, as in the rest of the book, the writing is brilliant, often very witty.

The blurb on the bookjacket is misleading, for it refers to the author as an alcoholic, and speaks of the alcoholic problem. This is clearly a problem of alcoholism plus. The author had to find a more drastic cure than A.A. He had to invent one for himself.

The A.A. episode is just a lull in this long career of violence, both in and out of hospitals. There is the first state hospital, "on an island" (Honolulu?) where he goes to hopefully "to be cured." A kindly and well meaning judge, and his loving wife both feel that this is the perfect solution. Before he gets in the door, he sees two nurses "damn near twist a girl's arm off." He enters the hospital, and just inside the doorway, he asks a question. The answer is not verbal—"it is a good beating up. Next day the attendant comes to see him in solitary. "You fell over the bed yesterday," he says instructively. "Your doctor will come, and it's better you don't talk too much."

What could a doctor have done, anyhow? Even a good doctor. As one of them explains to the author, "There are three of us here for 850 patients."

But the suffering he endures inside of himself is equal to the suffering in the institutions. During his periods at large, he is just as wretched. And then, in "Rathburn Psychopathic," one of the best private sanitariums (many A.A.s will recognize this one) he loses his chance to stay and get real psychiatric care. The examining board does not believe that he has forgotten that he hid a bottle in the toilet tank back home. They tell him he "has reservations" about getting well.

Now he is in the custody of his second wife. There is a brief period of sanity and happiness. Then, of course, trouble starts again. The novel, which he has just submitted, is flatly rejected by the publishers. The old wounds are opened, shame and guilt return. All the bitter insecurity of a childhood with a religious fanatic stepfather, who was unloving and cruel—all this piles back on him. He says, "I cringed like an exposed embezzler."

Just as the author of The Lost Week-End describes the alcoholic riot act, so this author describes the wild explosion in which alcohol is just an aftermath.

This is the period where he nearly dies of drink. His chapter called "City Drunk" will startle everyone in A.A.

This is the A.A. period, also Bellevue (for which he has nothing but praise), a crackpot religious farm for men which A.A.s will recognize, and elaborate guilt-inspired DT's in his own home-town jail.

But the will to get well is still in him. He knows he is not ready for the outside world, and so decides to take a job as an attendant in a hospital.

He gets in several. A private place, for the very rich, where the treatment in the violent wards is just as bad, the system just as corrupt. He is a male nurse to a millionaire psychopath, and these chapters are Rabelaisian and extremely funny. Then comes the end, with the goal in sight. Oddly enough, this is the worst place of all. A VA hospital, that makes The Snake Pit look like a pale pink boudoir.

Since this book has been published—and I don't know how much the book has had to do with it—there have been newspaper exposes of our state hospital systems. There have been Congressional hearings, and VA cleanups. But some day, it is to be hoped, the voters and taxpayers (all of us) will do a real job on all our hospitals, mental and otherwise.

You ask yourself how this man could get well in such a place. And here, I think, is the most interesting part of the story. In this ward, where there is one attendant, to 120 violent patients, he is set upon, one day, by a prizefighter. The prizefighter knocks him out, but not until he has given him a bloody nose. Beat a patient as you will, it is not etiquette to draw blood.

Mr. Maine is dragged up before a hospital board.

"Collectively and individually they represented that group of people whose morals are certified by accepted membership in the community or institution. To have given me approval at all would have been a sign of personal weakness.

related their alcoholic history during this meeting. One of them was an admitted agnostic. I have had the great happiness to hear this same man, some months later, admit before a large group that the evidence of God's power and love in his life since entering A.A. compelled him to a belief in God's existence and to an acknowledgement of it. There was another present who had just recovered from a severe drinking-bout and was still very shaky. He had been helped by many men and especially one who had tried for twelve years, but without success, to free him from the terrible slavery of alcoholism. Unfortunately, he never did shake off this bondage. He ended his life later by suicide. Others of the group that evening had fully grasped the blessing of the A.A. program and are now living happy fruitful lives. A few drifted away again. Some came back. Others haven't. This is in miniature the history of many groups in Alcoholics Anonymous.

Throughout the history of man, almost from the first, alcohol has been a problem. It has reached the proportions of a most appalling problem in our times. It has well been said that everyone knows at least one alcoholic. I mean by an alcoholic one who is unable to control his drinking. There are those called heavy drinkers, but who, though drinking constantly, can leave it alone without a struggle. Then we have some who occasionally go on what is termed a spree. But the true alcoholic simply cannot control his drinking, once he has started. Occasionally he may go for a short time drinking in moderation. Eventually he begins again the dreadful cycle of wild excess, dismal remorse, recovery and excess once more. In A.A. it is said that for such a man one drink is too many and a thousand not enough. Once he has started, he is utterly incapable of control. Why is this? No conclusive answer has been reached on this important question. It does appear that this is an illness just as truly as any other; an obsession of the mind coupled with an "allergy" of the body.

NOT A CURE

It really does not matter a great deal, for the purpose of this article, just what does make an alcoholic. What is of the utmost importance is that at long last we have a definite relief for this affliction. I did not say a cure. Once an alcoholic, it appears, always an alcoholic. But Alcoholics Anonymous claims that it can arrest the disease and restore the patient to a great measure of physical and mental health. With reason, A.A. asserts that it has had almost seventy-five per cent success. Fifty per cent of those who try this program are successful immediately. Another twenty-five per cent, after a few "slips," join this happy band. Any program that has statistics to prove such a claim is worthy of a hearing. Any program that has brought restored bodily and mental health in varying degrees to over 60,000 men and women cannot be ignored. It is my happy privilege, as a priest, to report to all who will listen what I have learned about this unique blessing to countless people.

The very essence of the program of Alcoholics Anonymous is found in the famous "Twelve Steps." Here they are in full, since no explanation of A.A. can be intelligible without them: We

1. Admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people whenever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. Continued to take personal inventory, and when we were wrong, promptly admitted it.
11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God, as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.
12. Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

The most superficial study of the Twelve Steps indicates that they embrace a spiritual program. It is also evident that they are familiar to any Catholic acquainted with the fundamentals of his own religion. This first attracted me to A.A. It was completely orthodox. It was free from "queer quirks." It taught the great virtues of honesty, humility, self-denial and resignation to God's Will. It insists on the importance of prayer, examination of conscience, admission of guilt, and the necessity of repentance and restitution. There was nothing in the program that any man of good-will could not accept and carry out. This expression "good-will" is used advisedly. A.A. does not pretend to have anything for the man who does not wish to quit drinking or wishes to do so only on his own terms.

It is absolutely essential that the alcoholic accept the fact that he can not control his drinking (Step 1), and that for him there is no possibility of ever being a social drinker. We mean by social drinker one who can take it or leave it alone. The alcoholic must be prepared to refrain from drink for the rest of his life. There have been some very tragic examples of men who thought that they could safely resume their drinking after a period of sobriety. It just can't be done. There is the authentic story of one man who stopped drinking until his family was grown up and established. He started to drink after thirty or more years of abstinence, and was dead from alcoholism within three years. However, all that is asked of an alcoholic on first being introduced to A.A. is that he sincerely wish to be freed from his drinking problem. It is presumed that, if he is truly serious about it, he will be ready to take whatever steps are necessary, even if this means total abstinence.

The new member is urged to keep several important points in mind:

1. Let him attend the meetings and read the literature and listen to A.A. members with an open mind. He is not expected to grasp the program, or even a part of it, immediately.
2. He should attempt to live the suggested new way of life one day at a time. Try it for twenty-four hours, he is advised, or limit this period if that seems too long to look ahead. If a man feels really desperate, he is assured that he need only strive to spend the next hour sober. Having completed that much, he will probably have the hope and the courage to continue another while. Thus, bit by bit, he is brought to realize that the impossible, as he has thought, can be accomplished.
3. Finally, he is told that "easy does it." Don't try to change the habits of a lifetime or of many years in a few days. It takes a man a considerable time to become an alcoholic. He cannot remedy this in an instant.

INFERIORITY COMPLEX

Such cautions are very necessary for the alcoholic. He needs an open mind, because his more or less serious efforts to conquer his weakness have always ended in failure. This has developed in him a sort of fatalism or even despair about ever getting relief. He must plan no more than a twenty-four hour program, since the alcoholic is notorious for quitting when the task involves too long a period or too great an effort. As a corollary of this he has to remember that "easy does it," knowing that his tendency is to attack an arduous problem with too much vehemence, as though he could in this way dissolve its more disagreeable aspects. Having, this many a day, fled from reality, he has formed a habit of seeking what are often most absurd solutions for apparently insurmountable difficulties.

This striving to escape from reality is at the heart of the alcoholic's problem. He suffers from a form of mental obsession. There is a distinct similarity in the personality pattern of most alcoholics. He is usually a man with what is called an "inferiority complex." He has a profound awareness of his limitations and at the same time a compelling urge to appear the exact opposite to others. This causes him often to attempt schemes which are considerably beyond his powers. He will go to most extraordinary lengths to impress those about him. This state of mind necessarily creates a state of urgency, almost of panic, lest he fail. Such a struggle between the exaggerated desire to be appreciated and the quaking sense of inadequacy can result only in great mental torment. Even success brings little relief, because he is conscious of how trivial, even unworthy, are his motives, and how very much he is wearing a "false front." Introduce such a temperament to alcohol, with its initial stimulus and eventual narcotic effect, and you have sowed the seeds of disaster. He will seek drink for a while, because this stimulus gives him a sense of power and general adequacy which he usually lacks. Ultimately, having received little relief for his anguish of spirit from the false stimulation, he turns to the narcotic influence for refuge. He discovers in this drug a blessed oblivion wherein the "arrows of "outrageous fortune" no longer trouble him. Unhappily, the physical sickness, the mental stupor and the acute remorse which result from alcoholic excess are too great a price to pay for this temporary escape.

The drunkard is a most miserable and unfortunate person. Whether he reached this state through the causes I have very summarily mentioned or not, he finally comes to a condition common to all alcoholics. He becomes a man profoundly distressed in body and soul, because he simply cannot control his drinking. His fault is not gluttony, as most non-alcoholics suppose. He is not interested in the taste of alcohol to any great extent. He uses alcohol to ease his mental discomfort or, as we would surmise, frequently to smother his conscience. Far from bringing the desired results, this pitiful attempt to escape from unpleasant reality, to shirk responsibilities, to run away from care, culminates in return to a starker reality, added responsibilities and a multitude of new ones. The alcoholic lives in a veritable squirrel-cage of constantly renewed physical torture, accumulating mental bewilderment and ever increasing spiritual demoralization.

His tragic condition is greatly aggravated by his relations with other people, especially those nearest and dearest. He often suffers intensely because of the pain and the misfortune which he brings upon innocent persons, and which he feels himself hopeless and helpless to prevent. He develops a definite persecution complex from their failure to understand and so to sympathize with his predicament. Is it any wonder that he frequently tries to solve the apparently insoluble by deliberately hardening himself to all appeals of morality or affection, and sometimes ends it all in tragic suicide?

The alcoholic is not without fault and indeed many and serious faults. Nonetheless, upbraiding him with angry accusations, appeals to his better nature, while expressing doubt that he has such an attribute, physically obstructing his drinking, hospitalization or incarceration will not remove such faults. He is not altogether at fault, as we now know. He needs what the blind man in the gospel found, when he cried out: "Lord, that I may see!" He needs a sympathetic and understanding heart.

How then does A.A. help the alcoholic? It provides him, we might say very briefly, with a sympathetic and understanding heart. If he is fully conscious of his desperate state and honestly anxious to find relief, he will discover in the fellowship of other alcoholics who have won release the sympathy and the understanding which only a fellow sufferer can give. When he talks to the members of A.A. or hears them relate their own sad history, he comes at last upon people who speak his language. They do not reprove or criticize him, since they have been as bad or even worse. They show by words and attitudes that they know exactly how he feels. They encourage him from advice which is wise from bitter experience. Also - and this is important - they easily see through his elaborate self-justification, alibis and outright lying; they inform him, perhaps quite bluntly, that he is deceiving only himself. Most of all, insofar as their influence is exerted upon him, they bring him a faint glimmer of hope, which he so sadly craves. But no genuine member of A.A. will maintain that these gifts of their fellowship are of so much importance as the program of the Twelve Steps. Just as the poor blind man who cried for assistance received more than sympathy and understanding when he met Our Lord, so does the alcoholic when in truth he meets God in the Twelve Steps.

NON-SECTARIAN

A.A. is strictly non-sectarian. It believes, like St. Paul, that you must go through each man's particular door, if you -are to bring him out your own. It does not even ask that a man be a Christian or, for that matter, believe in a personal God. All that is demanded from the beginner is that he acknowledge a Power greater than himself, call it what he may. The experience in almost every successful case is that a man comes to a very definite belief in God and endeavors to walk humbly in His Presence. The Christian has the further advantage that he can approach this God in the loving presence of Christ and be comforted and inspired by Him Who ever had compassion on the multitude. The Twelve Steps are an epitome of Christian living. They establish an alcoholic in humility, nourish him with faith and hope to make a good fight, soften and enliven his heart with a sincere interest in his fellow men, especially alcoholics, and a grateful love for God Who has been so good to him.

The A.A. program brings the alcoholic into a new world, free from drink and its attendant curses. It gives him a new way of life. If he faithfully perseveres, it will bring him peace and happiness that perhaps he has never known before. It cannot be emphasized too much that A.A. makes a man not only sober, but contentedly sober. Sobriety without this contentment would - to the alcoholic - not be worth the struggle. He has had such sobriety before and found it as miserable as drinking. Members of A.A. sooner or later discover that they do not even think of alcohol; which is understandable, since it was not their problem, but only a symptom of their problem. Once they have achieved a measure of right living, the need of alcohol no longer exists. Having recognized and admitted the truth of the first step, that the disorder in his life had made him an uncontrolled drunkard, the alcoholic is prepared to face the next two steps.

The second and third steps call for a recognition that a Power greater than himself can restore him to sanity and a submission of his will and life to that Power. If the alcoholic has a full appreciation of his desperate state, the result in great part of his trying to run his own life, he will not find it too hard to resign himself to a higher Power. He has nothing to lose and soon discovers that he has gained more than he even hoped for.

The fourth and fifth steps ask that he make a searching and fearless examination of his conscience and confess his sins. These steps bring self-knowledge, a sharper awareness of his problem, and deepen the humility of spirit so necessary for a thorough change.

The sixth and seventh steps are said to separate the men from the boys in A.A. If an alcoholic is sincerely intent upon following this program, his acceptance and fulfillment of these steps will prove it. Convinced that it is mostly because of his moral failing that he has come to such a sad plight, he is entirely ready to relinquish even his pet vices.

The eighth and ninth steps provide a means of making restitution for the injuries that he has done to his family, relatives and acquaintances. They tend to free him from his sense of guilt, as he pays his debts to society.

The tenth step, if conscientiously observed, ensures that he will not be caught off guard by a recurrence of old weaknesses, which, if not corrected, inevitably lead to a fall. Prompt correction safeguards against the dangerous complacency which follows procrastination or laxity.

The eleventh is a step toward the highest spiritual living. It leads to the habit of walking constantly in the Presence of God through persevering prayer. It also inculcates that most noble and efficacious virtue, conformity to the Will of God.

NEW WAY OF LIFE

The twelfth and final step brings the alcoholic, through a sense of gratitude for what he has received, to take upon himself an apostolate among other alcoholics, so that they may have the chance to share in his good fortune. It concludes with the very important advice that they carry out these principles in all their affairs. This points up the conviction of the members of A.A. that this is in truth A NEW WAY OF LIFE. These principles must permeate and influence every thought, word and deed henceforth.

time, however, there are craving and compulsion, memory blanks, shakes, sweats, headaches, and hangovers. One man after a bout felt as though he had seven skulls. In devotion to this autocratic tyrant alcoholics will surrender thought, time, money, health, friends, and vocation. To surrender to the Higher Power involves no more exacting a demand than the surrender they have made to alcohol, perhaps over a drinking period of twenty years.

II

Experienced A.A. practitioners, while admitting that they are only amateur psychologists, are wise enough not to begin by demanding beliefs. They work on thoughts, desires, attitudes, relationships, purposes, and habits. They are agreed that the root trouble is in the thinking, not in the drinking. At one meeting of a rather intellectual group the drink problem was not directly mentioned. Half a dozen speakers rang the changes on freedom from fears, surrender of resentments, cultivation of good will, positive help to others, building up a sense of dependence upon the Higher Power. When the inner life is brought under discipline the outer conduct is largely self-regulated.

The program of recovery is absorbed rather than learned, caught rather than taught. Listening to speakers, private conversations with alcoholics who are now happily and contentedly sober, reading the book Alcoholics Anonymous and pamphlet literature, and picking up fragments of truth will produce a transforming change. This may be sudden or gradual, and there is little concern as to which. Often the slow recoveries prove to be very sure, but the ladder of rehabilitation has these rungs, not necessarily in this order: honesty, humility, tolerance, concern for others, inner contentment, radiant happiness, a new standard of values, faith. Religious people would describe this as conversion: A.A.'s are content to speak of a personality change.

No one is more surprised at the transformation than the alcoholic himself. Like the lady in the fairy tale he is inclined to say "This is none of I." An army man, a heavy drinker for thirty-five years, had the temperament of a sergeant-major even after he became a colonel. Now he is mellow, tender, as sacrificial as once severe. Before a group of medical men he said, "I have had a personality change." A psychiatrist checked him by saying, "My dear fellow, you can't have a personality change." "Well at least I'm under new management," replied the A.A.

Spiritual power is frequently found on the lower levels of mysticism. The inner voice is really a mentor. An inebriate who had panhandled all over North America had an obsession against religion, fearing that it meant letters of fire in the sky, voices from the clouds, or a dramatic emotional upheaval. It was suggested to him that he spend five minutes each morning planning his day with his conscience, how he would use his time and spend his money, the mood in which he would meet his family, the sense of responsibility he would have in his work. He discovered that as soon as he listened, the inner voice spoke. He found he could be spiritual in a very practical way without seeing visions or dreaming dreams.

A high-strung man with perplexing business cares took liquor to get to sleep at night. In time he would go to sleep with a full jug of wine at his bedside: later he would waken with an empty wine jug in bed with him. One morning he passed out. A friend said, "One tenth the attention you give to gin, if given to God, could make you happy." The experiment was tried. Each day he lists the commonplace things for which he is thankful, the mistakes of yesterday he wishes to avoid today, the people whose friendship he ought to keep in repair, the duties which are "musts" for that day. With a gleeful grin he tells others "give God the first ten minutes of every day and he will give you back the whole twenty-four hours all different." This simple plan has freed hundreds.

At 2:30 A.M. a wise A.A. worker was aroused out of his sleep. A taxi driver had deposited a chronic at his door. The moment he was admitted to the hall the chronic shouted out: "I don't believe in God, or Bible, or church, or prayer. I am a free thinker." The reply was "O.K., my boy. Nobody wants you to believe anything if you don't want to. That's your business." The two went to the kitchen and had plentiful coffee. Before daybreak the A.A. man said: "There is no use discussing prayer. The only thing about prayer that is any good is praying. I am going to pray for you." Which he did, humbly, trustingly, and in colloquial terms. Then, the drunk was told he could pray, too, if he felt like it. His first petition was "O God, help me to have faith in this guy." He is still sober, back home again living with his wife.

III

It is this experimental, demonstration offer that is the key to A.A. Controversy, argument, and dogmatism are avoided. Everything is on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. "It worked for me, it might work for you." The goal is far greater than merely to stop drinking. In itself that may not be of very much help. To be conscious of not drinking and still wanting to drink is just about as distracting a state of mind as being under the influence of alcohol. The big positive goal is happy and contented sobriety, a rewarding and satisfying way of living. It is a distinct privilege to be an alcoholic if it leads to twenty-four hours at a time without fear and in good will toward people and in humble dependence upon God. Restoration to sanity is abundant proof of the working of a Higher Power.

Prayer becomes a reality, usually in everyday forms of speech. Rhetorical demands, purple-patch phrases, snatches of liturgies are replaced by simple but earnest desires. One man says each evening, "Thank you, God, for a sober day." Next morning he prays, "Please God, another day like yesterday." Even a spot of prayer such as that is an anchor by which to hold. An A.A. sober for six months went into a sudden panic. He found himself entering his favorite bar. Involuntarily he ejaculated, "O God, save me." In five seconds he was walking down the street cool and collected, every butterfly gone from his stomach. Another man hearing his stepdaughter in hysterics cried for help as to what to do. He was given the right words to say and soon the child was out skating. His verdict is that "the Higher Power works fast." To hear the A.A.'s recite the Lord's Prayer is an experience in worship. "Lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil." That is a life and death matter. Our desires are our real prayers, not what we say with our lips.

One helpful approach is to think of God as the Truth-making Power. The typical alcoholic insists on making his own interpretation of the universe and he anticipates the Day of Judgement by pronouncing condemnation on all and sundry. His dislikes are stronger than his likes. Criticism is his mental habit rather than appreciation. It is an initial step in humility to admit that truth is ordained of God. Mathematicians did not decree the multiplication table, nor musicians the octave, astronomers the calendar, orators the alphabet, mariners the magnetic compass. When truth is accepted as from God, intellectual conceit begins to vanish. The alcoholic learns to work with the laws of God instead of against them. Curiously enough the mind starts to discover new truth and to act upon it until every day becomes a voyage of discovery into the many-sided truths of God. Mind and mortality thus have a constant interplay.

In simple, even primitive fashion, members of Alcoholics Anonymous come to think of the Higher Power as the Hero of Eternity. Long before we were born the Higher Power was governing and ordaining long after we are gone that same Power will be ruling and overruling. Do not be fussed, little man. Today is all you need think about. The rhythm of the day and night becomes a contact with God. Living one day at a time can be an act of faith, a response of trust. One man returning from a five-thousand mile selling trip states: "To travel without fear is a new experience. I cannot become accustomed to it. I never will become accustomed to it." On a long, cold bus trip over an icy road, the one other passenger produced a bottle and offered a drink which was refused. The ability to refuse a drink offered in kindness and in the desire to help, to refuse graciously but finally, was the high light of the whole trip. To him it was the grace of God. It is in such experiences of protection and deliverance that A.A.'s become aware of the Living God.

The thought of the Higher Power is usually quite individual and may be decidedly unconventional. One man took his idea from a picture of flowers and birds. Just as the sun sends light and warmth, so he conceives of the Higher Power sending truth and love to him. One man, cursing himself as he shaved, heard a little bird singing outside his window. The bird was adjusted to his environment, but he, a university graduate, was not. Now he is. Another learned faith by seeing an engineer take five hundred passengers out of a railway station on one green light. There would be more signals as he went along. Another saw a bay freeze over. At first the ice was paper thin, by midwinter it was three feet thick, making ice from underneath. Could his soul grow imperceptibly like that? Another was told that big doors swing on little hinges. A.A. is the little hinge on which his future sobriety now swings.

IV

The personality change can be sudden, unexpected, and involuntary. A well-seasoned drinker, after two months of sobriety, was asked to speak at a meeting. He answered that as yet he had nothing to say. "Then just say that you have nothing to say," he was told. When called to speak he announced that for the sake of politeness he could not refuse but "actually I have nothing to say, for nothing has happened to me." Then he paused. After a somewhat painful silence he said quietly, "Something has happened to me," and sat down. Two months later an old friend asked what did happen. He replied: "As I was saying I had nothing to say, suddenly I knew that at long last I had surrendered to goodness. All my life I had been debating and holding back. I have been different ever since and I have not the slightest desire for a drink." Without conscious effort his personality has been unified.

Rehabilitation may follow a Christian pattern. One man after thirty years of hard drinking made an inventory of what drink had cost him. He became convinced he was a fool, and he did not like being a fool. In his own words this is his story: "I decided to investigate religion. I read what the apostles had to say about Jesus Christ. Christ came into my life and liquor has stayed out. Nothing goes out until something else comes in."

The spiritual aspect of the program is by no means camouflaged but it is not made too obvious at first. The big book, Alcoholics Anonymous, sometimes described as the A.A. bible, has three hundred references to the Higher Power. One member spent a Christmas Day counting them. Six of the Twelve Steps refer to God. The official magazine, The Grapevine, unhesitatingly refers to the Higher Power as God. With increasing frequency at group meetings older members say quite openly that they are staying sober only with the help of God. Surprising coincidences happen and the explanation naively offered is "Somebody Upstairs." The intimacy does not come from irreverence but from trust. However slight and vague the faith at first, progress is steadily made toward a more mature and adult thought of God.

In social life an alcoholic is regarded as a misfit. Medicine looks upon him as a non-cooperative patient, very often-poor payer. The law deals with him as a criminal and sends him to jail. Psychiatry diagnoses him as a mental case and confines him in an institution. The church tells him that he is a sinner and must repent. His family has convinced him that he is hopeless. Against this background of despair, Alcoholics Anonymous comes along telling him that God is in him, that God can be in him as much as God can be anywhere, that if God is not in him God is not everywhere and so cannot be God. By the witness of another alcoholic, now sober, the life is breathed into his soul. Without soul and spirit the body is only an empty shell. A few even go so far as to say that God himself may draw upon vital strength and increase of being from their fidelity. If so, they, each one of them, may be important in the whole scheme of things. A surrendered life, they hold, can be of use to God.

Strangely enough, no attempt is made to induce conviction of sin, awaken a sense of guilt, or lead to a period of remorse. It is quite unnecessary anyway. An alcoholic's conscience has told him all this a thousand times. Remorse weakens and is seldom redemptive. The better way is to live today. Yesterday is past, you cannot do much about it. You cannot undo what you have done. Waste no time on regret. Tomorrow is not here yet. Have no fears. The Higher Power has dealt with far harder cases than yours. A miracle might happen, if you will just take it easy. Live one day at a time. When you came into the world there was air for your lung: has the Higher Power ceased to care for you? Restraint from condemning increases the chance of cure.

Usually alcoholics are gun shy of religion. They may have tried it over and over and it has not worked, so they are more responsive to psychology. Fortunately there is enough psychology in the A.A. program for beginners to go on with. Some find that the psychology is sufficient to enable them to achieve sobriety; others keep seeking more than the laws of the mind, and by the practice of meditation advance to the laws of the spirit. It is a mistake to force growth. One man who has been instrumental in over three hundred recoveries says, "I have learned not to look for results too soon: I know they will come later." He himself is not content until he leads his proteges to definite faith, but he knows that time must be given for a seed of truth to germinate. If out of the Twelve Steps in the program the prospect is only ready for one or two, he is urged to work on these. The others will follow later.

Will power is discounted in A.A. "Use your will" has been useless advice to them. They have the will but not the power. They do not have won't power, let alone will power. Promises, pledges, prayers have not availed. Then they are told how to replace their puny wills by the will of God. The unit actually begins to lean on the strength of the All. It is found that the imagination governs the will. As one holds the picture of himself as a capable, controlled citizen, thoughts are focused in that direction, desires become conscious, emotions become strong, and the whole personality goes into action. Instead of trying to whip up a weak will into doing what it is unable to do, one finds will power restored by the use of thought, desire, emotion, creative imagination. In six months the will can become stronger to say "No" than formerly as routine it said "Yes." Such restorations of will power are frequent in A.A.

V

The changed attitude to life is indicated by new reading habits. Murder mysteries and sex novels are often replaced by worthwhile magazines, thoughtful books, and devotional manuals. So eager is the mind for truth that serious reading is done. There is a special interest in psychology and psychiatry. Religious classics have a new vogue. Pamphlet literature is kept in circulation. The leader of a group of two hundred men and women said to a visitor, "They are a tough-looking bunch, but you would be surprised to know the amount of Bible reading and prayer going on." Another evidence of spiritual experience is the number of newspaper articles and booklets being produced by members.

Men and women who have had medical care repeatedly, been sent to mental hospitals and sanitariums, been given conditioned reflex treatment, gone to alcoholic farms, or taken Keeley Cures, ask why these so often fail and Alcoholics Anonymous is having increasing success. One answer is that these treatments (for which we are thankful; they are much better than none) were only body cures; and in some degree fear was the motive for reform. They were also very expensive. Alcoholics Anonymous is cheap: there are no membership dues or entrance fees. Instead of a receding memory, A.A. is a growing experience of fact, fellowship and faith. It is enlarged opportunity and cumulative happiness. The old has gone, the new has come and keeps coming. The unhappy past is forgotten in happiness and hope. "He who rises quickly and continues his race is as if he has never fallen." There are great days ahead. The movement is strictly nondenominational. Catholics, Protestants, and Jews work together as brothers, though very few Jews are alcoholics. No effort is made to win others to any particular faith. The organization seeks to be inclusive rather than exclusive. No one is barred by age, sex, race, or creed. The one condition is the sincere desire to stop drinking. Nearly every club has one or two evangelical atheists, usually born of Christian parents, who strangely have conserved a Christian spirit. After a few months they usually agree that they never were atheists and anyway it did not make much difference. They stood on the same earth, breathed the same air, and talked the same language as others. Atheism had never been much help in keeping sober. Atheism, in fine, requires too much credulity: it is rather difficult to believe that nothing made everything and is going nowhere.

How is it that denominational differences can be so completely submerged? One reason is that no one is asked to give up anything but is urged to use what he already has. In time it is found that the A.A. program of recovery is founded upon universal spiritual experience. Jesuits affirm that it is similar to the principles of Ignatius Loyola. Quakers say that it makes use of meditation and the group conscience. Moral Rearmament people detect the four absolutes. Salvation Army officers are reminded of their knee drill. Methodists say it resembles John Wesley's discipline. Christian Science says it is closely akin. Unity, New Thought, Mysticism all think their programs have been adopted and adapted. A.A. is a synthetic product with a pragmatic test. What does not work is discarded: what does work is retained.

Do A.A.'s go back to church? Some do and some don't. Much depends upon early training. Some have a childhood belief to which they return with a deeper understanding. As a rule Roman Catholics resume their religious duties and observances - to them religion means their church. Some Protestants become active church workers, others go a time or two and report that "my minister doesn't know about God." Quite a few accept A.A. as their church. It gives faith and fellowship even though lacking much formal worship. Church

He sat down and reviewed his many problems. Wasn't drink the cause of them all? His troubles with his boss obviously came from his frequent absences from work, and the fact that when he was on the job, too often he was muddle-headed. His family's poverty was due not to his low earning power but to his alcoholic spending. His relationship with his wife and children - awful and getting worse - was clearly a product of his lust for drink. He didn't feel well most of the time. That too could be blamed on alcohol. As the young man sweated through his list of woes, it became marvelously apparent to him that he could dispose of them all by doing one thing - a difficult thing, certainly, but not impossible. He simply wouldn't drink anymore.

He realized he would always be an alcoholic, potentially. His friend in A.A. told him that. But an alcoholic who never took a drink was just the same as a non-alcoholic - outwardly. The net effect was the same. All he had to do was stop - and then live up to the program.

As I looked at the young man I couldn't help wondering how he would react on a not far distant day when he would have to face the fact that drying up was not enough. I recalled how a friend of mine took it. He was bewildered and bitter when, dry as a bone, he discovered that some of his troubles were worse than ever. The realization came close to throwing him back into the nightmare of alcoholism.

To build up such false prospects in the mind of the compulsive drinker is to do him a great unkindness. Drying up is seldom the complete answer to his problems. The involved and underground impulses that sent him down the alcoholic way in the first place remain with him.

Take the compulsive drinker who has an inferiority complex. Alcohol furnishes a quick, easy hurdle over repressions. Given a few drinks, the timid soul finds himself a brilliant conversationalist. His humor seems peerless. He shines. Now remove the alcohol. He is once more his diffident, self-conscious, nervous and fearful self.

A feeling of inferiority is, of course, only one of many human woes which taken singly or in combination may furnish the impulse toward alcoholism. There was Joe, for instance. After seven years of marriage he was still in love with his wife. But she had remained the sweet, irresponsible adolescent who first attracted him. His children were neglected, his home badly kept, his hard-earned money carelessly spent. The thing that bothered him most, however, was the feeling that she took him for granted. Resentment and hurt pyramided within him. Words led to words and Joe found himself playing the bully and saying cruel things he did not mean. His wife's tears made him despise himself.

Then he discovered alcohol. Through its haze he got a flattering picture of himself - much sinned against and justly enraged. Best of all, he could think about his wife without feeling all hurt inside. She deserved what she got. The sad old process followed. Joe became a drunkard. Job, home, wife, children - everything he valued was slipping away from him when he joined A.A.

Joe stuck to the program. Month after month he stayed away from the first drink. Yet home conditions grew steadily worse. His wife, completely her immature self, more than once wished Joe would go back to his favorite tavern - he was so irritable with her and the children. His self-restraint set her on edge. Incredible as it sounds - but it will sound that way only to the uninitiated - she took to drinking herself. Whatever the collective causes of Joe's alcoholism, drying up did not make his home idyllic.

Another compulsive drinker, Dick, started drinking because he couldn't get along with his business associates. His temper was always getting out of hand. Trouble inevitably followed either with his boss or his fellow employees. A kindly man at heart, he loathed himself for these outbursts of temper and the caldron of bitterness they stirred up. Alcohol became his cushion and his consolation. But it cost him one job after another. It ruined his home, got him more and more into debt, and was well on its way to destroying him physically, mentally and spiritually. Drying up surely seemed a cure-all. But he discovered that, dry as the Sahara, he still had his temper. He resented opposition and restraint as much as ever. Only now he had to face his frightening inadequacies without any anesthesia.

Then there was Eleanor, unmarried and in her forties. She had a well-paid job in which she was not particularly interested and an attractive apartment which served merely as a backdrop for loneliness. Gradually she made friends with John Barleycorn. After that, loneliness was never a problem. But the price was staggering. Her solitary drinking seemed headed for inevitable tragedy, when she joined A.A. She achieved sobriety all right; but the loneliness returned. She seemed only to have swapped tormentors. True, she found a certain amount of companionship amongst the members. But it didn't go deep enough. Much more than abstinence was needed to bring her to a satisfactory adjustment.

Fortunately, she had access to an alcoholic clinic and through the guidance of its competent psychiatrist eventually proved herself superior to her personality defect.

Joe and Dick worked out their problems too, but their help came in a different way. They became people of meaning to themselves and of value to others through the assistance of trusted advisers. Joe and his wife were led to see the basic weakness in their marriage, and eventually to erase it. Dick came to realize that back of his temper was a terrible pride which detonated his anger. Self-knowledge sent him back with extra fervor to his religion and the imitation of Christ. Most alcoholics, perhaps all, need psychiatric help. A man starts to drink for reasons of which he may or may not be aware. When he parts from alcohol those reasons may or may not still exist. In any case his means of escape is gone, but his difficulties remain. The dried up alcoholic still has his inferiority complex. He still has his temper. He still must suffer uncongenial moments with family, friend, employer - and worst of all with himself. He must still live in a world with painful prodding.

Recognition of the personality problem which is the substructure of his inability to adjust to conditions under which other people are living successfully is the first step in his rehabilitation; the second is the building up 'of attitudes and habits which will help him overcome the weakness. Both require long-term, intelligent psychiatric help - but above all, he must be convinced that ultimately he is the doctor. As in the cases of Joe and Dick, the help may come other than professional sources. It must, in many instances, if it is to come at all.

Alcoholic clinics, family welfare services, and similar professional agencies cannot cope with the estimated 400,000 alcoholics in the United States. Even A.A., in spite of its tireless, round the clock efforts, has been able to reach only one-seventh of the casualties to alcoholism, which ranks fourth among the nation's ills.

For many alcoholics, then, help in rehabilitation must come from non-professional sources - a clergyman, a lawyer, a trusted relative, the man in the next office, the woman across the street. It is to these "men and women of good will" as well as to the alcoholic himself that the suggestions in this article are directed. The friend of the alcoholic may - if he is inexperienced - overlook the fact that drying up usually furnishes only the condition of health. It is essential that one strive after his own well being, at least to this degree. It is a good start, if the alcoholic is smart enough to know that whisky is controllable -but it is just a start.

This might tend to discourage some who are struggling for sobriety. But it should not. For what every alcoholic must know is, that unless he stops drinking, there is no hope of anything else. Once dried up he can proceed to take the basic difficulties in hand.

I shall attempt to outline, first in a general and then in a specific way, the steps he must follow. First of all (in keeping with the A.A. program) the compulsive drinker seeking rehabilitation ought to turn with all fervor and humility to the faith and discipline implicit in his obligation to God. Such action will serve a twofold purpose: religious discipline will help him to overcome character weaknesses; faith in a will higher than his own, will open a source of limitless strength which he is free to make use of, when and how he needs it.

Next he must establish a motive, clearly understood and powerful enough to direct, even impel, him toward choices that will replace old defeating habits with healthful new ones.

Acquiring good habits is not a mechanical procedure. It does not fall into the classification of muscle building or weight reduction, dependent solely upon a day-by-day repetition of certain prescribed exercises. Rather, the will must adhere to the principle of reasoned choice. And choice, following the cue of man's intelligence must have motive behind it.

What then, is the motive powerful enough to impel the alcoholic toward right choice in all things that affect him - from the minutest detail of his environment to the broadest intellectual decision?

Some well meaning people still assault the alcoholic with appeals to decency, loyalty, love of wife, children, mother or father. They bring in the fear of punishment in this life and maybe hell in the next, or both. Experience has shown that none of these motives is sufficient.

The alcoholic's own obligation to himself is the only motive strong enough and wide enough to support the construction of his new life. This may sound egotistic and selfish. Actually it is neither; for self-love is not selfishness. It is the obligation a man has to act in such a way that his conduct will conform to his destiny, which is his inherent and over-all development in terms of his highest and most truly human ideals. In the order of grace and nature, a man's own perfection is his truest destiny. It furnishes him with the most powerful motive within the scope of human imagination.

In applying these broad, general principles toward a solution of his own problem, the alcoholic, and those who would help him, may find a few specific suggestions of value:

1. He should put himself into situations favorable to his new way of life and incompatible with his former behavior. This means choosing his physical surroundings, friends, books, hobbies, work, pleasure, and everything which bears upon him externally, with his motive firmly in mind. A persevering member of A.A. once told me that he likes everything about drinking. "I like the taste and smell and sight of liquor," he said. "Above all, I like the men I drank with." The day may come when the compulsive drinker can be with his friends again and not drink. But in the beginning he would be foolish to try it.
2. He should not permit exceptions - either in the resolve not to drink or in the systematic building of new habits. Each slip, says William James, is like dropping a ball of string. Just a little carelessness and much tedious work is undone.
3. He should carry out good resolutions as soon as possible. Sentiments and wishes are for the most part useless unless they end in action. In fact, they can be harmful. A wasted resolution is more damaging than a lost opportunity, for it sets a positive obstacle in the normal, wholesome path of future resolutions. William James thought there was no more contemptible type of human character than the sentimentalist and dreamer who spends his life on a sea of sensibility but never gets down to vigorous action. In short, a person should not allow himself the luxury of an emotion toward good without giving it concrete expression.

Occasionally in this article I have referred to normal living. Too much should not be read into that word normal. Most people's lives vibrate between success and failure intermixed with peaks of tranquillity and tumult. No life is free from dissatisfaction and incompleteness. St. Augustine in his Confessions, wrote: "Thou hast made us for Thyself and our hearts are restless until they rest in Thee." The seeds of discontent ferment in human nature along with man's insufficiency. Recognition of these truths is behind A.A.'s insistence that the alcoholic must admit his need for divine help.

Let the alcoholic know what he is in for. Sobriety truly means the alcoholic's salvation - in this life and perhaps in the next. But drying up is not the complete solution. It is only the key, which opens the way for him to live successfully without the crutch of alcohol. Granted intelligent help and perseverance, the compulsive drinker can anticipate a rewarding life. Yet, it will not be that simple because he stays away from drink. But unless he does stay away, he will not be able to look forward to anything.

|||||

+++Message 1237. . . . . pp. 109-116 from Area 20 historybook, copyright 2003 by NIA, Ltd.
From: ricktompkins . . . . . 8/24/2003 12:09:00 PM

|||||

*APPENDIX *V

*****

Serving as an employee of the General Service Office from 1982 through the close of 1996, Frank M. accepted the promotion to Archivist on the retirement of Nell Wing at the end of 1982. His love of A.A. history, his cordial and abundant correspondence, and his encouragement and assistance to A.A. Archivists throughout the entire Fellowship generated a loving memory and respect from all who knew him. Many Area, District, and Group Archives were established during his GSO years. By supporting the growing general service A.A. Archives effort with resources of archival materials, providing expert knowledge of research direction, and insightfully sharing the relationship between archival ethics and A.A. principles, his pioneering service to our A.A. Archives is felt to this day.

Frank's farewell address to the 1996 General

Service Conference, with its Conference theme of 'Preserving Our Fellowship--Our Challenge,' is reprinted with permission of A.A.W.S., Inc.

*G.S.O. A**rchives:

Window on the Past, Guide to the Present, *

*and Light for the Future*

I appreciate this opportunity to share on something I feel particularly passionate about--our collective A.A. history and its relevancy to our survival;

the anchor of our Fellowship. A.A. members relish histories, conscious or not.

Our A.A. lives are spent, usually happily, listening endlessly to oral histories, hearing again, and again, the underlying theme: (a) That we were alcoholic and could not manage our own lives. (b) That probably no human power could have relieved our alcoholism. (c) That God could and would if He were sought. (_Alcoholics Anonymous_, p. 60)

In each of our individual stories we hear of drinking causing collapse; then, following a serendipitous contact with Alcoholics Anonymous, a complete transformation of our lives through the remarkably simple application of our Twelve Steps. A clear demonstration of alchemy, turning lead into gold. Doesn't it appear startlingly fresh with each telling? I have listened to these personal histories now for over a quarter of a century, with a deepening sense of wonder.

With a growing recognition that our collective history also merited retention, our Fellowship's Archives was opened in 1972 by Tom Sharpe, former general service trustee; Bob Hitchins, G.S.O. general manger; and Nell Wing, Bill W.'s secretary for 22 years and the first G.S.O. archivist. Bill W. stated the purpose was '...to keep the record straight so that myth does not predominate over fact as to the history of the Fellowship.' (_ italic;">Handbook for Setting Up an Archival Repository_, p. 13) In the ensuing years, the collection has proliferated. Each year has brought forth a fuller appreciation of just what we've got. Throughout the Fellowship, particularly in the last decade, the interest in our history has exploded. At last count, 63 of the 92 delegate areas had an active archivist. Many of these areas have district archivists as well. This body, joined by other interested historians, generates about 40 requests per week for detailed historical data on earlytimers, groups, districts, and areas. As some of you know from firsthand experience, our researcher, Noela Jordan, spends a good chunk of her life pouring over old directories, newspaper clippings, and files hunting up the 'earliest' and 'firsts.' Not a few areas have published impressively detailed local histories that document A.A.'s beginnings and growth. The memories of a multitude of earlytimers have been captured on tape. And joyously, under the skill and guidance of Judit Santon, our assistant archivist, a large beginning has been made on scanning our material for computer access, with the aim of cutting future response time, making a larger body of material available, and avoiding physical damage to the fragile original documents in the collection. Is all this attention to our past necessary, some have asked?

As our co-founders, Bill and Bob, often stated, we, the present members of Alcoholics Anonymous, are links in an ancient chain of alcoholics stretching back through time. And haven't alcoholics been a perplexing problem for society for centuries? For example, Solomon laments, almost 3000 years ago, 'Who hath woe? Who hat sorrow? Who hath contentions? Who hath babbling? Who hath wounds without cause? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine...when it moveth itself aright. At the last, it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. Thine eyes shall behold strange women, and thine heart shall utter perverse things...They have stricken me, shalt thou say, and I was not sick; they have beaten me and I felt it not: When shall I awake? I will seek it yet again.' (Proverbs 23:29-35)

It seems that alcoholics baffled Solomon, and we continue to baffle others and ourselves. Drunkenness is not new to our shores. Someone observed that the Pilgrims stopped at Plymouth Rock not because they wanted to settle in Massachussets, but because they had run out of booze.

Let's take a brief look through an archival window at some of the attempts over the ages to offer us sufferers some relief to our malady. In 1782, Benjamin Rush, prominent physician and signer of the Declaration of Independence, wrote a 17 page medical paper on our condition entitled, 'The Effects of Ardent Spirits on the Human Body and Mind.' In it, he terms alcoholism 'a progressive and odious disease' and urges complete abstinence as the only effective treatment. The paper was widely circulated and well received, becoming a cornerstone document of the Temperance Movement. Yet, the points he made for abstinence from alcohol as the treatment for a progressive disease seem to have been often forgotten and frequently challenged. In such a fickle public arena, it's nice to remind ourselves that A.A., as such, has no opinion on the matter. Our Big Book terms it an illness. Whatever society may choose to call it, I seem to have gotten a bad case of it.

Another

opportunity for us alcoholics was embodied in The Washingtonian Temperance Society, which had uncovered a workable formula. After a founding in March of 1840 by six drunks at Chase tavern in Baltimore, the group experienced a meteoric rise, recoding 1,000 members before the end of that year. Abraham Lincoln addressed their second anniversary celebration. Their message was simple: 1) the drunkard could be rescued; he was weak, not wicked; 2) relating personal experience by a reformed drunkard was more moving and persuasive than a lecture by a well meaning nonalcoholic; 3) the simplicity of the pledge, requiring only one thing--personal abstinence; and 4) neutrality on the subjects of politics, religion, and the distributions and sale of alcoholic beverages. Not unlike the elements in our own Preamble.

Initially, the Washingtonian movement was virtually entirely made up of reformed 'sots." Later, others flocked to their meetings and took up the pledge and the 'fellowship of sufferers" became diluted. In spite of their stated aims, to avoid politics, etc. many members took opposing sides publicly on alcohol reform and other issues. Importantly, there was no principle of anonymity to protect the society from erring members. Within eight or nine years it was reported that the Washingtonians had 'lost their thunder." At their zenith, the press reported that there were 500,000 recovered sots in the Washingtonians. Since the population in those years was a recorded 20 million, I calculate that today A.A. would have to have 7,5000,000 members in the U.S. alone to have that same ratio. One can't help but ponder the fate of those members when the fire went out.

Another promising answer for the reclamation of the alcoholic was the Emmanuel Movement, founded by a clergyman psychologist, Elwood Worcester. In 1906, Worcester had a deep conviction that the physician and clergyman could work more effectively together in the treatment of functional ills; he had studied, interestingly enough, in Leipzig with Gustav Fechner, one of the pioneers in psychotherapy and one of Carl Jung's professors. His book outlining his theories, Religion and Medicine, the Moral Control of Nervous Disorders, appeared in 1908 and had nine printings in the year of publication. Alcoholism, not surprising to us, constituted the largest category within 'nervous disorders."

Two successful graduates of the process were Courtney Baylor, who became the first paid alcoholism lay counselor, and Richard Peabody, a prominent lay therapist and author of the Common Sense of Drinking, a runaway best-seller of its day (1930), that had found a home in Bill W.'s library. After a couple of decades of successfully treating alcoholics, public controversy entered and diminished their effectiveness. The clergymen publicly quarreled with the physicians. Thus, the movement did not last much beyond the life and energy of its founder.

Our immediate ancestor, the Oxford Group, later renamed Moral Rearmament, has a similar story; it has initially impressive results through a proven method of personal spiritual transformation. Bill asserts in _A.A. Comes of Age_, that all of our spiritual principles come directly from the Oxford Group, and by way of Sam Shoemaker, its New York leader at Calvary Church, where Bill attended meetings with Ebby and Rowland H. The Oxford Group had the ability to fill vast arenas, like the Hollywood Bowl in 1939, where 25,000 filled the inside and another 10,000 waited outside. Yet today there's little awareness of their immense influence outside of Alcoholics Anonymous.

Our own present guide, our 'founding moment' to recovery from the illness of alcoholism, is thought by many of us to have begun with an encounter just before Armistice Day in 1934, between our co-founder Bill and a childhood friend, Ebby, a recent recruit in the Oxford Group. Bill and Lois were living in Brooklyn Heights. Ebby was sober--something Bill hadn't expected to see; he left Bill a description of a program of simple actions, one designed to produce a spiritual awakening. Bill continued to drink for a few more weeks, but after his fourth admission to Towns Hospital on December 11, 1934, he experienced his 'sudden and profound' spiritual event that changed him and the lives of alcoholics in this room. For he then, like Ebby, had caught fire and set about trying to ignite the same passion for sobriety that had been let loose in himself. It is said that Bill tried and failed with 40 men. He then ventured to Akron and tumbled into the lives of

Dr. Bob and Ann. He was to stay with the Smiths for over three months, and together they carried the message with zeal to many others. When he left Dr. Bob's, there was one other on the road to recovery, Bill D., a lawyer. What was to become Alcoholics Anonymous had begun.

Thus A.A. started on the Road of Happy Destiny. And, initially at least, our growth was slow. Most likely a good thing. It took almost four years to gather 100 members, and publish a basic textbook. Like those movements before us, Bill to observe in a talk in Memphis in September 1947, that success was a 'serious problem.' He stated, 'The wine of forgetfulness might make us dream that Alcoholics Anonymous was our success rather than God's will...How, as a movement, shall we maintain our humility--and so our unity--in the face of what the world calls a great triumph? Perhaps we need not look far afield for an answer. We need only adapt and apply to our group life those principles upon which each of us has founded his own recovery. If humility can expel the obsessions to drink alcohol, then surely humility can be our antidote for that subtle wine called success.'" (A.A. Grapevine, October 1947, p.8)

was

In August

1947, the previous month, it was reported that there were 48,613 members, in 1,650 groups, in 13 countries. Bill then set about the task of 'assuring A.A.'s future" through the formulation of our Twelve Traditions. He knew that these were the Light for our future. Each of these principles has a reality in the records of our early years, and was deep in the documented experience of these earlier 'successful" efforts to aid the alcoholic. Earlier movements failed not because they weren't successful, but rather because they were; they demonstrated Bill's point that success can be more damaging to a society than failure.

As in my own personal experience, failure gets my attention; success can make me 'intoxicated." When I lose, I may ask for help; if I hurt enough I might even take the advice. I find that I need the Twelve Steps in my life more than ever to assure my own emotional sobriety.

And our

Fellowship needs the Twelve Traditions in our collective lives to assure Emotional Sobriety at the Group and Area levels. Although records on alcoholics are difficult to gather, it is estimated that there are now 2,000,000 members in approximately 89,000 groups in 146 countries.

So many of us in service throughout the A.A. world believe that a careful study of our history is essential--to deepen appreciation for our gifts and to foster a renewed effort to remember and carry forward our original message. Archives then are about keeping our collective history and its struggle before us, stimulating a feeling of humility and trust in God's guidance; taking the abstract wording of the Traditions and transforming them into vital tools for survival. Keeping clear this window to our past can provide the best light for our future.

information

(and help) have been received by the Montpelier Group from points 135 miles distant.

Miss B. Elaine Atkins, editor and publisher of The Argus not only speaks highly

of

A.A. and what she has seen it accomplish, but she very definitely does something about it. . . . One Vermonter, with his wife, travels every Sunday night from Windsor to the state capital for the A.A. meeting --a round trip of 150 miles.

A series of seven articles on A.A. have been prepared by the Shreveport, La., Group and are now appearing in the Shreveport Times. . . . "A.A.--What it is and How it Works" will be discussed by a member of the Minneapolis Group, speaking before an assemblage of more than 500 pastors from Minnesota and adjacent states who are attending a conference in that city. . . . The Savannah, Ga., Group, which originated

last October, now have their own clubrooms. . . . Sponsored by a committee known

as the Alcoholic Confidential Assistance Committee, co-operating with local A.A.'s, alcoholics arrested in Plainfield, N. J., will henceforth be heard on a special court

day, when the courtroom will be cleared of spectators. The alcoholic's sentence

will be suspended, provided he or she will consult with the committee and follow their proposed program.

On the request of the superintendent of the California Institution for Women at Tehachapi, Glendale A.A.'s got a group going within the institution, aided by members from Burbank, North Hollywood, Inglewood and other nearby communities. With regular meetings every two weeks as a starter, the Tehachapi Group is already going strong. .

. . Membership of the Memphis, Tenn., Group has increased to such an extent that

a second group has been formed in Crosstown. . . . A.A.s, police, probation officials, and officers of county and medical societies are among those who took part in

a convention of the Institute on Chronic Alcoholism held at the University of Minnesota. . . Until now, the Greenville, S. C., Group has been meeting the office of one of the members. They've outgrown that space and are now holding regular sessions at the Coca-Cola Bottling Co., plant.

In Battle Creek, Mich., they've devised a way of remaining anonymous, strictly.
Referring to a big open meeting and banquet affair, a member explained how they maintained complete anonymity: "We invited so many friends and friends of friends that the guests couldn't possibly tell an A.A. from an A.B. or an M.D. But don't get the idea that only those with college degrees are welcome. Many of us have degrees only from the University of Experience." . . . At the Second Anniversary celebration of the Tampa, Fla., Group the 150 celebrants included members from a dozen states;
their roster today reads 103 members. . . The two Colorado Springs, Colo.,
groups,
now five years old, have a membership of over 40; other Colorado groups are in Pueblo, Cannon City, Salida, and Gunnison. . . In four years the Indianapolis, Ind.,
A.A.'s have grown to about 275 men and women.

Parole supervisors and welfare workers in twenty Northeastern Indiana counties heard a talk by a Fort Wayne A.A. . . . More than 200 A.A.s, including members from Saginaw, Flint, Pontiac, Royal Oak, Travers City, Detroit, and Windsor, Ont., attended the Second Anniversary festival of the Bay City Group. . . . Within five months after the Davenport, Iowa, Group was started, July 1945, it had acquired clubrooms-- at 404½ Brady Street . . . The El Paso, Tex., Group, with 10 members, has its own post-office box #211, El Paso. . . Hays, Kans., A. A.s are growing slowly but surely in numbers; two years ago they were three, today they are fifteen.

"It's not the numbers that count so much," said a speaker of the Manhattan
Group,

"but the quality of one's sobriety." . . . Among the newest groups to be formed are: Brockton, Mass.; Port Arthur, Texas; St. Johnsbury, Vt.; Elmira and Newburg, N. Y.; Redwood City, Calif.; and Torrington, Conn. . . . And a few of the groups which have recently furnished speakers to local clubs, civic organizations, medical societies, churches, etc., are Chicago, Ill.; Orlando, Fla.; Newark, N. J.; Dallas, Texas; Peekskill, N. Y.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Reading, Mass.; and Bridgeport, Conn.

Attending the Burlington, Iowa, Group's Second Anniversary meeting were 200 members from Iowa, Wisconsin, Nebraska, and Missouri. . . . The flourishing group in Mt. Vernon, N. Y., marked their Third Anniversary with a big gathering which included many A.A.s from New York City and environs.

In one of those competitive quiz broadcasts in which scores are kept and prizes given, A.A.s of Hartford, Conn., bested members of the Springfield, Mass. Group on a recent "Quiz of Two Cities" radio show in the latter city. . . . In the new hospital to be built in Atlanta, Ga., there will be a ward set apart exclusively for A.A.

. . .
. Detroit, with its 20 groups, now has 800 members in all. In Louisville, Ky., where a $100,000 clinic for treatment of alcoholics is soon to be established, the A.A. membership totals 80. . . . The Doan, Ohio, Group romped dryly but merrily through their Fifth Anniversary recently.

Because of the success of the A.A. group in San Quentin prison, the Superintendent of the Iowa State Penitentiary at Fort Madison indicated in the Presidio (prison publication) that he would like to see a group started in that institution. Following this lead, A.A.s of Des Moines are getting busy on the project.

don't want alcoholics. This mode of thought shows they do not regard alcoholism as a disease, and they let the problem go for solution to some other field of therapy. Are they correct in his procedure?

We feel that they are not. But I'm quick to admit that their decision is based on misinformation, misunderstanding, and a distorted public opinion of what alcoholism is and what alcoholics are. The Catholic hospital should take the initiative in focusing the light of truth on the moral and physical causes of the disease of alcoholism and exert the charity of Christ in the treatment of the victim of alcoholism.

Are Alcoholics Hospital Cases?

Some may say alcoholism is not in our field. We should remind them that the hospital is dedicated to minister to the body of suffering humanity directly and to the needs of its soul indirectly. A Catholic hospital is not Catholic if it does not take into consideration the whole man created to the image of God. A Catholic hospital must supply psychosomatic medicine in the best sense of that term. Again, it might be argued that the alcoholic is a problem for the clergyman or psychiatrist. But what can a clergyman or a psychiatrist do to help a person suffering from dietary deficiency and the host of physical ills which attend alcoholic poisoning?

Hospital care is basic if we are going to do anything for the rehabilitation of the alcoholic. As it is today, the acutely poisoned alcoholic is thrown into jail or the psychopathic ward of a city hospital. By this method, he is stamped as a criminal or a lunatic. One taking poison intentionally is readily admitted to a hospital, and all possible care is given to him. The intentions of the alcoholic and the suicide-minded are not the same, but both are poisoned; hospital and 'medical care is just as necessary to the alcoholic. We cannot reach the intellect and will of a hungry or sick man. We must first treat him physically and then spiritually.

This was Christ's practice when He fed the multitudes and taught them - He cured their bodies and then healed their souls. In the case of the alcoholic, hospitals must cure physically before religion can cure spiritually.

In religion we say the pews should not lead the pulpit: in hospital practice we must not let the layman's distorted conception dictate policy toward the alcoholic. The public regards the alcoholic as a moral leper, a backslider who deserves punishment. Hospitals, by refusing aid to alcoholics, have punished them more than is ever realized.

I know that some charitable hospitals take alcoholics for treatment but record them as gastritis patients. This is hypocrisy; if the profession could honestly diagnose the disease of alcoholism, the public and the victim would have a clear picture of the disease and its consequences. Educational campaigns have caused the public to change its opinion about tubercular and diabetic patients, and a much more enlightened attitude prevails about venereal disease, with the result that patients, by and large, are no longer ashamed to come for treatment. Why couldn't the public be educated similarly about alcoholism?

Alcoholism is a public health problem, and health is the hospitals' business. Broken homes, destitute families supported by public funds, absenteeism costing millions in industrial loss, accidents and crime are but a few of the results suffered by all because alcoholism is not publicly termed a disease and treated as any other affliction. We have stigmatized the alcoholic, so he will not admit he drinks, nor will his family seek aid for him. Wretched publicity or death often ends the record.

Example at One Hospital

I do not know how many hospitals there are which treat the alcoholic, but one which comes to my mind is the Knickerbocker Hospital in New York City. Under skillful and sympathetic direction, this hospital has done a great work for the alcoholic. And the members of the staff have been surprised to find that the problems they expected in the care of alcoholics never materialized. They have such a long waiting list that the same person cannot be admitted twice. This is not because they have no confidence in one who has had a relapse, but they wish to give at least one chance to each of those who apply.

A patient cannot be admitted to the hospital except with an Alcoholics Anonymous member as a sponsor. The physicians say that there is no more difficulty in taking care of an acute alcoholic than there is in taking care of any post-operative patient. Within a short period, the alcoholic recovers from the worst effects of his drinking bout: then he is given the proteins and vitamins which were neglected in his alcoholic diet. He is supplied with all the food he cares to eat, and as soon as he is ambulatory, he goes into the large meeting room which is called "Duffy's Tavern." And so well do the patients get along that the physicians and nurses enjoy associating with them in that room. Tables are piled high with food, and Alcoholics Anonymous literature is spread around. There is nothing to read except this.

Members of Alcoholics Anonymous meet and talk with the patients, gain their confidence, and prove the possibility of rehabilitation. No patient can leave until the Alcoholics Anonymous sponsor takes him from the hospital. The sponsor follows up his charge and takes him to weekly meetings where the Alcoholics Anonymous program counteracts the alcoholic's obsession. He is greatly helped because he is associating with those who have mastered identical difficulties. Eventually he is trained to help other alcoholics, and by taking care of others, he preserves himself from a relapse.

A hospital needs no extra or special equipment to handle alcoholics. A psychiatrist must be employed to discover whether a neurosis causes the alcoholic's drinking or drinking causes the neurosis. If a neurosis causes the drinking, he must get rid of the neurosis. In this case Alcoholics Anonymous cannot help him to recover. If his neurosis is the result of drinking, then he can be entrusted to Alcoholics Anonymous members, and they can effect the balance of the cure. Alcoholics Anonymous members have often been more successful in determining this distinction than the psychiatrist. Alcoholics Anonymous members are the best lay therapists in serving the victim who has a neurosis because of his drinking.

How many alcoholics are there? We do not have accurate figures, but we know of 750,000 alcoholics who have become known when they were taken to courts, jails, or mental institutions. Despite the difficulty of obtaining correct data, we do know 12,000 people die each year with alcoholism as the primary or secondary cause of death. God alone knows how many lives have been wasted and souls lost because most hospitals will not accept alcoholics and most physicians will not treat them.

In Alcoholics Anonymous today there are 25,000 members rehabilitated through Alcoholics Anonymous program combined with some manner of hospital care. These 25,000 are well and happy again, united with their families, and living normal and productive lives - assets to themselves, their families, their communities -and especially helpful to other victims of alcoholism who learn from them that life has a brighter side. There are 500,000 cases of tuberculosis, and we have $130,000,000 to spend on curing them and educating the public not to conceal the disease. There are 750,000 known alcoholics, and we have scarcely $500,000 to spend on their cure and the education of the public. Obviously, the need for recognizing and treating the disease of alcoholism is much greater than we suspected.

A.A. And The Hospital

Let us consider the role of A.A. in relation to the hospital. Alcoholics Anonymous is a group of men and women who have recovered from alcoholism and who have dedicated themselves to do all in their power to effect the cure in others. They are convinced that alcoholism is a disease that the alcoholic can be cured and is worth curing. They regard the whole problem as a public responsibility and feel they can help the victims and the community at large, which pays such a heavy toll (more than a billion dollars a year) because of alcoholism. The educational work of Alcoholics Anonymous is carried out through the large amounts of literature which it distributes throughout the country, and through the examples of the great number of seemingly hopeless individuals whom they have rehabilitated.

The members realize that hospital, physician, psychiatrist, employer, social worker, and Alcoholics Anonymous must work together. They know one alone cannot effect the cure. The teaching of Alcoholics Anonymous might be summarized in the 12 Steps which are gradually undertaken by the new member in such a manner that he will slowly become master of himself. The steps are:

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. We made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. We made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. We admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. We were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. We humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. We made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. We continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. We sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry it out.
12. Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

These steps cannot be given to an individual until he is cared for physically by the hospital, by the physician, by the psychiatrist, and by the close and brotherly working of other members. In the few hospitals which treat alcoholism, it is admitted that much of the success is attributable to co-operation with Alcoholics Anonymous.

Who is an alcoholic? Everyone who drinks is not an alcoholic -even one who drinks excessively is not necessarily an alcoholic. There are certain symptoms which mark the alcoholic:

Who Are Alcoholics?

1. The desire for liquor the morning after over-indulgence; only a confirmed or potential victim of alcoholism can tolerate the taste of liquor after such an experience.

2. Desire for a drink at definite periods throughout the day.
3. The desire to be alone while drinking.
4. Drinking to conquer a sense of inferiority, to impress others, or to display an air of nonchalance.
5. Moodiness, jealousy, irritability, and nervousness as a result of drinking.
6. An allergic reaction to alcohol.

The alcoholic is often proud and sensitive, has a high degree of intelligence and a highly sensitive nervous system. He is frequently a capable person; consequently, pride can wall off his drinking from its cure. Here is the greatest work of Alcoholics Anonymous - seeking out and serving the individual alcoholic before his condition reaches its lowest level. The alcoholic knows he doesn't want to get drunk; he doesn't want to cause trouble to himself and to his family; but he doesn't like to admit he is no longer able to control his drinking. The alcoholic must admit that he has a serious problem that he cannot handle by himself. He must seek the help of almighty God, the Power above himself; here prayer comes into the program. In a most practical way the alcoholic is taught to pray; considering this attainment, a man may even consider himself fortunate to have been an alcoholic, if he has learned the secret of his own weakness and the power of God's help.

In the Alcoholics Anonymous the victim has the companionship of other alcoholics who appreciate his trial, know his difficulties because of their own experiences, and do not tempt him with more drinking. They understand what the alcoholic is up against, and in each they see themselves, realizing, "there but for the grace of God go I." They know their own success is measured by their assistance and service to others.

In working with Alcoholics Anonymous members, I have found great humility, excellent natural ability, and practical Christian charity. They seem to have a deeper understanding of spiritual values than many other lay people. Love for one's neighbor, willingness to go all out to save one life is manifest. Few hospitals would not co-operate diligently with such a group of men whose free time is dedicated to the service of others.

In service to alcoholics, Catholic hospitals have unlimited possibilities. United as the Catholic hospitals are with the Church, they have the means to cure body and soul. Because of their unified authority, they could, with one stroke of the pen, open their doors to victims of acute alcoholism. They would have at their disposal the experience and assistance of every member of Alcoholics Anonymous. Catholic hospitals can lead the way to a new officials and others interested in the alcoholic problem confronting the public today.

The Rock Hill, S. C., Group was host to all the North and South Carolina groups at a meeting last month. Two hundred representatives were present from Raleigh, Chapel Hill, Charlotte, Shelby, Winston-Salem, Asheville, Hendersonville, N. C., and Columbia, Anderson, Chester, Greenville, S. C. . . . Marty Mann of the NCEA spoke last month to the student body of Winthrop College, South Carolina's largest female institution. She also spoke to the South Carolina Legislature; the student body of the University of South Carolina at an open meeting of the Carolina groups.

Oklahoma City A.A.s are preparing to establish a group in Clinton. Shawnee, the latest town in the Sooner State to form a group, now has 15 members, and they are steadily rolling 'em in. . . . A.A.s of Philadelphia attended a lecture on mental hygiene at the Philadelphia County Medical Society. . . . To better serve new members, give them more individual attention, the Atlanta, Ga., A.A.s have branched out into a second group. . . . Last November a group was formed in Wakefield, Neb., which later combined with the Pender Group. Jointly, they have 11 active members and several prospective "customers." They are running ads in the three local papers.

. . .
. The Deep East Texas Group comprises members from Centerville, Palestine, Longview, Nacogdoches, Lufkin, Diboll and San Augustine.

The Syracuse, N. Y., Group now has 100 active members, and the women's auxiliary, recently organized, about 30 members. . . . On invitation, Lt. Col. Samuel Paster, psychiatrist at Kennedy General Hospital, addressed the Memphis Group, outlining the responsibility of society resulting from the psychiatric disturbances caused by World

War II, and the possible help that A.A. might contribute. . . . Fort Smith, Ark., boasting 24 members and more new ones each week, has moved into new clubrooms
at 708½ Garrison Avenue.

Manhattan's loss is Florida's gain. Two members, Bill W. and Art C., who have moved south, are now spark-plugging the Sarasota group which numbers about 20, half
of
them transients during the winter months. John A. of Manhattan, visiting there for six weeks, has also attended meetings of the Tampa Group, which now boasts more than 70 active members and maintains clubrooms in the DeSoto Hotel. The Tampa group
was organized by Roy Y. while he was stationed there with the Army. A.A.s from Fort
Myers, Bradentown and Venice drive to the Sarasota and Tampa meetings often, John reports.

"A.A.s live democracy," said a Glendale member, speaking at a big meeting of the San Bernardino, Calif., Group. ". . . Our goal is not to be better than someone else
but to be better than ourselves. . . . When an A.A. told me I was emotionally immature I didn't mind. So was he."

The seven-year-old Dayton, Ohio, Group saved 1,700 manpower hours per week during the war by putting alcoholics back on the job. "A cell is a medieval instrument of detention and has little or no place in the fight against alcoholism today," declared
Dr. James Sagebiel, Dayton psychiatrist who, like the A.A.s, deplures Dayton's lack of hospital facilities for treatment of alcoholics.

In New England they don't seem to mind the weather. Brockton, Mass., A.A.s braved hazardous travel conditions in a downpour to be on hand for their usual meeting.

Membership of the three-month-old group has been boosted to over 30 and all of them, plus several new prospects, showed up during the storm, wet without, dry within.

The story of A.A. was heard at a meeting of the Council for Coordination of Community Services in Montgomery, Ala., as the first in a series of programs built around the theme "Developing Citizenship," selected by the program committee of the council. The Montgomery Group cooperated with the committee in arranging details.

An Indianapolis, Ind., A.A., at the fourth of a series of forums at the West Lafayette First Methodist Church, answered questions on the purpose and methods of A.A. . . . The South Jersey Group heard a talk by Dr. C. Nelson Davis of the Psychopathic Division, Philadelphia General Hospital. . . . The St. Petersburg, Fla., Group observed their first anniversary with a dinner and meeting;. . . . The Denver, Colo., Group, now four years old, gave a ball to obtain funds for clubrooms large enough to accommodate their rapidly increasing membership.

In 1940 there was only one group in Connecticut, located in Greenwich. Today there are 14. They are located in Bridgeport, Bristol, Cornwall Bridge, Danbury, Derby, Greenwich, Hartford, Meriden-Middletown, New Britain, New Haven, Norwalk, Norwich, Stamford, and Waterbury.

In a eulogistic piece about a New Haven meeting, attended also by members from the New Britain Group, a local paper wrote: "A.A. recognizes both sides of the truth that a man must help himself, and that self-help may be greatly supplemented by the moral support and comradeship of fellow victims and victors."

The Montgomery, Ala., A.A.s recently had their second anniversary gathering.

...

A

Baton Rouge, La., A.A. spoke at a luncheon of the Cooperative Club of that city.

In

the same state, the Alexandria Group is now holding meetings in the Salvation Army's Red Shield center.

A little over a year ago four Norwalk, Ohio, men met in one of their homes and held the first Norwalk A.A. meeting. In 12 months the group had grown to 22. Their first, anniversary dinner was attended by 136 members representing seven counties and 12 cities and towns in North Central Ohio. .

. . A Tallahassee, Fla., member outlined the A.A. program in a talk before the Rotary Club. . . . Wilmington, Del., A.A.s received as guest speaker Col. Charles I. Carpenter, head of the Air Force chaplain service in Washington, D. C.

Addressing a St. Louis, Mo., A.A. meeting, Dr. Joseph B. Kendis of that city said that the ratio of women alcoholics is increasing in astounding proportions.

Formerly,

the doctor said, there were four-and-one-half male alcoholics to one female; now there are two to one. . . . The new clubrooms of the Pittsburgh, Pa., Group are

at

615 West Diamond Street, Northside. . . . "Alcoholics Anonymous" tops the alphabetical list of 81 civic organizations published by the Bloomfield, N.

J.,

Independent Press. . . . Niagara Falls A.A.s meet at the local International Institute, where 15 other organizations also hold their meetings.

Clergymen and city officials were among the more than 60 persons who attended the second anniversary get-together of the New Bedford, Mass., Group at which an A.A.

speaker told of taking his first drink when he was seven years old. "My mother had a party for my older brother. While my folks and the guests were in one room, I was in another draining the glasses." He drank from that time on until Labor Day 1943,

when he was hospitalized and immediately afterward came into A.A. via the Boston Group. He

Bill had been sober for five months. One of the things that had kept him sober was his frequent visits to other alcoholics in an effort to sober them up. He hadn't been successful, but at least it had helped to keep him sober. The other thing that Bill found a help in his fight with alcohol was his interest in an Oxford Group. Here he found some resources which gave him strength.

Sobriety had brought with it a new success in his business. He was slowly trying to put his affairs on solid ground after years of neglect. To do this he had to make a trip from New York to Akron. Legal entanglements produced problems, and as the days stretched into weeks, and success was not yet at hand the old battle with alcohol grew stronger. Yet here he was, miles away from any alcoholics whom he knew, and far from his Oxford Group. Out of sheer desperation Bill, searching for an Oxford Group and contact with a man who was having trouble similar to his, called a minister in Akron. This call brought him together with Dr. Bob.

Dr. Bob had been fighting his problem with alcohol for 35 years, ever since medical school days. All the resources at his disposal seemed to be of no avail. He too had had an interest in the Oxford Group, but even this was not enough. He and Bill shared their common problem and the resources they had found to help them. Dr. Bob was interested in Bill's added "technique" of trying to help other alcoholics as a means of keeping sober himself. Bill moved from the hotel into Dr. Bob's home and together they set out to find other alcoholics whom they might help. When Bill returned to New York six months later he left behind not only Dr. Bob but two other alcoholics who had joined them in this program of mutual aid. With the encouragement of the fellowship he had found in Akron, Bill began again to work with alcoholics and soon there was a small group who gathered together in New York. Out of these two small groups of men has grown the movement which is now known as Alcoholics Anonymous. Today A.A. is a movement which has about 80,000 members scattered throughout the United States and in 29 countries around the globe. While no exact figures are kept, it is estimated that about 50% of those who undertake the A.A. program remain sober, another 25% have a few "slips" and the remainder can best be classified as "doubtful." The power of these figures can only be realized when we note that traditional medical and religious "cures" for alcoholism can best claim effectiveness somewhere under 5%. Honesty requires mentioning however that as the size of the A.A. movement increases the percentage of effectiveness decreases. What this means will be discussed shortly.

What is A.A. and how does it work? The answers to this question can best be found in the book "Alcoholics Anonymous" first published in 1939 when the group consisted of about 100 men and women. It was the publishing of this book that changed A.A. from a small localized group of alcoholics to the world movement it is today. It explains the principles and program of A.A. and gives the personal stories of a number of those who first found their strength in A.A. It is urged that those with an interest in A.A. should have the book on their shelf.

We can give a brief answer to the question, however, by mentioning three of the central aspects of the A.A. program: -1.) The Twelve Steps 2.) The Fellowship 3.) Twelfth Step Work.

The Twelve Steps of A.A. are: -

Step One We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.

Step Two We came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.

Step Three We made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God, AS WE UNDERSTOOD HIM.

Step Four We made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.

Step Five We admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.

Step Six We were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.

Step Seven We humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.

Step Eight We made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all.

Step Nine We made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.

Step Ten We continued to take personal inventory, and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.

Step Eleven We sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God AS WE UNDERSTOOD HIM, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.

Step Twelve Having had a spiritual experience as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

In a sense these Twelve Steps are self-explanatory. A few things should be mentioned however. A.A. does not offer these steps as a recipe for sobriety. They don't guarantee success. They are not steps which once taken are then finished. They are rather like a snowball - incorporating all the previous steps in the one of immediate concern. They are not steps in the sense that one must be taken before the next can be started. If any one step seems too difficult, move on to the next, and return to that one later.

A second fundamental in the A.A. movement is its fellowship. This finds its fullest expression in the A.A. meeting where the group shares their experience and thoughts. This meeting often takes the character of a "testimonial" meeting followed by refreshments-usually coffee. It is found that unless a man shares in this fellowship the Twelve Steps are exceedingly difficult. It takes the place of lost "drinking companions" or fills a long empty gap of loneliness. Part of the fellowship, though subsidiary to the meeting, are such things as an A.A. Club House, picnics, and parties.

The third fundamental of A.A. is the 12th Step Work. It was this that Bill brought to Dr. Bob in Akron. Particularly if the going "gets rough" the A.A. immediately goes out to help others. They will spend long hours with one another, or a newcomer, or in the alcoholic wards of a hospital giving acceptance and hope to others. This is the final step, but it also points to a step before the first step, which is this - that if a man is going to take that first step he must feel that there are people whom he can rely on even though he admits he is "powerless over alcohol," people who know what he is experiencing, people who will accept him, at his lowest point, with love rather than judgement. It is only in this climate that a man can take this first step.

Even in such a brief statement of the history and fundamentals of the A.A. movement, one is impressed with the "religious" quality of the program, and the many parallels between A.A. and Christianity. There is for example an historic parallel. Almost everyone who becomes familiar with the spirit and voice of this fellowship remarks that it must be similar to that of the first century Church. As was true of the first century Christians, the alcoholics are a minority group who stand on the fringe of society. Misunderstood by the majority, often subject to the law, they find their security in their own fellowship. With the members of A.A. their fellowship is not only the result of their alcoholic exile, but also the sharing of a mutual redemptive experience, which soon becomes not just a means of sobriety but a way of life. Thus, central in both groups is the dynamic of a personal faith which resulted in salvation for each individual.

There is also a clear parallel in the Fellowship of A.A. with the congregational life of the church. Central in the A.A. meeting is the "word," the telling of the gospel of A.A., and the explanation of it. This is done by public testimony, which can be found in some form in all our churches. The A.A. groups also have a social expression similar to many churches. Socials, suppers, picnics and the like are reminiscent of the weekly activities in many churches. The A.A. Fellowship is a group who, having shared a common peril, now share in a common salvation. Is this not similar to the Christian fellowship which sings: -

Blest be the tie that binds Our hearts in Christian love

The fellowship of kindred minds

Is like to that above.

We share our mutual woes,

Our mutual burdens bear,

And often for each other flows

The sympathizing tear.

With the exception of the word "Christian" these verses perfectly describe the fellowship of Alcoholics Anonymous. It is particularly interesting to compare the principles, the theories and the "dogmatics" of A.A., with those of the Church. The Twelve Steps certainly are expressions of principles which have been central in Christian thought and teaching in all ages.

Step one, the admission that the alcoholic is powerless over alcohol, that his life has become unmanageable, immediately calls to mind Paul's:- "The good which I would I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do." A.A. emphasizes that this lack of power is caused by something beyond the control of the individual. They speak of allergy and addiction - they are constitutionally alcoholics. There is something in their mind-body-spirit totality which makes this first step a fact. Is there not a similarity here with the concept of original sin? Both relieve the individual from the burden of guilt which hinders his admitting his sin (i.e. life being unmanageable), while leaving him with the possibility and responsibility of recognizing his sin, and thus making salvation possible.

Steps two and three are likewise particularized statements of fundamental Christian doctrine - the recognition and surrender of ourselves to a "Higher Power," to God, as the source of our salvation. These steps are similar to the first answer in the Heidelberg Catechism: -"That I-am not my own-." It is significant that these steps are the first three. It is an insistence upon faith as basic to salvation. The A.A. message is a message of salvation through faith, with works being the expression of that faith, rather than the source of salvation.

Steps four through seven make the distinction between original sin and particular sins. Besides being "alcoholic"-being in a constitutional state of sin- each individual has particular sins which he must acknowledge in step four. In step five, A.A. sees the value of the traditional Christian practice of confession. And in steps six and seven God is recognized as a forgiving God. All these steps are fundamentally Christian.

In steps eight and nine, where the alcoholic is urged to make amends to all those he has injured, we are reminded of the words of Jesus: -"If you are offering your gift at the altar, and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar and go; first to be reconciled to your brother-." That one's relation to God involves a certain responsibility to our brothers is here very clearly stated, just as it is constantly reaffirmed in the New Testament.

The Church has always insisted that a spiritual life requires constant effort and is a never ending process. This effort takes the form of turning frequently to the source of our spiritual power through prayer and meditation, and also of trying to live our daily lives, in our relationship to our brothers, according to God's will. A.A. expresses these principles in the tenth and eleventh steps.

Christianity has moved always under the commandment of the risen Christ: -"Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation." This has been the drive for the spread of Christianity. It has made Christianity the evangelistic religion of the world. It has resulted in missionary work around the globe. A.A. says in its twelfth step: -"having had a spiritual awakening-carry this message to alcoholics-." Recognizing these many close parallels between the A.A. movement and fundamental Christian thought and practice prompts us to ask a number of questions. How is it that A.A. is more successful in bringing a spiritual approach to alcoholics? Is there anything which the Church can learn from A.A.? How can the minister in his pastoral work best cooperate with A.A. in particular situations?

There is nothing really new in A.A. It is a synthesis of old ideas, and techniques, reemphasizing well known, perhaps forgotten principles. One might suspect that A.A. would point to some glaring error in the procedure of the churches in dealing with alcoholics, and with the world in general. Particularly this might be true at first glance regarding the matter of self-righteousness. It is true that many A.A.'s have expressed a dislike toward self-righteous helpers, and "preachers," but it includes all such people, and doesn't give the clergy or the Christian any special claim on this attitude.

The growth of the A.A. movement has served as evidence which should plead for more tolerance toward the errors of the churches. It has shown that in many of the ways the churches have erred this has been the result of their human frailty, rather than any insincerity or weakness in the institutions and members-as such. For example, the AA's point out that pride and self-righteousness are blocks in approaching newcomers, but as A.A. has grown large, in some circles it has established a reputation for these qualities. The author was visiting an alcoholic patient in one of our big city hospitals, and among other things suggested that he might contact the A.A.s His reply was significant. "I've had plenty of contact with the A.A. and I don't want any of them coming here and looking at me and saying that `Anyway there is one bum in the world lower than I am.'"

We are touching here one of the fundamental dangers in the systematic and institutional expressions of man. What for A.A. was a somewhat systematic statement of the experience of a group of men, now becomes a system to which men must fit themselves. We ask the question: - "Is the system created for man, or man for the system?" It would appear that after the first systematization of an experience succeeding generations are more and more required to fit into the system. This has some practical meaning for the pastor who tries to help individuals with A.A. A.A. at this point is still quite fluid and free from rigid institutional forms. Its unique quality is this. It is still a group of people who have had an experience. However, the more that the clergy, families and interested people use A.A. as a referral agency the more it is deprived of this quality. That is why A.A. suggests that it establish contact with a newcomer as much as possible directly with him, so that he may become a part of that experience rather than as an outsider sent to A.A. to be "cured." A.A. is not a referral agency for a particular human problem.

One thing which A.A. can say to the Church is that it is a validation of some of the central tenets of Christianity, and the orthodox theology of salvation. This was the implication in the comments pointing out parallels between the A.A. principles and Christian teachings. For example we can look at the way the first step illustrates the importance of recognition of one's sin as the beginning of salvation. A similar validation is the recognition of the following steps that faith-faith in a loving and forgiving God-is the avenue of salvation, and that works are the expression of this faith and belong in the secondary position. We might note at this point the importance however of what was called the step before the first step. That is that before the man can come to recognize and admits his "state of sin" a climate of love, acceptance, and understanding must be present. Taking the first step is not the result of exhortations pointing out this "state of sin."

This brings us to the second major area in which we can learn something from A.A. The Church has always been troubled with the problem of a "point of contact" -how do we contact people to tell them the Gospel? It is here that A.A. has some important reemphasis to make.

The first of these is that the contact between members and non-members is a contact between saved sinners and unsaved sinners, with the emphasis upon the fact that both are sinners rather than emphasis upon the idea that one is saved and the other unsaved. When an A.A. approaches an alcoholic, his first job is not to show that he is sober, but to show that he understands and is fighting the same battle. An A.A. told the author that the reason why the clergy had a difficult time in making contact with alcoholics is that they don't have a common experience to serve as a basis of confidence. It is true that most clergymen don't have a similar alcoholic history, but certainly if this point is emphasize there is a common experience, the experience of needing help, which can be shared. This is equally applicable to situations other than alcoholism.

It is well known that common peril makes strange bedfellows. The deer and the mountain lion run side by side in front of a burning forest fire. The point at which we contact not only the alcoholic, but the whole "city of the world," is that we all share a common peril. This is not only the point of contact, it is the dynamic of fellowship. Here we are reminded of Calvin's insistence that the Church is made for forgiven sinners rather than righteous men. The fellowship of A.A. stems from the fact that all members share the common peril of alcohol. And in a broader sense this is the source of fellowship with all men. A.A.'s have found that their fellowship is of the weak helping the weak, rather than the strong helping the weak. There is indeed something that we as churchmen can learn from this experience of A.A.

This brings us again to the problem of self-righteousness and pride. It is no doubt true that we can never get completely away from creating this feeling, because it stems to a degree from the sense of guilt which the one being helped feels. His pride is destroyed. He resents his need for help and counters it with doubts about the sincerity of others. However, much of this can be avoided if we are fully aware that our point of contact is that we all need help. It is perhaps significant at this point that A.A. tradition has stood resolutely against the development of any professional workers. The professional worker often has as his point of contact the fact that this is his job, his business. This tends to hide the more basic, more relevant, and more successful point of contact.

We might also note at this point the attitude which the A.A. has regarding his twelfth step work. For him it is not the consequence of his salvation, or a duty or expression of thanksgiving, but it is an integral part of his salvation. He does the sacrifice and the work involved in this step not simply because he wants to "help people," but because it is necessary and vital to his own welfare. There is the danger that in the Church we often forget this aspect of our "good works."

The second major area in which A.A. sheds light and worthwhile emphasis, concerning the "point of contact," is the well known idea of meeting people where they are. Particularly we might call attention to the A.A. use of the term "Higher Power," always qualified "as the individual understands Him." Here is the way to meet people just where they are. A.A. recognizes that many alcoholics have strong prejudices against many of the teachings and terms of the institutions of religion. And they are quick to remind us that arousing these prejudices is not the place to start the spiritual approach to sobriety. Go with a man the second mile on these prejudices. Meet him where he is religiously.

Does this not have some relevance to us as churchmen when we see how often our ++++Message 1245. . . . . RE: Question maybe you can answer?

From: Robert Stonebraker . . . . . 8/26/2003 1:24:00 PM

|||||

Dear Stephen,

I have a book entitled "Diary Of Two Motorcycle Hobos," written by Lois Wilson and edited by Ellie Van E. On the back cover is written: " You are invited to follow Bill W. and his wife Lois, on their Harley-Davidson motorcycle adventures in Eastern America in the late 1920's."

Bob S., from Indiana

P.S. This book was published in 1998.

-----
-----Original Message-----

From: Stephen Gentile [mailto:sagentile@hotmail.com]
Sent: Tuesday, August 26, 2003 11:28 AM
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Question maybe you can answer?

Did Bill Wilson ride a Moto Guzi motorcycle or was it a different model that they speak of ?

I have heard this shared at a meeting.

-----
MSN 8: Get 6 months for $9.95/month. [8]

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to the Yahoo! Terms of Service [2] .

|||||

++++Message 1246. . . . . Re: Question maybe you can answer?

From: Mel Barger . . . . . 8/26/2003 2:05:00 PM

|||||

A friend told me recently that Bill's motorcycle was a 1918 Harley-Davidson, 16 horsepower, with a new price of $350.

Jolla, one of the world's leading scientists who studies the genetic factors of alcoholism can look at a glass and see it half-full. The data Dr. Marc A. Schuckit have collected in 30 years of research show certain strong biological links within families of alcoholics. A professor of medicine at the University of California, San Diego, Schuckit has dispelled several myths about the disease, as well as uncovered evidence that shows how genes interact with a person's environment to heighten the risk of becoming an alcoholic. He has great hope this research will lead to alcoholism-prevention techniques.

Across town, in three large houses in Golden Hill, 40 alcoholic men look at the glass and see it bone dry. These men, at the residential recovery homes operated by Pathfinders of San Diego, are tapped out. Each has hit his own personal bottom and is now--with the support of the others--undergoing the only known 'cure" for the disease of alcoholism: abstinence.

A few thousand other alcoholics are on the same course at dozens of recovery homes in the county. During stays at these homes, men and women are educated about their shared disease, with much of the medical information coming from Schuckit's work. They also learn that becoming sober is an event, while recovery from alcoholism is a lifelong process.

The public probably doesn't often think of alcoholism. A person's experience with the disease may be limited to a neighbor or a boss or a driver who's ready to pass him on a freeway. According to Schuckit, in the United States the risk of developing alcoholism is about 15 percent for men and 8 percent for women, giving rise to the oft-cited figure that approximately 10 percent of the population is alcoholic.

But the public ought to be interested in what alcoholism and other drug abuse costs them. Nationally, the figure is about $500 billion a year. In San Diego County, it's estimated at $3.8 billion a year, including direct costs--such as emergency medical care --and indirect costs, such as loss of earnings when a family breadwinner dies of alcoholism.

Yet a cost-effectiveness study funded by the state Department of Alcohol & Drug Programs shows that each $1 invested in a treatment program saves taxpayers $4 to $7, mostly due to reductions in crime and need for medical care. These studies have the attention of the county Board of Supervisors, which adds $6 million to $7 million annually to the $45 million in state and federal funding San Diego receives for alcohol and drug programs. Much of the county money comes from tobacco settlement funds.

'In the past five years, San Diego has made its own investment of local resources in a big way," says Al Medina, the county's alcohol and drug services administrator, even with the steady erosion of state funding for alcohol programs because of budget cutbacks. California's current budget crisis undoubtedly means less funding in the coming fiscal year, Medina says, although he is uncertain where cuts will be made.

"There is a treatment gap," he adds. "Despite the substantial evidence of the cost benefits gained through treatment and prevention, there hasn't been an equal investment in expanding the programs that provide it."

To help alcoholics who are committed to becoming--and staying--sober, the county contracts with 24 state-licensed and certified recovery homes and a network of outpatient services. Seventeen of these homes are known in the recovery world as social-model systems--programs strongly rooted in the 12-step philosophy of Alcoholics Anonymous, focusing on self-motivation and peer support. There are no doctors or therapists in a social-model program, only other alcoholics who are in varying stages of sobriety. Employees at these homes are usually in long-term recovery themselves.

Lots of alcoholics, of course, stop drinking and stay sober without going to a residential recovery program. Many do it through AA (there are more than 700 AA meetings each week in San Diego County). Some seek counseling. Some check into the Betty Ford Center, a medical-based program in the Palm Springs area, where a 28-day stay can cost nearly $20,000.

Schuckit cites research that shows as many as 30 percent of alcoholics go through a 'permanent spontaneous remission.'" For some unknown reason, these drinkers say for the umpteenth time they'll quit, and they do, and--unlike all the other times when they started drinking again--this time their sobriety sticks.

For other alcoholics, 'the safe, supportive and structured environment of a recovery home is needed for them to change," says Medina, 'and that's where the social model comes into play."

Pathfinders of San Diego is the state's oldest alcohol recovery home and a pioneer in social-model programs. Several men who were AA members opened it in 1950 in a downtown storefront where men living on Skid Row could find a sober setting.

"The idea was simple and effective," says S.G. "Stan" Stanley, executive director of Pathfinders. "Sober alcoholics were helping practicing alcoholics stop drinking. We're still doing it 53 years later." Pathfinders grew through the years and was incorporated as a nonprofit organization. Three residences in Golden Hill were purchased in the 1960s and remain today as the group's main recovery homes.

The program was one of the first organizations to be given a county contract for alcohol recovery services. Pathfinders currently receives about $245,000 a year from the county for the 40 recovery 'beds" it provides--roughly half its operating budget, with the remainder made up from donations and residents' fees of $250 per month.

'We've had doctors, lawyers, welders, teachers, street drunks, you name it," Stanley says of Pathfinders' residents. 'Most have tried to get sober many times and have failed miserably at it--that's what they have in common. By the time they come to us, they've lost family, relationships, jobs and possessions."

The only requirement for admission is a willingness to accept responsibility for one's own recovery, says Stanley, a Pathfinders resident 13 years ago. There is always a waiting list for admission, he adds, and prospective residents are interviewed at length to gauge their commitment. 'We don't want anyone who is only here because of coercion from family, employers or the courts," he says. "They must have the sincere desire to help themselves."

As with most recovery homes, men at Pathfinders typically stay three to nine months in a highly structured environment. Once admitted, each is handed a five-page list of resident guidelines--'No sleeping in after 6 a.m.'" 'A copy of the Big Book of Alcoholics Anonymous MUST be on your nightstand.'" Daily AA meetings and alcohol education classes are mandatory, and residents must get a job, as well as volunteer for community-service projects. If a resident is caught drinking or taking drugs, he is immediately evicted and will not be readmitted.

How well does it work? How many stay sober after they leave? There are no official numbers for graduates of Pathfinders or other recovery programs, primarily due to federal Privacy Act provisions. Stanley estimates, however, that about 60 percent of Pathfinders alumni continue long-term sobriety. 'We usually get a good feel for it, because residents keep coming back to meetings, or they'll stay in touch by phone," he says. 'I heard from one guy the other day for the first time in three years. He's in Chicago, and he's still sober."

Researcher Schuckit says an alcoholic who remains sober for one year has about a 70 percent chance of long-term sobriety, especially if he or she has a support system of family and friends and has job skills. He also points to studies by other scientists that show with continued abstinence, body and brain damage caused by alcoholism--a terminal disease if not treated--continue to improve every month.

North County Serenity House opened in 1966 as the area's [9] first nonprofit social-model recovery home for female alcoholics. When Francine Anzalone-Byrd was hired as its executive director in 1994, North County Serenity House had 25 beds at its Escondido site. Today it provides housing for 172 women and children, including a 100-bed residential facility, three recovery homes, four transitional living homes and two child development centers. An eight-house project dubbed Serenity Village will open this year to provide an additional 48 beds. Escondido also is home to several recovery groups for male substance abusers who want to get sober.

'Escondido has been extremely friendly to recovery homes, primarily because we have a proven track record of being good neighbors," says Anzalone-Byrd. She credits recently reelected Mayor Lori Holt-Pfeiler and the Escondido City Council for using some of the city's redevelopment funding to help Serenity House expand. The annual budget for Serenity House is $5.3 million, with the county contributing about half, Anzalone-Byrd says. Residents pay $275 a month for rent.

Serenity House began offering drug-abuse treatment in the 1980s as the connection between drug and alcohol abuse became more apparent, says Anzalone-Byrd, who has been a recovering alcoholic for 22 years. 'Now we refer to poly-substance abuse," she says, 'but the gateway drug is always alcohol." As with other recovery homes in the county, Serenity House has a long waiting list for admissions.

There's never enough money, and there are never enough beds," says Warren Stewart, president of the California Conference on Alcohol Problems, a 28-year-old program that focuses on issues related to social-model recovery homes across the state. 'Even if you do have the money, there's the problem of where to put the beds."

Stewart refers to what's become well-known as NIMBY--the not-in-my-backyard sentiment. In the context of recovery homes, it means a neighborhood's resistance to having health or other social services in the area.

'We have maxed out our available capacity of [recovery] beds," says the county's Medina. What solution does he see? 'We need to increase the public's understanding of alcohol- and drug-abuse recovery programs. We have to show the cost benefits [of these programs] to the taxpayer."

Stewart notes another facet of this problem: A substance-abuse recovery facility that provides six or fewer beds does not have to be licensed and certified by the state, nor must it have a conditional-use permit, which is required for a larger recovery program. These small facilities are often known as sober-living residences, but some may not provide even basic supervision for renters.

'A lot of these places are springing up, and they're fly-by-night operations," says Warren Stewart. "The public, though, often confuses them with legitimate recovery homes, and they give us all a bad name. It doesn't help in trying to get more sites for recovery homes."

How the county implements Proposition 36 concerns many operators of social-model alcohol recovery homes. Passed in 2000, the voter-approved statewide initiative allows many nonviolent drug offenders the choice of entering a recovery program rather than doing jail time. The county must provide about $13 million for funding the proposition locally, and there's the dilemma of where to find beds for the participants who require residential treatment, estimated to number between 350 and 500.

Recovery home providers are concerned that funding for their programs will be reduced, and they don't want to have to accept court-ordered drug offenders solely to maintain county funding. Moreover, social-model advocates don't want residents who may be participating only to avoid jail, because their commitment to staying clean and sober is often lacking.

At some early point in their drinking careers, most alcoholics are proud they 'can drink anyone under the table." They knock back their drinks faster and longer than their pals and often don't appear to be as intoxicated as someone who's had the same amount to drink. Researcher Schuckit, who is also the director of the Alcohol Research Center operated by the V.A. Hospital in La Jolla, has discovered what's behind this phenomenon: genes.

These apparently high-tolerant pre-alcoholics, he believes, don't get the same physical reactions to alcohol as the usual person gets when drinking the same quantity. 'In other words," Schuckit says, 'they don't receive the same warning signals that it's time to stop drinking if heavy intoxication is to be avoided."

Schuckit's findings are drawn from ongoing research he began in 1978 by studying 227 sons of alcoholic fathers and a control group of 227 men who had no known alcoholic biological relatives; all were about 20 years old at the time. Today, 97 percent of the study's original participants are still involved in the research, although they're scattered across the United States. By studying these men at five-year intervals, Schuckit has found that the decreased number of pertinent questions: If certain forms of misbehavior are sickness rather than sin, why does the same diagnosis not apply to other misdeeds?

By what criteria are judges to determine whether the rational individual who does wrong is willfully perverse or woefully pathological? If addiction to gambling is caused by a psychomotor disorder, why are not addictions to murder, adultery, stealing, lying, and other pernicious practices also attributable to the same ailment? Or does each represent a different but equally amoral reflex?

When Jesus answered the Pharisees who criticized him for associating with sinners, "They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick," what did he mean? In my opinion he meant to imply, not that sin is a form of sickness, but that sin produces a form of sickness. There is a radical difference between these two propositions. Certainly he did not intend to teach that all moral weakness, or even the worst type of it, is to be included in the category of illness over which the doer has no control. Just as the physician must go among those who are sick in order to heal them, so should the physician of souls go among those who are "sick" as a result of sinning to accomplish their conversion and redemption.

But there is a disposition in certain quarters to push the analogy much farther than Christ intended it to be carried. So we hear that those who violate recognized patterns and principles of behavior should have diagnosis rather than denunciation, treatment rather than punishment, cure rather than conversion. To insist that it is as irrational to stigmatize a person for gross offenses against right and decency as to stigmatize a patient for developing tuberculosis or cancer is pure sentimentalism.

Some schools of thought classify alcohol addiction as a medical rather than a moral problem and attribute it to sickness rather than to sin. Adherents of this attitude say in substance: Excessive indulgence in intoxicants is a symptom rather than a source of basic disorders in personality. The moralistic doctrine that the chronic alcoholic is a sinner and a criminal is medieval and unscientific. Those who are uncontrollably seduced by alcohol cannot be held responsible for the misfortunes they inflict upon themselves, their families and society. The trouble is not in the bottle but in the individual. Or it resides in certain structural ills of society, such as slums, broken homes, unemployment, maladjustments in jobs, racial conflicts, international tensions and war. This position not only removes all stigma from problem drinking but it has the highly convenient virtue of also completely absolving the liquor traffic from all blame for the manifold evils produced by its operations.

When Borden P. Browne was professor of philosophy at Boston University, a perplexed student asked him at the close of one of his classes, "Professor, did you say it was thus, or so?" Answered the philosopher: "My young friend, the longer you live in this strange world, the more things you will find in it of which you cannot truly say either-or, but must learn to say both-and." That wise observation, with its implied warning against being confused and deceived by false dilemmas, is certainly applicable to the subject under consideration. It suggests that the following is a realistic analysis of the situation.

MORAL AND MEDICAL

First, addiction to alcohol is both a medical and a moral problem. Neither the moral nor the medical approach is a sufficient solution in itself. Certainly the mere detention of drunks until they sober up is deplorably inadequate treatment of their condition. To confine problem drinkers in county jails, reformatories or houses of correction until the effects of intoxication have worn off, without any constructive effort to accomplish their permanent rehabilitation, is a medieval practice. Such cases should be under the care, not only of the police authorities, but of the public health authorities as well.

Unquestionably many of them should be sent to hospitals rather than to jails. A number of states, including Wisconsin, New Hampshire, Connecticut, New Jersey, Massachusetts and Virginia, have inaugurated enlightened programs for the treatment of compulsive drinkers. In general they substitute the hospital for the jail and place a major emphasis on medical rehabilitation.

But alcoholic addiction is also a moral problem and should continue to be regarded as such. Addiction indicates that there are basic defects not only in the constitution but also in the character of the addict. To insist that drunkenness is not a disgrace but a disease, and therefore to sentimentalize it and attempt to remove all reproach from it, is just as unscientific as going to the opposite extreme and declaring the drunk to be a criminal and a sinner who deserves only condemnation and punishment. Arbitrarily to remove the stigma from alcoholic excesses while continuing to keep it on numerous other practices which are legally and morally opprobrious would not only be gross inconsistency but rank injustice as well. Drunkenness is both a disease and a disgrace. It deserves to receive both treatment and punishment. The problem drinker requires reformation of his character as well as the rehabilitation of his condition.

SCIENCE AND SPIRIT

Second, the solution of problem drinking demands both the scientific and spiritual approaches. Excessive indulgence in intoxicants is both a source of sickness and a symptom of it. The correct classification of the chronic alcoholic is a "sin-sick-soul." Making due allowance for different categories of problem drinkers, and acknowledging that no single type of treatment will be effective in every case, it nevertheless remains profoundly true that the most effective cures are obtained when the influences of religion are combined with the techniques of medicine.

That amazingly successful organization, Alcoholics Anonymous, recognizes this principle and utilizes it with highly beneficial results. For that reason the processes of rehabilitation it employs are generally considered to be medically sound by physicians and religiously wholesome by clergymen. The organization refers a large number of its cases to medical practitioners, especially in the initial stages of treatment. But it also invokes the assistance of the dynamic forces of religion to accomplish the permanent cure. It proceeds on the assumption that in alcoholic excesses there is a reciprocal relation between sin and sickness in cause and effect. Consider the "Twelve Steps" outlined in the book, Alcoholics Anonymous:

1. We admitted that we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. We came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. We made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. We made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. We admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. We were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. We humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. We made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. We made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. We continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. We sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of his will for us and the power to carry it out.
12. Having had a spiritual experience as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

Note that the steps, which are the basis of A.A.'s remarkable success, are predominantly, definitely and deeply moral and spiritual. They are based on the conviction that the alcoholic is suffering from both sin and sickness, and

Fifteen years ago last June, in New York, Bill W. had met a person who for the first time brought God into his life, "a Power greater than himself, God as he understood Him." Bill W., after he got out of service in World War I, had been tremendously successful in a number of business ventures, and failed completely in just as many - sometimes because of economic changes, but frequently because of his addiction to alcohol.

Bill believed in God. He knew that nobody went out in the morning to pull up the sun, or went out in the evening to hang up the moon. He knew that animals did things that they were never taught. But he didn't have any idea of a personal God upon whom human beings are totally and completely dependent, in whom he should have a trusting confidence and love.

This man to whom he was speaking had been a drunkard too, and had done some remarkable things with his life because he went to God for grace and strength. And so for the first time Bill W. tried that and experienced a tremendous change.

He had been in Wall Street for many years, succeeding and failing frequently, and at this time he had under consideration a negotiation that was going to make him independent for life. He thought he had everything sewed up in the way of proxies to obtain complete control of a very successful industry in Akron, Ohio.

But somebody outsmarted him, and he learned at the stockholders' meeting held in Akron that he had failed. Everything that happened to him that day was all an alcoholic needed to go out and start on a real binge, but he didn't. He was in a hotel in the afternoon and had only five dollars. He had a hotel bill that was running up, and he debated whether to use that five dollars to get a bottle to take to his room and drown his troubles. While he was walking across the lobby he saw a church directory on the wall. He decided that he would pick some clergyman from that list, and through him, try to find some alcoholic with whom he could discuss his problem.

He called a clergyman, who had some grave doubts and misgivings about the genuineness of his purpose, and being unable to refer him to anybody who was addicted to excessive drink, he suggested that he might talk to Henrietta Sieberling. She had attended certain meetings which were also attended by men who had drinking problems.

So he called up Henrietta Sieberling and she too had at first some doubt about his sincerity, but she was rather intrigued by the subject and suggested that he come out to her house. While he was there she became convinced that he was sincere.

It was from her house that she called up Dr. Bob and learned from Dr. Bob's wife that the good doctor was drunk. So the engagement was postponed. They met the next day and discussed their common problem, and Doctor Bob admitted that he had been going to these Oxford Group meetings regularly, and that he was praying some, but getting drunk just as often as before.

They decided that the next day they would look for a subject they could work on. They conceived the idea that faith and fellowship with prayer and the interest in their fellow drunkards was a solution for their individual problems, and for the problems of other alcoholics.

So the next day they called up the City Hospital. When they asked the man in charge if they had any drunks in there, he told them that they had one who was in there for about the eighth time, but that he was helplessly drunk.

They went down anyway, and there they saw in bed Bill D., an Akron lawyer, who had been in there for a day or two, and was still in restraint. They saw at once that he was in no fit condition to be talked to, but somehow or other they made a remark to him that registered. When they came back the next day he was comparatively sober and listened. So they proceeded to meet together frequently and attend the meetings at T. Henry Williams' home for some time thereafter.

In the first year four successful, totally abstemious alcoholics was their record. During the second year they obtained fourteen more; they obtained twenty-three by mid-August of 1937.

At the end of three years they had forty, at the end of four years, a hundred. It was about at that time that Jack Alexander of the Saturday Evening Post wrote an article, and the Cleveland Plain Dealer ran a series on A.A. And the growth began to be tremendous from then on.

During the first two years, as I have said, they met regularly at the home of T. Henry Williams, but after that it was decided that they were to begin to meet at King's School in Akron. Five or six remained with Williams out of a sense of loyalty to him, because they had attained their sobriety through the meetings that were conducted in his home. But all the others withdrew and started their meetings at King's School. When those grew too large (since majority were from Cleveland), the Cleveland group was formed.

From that beginning the groups we now have in Cleveland have grown to about a hundred, and of course you know the tremendous growth throughout the country, in every state in the union, and in many countries beyond our shores.

Now, there are many strange things that happened during the formation of this fellowship; things it seems that could not have been purely coincidental. The Big Book was drafted in the third year; the twelve steps were being formed by trial and error; and in the fourth year they had reached their final form.

I once heard it said by a Jesuit who made a thorough study of A.A. by close observation of its members and by a thorough reading of all the literature, acting somewhat as 'character' witnesses.

I find it a bit hard to believe that it took till the 1960's (over 25 years!) before courts started using some form of attendance sheet. Perhaps the info you have just refers to California, or a particular area of that state.

Another early example, in the 1940's Chicago had a fairly prominent judge who was a member. I suspect that he was also releasing prisoners to attend AA.

=====

++++Message 1254. . . . . RE: Is there a list of who died sober out of first 100?
From: Ed Adami . . . . . 8/28/2003 9:04:00 AM

=====

-----Original Message-----
From: Stephen Gentile [mailto:sagentile@hotmail.com]
Sent: Wednesday, August 27, 2003 12:39 PM
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Is there a list of who died sober out of first 100?

I've often heard that only 13 died sober out of the first 100 in the big book. Is there a list compiled of the names anywhere? If so was Morgan R the radio man one of them?

-----

Stephen,

You may want to take a look at the following article posted on AAHISTORYLOVERS and also at silkworth.net

Ed A.

-----

From: NMOlson@a... [11]
Date: Mon Jun 16, 2003 5:39 pm
Subject: 12th Step Recovery

Ernie Kurtz passed this along to me. I don't know who wrote it.

Nancy

There's a new AA book out called Experience, Strength and Hope which is a compilation of the stories that were in the 1st, 2nd and 3rd editions, that no longer appear in the 4th edition. I've been reading through the early stories and comparing them with the histories of the authors, which may be found on the Silkworth.net. [NOTE: these were copied, with permission, from AA History Lovers.]

While we chug along in the year 2003, fat, sober and happy, it may be well to recall how many of the "first 100 men and women" got drunk. The authors of the 1st four stories in the first edition of the Big Book all got drunk.

"The Unbeliever": Hank P. They say the Big Book would not have been written without Bill W., and it wouldn't have been published without Hank P. He was probably the man that Dr. Silkworth refers to in the "Doctor's Opinion" as having changed so much after a year of sobriety that he was unrecognizable. After 3 1/2 years, he got drunk and never got sober again; died in 1954.

"A Feminine Victory": Florence R. They might have called it "100 Men," except for Florence. She was the first woman to come into AA and put together continuous sobriety. She stayed sober one year, then married a drunk, got drunk, and committed suicide in 1941.

"A Business Man's Recovery": William R. He's got a terrific, inspirational story in the Big Book, with all kinds of colorful details like fleeing to South America to work in the oil fields so he could learn to drink responsibly like the oil well workers; he thought that would help him. He was the first alcoholic trustee on the board of the Alcoholic Foundation; unfortunately he got drunk as soon as he was elected.

"A Different Slant": Harry B. Harry is probably "Fred" from the chapter "More About Alcoholism," the competent accountant who thought he didn't need AA, he could stay sober on self-knowledge, but inexplicably kept winding up in the hospital. He says in his story that he wants to illustrate that even a successful businessman, like himself, can become an alcoholic. He was elected to the board of the Alcoholic Foundation to take over when William R. got drunk, and promptly got drunk himself.

Curiously enough, the author of the "The Backslider," the 5th story, is the first one who stayed sober. His name was Walter B., and he was the first one admitted by Dr. Bob and Sister Ignatia to the hospital after they formed their partnership to hospitalize drunks.

The author of the 6th story, "The Seven Month Slip," actually slipped for about 30 years. His name was Ernie G., and he has the distinction of marrying Dr. Bob's daughter, Sue, while drunk, in 1941. Dr. Bob was against the marriage; in fact he found out they had gotten married by reading the newspaper. Both Dr. Bob's children married drunks. Ernie stayed sober about a

and

6.

... The Carnegie and Lakeshore Groups recently celebrated their first anniversaries.

The latter reports it has tripled in membership since its organization in April, 1945. . . . The Lorain-Antlers Group announces acquisition of new quarters, with more space for expanding attendance. . . . A fulltime secretary is in charge of the new central office opened by the Boston, Mass., Group at 30 Huntington Avenue. .

. .

The

Charleston, W. Va., Group, Box 924, reports excellent progress. . . .

Leading

ministers of all faiths, judges, physicians and prominent public officials address the Richmond, Va., Group from time to time. This group now totals 50 members.

Richmond A.A.s are sending spokesmen to Norfolk and Staunton to assist new groups founded there.

At the suggestion of the Baltimore Group a meeting of city officials and A.A.

representatives was arranged to consider the feasibility of establishing an alcoholic clinic. Three committees were formed, the first to investigate available space,

the second to promote the recruiting of a psychiatrist and a social worker, and an

A.A.

committee to determine the maximum number of candidates which could be effectively handled by the Baltimore Group on a referral basis.

Much discussion was evoked in Baltimore business offices recently following a two-column feature article on A.A., "Insurance Against a Lost Week-End," in the Baltimore Advertising Club News Bulletin. . . . Women A.A.s of Baltimore have laid the foundation for a self-operating A.A. Group in the Women's House of Correction at Jessups, Md.

Arkansas is rapidly becoming A.A.-ized from border to border. Thriving groups now are established in Fort Smith, El Dorado, Helena, Pine Bluff, and to a smaller degree in about 20 other towns; and the three groups in Little Rock have almost 200 members, with about 130 in the original group, 40 in the second, and 20 in the third.

. .
.

The Stockton, Calif., Group was host at a dinner to members from Sacramento, Lodi, and Roseville. . . . Covington, La., A.A.s, whose membership encompasses Amite, Bogalusa, Franklinton, Hammond and Ponchatoula, are running a series of newspaper articles on alcoholism and A.A.

A.A., organized in Youngstown, Ohio, six years ago, today has its private hospital, clubrooms, and a membership of 500. The club rooms, hospital and offices are in one building; the hospital has 12 beds, for men only. . . . The Columbus Group, four and a half years old, with approximately 450 members, 100 for each year, is planning a big open meeting for June at Memorial Hall. The purpose is to present A.A. to the public as well as to Central Ohio members. This group now uses the facilities of two local nursing homes for work with alcoholics. . . . The Marion, Galion, and Mansfield Groups have made remarkable strides. At least a portion of their success lies, they state, in their friendly habit of attending neighboring meetings.

Denver A.A.s, since the establishment of their clubrooms, report that more drunks are finding their way into A.A. under their own power. . . . Fort Worth, Tex., now has an Alcoholic Information Center, with an A.A. in charge. . . . The St. Georges, Bermuda,

Group, originating in November, 1945, is currently running ads in the Mid-Ocean
News.
. . . A.A.s from Shelby, N. C., and Anderson, S. C., participated in a meeting
of the Greenville, S. C., Group which started in November 1945, and today has over 25 members. . . . Celebrating its fifth anniversary, the Forest Hills, N. Y., Group
had as guest speakers at a dinner-meeting the Rev. Father James Griffin and Judge
John
O'Brien. This group has moved into larger quarters in the Queens County Medical Society Building, Queens Boulevard and 75th Avenue.

In the last few weeks the Milwaukee, Wis., Group has experienced a growth which
some attribute partly to generous and constructive newspaper pieces on the A.A.
program.
The Coffee Bar is an outstanding feature of the new clubrooms. . . . In the past six months Albany, N. Y., A.A.s have doubled their membership, which now totals 35.
. . .
The four-year-old Rochester, N. Y., Group has grown from 20 to 200. . . .
Ithaca
A.A.s, with a membership of 15, have instituted a series of monthly meetings open to the public. . . . A new group is getting under way in Poughkeepsie.

The San Francisco Group's institutional program is expanding. Added to the San Quentin program, in which Oakland, Richmond, Palo Alto and Vallejo groups cooperate, is a revival of the Napa State Hospital project, in which Oakland, Vallejo,
and Santa
Rosa have joined. Now the San Francisco Group has added a Marine Hospital
program, with weekly meetings. Hand in hand with that expansion is a project for districting

the city and establishing small groups, which will remain identified with
the central body. The Mission Group was established last year; the Marine-Midtown is now under way, as is the Marin County Group, all stemming from San Francisco. A public address system has been ordered for the combined clubhouse-meeting-hall.

The Upper Darby, Pa., Group, which was started in January, 1945, by a few members of the Philadelphia Group who live in the Upper Darby area, now has a membership of 60.
After having generously been provided with a meeting hall by the township commissioners, the group began to feel the necessity for a small clubroom of their own. They procured the necessary furniture and the clubroom opened for business
last November 1, at 7020 Garrett Road. One hundred and twenty-five were present at
the second open meeting, including doctors, magistrates, educators, lawyers and
members of the clergy.

The annual banquet of the Baltimore Group was held on Easter Saturday evening,
April
20. Guest speakers were Dr. Edward F. Kerman, eminent Baltimore psychiatrist;
the
Rev. Fr. Dougherty, S.J., of St. Ignatius' Church; the Rev. Richard Baker of
the Church, of the Redeemer. A.A. speakers came from Philadelphia, Washington
and Newark
Groups.

Kalamazoo, Mich., now has two active groups. . . . Starting in July, 1945, with six members, Seattle, Wash., A.A. has grown to a total membership of over 200, comprising nine groups. They have their own clubrooms. . . . The Fort Lauderdale, Fla.,
Group

has observed its second anniversary.

On April 29 the story of A.A. in dramatized form was once again broadcast throughout the nation--over NBC's "Cavalcade of America" program.

The Memphis, Tenn., A.A.s a few month ago began making calls on the alcoholics at the West Tennessee State Hospital at Bolivar, at the request of doctors in charge.

Each band of visiting A.A.s is different from the preceding one. Some of the alcoholic patients, on release from the hospital, are now beginning to get in touch with the group. . . . A state's attorney attended an A.A. meeting in Lyndonville, Vt., last month and was much interested in what he heard. The meeting was held by the Montpelier and the St. Johnsbury groups as a first, venture in that town. The state's attorney participated in the open discussion, indicating deep interest in the age and type of men and women who are finding a new way of living through A.A. At the conclusion of the session he gave the group the names of two men in jail at the time as prospects for 12th stepping. Further, he asked for a list of A.A. groups in Vermont to use in sending a personal letter to the other 13 state attorneys in which he would suggest that A.A. be contacted on alcoholic cases.

Father Flannegan of Boys Town was a guest at the second anniversary get-together of the Sioux City, Iowa, Group. . . . The Albuquerque, N. M., Group, now one year old, has today a membership of 50, and a second group has already been formed In Cincinnati, you can usually find 12 or 15 A.A.s lunching every noon at The Colony.

I've heard a number of people make various claims about members in the 1st edition stories that drank again. But I have yet to see those assertions backed up with something more than conviction. Using 1st edition stories as a representative sample, it seems that the percentage of success (continued sobriety) was much higher than failure (a slip).

The information below is what I've been able to glean that can be corroborated by a written source reference. 8 slips out of the 28 1st edition stories yields a fairly decent (2/3) success rate. Some members who drank again continued drinking until they passed away - some sobered up again and stayed that way.

1. A Business Man's Recovery (Bill R, NY): from November 1938 to February 1939, Bill was the 1st Chairman of the Alcoholic Foundation Board (the actual title was "President" at the time). He got drunk within a few months of taking office and had to resign. He sobered up again and served on the Advisory Committee to the Board from February 1939 to April 1942. He passed away in 1962.

2. A Different Slant (Harry B, NY): from June 1939 to December 1939 he succeeded Bill R as the 2nd Chairman of the Alcoholic Foundation Board. He got drunk several months after assuming office and had to resign. He sobered up again. The experience of Bill R and Harry B may well be the reason the Board Chair has been a non-alcoholic ever since.

3. A Feminine Victory (Florence R, NY): she appears to have been the 1st woman member in NY (and is mentioned as one of the alcoholic residents at Bill W's house on Clinton St). I believe she was the wife of a past Wall St associate of Bill W. She went to Washington DC to help Fitz M and sadly committed suicide after returning to drinking.

4. Fired Again (Wally G, OH): he reputedly was Dr Bob's "right hand man" and a prodigious 12th Stepper. He got drunk after several years sobriety but sobered up again.

5. Lone Endeavor (Pat C, CA): his story was ghost written by Ruth Hock after he claimed to have sobered up using the manuscript. Invited to NY, he arrived very drunk. He reputedly sobered up.

6. The Back Slider (Walter B, OH) he was admitted to St Thomas Hospital in Akron by Sister Ingnatia and Dr Bob on August 16, 1939 as their 1st patient. His wife Marie wrote the 1st edition story An Alcoholic's Wife. I believe he sobered up again but cannot confirm it.

7. The Seven Month Slip (Ernie G, OH): Dr Bob's son-in-law. He was persistently on and off the wagon. In his later life, there was a terribly tragic situation regarding his granddaughter and daughter (a murder/suicide). He died two years later to the day in 1971.

8. The Unbeliever (Hank P, NY): he also wrote the chapter To Employers. His situation is fairly well known. Hank served on the Advisory Committee to the Alcoholic Foundation Board from August 1938 to April 1940 when he got drunk again. He continued drinking and passed away in 1954 supposedly a very broken man.

9. Women Suffer Too (Marty M, NY - 2nd to 4th editions): started NCEA (later NCA & NCADD) and also helped start the Grapevine. She relapsed briefly sometime between 1959 and 1964. This was revealed in her 2001 biography by Sally and David Brown. There were those in NY AA and NCA who knew but kept it a guarded secret. She sobered up again. Marty passed away in 1980.

There is much info on Morgan R in Pass It On. He is also mentioned in AA Comes of Age but is not listed in the index. Morgan was in the advertising business and became a friend of Gabriel Heatter. In April 1939, he appeared on Heatter's radio program, We the People, to tell his story and make a pitch for the Big Book. That was the event where Bill W, Hank P and Co mailed out 20,000 post cards to physicians but received only 12 replies. Morgan served on the Advisory Committee to the Board from 1938 to 1940, was an attendee at the 1940 Rockefeller dinner and had Bill and Lois stay with him for about two months after they had to vacate their Clinton St home. I cannot find any information on whether he returned to drinking and presume (hopefully) that he stayed sober.

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: Stephen Gentile

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Wednesday, August 27, 2003 12:38 PM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Is there a list of who died sober out of first 100?

I've often heard that only 13 died sober out of the first 100 in the big book. Is there a list compiled of the names anywhere? If so was Morgan R the radio man one of them?

-----
Enter for your chance to IM with Bon Jovi, Seal, Bow Wow, or Mary J Blige

through. This fellow-feeling is very helpful. The alcoholic is asked simply to concentrate on keeping off one drink, the first, for one day at a time. He is not asked to take a pledge for life. Thus he is not from the outset frightened and depressed by the magnitude of the problem of his recovery. This problem has been reduced to and set out for him in manageable proportions. He is exhorted to realize his dependence upon God - Whose help must be earnestly asked. As a final step, the twelfth, the alcoholic has set before him the motive of bringing help and hope to others similarly afflicted. This is a vital and most valuable part of the programme. The alcoholic is made to realize that he can help others. This realization serves to lessen and to destroy his sense of failure and uselessness and to restore his self-respect. It becomes also a powerful incentive to the alcoholic to persevere in sobriety. The Fellowship has made no extravagant claims for the success of the treatment provided. It does not claim final cures - but rather the effective arresting of the disease. And there is abundant evidence to show that, by means of it and with due cooperation, very many so-called hopeless alcoholics have been rehabilitated.

Anyone who has experience of the great problem and heartbreak of trying to help and restore to normality and decency chronic alcoholics, will be grateful for the help which this Fellowship proffers. The emphasis of the programme is mainly upon the natural virtues of humility, sincerity, honesty with oneself, and then the need for the help of God. We see nothing in the program which need conflict in any way with Catholic principles. There is, indeed, evidence that Catholics have, through Alcoholics Anonymous, returned, not merely to sobriety, but to the regular practice of their religion. This is as might be expected. Restoration of a sense of responsibility and self-respect should naturally lead to a conscientious realization of religious duties.

There are just a few suggestions we would make. Firstly, we should like to see it admitted that, while alcoholism may easily enough reach the stage of being a serious disease in particular cases, this pass is generally reached as the result of earlier and culpable excesses. This admission would have no deleterious effects. It would rather serve as a greater incentive to strive for recovery. Secondly, for the sake of Catholics, we should like to see a reference to the necessity and incalculable value of supernatural helps for the alcoholic in his struggle towards sobriety. These helps can be abundantly obtained by frequent reception of the sacraments. The difficulty about inserting such a reference into the general programme of recovery is that it is desired to keep this programme on non-sectarian lines. But, perhaps, priests who come into contact with members of Alcoholics Anonymous might make for those concerned the point to which we have referred. We are assured that suggestions and co-operation would be welcomed. Needless to say the use of the available supernatural means would serve to consolidate successes won along natural lines. The supernatural elevates, it does not destroy the natural.

them,
after finding A.A. himself, started the Skidrow Group. In the months to come Toronto
A.A.s expect to open a North End and a West End Group.

The New Orleans, La., Group, started March 30, 1943, has grown to an active membership of almost 200. They have been instrumental in assisting to organize
groups in Covington, Abbeville, and Pollack, La.; and Tylertown, Miss. The latest one started on the Mississippi Gulf Coast includes members from Gulfport, Biloxi,
and other towns in the vicinity. This group was suggested by the major in charge of
the Veterans Hospital at Gulfport, who is interested in A.A. work. The same applies
to the Marine Hospital in New Orleans, where the chief psychiatrist is a friend
of
A.A.
and has made some several talks before the group.

At a recent open meeting of the Tacoma, Wash., Group the hall was crowded to capacity with members from that city and Seattle. The secretary of the Tacoma Group, who
was called "Joe Alcohol Jr." for the evening, acted as chairman and introduced as the man responsible for the establishment of A.A. in the Pacific-Northwest a member
who traced the history of A.A. Other speakers were a private in the Army, who is a member of the Philadelphia Group, and is temporarily stationed in Washington; a woman member; and one of the state's oldest A.A. members, dubbed "Joe Alcohol Sr."
for
the occasion.

In Sacramento, Calif., they've just settled a vexing telephone problem, the solution for which, they think, might help other groups in small cities. The group was too small to afford a downtown office with a paid secretary, but members felt

there should be a telephone listing so prospects could call. The satisfactory solution
came through engaging 24-hour telephone service with a phone bureau.

In Vancouver, Canada, at some of the meetings a questionnaire is used. "How did
you
first come to join?", "What is the chief cause of slips?", and so on.
Members
are called upon without warning for two-minute impromptu talks in answer.

Oklahoma City A.A.s are now holding their meetings in a brand new modernistic, brick building, the property of the group and strictly a membership proposition, built
from plans drawn by members, constructed by members, and paid for from funds contributed by members. The auditorium seats approximately 400 and the Clubhouse has a dining room, kitchen, offices, and men's and women's rest rooms. Today's total membership is over 200 divided into small groups for discussion meetings.

Two of the Oklahoma City members outlined the principles of A.A. before the Kiwanis
Club of that city recently. A return engagement was requested.

The first joint meeting of the Greater Boston Groups of A.A.-- for the financial benefit of the office of the Boston Central Service Committee--was attended by
about
400. All contributions, and they were generous, went to help maintain Boston's
Central Office. Visitors came from Hartford and Manchester, Conn.; Montpelier,
Vt.;
Maine, Massachusetts and other New England groups. One of the guest speakers
was
the

Rev. Father James Timmins of Manchester, Conn.

Members from Boston attended meetings of two new groups recently: Lawrence, Mass., and Dover, N. H. . . . A group is getting under way at the Veterans Hospital, Bedford, Mass.

The Montreal, Canada, Group is now well into its second year, the present membership totaling about 65, of which some 15 are women. The membership is divided into four groups, one of them an all-male section. The Building Fund for the Montreal clubhouse is growing.

The Rev. Arthur C. James, pastor of the Broad Street Memorial Methodist Church of Drexel Hill, Pa., recently attended an A.A. meeting for the first time, at Upper Darby. He was so impressed that he invited members of the group to speak at an evening church service --before a congregation of about 600. . . . Shreveport, La., members have helped the Minden Group to get started with two meetings weekly. .

. . The Seattle, Wash., Group now maintains a public clubroom downtown both for meetings and for dispensing information to those interested. Since July, 1945, the parent group of six members has grown to nine groups with over 200 in the fellowship. .

. . Beaumont, Tex., A.A.s have reported a growth from two members two and a half years ago to a present membership of 36. . . . Flushing, N. Y., members marked their third anniversary with a dance.

Glendale, Calif., A.A.s claim the distinction of having the oldest new A.A. member anywhere. A man of 78 walked into the Monday night meeting under his own power,

no sponsor, and shaking so badly he couldn't light his own cigarette. That was four months ago. He hasn't had a drink since.

Eighteen months ago the membership in the Glendale area was about 50, with two meetings a week. Today they number over 200, with nine meetings a week. They are sending members twice a month to meetings at the San Queutin Honor Road Camp, a
group which they helped to organize over a year ago, and from which today they have
some very active paroled members. Their women's group now totals 40, their sobriety
running from a year to four and one-half years.

The latest group to get going in Manhattan is in the Chelsea district. It meets
at the Y.M.C.A., 215 West 23rd St., on Wednesdays. . . . The Long Beach, Calif.,
Women's
Group reports steady progress. . . . Ann Arbor, Mich., now has two groups with a total membership well over 50. The original group is 16 months old; the other
was formed early this year.

Montpelier, Vt.. A.A.s have accepted an invitation to a sugaring-off party
on
the farm of a fellow member. . . . Since organization of the Marin Group in San Anselmo,
Calif., six months ago, membership has more than tripled and is now at about 20.

. . .
. The Newark A.A. Group has assisted in inaugurating meetings at the Salvation
Army
Men's Social Service Center. From 25 to 30 men attend the meetings every Friday night. Mrs. Ivy Cunningham, personnel worker at the Center, is helping to sponsor the project, which is about four months old. . . . The Anderson, S. C., Group, is in its seventh month and is experiencing rapid growth--as are those in Greenville.

Spartanburg, Columbia, and Charleston. . . . St. Petersburg and Tampa members joined Clearwater, Fla., A.A.s to celebrated the latters' first birthday.

City, criminal and juvenile judges were in attendance at the third anniversary banquet of the Jacksonville, Fla.. Group. Other Florida groups represented were Daytona Beach, Gainesville, and Tampa. Georgia A.A.s came from Valdosta.
Waycross.
Atlanta, and Rome. A.A.s from Boston. Mass., were also present. With Jacksonville's
several small group weekly meetings, new members are delighted that there are now
meetings every night in the week.

When Paterson, N. J., A.A.s held their second birthday party recently, the 70
members were joined by several hundred guests from neighboring groups. The group grew from a nucleus of four members meeting in a hotel room two years ago. The Rev. Dr.
Howard A.
Adair, pastor of the Eastside Presbyterian Church, has befriended the group,
which uses the church facilities for its meetings. . . . A series of radio programs devoted to A.A. and broadcast over the local station at Hartford, Conn., have won an award from Variety, national show business paper. A.A. Membership in the Hartford area
has increased over 200 per cent, and nine new groups have been started, in two years.

The eleventh anniversary of A.A. will be celebrated by groups in two Ohio cities. It was June 10, 1935, that Bill's first successful 12th step case, Dr. Bob, took his last drink. Dayton members will sponsor a banquet Saturday, June 15, at a to recover?'

VICTOR

Our correspondent has kindly sent us a number of leaflets and booklets in which are set out and explained the constitution, the aims and the methods of the Fellowship of Alcoholics Anonymous. We have examined this literature carefully and have also read some independent descriptions of the work and history of the Fellowship-which was founded in America in 1934, and now has a membership of over 100,000 scattered over thirty countries. We have been very favourably blessed by what we have read on this subject.

The Fellowship is a voluntary, non-sectarian, non-political society of alcoholics who have an honest and earnest desire to recover (and to stay recovered) from their unfortunate state. It is emphasized that this state is truly a disease in the case of the real alcoholic - a disease which is partly a physical allergy but mainly a form of mental obsession. The aim of the society of Alcoholics Anonymous is to rehabilitate those so afflicted and diseased. The means are social therapy and a programme of recovery which is summarized in twelve steps. The psychological approach seems to be very sound and well-considered. We shall only mention a few points here. The alcoholic finds great human sympathy, understanding and strength in the company of those who have been afflicted as he is, and who are winning through. This fellow-feeling is very helpful. The alcoholic is asked simply to concentrate on keeping off one drink, the first, for one day at a time. He is not asked to take a pledge for life. Thus he is not from the outset frightened and depressed by the magnitude of the problem of his recovery. This problem has been reduced to and set out for him in manageable proportions. He is exhorted to realize his dependence upon God - Whose help must be earnestly asked. As a final step, the twelfth, the alcoholic has set before him the motive of bringing help and hope to others similarly afflicted. This is a vital and most valuable part of the programme. The alcoholic is made to realize that he can help others. This realization serves to lessen and to destroy his sense of failure and uselessness and to restore his self-respect. It becomes also a powerful incentive to the alcoholic to persevere in sobriety. The Fellowship has made no extravagant claims for the success of the treatment provided. It does not claim final cures - but rather the effective arresting of the disease. And there is abundant evidence to show that, by means of it and with due cooperation, very many so-called hopeless alcoholics have been rehabilitated.

Anyone who has experience of the great problem and heartbreak of trying to help and restore to normality and decency chronic alcoholics, will be grateful for the help which this Fellowship proffers. The emphasis of the programme is mainly upon the natural virtues of humility, sincerity, honesty with oneself, and then the need for the help of God. We see nothing in the program which need conflict in any way with Catholic principles. There is, indeed, evidence that Catholics have, through Alcoholics Anonymous,

Grapevine, July 1946

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

A.A. in Atlanta, Ga., has made great progress since its birth five years ago.

The two groups are plugging for the establishment of an alcoholic ward in the big Fulton-DeKalb County Hospital soon to be built. . . . The Newark Group has moved into its new meeting quarters at 66 North 7th Street, about one block from the Alanon Clubhouse. More than 100 people were at the first meeting in their new home.

Another

group, known as the North Newark A.A., is growing to such an extent that they are now

forming a second one. Other new groups in this vicinity are the Vailsburg and

Clinton

Hill. . . . Rochester's fourth birthday dinner was attended by 230 members and guests. This group has branched out into morning meetings to provide for night shift

workers or others who are unable to attend evening meetings. . . . To extend the scope of its usefulness, the Middletown, Conn., Group each week invites six different guests: doctors, pastors, judges or other substantial citizens.

Two new A.A. broadcasts have gone on the air--in Dallas and Los Angeles. . .

.

The

Cincinnati Fellowship of A.A. celebrated its first anniversary in the new clubhouse early in July. When the idea of obtaining a new clubhouse was first suggested

there were numerous objections and many predictions were made of future trouble regarding the administration of the affairs of the club. Happily, none of these predictions has materialized. The financial and administrative affairs of the club are handled

by elected representatives and the Board of Trustees, all of whom are two-year-old
members.

Cooperating with the Fort Worth Group, Dr. W. B. Nies, City-County
physician, addressed the Texas State Medical Association in Galveston on "Relation of Alcoholism to Public Health." Dr. Nies presented his facts on alcoholism to this medical body for the first time in Texas; other city-county health officials became interested,
asked for more information and expressed their desire to cooperate more closely
with
A.A. groups throughout the state. . . . Growing membership of the four-year-old Dallas Group (approximately 150 strong) has necessitated division into 10 units
for the weekly closed meetings held in members' homes, offices and hotels. This
group,
now searching for permanent quarters, reports an increasing cooperation of medical,
clergy and law-enforcement officials.

The Indianapolis Group now numbers about 275 members. There are five sectional groups: Broad Ripple (bi-partitioned this spring because of luxuriant growth),
East
Side, West Side, Women's Group and the Meyerson Group. The present arrangement provides a meeting by one of the sub-groups every night in the week.

The Pensacola, Fla., Group is receiving many inquiries as a result of an
A.A.
advertisement in their local paper. . . . After some five and one-half years
there are now nine well-established groups in California's San Diego County: La Mesa,
San Marcos, Chula Vista, Old Town, Presidio, City Jail Group, Pacific Beach Women's Group, San Diego Women's Group and the San Diego Group. A group of San Diego
A.A.s

were present at the first meeting in El Centro; representatives of the local clergy, civil authorities and radio were present.

Big crowds of Cleveland A.A.s were attracted to the Little Theatre when Mack's Merrie Minstrels presented their third annual minstrel show. It ran two nights and was a complete success, with end men, an interlocutor, a chorus, and even a big olio.

. . . .
That city's Lorain Avenue Monday Group celebrated its fifth anniversary with a meeting and dance. . . . Another big event for the Ohioans was the third annual A.A. boxing show. Five hundred fight fans saw the nine bouts. The previous night, the A.A. Bowling League Banquet (for members of 32 participating teams) was served to 200. Teams from the Glenville and West Side Morning Groups were declared champions.

In "Easy Does It." its second annual variety show, the East Orange, N. J., Group went to town again this year, displaying lots of talent and ingenuity. The show was produced and directed by the group, with scenery painted by the members. Stage crew, electricians, tickettakers and ushers, all were recruited from the local A.A.s. And the cast of 36 "Easy-doers ' came from the group. The music was furnished by the Alanon orchestra from Newark. This entirely A.A. production brought an audience of 600 A.A.s and friends from nearby communities. Some of the rollicking musical numbers and satirical skits were "The March of Crime," "You Made Him What He Is Today," "Boys

Will Be Girls," and "Don't Point."

This has been "open season" for members of the Boston, Mass., area. More than 500 people gathered to hear the talks at the recent open meeting in Worcester; about 200 attended the first open meeting of the Woburn Group. The second monthly joint meeting of the Greater Boston Groups, for the benefit of the Central Service Committee, had as guest speaker Austen Lake, columnist and war correspondent. A member of the Boston Group addressed a gathering of the District Nurses' Association in Swampscott. .

.. The Pittsfield, Mass., Group, started last November, has now reached a point where it is beginning to be felt in the community. Today the total membership is 18. At the first open dinner meeting five-minute speakers were heard from Albany, Schenectady and Troy, N. Y.; Hartford, Conn.; Springfield and Boston, Mass.

The one-man group in Mission, Tex., has been 12th stepping by writing letters to be read at meetings of larger groups. He got going about six months ago. . . . Such a large number of California state institutions have asked groups in the Los Angeles area to introduce A.A. to their patients that the Los Angeles Central Committee has had to coordinate the work among the various groups. . . . The Mill Creek Group of Salem, Ore., recently held an essay contest for members, who wrote on "What A.A. Means to Me." . . . Des Moines A.A.s recently had a professional movie camera crew record activities at one of their regular Saturday night open house parties at their newly-painted clubhouse. The showing (for members and friends only) is scheduled for July.

With help from the Denver, Colo., Group, an A.A. brunch got started in Cheyenne, Wyo. . . . A Detroit A.A. spoke for the Saginaw County (Mich.) Public Health Association at a community dinner meeting on "Alcoholism" attended by teachers, doctors, public officials and other interested residents. . . . A transcription of the "Cavalcade of America" A.A. story was played at an open meeting of the Seattle, Wash., Group.

The Kansas City, Mo., Group, which recently observed its fifth anniversary with a supper and door show, some time ago started holding small neighborhood meetings. Beginning with 10 units, there are now 17. The success of these small neighborhood discussion units is reflected in the increased attendance at the weekly central meetings, where the average number has risen from 125 to 250. The group's membership has doubled since its fourth anniversary. . . . A district group meeting, representing the four groups that sprang from the Bellevue, Ohio, Group--Norwalk, Sandusky, Port Clinton and Fremont--was held at the Bellevue Town Hall. . .

The Fresno, Calif., Group, which held its first meeting March 1, now has nine active members. The address is P. O. Box 131. . . . Memphis, Tenn. A.A.s observed their second anniversary with an open house for members and friends.

The newly organized Alano Club in Milwaukee, which was incorporated under the state laws of Wisconsin, is holding a series of Sunday evening buffet suppers. The Milwaukee A.A.s invite out-of-town members to their clubrooms in the Tiebout identified this "X-factor" for his fellow psychiatrists. It was, he said, "a religious component, a spiritual development, a belief in God - a conversion."

Dr. Tiebout was appraising the program of Alcoholics Anonymous, an informal fellowship of arrested alcoholics, then numbering nearly 15,000 men and women. If he were addressing the psychiatric profession this year, he could count on a much wider understanding of his theme. For 96,475 people in 34 countries will tell you today that they have stopped drinking through A.A. The fraternity and sorority of ex-drunks is increasing at the rate of more than 20,000 a year - an achievement that has won the interest and the applause of prominent spokesmen for medicine and religion.

As a matter of fact, Alcoholics Anonymous had been in existence for a decade before it became the subject of discussions before medical societies. Its beginnings go back to a night in November, 1934, with a former Wall Street broker sitting in his kitchen wondering where, before his wife returned, he could hide the bottle of gin needed to tide him over till morning. He desperately desired to stop drinking but found himself helpless. Promising business opportunities he had ruined beyond remedy. Continuous trips to hospitals and sanitariums had at last brought the verdict that he faced no more than a year of life before the inevitable heart attack during delirium tremens. Blank, terrifying despair coupled with an insatiable, murderous craving for alcohol made the hiding of that bottle the most pressing concern of his life.

His reverie was interrupted by the visit of an old school friend, a familiar drinking companion of former days, rumored to have been committed as an alcoholic psychotic. The rumor was obviously mad, triumphantly false. For here was the former drinking companion with hew health, a new and strange serenity and a new and curious idea: God could manage our lives if we would only allow Him. It was an idea he had learned from the Oxford Group, the disciples of Dr. Frank Buchman, with their teaching of Surrender, Sharing, Change, Quiet Time and Witnessing, and the four imperatives - Absolute Honesty, Absolute Purity, Absolute Unselfishness and Absolute Love. That had been enough to beat John Barleycorn and supply a new vision of a God-centered way of living.

Ancient prejudices against religion were mocked by evidence of the buoyant happiness that came from someone's saying very simply that God had done for him what he could not do for himself.

The protestations of the ex-stockbroker that he knew little about God and believed less were met with the suggestion that a willingness to believe in a Power greater than one's self would suffice. A trip to the hospital to dry out provided an opportunity for a complete surrender to God. A determination to make personal reparation for wrong done to others brought a wonderful sense of victory, a fresh confidence and a resolve to bring to other hopeless alcoholics the encouraging and saving message of God's nearness to those who want Him.

A business trip to Akron the following spring gave the sometime broker an opportunity - indeed a compulsion - to carry out his resolve. Tense because of a setback in a dragged-out lawsuit, he felt he must help someone or lose himself in self-pity and, consequently, in alcohol. Providentially, he was introduced to a surgeon, a despairing victim of drink, who responded to the message of hope - that God exalts the humble and strongly supports those who put their lives in His keeping. In the local Catholic hospital the doctor and the businessman brought fellow alcoholics the assurance that there is a way out for those who want to stop drinking. The two were soon five, then a group overflowing the doctor's home for the weekly gatherings, then a fraternity spread across the country by salesmen who carried with their lines of goods a new and compelling idea.

By April 1939 there were a hundred whose pooled experience was set down in a book that reached Dr. Tiebout at his Greenwich sanitarium in its provisional multilithed form. He gave it to a thirty-four-year-old woman alcoholic whose character structure, he confessed, defeated all of his skills and all of her own pitiable resolves. The book she read contained a collection of case histories of people who had conquered their addiction to alcohol. It contained also a good deal of hard headed advice, and it outlined a Program of Recovery. The way out of the squirrel-cage of shakes, night sweats, jittery nerves and horrible dreams, she read, consisted of twelve steps, none of which could be skipped. The ladder to sobriety for a hundred ex-drunks had been sealed, these ex-alcoholics said, when:

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.

9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.

10. Continued to take personal inventory and, when we were wrong, promptly admitted it.

11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.

12. Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

(In the Twelfth Step "spiritual awakening" was substituted for the phrase "spiritual experience" employed in the first printing of the book, Alcoholics Anonymous. An overwhelming and sensible emotional upheaval, it was learned, did not always accompany acceptance of the Twelve-Step Program of Recovery. Nor was it needed: an inevitable alteration of attitude followed gradually any honest determination to give the greater Power management of one's life.)

Dr. Tiebout's patient was impressed by the book he gave her; She attended a meeting of a group of Alcoholics Anonymous, listened to personal accounts of how the program had worked for others and soon became an active member of the group. The psychiatrist described the consequent personality change in his patient as a dissolving of the character structure which had been blocking all help.

Intensive research over the past several years has failed to establish a common "character structure" in people for whom one drink is too much and a thousand not enough. Perhaps, as some scientists hold, there is a physical rather than a psychic deficiency afflicting our three million problem drinkers. Whether excessive drinking produces or is the product of personality disorders, there is certainly an emotional immaturity noted in alcoholics of which addiction to the bottle is only a symptom. There is a rooted dissatisfaction with life, manifesting itself in festering resentments, flight from responsibility, displays of grandiosity, all operating in a penumbra of fear, concealed self-doubt and whining self-pity. Spiritual writers have always labeled such self-centeredness as "pride," and have acknowledged that pride can flourish in a person who is not all vain. The classic cure for pride, religion teaches, is humiliations.

Humiliations engendering humility are inevitable for anyone attempting the A.A. Twelve Steps. There is the initial acknowledgment of helplessness, jettisoning the protestation that the alcoholic can somehow by some ingenious change of habits join the ranks of America's 60 million "social drinkers." The false and grasping self, getting in the way of God's management, must be cauterized by ruthless self-examination, the smothering of all resentments and the honest reparation of all injuries to others, whatever the cost to self-esteem. Prayer to keep one's mind responsive to God %s!3 imperative, despite all ridicule of religiosity. Apostolic activity on behalf of other alcoholics, however inconvenient and unpleasant, is held essential as an expression of gratitude to God and a self-strengthening service of others.

For the Twelve Steps are to be a new way of life, a kind of living that counts on God's incessant interest and expresses that reliance by unconcern for the future. Living is reduced to a manageable Twenty-Four-Hour Plan, with "Easy Does It" as the motto of a trust that relaxes tensions.

That is the program that an A.A. will explain when called to help a fellow alcoholic. There will be no talking down to the inebriate (the A.A. realizes that he is only one drink away from sharing the same plight). There will be no moralizing (the A.A. will freely give him another drink if needed to steady him). There will be no excuses putting off the central point of the discussion: does the drinker want to stop drinking? The A.A., you see, has a crucial advantage over all other visitors: there isn't any depth of physical misery or mental torment that he can't match from personal experience. He can truly say that he understands. He can add, with convincing power, that he has a real answer.

The AA visitor will explain that there is such a thing as an allergy to alcohol, that drinking for some people is as disastrous as the eating of sugar would be for a diabetic. No permanent cure for alcoholism is promised, merely relief from the burden of a self-centered personality, stupidly smothered in drink. For an honest and resolute following of the Twelve Steps there is the assurance of sobriety, a serene, vital, active sobriety, a full and satisfying life.

Does it work?

Alcoholics Anonymous estimates that 50 per cent of those who accept the program achieve immediate sobriety. Another 25 per cent, after slips occasioned by over confidence and neglect of some part of the program, permanently abstain from alcohol.

A.A. describes itself as a spiritual entity, a movement rather than an organization. It has no dues, membership lists, constitution or by-laws. It doesn't bother to keep records nor will it turn its back on a lapsed member. To help spread the message, to provide service for the 3,527 local groups and to answer inquiries from all over the world, there is an office, called The Alcoholic Foundation, at 141 East 44th Street, New York City. Governed by trustees, a majority of whom are non-alcoholics, the Alcoholic Foundation is determined to keep the spiritual nature of its work uppermost. On

---

Note by G.C. This introduction to the steps was originally published in Detroit as a twenty-page pamphlet when A.A. first began, when the newcomers were gathered in large sessions and allowed to ask questions of a panel of people with longer sobriety - - it is a marvellous example of early old-time A.A. teaching. The original version is still obtainable from Alcoholics Anonymous of Greater Detroit, 380 Hilton Road, Ferndale MI 48220.

The twelve steps are divided up so they can be dealt with in four separate discussion sessions: Admission (Step 1), Spiritual (Steps 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 11), Inventory/Restitution (Steps 4, 8, 9, 10), and Active (Step 12). If the group meets once a week, all twelve steps can then be covered in a month.

An edition with reset type was prepared in 1995 for use in A.A. discussion meetings in northern Indiana, where it proved equally successful in providing worthwhile topics, not only for the newcomers, but for the oldtimers too. After going through the pamphlet several times in a row over a period of three or four months, it was surprising how the apparently simple language led you deeper and deeper into profound spiritual insights. In this discussion-meeting format, the pamphlet was passed around the table, with each person reading a few paragraphs of that week's section of the pamphlet, and then after all of that section had been read, each person in turn around the table was given an opportunity to talk about the topics that had been raised.

Parts of this pamphlet have also been used in recent years for Saturday morning beginners' meetings in Elkhart, Indiana, where the teacher reads from and then talks about the material on one or another of the steps for the newcomers. It seems to many of the oldtimers to work better than anything else they have tried for getting raw beginners into serious thought about the way the program works.

|||||

++++Message 1270. . . . . Re: Conference approval
From: Arthur Sheehan . . . . . 9/2/2003 10:51:00 PM

|||||

Hi

The Delegates wasted no time in implementing the Conference-approval process for AA literature. It was one of the first items they addressed. The General Service Conferences began in 1951 on an experimental basis with Panel 1 (consisting of 1/2 of the Delegates). The 1951 Conference passed an advisory action to the effect: "In future years, AA textbook literature should have Conference approval." It also retroactively approved the 1st edition Big Book and Alcoholic Foundation Board pamphlets in existence at the time.

The Conference-approval process for literature was firmly in place in 1952 after the 2nd Conference (Panel 2 - the first Conference that included all the Delegates). Based on the 1951 Conference advisory action, the Alcoholic Foundation Board formed a special committee on literature and submitted a report to the 1952 Conference recommending literature items that should be retained and future literature items that would be needed. Bill W also made a presentation to the 1952 Conference of the various literature projects he was engaged in. As stated in the Final Report of the 1952 Conference, Bill's projects included:

- 1) "Updating the Story section of the Big Book"
- 2) "A series of orderly point by point essays on the Twelve Steps."
- 3) "A new series of anecdotal analyses of the Twelve Traditions"
- 4) "A kind of popular history of AA and its ideas of recovery, tradition and service"
- 5) "A book on the application of AA philosophy on the total problem of living"
- 6) "A reference manual stating our total experience with the whole idea of service functions"

The 1952 Conference unanimously approved both the Alcoholic Foundation Board proposals and Bill's literature projects. Bill's approved projects would eventually lead to the development of: (1) the Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions, (2) the 2nd edition of the Big Book - Alcoholics Anonymous, (3) AA Comes of Age, (4) The AA way of Life (later renamed to As Bill Sees It) and (4) The AA Service Manual and Twelve Concepts for World Service (developed separately and later combined).

The 1952 Conference also approved an advisory action to the effect: That the following be incorporated on all literature publish by the Works Publishing Inc.:

"Issued by Works Publishing Inc., the sole publishing agency for the Society of Alcoholics Anonymous. Approved by the General Service Conference of A.A."

The 1953 Conference reaffirmed the 1952 Conference advisory actions. Bill W provided the 1953 Conference with a list of specific pamphlets to be developed as well as a specimen copy of the 12&12. The 1953 Conference approved the name change of Work Publishing Inc to AA Publishing Inc. The new name first appeared in the 12&12 published in June 1953.

The 1954 Conference recommended that "All Conference-approved literature have on its face an identifying symbol." this would give birth to the circle and triangle logo. They also approved renaming a publication then called The Bulletin (started in 1940) to The Exchange Bulletin (which was later renamed to Box 459 in 1966).

The 1955 Conference approved a retail price of $4.50 ($27 in 2003 dollars) for the 2nd edition Big Book which was introduced at the 1955 International Convention (in July). The International Convention also ended the "experimental" nature of the Conference and it became the Guardian of the Traditions and voice of the group conscience of the entire Fellowship. AA Comes of Age was approved in 1956 and published in 1957. The 1959 Conference approved renaming AA Publishing Inc. to AA World Services Inc. The Twelve Concepts for World Service was approved by the 1962 Conference which also recommended that it be a supplement to The Third Legacy Manual (first published in 1950-1951). The AA Way of Life was published in 1967 (and later renamed to As Bill Sees It in 1975). The 1969 Conference approved The AA Service Manual (to replace The Third Legacy Manual). It and the Twelve Concepts for World Service were combined into one publication by the 1981 Conference.

All the above publications came out of the list of Bill's projects presented to, and approved by, the 1952 Conference.

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: jenny andrews

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Tuesday, September 02, 2003 5:46 AM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Conference approval

Neither the 12 and 12 nor Big Book (first three editions) were AA Conference-approved - presumably because there was no Conference to approve them when they were published. Can anyone tell me when Conference first began approving AA literature, and whether a decision was taken at a Conference to endorse previous publications and decisions for which the Alcoholic Foundation was responsible. Laurie A.

---

salvation.

From my experience in A.A., I can say in all honesty: I am a better Catholic because I am a member of Alcoholics Anonymous. I am a better A.A. because I am striving daily to be a better Catholic.

Fifteen Years Old

Alcoholics Anonymous is just more than fifteen years old. There came a belief to a New York investment consultant that, with the help of God, he could cease drinking. The belief came as he lay in an alcoholic hospital. And through what psychologists describe as an ecstatic religious experience - something akin to what happened to Saul of Tarsus on the Damascus road.

The New Yorker ceased to drink. Though he strove earnestly, he won no converts. Some six months later, he was in Akron on a business trip. Always in his work with other alcoholics, he thought that he was conferring a favor on them, that he was helping them for their sake. That Saturday afternoon in Akron, he realized he must talk to another alcoholic; that if he didn't find an alcoholic and talk to him that he would get drunk. There followed a providential meeting with an alcoholic surgeon of that city and the founding of Alcoholics Anonymous. But the experience of that Saturday afternoon, the need for an alcoholic to talk with another alcoholic, has been of the very warp and woof of the A.A. code. So it is that when we A.A.'s work with another alcoholic, when we strive to show him the road to sobriety, we are doing it not only out of our gratitude to God but for the very selfish reason that this helps us to keep ourselves sober. Very definitely, it is not done as a favor to the other alcoholic, nor in the spirit of evangelism or reform.

It is an important point. A man can't become overly self-righteous, he can't develop the reformer complex when the thing he is doing is primarily for himself. It is one of the things that differentiate A.A. from many a temperance movement of the past. Another thing is that we stick to our own knitting. We don't engage in controversy. We have no official position, for or against anything. We operate under the naive belief that what God wants us to do, for the most part, is to keep sober ourselves and to help other alcoholics get sober and stay sober.

A member's attitude toward Prohibition, toward liquor, is his own. I continue to serve drinks on occasion in my home to non-alcoholic guests. My Irish relatives would object strenuously were I to change. And well they might. I'd object, too, if I were a guest in a diabetic's home and he forbade me the use of sugar.

Alcoholism - a Disease

Which brings us to the question of alcoholism. Following the general belief in the medical profession, we in A.A. look upon alcoholism as a disease, a symptom of a disease or something in the nature of an allergy.

This is not done with any intent to evade or disclaim our own moral responsibility in the matter. The Twelve Steps of the Recovery Program, printed elsewhere in this article, are a direct denial of any such thought.

We emphasize the point of disease or allergy to help the alcoholic hold out his alcoholism at arm's length and examine it. We want him to look upon it with rational objectivity. We want him to consider it as he would consider a heart ailment, hypertension or any disease. To separate it from himself. We as alcoholics know that the alcoholic has an obsession that his drinking problem is peculiar to himself, that he is the only one in the world who is so afflicted that he drinks because he has to, that other drunkards drink too much because they want to.

We go to see a prospective member of A.A. We tell him of our own drinking experiences - the things we did, the thoughts we had, the futile attempts at seeking to control our drinking. We tell him of the, black despair and the bitter remorse we suffered.

We know that at first he'll listen to us with doubt, with suspicion, with the belief, perhaps, that these clear-eyed men are just a couple of reformers, busybodies who mean well but who just don't know the score.

But as we tell about ourselves, the alcoholic knows that we know about alcoholics. He has seen a stranger in an alien land and suddenly he hears his native tongue. And often he takes the conversation away from us. He has found someone who understands and he wants to pour out the thoughts that have been bottled up - no pun intended - within him. And often, within minutes, he is confiding to us things that his wife, his relatives, his friends have never been told.

I recall a woman whose husband came into A.A. Half indignantly, she remarked: "For years I begged John to quit drinking, for his own sake, for my sake, for the sake of the children. And he wouldn't do a thing. Now along comes a couple of strangers and John quits drinking - just like that."

Her error, apart from the fact that she should have been thanking God for John's sobriety, was in thinking of the A.A.'s as strangers. John knew otherwise.

We tell the prospect not to quarrel with the word "alcoholic" that an alcoholic is simply an uncontrolled drinker. Alcohol does something to us, we say, that it does not do to the ordinary person.

When we start to drink, chances are that if nothing drastic interferes, we'll keep on drinking until we are drunk.

"The More You Eat"

You who are not alcoholic have sat down with a bag of peanuts or a bowl of popcorn and started to nibble away. Each bite you took, led to another. That "the more you eat, the more you want" appetite multiplied by a million (I am being slightly conservative) might give you some idea as to the desire set up in an alcoholic by his first drink.

There's another obsession we must combat. The practicing alcoholic suffers from the delusion that somehow, somewhere, some day - maybe "the next time" - he is going to drink in a controlled manner. This despite his record, this despite the thousand and one failures in his attempts to be a normal drinker.

We have to hammer home to the man we are calling on that once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic. Never in the history of Alcoholics Anonymous, with its hundred thousand members, never in the history of medicine or psychiatry (so far as we know) has a man ever been able to drink in a controlled manner once he has passed the line that separates the uncontrolled drinker, the alcoholic, from the social drinker.

Never, we say out of our experience, can such a man hope to drink in a controlled fashion. So we point out that it isn't the fifteenth drink that gets us into trouble - it's the first one.

"We are all one drink from being drunkards, we A.A.'s.

No man that I have heard of set out to become an alcoholic. He drank for the reasons other people drink - for sociability, in a festive spirit, to accentuate a mood. His predisposition to alcohol did the rest.

There's a Texas physician, a member of A.A., who says: "Alcoholism is like the seven year itch. It's no disgrace to get it. But it's a disgrace to keep it."

Which brings to mind some of the remarks that relatives of alcoholics have been making these many generations: "Why don't you just have a couple of drinks like your Uncle Gus? Why don't you exercise your will power?"

The only time an alcoholic can exercise his will power is before the first drink, a thing most non-alcoholics do not understand. That first drink shatters the alcoholic's will power. The reason for this, perhaps, is that alcohol is not a stimulant, as so many fondly believe. It is a narcotic, a depressant, a drug, and the alcoholic is particularly and peculiarly sensitive to its effects.

Our first effort with the new man is to seek to bring him to the firm conviction that he is an alcoholic, that being an alcoholic he can never drink without drunkenness and ruin. We have seen alcoholics, after periods of sobriety up to ten and twelve years, make the experiment of trying to drink normally. We have seen the tragedy that followed.

That is why "the pledge," as given in the Catholic Church, ordinarily protects the drinker only for the duration of the pledge and rarely has lasting results. A period of sobriety adds nothing to an alcoholic's ability to control his drinking. That's from the record.

"OK," says our prospect, "so I'm an alcoholic, so I can't ever drink again. Now what do I do?"

The Twelve Steps

Then we tell him about the rule of life in the Twelve Steps of the Recovery Program of Alcoholics Anonymous. These, translated into Catholic terms, are what A.A. demands of a man.

He must admit he is an alcoholic.

He must seek to live in all things in accordance with the will of God.

He must make a thorough examination of conscience plus an analysis of his character.

He must make a general confession.

He must seek with the help of God to rid himself of his sins, his shortcomings, his character defects.

He must make amends to those he has harmed, except where to do so would bring another greater harm.

He must continue to examine his conscience regularly and when wrong "promptly admit it."

He must seek "through prayer and meditation" to come closer to God, "praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out."

He must, following a spiritual awakening, try to carry this message to other alcoholics and to practice these principles in all his affairs.

Now a priest, someone schooled in Theology, might out of his learning have devised some such set of exercises. You will note that they are in accord with principles for the devout life, ancient in the Catholic Church: Contrition, a turning to God, seeking to rid ourselves of the things that keep us from God and then doing the things that will bring us closer to God.

But no. The Twelve Steps were devised by men who had little religious background. They had been exposed but briefly to Dr. Frank Buchman's Oxford Group movement. We think it beautifully strange that a spiritual program so sound should be thought of by men whom any theologian, Catholic or otherwise, might well regard as spiritual ignoramuses, theological tyros.

The similarity between the Recovery Program and the first week of St. Ignatius' Exercises has been remarked by more than one Jesuit.

One of the greatest gifts of A.A. over and above sobriety is the 24-hour idea. When a man becomes an A.A., he makes no promises, signs no documents, takes no pledges that never again will he drink.

He is asked to quit drinking just for today.

This may seem a childish device - this 24-hour idea. But it works. First thing in the morning I ask God to help me not to drink today. When night comes, I thank God for His help in keeping me from alcohol that day.

So the days pass, one at a time, without alcohol. The days become weeks. The weeks are now months. We have been dry just a day at a time but now we have been dry for months.

My mind is clearer. Hope, long dead, lives again. Faith, once submerged in alcohol, begins to rise. And charity. It is an old saying among us that A.A. is charity in action - not merely something believed, but something lived.

"Give Us This Day"

We begin to live all of our lives within the compass of 24 hours. "Give us this day our daily bread" takes on a new meaning. We close the door on the past, leaving it to God's mercy. We refuse to thrust ourselves into the future, leaving that to God's providence. We concentrate on living in the here and now to the fullest. A Catholic writer refers to the Sacrament of the Present Moment. I knew just what he meant. So would any Catholic A.A.

The new man coming into A.A. is told of the necessity of asking for His help.

The Catholic might protest that he had prayed. We say to him, out of our own experience, that his prayers had been like this:

He prayed only to get out of trouble and the moment the jam was over, he lost fervor. Or he prayed for what we alcoholics believe the impossible - that he is able to drink "like a gentleman." Or he prayed with his lips and did nothing to merit the help of God.

He must pray, but he must also seek to do the Will of God.

The scientists, looking at A.A.'s amazing success, speaks learnedly of group therapy. We Catholics know that God seeks to work His wonders through natural means. When He does otherwise, it is a miracle. It is an axiom of biology that every living thing tends to adapt itself to its environment. So the novice finds himself with alcoholics who understand him because they have come to know themselves. They give freely of their experience, their counsel, of their time and of themselves.

There is the misguided belief among some that A.A.'s sit around bragging about their drinking days, about the amounts they consumed; or that they sit around mourning the days that were, as a man now poor might recall the days of his wealth, or a man now old, the days of his youth.

We do talk a bit about our drinking careers. We do it to illustrate a point or to raise a laugh. We laugh easily in AA. We laugh frequently. It is easy to laugh when a man is happy.

But, for the most part, our conversations, our bull sessions, our meetings are concerned with God and the things of God. We discuss the steps of the program - how best to do them. What living according to the Will of God actually requires. What's the best way to combat pride and develop humility? How to rid yourself of resentments, jealousies, angers, fears, doubts, suspicions?

Many a Catholic has achieved a reputation among the non-Catholic brethren of being a minor Thomas Aquinas by reciting to them the words of the Baltimore catechism.

He Learns Things

A Catholic isn't long in A.A. before a fellow Catholic, older in the movement, invites him to a Catholic lecture, a day of recollection, a week-end retreat. The new man finds that many of the Catholics are weekly communicants, that no few of them have a daily routine of Mass and Communion.

He learns, too, that not always were these Catholics thus. He learns that this one, prior to A.A., had been a careless, indifferent Catholic. He learns that that one, prior to A.A., had been away from the Sacraments for nineteen years.

What changed them?

Some sage has said: "Character is right thinking become a habit. But it is easier to live yourself unto right thinking than it is to think yourself into right living."

There is the principle that a man becomes Christlike by seeking always to do the Christlike thing. It is a principle used much in the formation of apostles in Catholic Action.

Because it is a principle, it operates in A.A. as elsewhere. The essence of the A.A. program is in the step wherein a man decides to turn his will and his life over to the care of God.

A man seeking to do the Will of God must seek to do the good thing, the honest thing, the pure thing, the unselfish thing, the loving thing, the Christlike thing.

And little by little, he becomes good, he becomes unselfish, he follows in Christ's steps.

We Catholics in A.A. come eventually to these thoughts: We need A.A. to remind us of the necessity of sobriety, to keep us alert against the things that might end our sobriety. We know we can't stay sober without the help of God. We can best get that help through the Church and the Sacraments. The more we tend toward God, the more grateful we become for His help. We begin to look upon our alcoholism in terms of Francis Thompson's "Hound of Heaven." It occurs to us that had we not been alcoholics, had we not, reluctant and unwilling, turned to God for help, our Catholicism might never have become the tremendous force that it is in our lives today. To know, to love and to serve God might have remained a half-remembered phrase from the catechism. We have learned, as Augustine did, that there can be no rest until we rest in God.

We do not obtrude our Catholicism upon our fellow A.A.'s. We, as they, are scrupulous about keeping discussions on non-denominational basis. A man says: "This is my view," or "This is what I believe." He does not say: "This is what the Catholic Church teaches," nor "The Methodist church insists that-

There are Catholics and Protestants, Christians and Jews, believers and non-believers in A.A. There is a sizeable number of agnostics, a few members who insist they are Atheists. They, too, in A.A. have a right to their opinions, a right to express their views. They see nothing anomalous, these doubters, in membership in a group which is basically God-centered. After all, Faith is a gift. Some eventually come to believe in God, but others remain doubting but dry. The why of this I do not understand. It has taken me a long time and many a suffered scar to learn that God knows what He is doing. I have ceased to question Him.

The Most Tolerant

Alcoholics, by and large, are the most tolerant of people. Because of what we have suffered, there is a kinship among us that transcends color and creed. It is good for us Catholics to associate with our non-Catholic brethren. We learn to be so grateful for the Sacraments. We learn to be so grateful for Our Lady's intercession.

Generally - there are some notable exceptions - we Catholics are better informed about God and the things of the spirit. Generally the Catholic's concepts are clearer and he can express them better, therefore. So considerable Catholic thinking has entered into A.A., which is understandable because of its essential agreement of basic A.A. with Catholic principles.

We like to share our days of recollection, our retreats with our non-Catholic brethren. We like to recommend books on the proofs of the existence of God, "The Imitation of Christ," other spiritual books. We know these things will help the fellow who is having difficulty with the spiritual phases of the program. And so, on occasion, an erstwhile Atheist becomes a Catholic, a whilom doubting Thomas embraces the Faith. And we have known Protestants after a Catholic retreat to return to the church of their youth.

Suggest A.A.

Maybe you have a friend a relative who needs this help to stop drinking. First thing to do for him (or her - about 15 per cent of our members are women) is to pray. Then suggest A.A. to them. Or if you lack the opportunity or courage, ask his parish priest or physician to suggest A.A. Impress upon the alcoholic that there are no initiation fees, no dues, no officers, only the simple spiritual rules of the Recovery Program.

Make it clear to him that if he doesn't want A.A., A.A. doesn't want him. If, after he hears our story, what we have to offer, he does not want A.A., we'll leave him alone until the day he does want A.A. The only investment we ask of him is a half hour of his time. And don't forget your prayer.

Most Alcoholics Anonymous groups are listed in local telephone books. If one is not listed in your community, information as to the nearest group may be obtained by writing the Alcoholic Foundation, P.O. Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York 17, N.Y.

|||||

+++Message 1275. . . . . Gv July46 - New Groups
From: t . . . . . 9/3/2003 5:53:00 AM

|||||

Grapevine, July 1946

12.0pt;">Attendance in recent years has been limited to the 275 capacity of the dining room at The Oasis. So get your tickets early from one of the folks mentioned below - or through 234. Your group rep should also be able to sell tickets at $22 per person.

12.0pt;">Tickets will be sold at the door - but don't get 'shut out".

12.0pt;">The fantastic 10AM Buffet is preceded by coffee and fellowship that usually kicks off well before 9. The meeting itself gets underway at 11.

12.0pt;">This year Ann M. long time Toronto area resident will travel from Ridgetown, Ontario to share with us. Ann will be joined by Ben W. a fixture at Thorncliffe Park.

12.0pt;">In addition Bob D., who recently celebrated his 45th anniversary in Barrie, will chair the meeting portion of the event.

12.0pt;">A display of Archives material will be set up in the main lobby for review.

12.0pt;">It is vital that we remain true to the vision of our founders.

12.0pt;">We have a responsibility to recognize the effort and dedication of early members who discovered through painful trial and error the successful methods that are now taken for granted by so many of us.

12.0pt;">So the purpose of The Breakfast is not only to celebrate the long term sobriety that so many of us enjoy but to remember our predecessors and to learn the lessons of the past.

12.0pt;">The steps and traditions 'come alive" when studied in the context of evolution.

12.0pt;">It is great opportunity for newcomers to learn of our rich history so come, bring a friend and enjoy great fellowship.

12.0pt;">

12.0pt;">Tickets are available from 234 (or Intergroup Rep)

(or Business) meeting. It could take a few hours to do if it is done thoroughly. There is a list of 13 questions defined in the pamphlet that form the basis for the inventory.

Something that is also very important, is to have an experienced, non-participating, moderator of the meeting as well as a recording secretary (your District Committee Member or somebody from your Area Committee might be a good candidate to be moderator). The Moderator reads a question, and then calls on each attendee, in turn, to speak no more than two minutes on the question. This allows all attendees to participate and keeps anyone from dominating the meeting or getting into debates. The recording secretary notes the comments made and summarizes them into minutes. This done for all 13 questions and attendees may also raise additional questions as well. It's helpful to announce the schedule of the inventory well in advance and also distribute copies of a list of the questions to Group members in advance so that attendees can prepare themselves.

The summarized minutes of the inventory are a good item to bring to a Group conscience meeting for discussion and action.

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: Rachel Ivie

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Wednesday, September 03, 2003 3:34 PM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] AA History: Group conscience question

I have a question. I recall seeing some place an outline for groups to use at a group conscience to evaluate the groups effectiveness. Does anyone know where I can find this. Thanks for your help and for being here.

In His Grip,

Rachel I. Woodstock, Ga.

-----

well as giving the help of fellowship.

© reprinted from Nov. 69 Grapevine

Tradition Two: For our group purpose there is but one ultimate authority - a loving God as he may express Himself in our group conscience. Our leaders are but trusted servants; they do not govern

1. Do I criticize or do I trust and support my group officers, AA committees, and office workers? newcomers? old-timers?
2. Am I absolutely trustworthy, even in secret, with AA twelfth step jobs or other AA responsibility?
3. Do I look for credit in my AA jobs? praise for my AA ideas?
4. Do I have to save face in group discussion, or can I yield in good spirit to the group consensus and work cheerfully along with it?
5. Although I have been sober a few years, am I still willing to serve my turn at AA chores?
6. In group discussions, do I sound off about matters on which I have no experience and little knowledge?

© reprinted from Dec 69 Grapevine

Tradition Three: The only requirement for AA membership is a desire to stop drinking.

1. In my mind, do I prejudge some new AA members as losers?
2. Is there some kind of alcoholic whom I privately do not want in my AA group?
3. Do I set myself up as a judge of whether a newcomer is sincere or phony?
4. Do I let language, religion (or the lack of it), race, education, age, or other such things interfere with my carrying the message?
5. Am I over impressed by a celebrity? By a doctor, a clergyman, an ex-convict? Or can I just treat this new member simply and naturally as one more sick human, like the rest of us?
6. When someone turns up at AA, needing information or help (even if he can't ask for it aloud), does it really matter to me what he does for a living? Where he lives? What his domestic arrangements are?

Whether he has been to AA before? What his other problems are?

© reprinted from Jan 70 Grapevine

Tradition Four: Each group should be autonomous except in matters affecting other groups or AA as a whole.

1. Do I insist that there are only a few right ways of doing things in AA?
2. Does my group always consider the welfare of the rest of AA? Of nearby groups? Of loners in Alaska? Of internationalists miles from port? Of a group in Rome or El Salvador?
3. Do I put down other members behavior when it is different from mine, or do I learn from it?
4. Do I always bear in mind that, to those outsiders who know I am in AA may I to some extent represent our entire beloved fellowship?
5. Am I willing to help a newcomer go to any lengths - his lengths, not mine- to stay sober?
6. Do I share my knowledge of AA tools with other members who may not have heard of them?

© reprinted from Apr 70 Grapevine

Tradition Five: Each group has but one primary purpose - to carry its message to the alcoholic who still suffers.

1. Do I ever cop out by saying, " I'm not a group, so this or that Tradition doesn't apply to me"?
2. Am I willing to explain firmly to a newcomer the limitations of AA help, even if he gets mad at me for not giving him a loan?
3. Have I today imposed on any AA member for a special favor or consideration simply because I am a fellow alcoholic?
4. Am I willing to twelfth-step the next newcomer without regard to who or what is in it for me?
5. Do I help my group in every way I can to fulfill our primary purpose?
6. Do I remember that AA old-timers, too, can be alcoholics who still suffer? Do I try to help them and to learn from them?

© reprinted from June 70 Grapevine

Tradition Six: An AA group ought never endorse, finance, or lend the AA name to any related facility or outside enterprise, lest problems of money, property, and prestige divert us from our primary purpose.

1. Should my fellow group members and I raise money to endow several AA beds in our local hospital?
2. Is it good for a group to lease a small building?
3. Are all the officers and members of our local club for AAs familiar with "Guidelines on Clubs" (which is available free from GSO)?
4. Should the secretary of our group serve on the mayor's advisory committee on alcoholism?
5. Some alcoholics will stay around AA only if we have a TV and card room. If this is what is required to carry the message to them, shouldn't we have these facilities?

© reprinted from Aug. 70 Grapevine

Tradition Seven: Every AA group ought to be fully self-supporting, declining outside contributions.

1. Honestly now, do I do all I can to help AA (my group, my central office, my GSO) remain self-supporting? Could I put a little more into the basket on behalf of the new guy who can't afford it yet? How generous was I when tanked in a barroom?
2. Should the Grapevine sell advertising space to book publishers and drug companies, so it could make a big profit and become a bigger magazine, in full color, at a cheaper price per copy?
3. If GSO runs short on funds some year, wouldn't be okay to let the government subsidize AA groups in hospitals and prisons?
4. Is it more important to get a big AA collection from a few people, or a smaller collection in which more members participate?
5. Is a group's treasurer's report unimportant AA business? How does the treasurer feel about it?
6. How important in my recovery is the feeling of self respect, rather than the feeling of being always under obligation for charity received.

© reprinted from June 70 Grapevine.

Tradition Eight - Alcoholics Anonymous should remain forever non-professional, but our service centers may employ special workers.

1. Is my own behavior accurately described by the Traditions? If not, what needs changing?
2. When I chafe about any particular Tradition, do I realize how it affects others.
3. Do I sometimes try to get some reward - even if not money - for my personal AA efforts.
4. Do I try to sound in AA like an expert on alcoholism? On recovery? On medicine? On sociology? On AA itself? On psychology? On spiritual matters? Or, heaven help me, even on humility?
5. Do I make an effort to understand what AA employees do? What workers in other alcoholism agencies do? Can I distinguish clearly among them?
6. In my own AA life, have I any experiences which illustrate the wisdom of this Tradition?
7. Have I paid enough attention to the book TWELVE STEPS AND TWELVE TRADITIONS? To the pamphlet "AA Tradition - How it Developed"?

© reprinted from Dec 1970 Grapevine

Tradition Nine: A. A. as such, ought never be organized; but we may create service boards or committees directly responsible to those they serve.

1. Do I still try to boss things in A A?
2. Do I resist formal aspects of A A because I fear them as authoritative?
3. Am I mature enough to understand and use all elements of the A A program - even if no one makes me do so - with a sense of personal responsibility?
4. Do I exercise patience and humility in any A A job I take?
5. Am I aware of all those to whom I am responsible in any A A job?

6. Why doesn't every A A group need a constitution and bylaws?
7. Have I learned to step out of an A A job gracefully - and profit thereby - when the time comes?
8. What has rotation to do with anonymity? With humility?

© reprinted from Feb. 1971 Grapevine

Tradition Ten: Alcoholics Anonymous has no opinion on outside issues; hence the A A name ought never be drawn into public controversy.

1. Do I ever give the impression that there really is an "AA opinion" on Antabuse? Tranquilizers? Doctors? Psychiatrists? Churches? Hospitals? Jails? Alcohol? The Federal or state government? Legalizing marijuana? Vitamins? Al-Anon? Alateen?
2. Can I honestly share my own personal experience concerning any of those without giving the impression I am stating the " A A opinion " ?
3. What in A A history gave rise to our Tenth Tradition?
4. Have I had a similar experience in my own A A life?
5. What would A A be without this Tradition? Where would I be?
6. Do I breach this or any of its supporting Traditions in subtle, perhaps unconscious, ways?
7. How can I manifest the spirit of this Tradition in my personal life outside A A? Inside A A?

© reprinted from the May 1971 Grapevine.

Tradition Eleven: Our public relations policy is based on attraction rather than promotion; we need always maintain personal anonymity at the level of press, radio, and films.

1. Do I sometimes promote A A so fanatically that I make it seem unattractive?
2. Am I always careful to keep the confidences reposed in me as an A A member?
3. Am I careful about throwing A A names around - even within the Fellowship?
4. Am I ashamed of being a recovered, or recovering, alcoholic?

5. What would A A be like if we were not guided by the ideas in Tradition eleven? Where would I be?

6. Is my A A sobriety attractive enough that a sick drunk would want such a quality for himself?

© reprinted from the Jul. 1971 Grapevine

Tradition Twelve: Anonymity is the spiritual foundation of all our Traditions, ever reminding us to place principles before personalities.

1. Why is it a good idea for me to place the common welfare of all A A members before individual welfare? What would happen to me if A A as a whole disappeared?

2. When I do not trust A A's current servants, who do I wish had the authority to straighten them out?

3. In my opinions of and remarks about other AAs, am I implying membership requirements other than a desire to stay sober?

4. Do I ever try to get a certain A A group to conform to my standards, not its own?

5. Have I a personal responsibility in helping an A A group fulfill its primary purpose? What is my part?

6. Does my personal behavior reflect the Sixth Tradition - or belie it?

7. Do I do all I can do to support A A financially? When is the last time I anonymously gave away a Grapevine subscription?

8. Do I complain about certain AAs' behavior - especially if they are paid to work for A A? Who made me so smart?

9. Do I fulfill all A A responsibilities in such a way as to please privately even my own conscience? Really?

10. Do my utterances always reflect the Tenth Tradition, or do I give AA critics real ammunition?

11. Should I keep my A A membership a secret, or reveal it in private conversation when that may help another alcoholic (and therefore me)? Is my brand of A A so attractive that other drunks want it?

To the best of my knowledge, what I am calling the Detroit Pamphlet was first produced in Detroit (their Central Service Office still sells copies of it), but there seem to be versions of this pamphlet which were also produced in Washington D.C. very early on, and also on the West Coast. Early A.A.'s traded materials like this back and forth between different parts of the country so freely, that it is often impossible to find out for sure what place actually originally developed the material.

SOURCES:

Foreward to the 50th Anniversary Edition of The Little Red Book (Hazelden, 1996), p. xiv.

Wally P., Back to Basics: The Alcoholics Anonymous Beginners' Meetings. Quotes liberally from what I am calling the Detroit Pamphlet, and refers to this as the teachings of the early Detroit A.A. people, but seems to say in places that these quotes are actually taken from the Washington D.C. printing of that little pamphlet -- Wally P.'s description is not quite clear.

The Detroit Pamphlet material is the real meat of Wally P.'s Back to Basics book -- I always advise people to go back to the original Detroit Pamphlet -- it's much shorter and far less confusing and much more in the original A.A. spirit -- and also works better with beginners, even nowadays. If you want to find out what the good oldtimers actually taught newcomers when they came to their first meetings, the combination of the Little Red Book (which is what you seem to have) and the Detroit Pamphlet will give you a very good flavor of how and what they would have taught you.

Glenn Chesnut (South Bend IN)

----- Original Message -----

From: lent51001

Sent: Wednesday, September 03, 2003 6:17 AM

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoo.com

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] An Interpretation of the Twelve Steps of Alcoholics Anonymous

The book I'm researching came into the possession of a friend some time ago, acquired in treatment from another patient. It's copyright 1946, published by the Coll-Webb company. It is extremely similar to the "Little Red Book". I'm wondering who wrote it, and wether or not it's a first edition. I think under the publishers name is roman numerals for 1948. I heard it could be a periodical publication, but it seems then the copyright would also change every year.

The inside of the front cover is also autographed "To Linda from Bill", and the signature looks identical to those on reprints of alcoholics along already proven lines of their own, there is nothing to be said, save to wish them more and greater success. To those who feel that it is not their problem, it must be said that they are wrong, for frequently they are the first to whom the distraught family, or even the sufferers themselves, turn for comfort and advice. And although they may know nothing about alcoholism now, they can learn enough to be of help. Enough is known, now, enough literature is available, so that no pastor need say he cannot understand alcoholism or the alcoholic. But he needs more than understanding of the problem and its human victims. He needs knowledge of the methods which have been able to help those victims, and then, through his understanding, he will be able to guide them toward the use of such methods.

This is where the majority, who have tried and tried in vain, can turn many of their failures into success. They have had understanding - at least enough to create sympathy and a great desire to help - but they have not had knowledge. Today they can remedy that lack. The National Committee on Alcoholism, 2 East 103rd Street, New York 29, is the distribution center for both general and specific information on alcoholism, and has prepared many pamphlets on various aspects of the problem. It also takes orders for my book, Primer on Alcoholism, recently published by Rinehart & Co. ($2.00), which should be of enormous help in laying a foundation of basic knowledge.

Pastors, like everyone else, must start at the beginning. Their understanding has in most cases been intuitive, based on a love of humanity and an equal love for human beings as individuals, with all their faults and foibles, their tragic mistakes and their tremendous potentialities. Often that understanding has grown out of a real knowledge of the individual concerned, of their fundamental fitness of character, of their great potentiality for good. The pastor who kept on trying with that kind of understanding and its concomitant sympathy, kept going on the hope that his alcoholics would somehow, someday, "be themselves again." That is not enough. That intuitive understanding, fine as it is, must broaden itself and at the same time focus itself, with the aid of knowledge. It must learn to be a constructive understanding, able to teach the object of its sympathy what it knows.

It should be apparent to pastors with that much understanding that there is more to the problem of alcoholism than "moral weakness," and that therefore it will take more than moral strengthening or even the best spiritual guidance and bolstering to be of real help. Science tells us that alcoholism is a disease. Alcoholics Anonymous accepted that definition and uses it with effect on new "prospects" its members are trying to reach. A.A. defines the malady more specifically as "an obsession of the mind coupled with an 'allergy' or the body." The terms disease, malady, obsession, "allergy" - all are used to prove two points to the victim of alcoholism: 1. He is not alone, but is one of countless thousands suffering the identical illness. 2. He needs expert help to get well, just as he would if he had cancer, TB, or diabetes. The pastor could well incorporate this knowledge into his understanding and sympathy with a great gain in its effectiveness on the alcoholic. The greatest gain, however, will come if he can instill hope.

Two things, then, are necessary to constructive understanding, and they are expressed in the first two of the three points made by the National Committee on Alcoholism: 1. That Alcoholism is a disease and the alcoholic is a sick person. 2. The alcoholic can be helped and is worth helping. Next comes specific knowledge.

Psychiatric and psychological treatment have helped many alcoholics. The problem is to find an expert practitioner with a real interest in alcoholism (which usually means that he specializes in it) who can win the confidence and trust of the specific alcoholic who needs his help. It may be a psychiatrist, an analyst, a psychologist, or a lay therapist - the requirements remain the same: that they be expert in their treatment and that they be able to inspire faith in them and their method. In the case of lay therapists who specialize in alcoholism, this last requirement is almost invariably met, for those few who are in practice are themselves recovered alcoholics and the very fact is faith-inspiring to an alcoholic patient. A greater problem, however, is the time and expense involved in this type of treatment, if and when the right doctor or therapist can be found. Most alcoholics have little money to spare, and when sober they either have or need to have work, which means they have little time either. There are cases, however, in which time and money are available and where one or the other of these methods are strongly indicated.

The conditioned reflex method of treatment has also had a good measure of success. Unfortunately, it is not widely given in its most effective form, and the patient will usually have to travel some distance to one of the three or four really good places. While this treatment does not take so much time, it is expensive, so once again it is not the answer for the majority of alcoholics.

Alcoholics Anonymous, however, offers none of these problems. It has had a greater success with a greater number of alcoholics than all the other methods put together. It costs nothing. And it is very nearly everywhere. 100,000 members in 2500 A.A. groups scattered throughout the United States, Canada, and some twenty foreign countries, are ready and eager to help any alcoholic who wants help in recovering from that terrible malady known as alcoholism. In fact they need alcoholics to help, for it is in helping others that they help themselves to stay well. Knowledge about Alcoholics Anonymous, therefore, is probably the most useful knowledge that a pastor could have to implement his understanding. The day may come when pastors and all other groups who have struggled in vain with this hydra-headed problem: the courts, the social agencies, employers, bewildered families, even the doctors themselves, will have all of these methods available at no cost, to be used either singly or in conjunction with each other according to the needs of the individual alcoholic. That day will come when Alcoholic Information Centers and alcoholic clinics are established everywhere. Twenty-two such clinics now exist, located in different parts of the country, from Massachusetts to California. Thirty-five Alcoholic Information Centers are operating, each established by a local Committee for Education on Alcoholism. It is one of the major activities of the National Committee on Alcoholism to promote the establishment of such centers and clinics, and great headway is being made. When the National Committee's three points are finally and completely accepted by the public at large, every city and town will boast its information center and clinic, for the third point insists on action: 3. This is a public health problem and a public responsibility. Pastors can help gain acceptance for these concepts and can help to promote action on them. It is our hope that they will continue to take an active part in this work, as many of them have already done.

Meanwhile they are faced with the problem and must make do with the limited resources at hand. They already know what help they can expect from the Salvation Army, for instance, and how to obtain that help. For many years the Salvation Army was the only group who would extend a helping hand to the alcoholic, especially the down and out one. And they know of the Lutheran Inner Missions and that many of them have made a special effort to help alcoholics. Some social agencies, too, have tried to do more than they could do. It is a proud but pitiful record, the hopeless, ever-hopeful efforts of these groups, and their all too occasional successes. Organized religion in itself, through all denominations, has had occasional success, for a true religious conversion can heal alcoholism as well as other ailments. The difficulty lies in repeating the success with the next alcoholic in the long endless line waiting for help. That chain-reaction did not come until Alcoholics Anonymous came into being.

It is not the purpose of this article to explain the workings of Alcoholics Anonymous as a method of recovery. Such information can be had for the asking by writing them at Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York 17. But there are many practical questions relating to the use of A.A. by other groups such as doctors, ministers, social workers, etc., which are not dealt with in the present A.A. literature. For instance, how can the pastor, in his professional capacity, work with A.A. and get help from it?

First, he will want to know if there is an A.A. group in his area. A letter to the Box 459 address will get him this information immediately, plus a local address to which he can again write for further details. Such a local address is usually just a P.O. Box number, but a letter there will reach the local group secretary who handles inquiries. The pastor should ask for a personal interview, either with the group secretary, or with some member who is willing to call on him and describe the set-up and workings of that local group. It is necessary to point out, especially to professional people used to working with organizations in the usual sense of the word, that A.A.

groups are not organizations in that sense. They are rather loosely-knit fellowships, held together and operating on a purely voluntary and individual basis. No single member, including the secretary, can speak for the group as a whole. He or she can only offer his or her personal cooperation, and that of such other members as signify their interest and willingness to cooperate on that particular job. Therefore it is important that a pastor establish a working relationship with an individual or several individual members on who he can call for assistance. They will frankly tell him just how much he can count on, and describe their own limitations in that area.

Such limitations are obvious to those who are familiar with any A.A. group, but often seem to surprise people newly acquainted with A.A., particularly professional people. A.A. has no magic formula, for instance. Members cannot descend on an unwilling prospect and magic him or her into willingness and cooperation with the program of recovery. As in any other illness, the patient must want to get well - have the "will to live" as doctors phrase it for other maladies. Those who have accepted alcoholism as a disease will recognize this truth if they stop to think a moment. There are cases, however, in which the desire to get well is not evident to the family, friends, or pastor, but is nevertheless there. Sometimes, in such cases, if a meeting can be arranged between the "practicing" alcoholic and an A.A. member, the latter will be able to break through the wall of defiance which the alcoholic has built up against all efforts to help him (and which he calls "pushing him around" and "curtailing his right to live as he wishes"), and bring out the underlying wish to recover. It is my firm belief that very few alcoholics who have actually crossed the line from excessive drinking into true alcoholism, and therefore felt all the agonies and horrors of an exceedingly painful disease, actually wish to continue being like that. They want to get well, but unfortunately what they really want is to be as they used to be, able to drink normally without suffering. They do not know that they are victims of an incurable malady, and that, like diabetics who can never again touch sugar if they are to regain and maintain health, they can never again safely touch alcohol in any form. Once again, if they can be brought to accept alcoholism as a disease they, too, will eventually recognize this truth, and with that recognition, their cooperation in a program of recovery can usually be obtained.

A word of warning is in order here to pastors who are unfamiliar with alcoholism. A.A. cannot, and has no wish to help excessive drinkers back to moderation. It is a program designed specifically for true alcoholics, those who have lost the power of choice in the matter of where, when, and how much they drink, those who, when they drink at all, almost invariably end up in drunkenness. Many people mistakenly lump all drinkers who ever drink to excess under the heading of "alcoholics." Nothing could be further from the truth. Possibly many excessive drinkers, "spree drinkers," "Saturday night drunks," "party drunks," are indeed potential alcoholics in grave danger of crossing the line into true alcoholism, but the A.A. program rarely, if ever, appeals to such drinkers. Education in what alcoholism is, and how nearly they may be approaching it, might conceivably stop them in their tracks, (I have, in fact, seen that happen a few times) but an effort to push them into A.A. usually backfires. A.A. members know this, and through their vast experiences can recognize such drinkers as being outside their province. On the other hand, there are many alcoholics who have only recently crossed the line - or at least, only recently has it been apparent that their drinking has changed - and who have not yet lost anything - job, friends, or family, who can be reached by A.A. These are questions which can best be passed upon by A.A. members, and which the pastor would do well to discuss with them in the light of such knowledge as he has of the case, before either approaching the suspect himself or arranging any contact with A.A.

In short, the pastor's relationship with his local A.A. group should be one of reciprocity, of a free exchange of information and ideas on the particular case for which he desires help. Often the pastor will be able to get the patient interested in A.A. before he brings an A.A. member on the scene. It is assumed that he will have made every effort to learn about and thoroughly understand the workings of A.A. first; that he will have attended many meetings and talked with many members in addition to having read all the literature. In that case he should be able to vividly describe the set-up and the people in terms which will appeal to the alcoholic. He will be able to arouse his curiosity and at the same time to allay his fears, for he will have learned that there are no "musts" and no "dont's" in A.A., but only a great willingness to pass on the tricks of the trade" which have enabled the members to get sober and stay sober, and a great eagerness to accept newcomers as instant equals and as members in good standing from the moment of their entrance.

The pastor will also have discovered that he, himself, cannot do an A.A. job on the alcoholic. He will see with his own eyes at meetings and at interviews he may witness, that the man or woman who has actually been through the appalling experiences of alcoholism has an edge on him that no substitute knowledge can replace. For one thing, the sober A.A. member is the embodiment of hope. He is the living promise that it can be done. He makes faith in the possibility of recovery a thing that can be seen and touched and heard - himself. And, step by step, he can tell not how it can be done, but how he did it. The psychological value of such an object lesson for a helpless, hopeless sufferer cannot be matched. The nearest that the pastor can come to this is to relate a vivid and accurate story of the rehabilitation through A.A. of another alcoholic whom he personally knew. If he has that A.A. member's permission to give his name and to produce him as the first contact with A.A., the effect will be even better.

Of course it should be made clear that A.A. members are in no sense trained experts, nor do they make any such claim. They are strictly amateurs, but amateurs with a difference. In a field where all too few trained experts exist, the man with experience is in a unique position. And in this case the experience itself is unique: it is inside knowledge which gives its possessor an inside track to the heart of the problem involved.

Nevertheless, in spite of all these advantages; a sound program which has thoroughly proven itself, and specially qualified exponents of that program, A.A. does not claim 100% success. There are alcoholics who cannot be reached by this method (a rough estimate is 75% success) and this fact must be recognized. Then, too, there are those who are primarily mental cases with alcoholism as one of their symptoms -they are not good A.A. material.

Another word of warning comes to mind. The pastor should never forget that all alcoholics are consumed with guilt. They do not need to be scolded and lectured, or reminded of their sins. They have suffered pangs of remorse over their own behavior and what it has done to those who love them as well as themselves, that are beyond the comprehension of normal people. In fact, their mental suffering, their guilt if you like, is abnormally acute, and therefore abnormally agonizing. These feelings of unbearable guilt are so much a part of the picture of alcoholism that many alcoholics drink because of them; in other words, they cannot bear to be sober, and remember clearly the things they have done. They endure torments inexpressible save by a Dante whenever they think clearly.... at least until time has dimmed the recollections. This state of affairs, incidentally, explains the alcoholic's reluctance, often downright refusal, to talk about his problem when he has been sober for a while. It is unbearable for him to look clearly at his memories. They hurt too much.

The pastor who understands this will not preach when an alcoholic comes to him for help. If he is a man of true compassion, he will be hard put to it not to overdo his proffered comfort. An attitude of objective sympathy and real comprehension - the opposites of condemnation and contempt - will prove the most helpful. Ministers perhaps do not realize that in the minds of the alcoholic whom they are anxious to help, they themselves offer the greatest obstacle. The reason is simple. The alcoholic considers himself a pretty low fellow when he looks squarely at his drinking problem and his behavior because of it. He may try to avoid such a conclusion, but in his heart he has admitted it. The minister, on the other hand, is a symbol of good. He stands for righteousness and upright behavior in the middle of his parishioners. He is a Godly man - in fact he stands for the voice of God in his Church. The alcoholic who goes to his pastor for help, in effect is bringing himself to judgement. If he has been persuaded or forced to go to his pastor by his family, he is being brought by them for judgment. And he does not want judgment by any man, even a man of God, for he has already judged himself and found himself wanting. What is more, judgment will not help him, as he has already discovered. What he needs is comfort, enlightenment, and hope. The pastor who can offer these can be really effective with alcoholics, can properly prepare them for the supreme effort they themselves must make in order to recover. In giving such comfort and hope, he can and should be pretty tough under the heading of enlightenment -

he should never minimize the desperate seriousness of alcoholism, its progressive nature, its possible fatal end. He can stress the comparative hopelessness of any victim of such a terrifying disease attempting to cope with it unaided, even though his own intensive effort is essential if he is to use such aid.

Here, then, are some suggested techniques for getting an alcoholic interested in A.A.: a thorough familiarity with A.A.; an understanding of alcoholism and an acceptance of it as an illness (that it is a spiritual sickness as well as a mental and physical one, no A.A. member will deny); acceptance of the fact that he, the minister, can rarely ever do the whole job himself; the presentation of A.A. not as an abstract philosophy nor as a miracle-working mystical something, but in the form of a humanized personal story of what it did for someone real and live, who can be produced in the flesh; the offering of comfort, hope, and a straight-from-the-shoulder enlightenment. Now the pastor is ready to either produce an A.A. member for a private interview with his alcoholic, or to take the alcoholic to an A.A. meeting and there introduce him to several members, in both cases turning him over for A.A. to finish the job.

Do the wrong methods still need to be enumerated? There are a few glaring ones that perhaps should be further pointed up. First and foremost, do not preach - or indicate to the alcoholic what a miserable sinner he is. He knows it. Do not attempt to take over the whole job of regenerating this poor devil - unless you want a large proportion of your time and energy taken up with small chance of success after all your pains. Once you have led him, (or her) into A.A., let go. In A.A. they say, "let go and let God." It's not impossible that A.A. may lead him more directly to God than you could. In which case, incidentally, he will return to you - eagerly, and full of gratitude for your guidance.

This brings us directly to the question of what does and does not work in speaking of religion to an alcoholic. A.A. of course has a spiritual basis: the words Higher Power or God are used in six of the twelve steps of the program. Of vital importance, however, is the fact that following the word God in Step 3 are the words, "As we understood Him" - in caps for greater emphasis. This takes into account the extreme individuality of the alcoholic, and the never-to-be-forgotten fact that each one must be treated as an individual case, according to his or her specific needs. There is no effort in A.A. to force the spiritual part of the program on a newcomer, and in many cases this is the last thing about A.A. to be accepted. Too many alcoholics have gone completely away from their religious connections, either drifted away or in some cases deliberately turned their backs upon all things religious. In such cases it is most unwise to stress religious or spiritual matters, it would merely serve to close the door on that person's chances for recovery. A.A. believes in leaving the door open, the wider the better, allowing the newcomer to make use of the purely psychological steps, the group therapy, and the social benefits of A.A. until such time as he or she is ready to progress a bit further. That time, incidentally, always comes.

In the case of the pastor, he will undoubtedly know the religious status and attitude of the alcoholic he is trying to help, and can be guided accordingly in speaking of spiritual matters. If he is not sure of the alcoholic's attitude he would be wise to understate the spiritual aspects, not only of A.A., but of his own interest in the case. One thing almost every alcoholic is terrified of is "being prayed over," as they put it. Some of them, who have read the A.A. literature and especially the twelve steps, stay away from meetings for some time for fear that will happen when they go there. Possibly they do not feel worthy of such efforts at the time they are asking for help! Certainly I have heard many of them say, "If I could not appeal to God when things weren't too bad, or thank Him when they were good, I have no right to ask Him for help when everything seems lost." Most of them, however, would probably put praying along with preaching - it only increases their sense of guilt at a time when they can't stand it.

The pastor who feels it is his bound duty to act as a spiritual mentor to an alcoholic who come to him, could perhaps succeed if he could recall out of his own experience some time of deep crisis or personal suffering in which he found comfort from his faith, and could tell that story simply and directly. In other words, if he could come down from his symbolic mountain above the battle and meet the tormented soul of the alcoholic on its own level of suffering, that soul could perhaps accept comfort from him and gain some of his faith.

Most of the foregoing has taken for granted the existence of an A.A. group within reach of the minister who wishes to make use of it. But there may be some towns where A.A. has not yet started. The pastor who finds himself in such a situation need not give up hope. It takes two alcoholics trying to get well to make a group, but only one alcoholic trying to get well to start a group. If the pastor knows even one alcoholic whom he thinks really wants to stop drinking, he can very well help him to start an A.A. group. But he must always remember that it is the alcoholic who is starting the group, and not himself. In other words, he should remain in the background, ready to offer advice and assistance but not taking a prominent part in the activities of the one, two, or three alcoholics who are trying to get started. His greatest usefulness will always be in providing new prospects for the first ones to work on, in spreading the word around among his colleagues, and even in actually bringing the A.A. and the new prospect together. Possibly he will have trouble getting his first man - or woman. If he finds that talking it over and giving them all the literature and such suggestions as he may have derived from it are not enough to get that one started, he can take a further step. Correspondence with the A.A. central office or the nearest group, may bring a visit from a travelling A.A. who can call on the alcoholic, or he may be able to take his alcoholic on a visit to the nearest group. Ten years ago when there were not many groups, a Catholic priest in St. Louis shepherded several alcoholics whom he was trying to interest in A.A. up to Chicago where they could see it for themselves. The St. Louis group was started.

There is an important point here which needs re-emphasizing. A pastor may be vital to the starting of an A.A. group, but he will remain important to that group just so long as he does not try to take it over, just so long as he stays in the background. Non-alcoholics cannot successfully run A.A. groups. A.A. has been well called a "self-help" fellowship. This is particularly true of ministers, since if the group were too closely associated with a man of religion it might keep out agnostics, and a large portion of alcoholics think they are just that. They must get into the group to find out differently, and they will not come in if they think it is a religious outfit. Then, too, a close association with any one denomination might keep members of other faiths away, and A.A. has no particular creed, faith, or denomination - it numbers all of them within its ranks.

One more word, I think, needs to be said. Many ministers have asked me if A.A. drew people away from their church. Quite the contrary. Those who had a church, from which they had probably drifted away, almost invariably return to it. Some who had never had a church connection, make one after a while in A.A. A large proportion still had a connection, although most likely it was a tenuous one - such A.A. members can become very good church members. There is no conflict whatever between A.A. and the church - any church.

|||||

+++Message 1284. . . . . How early AA"s introduced themselves at meetings
From: Glenn Chesnut . . . . . 9/3/2003 10:25:00 PM

|||||

The question was asked by Larry in New Mexico, "How did the tradition of introducing ourselves as an alcoholic at meetings get started?"

Sgt. Bill S. (Sonoma CA), who celebrated 55 years of sobriety in July, has just published a book telling about his early years in the program, and touches on this topic in one of his chapters. The book is a goldmine of information about early A.A. Bill started the first officially sanctioned military alcoholism treatment programs in the U.S. He was aided by Mrs. Marty Mann, and also spent a year studying the way that Sister Ignatia ran her treatment program at St. Thomas Hospital in Akron. He achieved a fifty percent success rate in the alcoholism treatment program he ran at Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas, during the early 1950's.

In Chapter 12, "Getting Sober: July 5, 1948," Sgt. Bill S. says:

As I began spreading the message [in 1948] among other alcoholics there at Mitchell Air Force Base [on Long Island, just a few miles from New York city], and taking them to A.A. meetings at Valley Stream and Hempstead and other towns in the vicinity of our base, all of us found a friendly, welcoming atmosphere. The civilian A.A. members were outgoing, and extended us the kind of support which made us feel like we truly belonged. It removed our feelings of rejection and isolation, and helped turn our lives around.

The meetings in those days were somewhat different from the present ones. There were both open meetings, and closed meetings for alcoholics only, just as there are nowadays. But the format was different. There was no reading of the preamble at the beginning, for example. On the east coast, in and around New York city, we introduced ourselves by saying, "My name is _____ ; my sobriety date is _____ ." In those days, I think that introducing yourself by saying, "My name is _____ ; I am an alcoholic" was more midwestern, and may have come out of Akron, but I am not sure. When I went out to California later on, in 1965, and would introduce myself in meetings by giving my name and sobriety date, people just thought I was doing that because I was bragging, so I switched over to the other style.

I do not really think that things like this are very important though. When people in A.A. begin worrying too much about this sort of thing, it becomes like the kind of traditional dogmatic religion where the members are terrified that they will be condemned if they use the wrong word in some ritual phrase. A.A. is concerned with spirituality, and was not intended to be some new, rule-bound, legalistic set of doctrines and dogmas and complex rituals. No one ever resolved crippling subconscious conflicts, nor do people ever heal the resentments, fears and guilt which are destroying their happiness and their lives, by repeating a handful of mechanical words and phrases over and over. You remember that I had learned how to "say words" in A.A. meetings back in Warren, Ohio, in 1946, but I still kept on feeling bad about myself, and after less than three months, went back to drinking again.

SOURCES:

Sgt. Bill S., On the Military Firing Line in the Alcoholism Treatment Program: The Air Force Sergeant Who Beat Alcoholism and Taught Others to Do the Same (Hindsfoot Foundation/iUniverse, August 2003).

See also the sections on Sgt. Bill's work in:

Nancy Olson, With a Lot of Help from Our Friends: The Politics of Alcoholism, Hindsfoot Foundation/iUniverse, March 2003, which also talks about Capt. Joe Zuska's extremely successful work with alcoholics in the Navy later on in the 1960's.

Sally Brown and David R. Brown, A Biography of Mrs. Marty Mann: The First Lady of Alcoholics Anonymous (Hazelden, 2001), for the connection with Company on the title page is 1948, it is presumably not a first printing which you have, but some later printing (second or third printing, or something like that).

Hazelden claims on their copyright page that their version (the one that is currently in print) is taken straight from the original 1946 Coll-Webb version.

You can click on this Indiana University web link and obtain downloadable copies of some other early A.A. pamphlets of this sort from their collection:

<http://mypage.iusb.edu/~gchesnut/hs00.html>

The Detroit Pamphlet has on its title page, "Alcoholics Anonymous: An Interpretation of the Twelve Steps," but I do not believe it was ever printed by Coll-Webb, and it is a very short ! pamphlet, around 12 pages or so when it is printed as a little! booklet . If you want to compare your book with that, you can find the Detroit Pamphlet at that Indiana University web site:

<http://mypage.iusb.edu/~gchesnut/hsdetr0.html>

To the best of my knowledge, what I am calling the Detroit Pamphlet was first produced in Detroit (their Central Service Office still sells copies of it), but there seem to be versions of this pamphlet which were also produced in Washington D.C. very early on, and also on the West Coast. Early A.A.'s traded materials like this back and forth between different parts of the country so freely, that it is often impossible to find out for sure what place actually originally developed the material.

SOURCES:

Foreward to the 50th Anniversar! y Edition of The Little Red Book (Hazelden, 1996), p. xiv.

Wally P., Back to Basics: The Alcoholics Anonymous Beginners' Meetings. Quotes liberally from what I am calling the Detroit Pamphlet, and refers to this as the teachings of the early Detroit A.A. people, but seems to say in places that these quotes are actually taken from the Washington D.C. printing of that little pamphlet -- Wally P.'s description is not quite clear.

The Detroit Pamphlet material is the real meat of Wally P.'s Back to Basics book -- I always advise people to go back to the original Detroit Pamphlet -- it's much shorter and far less confusing and much more in the original A.A. spirit -- and also works better with beginners, even nowadays. If you want to find out what the good oldtimers actually taught newcomers when they came to their first meetings, the combinati! on of the Little Red Book (which is what you seem to have) and! the Det roit Pamphlet will give you a very good flavor of how and what they would have taught you.

Glenn Chesnut (South Bend IN)

----- Original Message -----

From: lent51001

Sent: Wednesday, September 03, 2003 6:17 AM

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] An Interpretation of the Twelve Steps of Alcoholics Anonymous

The book I'm researching came into the possession of a friend some time ago, acquired in treatment from another patient. It's copyright 1946, published by the Coll-Webb company. It is! extremely similar to the "Little Red Book". I'm wondering who wrote it, and wether or not it's a first edition. I think under the publishers name is roman numerals for 1948. I heard it could be a periodical publication, but it seems then the copyright would also change every year.

The inside of the front cover is also autographed "To Linda from Bill", and the signature looks identical to those on reprints of other photos autographed by Bill W.

----- Yahoo! Groups Sponsor ----->
Buy Ink Cartridges or Refill Kits for Your HP, Epson, Canon or Lexmark Printer at Myinks.com. Free s/h on orders $50 or more to the US & Canada. <http://www.c1tracking.com/l.asp?cid=5511>
<http://us.click.yahoo.com/l.m7sD/LIdGAA/qnsNAA/219oIB/TM>
----->

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email ! to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

!
Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to <http://docs.yahoo.com/info/terms/>

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to the Yahoo! Terms of Service [2] .

Hello,

The First General Service Conference took place in 1951 and the 12 & 12 was printed in 1953. So there was a conference before this book was published. My copy of the Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions 10th printing 1971 clearly states it is "Conference Approved." At the very first General Service Conference in 1951, it was agreed that any published items by the Alcoholic Foundation be Conference Approved. Here is page 15 from the 1951 Conference Report.

Hope this helps.

Charles from California

-----
General Service Conference - 1951

CONFERENCE ADVISORY ACTIONS

*****

Six subjects were put before the Conference at its closing session by the Committee on Agenda. The Committee reported that it had considered a long list of items on which it would be useful to have an expression of Conference opinion and that the six subjects selected were "chosed deemed to be of particular importance at the present time.

1. "Should non-alcoholics continue to serve on the Board of Trustees of the Alcoholic Foundation?"

The Conference voted affirmatively, with complete unanimity.

2. "This Conference feels that in future years A.A. textbook literature should have Conference approval."

The Conference voted, affirmatively, with complete unanimity.

Prior to the vote on this subject, it was pointed out that adoption of the suggestion would not preclude the continued issuance of various printed documents by non-Foundation sources. No desire to review, edit or censor non-Foundation material is implied. The objective is to provide, in the future, a means of distinguishing Foundation literature from that issued locally or by non-A.A. interests.

3. "It is the sense of this Conference that the alcoholic members of the Board of Trustees ought to have a fixed term of office."

The Conference voted affirmatively, with complete unanimity.

4. "Should attendance at next year's Conference sessions be United to members only?"

The Conference voted affirmatively, with complete unanimity.

(In addition to delegates. Conference members include Trustees of the Alcoholic Foundation and accredited staff members of the General Service Office and. the Grapevine.)

5. "It is the sense of this Committee that the subject of A.A. auxiliaries or family groups should, be taken back to local groups for further discussion and be considered at the 1952 General Service Conference."

The Conference voted, affirmatively to support the opinion of the Committee.

----- Original Message -----

From: jenny andrews

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Tuesday, September 02, 2003 3:46 AM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Conference approval

Neither the 12 and 12 nor Big Book (first three editions) were AA Conference-approved - presumably because there was no Conference to approve them when they were published. Can anyone tell me when Conference first began approving AA literature, and whether a decision was taken at a Conference to endorse previous publications and decisions for which the Alcoholic Foundation was responsible. Laurie A.

---

Express yourself with cool emoticons - download MSN Messenger today!
<http://www.msn.co.uk/messenger>

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to the Yahoo! Terms of Service [2]

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

members.

The one-man "group," in McLean, Tex., reports that a number of A.A.s from Amarillo came to McLean to assist him in holding the first open meeting in that town.

..

.

San Francisco A.A.s are now so numerous that they have to rent Druids' Hall for central meetings. A picnic in July, a fish fry this month, and a "Days of '49" party in September are highlights of their social activities during the summer. .

..

A.A.s of the Washington State Penitentiary Group (Walla Walla) are setting up a small library of their own. . . . Three California judges spoke at a meeting of the Los Angeles Group which was attended by about 400 people. They are Justice Thomas P. White, California Court of Appeals; Superior Court Judge John Gee Clark, and Municipal Judge Robert Clifton.

Three A.A.s from Chicago and one from South Bend attended a meeting of the A.A.s in the Indiana State Prison in Michigan City. . . . The Nashville, Tenn., Group has recently opened club rooms at 308½ Fifth Ave. North, in the heart of the business section. They are open daily until midnight.

After driving to A.A. meetings in January, 1944, in Oklahoma City, a resident of Tulsa decided to see if there were not enough Tulsans who would like to give the program a whirl. In May, 1944., he and two other alcoholics met. That was the first session of the Tulsa A.A. Group, which celebrated its second anniversary in its own club rooms at 114½ North Denver Ave. this year. During the first year, the membership stood at 33, compared to the 97 men and women on the rolls today. . . . the noted

Philadelphia neuro-psychiatrist, Dr. C. Nelson Davis, was guest speaker at a meeting of the Lehigh Valley, Pa., Group, which maintains club rooms in Allentown. . .

the newly organized Bronxville, N. Y. A.A.s held their first open meeting in the Bronxville Public Library.

The group at Hays, Kansas, now numbers 28 active members, which is encouraging

growth

for a comparatively short time, especially in a small community. . . . The Sioux

City, Iowa, Group now has more than 100 members.

Down in Monterrey, Mexico, a Group of 25 has resulted from correspondence (in Spanish) with a Spanish-speaking A.A. in Cleveland. The Group began a little over a year ago when a woman in Monterrey wrote the Cleveland downtown office asking

for help for her husband. . . . Outdoor eating is high on the popularity list in the Cleveland area. Groups holding annual picnics or breakfasts include Canton, Massillon, Borton, and Euclid-Wade. The last one celebrated its fourth anniversary in late July. . . . the Tulare, Calif., Group is now three months old, having started in May with the help of members from the Los Angeles Central Sunday Night Group.

Tulare

A.A.s occasionally hold meetings with the members working in Giant Forest, Sequoia

National Park.

On station WFIL a member of the Philadelphia Group recently outlined A.A. on a regular variety show called "This Week in Philadelphia." . . . the Group in Ann Arbor, Mich., is one of many cooperating with theaters and newspapers during the showing of the March of Time feature, "Problem Drinkers," the first public film record of A.A. work. Stories in Ann Arbor newspapers about the movie refer interested readers to the local Group for further information and help. . . .

Incidentally,
Westbrook Van Voorhis, the "voice" in MOT films, recently spoke about
"Problem
Drinkers" to the Cleveland Advertising Club.

A three-member team of Palo Alto, Calif., A.A.s recently explained the 12 Steps
at their First Methodist Church. Other Groups that have furnished speakers for non-alcoholic meetings lately include those in Westport and Bridgeport, Conn.;
Scotch
Plains, N. J.; Hanover, Pa.; Columbia, S. C.; and Eau Claire, Wis.

The Monroe County (Rochester, N. Y.) Group held a forum on the part played by
the wife in the rehabilitation of an alcoholic husband. These A.A.s report a 50% increase in membership over a period of a few weeks. . . . Six founders of the New Rochelle
Group spoke at their second anniversary meeting, which was attended by A.A.s
from White Plains, Mt. Vernon, Peekskill, Yonkers, Mt. Kisco, and Bronxville. . .

.
Over
125 members from Kingston, Central Valley, New Paltz, Newburgh and New York City
attended a dinner party in Croton-on-Hudson sponsored by Peekskill A.A.s.

Doctors, clergymen, city officials and social workers were present at an "educational" open meeting conducted by the Mt. Vernon, N. Y., Group. . . .

When
the Twin City Group ( Benton Harbor-St. Joseph, Mich.) celebrated its first anniversary with a dinner in St. Joseph, 160 delegates attended from Kalamazoo, Elkhart, South
Bend, Chicago, Mishawaka and LaPorte. This Group holds its weekly meetings over
a Sunday breakfast and has planned a vigorous program for its second year. . .

.
Wilmington, Del., members heard an address by the Rev. Dr. J. Francis Tucker, pastor of St. Anthony's Church there, on a program which also included talks by two Philadelphia A.A.s.

cause a harrowing of soul. It has at times led me to the despairful conviction that my moral weakness, was such as to cut me off forever from the goodness my mind saw and my heart desired. It has brought me - a man with an unusually thorough training in philosophy and theology - to making distinctions between the application of the moral teaching of my Church and the intention of God. Many times my uncontrolled craving for alcohol has dominated, even obliterated, every other consideration, including that of my own welfare, the welfare of any other human being, and my relationship to my Creator and Redeemer.

Unlike non-Catholic alcoholics, I did not taste the dregs of those years in the pain caused to family and friends, in the betrayals of trust, in the thousands of mean deceptions, or in the repeated social degradations. Those did hurt. But engulfing them all and reducing them to items of minor importance, was the unspeakable terror of feeling cut off from goodness and from God - the terror, quite literally, of Hell. Beside it, nothing else mattered.

And all this went on, mind you, while I was living an outwardly adequate, active Catholic life. There are people who have known me all those years who do not to this moment know that I am an alcoholic, others who only know it at second-hand. That was possible because my particular "pattern" of drinking did not involve disappearances for days or weeks at a time. It was rather a question of extending an evening (sometimes a mid-day) drinking session into the following dawn and then stumbling through the next day by a series of subterfuges. My career could be portrayed by the endless repetition of one picture: a man pushing himself up from the gutter, walking dazedly for a few steps, refreshing himself with deep breaths of clean air till he was striding forward with vigorous resolve only to trip over his own feet and land back on his face.

By a certain gratuitous grace of God, I kept getting up, and each time I got to my feet I was absolutely certain I would stay up. The certainty was sometimes belied within hours.

I tried the Sacraments. Between drinking bouts I made frequent and intensive use of the channels of grace available to me. They did not seem to help.

When not drinking, I was a daily communicant, I did a lot of spiritual reading, I made frequent retreats, I have knelt far into the night saying the rosary with arms outstretched in penance and petition.

But I have come from a private closed retreat made with the utmost fervor and devotion - and walked into the first saloon I met. I have frequently been at Holy Communion in the morning and drunk the same night. I have seen my rosary emptied out on a police blotter with my tie, my belt and the contents of my pockets, before I was led off to a cell.

This went on for years with something under two weeks - and that only attained once - as my record period of abstinence.

Then a few months ago, on the advice of friends and with their assistance, I quite suddenly broke the pattern and stopped drinking. I did it by the combined use of two of the techniques recently evolved for the rehabilitation of alcoholics. That is, I followed one of the treatments against a background of knowledge of and contact with the other.

It is now an established fact that I have gone without alcohol for a much longer period than ever since the drinking started. My drinking has been arrested. I have not been cured of alcoholism. I am still an alcoholic and a moment of carelessness or over-confidence could start me back on the old cycle within an hour of writing these words. But I am not drinking. I am doing my best to fulfill my duty to myself, to my fellow man and to God. I am, within the limitations of human nature and my own temperament, at peace.

That is a fact and the fact raises some questions.

How is it that the natural means succeeded when the supernatural means failed? If a man can resist the "compulsion" to drink because he has taken a pill that will make him violently ill if he does drink, why can he not resist it because it will land him in Hell? Or, to put it positively, is the pill a greater help than the grace of God?

If a man can stop drinking because another man convinces him he is an alcoholic and one drink means disaster, why can he not stop when a priest tells him that he has a chronic weakness and is bound under pain of mortal sin to avoid the occasion of sin?

If a man can stop drinking because other alcoholics have done it before him and are willing to help him do the same, why can he not deny himself when Christ, the saints and his whole Church tell him that it is the only way to salvation and they are willing to help him along it?

If a man can stop drinking by following twelve rules of conduct laid down by two drunks, why can he not stop it by following the ten commandments and the moral and ascetic teaching of his faith?

One answer can be given to all these questions if we take them in their absolute sense, "he can." But we do not live in absolutes. The unfortunate fact of experience is that the man doesn't and he doesn't because he can't. That is neither theory nor excuse. It is a cold fact of experience to which I and thousands like me can attest. Most non-alcoholics must, with all the good will in the world, find it difficult, if not impossible, to accept this declaration of powerlessness over the habit. Common sense and their own experience of fighting against desire tell them that the reason the man can not is that he will not. His love of the pleasurable, they can scarcely avoid concluding, is greater than his desire for the good. He is, whatever the cause or however you dress up the conditions, a moral weakling. He is a sinner, unwilling to be separated from his sin. This is quite understandable and reasonable attitude has in the past done irreparable harm to the victim of alcoholism by plunging him, each time he met it, further and further down the ever-descending spiral of his despair. It is still all too prevalent; but the harm it does is no longer irreparable. For today the alcoholic finds his hitherto unheeded avowal of helplessness supported by an army of scientifically established evidence that no just man who studies it will contest. This evidence comes from the research of physicians, psychologists, and latterly -thanks be to God! - such Catholic moralists as Father John C. Ford, S.J.

Theological Study of the Problem

Immediately upon bringing in the name of a Catholic moralist, I must again stress that there is no question of the absolute impossibility of an alcoholic's stopping drinking "only" by spiritual motives and supernatural aid. That would be absurd and contrary to fact. There has been a glorious parade of unsung Matt Talbots. The question is one of moral responsibility which may be rooted either in subjective failure to understand and/or co-operate intelligently with the spiritual and the supernatural, or in some objective defect in necessary concomitants to the ordinary channels through which spiritual and supernatural aid reach the ordinary Catholic.

The nature and extent of this "moral impossibility" is obviously a question of great importance for the alcoholic and for his confessor or anyone else who wants to help him. Before offering an opinion on it out of my own experience and knowledge, I should like to lay the ground by a brief discussion from an alcoholic's point of view of a recent work of Father Ford's. For, in this paper, Depth Psychology, Morality and Alcoholism (Weston College, Weston 93, Mass., 1.00$), the eminent Jesuit moralist discusses the present state of knowledge on Depth Psychology (with its much quoted findings about compulsive behavior) and on alcoholism as a disease. After separating what may be regarded as scientifically established fact from what is not certainly such, he deals first with the general question of subjective morality in the light of depth psychology and then with the particular question of subjective responsibility in alcoholism.

The paper (reprinted from the Proceedings of the Fifth Annual Meeting of The Catholic Theological Society of America, held at Washington last summer) is divided into two parts: "Depth Psychology and Morality" and "Alcoholism." Father Ford states that the two parts are "not closely related to one another," a statement which can only be accepted, on the evidence of the author's own findings in the second part, after a somewhat nice distinction of the meaning of the word "closely."

It begins with what to the non-expert seems to be an impartial presentation of unconscious motivation as described in the Freudian and derived systems. After distinguishing three levels in the Freudian system - metaphysics, psychology and therapeutics - it quotes from Catholic psychiatrists who find much that is good on the latter two levels of Freudian thinking. These Catholics include Father Jean Rimbaud who says, in the words of Father Ford's summary, "Psychoanalysis, apart from its errors and excesses, has discovered a new man. It makes the treatise De Actibus Humanis more or less obsolete. At least it must all be rewritten lest we base our morality on something illusory - a 'man' or 'conscience' that does not exist." Then Father Ford presents a convincing mass of reputable opinion, Catholic and non-Catholic, which makes the Freudian school suspect of the capital scientific sin of treating an hypothesis, as an established fact and accuses it of the error of making the abnormal the norm of the normal.

In offering his conclusions as a moralist, Father Ford wisely waves any claim to pass upon the scientific issue. He says: "Unconscious motivation as described in the Freudian and derived systems is a controversial theory, not yet established, nor agreed upon by psychologists generally - hence the moralist is not forced to re-write his treatise De Actibus Humanis in the light of that psychology. But even if it is accepted that unconscious motivation exists and influences notably our conscious human activity, there is no proof that it eliminates or notably impairs the freedom of our everyday deliberate decisions. The direct testimony of the conscience of the individual agent in his individual acts is, up to this moment, a better criterion of subjective morality than the quicksands of depth psychology."

That is no new conclusion, but it is refreshing to find it arrived at with such patient and understanding study of contrary opinion.

The second part of the essay gets to immediate grips with the special problem of alcoholism in these words: "Whereas the first part of our essay dealt with subjective responsibility in normal individuals, it should become apparent from the present discussion that the alcoholic is not a normal individual where responsibility for his drinking is concerned. He is across the line on the abnormal side and his drinking is correctly termed pathological."

Before going further, Father Ford throws off the casual statement that "psychoanalysis has been unsuccessful with alcoholism." I am sure the author could defend this. But I feel equally certain that proportionately as many psychiatrists would resent it as would priests that other generalization, "religion has been unsuccessful with alcoholism." Both dissenting groups would be likely to borrow words from Chesterton and reply, "It has not failed. It has not been tried."

Distinction between Drunkenness and Alcoholism

The first important point established by Father Ford is the distinction between mere drunkenness and its morality and the morality of alcoholism. He says: "Alcoholism is not the same thing as drunkenness; not even the same thing as excessive drinking; nor even the same thing as excessive drinking over a long period of time." For, as he points out, there are people who can do all these things without becoming alcoholics. They can stop if they want to, much as a man with a long habit of smoking can give it up.

The author proceeds from here with an authoritative and completely accurate discussion of the nature of alcoholism. Since it was not within his intention, he did not dwell upon the implications and the consequences, therapeutic and moral, of the distinction between drunkenness and morality. From my own experience and the experience and knowledge of others, I know that acceptance of this distinction and an attitude based on such acceptance form the all-important first step that must be taken by both the victim of alcoholism and by anyone who would aid in his rehabilitation. It is a hard step for both parties to take. The first is extremely unwilling to admit that he is not as other men - that he is an alcoholic. The second, if he is a non-alcoholic, cannot for the life of him see why the other cannot pull himself together and put an end to his bad habit. Each can overcome his different obstacles to taking the step if he has good will, is willing to make inquiry and accept authority.

For the alcoholic, or the person who suspects he may be an alcoholic, the handiest way of making inquiry might be the twenty-questions test, devised by Dr. Seliger, formerly of Johns Hopkins University, and cited in a footnote to Father Ford's paper:

(1) Do you lose time from work due to drinking? (2) Is drinking making your home life unhappy? (3) Do you drink because you are shy with other people? (4) Is drinking affecting your reputation? (5) Have you ever felt remorse after drinking? (6) Have you ever gotten into financial difficulties as a result of drinking? (7) Do you turn to lower companions and an inferior environment when drinking? (8) Does your drinking make you careless of your family's welfare? (9) Has your ambition decreased since drinking? (10) Do you crave a drink at a definite time daily? (11) Do you want a drink the next morning? (12) Does your drinking cause you to have difficulty in sleeping? (13) Has your efficiency decreased since drinking? (14) Is drinking jeopardizing your job or business? (15) Do you drink to escape from worries or troubles? (16) Do you drink alone? (17) Have you ever had a complete loss of memory due to drinking? (18) Has your physician ever treated you for drinking? (19) Do you drink to build up self-confidence? (20) Have you ever been to a hospital or institution on account of drinking?

Father Ford sets forth general medical and psychiatric agreement that alcoholism is a twofold disease of the body and of the mind. Then he indicates the extent to which efforts to determine the causes of each of these ills have gone. "There is good reason for believing that there is a psychological basis for the alcoholism of many alcoholics; that there is a bodily pathology which contributes to their condition. But there is no unanimity yet among scientific men as to the existence of these factors; nor have they succeeded in identifying them to everyone's satisfaction, but we can assert with probability that alcoholism is a bodily disease in many alcoholics. This is the sense in which it may be called a bodily disease." In what sense is it called a disease of the mind? "Not in the sense that alcoholics are insane, although, as already mentioned, among alcoholics there are psychotic individuals, and there are some who as a partial result of their alcoholism suffer from delirium tremens, or hallucinations, or Korsakoff's psychosis, etc. But when we say alcoholism is a disease, or disorder, or sickness of a mental kind we mean that the drinking itself is to a greater or lesser degree compulsive. Many psychiatrists describe it as psychoneurosis of the obsessive-compulsive type. On this point - the compulsive character of the alcoholic's drinking - I believe there is great unanimity among all the psychiatrists and other specialists in the field."

In the course of discussing this compulsion, Father Ford makes a statement which I, as an alcoholic, would beg you, a non-alcoholic, to accept even if you do not understand how it can be so. He writes: "There are times when the alcoholic reaches for a drink blindly and compulsively even when he has had nothing to drink for a considerable period. I was not ready to believe this at first. But after listening to hundreds of alcoholics tell their stories, and after questioning many of them on that very point, I am convinced that not only after having had some drinks but even after a considerable period of sobriety the alcoholic reaches out compulsively and blindly for the first drink."

That statement is stark truth and the compulsion and blindness take many forms. In my own experience, after having "dropped in for a couple of beers with the boys" and finished up by drinking to drunkenness not once or twice or ten or eleven times, but time after time after time for years, I have again gone in to have a drink with the boys and felt absolutely certain and clear in my conscience that I was just going in for a couple of drinks and go home. I am so certain of the honesty of my belief at those moments that I can affirm it before God. I am also fully aware that it is against all reason and common sense that I could possibly have felt like that when I knew so well what had happened so often before. I am also aware that it is the common excuse of any moral coward to say, "I couldn't help it." But neither the shame of being accused of that, nor the fear of ridicule alters the fact that I was quite certain I was only going to have a couple of beers.

In my case I had not yet fully admitted that I was an alcoholic. But whatever the reason, the fact stands and it demands recognition.

So there, I think, we have the first basic step in the rehabilitation of the alcoholic: the non-alcoholic accepting authoritative opinion that there is, as distinct from common drunkenness, such a thing as a disease called alcoholism; the alcoholic accepting authoritative opinion that he is subject to that disease.

The fundamental reason for the success of Alcoholics Anonymous is the absolute finality with which that first step is taken by both sides. For both "doctor" and "patient" are alcoholics who have made the admission that "I am powerless over alcohol." There is no lack of understanding on the one side, no feeling of being unjustly despised on the other.

A Triple Sickness

So far we have nothing more than a moralist's report on the findings of science about alcoholism. Father Ford now takes up the moral aspect and adds to bodily and mental sickness a third sickness of soul. He says: "But I do not believe we have any adequate picture of the disease of alcoholism unless we add a third fact. Alcoholism is also a sickness of the soul. The sickness of the soul is sin. Alcoholics have no monopoly on this sickness but they have to a greater extent than other people the unhappy faculty of letting their sins become manifest." The paper then speaks of neurosis and sin and says I "Psychiatrists who do not believe in sin will class all these persons as neurotics. Religious-minded people who know nothing of neurosis will class all these people as sinners. But I see no inherent difficulty in admitting that the same person can be both a neurotic and sinner. In the case of the alcoholic, he can be both a compulsive drinker and a sinner, his misconduct being at times the product of his compulsion and at other times of his willfulness."

The alcoholic will agree to that. In fact, he will be glad about it as a just and clarifying judgment.

Then Father Ford supports his "sickness of soul" finding by reference to the success of Alcoholics Anonymous whose members attain lasting sobriety through adherence to the Twelve Steps, which "are nothing but a program of moral and spiritual regeneration, a program of self-discipline and asceticism that has been compared to the First Week of the Exercises of Saint Ignatius."

Here are the Twelve Steps:

- (1) We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable
- (2) Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
- (3) Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
- (4) Made a searching and fearless moral inventory of ourselves.
- (5) Admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
- (6) Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
- (7) Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
- (8) Made a list of all persons we had harmed and became willing to make amends to them all.
- (9) Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others. (10) Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it. (11) Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out. (12) Having had a spiritual awakening as the result of these steps we tried to carry this message to alcoholics and to alcoholics and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

The reader will notice that emphasis of this program is all on spiritual values, and that alcohol is only mentioned once. The priest will at once say that these are the things he has been telling people all his life and that if the alcoholic would only listen to him he would not need doctors, psychiatrists, A.A. or anything else.

Which brings us back to one of the questions we posed earlier. Why is it that A.A.'s could stop an alcoholic's drinking when the Church failed?

Inadequate Use of Religious Means

To my mind, the primary reason lies in that first step of which I have spoken above: the recognition by both priest and penitent of the distinction between mere drunkenness and alcoholism as a disease. Berating an alcoholic for being a no-good drunk, or whining at him for "doing this to me and the children" does nothing but drive him back to drink. The alcoholic may or may not be a reprobate. He is certainly a sick man.

The second reason I give for the success of A.A. is a rather shocking one. I offer it in humility and with all due respect. Alcoholics Anonymous insists more vigorously on the practice of those principles of Christian ascetics and the spiritual life than do priests of the Church of Christ.

Let's look at the Twelve Steps. From Steps 3 to 10 they describe in substance the requirements for a good Confession as we learned them from our catechism. They lack the priest and the grace of Sacrament. Yet they bring about conversion of life where sacramental Confession has failed. Now, the grace of God never fails. So there must have been something blocking the channel. That block can only be man's failure to co-operate with the grace. The failure, in turn, must essentially lie in the understanding or in the will of the penitent. Granting that the penitent alcoholic really wants to stop, and allowing for the weakness of will born of habitual indulgence, we must put a large part of the blame on the penitent's understanding. He does not understand the nature of his soul-sickness and he does not understand the absolute necessity of specific remedial action.

This is where the priest should come in as a physician of souls. And this is where the priest so often fails. He fails to enlighten the penitent's understanding. He fails to prescribe a regime for the strengthening of his will. A.A. does both. It not only tells the man what is the matter with him but it adds, "Here is what you have to do if you want to get better." Now the Church in its general teachings does the same for all Christians. But the priest, the immediate point of contact through which the Church's teachings passes to the individual, does not bring this teaching to bear in the specific instance. Were you ever asked to make restitution as specifically as the member of A.A. is in Steps 8 and 9? Where outside a retreat for religious is anyone ever asked to "make a list" of all the people he has harmed? Where can the layman go to receive individual guidance and help through a course of spiritual exercises to strengthen him against his particular weakness?

He is asked to do these things and does get this aid in A.A. which also gives him in Step 11 an invitation to perfection and a doorway to the Church. Many alcoholics find in the A.A. program all the religion they need, more urgent demand for the practice of soul satisfying Christian virtue than in the Churches to which they may have belonged. For these people A.A. is a religion, although I objectively and in itself it is most definitely nothing of the kind. It is an aid to sobriety for people of any religion. The fact that it does satisfy a religious hunger where the Churches do not is one more reason for the priests of the Church of Christ informing themselves on the nature and treatment of alcoholism. It is one more reason for urging our Christian people to more knowledge and stronger practice of Christian asceticism.

If a layman may presume from the depths of his own experience on the outside of the confessional grill, I should like to outline a procedure which I think would have helped me and perhaps enabled grace to perform its healing work.

I would have liked the priest to have questioned me along the lines of Seliger's twenty questions and then have told me that I was an alcoholic, a sick man who had to take special measures to remove his weakness. I would have liked him to be, like Father Ford, "of the opinion that it is generally unwise for the confessor or counselor to tell excessive drinkers that they are obliged sub gravi not to drink at all." I think I would have been helped if he had asked me to come back to him frequently, to call upon him at once as a patient would a doctor in case of relapse, to get it out of my head that he might think I wasn't even trying. I would have been glad if he had encouraged me to distinguish between the times I was aware I was putting myself in the occasion of sin and the times I wasn't. I would have liked him to recommend literature on alcoholism and to suggest that I join A.A. I would have been eased in soul had he laid down as a condition of forgiveness that I set about making reparation to those I had offended. I would have liked him to explain to me the technique of the particular examen. I would have liked him to explain to me that grace builds on nature and that I had to take the available natural means to strengthen my soul.

For my part, and this gets me back to Father Ford's paper, I would not have wanted to escape responsibility for my drunken conduct. I would have agreed that "The average alcoholic feels himself more or less guilty for the things that happen while he is in this state, although his general confusion of mind is an attenuating circumstance"; and that "His responsibility for his drinking is generally diminished to a considerable extent, and sometimes eliminated, but each alcoholic, each drinking episode, and even each act of drinking must be judged separately...the honest and enlightened testimony of his own conscience is the best criterion we have of his responsibility... and in the final analysis the judgment must be left to a merciful God."

It still remains true that extraneous aids have worked with me and with thousands of others, where unaided religion has not. Father Ford goes so far to say, "Co-operation with Alcoholics Anonymous is essential to the successful pastoral care of alcoholics." But it makes a big difference to the Catholic alcoholic whether or not he seeks this outside aid with the blessing and understanding of his Church. When he does so, his alcoholism is transformed from a soul-eating monster to a felix culpa which turns him toward the practice of Christian perfection.

|||||

+++Message 1293. . . . . RE: Conference approval - Meeting Opening
From: ny-aa@att.net . . . . . 9/5/2003 8:29:00 AM

|||||

The A.A. Preamble is copyright by the AA Grapevine. As such, though, it is just as acceptable as Conferenced Approved literature for use at any meeting.

The other one, the Open Meeting side and the Closed Meeting side of The Blue Card, is "service material" which was written by GSO staff because the groups indicated through the Conference many some of them wanted standardized opening statements to be available. Its use is not required at meetings. It isn't, "GSO wants us to read this to start our meetings. It is used - or not - as determined by group conscience.

|||||

+++Message 1294. . . . . RE: Conference approval
From: ny-aa@att.net . . . . . 9/5/2003 8:32:00 AM

|||||

Hi again, Nancy:

stop drinking," suggesting that since "honest" does not appear in the Third Tradition, it might be deleted from the Preamble. In discussion, most Conference members felt that as AA had matured, it had become almost impossible to determine what constitutes an honest desire to stop drinking, and also that some who might be interested in the program could be confused by the phrase. Thus, as part of the evolution of AA, the phrase had been dropped from common usage. The midsummer 1958 meeting of the General Service Board of Trustees ratified the deletion, and since then the Preamble has read simply "a desire to stop drinking."

At the same time, the phrase "AA has no dues or fees" was clarified to read as it presently does: "There are no dues or fees for AA membership; we are self-supporting through our own contributions." The current version of the Preamble appears on page one of every issue of the Grapevine.

The above info is posted on the AA Grapevine web site and is in the Best of the Grapevine, Volume 1 pgs 274-275.

The wording of the Conference advisory action that made this change is very curious and can erroneously give the impression that the Conference made a change to the short form of Tradition Three. The 1958 advisory action reads "The Conference recognize [sic] the original use of the word 'honest' before 'desire to stop drinking' and its deletion from the Traditions as part of the evolution of the AA movement. Any change to be left to the discretion of AA Publishing Inc." The word "Traditions" really should have said "Preamble." Also there is no specific mention of the "dues or fees" change in the advisory action.

By Conference advisory action, Grapevine was given approval (sometimes to the consternation of some members) to publish what its trusted servants decide. A 1985 (and an editing change in 1986) advisory action read: "Since each issue of the Grapevine cannot go through the Conference-approved process, the Conference recognizes the AA Grapevine as the international journal of Alcoholics Anonymous."

The matter of what "Conference-approved" means, and just as important what it doesn't mean, might be worthy of some discussion and research in the History Lovers group. I'm going to dig up a service piece (GSO item # F-29) on the topic and post it. Some folks (and Groups) get just a wee bit too orthodox and inflexible with the term (usually to keep the "psycho-babble" books out of meetings or to qualify what literature gets sold). There is a fairly substantial body of AA literature that is not required to go through the Conference-approval process:

Grapevine (and its non-English counterparts)

Box 459

Guidelines (the "yellow sheets")

Workbooks (e.g. Archives, PI and CPC, Treatment and Correction Facilities service committees)

Markings (the Archives newsletter)

About AA (PI releases)

Directories

Advisory Actions of the General Service Conference of AA (M-39)

Final reports of the General Service Conference

Literature published by General Service Offices other than the US/Canada and AAWS.

Final reports of the World Service Conference

Memento booklets from International Conventions

Literature catalogs and flyers (AAWS and Grapevine)

Non-English interpretations of books/pamphlets (which rarely can be exact word-for-word translations)

(and I've probably missed others)

The above are all legitimate "AA literature." Some members have the notion that if a piece of paper doesn't have the "Conference-approved" stamp on it then it's "not legit and not AA." That's really not the case.

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: Lash, William (Bill)

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Thursday, September 04, 2003 8:03 PM

Subject: RE: [AAHistoryLovers] Conference approval

Does anyone know what the deal is with whether or not the "What Is AA" reading that most groups open with (published by the AA Grapevine) is Conference Approved or not? I always get a weird answer whenever I ask G.S.O. Thanks!

Just Love,

Barefoot Bill

-----Original Message-----

From: cdknapp [mailto:charles@aahistory.com]
Sent: Wednesday, September 03, 2003 1:43 AM
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] Conference approval

Hello,

The First General Service Conference took place in 1951 and the 12 & 12 was printed in 1953. So there was a conference before this book was published. My copy of the Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions 10th printing 1971 clearly states it is "Conference Approved." At the very first General Service Conference in 1951, it was agreed that any published items by the Alcoholic Foundation be Conference Approved. Here is page 15 from the 1951 Conference Report.

Hope this helps.

Charles from California

-----
General Service Conference - 1951

CONFERENCE ADVISORY ACTIONS

*****

Six subjects were put before the Conference at its closing session by the Committee on Agenda. The Committee reported that it had considered a long list of items on which it would be useful to have an expression of Conference opinion and that the six subjects selected were "those deemed to be of particular importance at the present time.

1. "Should non-alcoholics continue to serve on the Board of Trustees of the Alcoholic Foundation?"

The Conference voted affirmatively, with complete unanimity.

2. "This Conference feels that in future years A.A. textbook literature should have Conference approval."

The Conference voted, affirmatively, with complete unanimity.

Prior to the vote on this subject, it was pointed out that adoption of the suggestion would not preclude the continued issuance of various printed documents by non-Foundation sources. No desire to review, edit or censor non-Foundation material is implied. The objective is to provide, in the future, a means of distinguishing Foundation literature from that issued locally or by non-A.A. interests.

3. "It is the sense of this Conference that the alcoholic members of the Board of Trustees ought to have a fixed term of office."

The Conference voted affirmatively, with complete unanimity.

4. "Should attendance at next year's Conference sessions be United to members only?"

The Conference voted affirmatively, with complete unanimity.

(In addition to delegates. Conference members include Trustees of the Alcoholic Foundation and accredited staff members of the General Service Office and. the Grapevine.)

5. "It is the sense of this Committee that the subject of A.A. auxiliaries or family groups should, be taken back to local groups for further discussion and be considered at the 1952 General Service Conference."

The Conference voted, affirmatively to support the opinion of the Committee.

----- Original Message -----

From: jenny andrews

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Tuesday, September 02, 2003 3:46 AM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Conference approval

Neither the 12 and 12 nor Big Book (first three editions) were AA Conference-approved - presumably because there was no Conference to approve them when they were published. Can anyone tell me when Conference first began approving AA literature, and whether a decision was taken at a

Look for the statement on books, pamphlets and films:

"This is A.A. General Service Conference-approved literature"

All "A.A. Literature" Is Not Conference-approved

Central offices and intergroups do write and distribute pamphlets or booklets that are not Conference-approved. If such pieces meet the needs of the local membership, they may be legitimately classified as "A.A. literature." There is no conflict between A.A. World Services, Inc. (A.A.W.S. - publishers of Conference-approved literature), and central offices or intergroups - rather they complement each other. The Conference does not disapprove of such material.

G.S.O. does develop some literature that does not have to be approved by the Conference, such as service material, Guidelines and bulletins.

Available at Most A.A. Groups

Most local A.A. groups purchase and display a representative sampling of Conference-approved pamphlets, and usually carry a supply of hardcover books. Conference-approved literature may be available at central offices and intergroups, or it may be ordered directly from G.S.O. Groups normally offer pamphlets free of charge, and the books at cost.

Copyright

Conference-approved literature is copyrighted with the Copyright Office, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C., U.S.A. To insure the continued integrity of A.A. literature, and to make sure the A.A. recovery programs will not be distorted or diluted, permission to reprint must be obtained from A.A.W.S. in writing.

However, A.A. newsletters, bulletins, or meeting lists have blanket permission to use the material, providing proper credit is given to insure that the copyrights of A.A. literature are protected.

The A.A. Preamble is copyrighted by The A.A. Grapevine, Inc. (not by A.A. World Services). Beneath it, these words should appear: Reprinted with permission of the A.A. Grapevine, Inc. The Steps and Traditions should be followed by these words: Reprinted with Permission of A.A. World Services, Inc.

10/93

F-29 (handwritten)

1969 - Apr., the 19th General Service Conference (GSC) recommended that: (a) the GSC approve the recommendations to incorporate into existing AA Guidelines the questions on how AA and Al-Anon can cooperate with regard to central offices and area and regional get-togethers and conventions and (b) the GSC approved a resolution of gratitude to AFG.

1986 - Sep. 12-16, the first permanent International Al-Anon General Services Meeting. (AFG pamphlet AR-2)

1988 - Oct. 5, Lois Burnham Wilson (age 97) co-founder of Al-Anon Family Groups, died. (AACOA xi) Her contributions to the AA and AFG Fellowships entitle her to be considered co-founder of both. Michael Alexander, past Chairman of the General Service Board is cited "many AAs today feel their lives are owed to Lois as well as Bill, Dr. Bob and Anne S." (WPR 53)

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: Art B

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Friday, September 05, 2003 1:14 PM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] AA Auxiliaries

Dear members,

cdknapp sent some 1951 conference decisions. One is as follows:

From: cdknapp [mailto:charles@aahistory.com]

Sent: Wednesday, September 03, 2003 1:43 AM

5. "It is the sense of this Committee that the subject of A.A. auxiliaries or family groups should, be taken back to local groups for further discussion and be considered at the 1952 General Service Conference."

The Conference voted, affirmatively to support the opinion of the Committee.

What did the local groups discuss and the 1952 Conference consider or decide?

Art Boudreault
artb@netwiz.net

monthly meetings to discuss AA program and go over the 12 Steps of N-AA, believed to have originated in Syracuse N.Y. Also mentions plans for weekly picnics, boat rides, buffet suppers and other social events for the group - both AAs and N-AAs.

Nov 47

in News Circuit column mentions formation of 'Another Womens Auxiliary' in Hickory N.C. with "36 members who plan to study A.A. as well as help other women who are 'going through what we have, and maybe through the wives bring other men into A.A.' There are two meetings and one social every month."

Dec 47

In the News Circuit column, mentions the Twin City Group, composed of members from Benton Harbor and St. Joseph, Mich., have formed the A.A.A. or Alcoholics Anonymous Auxiliary. The members are trying to live by 11 Steps, all but the first of the 12. They advocate attending all open meetings and lectures, as well as social gatherings in order to learn all they can about alcoholics, their own associates in particular.

Jan 48

In the News Circuit column, mentions San Antonio, Tex womens auxiliary

Feb 48

In the News Circuit column, mentions how Non-A.A.s of the Suburban Group in Houston Texas aid the growth of the group.

March 48

In the News Circuit column, mentions Kansas City Mo groups Ladies Auxiliary, both in planning social events/parties and in helping wives of new members.

same column mentions formation of auxiliary by the wives of the Cheraw and Bennettsville groups (W. Va.)

May 48

article "Non-Alcoholic Wives form AA Auxiliary" by a member in Rome, Ga.

June 48

in 'Group Meeting Methods Discussed' article, there is mention of Louisville, Ky
having seven neighborhood groups and a recently formed Ladies Auxiliary who's
members are sometimes referred to as 'Dry-Mates'.

-----

Grapevine, Aug 46

God Made Our Relatives Too

If there are more than twenty thousand A.A.s scattered throughout the land,
there must be. guessing conservatively, at least sixty thousand of their relatives.

That means 60,000 additional problems--ours! Our attitudes toward them affect our sobriety, both in quality and duration. Should we not consider carefully what those attitudes are, since family is often the most important influence in our lives?

Over here on the right, ladies and gentlemen, you find a school of A.A.s who mentally tack up a large sign: No Relatives Or Dogs Allowed! And over here on the left,
is another group who complain that their relatives take only a long-suffering, skeptical interest in the program. Again, here and there, dotted around the country, are
A.A.
groups that are actually relative-ridden. Some groups don't even dare to have closed meetings. because relatives object. Some gatherings are attended by more relatives
than alcoholics; the wives and husbands come, even if their A.A. is sick or out
of
town--kin. hell-bent on getting well for them!

An old-timer recently hazarded a guess that 95 per cent of the relatives had never read the chapter written just for them in our book Alcoholics Anonymous. Most of them, however, did not know there was such a chapter; of course a lot of them didn't know there was a book!

Urge Rending of Book

Point One might well be, then, to introduce the book and chapter to our own families, and to relatives of those on whom we are doing Twelfth Step work, and urge them to read it! But that is only a starter. If we expect to be happy in our own A.A. life, and want newcomers to make the grade, we must be more understanding of our near-and-dear ones.. We are so sick and weak ourselves by the time we reach A.A.; we are so full of physical aches, mental pains, moral sores and spiritual bruises, that it is hard for us to realize that those who have lived through our binges with us are generally neurotic cases, too. At this point, relatives are not their real selves at all, they have lived too long in hourly fear, dashed hopes, privations, humiliations and disgust; they have been the objects too often of drunken revenge, vituperation and betrayal. Justly or not, they have been blamed extravagantly for everything. Is it not natural that they, too, will have to go through a faltering period of recovery and readjustment and recapture of faith ?

Certainly, they need sympathetic understanding, too--and need it badly. And they can come to see, and let us hope, experience, how eleven of the Steps can be adapted to their own benefit. Human nature being what it is, it is not likely they are going to achieve all this alone; they need help as we do.

Sponsors and older members can do a generous service by pointing out these values repeatedly during a newcomer's early months.

The more that our relatives appreciate the program, take an interest in the group, are welcomed among A.A.s, and given a sense of belonging, sharing and helping to further the good work, the less friction, frustration and hindrance each of us will suffer in progress.

Take, for example, the extreme disapproval of so many relatives in regard to our closed meetings. Or consider the resentment many of them feel about the long, intimate twosome A.A. powwows that are a major aid to clarifying our outlook.

Naturally, such occasions must seem suspect to relatives left out in the cold.

If the situations were reversed, might we not conclude that we and our intimate affairs were being discussed --with no chance given for us to tell our side of the story?

Or, according to our imaginations, might not we surmise that these were bull sessions, and sex discussions, and might we not be jolly well articulate about it all?

Or, supposing we were long-suffering enough to forbear, wouldn't we feel estranged and self-conscious?

Only by thoroughly understanding that an alcoholic will talk to another alcoholic as to no other human, can our relatives possibly come to tolerate, approve and even encourage meetings and confidential sessions.

And as their complete understanding is necessary on this point, so the solution to a great many of the conflicts that often put relatives on one side of a barbed-wire

fence, and members on another, lies in the enlightenment of relatives in the whole

A.A. program and all that it implies and entails. We should stress the word enlightenment too--and avoid the word instruction --for the very righteous, ego-puffing attitude that the word "instruction" causes us often to adopt, is salt in a suffering relative's wounds and detrimental to our own pursuit of humility.

It is said--and rightly--that A.A. is the greatest example of democracy in the world.

But don't we risk that ideal if we make and feel a class distinction against normal drinkers or non-drinkers, and find ourselves associating happily with alcoholics only? The luxury of being understood, and of being able to talk freely can wreck

us

if overdone. As soon as we are able to look out as well as in, we might do well

to set ourselves a definite goal, to meet and like all our fellows, rich and poor, educated and uneducated, men and women, young and old, bores and charmers, alcoholic and non-alcoholic! With our slogan of "live and let live," we soon learn to sympathize, to listen patiently, to shrug at the prejudices, the foibles, the eccentricities, of perfectly stranger fellow-drinkers, giving them time to iron

out

their character snags, helping them to do so when we can. and even examining ourselves exhaustively on a challenged point, to reaffirm or readjust our own views.

It stands to reason that it would pay off in spiritual and social growth to give

the same tolerance and kind patience to non-A.A.s. All non-A.A.s. but most especially non-A.A. relatives.

Relatives Can Be Helpful

There are any number of relatives who would be happy to feel useful and a part of things. Why waste such a source of good works? Why not tap such a powerhouse of constructive effort? We find ourselves with a great work to do --helping other alcoholics--and because we seem ordained by our own suffering to do that work as no one else can, and since it helps us "make amends" to the world we live in to do so, we know the strength and healing help that being useful gives us. No relative who properly understands will want to interfere with or intrude on 12th Step work--it's not his forte. But why can't our folk help with the relatives of our newcomer? And aren't there often a dozen things to be attended to for a new and perhaps rambunctious prospect--anything from broken earphones to be fixed, irate landladies to be calmed, broken appointments to be explained, trains to be met in place of the drunk--and wouldn't a surprising lot of relatives be happy and proud to work as co-partner on some of our cases? Certainly there is more work to be done than there are A.A.s to do it fully and competently. What A.A. hasn't wished, at some point, that he had 48 hours in his day? We have all heard many relatives say, with real humility, that they would gladly be "hewers of wood and drawers of water"--errand-boys and envelope addressers, if it would help. And as soon as they learn loyalty to observe the sacredness of our anonymity, so that they can be trusted, not gossip or spread information, what mistaken altruists we make of ourselves to refuse their help!

Why Deprive Them of Joy?

If, however, the feeling persists with an A.A. that relatives must not be involved in any way directly with our activities, should this exposure to the joy and strength to be obtained through direct personal giving of oneself to help another go completely to waste? A husband or wife, mother, son or daughter might be encouraged to find another avenue of good samaritan practice. There is too much suffering in the world

besides alcoholism for them not to find an absorbing source of spiritual growth
in unselfish aid, with our enthusiastic support.

In some towns, relatives have asked for Relatives' Meetings, and some of these
are successfully under way with one or two A.A.s speaking briefly, two relatives speaking and a long question-discussion period.

Many of the old-timers around the country are beginning to wonder whether further development might not be a great contribution to happiness and co-operation
all around. Why not groups of relatives, run as sort of auxiliary? They might welcome a list of things to be done from which they could choose their activities;
chief
of which might well be to welcome relatives of newcomers and work with them as we work with the alcoholics. There are so many kind things to be done for newcomers
AND
their families, to bridge them into peace with themselves and ease with the the world,
all quite aside from the program help which only an alcoholic can give to an alcoholic.
There are some groups that put across outings, bowling teams, baseball or softball games successfully. Frequent and smaller get-togethers might be stimulating, helping relatives to know each other.

Express Your Appreciation

On the little matter of parties--it might go big if more A.A.s expressed appreciation

and praise oftener to those wives of members who are forever giving forth with sandwiches, cookies, cakes and coffee after meetings. We are apt to take so much for granted, and neglect the graciousness that could give a kindly heart joy.

With women A.A. members, the opinion and attitude, of relatives are, often, the keynote of recovery and success. Women are generally more answerable to their relatives, less apt to have freedom of movement and time without disrupting a household. If The woman A.A. is a wife and/or mother, or even a daughter, her comings and goings affect other people. And she, even more than a man, needs the warmth of approval, interest, enthusiasm of those closest to her. Unshared interests do not contribute to a happy relationship or a harmonious household. The understanding of her folks can do much to cement a woman A.A. to her new activities and can certainly add to the quality of her sobriety. Surely, there is little serenity when a woman is trying to readjust her whole mode of living amidst surroundings that are cold, unresponsive and filled with misgiving, or even downright disapproval or tinged with ridicule. It would seem wise, therefore, to make a far more concerted effort with the relatives of women A.A.s than any other. A husband greeted, welcomed and treated as an important element in the picture may be an oblique kind of 12th Step work that can well forestall a future slip.

Isn't all of this collateral 12th Step work in its way--certainly, "practicing these principles in all our affairs?" In winning and helping a relative to our way consider that their membership numbers over 100,000, while starting in 1935 with two, we must conclude that their methods are proving effective.

A Catholic member of A.A. should be a better Catholic as the result of his affiliation with this society and vice versa.

The Twelve Steps which the members of Alcoholics Anonymous have taken as their program for recovery are spiritually sound and would do credit to anyone schooled in theology; yet, strangely enough, they were drawn up by men who had meager religious backgrounds. Let's take a look at these Twelve Steps which constitute a successful way of life for alcoholics:

- 1) They admitted they were powerless over alcohol - that their lives had become unmanageable. Catholics are taught their great need of God and their utter dependence upon Him, that they cannot do anything without His grace.
2. They came to believe that a Power greater than themselves could restore them to sanity. " I believe in God, the Father Almighty...."
3. They made a decision to turn their wills and their lives over to the care of God as they understood Him. "Thy will be done, on earth..."
4. They made a searching and fearless moral inventory of themselves. Examination of conscience.
- 5) They admitted to God, to themselves, and to another human being the exact nature of their wrongs. Confession.
- 6) They were entirely ready to have God remove all of these defects of character. The disposition of the will toward allowing grace to flow into the soul.
- 7) They humbly asked Him to remove their shortcomings. Even as every humble Catholic..
8. They made a list of all persons they had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all. Further examination of conscience and a readiness to restore all things to their rightful owners.
9. They made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others. A Catholic must do likewise after he makes a good confession; he must make restitution when he has robbed another, be it material goods or his neighbor's good name, and is required to rectify this harm whenever possible.
10. They continued to take personal inventory, and when they were wrong, promptly admitted it. Catholics are urged to make a daily examination of conscience that they may move forward toward spiritual perfection.

11. They sought through prayer and meditation to improve their conscious contact with God as they understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His Will for them and the power to carry that out. "Thy will be my will - show me the way, O Lord..."

12. Having had a spiritual experience as a result of these steps, they tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all their affairs. None of that "Sunday morning Catholic" idea here; then "business as usual" the remainder of the week. Propagation of the faith. "Faith without works is dead."

None of the members claims perfect adherence to these principles. They are not saints. This prescribed course is a guide to progress, and the members claim spiritual progress rather than spiritual perfection.

Since we see such conformity of these Twelve Steps with Catholic teaching, one might well ask: "Why does a Catholic alcoholic need A.A.?"

For one thing, Catholics believe that faith is a gift; yet this gift is not meted out to each individual in the same proportions. A somnolent or arrested faith can become active through A.A.

We also know that we have not all learned how to pray; nor do we all know when our prayers are answered.

Sometimes victims of alcohol drift into this vice through social drinking that seems harmless (and is harmless for some), then find themselves enslaved by a phenomenon of craving to such a degree that they are too mentally confused to pray. Free will fails to function through long periods of disuse or abuse by alcohol. Alcoholics are not alone in that they pray to get out of trouble, storm heaven with prayers; then, as soon as the crisis passes, their prayers cease, or at best, lose fervor. Many another also gives lip service to God, yet does not try to search for God's will in relation to his own life. A.A. opens many eyes to this faulty practice. Pride is the enemy of alcoholics; it is likewise the enemy of many a Catholic.

Does a Catholic alcoholic need A.A.? In one diocese that we know of, the Bishop has appointed a priest to do nothing but study this problem and the work of Alcoholics Anonymous with a view toward aiding Catholic victims and giving their families some insight into this problem so that they are in a position to help and not hinder the sufferer's advancement toward recovery.

Numerous Catholic victims of alcoholism are brought to A.A. through the influence of nuns and priests who have seen the efficacy of the program in others with whom they have come in contact. A.A. groups are listed in the have attempted to serve as a "clearing house" for the expanding movement.

3. FAMILY GROUP REPRESENTATIVES HAVE AFFIRMED THEIR DISTINCT ENTITY. The family groups are filling a distinct need, according to the evidence from areas where the idea has taken hold, and the groups are not seeking to use the "A.A." name. As a movement with local groups in all parts of this country and in Canada, the non-alcoholics have their own committees and their own program. As now set up they do not impinge on A. A. and do not seek to do so.

4. DEVELOPMENT OF FAMILY GROUPS IS VIEWED SYMPATHETICALLY IN VIRTUALLY ALL AREAS. Only two delegates out of 77 came to the 1952 Conference with instructions from area committees that might be construed as critical of the family group movement.

5. REPORTS OF FAMILY GROUP DEVELOPMENT ARE CARRIED IN THE "GRAPEVINE," WHEN NEWSWORTHY. Historically, the "Grapevine," from its first issue, has carried news of non-A.A. happenings when they relate to the interests of A.A. readers, directly or indirectly. The Conference, in a special resolution, affirmed its support of this traditional "Grapevine" policy.

6. DELEGATES TO THE 1952 CONFERENCE APPROVE UNANIMOUSLY THE WORK THAT LOIS AND BILL HAVE DONE TO ENCOURAGE AND SUPPORT THE SOUND GROWTH OF THE FAMILY GROUP MOVEMENT. This sentiment, framed in a special resolution at the close of the final policy session, was adopted by an enthusiastic standing vote of all delegates.

----- Original Message ----- From: Arthur Sheehan

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Friday, September 05, 2003 5:51 PM

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] AA Auxiliaries

Hi Art

SOURCE REFERENCES:

AACOA AA Comes of Age, AAWS

BW-RT Bill W by Robert Thompson

GB Getting Better Inside Alcoholics Anonymous by Nan Robertson

GTBT Grateful to Have Been There by Nell Wing

LR Lois Remembers, by Lois Wilson

WPR Women Pioneers in 12 Step Recovery, by Charlotte Hunter, Billye Jones and Joan Ziegler

1951 - Apr. at the close of the 1st General Service Conference, Lois W, with her close friend and neighbor, Anne B, invited the delegates' wives and local family group members to Stepping Stones to discuss an organization for what was then called AA Family Groups. (LR 174-176, WPR 69-70)

1952 - Jan. 9, the first AFG Hq (the Clearing-house Committee) was set up at the 24th St. clubhouse in NYC. (LR 174-176). In Mar., non-alcoholic groups, previously using names such as AA Helpmates, AA Auxiliary, Triple A, Non-AA, AA Associates, etc. established the name of Al-Anon Family Groups for their Fellowship. (LR 176, CB 142) AFG sent a memorandum to AA asking permission to use its Twelve Steps. AA agreed unofficially but its members felt strongly that AFG should be a separate society and not a subsidiary of AA. (LR 176)

1953 - Sep., Al-Anon Family Groups adopted an adaptation of the Twelve Traditions of AA. (LR 177-178)

1955 - Jul. 1-3, 20th anniversary and second Int'l Convention at St. Lois, MO. The first AFG book The Al-Anon Family Groups was released at the Convention. (AACOA ix, 32-34, LR 180)

1960 - Jul. 1-3, 25th anniversary and 3rd Int'l Convention at Long Beach, CA. AFG members present at the Convention voted to approve a plan, similar to AA, for an annual conference of delegates. AFG groups later affirmed the action. (LR 181)

1969 - Apr., the 19th General Service Conference (GSC) recommended that: (a) the GSC approve the recommendations to incorporate into existing AA Guidelines the questions on how AA and Al-Anon can cooperate with regard to central offices and area and regional get-togethers and conventions and (b) the GSC approved a resolution of gratitude to AFG.

1986 - Sep. 12-16, the first permanent International Al-Anon General Services Meeting. (AFG pamphlet AR-2)

1988 - Oct. 5, Lois Burnham Wilson (age 97) co-founder of Al-Anon Family Groups, died. (AACOA xi) Her contributions to the AA and AFG Fellowships entitle her to be considered co-founder of both. Michael Alexander, past Chairman of the General Service Board is cited "many AAs today feel their lives are owed to Lois as well as Bill, Dr. Bob and Anne S." (WPR 53)

Cheers

Arthur

groups, previously using names such as AA Helpmates, AA Auxiliary, Triple A, Non-AA, AA Associates, etc. established the name of Al-Anon Family Groups for their Fellowship. (LR 176, CB 142) AFG sent a memorandum to AA asking permission to use its Twelve Steps. AA agreed unofficially but its members felt strongly that AFG should be a separate society and not a subsidiary of AA. (LR 176)

>

>1953 - Sep., Al-Anon Family Groups adopted an adaptation of the Twelve Traditions of AA. (LR 177-178)

>

>1955 - Jul. 1-3, 20th anniversary and second Int'l Convention at St. Lois, MO. The first AFG book The Al-Anon Family Groups was released at the Convention. (AACOA ix, 32-34, LR 180)

>

>1960 - Jul. 1-3, 25th anniversary and 3rd Int'l Convention at Long Beach, CA. AFG members present at the Convention voted to approve a plan, similar to AA, for an annual conference of delegates. AFG groups later affirmed the action. (LR 181)

>

>1969 - Apr., the 19th General Service Conference (GSC) recommended that: (a) the GSC approve the recommendations to incorporate into existing AA Guidelines the questions on how AA and Al-Anon can cooperate with regard to central offices and area and regional get-togethers and conventions and (b) the GSC approved a resolution of gratitude to AFG.

>

>1986 - Sep. 12-16, the first permanent International Al-Anon General Services Meeting. (AFG pamphlet AR-2)

>

>1988 - Oct. 5, Lois Burnham Wilson (age 97) co-founder of Al-Anon Family Groups, died. (AACOA xi) Her contributions to the AA and AFG Fellowships entitle her to be considered co-founder of both. Michael Alexander, past Chairman of the General Service Board is cited "many AAs today feel their lives are owed to Lois as well as Bill, Dr. Bob and Anne S." (WPR 53)

>

>Cheers

>

>Arthur

>

>----- Original Message -----

>

> From: Art B

> To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

> Sent: Friday, September 05, 2003 1:14 PM

> Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] AA Auxiliaries

>

>

> Dear members,

>

Groups in 1952 appeared with their effort.

I credit this source from the Stepping Stones Foundation Archives, in research completed in 2001:

Four wives met at Stepping Stones in April of 1951, during the week of the first General Service Conference.

From records in an April 21, 1951 entry in the Guest Book that Lois kept for many years, these four women met to discuss the need for a "family service Center."

The women were: Henrietta D., wife of our beloved "A.A. Number Three" from Akron, Ohio; Katie T., wife of Alcoholic Foundation Trustee Earl T. from Evanston, Illinois; and Virginia H., wife of Panel 1 Chicago Delegate Luke H., from Evanston, Illinois.

The three guests, two from the Chicago Group and one from the Akron Chapter, had been on the city-front lines for the alcoholic family for over a dozen years. Their 1951 meeting furthered the consensus to organize a Fellowship for the family groups---A.A. Grapevine articles on the A.A. auxiliaries, the "A.A.A. meetings" discussed the questions and gave the encouragement, but Al-Anon seemed to finally take shape when our A.A. Fellowship tested its unity by holding the General Service Conference.

As many of us have found over the years, Alcoholics Anonymous led by example.

While the Al-Anon Family Groups may have taken their lead from the 1950 ratification of our Traditions and the organization of our 1951 Conference, the outreach to the families actually did begin with Anne Smith, Henrietta Sieberling, and Lois Wilson

(I honestly believe this, as an A.A. Historian given the support and trust of my Delegate Area 20).

The family groups' unnamed leaders supported the A.A. "trial and error" efforts, from our 1935 beginning through our first A.A. coming of age of 1950. And their support and encouragement continues today!

I know of the activity in Chicago, where the first Open Meetings (later called the Tuesday Night "Big" Meeting) held in October 1939 had special emphasis on reaching out to the families of alcoholics, and Mrs. T. and Mrs. H. were just two of many who were there every step of the way.

In the northern section of Illinois, "Socials" were held as early as 1942 in Peoria, Illinois and in 1943 in Rockford, Illinois, allowing family members a participation in the developing health that A.A. had brought for their

- * Group Registration Suggestions. Suggestions derived from the experience of A.A. members in various service areas for registering A.A. groups.
- * Guidelines. One set provided at no charge; additional copies at regular price.
- * Homers. Information on correspondence service for housebound A.A. members.
- * How to Conduct a Sharing Session. Descriptive sheet.
- * Information on Alcoholics Anonymous. Guidance for anyone sent to A.A. and for administrators of court programs and other referring agencies.
- * Internationalists. Information on correspondence service for "seagoing" A.A.s.
- * Literature Catalog/Order Form.
- * Loners. Information on correspondence service for Lone A.A. members.
- * Map. A.A. Regions in U.S./Canada.
- * Material for Deaf and Hard-of-hearing A.A.s. List of Central Offices, etc.; Summary Sheet of Material Available for Deaf and Hard-of-Hearing Alcoholics; the Twelve Steps for signing purposes; the Twelve Traditions for signing purposes; the Twelve Traditions (Long Form) for signing purposes; "A Brief Guide to Alcoholics Anonymous"; "A Deaf Newcomer Asks" for signing purposes; "How It Works" for signing purposes; "Is A.A. For YOU?" for signing purposes; The Serenity Prayer for signing purposes.
- * Money Tree Chart. Showing various ways contributions by A.A. members are used by G.S.O.
- * Newsletters in the Fellowship. Listing of some Area, District, Central/Intergroup Office newsletters.
- * Presentation -- What A.A. is and What it is Not. For alcoholism treatment program professionals and/or clients -- prepared by the Conference Treatment Facilities Committee.
- * Primary Purpose Statement Card. Regarding "Open" and "Closed" meetings.
- * Self-Support Packet. Contains the following, including the Conference-approved "Self-Support: Where Money and Spirituality Mix": Historical Background of Self-Support; Idea Starters; Posters; Service Delivery at the Group Level.
- * Serenity Prayer. Description of origin.
- * Sponsorship: A vital Stepping-Stone to Service and Sobriety. Piece on importance of service sponsor.
- * Staff Assignments. Descriptive sheet.
- * Suggested Guidelines for Changing Regional Boundaries.
- * Suggested Topics for Discussion Meetings. General topic ideas.
- * Suggested Workshop Format. Sheet on conducting workshops.
- * Survey. Summary of "A.A. Membership Survey."
- * Tapes for Sale or Exchange. List of distributors of A.A.

THE CARE OF ALCOHOLICS

St Thomas Hospital and A.A. started a movement which swept the country

By Sister M. Ignatia, C.S.A.

(Administrator, St. Thomas Hospital, Akron, Ohio)

Nearly 12 years ago, one of the co-founders of Alcoholics Anonymous, Dr. Bob was on our staff. He was a skilled proctologist, and was on our staff five years before we knew that he had a drinking problem. We would not have known it then had he not volunteered the information.

Dr. Bob often discussed the problem of alcoholism with us, with regard to auto accidents and other tragedies caused by excessive drinking. Many of these cases had to be admitted to the hospital even though they were intoxicated. After talking with members of the families of these compulsive drinkers and realizing the suffering brought into the homes of these afflicted people because of drink, we became deeply interested in the plan which Dr. Bob unfolded to us.

This was in 1939, just about the time we were trying to pull out of the depression. Hospital beds were at a premium, without any prospect of adding to our bed capacity. There was very little enthusiasm around the hospital about admitting people who were imbibing too freely in those days. However, prompted by the grace of God, we very cautiously admitted one patient, with the diagnosis of acute gastritis, under the care of Dr. Bob. The patient was placed in a two-bed room. The next morning Dr. Bob came to the admitting office very timidly and requested that the patient be moved to a spot where the men who came to visit him might talk with him privately. The only available space we could think of was a small room across the hall called the "flower room," where patients' flowers were changed and arranged. We pushed the alcoholic's bed into this room. It was there that he received his first A.A. visitors. The men who came to visit him were such respectable, dignified - appearing men that we could hardly believe they had ever been addicted to alcohol.

We then set aside a two-bed room, then a four and later a six-bed room ward. Today our A.A. ward has eight beds, adjoining a corridor which serves as a lounge. The corridor opens into the gallery of our chapel.

Our alcoholic ward is not a great problem. It is simply a large room with accommodations in one end for eight beds. The other end of the room is a small lounge with comfortable chairs, a davenport, A "bar" a coffee urn, and an ice-box. To the rear of this ward-lounge is a room with a lavatory and shower into which the new man is brought for admission to the ward.

An important point is that he is helped out of his street clothes and into hospital attire by other patients in the ward. The advantage for the new patient is that, from the first, he is in the care of understanding friends. The advantage for the older patients who perform this duty is that they are thus able to see themselves again as they were upon admission. Administratively, an economy is effected by thus eliminating the need for hard-to-get employees.

Directly across the hall from our ward-lounge is the choir-loft of our chapel, which permits A.A. patients to hear Mass every day if they wish and to make visits in hospital attire when they so desire - all in complete seclusion. Bearing in mind always that the alcoholic is a person who is sick spiritually as well as physically, the ready access he is thus given to the source of spiritual healing is a powerful factor in his recovery.

To return to the mechanical operation of the ward, it can be stated that it is almost wholly self-operating. A nurses aid comes in to make beds and an A.A. employee does the heavier cleaning. The cleaning of ash trays, the making of coffee - the coffee urn is in operation 24 hours each day - the washing of coffee cups, all of this is done by the patients themselves. Usually they welcome these small opportunities to busy themselves and thus keep their minds off their problems. Activity eliminates brooding, and the volume of such work is never great at any time.

The function of the lounge is to provide a place where the patient can chat with A.A. visitors and listen to informal talks. A secondary value, but a most important one to the former patient, is that by visiting current A.A. patients the former patient helps to perpetuate his own sobriety. It is axiomatic that the alcoholic is never "cured"; his ailment is simply arrested but it is positively arrested if he perseveres in the program. The visitors' lounge (which is supplemented by chairs in the hallway that divides the ward from the choir loft) helps not only to aid the current patient to sobriety but also to preserve and perpetuate the sobriety of former patients.

The icebox is kept stocked with food and particularly with milk and citrus juices, for the alcoholic is frequently an undernourished person. The patients are encouraged to eat at will. The coffee urn and bar are the A.A. equivalent for the brass rail and bottles of the drinking days.

The A.A. visitors perform a multitude of chores for the current patients. Sometimes they secure a job or effect a family reconciliation or pacify a creditor pressing for payment of a bill. These and other services are done by A.A. Is for the dual purpose of Showing true Christian brotherhood and as a means of perpetuating and insuring their own sobriety.

We begin where reality begins for the alcoholic. Reality for the alcoholic is drinking. It is most important that the approach be made through another alcoholic - a sponsor. The sponsor speaks the language of the alcoholic. He knows "all the tricks of the trade," because of personal experience.

Those of us who have anything to do with admitting these patients would do well to have the humility to rely upon the judgment of the sponsor. Let him decide when the patient is ready for the program. We do not accept repeaters! Sponsors know this, hence they are very careful to qualify the person before bringing him into the hospital. Above all, he must have a sincere desire to stop drinking. Wives, relatives, friends, and well meaning employers may try to high-pressure the alcoholic into accepting the program. Someone may even persuade the family doctor to use his influence with the hospital, so that the prospect may be admitted into the alcoholic ward.

The role of the sponsor is not an easy one. He leaves nothing undone to clear away all the ill feeling, indignation, and resentment that have accumulated in the path of his patient. The sponsor acts as a catalytic agent in combating all adverse forces. He tries to appease an exasperated wife, talks with the employer, landlord, creditors, and others. He explains the program, tells them that this is not simply another "sobering up process." This time he is being treated not only physically but morally and mentally as well. The sponsor assures them that with God's grace, their cooperation and the help of his fellow A.A.'s, his charge will be given a real opportunity to make a complete recovery.

The Patient Admitted To The Hospital

After registration the sponsor escorts his patient to the A.A. ward.

The ward is virtually self-governing. Two or three of the senior patients in the ward take over and welcome the new patient. They check his clothes and prepare him for bed. (Many of these patients are in such good condition that they sit in the lounge and join in the conversation). Nothing is left undone to make the new man feel at home. This reception inspires hope in his heart. It also gives the A.A. patients a splendid opportunity of doing twelfth-step work, namely, helping others.

The alcoholic is ill, in body, mind, and soul; hence we begin with the physical care.

Second day - The Day of Realization

The physical condition of the patient is usually much improved on the second day. His mind is beginning to clear. He feels encouraged because everyone seems interested in him. Visitors call on him, telling him "This is how I made it." Some of the visitors may be men with whom he used to drink. The power of example is a great example to the patient. He begins to say to himself. "If he can do it - so can I. But how am I going to make it?" At this point he generally has a "heart to heart talk" with his sponsor.

He acknowledges his utter powerlessness over alcohol. He honestly admits that he has tried innumerable times to drink normally and has always failed. He is finally ready, honestly and humbly, to admit defeat. His sponsor is delighted to know that his patient is really honest about his drinking. The sponsor says "Good! We can help you since you are humble and honest."

This is the grace of God at work in the soul of the patient -to admit helplessness and to seek help outside of self. This may be the first time the patient has admitted the fact that he is powerless to help himself.

The next step is humbly to turn to God: "Ask and you shall receive." Patients have often said that is the first time they sincerely prayed. The "Our Father" takes on a new meaning at this point. They feel that they really belong.

Third day - The Day of Moral Inventory

The patient makes a searching and fearless moral inventory. He faces the past honestly, admits to God, to himself, and to another human being the exact nature of his wrongs. He is finished with alibis and reservations. "I am an alcoholic, what a joy to be honest! The truth will make you free." Now he is sincerely asking God's help and the help of his fellow man.

Fourth Day - The Day Of Resolution

"Give us this day our daily bread." This is interpreted by the alcoholics to mean, "I surely can stay sober today." This is usually followed by an act of complete surrender to God. The past is finished. "I am heartily sorry." "I'll try to make amends." This means confession, repentance and firm purpose of amendment. Many Catholics return to the Sacraments after years of negligence. Scripture says, "There is more joy in heaven over one sinner doing penance than 99 just who need not penance." He used to drink because he felt like it. He permitted his emotions to run away with him. Now, with God's help and the help of his fellow A.A.'s, with his clear thinking, he can control his feelings and emotions. Reason now governs his life. Strong convictions are given him as to why he cannot take that first drink. He has learned from his fellow alcoholics that it is more blessed to give than to receive, and that it is a privilege to help others. What a joy too! He is kept so busy helping others that he does not have time to even think about a drink. What a transformation takes place in the lives of these men and women!

Fifth Day - Plans For The Future

As he leaves the hospital he must now face his problems. The way has been

Grapevine, Sept 1946

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

Baltimore, Md., A.A.s "take the air" every Thursday night at 7:15, and the resulting 12th Step follow-up work has been extremely gratifying. The management and staff of radio station WBFR in Baltimore are enthusiastic about the possibilities of A.A. as a sustaining program. . . . Plans for a larger permanent club are under way and in the interim Baltimore's Wednesday night open meetings are held at 512 Charles Street. . . . Appointment of a commission to study alcoholism in Maryland has been announced by Governor O'Connor. The Governor's action in naming a seven-member group was in line with a Senate resolution passed at the last regular session of the Legislature calling for appointment of the commission and a report by it to the 1947 General Assembly.

The Batesville, Ark., Group had its inception last year when a local man went in desperation to the Little Rock Group, and after a two-week stay came home and started to work on other alcoholics. Today the Batesville Group has a membership of 14, and clubrooms where they hold regular meetings. . . . The A.A. radio dramatization over Detroit's WWJ is recorded every Sunday at 6:15 P.M. over New York City's own station, WNYC. . . . The Little Rock, Arkansas, Group has now passed its sixth anniversary as one of the most active Groups in the Southwest. Membership continues to grow steadily.

In the attractive Sponsorship Program pamphlet -- which contains no musts, merely suggestions -- distributed among membership by Miami, Fla., A.A.s, we note: "A sponsor is a person who accepts responsibility to another person in A.A.; to be a friend, advisor, and an understanding confidant in any problem concerning the common malady, alcoholism. . . . LET HIM (the new member) TALK, TOO. . . . For the first 30 days, the new member (shall) be sponsored by the member who introduces him or her to A.A.; if no member was the direct avenue through which the new member contracted A.A., then the secretary assigns a temporary sponsor. . . . Explain the necessity of reading and re-reading the A.A. book. Point out that this book gives a detailed description of the A.A. tools and the suggested methods of application of these tools to build a foundation of rehabilitation for living." . . . It won't be so very long before the Miami Group will be six years old.

Definite arrangements have been completed for the Southern Regional Meeting in Asheville, N. C., September 16, 17 and 18, with the George Vanderbilt Hotel as headquarters. Plans are being made to accommodate the largest A.A. crowd yet assembled in the South. Nationally known speakers will be heard, and scheduled A.A. clinics will be held. These plans were announced at an Inter-Group meeting of all the Carolina groups which took place recently in Shelby, N. C., and was attended by about 90 members and their families.

During the Yale Summer School of Alcohol Studies which started July 7 and came to a close August 2, the New Haven, Conn., Group had an extra Wednesday night meeting at the local high school for four weeks, in addition to its regular Tuesday night meeting. The discussions proved highly interesting to audiences of about 275 persons. Many prominent speakers were heard at these meetings, among them clergymen, doctors, judges, lawyers and A.A. members from all over the country. Dr. Seldon D. Bacon of Yale University spoke briefly from the floor at the initial open meeting, giving praise to A.A. and expressing the hope for A.A.'s continued cooperation with The Yale Clinic in helping the alcoholic. He also said that plans were already established for clinics in several of the larger cities of Connecticut to be run by the State, and spoke of plans for establishing a new hospital to be sponsored by the State for inebriates. The picture, Problem Drinkers, was run at two of the local theatres during the first two weeks of the school, and A.A. newspaper ads were tied in. The New Haven Group has, in consequence, many new members, quite a few of whom are women.

Louisville, Ky., reports that its group, formed about five years ago, huffed and puffed along until about the first part of 1945. Then things began to happen and it has steadily grown until it now has a membership of over 150, all of whom are really working at the program. This number includes 36 women. The Louisville Group also includes New Albany, Ind., and they have four sectional groups which meet weekly. In addition to meetings almost every night in the week, there is a weekly luncheon for the men and another one for the women. Recently the Louisville A.A.s supervised the formation of a group at Shelbyville, Ky. "We operate with a light touch," writes a member from Louisville, "and don't get too sad or exercised about anything. Tolerance is our watchword, and the constant reminder that 'nobody speaks for A.A.' has kept us sober, happy, and growing."

With a membership nearing 400, Vancouver (B. C.), A.A.s recently came to the point where they felt the chapter was growing so large as to be unwieldy, and the meetings too crowded to achieve a useful intimacy of fellowship. So the decision to divide into smaller groups was made. Seven such groups, completely autonomous, now have been set up in Vancouver proper, with other groups in adjacent West Vancouver and New Westminister. The city groups are West End, Central, Hastings, Charlie Brown, Kerrisdale, Kitsilano, and Bayview. To establish some sort of liaison between these, a Central Steering Committee with one delegate from each group has been formed. It is purely a consulting body. Elsewhere in British Columbia A.A. continues to flourish, with new groups being continually formed. . . . In another section of Canada -- Toronto, Ontario -- word comes that the March of Time film has created a tremendous demand for information about A.A., and that this is partially responsible for the formation of a Central Committee. A Speakers' Bureau has also been formed, with names given from each group to the Central Club to answer calls from clubs, churches and social organizations. Dr. Bob is going to speak in Toronto in September. The Toronto

Women's Group, now numbering approximately 20, is going strong.

Writing about the Las Vegas, Nevada Group, with 35 men and women to date, and the new branch that has been formed by members from Boulder City and Henderson, a Las Vegas correspondent, lauding the work of A.A., begins with: "Last November, when it was announced that Alcoholics Anonymous had organized in Las Vegas, a startled woman went to her minister and complained at the sorry state of affairs. She declared that things were coming to an awful fix 'when the drunkards organize'." . . . More than 260 San Francisco A.A.s and their families held their annual picnic at the Sonoma County Golf Club -- a steak barbecue. This group now has four active neighborhood groups, the members of which retain their identities with the central group.

. . .
the combined groups of San Diego County, Calif., had their first annual picnic in Cuyamaca State Park in the Lugana mountains. More than 200 A.A.s, their friends and families were there.

Visitors from Kent, Ravenna, Barberton and Canton attended the picnic of the East Akron, O., Group. . . . Among recent visitors to Akron was the man who, back in 1935, drove Bill to the home of the prominent Akron woman who arranged the first meeting between Dr. Bob and Bill. The man in question, now a member of the Phoenix, Ariz., Group, was a chauffeur in those days, still struggling with his problem. He is a five-year-old member now. . . . One of the most inspiring meetings in the history of A.A. in the Cleveland area took place at Vermillion, O., when the group

Part I of 2

The Furrow, January 1952

GRACE IS SUFFICIENT - WHY ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS?

REVEREND SEAN O'RIORDAN, C.S.S.R., D.D. Maynooth College, Dublin, Ireland

I should like to draw the attention of readers of The Furrow to an article entitled "Science, Religion, and Alcoholism" which appeared in the American Catholic monthly magazine Integrity in September, 1951. In it "John Doe", himself a victim of alcoholism, discussed the problem of self-conquest in this difficult sphere, which date from his own experience.

For more years than he has "stomach to look back on" John Doe was an alcoholic. Yet it was not for want of trying to do better.

"I tried the Sacraments. Between drinking bouts I made frequent and intensive use of the channels of grace available to me. They did not seem to help.

"When not drinking, I was a daily communicant; I did a lot of spiritual reading; I made frequent retreats; I have knelt far into the night saying the rosary with arms outstretched in penance and petition.

"I have come from a private closed retreat with the utmost fervor and devotion - and walked into the first saloon I met. I have frequently been at Holy Communion in the morning and drunk the same night...."

"Then, a few months ago, on the advice of friends and with their assistance, I quite suddenly broke the pattern and stopped drinking. I did it by the combined use of two of the techniques recently evolved for the rehabilitation of alcoholics....

"It is now an established fact that I have gone without alcohol for a much longer period than ever since the drinking started. My drinking has been arrested. I have not been cured of alcoholism. I am still an alcoholic, and a moment of carelessness or overconfidence could start me back on the old cycle within a hour of writing these words. But I am not drinking. I am doing my best to fulfill my duty to myself, to my fellowman, and to God. I am, within the limitations of human nature and my own temperament, at peace."

NATURAL VS. SUPERNATURAL MEANS

There we have a concrete case of a man who overcame the grip of his fatal habit by natural means of physical and psychological readjustment, when he had failed to do so by supernatural means directed at overcoming temptation. This is certainly a fact of considerable interest to anyone who has to deal with the problem of recidivism, whether in the matter of alcoholism or in any other sphere. As John Doe himself puts it, "If a man can stop drinking because another man convinces him he is an alcoholic and one drink means disaster, why can he not stop when a priest tells him that he has a chronic weakness and is bound under pain of mortal sin to avoid the occasion of sin?"

Later in his article the writer enumerates the Twelve Steps toward lasting sobriety laid down by Alcoholics Anonymous, the rehabilitation movement that has had such a striking record of success in different countries (including Ireland) in recent times. They deserve to be repeated here in full before we go on, with the help of John Doe, to consider the bearing of such remedial techniques on the spiritual life of the recidivist.

THE TWELVE STEPS OF A.A.

1. We admitted we were powerless over alcohol - that our lives had become unmanageable.
2. Came to believe that a Power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity.
3. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God as we understood Him.
4. Made a searching and fearless inventory of ourselves.
5. Admitted to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.
- 6) Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.
7. Humbly asked Him to remove our shortcomings.
8. Made a list of all persons we had harmed, and became willing to make amends to them all.
9. Made direct amends to such people wherever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others.
10. Continued to take personal inventory and when we were wrong promptly admitted it.
11. Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out.

12. Having had a spiritual awakening as a result of these steps, we tried to carry this message to alcoholics, and to practice these principles in all our affairs.

And so we return to John Doe's questions: "If a man can stop drinking by following twelve rules of conduct laid down by two drunks, why can he not stop by following the ten commandments and the moral and ascetic teaching of his faith?" A superficial answer might be: "A man will stop when he really wants to stop. He promises his confessor that he will avoid the occasion of sin, but deep down in himself he doesn't mean it sincerely. Then one day he promises A.A. never to touch a single drink again, and this time he does mean it; so of course he stops. The result would have been the same if his promise to his confessor had been equally sincere in the first instance. But the question remains: "Granted that the fundamental sincerity and firmness of the purpose of amendment are of capital importance, how is it that A.A. can elicit such a purpose from a habitual drinker when a priest cannot?" Moreover, in many cases the fundamental sincerity is there all the time; but while it fails to secure a victory over habit under a strictly spiritual course of guidance, it achieves signal and lasting results under the guidance of A.A. This is fairly clear in the case of John Doe himself. His good will was constant and genuine for years, but he did not get the better of drink until he used techniques of rehabilitation. Is it, then, that such techniques form, as John Doe suggests, "necessary concomitants to the ordinary channels through which spiritual and supernatural aid reach the ordinary Catholic?"

DISTINGUISH ALCOHOLISM FROM DRUNKENNESS

The inquiry must begin farther back. Actually John Doe begins it with the help of a study of alcoholism made by Father John C. Ford, S.J., a well-known American moral theologian. He is glad to find Father Ford accepting, for a start, the difference between drunkenness and alcoholism. "The first important point established by Father Ford is the distinction between mere drunkenness and its morality and the morality of alcoholism. He says: alcoholism is not the same thing as drunkenness; not even the same thing as excessive drinking; not even the same thing as excessive drinking over a period of time. ` For, as he points out, there are people who can do all these things without becoming alcoholics. They can stop if they want to, much as a man with a long habit of smoking can give it up."

Alcoholism is therefore an abnormal phenomenon. As Father Ford points out, "the alcoholic is not a normal individual where responsibility for his drinking is concerned. He is across the line on the abnormal side and his drinking is correctly termed pathological."

COMPULSION - POWERLESSNESS

This does not mean at all that the alcoholic is necessarily insane. "But," says Father Ford, "when we say alcoholism is a disease or disorder, or sickness of a mental kind, we mean that the drinking itself is to a greater or lesser degree compulsive... On this point - the compulsive character of the alcoholic's drinking- I believe there is a great unanimity among all the psychiatrists and other specialists in the field."

John Doe agrees absolutely. He comments;"In the course of discussing this compulsion, Father Ford makes a statement which I, as an alcoholic, would beg you, a non-alcoholic, to accept, even if you do not understand how it can be so. He writes: "There are times when an alcoholic reaches for a drink blindly and compulsively even when he has had nothing to drink for a considerable period. I was not ready to believe this at first. But after listening to hundreds of alcoholics tell their stories, and after questioning many of them on that very point, I am convinced that not only after having had some drinks but even after a considerable period of sobriety the alcoholic reaches out compulsively and blindly for the first drink." That statement is stark truth....

In other words, the alcoholic is, as the first of the twelve steps says, "powerless over alcohol." His powerlessness is, of course, a moral, not an absolute one, but it is terribly real for all that. He is not a sinner in the ordinary sense, that is, a man who "cannot because he will not." "The unfortunate fact of experience,' says John Doe, "is that the man doesn't, and he doesn't because he can't. That is neither theory nor excuse. It is a cold fact of experience to which I and thousands like me can attest."

SIN AND NEUROSIS

Not that the element of freedom and therefore of sin is absent from alcoholism. It is present, but in a complex and obscure way. There is a mental element in alcoholism; there is probably a physical element in it in many cases; but a third element, the spiritual one, must also be considered. Father Ford writes; "Psychiatrists who do not believe in sin will class all these persons as neurotics. Religious -minded people who know nothing of neurosis will class all these people as sinners. But I see no inherent difficulty in admitting that the same person can be both a neurotic and a sinner. In the case of the alcoholic, he can be both a compulsive drinker and a sinner, his misconduct being at times the product of his compulsion and at other times of his willfulness."

John Doe comments; "The alcoholic will agree to that. In fact, he will be glad about it as a just and clarifying judgement."

ACCEPTANCE

Now we come to what this sincere and enlightening writer regards as the crucial point in the cure of alcoholics. The alcoholic must accept his status, before God and man, as an alcoholic. He must realize the difference between his position and that of the simple drunkard who does not suffer the compulsive factor in drinking. "From my own experience, and the experience and knowledge of others, I know that acceptance of this distinction and an attitude based on such acceptance form the all--important first step that must be taken both by the victim of alcoholism and by anyone who would aid in his rehabilitation. It is a hard step for both parties to take. The first is extremely unwilling to admit that he is not as other men- that he is an alcoholic. The second, if he is a non-alcoholic, cannot for the life of him see why the other cannot pull himself together and put an end to this bad habit." A.A.'s are fully aware of the necessity of building everything on this initial acceptance of the true nature of alcoholism; hence their success. But confessors are often ignorant of the matter (as are alcoholic penitents themselves); hence their failure to effect a cure, in spite of the excellence of the spiritual means of grace which the church places at the disposal of all us. The fact is that grace does not then get a chance of working fully and freely in the soul of the alcoholic. He lacks adequate self-knowledge.

I AM NOT ONE OF THE BOYS

This lack can have disastrous and long-term results for the sufferer. If he looks on himself as a normal fellow in every way, with nothing but a moral defect to overcome, he is in for serious trouble. After a brief recovery from a drinking bout he will again "drop in for a couple of beers with the boys," on the supposition that if they can have a couple of drinks and go home, so can he.

John Doe again speaks from experience, "In my own experience, after having `dropped in for a couple of beers with the boys' and finished up by drinking to drunkenness, not once or twice or ten or eleven times, but time after time for years, I have again gone in to have a drink with the boys and felt absolutely certain and clear in my conscience that I was just going to have that couple of drinks and go home.. .am.. . fully aware that it is against all reason and common sense that I could possibly have felt like that. . .I am also aware that it is the common excuse of any moral coward to say, `I couldn't help it.' But neither the shame of being accused of that, nor the fear of ridicule, alters the fact that I was quite certain I was going to have only a couple of beers.

"In my case I had not yet fully admitted that I was an alcoholic. But whatever the reason, the fact stands and it demands recognition.

"So there, I think, we have the basic first step in the rehabilitation of the alcoholic; the non--alcoholic accepting authoritative opinion that there is, as distinct from common drunkenness, such a thing as a disease called alcoholism; the alcoholic accepting authoritative opinion that he is subject to that disease.

FINALITY OF ACCEPTANCE

"The fundamental reason for the success of A.A. is the absolute finality with which the first step is taken by both sides. For both 'doctor' and 'patient' are alcoholics who have made the admission that 'I am powerless over alcohol.' There is not lack of understanding on the one side, no feeling of being unjustly despised on the other."

This acceptance prevents another misfortune which lies in wait for the compulsive drinker who continues to think of himself as a quite normal man; the "ever-descending spiral of his despair," as John Doe calls it. Once he knows himself as he really is and knows that his deliverance must come from God, he will stop reckoning his failures in terms of what is "normal" (as the word is commonly understood). He will not worry because he cannot drink at all without drinking madly, whereas "the boys" can take a drink and leave it at that. He will simply stop thinking of himself as one of "the boys," will leave them to go their way while he goes his, and so will escape the tendency to take chances on the one hand or to grow despondent over repeated failures on the other.

Applying the conclusions of his own experience to the relationship of priest and penitent in the Church's sacramental life, John Doe maintains that both priest and penitent must be quite clear about "the distinction between mere drunkenness and alcoholism as a disease. Berating an alcoholic for being a no-good drunk, or whining at him for 'doing this to me and the children,' does nothing but drive him back to drink. The alcoholic may or may not be a reprobate. He is certainly a sick man.

|||||

+++Message 1310. . . . . Rel. & AA - Furrow, January 1952

(part II)

From: Jim Blair . . . . . 9/9/2001 6:18:00 AM

|||||

(part II)

REHABILITATION

So much for the starting point. But what about the process of rehabilitation itself? Here again, says John Doe, A.A. with their twelve steps have something solid to offer which is, unfortunately, not often proposed to the penitent in confession. As he expresses it himself; "The second reason I give for the success of A.A. is a rather shocking one. I offer it in humility and with all due respect. A.A. insists more vigorously on the practice of those principles of Christian ascetics and the spiritual life than do priests of the Church of Christ."

Such is an experienced Catholic's judgment on the twelve steps - and he has been through the alcoholic mill himself. They "bring about conversion of life," he insists, "where sacramental confession has failed. Now, the Grace of God never fails. So there must have been something blocking the channel. That failure can only be man's failure to co-operate with the grace. The failure, in turn, must essentially lie in the understanding or in the will of the penitent. Granting that the penitent alcoholic really wants to stop, and allowing for the weakness of will born of habitual indulgence, we must put a large part of the blame on the penitent's understanding. He does not understand the nature of his soul-sickness and he does not understand the absolute necessity of specific remedial action.

"This is where the priest should come in as a physician of souls. And this is where the priest so often fails. He fails to enlighten the penitent's understanding. He fails to prescribe a regime for the strengthening of his will. A.A. does both. It not only tells the man what is wrong with him but it adds, "Here's what you have to do if you want to get better."

COMPLETE NEW WAY OF LIFE

Moreover, John Doe points out, A.A. aims at building up a new way of life for the alcoholic on a positive, over--all basis. Alcohol is mentioned only once, in the first step. A recognition, humble and unflinching, of its deadly power over the victim is made a point of departure for a completely new way of life where alcohol loses its power because another Power takes over. But the humble acceptance of the victim's personal frailty is always maintained. "I am still an alcoholic," says John Doe, "and a moment of carelessness or overconfidence could start me back on the old cycle within an hour of writing these words."

CO-OPERATION WITH A.A.

At the end of his article he quotes Father Ford to the effect that "cooperation with A.A. is essential to the successful pastoral care of alcoholics." He seems to think, for his own part, that such cooperation is very desirable but will not ordinarily be essential, provided that the priest as physician of souls is able to appreciate and apply in practice the principles of rehabilitation so well understood by A.A.

DEGREE OF RESPONSIBILITY

As to the precise degree of responsibility which the confessor should attach to an alcoholic's acts of drunkenness, John Doe agrees with Father Ford's opinion: "His responsibility for his drinking is generally diminished to a considerable extent, and sometimes eliminated, but each alcoholic, each drinking episode, and even each act of drinking must be judged separately. .

.and in the final analysis the judgement must be left to a merciful God."

COMPULSIVE PROBLEMS IN GENERAL

Apart from the light which this article throws on the problem of compulsive drinking from a layman's experience, "on the outside of the confessional grill," as he says himself, it helps also, I think, to clarify a number of points relating to "compulsive" acts as a class. The compulsive factor is one that arises in connection with many other types of sinful or spiritually disturbing acts besides drinking to excess. Indeed a certain degree of compulsiveness asserts itself in some acts of most people who are, by all standards, quite normally constituted. A familiar example of this, in the religious sphere, is compulsive distraction at prayer. It is one thing to be distracted in a casual or accidental way, say by stray thoughts running through the mind from time to time; it is quite another matter to be internally driven to distraction, as if by a mechanical force, under pressure from some preoccupying thought, pleasant or painful, which sticks inextricably in one's mind like a piece of barbed wire. Yet there are few, even among the most recollected people, who do not have that distressing experience from time to time. Similarly one can suffer from compulsive impatience talkativeness (or taciturnity), laziness, insubordination, and so on.

FRONTAL ATTACK USELESS

Ascetical writers have much to say of these spiritual "trials," and it is a noteworthy fact that the Church's ascetical tradition deals with them in substantially the same way as A.A. deals with alcoholism. Thus we are recommended not to try to combat persistent (i.e., compulsive) distractions at prayer by a frontal attack or obstinate self-assertive efforts at recollection. That will get us nowhere, since our efforts, however dogged and well-intentioned, will be vitiated from within by the deep--seated inner "cleavage" of attention from which we are suffering and over which we have, at least for the moment, no direct control. One might as well try to eliminate an infection from one's lungs by violent coughing. The only thing for a man with lung trouble to do is acknowledge that he cannot cure himself and to put himself unreservedly in the hands of the doctors. In the same way, when we are the victims of compulsive distraction, impatience and the like, or of compulsive temptation in thought against the Christian virtues (say against faith or chastity), we always get the same advice from the saints: "Do not try to get rid of these things directly. Rather take advantage of them to confess your powerlessness before God; surrender your-self into His keeping, with all readiness to accept whatever sacrifices He may ask of you, whatever duties He may lay on you; commit yourself entirely to the care of your loving and merciful Father in heaven --and all will be well." The analogy between such counsels and the first three of the twelve steps (from which the other nine logically derive) is obvious.

PASTORAL TECHNIQUES

These considerations suggest the possibility of broadening our approach to the whole body of moral and spiritual deadlocks that involve, and are created by, the compulsive factor in human conduct. The priest as physician of souls encounters this factor repeatedly, not only in the sphere of alcoholism but also in such serious moral entanglements as scrupulosity on the one hand and autoeroticism on the other. In such cases the victim is powerless over his troubles in just the same sense as the alcoholic is powerless over alcohol. Here too, the confessor may fail to help the sufferer as much as he might, if he persists in treating him as though his psychological make-up were, here and now, fully normal -telling him not to be a fool, to pull himself together, to behave just like everybody else, and so on. This may be a quite effective way of dealing with a mild case of compulsive aberration -- that is, where the element of compulsiveness is slight or momentary (it is momentary, for example, in most cases of individual or mass panic) but it does not work with serious and permanent cases. The program of rehabilitation from alcoholism outlined by John Doe would seem to offer a better nucleus of general principles capable of being applied, with the necessary adaptations, to similar situations in other fields.

SURRENDER TO GOD'S PROVIDENCE

In the last sentence of his article this writer says that when the Catholic alcoholic makes use of the right remedial techniques "with the blessing and understanding of his Church" his alcoholism "is transformed from a soul eating monster to a felix culpa which turns him towards the practice of Christian perfection." Here, surely, in the recognition of an overruling Providence behind all human weaknesses and sins we have a basic outlook of incomparable value for the proper handling of compulsive difficulties as a class. If God allows evil, it is only in order that He may draw greater good from it that is as true of psychological snags and cleavages as of physical sickness, poverty, war, and all the other misfortunes of human existence. Man's extremity is, in fact, God's supreme opportunity. Driven back on his ultimate defenses, man finds himself alone with God and sees that there is only one way out; Humility of heart, unconditional surrender to God, absolute self-abandonment into His hands, obedience to His will. To take that way out of one's troubles is to set one's feet, as John Doe says, on a road leading "towards the practice of Christian perfection." The fault is indeed happy which has so happy an ending.

Confidence in God's loving providence, then, both priest and penitent need not fear to recognize a compulsive trouble for what it is -- not a straightforward case of mere "nonsense" or "sin" or "lack of purpose of amendment," but of "soul sickness," as John Doe terms it. (we may take that term as covering both the mental and the spiritual elements in compulsive acts, leaving room also, of course, for the possibility of contributory physical factors). Thus the penitent is asked to begin by accepting his personal powerlessness over something which he would very much like to overcome - and may be, in fact, trying hard to overcome - by self-reliant exertions of one kind or other.

PREPARING THE GROUND FOR GRACE

The breakdown of these exertions then becomes intelligible to him. He has no alternative except, in a human sense, to despair of himself ("I am powerless over alcohol"), since all his self-assertive efforts are sabotaged from the start by a profound inner snag which he bears willy-nilly within himself. This is, inevitably, an extremely disconcerting realization - -but also a liberating one. The victim gives up trying to discover and apply rules of rehabilitation based on the supposition that he has only to want to be normal. He knows now that normality is not for him; he is powerless, except for his power to turn to God.

The second and third steps can now be taken ("Came to believe that a power greater than ourselves could restore us to sanity. Made a decision to turn our will and our lives over to the care of God."). The grace of the sacraments and of prayer can then function in a properly prepared environment of subjective life, and the time may come when, for example, the apparently incurable autoerotic may be able to say, in words that echo those of Integrity's thought-provoking contributor: "I have not been cured of autoeroticism. I am still an autoerotic and a moment of carelessness or overconfidence could start me back on the old cycle within an hour of writing these words. But I am not sinning. I am doing my best to fulfill my duty to myself, to my fellow man and to God. I am, within the limitations of human nature and my own temperament, at peace...."

Integrity deserves the thanks of theologians and the pastoral clergy alike for publishing "Science, Religion, and Alcoholism." Based as it is on a fact finding course pursued in the unique academic institution, the "university of hard knocks," it is a valuable contribution towards the progress of our knowledge in our obscure but important department of human conduct.

DISCUSSION

Q.: That was an excellent paper. Doesn't it touch the question of the old problem, namely, recognition by the alcoholic of his own state? What I ask is this: Is that a perfectly natural act or does it in turn imply some kind of a special, actual grace? A.A. offers a fine opportunity for this self-recognition as an alcoholic. Does it bring into play a special, actual grace for the occasion? If so, then, I can still see that it is quite properly handled in the confessional. But, if not, isn't it true that the confessor would have an obligation to outline this to the penitent, and have him promise that he is taking steps accordingly? That in turn would lead the priest to taking the case out of the confessional, and to suggesting that he go to A.A., in obedience to what the confessor knows would be the prosecution of a perfectly natural act, rather than surrounding it with the supernatural aura which in turn might delay the recognition.

Fr. Pfau: I think we have all had that experience in the confessional. Especially those of us in A.A. The procedure is to ask the man if it is all right to talk about this outside the confessional. Now, most priests I have talked to who are members of A.A. approach the man in some way similar to this: "If you are honest, and sincere in wanting to do something about your problem, you will naturally be willing to give a hearing to men who, as we know by their results, have the answers for your problem. Would you be willing to speak to a member or two members of A.A.?" Then, usually, if the man is sincere, he goes to A.A. In a few weeks or so he comes back to you ready for all the spiritual advice that you want to give him. The penitent's mind is pretty confused in the confessional. The emphasis there is on moral degeneracy that he is trying to fight against in himself. The main thing is to help him recognize it for what it really is, and that he is not a moral degenerate. I think that is the main reason, and it is psychological more than anything else.

Father A.: With regard to the confessional, I am experienced as both confessor and alcoholic, and I would defy any of the confessors to know I am an alcoholic. They may have learned it from someone else, but I didn't confess it myself. I did confess I had had too much to drink. I think our sphere of activity here' is more often in the field of pastoral theology or pastoral care than directly in the confessional. You may be aware from someone coming in, a wife or friend, or from your own observation, that a man very definitely has this problem of alcoholism. My way of handling it is this: If someone comes in and tells me that a brother or husband is an alcoholic, I don't say, "Bring him in." But when I am taking census in that area I find' it easy to get on the topic of alcoholism. I try to convey to the man first of all that alcoholism is a disease, and to get him to accept that knowledge. Now, the acceptance of that knowledge on his part, as having personal application, definitely requires an actual grace because of pride. Another thing in regard to the confessional, Father Ford points out that we must distinguish between the drunkard and the alcoholic; but it works the other way around, too. Not everyone who confesses his sins of drunkenness is an alcoholic; so to advise everyone who comes and confesses drunkenness to go to A.A. is as incorrect as to advise no one to go to A.A. Your knowledge of the particular case will be more complete in the things you know from outside of the confessional, than by what your penitent actually says. I think the most important thing that the pastor can do, especially the non--alcoholic pastor, is first of all to inform himself on the nature of alcoholism. Then, when he sees the symptoms of alcoholism present in one of his parishioners he tries to convey his knowledge of alcoholism as a disease to that person. Then he can try to guide him to those who have personal knowledge of the disease, within A.A. After you do that, continue to give encouragement, but let go of the ball! Don't try to do it yourself. Give him the knowledge of the fact that alcoholism is a disease; then "let go and let God" step in. That's a phrase you often hear in A.A. I think that's the best help a pastor can give. First of all, knowledge, then guidance to where he can get the therapy of A.A., and then constant encouragement. Of course, too, I think that we should bear in mind that an alcoholic priest in confession can more quickly recognize the problem of alcoholism than the non--alcoholic priest. There is something there we can sense while the non-alcoholic priest might be debating in his mind whether this man is or isn't an alcoholic. On the average, the ordinary excessive drinker does not minimize his drinking, whereas the alcoholic will always minimize it. If he says, "I only had one beer," you suspect him; if he says, "I had two beers," you know he is an alcoholic. The excessive drinker is not particularly ashamed of it. The alcoholic is ashamed of it.

Father B.: I think there is one point that Father brought up that is important. He asked the question whether or not the recognition by the alcoholic of the fact that he is an alcoholic and the admission and acceptance of it was a natural act. I'd like to say this: It is hard for a person who is not an alcoholic to understand how an alcoholic can be so blind to his condition. An alcoholic is suffering terribly from alcohol. Everybody else is aware of the fact that he is alcoholic and that he should never drink, but the alcoholic himself is the last one to become aware of what alcohol is doing to him. I don't think it is a natural act for an alcoholic to be able to see and accept the fact that he is an alcoholic. He is blind to that, and somebody has to help him, and I think that is the work of A.A. The phenomenal success of A.A. is attributed by A.A. to the grace of God which works through this fellowship of A.A. It is the act of charity performed by the members of A.A. in trying to help other alcoholics that brings the grace to the alcoholic to enable him to see that he is a person who never should drink. The members of A.A. become the instruments of God's grace to alcoholics to enable them to open their eyes and become aware of the fact that they are suffering from the sickness of alcoholism.

Father C.: I think the incidence of members of A.A. who did not realize that they were alcoholics is large. We have to keep that in mind. There are a lot of fellows who go along with the program a long time before they admit that they are alcoholic. In my own experience, for a year and a half I had no recognition of the program. I was told I was alcoholic. I couldn't drink. It was a year and a half before I suddenly had the realization. That is the reason we should never push it. The most important thing in the initial period of sobriety, going back to the sacraments and all the other things will follow. Undoubtedly it is an actual grace, but we can't prognosticate that either.

Father D.: Would you say this blindness is part of the clinical picture or part of the ascetical problem of alcoholism as a vice or as a disease?

large enough to accommodate their expanded membership. As of November 29th, the Manhattan clubhouse at 405 West 41st Street (New York City) will be no more. The building has been sold. In the meantime, the various groups, including Manhattan, which made the clubhouse their gathering center, are scrambling around, individually, looking for space for a social center, space to hold meetings, both large and small, space of any kind to be used for A.A. work. This compulsory relinquishment of the spacious 41st Street clubhouse may result in the establishment of many more small groups throughout New York City than exist at present, with each group having its own headquarters --as has long been the case in the other big cities. Manhattan alone has been an exception to this rule.

In Charlotte, N. C., where the group has been unable to find any permanent clubroom space at all, and where the various meetings are held in different places, the problem has been partially solved by a member of the judiciary. Judge Reed of the Domestic Court has generously given over his courtroom at the Mecklenburg County Court House for two meetings a week. . . . The Charlotte branch, which had its inception in 1942 and reports "92% happy and sober," was well represented at a big meeting in Greenville, S. C. Other members came from groups in Rock Hill, Anderson, Spartanburg, and Inman, S. C.; and from Shelby (the original group of the Carolinas), and Asheville, N. C. Bennettsville is a recent South Carolina group to get going; others reporting increasing numbers in the two states are Andrews, Charleston, Greensboro, Greenville and Hendersonville. The two-man Elizabeth City, N. C., Group visits religiously the meetings at Norfolk, Va.

October finds the Dallas membership confident that local activity is on the eve of its greatest progress. They (the lucky minority) cite, as an example, that club facilities are more adequate than ever!--and that meeting attendance is snowballing. Workmen have completed removal of the three-year-old downtown chapter to the second story of a building which has been sub-leased for two years--2,700 square feet of space. The total membership of this group, combined with a suburban group which is quartered in a formerly fashionable residence whose decorations were executed by members themselves, totals over 200. The two groups cooperate in weekly open meetings. Nacogdoches and Amarillo branches are forging forward, too.

Average attendance of four California groups comes to exactly 1,000: Los Angeles, 400; Pasadena, 200; Glendale-Burbank, 250; Long Beach, 150. . . . The Pasadena Group, one of the first to spring up soon after A.A. was first introduced to Southern California, in 1945, had an attendance of 86 in August, 1945. One year later the count was well over 200. . . . City and county police courts, judges and prosecutors are cooperating with A.A. in Pasadena--which group has been mainly responsible for the organization of branches this past year in Pomona, Arcadia, Whittier and Oxnard.

Since division of the Vancouver, B. C., A.A.s into five autonomous groups, held together by a central steering committee, each group has gone ahead steadily and membership continues to increase. . . . A visit to the Kerrisdale Group by two newspaper men resulted in a highly readable column about A.A. in a Vancouver newspaper, and a radio broadcast over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's network from Winnipeg. . . "With drunkenness records in Vancouver police court showing

a 300% gain over 1943, A.A.'s work gains added significance in the community," writes
the Vancouver reporter on group activities.

Among the festivities planned for the October 26-27 celebration of the third anniversary of the Des Moines, Iowa, Group are a "chuck wagon" breakfast--all
the chuck you can eat, you bring the wagon; a ladies' luncheon; an afternoon
"bull session," and a banquet at which 600-750 are expected, with floor show--and no speeches! . . . The non-alcoholic wives of the Tulsa, Oklahoma, chapter hold regular meetings.

Two more groups, New Orleans and Houston, have participated in CBS's "Quiz
of
Two Cities" program. New Orleans came off the winner. . . . A.A.s from New Orleans addressed the Hammond, La., Group; attending were members from chapters which derived from the original New Orleans Group: Hammond, Covington, and Houma, La.; Tylertown and Gulfport, Miss. Quite a few veterans are coming into the New Orleans chapter, direct from the Veterans Hospital--where the medical staff is 100% for A.A.

The South Bronx Group, 222 Alexander Avenue, New York 51, reports that it is perhaps the only group in the metropolitan area which holds regular meetings on Saturday
nights. Countless visitors, in consequence, from other groups in and around New York
City come to these (former binge-night) sessions. The meetings have been splendidly written up by The Bronx Home News. . . . One of the growingest little groups is
in Wooster, Ohio. They have between 25 and 30 members and often exchange meetings

with the Ashland Group.

From Northern California comes word that there has been "considerable opposition to the A.A. program in Reno, Nevada." But since some of the Sacramento and Roseville members --18 in all--went to Reno and held an opening meet, it is felt that the Reno populace now has a better understanding of the aims of A.A. . . . At a Greenwich Village Group (New York City) meeting last month a brand new woman member told of suddenly coming to--out in Reno. What in heaven's name was she doing there getting a divorce? She got out just in time. Her case was to have been heard the following day. She hopped a plane going East--back to her husband and children and A.A. . .

The 20-30 Club of North Sacramento invited an A.A. to speak at one of its dinners. After the formal talk was over he answered questions peppered at him from the 55 diners. . . The Ladies Group of San Diego enjoyed its first anniversary as a separate group, with the men attending their shindig en masse, proud of the success of the women A.A.s. . . . To the University of California's Institute on Alcohol Studies, held for one week during late summer, came a large crowd from Los Angeles's social, political, religious and scientific world.

The 15 members in Pocohontas, Iowa, have to date had about nine meetings; all hands staying dry. . . . The New Castle, Ohio, Group held a combined meeting with the Alliance A.A.s. . . . Youngstown, Ohio, reports that over 350 new A.A. contacts were made during the first six months that their central office was in existence.

that were just "rim-runners," and there were those few who died drunk, but there were some who had a slip but remained and stayed sober for good thereafter. For those who did try, there were great successes, especially in the Midwest. Let's keep in mind, the culture existing in America respecting AA of that period is not the same as what we have today. AA was unknown, and recovery from alcoholism was relegated to the sparse hospital remedies of the time. The idea of reliance on God to affect a cure was considered radical, and one must consider the tough sell Bill and Dr. Bob had. Imagine being Bill Dotson, AA #3, lying in bed and listening to the proclamations of two people, with no other record of success behind them! How much stock would YOU have placed in their testimonies? It's not like the thousands of AA meetings and members who have had success today to convince people to try AA. Just to reach 34 sober drunks by November 1937 (not 40, as Bill stated in AA Comes of Age), was a true miracle! If 34, or 40, or 79, or 100 people had been healed from SARS, with no other method of a cure for SARS, that news would have been on the worldwide newswires in an instant! We should not think of them as "ONLY 34, or ONLY 40, etc." After all, the successes of these first AAs produced a wellspring of inquiries from media articles of the time. It was a big deal!

Building up from nothing required a tremendous amount of effort and hard sell. Also keep in mind, these were all "low-bottom" drunks. Certainly the majority of AA members today would not be classified as such, and the early AAs had much more devastation to climb out of. To consider a slip in the early days as a failure, come on! What can be expected from an individual who had been a hardcore drunk for many years, trying a program that was virtually untested? Certainly most of them had to be skeptical at first. Fear of reliance on God and selflessly helping others in hospitals and others' homes must have been rampant, as it would have been completely out of character for many of these early pioneers. Adherence to the Four Absolutes, reading the Bible, and attending gatherings must have been a heavy prescription to swallow, to be sure. But many did take it, and many succeeded beyond wildest expectations.

One other note: AA itself produced an internal memo in 1990 called "Comments on AA's Triennial Surveys" that clearly exhibits, at best, a 5% success rate between 1977-1989. 95 of 100 individuals leave AA inside of one year. The general AA public has never seen this report. Before we begin to diminish the importance of our early history, let's ponder our own current situation and see if there's a need to take a cue from our pioneers and see what "really worked."

For those who are interested in the roster, I have it available (in syllabus form), and I will gladly ship it out to those who wish to respond:

taken out of circulation.

Alcoholics Anonymous, an organization founded by Dr. Smith and Bill Wilson, two former alcoholics, completely disagreed with and disproved this theory. It was their contention that the alcoholic is a sick man and should be treated as such. Modern social workers, more and more, are coming to appreciate the point of view of Alcoholics Anonymous.

The question frequently asked, "Why does the alcoholic drink?" is answered by Alcoholics Anonymous in these words: "The alcoholic drinks to escape." The alcoholic is definitely an escapist. He is seeking to escape from some reality or imagined reality. It may not always be easy to put one's finger on the cause of the escape complex, but it is there none the less. It may rest fundamentally in an inferiority complex and frequently it is accompanied by a feeling of resentment or self-pity. The Alcoholics Anonymous philosophy says one of the objects of Alcoholics Anonymous is to straighten out the kinks in his mental processes and thus remove the causes of his escape mechanism.

The Alcoholics Anonymous program is divided into twelve steps. The alcoholic-seeking sobriety is expected to mentally and spiritually live up to each step as it is presented to him.

The first step of the A.A. is nothing more than a recognition of the fact that one has been powerless over alcohol, and that one's life has become unmanageable. This may be very obvious to the general public, but often it is not appreciated by the alcoholic himself. The A.A.'s have an old saying that you may have to hit bottom before you realize it is time to quit, but smart is the man who can come to his true senses before he does. Where there is smoke, there must be some fire and generally the friends and intimates of an alcoholic know it before he himself does. Sometimes, even a bartender will advise a man time and time again to quit, all to no avail. While it is never too late to get the program, it is better to get sobriety before one's home and family life have been destroyed.

Then, you are ready to contemplate the second step - that a higher power can restore you to sanity. This is a difficult step for some with no belief in God, but experience has proven that it is absolutely essential. While there are a small number of atheists and agnostics in the ranks of A.A. - men who either deny the existence of a God or deny that we can know of His existence - it is doubtful if their dryness is due entirely to A.A.

The second step speaks of a higher power, not of a Supreme Being or a personal God. Theoretically, this allows for the inclusion of Pantheists, who associate God with nature, and Deists, who believe in a Supreme Power but deny the validity of Revelation. However, the following steps of A.A. make sense only if one believes in a personal God, that is, a God possessed of intellect and will.

The Third step, following from the second, is a resolution to turn our lives over to this Supreme Power as we understand Him. If we visualize God as a force only, it is ridiculous to talk of turning our lives over to blind force. It is absurd also to make a confession and promise restitution to a blind force. To have any meaning, this Supreme Power must be a personal God.

The Fourth step of A.A. calls for a searching and fearless moral inventory. This personal inventory should be a familiar thing to a Catholic who, from the time of First Holy Communion, has been taught to examine his conscience regularly. This examination should apply not only to lapses from sobriety but to all moral failings. This leads to the fifth and most difficult step of all - admitting to God, to ourselves, and to another human being the exact nature of our wrongs.

In general, the Fifth step of A.A. has brought about greater respect for the Catholic confessional, very frequently a stumbling block to the non-Catholic mind. However, it has also been the cause of some misunderstanding and confusion. True is the old saying, "Confession is good for the soul." But this does not explain the existence of the Sacrament of Penance in the Catholic Church. We Catholics go to Confession because we firmly believe that this is the ordinary way in which Christ intended that sins be forgiven. That is why He appeared to His apostles on the evening of Easter Sunday and conferred upon them the power to forgive sin.

To say that this A.A. confession should be more intensive or complete than the sacramental confession is to misunderstand entirely the place of confession in the Catholic Church. It is possible for one to perform any of his religious duties in a routine manner, but this is the fault of the individual, not the sacrament. For intensiveness and completeness, it is not possible to improve on the sacramental confession rightly understood.

The penitent who approaches the Sacrament of Penance is expected to have a firm purpose of amendment to avoid all sin. He may well have had this good intention in the past but because he was not concentrating at that time on his alcoholic weakness he may not have had the results he now obtains with the help of A.A. The fault however, was not with the sacrament but with the failure of the individual to take proper advantage of the confessional.

The Catholic priest, by his training and experience, is better qualified than any person in the world to hear confession and give advice, but the Catholic priest, who sits in the confessional week after week, is there primarily to forgive sin, not to operate an alcoholic clinic. Thus, in order to obtain helpful advice in dealing with his problem, it is desirable that the alcoholic select a priest who understands the alcoholic mind and has a fair degree of sympathy for the alcoholic.

From the fourth and fifth steps, it may be gleaned that, while alcoholism is a disease, it is a disease involving moral implications. A person may acquire some diseases through no fault of his own and be in no way responsible for the progress of the disease. But alcoholism is a disease, the progress of which can be checked by the will power of the individual; and all who are capable of exercising free will are responsible. Nor, is it true to say that alcoholics in general are persons with weak wills. It takes a great deal of will power to put in a day's work when one has had little or no rest the previous night; yet, alcoholics do this very thing time and time again.

In the Sixth step, the alcoholic expresses a willingness to have God remove all defects of his character, and in the Seventh step he humbly asks Him to remove the same. This, of course, means that prayer is absolutely necessary and, like St. Francis of Assisi, the sincere alcoholic seeks to make himself an instrument in the hands of God.

In the Eighth step, the alcoholic makes a list of the persons he has harmed and expresses a desire to make amends. Certainly this list should include the members of his immediate family and all those who have befriended him during his periods of drinking. In the Ninth step, the alcoholic proceeds to make amends to all such persons whenever possible, except when to do so would injure them or others. Thus, the Eighth and Ninth steps can be seen to be nothing more than a process of restitution demanded by every sincere confession. By the Tenth step, he continues to take personal inventory from time to time. The Eleventh step is an effort, through prayer, to seek to know God's will, and the Twelfth step is a determination to carry the message to others.

The alcoholic is urged to pray to God. The Catholic knows that God has revealed Himself to us principally through His Only Begotten Son. Most of the prayers of the Mass are directed to God, the Father, "through Christ Our Lord," and the Catholic seeking help from God would do well to carry his petitions to the Father through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The A.A. program cannot be digested with one swallow. The A.A. program is a philosophy of life; as such, it must become part of one's make-up. That means that it must be absorbed gradually. It takes time to tear down the old mentality and replace it with the new.

The neophyte to A.A. will be assigned a sponsor, or, very likely, the sponsor will introduce him to A.A. No one is eligible to sponsorship until he has proven by time and experience that he has a firm grasp of the program and the ability to stay dry himself. It is desirable that the sponsor have some common interest with the new member, e.g., a railroad man should make a good sponsor for a fellow railroad man. The sponsor should also live in close proximity to the new member, so that he can call for him in person and take him to meetings. It is estimated that it requires at least three months for the A.A. program to sink in, so to speak, and meantime, the newcomer to

A.A., with his alcoholic thinking, is very apt to seek excuses for missing meetings. Some sponsors make a practice of calling their subjects on the telephone every day just to bid the time of day and ask him how things are coming. It is no exaggeration to say that the interest of a real sponsor in his subject is comparable to that of a mother in her child.

And so the newcomer is introduced to the A.A. set-up. For more effective results, the large A.A. group is divided into squads. A squad is generally composed of from fifteen to twenty members. When it becomes too large, it will be split in two, one of the older members assuming leadership of the new squad.

The squad meets once a week, either in the A.A. clubhouse or in the home of some member. The squad meeting consists of a discussion of the A.A. program conducted by the chairman of the evening. The purpose of the squad meeting is to deal with present difficulties confronting the members in their efforts to live the program. It is no place for delving into past escapades, however conducive these may be to humility. The operation of the squad is nothing more than the submission of individual problems to a treatment of group therapy.

Since most alcoholics drink as an escape, the squad affords an excellent opportunity for this mental twist in one's make-up to be brought out into the open and straightened out accordingly. The alcoholic is suffering from some variety of frustration. The squad meeting endeavors to discover it and eliminate it. Phenomenal success has been achieved by the medical profession in the use of a new drug sodium pentathol. This is used in mental cases to obtain a subconscious confession. The patient under the influence of this drug will talk about the thing that is bothering him. After being thus relieved, a new personality is constructed.

In a similar way I the squad endeavors to reconstruct the personality. However, there may be some tender points too delicate or too personal for squad discussions. These should properly be treated in confession. Herein, the Catholic has the added safeguard of the sigillum, or seal of confession, which binds the priest to absolute secrecy. Archbishop Murray has stated that A.A. endeavors to bring into the open all of the alcoholics good points and bad points, then suppress the bad and develop the good. The squad discussion ends at an appointed time and is followed by light refreshments usually served by wives of the members.

The social element of A.A. is of vital importance. The A.A. program is a serious thing; it needs something to lighten it. If a man takes A.A. too seriously, with no sense of humor, he becomes a dry drunk. He does not drink but he is not happy about his condition. Many an individual has tied up his fun with drinking. The A.A. program should enable him to enjoy himself without drinking. Many an A.A. will testify that he has made his truest friends through this organization. Common interests and personalities that coincide with his may be the basis of his selection. The happiness of the individual is vital not only for his own well being, but also for the happiness of his family.

In addition to the squad meetings, the newcomer is asked to attend primary classes, usually one a week, where the twelve-point program is explained by veteran members of the organization. Many of the larger groups, from time to time bring in an outside speaker, such as a doctor, clergyman, or judge, who will speak to the entire membership on some subject of practical interest. Thus, it can be seen that A.A. activities, social and otherwise, will consume a great deal of the alcoholic's free time. Even after one has been dry for some time, it is important to keep in close contact with the A.A. groups - although this is more imperative in the first stages - and so any position that keeps a man on the road or working nights is hardly conducive to the A.A. program because it makes regular attendance at meetings well-nigh impossible.

At first, it is more or less necessary for an A.A. to concentrate on himself; but gradually he should branch out in his viewpoint and see how it is affecting his relations with others in order to complete the picture as he wants it - namely, a normal happy life. He might ask from time to time, "Am I using the fact that I am dry as a defense against personal criticism? Do I fly off easily as I did when I was drinking? Do I harbor the same petty resentments as before?" This might well be a matter of personal inventory.

The newcomer to A.A. may discover that some prominent members of the organization make no serious effort to keep the twelve steps, but this does not militate against the soundness of the twelve steps any more than the presence of hypocrites militates against the soundness of the Christian religion. He should bear in mind the fact that not every A.A. who remains dry does so because he has faithfully adhered to the program. The A.A. program leaves no place for bitter resentments and hatred, yet some A.A.'s holding these resentments manage to stay dry. Their dryness may be due to the fact that, owing to their prominence, they have been placed on a pedestal by their fellow members. Thus, human respect or self-pride is the impelling force in their dryness. Others may stay dry through fear of consequences brought on by a doctor's warning or the threat of a wife or employer. Nevertheless, the experience of most Alcoholics Anonymous has been that you don't stay dry very long if you stray far from the twelve steps.

Obviously, A.A. does not have 100% success. Some individuals will just not make the effort to cooperate with the help which the A.A. program offers. It may be that a judge has given an alcoholic the choice of either submitting to A.A. or doing a stretch in the county jail or workhouse. It is not difficult to make a choice between these alternatives. Here the A.A. members are faced with the task of selling their program to one who has little or no interest in A.A. and has come to it only because he regards it as the lesser of two evils. Furthermore, A.A. has no screening process so that many persons find their way into the group simply because, along with other evils, they have engaged in excessive drinking. This drinking may only be an external symptom of a far deeper-rooted ailment which in many cases will require institutional treatment of a specialized nature. Despite these factors, A.A. has had phenomenal success, and it is estimated roughly that about 75% of its members have remained permanently dry from the time they entered the organization.

The importance of the Eleventh and Twelfth steps can not be overemphasized. The A.A. member is urged to spend at least fifteen minutes a day in sincere and humble prayer, asking guidance from that Supreme Power without which it is impossible to get this program. The A.A. program is a twenty-four-hour-a-day program. No one of us has a long-term lease on life. We live one day at a time. So the A.A. every morning asks God for twenty-four hours of dryness and every evening gives thanks for the same. If he keeps this up the rest of his life, he can truly say, "I got the A.A. program."

In this respect, at least, A.A. is preferable to the pledge method of combating alcoholism. The alcoholic who took the pledge frequently managed to stay dry for a definite period of time but, when the time was up, his old weakness was back again. I know of one alcoholic who for fourteen straight years has taken the pledge and kept it, but this is exceptional indeed. Usually, it is a case of looking forward like a child to Christmas or Easter when, after a period of fasting, he is able to eat his candy again with renewed vigor. The candy in question is poison to the alcoholic.

This, incidentally, helps answer a question frequently asked: "How does it happen that an A.A. after a long period of dryness sometimes slips?" It is often due to the fact that he has maintained a mental reservation that someday he will be a controlled drinker, that some sweet day he will be able to take that first drink again without courting disaster. What an ambition to carry through life! It is the firm conviction of A.A. that the alcoholic can never become a control drinker, that he should seek his recreation in other pursuits. This is part of the A.A. procedure, a battle of no mean proportions for one who travels in society where highballs flow freely.

The Twelfth and last step of A.A. is an effort to change the alcoholic, by nature an introvert, into the finest type of extrovert. That is, indeed, a radical personality change. The psychiatrists say that the happiest people in the world are those who forget their own troubles and concentrate their energies upon the troubles of others. Christ has expressed the same thought in the words, "He that saveth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for My sake shall save it." Next to the mental reservation mentioned above, the greatest enemy of the alcoholic is the element of self-pity. One who has constantly before his eyes the spectacle of those whose miseries are greater than his own is not likely to be carried away by a contemplation of his own heartaches.

Yes, the alcoholic is a sick man, but the prescription that has enabled thousands to check this disease consists of straight, honest thinking, will power, and divine assistance.

The patient entering freely into discussion with fellow alcoholics, giving helpful advice to others, and receiving the same in return, regains confidence in himself. Because he had lost that confidence, he sought, through drink, to escape from reality. Through the sacrifices other alcoholics have made for him, he realizes that he realizes that he is no longer an outcast of society but a worthwhile individual. Praying and seeing his prayers answered, he realizes the significance of the words, "Ask and you shall receive, seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you."

We Catholics believe that salvation is not a momentary impulse but the work of a lifetime. Sobriety, like every virtue, is a lifetime job, for Christ has said: "He that perseveres to the end, shall be saved."

Clear thinking should enable a Catholic to see that there is very little in Alcoholics Anonymous which the Catholic Church has not had for centuries. Trust in God, Meditation, Examination of Conscience, Confession of Faults, Purpose of Amendment and Restitution are nothing new to Catholic theologians. Matt Talbot and others, who had an alcoholic problem, straightened out their thinking without the aid of the twelve steps in written form, but they used the twelve steps because the twelve steps of A.A. are hidden in the conscience of every man. They can solve the problem of alcohol; they can solve many other problems as well.

The Church teaches us the dignity of the individual soul, the superiority of the spiritual over the physical, the concern of Almighty God for His creatures, and the need of our dependence upon Him. The saints of God urge us to pray as if all depended on God, and work as if it all depended upon ourselves. This is the pathway to sobriety, this is the pathway to every Christian virtue.

The great contribution of A.A. to the solution of the alcoholic problem is in helping the alcoholic by scientific analysis of his make-up to answer the question, "Why do I turn to drink?" Some may think that the remedies applied are newly discovered in this Twentieth Century, but actually they have existed for centuries in the moral principles of the Catholic faith.

|||||

+++Message 1315. . . . . Addendum to Roster of Early AA Pioneers (Important)
From: Richard K. . . . . 9/10/2003 8:55:00 AM the truth behind AA's success rates then and now? 5) Were AAs misleading about a cure for alcoholism, as the editor of Dr. Bob and the Good Oldtimers suggests? and 6) How accurate was the Frank Amos report of 1938 regarding the early Akron laboratory?

Also included is a chronological survey of the early AA pioneers, covering the period from Bill Wilson's sober date (Dec. 11, 1934) through the release of the Big Book in April 1939. Various sources were utilized in the formation of this roster, and they are noted in its introduction. Two of the founders' own statements verified the accuracy of the roster up to November 1937, which culminated in 34 miraculous recoveries. The remaining period (Dec. 1937 - Apr. 1939) is as thorough as could possibly be reconstructed. It is noteworthy that the historical reminiscences of this period cover much of the organizational beginnings of AA, and the work on the Big Book; however precious little exists pertaining to the actual members themselves. Nevertheless, original rosters from this period are still congruent, and an Akron oldtimer in 1941 verified in the media that "31 Akron members (as of 1941) were between 2 ½ and 5 years sober." The roster matches this total exactly, thus confirming the Midwest AA picture up to April 1939. The New York side is still open to debate, and hopefully the continuation of unearthing new sources will complete the picture in its entirety.

The final inclusion is a painfully disheartening revelation: the deliberate rewriting of AA's most precious and electric newspaper reviews of all time: the Elrick Davis series from the Cleveland Plain Dealer in October of 1939. This review alone sent prospects clamoring for the doors of AA's press office, resulting in a tremendous boom in Cleveland, from 15 groups to 100 in two weeks!

Another truly exciting find was a reservoir of media articles in the late 1930s and early 1940s proclaiming to the nation AA's cure for alcoholism. Yes, cure! Author Dick B. was as shocked as I was when I presented him with hundreds of newspaper and magazine articles that corroborated what was only recently a handful of quotes from AA's literature stating early AA's considered their victories to be a cure. This 222-page collection is a unique treasure, and it was first unveiled as a display item at the Delaware history conference. Several requests for copies came in, and it is now being printed, and it will be available for shipment early next week. So You Think Drunks Can't Be Cured? will undoubtedly silence the critics who suggest that AA's were misleading!

The costs of these books are as follows:

"Early AA: Separating Fact from Fiction" (includes the roster)

61-page spiral-bound

$17.95 + 1.90 shipping = $19.85

(Samples of articles from "So You Think Drunks Can't Be Cured?" included)

"So You Think Drunks Can't Be Cured?"

222-page spiral-bound

$34.95 (shipping unknown at this point. Shouldn't be much.)

"New Freedom: Reclaiming Alcoholics Anonymous"

Release in 2004, price undetermined

Orders of 10 or more books = 10% off total price, including 10% off shipping.

Any orders for multiple books, I'll email you with the applied shipping total.

Mailing address:

Golden Text Publishing Company

600 Main Street #1

Haverhill, MA 01830-3228

Cash or check is fine. Not set up for CC at this time. Please make checks payable to Richard Kolenda c/o Golden Text Publishing Company
I will send out the books right away upon your request. Honor system will be in application for the first few weeks.

Questions: Office Tel (978) 697-4438 Fax (978)374-1683

If you are interested in either or both of the first two books, please reply with email.

If you wish to be kept in mind for the release of New Freedom, please add a note along with your request.

This has been an unbelievable summer, and I did not expect the demands for history that has come in recently. I was planning to set up a website in December, and hopefully this will be expedited in short time. It will include excerpts of the above material, and several short articles I have written in the past year.

For those interested in hearing the Delaware history conference, please see Glenn K Audio Tapes on the web.

clubhouse with grounds adequate to build an adjoining one-story auditorium which is planned for the near future. Valued at $18,000 and completely furnished through the work of the Ladies Home committee and fellow members, the club house is described as "sanctuary and bee-hive combined." Squad meetings (classes for beginners) and a general meeting on Saturday keep up the activities every night in the week. Since the first meeting on June 21, 1945, the club has grown to more than 100 members and while growing "fast and strong" has had the finest cooperation of civic clubs, newspapers, judges, doctors and hospitals.

Hoosiers Hustle. A.A. might have a second meaning of "all angles" in Indianapolis, Ind., from the variety of activities there. An open forum has been scheduled for November 8 when lay questions will be answered by a board consisting of a representative of each sectional group in the city. Dates for the fall anniversary banquet and a founders' day or commemorative Sunday breakfast meeting have not been fixed. The latter will feature an outline history of A.A. for the benefit of the untutored. Decidedly worthwhile results have been reported by a small group which has made its particular business the contacting of A.A.s who did a good job for a while but drifted away.

Two Freedoms. Of 40 members of the A.A. Group at the Federal penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., who have been released either by expiration of their term or parole, none has returned to the prison, although all members of this Group credit their imprisonment to trouble caused directly or indirectly by alcoholism. Members of the Kansas City, Mo., Group held a meeting at the prison April 22, 1945, after obtaining sanction of the prison officials. From the original five, the attendance at the first anniversary meeting readied 61 with the present figure at 80, including 15

one-year members. From time to time members have been transferred to the "honor farm"
and at request of 10 members, permission was given to start group there on August 25,
1946. Programs stress the 24-hour plan and remind members to take it easy and to remember the importance of immediate A.A. contact with their local groups
which will help them to start a new, sober, sane existence on release. Two members of the Kansas City, Mo., Group attend each meeting and usually give short talks. But the inmates have their own secretary, are in charge of the meetings, and have the major part
of the program. Books, literature and subscriptions to the Grapevine are furnished
by
the Kansas City Group.

First Birthday. Members of "The Fellowship Club," other A.A. groups and specially invited guests including ministers, several judges, members of the city welfare board, members of the parole board and relatives of some members for a total
of 135, attended the first anniversary banquet of the A.A. Home in Minneapolis this fall.
Starting with seven members, the club was reorganized under its present name
with membership average of 40 and indications of continued growth.

Parties, Picnics. San Francisco's first neighborhood A.A. Group, the Mission, celebrated its first anniversary recently with an open house for the city's
members and their families. On the same night the second neighborhood Group to be formed, the Midtown Marina, became the first to divide because it had become too large.
The
new

Groups, Midtown and Marina, adjourned to attend Mission's party. The second picnic of 1946 for the San Francisco Group was held recently at Sonoma Golf Club with more than 300 members and their families present. The same Group's second annual fish fry at the central club house drew more than 500 A.A.s and their guests.

Community Interested. Group psychotherapy used by A.A. was demonstrated by a Syracuse, N. Y., physician before the upstate interhospital conference held recently in Syracuse Psychopathic hospital, according to The Post-Standard of that city. The program urged creation of a hospital for alcoholics. In an editorial, "Problem for the State.," another newspaper, The Herald-Journal, praised the work of A.A. in an editorial stressing the need of some constructive action. Members of both the Eastwood and Central Groups were speakers at the conference and were swamped with questions by interested doctors, one of whom said that A.A. therapy went far ahead of them on the road to proper treatment. Professional and business clubs of Syracuse are taking a keen interest, having invited A.A. speakers to future sessions. A radio program is being worked out for early presentation.

Another Clinic. Working in cooperation with a local doctor, the Fort Worth, Tex., A.A.s have made arrangements for hospitalization in a hotel near the club house. Daily medical attention is given each new "drier-out" with the doctor seeing that everyone placed there has a complete physical check-up, administration of glucose and other medicines. Some member or members of the group will be present on two-hour day or eight-hour night shifts with a dispatcher lining up members to spend the periods with patients they have volunteered to help.

Help Remove Blinders. "We may be wearing bigger blinders than we know," a psychiatrist is quoted as saying in the Nassau Medical News, organ of the county medical society in a front page article on A.A. in its fall number.

According to

the canon of a Long Island cathedral, the Baldwin, N. Y., Group helped the doctor

who prepared the article. "An amazing thing has happened," the article begins.

"A

group

of laymen with no training in medicine or psychology has built up in the past 12 years a system of treatment for alcoholics that has produced unbelievable results."

After telling why A.A. succeeds where "medicine and religion had admittedly failed," the doctor discusses the varying altitude of psychiatrists with the conclusion voiced by one, "It is highly imperative for us as presumably open-minded scientists to view

wisely and long the efforts of others in our field of work." The article ends by telling Nassau county doctors how to reach the Garden City, Manhasset and Baldwin Groups.

No Distinctions. "Class groups as such do not seem to thrive," the Grapevine's

reporter from the East Los Angeles, Cal., Group concludes in telling how that

Group,

although small, is contacting many people of Spanish-American ancestry with some good results. "We have a large Mexican population, about 300,000, in the area and they have about the same ratio of alcoholics among them as any other class or nationality.

The A.A. approach is difficult, due to many factors, but we keep pitching," writes the correspondent. One three-year member is now living in Culican, Sinaloa, Mexico, and is trying to start a group there.

Circuit Flashes. San Diego, Cal., reports A.A. really growing, with Wednesday open meetings in the Chamber of Commerce auditorium, which seats 500. The sixth anniversary dinner, November 6, will be attended by several A.A.s with "six years of real living." Formation of a Norwegian group with the A.A. program in that language is reported. The Bronx County, N. Y., Group celebrated its second anniversary with a dinner attended by 300 members and friends. A Catholic priest was guest speaker.

From Sacramento, Cal., comes a report of more than 200 members and their families attending the October picnic of the organization with many present from Sacramento, Fresno, San Jose, Stockton, San Joaquin county and Roseville. In addition to building its own organization up to 80 members, the branch has helped form clubs in Yuba City, Marysville and Reno. About 85 members of the Rockland County Group, Suffern, N. Y., celebrated the first anniversary recently with a New York speaker. A member of the Austin, Tex., Group found A.A. an occupational hazard, for while he was talking to a man in an Abilene apartment two men who have been convicted and fined as bootleggers came to the place and started a fight ending in a 20-shot gun battle. The Wichita Falls, Tex., Group reports that body doing well with 12 members at present.

First Annual Dinner. The Bay Ridge Group, Brooklyn, N. Y., held its first annual dinner on October 7 and the relatively small dining room was filled to capacity. More than 100 A.A.s and their friends attended. Canon Sydney R. Peters of the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, L. I., was the principal speaker. The Bay Ridge Group has increased from seven members a year ago to 52 members today.

scientific men have found that most drunks are in the thirty to fifty age group, married, likable, and good workers when sober. Incidentally, when we speak of a "drunk," we don't mean the fellow who gets an edge on at the annual office party. We mean the fellow who never gets tight on holiday eves; his benders begin when the rest of the town returns to work.

Mr. X, that drunk who was fired from the industrial plant, was sick, just as sick as the diabetic or the man who forced to take time off during the year because of severe arthritis attacks. These latter get the sympathetic understanding they deserve. But the drunk is usually considered a moral weakling, a slothful liability on the office books and, generally, a bum with a white shirt

However, employee ignorance of his trouble is being replaced by familiarity with his problem. More than altruism is prompting the big industrial concerns to look deep into the matter of coping with the drunken employee. They want work for pay. Fortunately, any effort made by industry to understand and to help the drunk is just as welcome and just as beneficial to him as that made by the persons who love him, and who want so much to help him.

There's only one "but" in the recovery of an alcoholic. He can recover, but, only if he wants to recover. All the effort in the world won't amount to a drinker's dram if he isn't ready to quit. After the professional diagnosticians tell him what's wrong and what he can do to arrest - never cure - the disease of alcoholism that afflicts him, he is his own doctor. Usually he keeps his determination firm by joining Alcoholics Anonymous.

While it was unfortunate that the employer of our Mr. X was ignorant of the fact that he was a sick man, it was just the prod X needed. It sent him home frightened, hurt, and terribly aware of something that everyone, his wife and four school-aged children included, knew - that he could not be a social drinker: that once he took just one drink, he was headed for an extended bout with the bottle. One drink was too many; ten, not enough.

His wife was less concerned with the shabbiness of their home than with the marks of degeneration that were fast beginning to appear his language, first uncouth, had become obscene. His dress reflected a complete neglect and disinterest in appearance. Where once the wave of his hand replaced the good night kiss for the children on the rare occasions when he saw them, now, even that was forgotten. He had also forgotten his God. The Sabbath was spent in bed until shortly before the saloons opened at 1 P.M., the signal for an extended drinking session.

The weary, heartbroken wife was through. Either he looked into Alcoholics Anonymous, she said, or they separated.

And so it was on the evening of the day he was fired he went with an A.A.

member friend to a meeting.

At the meeting, in a community hall, Mr. X heard one of three guest speakers from a neighboring A.A. group tell the audience of about a hundred alcoholics and their friends and relatives how he had quit drinking three years earlier. The speaker traced the trouble he had with alcohol for fifteen years prior to joining A.A. after being fired for drunkenness on a responsible job. Mr. X thought the speaker was drawing on his own recent experience with John Barleycorn, their cases were that similar. Actually, most members of A.A. tell the same story, except some hold out longer than others before joining. In every case, they came into A.A. when they "hit bottom," to use an expression peculiar to their descriptions of defeat through excessive drinking.

After the speaker's story of the plight that went with his drinking, that actually was his drinking, he unfolded a happy tale of recovery through A.A.

Within a week after attending that meeting, Mr. X got his job back, thanks to a non-alcoholic friend of A.A., an employer who became a friend of A.A. Aided by the experience of seventeen years of A.A., industry is slowly recognizing that it can fight, along with the victims, the scourge that alcoholism is. This fourth most dreadful and most devastating disease in the world claimed 12,000 known victims last year. Unlike the so-called natural diseases, it can be controlled or arrested.

Of course, it is not simply a matter of just quitting, but really a matter of keeping alive your determination to stay away from that first drink. And if a person wants it, there is the help that 120,000 ex-drunks will gladly give. They know and understand the problems of confusion and remorse that afflict the man or woman trying to fight his or her way back to normal. And they are happy to help in gratitude for the help that was given to them.

We are more concerned here with what industry is doing about the alcoholic employee than with a detailed history of alcoholism and Alcoholics Anonymous. But because A.A. is such a unique phenomenon in society, because it is completely free of materialism, it might help all of us to better understand the informal group if we mentioned one or two facts about it that set it apart in a world pretty much preoccupied with the "gimmies," with a suspicion of anything free. A.A. is refreshing in that regard. It asks nothing of the potential member but that he or she sincerely desire to stop drinking.

A.A. has no formal membership, no dues, offers- no material aid, and is not affiliated with any religious group or political party. It cares not what your social status is, nor is it concerned with even so much about you as your name, if you want it that way. However, A.A.'s because they are alcoholics, are sociable, gregarious people, a fact that goes far to explain the success of the organization.

The meetings are informal. A newcomer may stroll into a session, sit and listen to the speakers, partake of the customary coffee and cake, and head home without anyone having "bothered" him. Usually though, a newcomer is easily recognized by his very effort to be inconspicuous, and is greeted by a member.

A.A. has only one purpose: to help alcoholics get and keep their sobriety, and to be happy in that sobriety. That last conjunctive phrase is the nub of it all: happy sobriety. Many non-A.A. alcoholics have been sober for periods, but they seldom were happy and usually returned to the bottle with destructive vehemence. That very briefly, is A.A.

To understand what industry is doing about alcoholism among its employees, glance at this roster of some of the larger firms that are doing a mutually beneficial job: Eastman Kodak; The Texas Company; Allis Chalmers, of Milwaukee; American Cyanamid Company; American Rolling Mill Company of Middletown, Ohio; E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Company, and the Consolidated Edison Company of New York, Inc.

Let's look in on the last named, Con Edison, as the company refers to itself on the thousands of signs and flags that it has posted and flapping throughout an extensive Metropolitan area. We chose Con Edison, which is the largest electric utility system in the world, because it recently disclosed the results of a program, inaugurated over four years ago, looking toward rehabilitation of the employee who did not know how to drink...and proved it. The proof took many forms, not excluding too many trips to the "dentist," Grandma's funerals," and that ever-recurring "sore throat." (No one ever thinks of the embarrassment experienced by the poor wife or mother who has to deliver the bare-faced lies to the employer of the drunk. Both usually know, too, which makes it more embarrassing.)

That company's program of rehabilitation for the excessive drinker began in December 1947. The record actually began on January 1, 1948 (always a good day of resolution, that first day of the new year), and in the time since, 135 employees whose heavy drinking interfered with their work were brought to "final warning." Of that number, 53 responded quickly to comparatively simple measures - threats of time off without pay, reminders of the permanent debility that could result from continued excessive drinking, and other admonishments and advice. According to Dr. S. Charles France, associate medical director of the company, the 53 were "chronic excessive drinkers without psychological maladjustments, reactive alcoholics, and less serious psychoneurotic alcoholics." In other words, they were uncomplicated, run-of-the-mill drunks.

The remaining 82 repeated their drunkenness. Eighteen of them were retired on pension because of age and faithful service. Thirty-seven more were discharged without pension but with separation pay over a lesser period.

Eighteen responded to treatment and eventually were returned to their jobs as "arrested cases," and nine, of whom several had severe psychological disturbances, were discharged.

Thus, the overall number of employees reclaimed there was 71 of 135, or 52 per cent. Of the cases coming up for recurrent offenses, only 18 of 82, or 22 per cent, were reclaimed.

At Du Pont, Dr. George H. Gehrman, medical director, said that A.A. had saved the lives of at least 180 employees there since 1943. It was in that year that Du Pont became one of the first major companies to recognize alcoholism as a disease and began to treat it as a health problem. Of the 76,000 workers at Du Pont, 180 are active in A.A. groups established at twenty plants. Thirty-four of them are supervisors.

"No man should be fired just because he is an alcoholic," said Dr. Gehrman. "If an alcoholic wants to stop, he should be given a real chance. He can be helped, and he is worth helping. When an alcoholic stops drinking, he is a somebody. He is a man of character and intelligence. I believe that we have actually saved the lives of 180 Du Pont employees who are in A.A. now. If these alcoholics had not joined A.A., in all probability they would be dead or insane now."

Talking about the employer's role, the doctor, who probably has dealt with more alcoholics in industry than any other medic, said this: "An employer takes less risk in hiring a member of A.A. than anyone else because such individuals know their problem, are honest with themselves and are trying to grow emotionally. He warned, however, that if an alcoholic "cannot, or does not want to stop, he should be discharged - the sooner the better."

Dismissing him under such circumstances, the doctor emphasized, "may prove a blessing to him" because "it may be just the jolt he needs" (as was the case with Mr. X, you may recall).

The Du Pont program involves work and education with supervision throughout the company and among the individuals themselves. Meetings are held in plants and offices to acquaint management and employees with A.A., and to break down the old stigmas attached to alcoholism. The alcoholic worker is urged, but not pressured, into joining A.A.

There are many approaches to the problem by industry, and while Du Pont sets a pattern, some of the others have merit worthy of adoption by concerns still feeling their way along. One large plant, for example, has set up a special bureau within the personnel division just to deal with the alcoholic employee. Several hundred employees are being "cased" intelligently after a therapeutic experiment conducted during the past year and a half.

Another plant hired a member of Alcoholics Anonymous. Because he knows the problem first hand, he has had real success in getting the drink-problem employee into Alcoholics Anonymous.

Still another concern of about 4,000 employees leans heavily on the services of a community clinic for alcoholism, utilizes one man from the labor relations department as a liaison between the company, the clinic, the individual, and the immediate supervisor. Then there is the company that is active in aiding the development of more effective community resources to meet the problem of alcoholism. Through its medical staff it refers employees to the community agency which, leans heavily on A.A.

|||||

+++Message 1318. . . . . Re: Bloomington Illinois
From: jbackman1@aol.com . . . . . 9/12/2003 2:36:00 AM

|||||

Hello group ---

Does anyone have information about the beginnings and early history of AA in Bloomington, Illinois? I moved here two years ago, and though there are some relative oldtimers, I have not met anyone who can trace his sobriety to the beginning of AA here.

Thanks for the help.

Jon B.

Bloomington, Illinois

|||||

+++Message 1319. . . . . Rel. & AA - Christian Herald, August 1953
From: Jim Blair . . . . . 9/12/2001 8:59:00 AM

|||||

Christian Herald, August 1953

YOU CAN HELP AN ALCOHOLIC

By Keith De Folo

The door slams: A man staggers into the house, reels toward the living room, slumps on the sofa. His wife angrily throws down the book she is reading and shouts: "Drunk again Bill, I can't stand this any longer!"

Bill grunts and shakes his head. He is lost in an alcoholic fog. He falls back in his drunken stupor, oblivious to everything. Lois springs her feet and hurtles across the room. Tears pouring down her cheeks, she pounds on her husband's chest. Bill! Bill! What are you doing to me? How can you be so selfish?"

Her voice trails off in a sob that is a prayer. "Oh, God! How is this going to end?"

This was the nightly scene in the home of Lois and Bill before Bill became one of the founders of Alcoholics Anonymous. (only members know his last name.)

For them the problem has been solved.

But other families across the United States - nearly four million others - are systematically being robbed of happiness by the alcoholism of one or more of their members. Lois has something to say to them that can and does transform their lives.

The technique is neither difficult nor mysterious: Bill was the alcoholic; but he could never have made a comeback without the help of Lois, the non-alcoholic. What she learned about the wife's part in a husband's drinking startled her into setting up the "Ladies Aid" of A.A. It's called simply the Family Group," and it quietly preaches that nagging, accusations and the tears of martyrdom are no way to effect the recovery of an alcoholic relative.

The approach that Lois learned the hard way and which the "Family Group" is spreading, you can apply for - and to - yourself, if there is an alcoholic in your household. During the past two years this revolutionary technique has brought a new and sober way of life to families all over America.

It's revolutionary because it turns the spotlight on the "innocent partner - you. "Has your mates alcoholism made you difficult to live with," they ask, "If so, better clear up your own problem. Your recovery will hasten the recovery of your husband or wife."

No one knows better than Lois; how an alcoholic husband can drive his wife to the very edge of despair. She learned it firsthand, heard the dismal accounts time after time as she toured the country's A.A. chapters with Bill. While he met with alcoholics, she listened to their husbands and wives. Talking out their troubles with one who had been through the mill helped. In 1951, Lois tied these wives and husbands together into an organization - the "Family Group." It was a way to help folks avoid some of the mistakes she and others had made.

Before Bill's amazing recovery in 1935, Lois supported and ruled the house. Bill was like a child - almost totally dependent upon her. In her multiple role of mother, nurse and wife, Lois became domineering. For seventeen years Bill drank steadily, and for seventeen years she pushed him into every "cure" she could think of - medicine, books, psychiatry, sanitariums. Bill always found another bottle.

It was a nightmare. She screamed at him. She threw things -pots, lamps, bookends, anything her hysterical hands touched. From a poised helpful wife, Lois turned into a neurotic, self-pitying creature. Bill, of course, lost every job. In his late thirties, he was a human derelict, a hopeless drunkard. Lois worked in a New York department store; doctor and hospital bills had to be paid, and often Bill had to be bailed out of jail. Lois often wondered how it would all end.

Then one day it did all end - sharply and suddenly. An old school pal of Bill's visited him. Once, he too, had been a hopeless drunkard. Now he stood before Bill glowing and fresh skinned, freed from the tight grip of alcohol. How had it happened?

"Religion," answered the friend. "God pulled me out of the gutter. I've come to tell you about it."

This was the deepest experience in Bill's life. He was powerless over alcohol, but there was a Higher Power waiting to be tapped.

His newly found faith in God and himself yanked Bill away from the bottle and kept him away. It was the beginning of Alcoholics Anonymous.

Through salvaging other alcoholics as he had been salvaged, Bill found peace and happiness. But Lois was not completely happy. Too long, she had dominated Bill. Suddenly, her job was over. She recalls: "I was resentful. My life job of sobering up Bill with all its responsibilities had been taken from me. I had not discovered anything to fill the void."

Bill found great benefit in attending religious meetings on Sunday nights. To please him, Lois went along. Bill's meetings had nothing to give her, she told herself.

One Sunday, Bill said, "Hurry up, dear! We mustn't be late." Angrily, Lois picked up a shoe and hurled it at her husband. "I don't care about your old meetings!" she cried.

And before the shoe hit the floor, it dawned upon Lois that she was actually jealous of Bill's meetings! She resented the new interest in his life which took up so much of his time. While Bill was trying to get back to normal,

Lois was standing still. At that moment, she made a momentous decision: "I climbed on the A.A. bandwagon and began living by the same principles as Bill."

As Lois applied A.A.'s "Twelve Steps" to her own life, she wondered about the wives and husbands of other alcoholics. Were they making the same mistakes she had made? Were other wives hindering their husbands recovery by nagging, themselves twisted by resentment, fear and self-pity?

Out of Lois' questioning sprang the "Clearing House" for the Family Groups. Two-and-a-half years ago, Lois and six other wives of alcoholics took over the loft of an old stable in lower Manhattan. From here (and their mail address, Box 1475, Grand Central Station, New York 17, N.Y.) a mountain of sound advice in letter and booklet form has gone to fearful and frustrated relatives all over the world.

Typical of the letters, that pour in weekly is this one from a distraught mother: "Please tell me what I can do to help my boy stop drinking. He is only 28 and has left his wife. He is our only child. Every night I pray for our son."

This mother was immediately put in touch with the nearest Family Group. From the Group, she secured literature which explained alcoholism to her son and herself. Soon, her boy may go to an A.A. meeting which could steer him to a new way of life. The answer to her prayer is on the way.

The "Clearing House" helps to organize a new Family Group wherever there is a need. Often Lois "introduces" by mail several non-alcoholics who live in the same town. Out of this arises a Family Group that meets in a home or a church basement.

Today, there are nearly 500 Family Groups in the U.S., Canada and overseas. Many a member has changed from a non-alcoholic but nagging wife or neurotic husband into a normal human being. The result: many alcoholics have stopped drinking months and years sooner.

Joan, a pretty young housewife, has found serenity in the year she has attended the Group in her town. Her husband, Tom, an airplane mechanic, drank steadily for ten and a half years. About a year ago Tom agreed to accompany a friend to an A.A. meeting. Tom liked the men and women he met there and has kept going. But occasionally, he slips off the A.A. program and goes on an all-night spree. Does Joan get frantic with worry?

"Not for a moment," she says. "I've learned to accept whatever happens. I'm so grateful that his drinking is no longer a nightly affair."

Through the Family Group discussions Joan has learned to control her "fear wheels." If Tom doesn't come home at 5:30 from the factory, Joan no longer imagines the worst. Instead, she prays: "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change; the courage to change the things I can; the wisdom to know one from the other."

If Tom comes home with a "glow" Joan greets him with a smile and a warm dinner. The old method was tears and a fierce upbraiding. Her new attitude of acceptance shames Tom, and takes the "kick" out of his bender. Tom redoubles his efforts to stay sober.

Jim is an advertising executive in New England who often tells an exciting story at his local Group meeting. Once, he was positive his wife was going insane. Nightly, he watched Sarah drink herself into a blind stupor. He tried to reason with her, and she laughed at him. He pleaded with her to see a doctor. "Me sick," she cried indignantly. From the Family Group, Jim learned not to antagonize her; building up resentment in the alcoholic against the non-alcoholic prolongs the drinking.

One day, Sarah, in an impulse of despair, phoned A.A., and a woman member came to her house that evening. Sarah learned that she herself was an alcoholic - and a very sick one. For today, most medical authorities say that alcoholism, like diabetes, progresses unless it is checked. Unlike diabetes, there is no "insulin" for alcoholism. The only prevention and cure is total abstinence from all liquor.

With the help of A.A., Sarah began her comeback.

Later, Jim and Sarah went to a party. As a trayful of cocktails was passed, Jim whispered: "Careful, dear! Better not take that one!" Sarah didn't, but she glared at him. At home, she rebuked Jim for his lack of faith in her. The Family Group gave him the same rapping of knuckles: distrust of the alcoholic who is trying to recover will often drive him or her backward. Today, Jim gives Sarah his confidence and she's responding.

Maria's husband used to drink every evening. Before she got into her local Family Group, she constantly lashed at Hugh with her sharp tongue. Over the years, her resentment against his drinking mounted. She accused him of drinking deliberately to wreck their marriage because he was in love with another woman.

Her false accusations and lack of understanding of the craving that drove him to drink almost toppled the marriage she so much wanted to preserve. Eventually, Hugh never came home unless he was drunk enough to be insulated against her outbursts of temper.

Since attending the Group meetings, Maria no longer scolds Hugh - and he comes home earlier and is more often sober. He remarks about the happy changes in her. Maria tries to show him patience and forgiveness. She now knows that he is desperately "sick" - that only her love for Hugh and their faith in God will lead him to sobriety. Soon her tender guidance may bring Hugh to recovery.

Twenty-five years of drinking has left a scar on the home of the Browns, who live in a fashionable suburb of Philadelphia. While in his twenties, Mr. Brown was made sales manager of the Chicago branch of his firm. There was only one thing wrong with the promotion: an unlimited expense account. The loud wailing of his wife did not halt the round of long, lavish parties he began giving. Soon he was drinking before breakfast.

His wife nagged, pleaded, fought, left him and returned. But he could not stop drinking. He lost the Chicago job. The next twenty years were a series of binges, short-term employment, illnesses. His wife supported the family by teaching school. When her health broke, his family rescued them.

During those dark years, Mrs. Brown tried to "hide" her husband from their two children. But the little boy and girl knew that tragedy ruled the house. As the boy reached adolescence, he looked for a father and was rebuffed by a drunken sot. The boy retreated within himself, grew insecure, leaned on his mother. The daughter adopted the domineering "mother" role. She repeatedly lectured her drunken father until he stormed out of the house and headed for the nearest bar.

Two years ago, Mr. Brown found A.A. While his family is grateful for his new sobriety, it is grateful also for the opportunity of emotional recovery in their own lives. Both mother and daughter attend Family Group meetings in Philadelphia and are trying to overcome their old attitudes. The son, however, may be irreparably damaged; he remains hostile towards his father who disappointed him so many times.

Mildred, the wife of an insurance salesman, was another drinker who made her whole family neurotic. Pete, her husband, didn't know how to help. He reacted to her drinking with violent denunciations or stony silence. Both tactics infuriated Mildred and she began to drink more heavily.

When Pete heard about A.A., he made another mistake. He tried to push his wife into it. Naturally, she rebelled. He didn't understand that A.A. can work only if the alcoholic wants to stop drinking. Pete's children imitated their father's bad temper.

One evening, Mildred wandered skeptically into an A.A. meeting. What she heard other alcoholics say gave her a strong lasting jolt. Today Mildred is a shining testimony to A.A.

this Nevada group will have the use of a library, card room, club room and coffee bar as counter attractions to other local activities. Starting with four members last May the membership grew to 19 in July with more than 80 now listed on the books although 44 per cent are transient. Some of these are new and some were members of other groups in New York, Utah, Arizona, California and Connecticut. Inquiries have been received not only from all parts of Nevada, but from Brooklyn, N. Y., Southern California and even Canada as a result of an advertisement in one of the Reno papers. Various members who travel all over the state and different parts of California visit any one in these vicinities wishing help and extend the usual invitation to any other A.A. members to drop in for a visit. Three new groups, and one day group are reported at Carson City, Nev., Sparks, Nev. and Herlong, Cal.

Welcome in West.--A.A. Grapevine's Los Angeles correspondent writes: "In California where everything is BIG we tried to make our welcome for B--national secretary, just that BIG . . . Come again, B., and stay longer!" Los Angeles A.A.s also report that although they do not believe there are any formal meetings in any studios just now, that after 20 weeks of meetings on the Paramount movie lot the Motion Picture group met for a while at the Hollywood hotel and is now at the Masquers Club, 1765 North Sycamore, between Hollywood Boulevard and Franklin on Sunday nights at 8 o'clock. About 150 attended recent sessions of the group which is an offshoot of the Brack Shops Group of Los Angeles. This correspondent also reports first a move to 730 South Grand where a group was continued for about a year until the building was torn down.

Meetings are now held Sunday nights at 2200 West Seventh for this latter group.
One
new group in the Los Angeles area has been functioning for about six months while another is being formed.

Public Gets Story. -- Solid progress in telling the A.A. story to the public
in a plan for education is reported by the St. Paul, Minn., Group which has four members on the mayor's committee for the study of alcoholism. The committee has been placed under the auspices of the city Council of Social Agencies, making available to them
the use of existing facilities including a speakers' bureau, newspaper space and other community outlets. The St. Paul Group has been swamped with requests for speakers and members have recently discussed A.A. before such organizations as the North St.
Paul
Lions club, First Christian church, Young Married Couples club of Dayton Presbyterian church, the young married people of Fairmount Methodist church and the inmate
group at St. Cloud state Reformatory. Further acceptance of the effort was shown when Carl
Swanson, director of state institutions told the St. Paul Group that the
A.A. philosophy was a thing at which he marvelled and that if it could be made universal this would be a better world.

More Meetings Announced. -- Cleveland, Ohio -- All-Group meetings are being held in the Allerton hotel ball room, East 13th Street and Chester at 8:45 Tuesday evenings.
These sessions, supplanting the Sunday consolidated gatherings, are on a three-month

trial basis. Various groups are sponsoring the meetings with the sponsoring group supplying four speakers, whose anonymity is assured. There is no discussion period.

Regular weekly meetings Thursday night at 8:30 at St. Peter Calver's R.C. Church of Montclair, located at 56 Elm wood Avenue, Montclair, N. J., are announced by the Essex County Group which extends an invitation to all interested. The new A.A. Group in Binghamton, N. Y., known as the Alkanon club, now has club rooms, including a recreation room and meeting hall at 91 State Street, third floor, in Binghamton.

Candles (Only) Lit Up. -- Representing several thousand years of individual sobriety, more anniversaries are reported to the A.A. Grapevine. The 350 A.A.s who attended the sixth anniversary dinner at the San Diego Club, San Diego, Cal., heard the founder of the Group, a friend from Los Angeles and two men who aided the club in its start. San Diego also reports two new Groups, North Park and Down Town Study, and a celebration of "Goblin Night" by the Dry Mates. Changing from the banquets in honor of one-year members, formerly held twice a year, The Alano Society of Minneapolis, Minn, gave double significance by combining it with the Founders' Day Banquet to be held each year. The sixth anniversary dinner was held at the Nicollet hotel on November 16.

Columbus, O., Groups gathered on a Sunday afternoon last month in the grand ballroom of the Neil house where 750 A.A.s and guests celebrated the fifth anniversary. A Columbus member gave a short history of the founding and growth and then introduced a Cleveland doctor who was the principal speaker. Following the meeting there was a social hour and banquet. Guests included invited members of the clergy, medical profession, judiciary, social workers, welfare workers and public health representatives. The South Bend, Ind., Tribune devoted more than a column and a half to an account of how more than 200 from 10 cities gathered there and "gave evidence of the miracle which had been performed." This dinner, the third anniversary, drew representatives from South Bend, Mishawaka, Elkhart, Laporte, Warsaw, Indianapolis and Ft. Wayne, Ind., Benton Harbor and Kalamazoo, Mich., and Chicago. The speaker said, "The secret of A.A. is the technique of surrender. We surrendered ourselves to victory." The newspaper concluded the account by listing the postoffice boxes of the groups for those desiring information.

Pleasant Growing Pains. -- Among the activities of the Memphis, Tenn., Group are the appointment of a member as Central Secretary and club room director as a full time job in answering inquiries and requests as well as club room activities, organization of two small affiliated groups, an A.A. breakfast on the mezzanine at Britling's cafeteria on Sunday mornings at 9:15 and continued growth of the Wednesday night question and answer meetings for new members. One of the two new groups is carrying on separate activities under the name of the Overton Park Group, meeting weekly at the Overton Park golf club house on Monday nights at 8. Memphis A.A.s are happy over being chosen hosts to the Southeastern Conference of A.A. at Memphis on October 16, 17 and 18, 1947.

Plan Vancouver Home. -- Plans for a clubhouse for A.A.s in Vancouver, now numbering more than 300, have readied the stage of a draft proposal in writing, detailing

recommendations for site, size, management and upkeep, which has been circulated

with an architect's drawing for consideration by a committee of the Kerrisdale Group.

The

proposal is to obtain a clubhouse on the outskirts of the city, which can also serve as a "first-aid hostel" for those needing medical care to be provided by physicians included in A.A. At present the city's numerous groups are making shift by using private homes and rented public halls. With Christmas approaching there have been extra social events, including a dance given in honor of women who were patient

with their once-bibulous husbands.

Near Supply Source. -- Since June the Omaha, Nebr., Group has had a "skid row"

Group

going right across the street from Omaha's famous Hobo Park. For another dramatic touch they had an artist make a seven-foot, well dressed, domino-masked man to peddle

a booklet on A.A. in the lobby of theatres showing "March of Time Problem Drinkers" and late showings of "Lost Weekend." About 1,500 pamphlets were put into circulation and phone calls at the club kept members hopping. Then, The A.A. Grapevine correspondent goes on, "outstate members . . . are organizing their own local

groups

and this work needs a hand. Even if all of us didn't want to do 12th Step work, we'd be in it up to the eyebrows." The Group celebrated its fourth annual Fall Festival with a banquet at the Elks club with more than 100 hearing talks by Judge John and a member of the Foundation from New York. Present were members from North Platte,

Tinley

Grand Island, Blair, Auburn and Fremont, Nebr., and Council Bluffs, Ia. For more than two years two members met regularly in North Platte and remote control members have been driving the 600-mile round trip to attend Omaha meetings. Now they have organized the Western Nebraska Group with 10 members from North Platte, Kearney and surrounding towns. At Grand Island a six-man Group was organized by an Omaha member. Recently 25 Omaha A.A.s drove to Lincoln to meet with a new group. Just to keep things bubbling more than champagne at the Alano club, Omaha, an experiment is being made with a set of recordings, 18 sides, which explain basic principles to prospects seeking information during the day when no member is present. The data recorded is being mimeographed in pamphlet form, pocket size, for 12th Step purposes.

Doctors Approve A.A. -- Toward gaining support and confidence of physicians in Tarrant county, Texas, a member of the Ft. Worth Group spoke to about 40 doctors in the county medical association in the Texas hotel in Ft. Worth recently. The doctors gave a spontaneous and approving reception to the explanation and offered their help in attending patients whenever called on.

Wide Awake at Waco. -- A beautiful threestory old building, formerly a convent, has been leased by the Waco, Tex., group and wives and members are redecorating the part to be occupied by A.A. Organized about a year ago, the Group now numbers about 40 members and includes in its accomplishments the establishment of a group in the Veterans Hospital nearby. The veterans' meetings are attended by 15 members regularly and continuously as patients are entered into and released from the hospital.

All of these men have been committed for alcoholism. The hospital psychiatrists determine which are eligible to enter A.A. meetings in the hospital, based on ability to accept A.A. and respond to help offered.

Another Club House. -- The Amarillo, Tex., Group has acquired a new twelve-room club house with approximately four acres of ground. While remodeling is going on for occupation in the near future, offices are maintained in the city auditorium by courtesy of the mayor and city officials. Further doings in Amarillo include establishment of study and manual training classes at night in the public schools for A.A. members desiring them. In seven or eight months' time the group meetings have drawn more than 80.

Double A for Attendance. - A Dallas A.A. who celebrated his first birthday recently has attended 67 closed A.A. meetings in Dallas and 45 in the other cities as follows:
Phoenix, Ariz., Corpus Christi and Houston, Tex., Hollywood of Los Angeles, Mayflower of Los Angeles, San Francisco, all in California, Portland and Seattle, Wash., Denver, Colo., Des Moines, Ia., Omaha, Neb., Minneapolis, Minn., two groups in Chicago, Buffalo, N. Y., Pittsburgh, Pa., Cleveland, Ohio, three groups in New York, Washington, D. C., Memphis, Tenn., Kansas City and St. Louis, Mo., and New Orleans, La.

New Group Grows. --Founded last summer by 12 members of the Montpelier A.A. Group, the Windsor, Vt., Group reports a considerable growth from the original 20 with only a thing to be exercised is the spirit. The word exercise indicates a releasing of the faculties or powers of the soul.

St. Ignatius starts with a presumption that our power or faculties are bound by sinful tendencies and addictions to the wrong things. The Spiritual Exercises, therefore, work on the soul in both a negative and positive way. The first section, the consideration of my sins and of their effects in hell, is the negative part. It aims by self-denial to release our wills from our binding addictions, to enable the will to desire and to choose rationally.

The second part of the Spiritual Exercises, starting with a consideration of the Incarnation and going through the Passion and Resurrection, is an effort to see how Christ would handle various situations.

A priest alcoholic, who has written with discernment on the Spiritual Exercises, first pointed out to me the similarity between them and the twelve steps of A.A. Bill, the founder of A.A. recognized that those twelve steps are pretty much the releasing of myself from the things that prevent my will's choosing God as I understand Him.

Twelve Steps and the Spiritual Exercises

The first seven or eight steps of A.A. are quite specific as to what should be done in order to release the will from addiction to evil. On the positive side, the twelve steps are very general. Bill once stated: "It is a firm principle with us that, so far as A.A. goes, each member has the absolute right to seek God as he will." On another occasion he declared that A.A. was not concerned about the particular way a man works out his dependence on God. That depends on him and on God, mostly on God. The alcoholic's business, as expressed in the eleventh step, is to find out what God wants and to ask for strength to carry that out.

Like the Spiritual Exercises, like Christian asceticism in general, the twelve steps are not speculative ideas. They are practical steps. May I suggest some of the parallels between the Spiritual Exercises and the twelve steps.

The Foundation

The first three of the twelve steps correspond roughly with the foundation of the Spiritual Exercises. In the foundation we see man as creature. It recognizes the dependence of Man on God because of the rather abstract, relatively unknown fact, creation. A.A. bases dependence on a rather concrete specific type of experience, drunkenness. The Ignatian foundation indicates that everything else shall be chosen or rejected in the light of the purpose that grows out of this dependence, i.e., sharing Him for all eternity by doing His will on earth. The A.A. third step directs that one's life and one's will be directed by the influence of God. In it the alcoholic determines to turn his life and his will over to the care of God as he understands Him. This emphasis on the will indicates that the alcoholic should direct himself by his will rather than by the feelings that have enmeshed him. The focal importance of the will is a characteristic of the Spiritual Exercises.

Moral Inventory - Confession

In the Spiritual Exercises, the next thing is the contemplation of sin; sin in the angles, in our first parents, in others, in myself, and sin in its effects. And, of course, right along the line there you have the fourth step of A.A., a fearless, thorough moral inventory of one's sins. The parallelism is rather striking.

To a priest who asked Bill how long it took him to write those twelve steps he said that it took twenty minutes. If it were twenty weeks, You could suspect improvisation. Twenty minutes sounds reasonable under the theory of divine help.

After a moral inventory of one's life, all spiritual exercises, Catholic anyway, demand the confession of sins. It is specifically required in the Spiritual Exercises. In the A.A. fifth step, you have that general confession admitting my sins to myself, to God, and to another human being.

Reatus Culpaee and Reatus Poenae

There are two liabilities when we commit a sin: one, reatus culpaee, the guilt of the sin; the other reatus poenae, the obligation of restitution. The A.A. sixth and seventh steps cover the guilt of the sin, and the eighth and ninth steps the obligation of restitution.

I think the sixth step is the one which divides the men from the boys in A.A. It is love of the cross. The sixth step says that one is not almost, but entirely ready, not merely willing, but ready. The difference is between wanting and willing to have God remove all these defects of character. You have here, if you look into it, not the willingness of Simon Cyrene to suffer, but the great desire or love, similar to what Chesterton calls "Christ's love affair with the cross."

The seventh step implements that desire by humbly asking God to remove these defects. The alcoholic sees one defect go as a bottle of beer is taken away. And so, that continuing detachment which goes along in any ascetical life holds true in A.A. As one grows in A.A., the problems seem to get bigger, the strength bigger, and the dividends greater.

Then comes the reatus poenae, the obligation of restitution or penance. God's forgiveness is sought in the sixth and seventh steps. In the eight and ninth steps one makes restitution. In the eighth step the alcoholic makes a list of those people he has offended and whose bills he hasn't paid. In the ninth step he pays off these obligations, if he can do so without hurting people more.

The Positive Side

The eleventh and twelfth steps give a rather limited parallel to the positive asceticism of Christianity. The eleventh step bids one by prayer and meditation to study to improve his conscious grasp of God, asking Him only for two things; knowledge of His will and power to carry it out. Now, that is a true and accurate description of the positive aspects of Christian asceticism as well as of the second, third, and fourth weeks of the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius.

Then, the twelfth step. Having had a spiritual exercise or awakening as a result of these steps, we carry this message to other alcoholics and practice these principles in all our other affairs. In our apostolic work we should be an instrument in God's hands. The A.A. steps before this twelfth step are to improve my instrumental contact with God. This dependence of work for others on my growth toward Christ-like sanity and sanctity has significance to an alcoholic priest. Often such a one will say, "If I could only get a little work, I feel that I could stay sober." Gradually he finds out that if he approaches sobriety through work, the work isn't going to come and the sobriety may not come either.

But, as soon as he says, "Once I become sober, work will come," the hope of success is much greater.

No Humility Without Humiliation

A.A. has helped me as a person and as a priest. A.A. has made my optimism greater. My hopelessness starts much later. Like anyone who has watched A.A. achieve its goals, I have seen dreams walk. You and I know that in the depths of humiliation we are in a natural area, and, rightly handled, especially in the inner spirit of that sixth step, I think we can almost expect the automatic fulfillment of God's promise to assist the humble. Where there is good will, there is almost an iron connection between humiliation and humility and God's help.

A.A. helps the priest in other matters than alcoholism, as the twelfth step indicates. I had a little exercise which will illustrate this point. It is a very small thing in itself, but I feel that it is a clear example of how A.A. work can help personally even a non-alcoholic priest.

Learning Not To Think About It

To obtain a greatly needed help which prayer alone didn't seem to bring, I thought of giving up smoking. I had failed to give it up, even though in retreat after retreat I had tried various plans to break off the habit. None of them seemed to work for long.

Then, thinking of A.A., I realized that I had seen men in that same boat who couldn't give up drinking. I realized that A.A. does not directly cause a man to quit drinking, but rather it causes him to quit thinking about drinking. Well, it seemed easier to give up thinking about smoking; but I didn't think I could do even that. I thought of A.A. novices saying, "I can't do it all my life. I can't do it all day. I can do it for maybe ten minutes." Inspired by the humble example of A.A. men, I said at that point to myself, "I won't try to quit smoking but I will, with God's help, postpone the thought of smoking for three minutes." That is a humiliating admission for a priest who tells others to give up much harder things.

From A.A. I learned to respect the little suffering of denying self the thought of a smoke and to pool that suffering with the sufferings of Christ, in the spirit of the sixth step. At that moment, like a breath of fresh air, came the thought of the widow and her mite and the importance which love can give to unimportant things. With humiliation came humility, and with humility came God's promised help. It is three or four years since I thought of myself smoking, and I have learned that you can't smoke if you don't think about smoking.

That is a little instance from among hundreds of the applications of A.A. principles. I have watched the most difficult personal situations which a priest faces yield to the A.A. twelve steps approach, even though no alcoholism was involved. Of course, Christ and His Passion came in encouragingly through the third and eleventh steps.

Priest Membership In A.A.

Now, the part which I would like to submit for your discussion. Should a priest go into A.A.? Should a Catholic join A.A.? There are two questions to be answered before one can decide whether or not a priest should enter A.A. First, what will be the effect on the Church? Secondly, what will be the effect on the priest?

Frankly, I don't think the Church needs saving nearly as much as the man. God's cause is often hurt by people who are trying to save God. There is an apostolic opportunity that you can find in dealing with A.A., which has therapeutic value to the individual and which offers great opportunity for the Church. The scandal that a drinking priest might give is not so serious in A.A. as it would be at a Catholic organization meeting, because the understanding is different.

The twelfth step demands an apostolic outlook, that is, it demands that we not only apply what we have learned to our own life, but also that we carry the good news to other people, and specifically to alcoholics.

The Moral Side Of Psychiatric Problems

Errors Of Psychotherapy, by Sebastian de Grazia is a humble confession of the failure of most psychiatric efforts. Psychoanalysis, which is the dominant psychotherapy today, is impractical for most people because of the expense and because of the unavailability of psychoanalysts. Its record of cures is not much better than the rate of neglected and spontaneous cures in state mental hospitals.

De Grazia's book is replete with devastating quotations from psychiatrists on the failure and inadequacy of current therapy, though he recognizes that all therapies have a certain percentage of cures. After surveying all therapies through history and throughout the world, de Grazia says, "Moral authority, an idea widely spurned by modern healers of the soul, is the crux of psychotherapy. The crystals that remain after the distilling the multiplicity of therapies are not many. A bewildering array of brilliants dwindles down to a few precious few: neurosis is a moral disorder; the psychotherapeutic relationship is one of authority; the therapist gives moral direction."

Religious Outlook Essential

Jung, one of Freud's first followers, wrote, "Among all my patients in the second half of life - that is to say, over thirty-five - there has not been one whose problem in the last resort was not that of finding a religious outlook on life. It is safe to say that every one of them fell ill because he had lost that which the living religions of every age have given to their followers. None of them has been really healed who did not regain his religious outlook."

The theory that moral and religious treatment is the type needed for today's epidemic of psychoses and neuroses is being most effectively urged by Dr. Frank R. Barta, director of the department of psychiatry at Creighton University in Omaha. In his book, The Moral Theory of Behavior, he writes: "All extant theories of mental illness have been refuted by able critics." He feels that the virtues of charity and humility would go a great distance in many neurotic and psychotic situations.

Recovery Inc.

The Saturday Evening Post, December 6, 1952, wrote up Recovery Inc., and showed how it approached neuroses and psychoses in much of the amateur way that A.A. approaches the alcoholic neurosis. Its founder, Doctor Abraham A. Low, rejects psychoanalysis as philosophically false and practically ineffective. He writes: "Life is not driven by instincts but is guided by the will."

Sanity, rather than sobriety, is the aim of the A.A. second step. Psychiatric literature echoes A.A.'s statement that alcoholism is a form of insanity. Yet, in treating this insanity, we know the success of the approach which is amateur and group, moral and spiritual. We remember the last speech of Dr. Bob, co-founder of A.A. Dying of cancer, he left his mental legacy: "Don't louse it up with psychiatry."

Priests of A.A. have two indelible marks: once an alcoholic always an alcoholic; once a priest, always a priest. Two invisible, indelible marks, both of tremendous significance to others. As alcoholics they know insanity from the inside. As members of A.A. they know the techniques and they know the wonders that can come from amateur group psychotherapy based on the human will aided by God's help.

Significance Of Clergy Conference

In this room we may be seeing the confirmation of R.B. Cattell's statement, in his Meaning of Clinical Psychology: "The possibility that the clergyman, rather than the psychologist or mental practitioner, is the ultimate specialist in human adjustment has been most unscientifically ignored." The experience in this room makes it easier to see de Grazia's statement: "Were a system of psychotherapy to be built by having all secular therapies agree to harmonize their divergent criteria of cures, it would emerge as a religious enterprise, an Imitation Christi."

Here are not only members of A.A., but priests trained by and adept in the use of Christian asceticism, priests who speak with authority because they are experienced. I cannot help feeling that there are trends and forces, human and divine, that keep rendezvous here tonight, and that the happiness and sanctity can be richer if we meet the challenge of this rendezvous.

|||||

+++Message 1323. . . . . A Request
From: Alope Dutt . . . . . 9/13/2003 11:22:00 AM

|||||

I'm Alope, an alcoholic in India.

Can something be made available like a government directive or resolutions of any county/ state to concerned agencies

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS A CATHOLIC MEMBERS APPRECIATION

"I HEAR the A.A. want to start a group here. Do you know anything about these fellows?" I was shown this part of a letter from one country priest to another not so long ago. I am an alcoholic myself and a member of A.A. for twenty-four years. My own success in the adventure of sobriety is bound up with the success of A.A. in Ireland. The object of this article is to tell something about "these fellows": what we are, what we try to do and what we have so far achieved. For we have found a knowledge and understanding of A.A. has made us friends and gained us helpers.

Up to comparatively recently, Society has placed all drunks in the same category - weak-willed, callous, helpless and unhelpable, intentional sinners, skeletons whose greatest offence is that they will not remain snugly in their family cupboards. Yet nearly everyone knows at least one person whose drinking has apparently almost without warning become incomprehensible. Men with good homes, money, good business or jobs, good reputations, healthy, in no way unhappy, suddenly go off the rails. Normal, seemingly, when not drinking, their characters undergo a complete change once they start on alcohol. Their former occasional "night-outs" develop swiftly into bouts, the bouts come closer and closer together. In many cases they are seldom completely sober. Their drinking is followed by periods of intense remorse, by sincere though short lived attempts to stay off liquor. Their relatives are in turn startled, puzzled, anxious to help, resentful, contemptuous, enraged. They themselves are at first sure they can find a way of retaining control "next time," then frightened when they fail repeatedly, then hopeless. Their complete ignorance of what has happened to them, what is still happening to them, what is still happening to them, makes it impossible for them to explain to, and gain the understanding sympathy of, those they love and respect. Little by little they cut themselves off from their world; they live in a state of desperate loneliness and finally become outcasts. These are the persons sometimes called the Problem Drinkers. They are, in fact, alcoholics or compulsive drinkers, suffering from a physical allergy to alcohol combined with a mental obsession to take more once they start to drink: drinkers whose compulsion to drink is a sign of disease. There are few alcoholics who have recovered who would deny that this disease is really spiritual.

A.A. is a loose knit society of men and women alcoholics who have banded together in groups all over the world to share their experience, strength and hope with each other, that they may solve their common problem and help others to recover from alcoholism. There are at the time of writing over 14,000 such groups, with a total membership of about 500,000 spread all over the world. The only requirement for membership is a sincere desire to stop drinking. A.A. is not allied with any particular religion, creed or denomination. It has nothing to do with politics, other organizations or any institution. A.A. simply minds its own business...to stay sober and help other alcoholics to achieve sobriety. Alcoholism is not a purely Catholic,

Protestant or Jewish disease; it is not the exclusive illness of either the millionaire or the down-and-out. Alcoholism strikes at all creeds, class and income--grades impartially. A.A.'s success has largely derived from its refusal to recognize any difference between one alcoholic and another. They are all sick persons, requiring A.A.'s help. A.A. does not usurp the place of Church or Medicine. The alcoholic who joins in poor physical condition is strongly advised to consult his doctor. The alcoholic's religion, or lack of it, is his own affair. In general, it has been our experience that a good A.A. member becomes a better member of his Church. But our primary object is to achieve sobriety. From that sobriety the other things will stem; without it, they are impossible. A.A. is not concerned with money. It has nothing to sell and none of its members are paid for A.A. work. There are no positions of authority to be obtained ;each member is on exactly the same footing. Its policy of anonymity does away with the danger of membership being used as a means of obtaining personal kudos. Thus the three most ordinary occasions of disunity and disruption are guarded against. Each group is autonomous. Its own members care for the necessary money to meet expenses of rent, printing and incidentals. Donations from outside sources are politely refused. Its officers are elected in rotation. Its policy of anonymity was first chosen as a worldly safeguard for its members; the spiritual value of anonymity has become more apparent since. But while personal anonymity is required, A.A. is only too glad of any publicity to its aims and being.

It came into existence thirty six years ago in America through a chance meeting between a New York stockbroker named Bill (in A.A. all members go by their first names), and an Akron doctor, Bob. Bill had already managed to keep sober for six months as the result of following out a few principles of living largely based on the Oxford Groups "Absolutes." He had, however, just had the bad end of a business deal and came to realize that to preserve his own sobriety he must make contact with another alcoholic and help him to achieve sobriety as well. Both of these men had long and dreadful histories of drink; but from that first meeting, they both remained sober. Bob died twenty-two years ago, but Bill lived till 1971, a total abstainer for over 36 years, after he had been given up as a hopeless and unhelpable drunk. The society they started that day grew slowly and shakily; it took over four years to muster the first hundred members. Since then it has grown in increasing tempo to its present size. In numbers it is still mainly American, United States and Canada. Twenty-nine years ago it was carried to Australia by a travelling American. Three years later, it came indirectly from Australia to Ireland, this time by a priest.

This priest was on holiday in Dublin in September 1946 and was interviewed by an evening paper on the subject of a Boy's Town with which he was connected in Australia. In the course of his talk he commented at length on the success that A.A. was having in Sydney and expressed the hope that Dublin would do well to take it up. This interview was read by a member of the Philadelphia group, an Irishman who had gone to live in the States, who was over here on holiday. Spurred on by his wife, he determined to start a group in Dublin, with the help of a doctor and by advertising, he managed to scrape together a small number of men willing to make the experiment. Their first public meeting was held in The Country Shop on November 25th.; and here on that night the first A.A. group in Europe was formed. As in America, the start was slow and uphill. Today it is firmly established in Dublin ( 35 Groups ); there are many large groups in Belfast; there are several groups in Limerick, Cork and Galway, and smaller ones elsewhere. Public meetings are held every Monday night, still in The Country Shop, where attendance's range from 50 upwards to 100. The maximum attendance was at a meeting held in the Mansion House when over 400 came along to listen to the Co-Founder of the Society, Bill. At a conservative estimate, there are at least 2000 members in Ireland and an estimated 8,000 in England, Scotland and Wales. A good many others, though partially convinced, are not yet ready to make, and act on, the necessary admission that they are beaten by drink. A world estimate is that about 70% of those who join and give the A.A. program a fair trial recover, though a great many of these suffer one or more relapses before they finally settle down. A short time ago, I was asked at a clerical meeting to explain to them why an alcoholic went on drinking long after it was evident that he was incapable of exercising control. I find it almost impossible to do so. I can only say that for a very long period of my own thirty years drinking I honestly believed I could, someday and somehow, find a way of drinking all I wanted without losing control. Life without drink seemed to me to be an unnatural and quite impossible way of existence. Later I became dreadfully hopeless and fatalistic about it. Though I still continued to make attempts to pull up, I felt even at the time that they were quite useless. I felt it would start again sometime, so what was the use of trying too hard? The truth is that we don't know why we drink; but when we tell the truth, we are not believed. Strength of will and sincerity of purpose do not enter into it. I have entered my name for a Retreat to find help in Quitting drink, yet gone to that retreat with a bottle of gin in my bag, which I drank between the first exercise and going to sleep. After a month's voluntary treatment in a private home, I felt convinced I had mastered drink; and been drinking again within a few hours. Drink makes us mentally unbalanced and we cannot be honest even with ourselves for long at a time.

My own case history may be cited as typical of an A.A. member, though space will mercifully prelude any but the minimum necessary details. I am seventy-five years of age, single and come from a good class Catholic family. My home life was happy and I went to a Catholic College in England. Later I entered the profession I wanted to join; I was very happy in it, I got on well. I was good at games; I was considered good at work, above the average of my rank in the British Army. I had a promising future to look forward to, I had nothing from which to escape. There was no previous history of drink in my family. I can see no reason why I should have become an alcoholic, yet almost from the start I drank like an alcoholic. At first I had some sort of control over myself as to when I drank. If circumstances seemed to indicate the need for it, I cut out drinking without much effort and with no feeling of self-sacrifice. But even in those first years if I drank at all I went on for the rest of the night. Soon I was losing even that control. I began to drink at the wrong times, in the wrong places and before the wrong people. Good luck and good friends covered up for me for many years, but finally life caught up on me and I was retired on retired pay, branded as not to be re-employed. This virtual dismissal made very little impression on me. I still had enough money for drink and I had a home to live in. Six more years were to pass before the climax came. I had been inflicting every kind of unhappiness not only on myself but on my parents, not the least for the latter being my complete indifference to my religious duties. In April 1947 they ordered me out of the house and the family and their lives. By now I had added drugs to alcohol. My routine had become one of the drugs in the morning to revive me, drink all day and another drug at night to give me sleep. My parents' "revolt" opened my eyes for the first time to where I had descended. It proved to be my own gutter. Fear for my security and at the prospect of becoming one of the legion of the homeless lost ( with the next stop almost certainly a Night Shelter ), at last made me genuinely willing in my own interest to do anything I could to stop drinking ("Give me back my Legions" .). The trouble was that I could think of nothing useful. Doctors, homes, hospitals, promises, all had proved in vain. Then my memory went back to that interview I had read nine months before, about A.A. The Grace of God must have put it into my heart to go to a meeting that night, and I managed to strike a one-sided bargain with my parents that if A.A. could do some good I might stay at my parents on probation. I arrived at that meeting, more than half-drunk, shaking from drugs and nerves; not too good a prospect, even for A.A. By the goodness of God and the help He has sent me through A.A. I have not had another drink since then.

There is no set blueprint of recovery in A.A. Each member succeeds in his own way and time and at his own pace. So what I write must be taken as my own experience only. For me, recovery came from Knowledge, Decision, Group or social therapy, a return to Realism and the program of the Twelve Steps. All of these together for me make up the A.A. way of life. And I attacked my recovery problem in just that order, which seems to me to be entirely logical. Without Knowledge, I could not come to any decision that would stand up for long. Without Decision to recover, group therapy would be a waste of time. Without Realism I should have been continuing my old pattern of running away into dreamland from the inescapable facts of life. And while all these things were essential to me to stop drinking, I had to bring another factor into play, the Twelve Steps, to learn not only how to remain abstinent but to be happy in remaining so.

That Knowledge was elementary, though new to me. Alcoholism is a sort of disease acquired by two or three percent of the world's drinkers. The disease in simplifying language is the disease of not being able to drink in moderation. It is the first drink the alcoholic takes that sets his disease in active virulence, not the total quantity consumed. Alcoholism cannot be completely eliminated once it gains a footing. No matter how long I might remain abstinent at a time, I would never be able to control my drinking if I started again. But if I could find a way of not taking a first drink, I could stay sober and normal.

The decision I had to take was to give up drinking for good. I had to face the unpalatable fact that I must make abstinence my own first and most vital aim. As for the group therapy, I was prepared to accept that the older members had had to make themselves essential to their groups and the groups essential to themselves. If I was going to avail myself of the same means that they had found necessary and successful, it followed that I must attempt what they did. Group therapy to me does not merely mean coming together at stated times for formal meetings. These meetings are important for many reasons and as the visible sign of coherence. The equally valuable, though invisible, sign is keeping the closest possible touch with the members of the group even when they are not in actual physical contact. That can be done by constantly thinking about the group, working for it, praying for it; keeping it in mind as much as possible.

Reality consisted in recognizing that my alcoholic life must be cut down to a size I could hope to deal with. My disposition was such that if I continued to think of abstinence in terms of months or years, I would be pretty certain that nothing would be done. So I adopted the A.A. suggestion of living my life in periods of twenty-four hours at a time. Today, the only day in reality that I ever have at my disposal. From the beginning, I slowly advanced to being content to accomplish only what of the rest of my life I could fit into Today. That again required further realism to determine which things were of the most immediate importance to be done Today. But my primary reality will always remain concentrated on not taking one single drink Today.

|||||

+++Message 1327. . . . . Re: C.S. Lewis & Oxford Groups
From: wilfried antheunis . . . . . 9/14/2003 11:51:00 AM

|||||

Very quickly, there is no tangible connection. Frank Buchman and C.S. Lewis

In 1908, Frank Buchman, a YMCA, and started a streetside church in Philadelphia, Church of the Good Shepherd. Frank had a disagreement with his trustee committee and went to Europe.

From: "The Oxford Group, its History and Significance" (Bookman Associates, Inc, 1951) "When the Reverend Frank Nathan Daniel Buchman arrived in Washington , his decision had been made. And so...was born the Oxford Group. The Group itself prefers to date its beginning from the conversion of the first Oxford students by Buchman and so far as its claim to its name goes, its preference is shrewd."

"The roots of the movement are American, not English. However desirable it may be from the Group's point of view to represent itself as an Oxford product, the reader who wishes to understand the Group by learning its origins must focus his gaze principally on the American scene. "

"Because even in the minds of many otherwise well-informed people the Oxford is identified with the Oxford Movement, it is appropriate here at the beginning to clarify this issue."

At Oxford University in England, the Oxford Movement began in 1833 under John Keble, E.B. Pusey and John Henry Newman. These churchmen had in a mind a return of the Anglican Communion to a Church faithful to the Early Father and free from the influence from the States.

Another movement which began in Oxford a century later and which has given us shelves of great books is that of The Inklings. This group of Christian friends, most of whom taught at Oxford University, included C.S.Lewis, J.R.R.Tolkien, Charles Williams, Owen Barfield, and others. They met weekly in Lewis's rooms in Magdalen College to talk, drink, and read aloud whatever any of them was writing. They are called by some modern scholars the "Oxford Christians."

Former Members of Magdalen include: Cardinal Wolsey, C.S. Lewis, John Betjeman, Oscar Wilde, Dudley Moore

In 1918 during his travels, Frank Buchman met a young YMCA worker, Sam Shoemaker, in China and converted him to the Oxford Group principles. Years later, Sam became the minister of that Calvary Church in New York, and that same church became the titular headquarters for the Oxford Group in the United States. (The name was changed in 1928 from "A First Century Christian Fellowship" to the "Oxford Group.")

So it may be stretching to talk about Lewis and Buchman. There is no obvious connection.

----- Original Message -----

From: rdb4002

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Sunday, September 14, 2003 7:14 AM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] C.S. Lewis & Oxford Groups

Does anyone know of the connection between C.S. Lewis and the Oxford college or an important official at a cathedral) but a "don," which meant an ordinary college teacher, who taught medieval English literature (Chaucer, the Romance of the Rose, and so on). An Oxford "don" gave a few lectures every week during term, and spent most of his time meeting with students for hour-long tutorial sessions, where the student read a research paper which he or she had written, and the teacher then made a critique of what the student had done, and made recommendations for further study. Ironically, Lewis received no great academic honors until the very end of his life, and that he received from Cambridge University, not Oxford University.

Frank Buchman (1878-1961) was an American, and a Lutheran pastor, not an Anglican (Episcopalian) priest, which meant that he did not move in the very high church Anglican theological circles in Oxford when he visited there in 1920. He had no fame at that point -- his public fame did not come until many years later -- and I doubt that anyone much noticed him at all. He would have been a quite peripheral figure, moving around the fringes at best. His seminary degree, from Mount Airy Seminary in Philadelphia, would not have been recognized as much in the way of credentials at Oxford University.

In 1920, Buchman visited Cambridge University in England, trying to carry out an kind of unofficial ministry to students (we have both Protestant and Roman Catholic groups setting up similar kinds of operations on my campus of Indiana University even today, setting up tables in the halls with literature out on it, and that kind of thing). He then got some of his Cambridge student converts to come with him to Oxford University, to do the same kind of thing there, and then convinced some of these student converts to come with him to South Africa in 1929. There in South Africa, people noticed that some members of the group had been students at Oxford University, and began calling them "the Oxford Group."

Buchman apparently loved this -- it gave an aura of enormous prestige to his youth for Christ movement -- but the people at Oxford University were not amused. At one point the university even sued Buchman, to try to get him to stop using the university's name. Buchman's rise to real fame began with his travels through Canada and the U.S. in 1932 to 1934. It is important to remember that he was no truly enormous influence on the world prior to that period.

All these dates are important. Buchman visited Oxford in 1920. Lewis did not give his first lecture at Oxford until 14 October 1924 (only four students showed up). Lewis was still a convinced atheist at that time, and would not have given Buchman the time of day, even if he had somehow met him. Oh, to give an example, in 1916 Lewis described Christianity as merely one among many mythologies of the world, and spoke of Jesus as "a Hebrew philosopher" -- similar to Bill Wilson's early beliefs as he describes them in the Big Book, but even more skeptical.

But in 1924, Lewis read Samuel Alexander's Space, Time, and Deity, and began to be uneasy in his atheism for the first time. And later he read Chesterton's The Everlasting Man, but even then he refused to acknowledge God. But finally in 1929, at some point during Trinity Term, Lewis says that "I gave in, and admitted that God was God, and knelt and prayed: perhaps, that night, the most dejected and reluctant convert in all England."

He was still skeptical about Christianity however. Lewis' book The Pilgrim's Regress came out in May 1933, but sold only 680 copies when it first came out. He had become a Christian by this time however.

How did he move into writing children's books? Tolkien wrote The Hobbit in 1932, and Lewis read it and thought it very good. He subsequently read George MacDonald's Phantastes, and (in 1936) Charles Williams' The Place of the Lion. But Lewis did not begin writing The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe for example until the end of 1939, when the first British children were being evacuated from the cities to the countryside to try to keep them out of the way of the Nazi bombs. And Lewis did not start to become widely read until well after that, so there would have been no influence of C. S. Lewis' works on the early A.A.'s during the period before the Big Book came out in 1939.

I love Lewis children's books myself, but the primary influence on them was Tolkien, George MacDonald, and Charles Williams. If you are a real Lewis fan, you ought to read both Phantastes and The Place of the Lion (I assume you have already read Tolkien's children's books).

No one who has done serious work on C. S. Lewis has ever seen any influence of Frank Buchman, and in fact it is difficult to see how there could have been any. Please ignore the word "Oxford" in the name Buchman gave his group. This was guff. It was not an Oxford University linked group in any serious way.

On the other hand, C. S. Lewis, particularly as a young man, shared many ideas and beliefs in common with the young Bill Wilson. And a study of C. S. Lewis' world would give a person a lot of insight into the intellectual world in which the young Bill Wilson moved. Lewis would indeed have known James' The Varieties of Religious Experience very well indeed, and he and Bill W. would have read many of the same books, or at least books which contained many of the same ideas.

If we try to understand Bill W.'s mind by ONLY reading Oxford Group literature, we will obtain a gravely distorted picture of his ideas. The Oxford Group was a conservative evangelical movement.

But we must also read Adolf Harnack's What Is Christianity? -- the great manifesto of classical Protestant liberalism. Early A.A.'s used The Upper Room for their meditational literature before Richmond Walker wrote

Twenty-Four Hours a Day in 1948, and The Upper Room was classical Protestant liberalism in its purest form, also incorporating the basic ideas of Horace Bushnell, whose major work, Christian Nurture, talked about spiritual growth as "an educational experience" (to use the Big Book's language). Bushnell (and the Upper Room) were very hostile to the conservative evangelists' insistence that you HAD to have had a highly emotional conversion experience to be a real Christian at all.

And we must also read some of the representatives of what was called New Thought, like Emmet Fox, who wrote The Sermon on the Mount, to understand some of the other influences on Bill W.'s thought.

People who over-emphasize the Oxford Group also tend to totally neglect the Roman Catholic influence on early A.A. Sister Ignatia frequently had alcoholics read selections from St. Ignatius Loyola's Spiritual Exercises, which pointed out the need for something like the Tenth Step, that is, the need to CONTINUE our regular moral inventories, in order to make real spiritual progress. Father Ed Dowling noticed that the minute he read a copy of the Big Book -- it might look "Protestant" in some ways, but there was a deep Catholic influence on its spirituality too. Some of the early Roman Catholic influence on A.A. ideas came from contact between Sister Ignatia and Dr. Bob -- they were both working at the same hospital, and both working with alcoholics (Sister Ignatia actually started trying to work with alcoholics at St. Thomas before Bill W. and Dr. Bob had met) -- while other influences came from Roman Catholics who joined A.A., and unconsciously assumed Catholic positions on various issues when the early A.A.'s were discussing how to handle the spiritual aspects of the program.

A book which has recently come out, Sgt. Bill S., On the Military Firing Line in the Alcoholism Treatment Program, is written by a man who got sober in A.A. in 1948, fifty-five years ago, and Bill's book reminds us that there was also an important group within early A.A. which chose to talk about the program in language almost completely devoid of traditional religious concepts. They turned to psychological explanations and so on.

Bill is held in enormous respect, almost awe even, by the good oldtimers, because of the way he works his program, and also because his methods for working with alcoholics work so well. At Lackland Air Force Base in the early 1950's, Bill was achieving a totally documented 50% success rate among people who went through his program the first time, with additional alcoholics getting the message later on, as the result of the seeds which he had planted. In other words, up in the same league as early Akron A.A.

Bill says that he had no luck at all in getting military personnel sober as long as he used any kind of traditional religious language -- it was the kiss of death among hard-bitten military people -- and Dr. Joe Zuska found the same thing later on when he set up his incredibly successful Navy alcohol treatment program. You HAD to have A.A. people working with the patients, and the patients HAD to go to A.A. meetings, but most military personnel would not come into your program at all if they heard too much religious language. They would literally rather die.

The phrase at the end of Step Three, "God as we understood Him," was designed to make room in the program for people like Bill, and even -- at the time the Twelve Steps were first written -- for one good sober A.A. member who still insisted that he was a total atheist.

So to understand Bill W.'s thought world thoroughly, we must also learn something about the psychological and psychiatric theories of the time (William James, Sigmund Freud and particularly the Neo-Freudians, Carl Jung, and so on) plus the people who were involved in the Emmanuel Movement and the Jacoby Club, who were trying to work out a spiritually based therapy, but who were also sometimes "practicing psychotherapy without a license" as far as the mental health professionals were concerned.

The Big Book says that each of us is allowed to develop our own kind of spirituality. C. S. Lewis has been a big influence on my own spiritual development, and it is a very good kind of spirituality indeed. Lewis himself as a young man was very much like the young Bill Wilson, and exposed to many of the same books and ideas, so reading Lewis, and finding out more about him, can help a person to understand Bill W. better.

But there seems to be no real connection between C. S. Lewis and Frank Buchman. And although a study of Buchman's Oxford Group is absolutely vital for understanding the origin of the Twelve Steps and certain other things about early A.A. practices -- we absolutely have to study the Oxford Group and the early linkage between A.A. and the Oxford Group -- I think that the main reason why reading C. S. Lewis could be useful to an A.A. member would be to introduce us to some of the other kinds of ideas which were influencing the spirituality of early A.A.

And C. S. Lewis' own spirituality would definitely work as part of a good A.A. program -- it would be one of the many excellent choices that A.A. members have to choose between for working out a strong spiritual program in the modern world. But A.A. gives us the freedom to make these choices ourselves, and there are many other kinds of spirituality which also obviously work. There is no one RIGHT A.A. spirituality, and never has been -- the VARIETIES of Religious Experience is what they learned from William James.

Glenn Chesnut, Indiana University (South Bend)

SOURCES:

Roger Lancelyn Green and Walter Hooper, C. S. Lewis: A Biography.

college or an important official at a cathedral) but a "don," which meant an ordinary college teacher, who taught medieval English literature (Chaucer, the Romance of the Rose, and so on). An Oxford "don" gave a few lectures every week during term, and spent most of his time meeting with students for hour-long tutorial sessions, where the student read a research paper which he or she had written, and the teacher then made a critique of what the student had done, and made recommendations for further study. Ironically, Lewis received no great academic honors until the very end of his life, and that he received from Cambridge University, not Oxford University.

Frank Buchman (1878-1961) was an American, and a Lutheran pastor, not an Anglican (Episcopalian) priest, which meant that he did not move in the very high church Anglican theological circles in Oxford when he visited there in 1920. He had no fame at that point -- his public fame did not come until many years later -- and I doubt that anyone much noticed him at all. He would have been a quite peripheral figure, moving around the fringes at best. His seminary degree, from Mount Airy Seminary in Philadelphia, would not have been recognized as much in the way of credentials at Oxford University.

In 1920, Buchman visited Cambridge University in England, trying to carry out an kind of unofficial ministry to students (we have both Protestant and Roman Catholic groups setting up similar kinds of operations on my campus of Indiana University even today, setting up tables in the halls with literature out on it, and that kind of thing). He then got some of his Cambridge student converts to come with him to Oxford University, to do the same kind of thing there, and then convinced some of these student converts to come with him to South Africa in 1929. There in South Africa, people noticed that some members of the group had been students at Oxford University, and began calling them "the Oxford Group."

Buchman apparently loved this -- it gave an aura of enormous prestige to his youth for Christ movement -- but the people at Oxford University were not amused. At one point the university even sued Buchman, to try to get him to stop using the university's name. Buchman's rise to real fame began with his travels through Canada and the U.S. in 1932 to 1934. It is important to remember that he was no truly enormous influence on the world prior to that period.

All these dates are important. Buchman visited Oxford in 1920. Lewis did not give his first lecture at Oxford until 14 October 1924 (only four students showed up). Lewis was still a convinced atheist at that time, and would not have given Buchman the time of day, even if he had somehow met him. Oh, to give an example, in 1916 Lewis described Christianity as merely one among many mythologies of the world, and spoke of Jesus as "a Hebrew philosopher" -- similar to Bill Wilson's early beliefs as he describes them in the Big Book, but even more skeptical.

But in 1924, Lewis read Samuel Alexander's Space, Time, and Deity, and began to be uneasy in his atheism for the first time. And later he read Chesterton's The Everlasting Man, but even then he refused to acknowledge God. But finally in 1929, at some point during Trinity Term, Lewis says that "I gave in, and admitted that God was God, and knelt and prayed: perhaps, that night, the most dejected and reluctant convert in all England."

He was still skeptical about Christianity however. Lewis' book The Pilgrim's Regress came out in May 1933, but sold only 680 copies when it first came out. He had become a Christian by this time however.

How did he move into writing children's books? Tolkien wrote The Hobbit in 1932, and Lewis read it and thought it very good. He subsequently read George MacDonald's Phantastes, and (in 1936) Charles Williams' The Place of the Lion. But Lewis did not begin writing The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe for example until the end of 1939, when the first British children were being evacuated from the cities to the countryside to try to keep them out of the way of the Nazi bombs. And Lewis did not start to become widely read until well after that, so there would have been no influence of C. S. Lewis' works on the early A.A.'s during the period before the Big Book came out in 1939.

I love Lewis children's books myself, but the primary influence on them was Tolkien, George MacDonald, and Charles Williams. If you are a real Lewis fan, you ought to read both Phantastes and The Place of the Lion (I assume you have already read Tolkien's children's books).

No one who has done serious work on C. S. Lewis has ever seen any influence of Frank Buchman, and in fact it is difficult to see how there could have been any. Please ignore the word "Oxford" in the name Buchman gave his group. This was guff. It was not an Oxford University linked group in any serious way.

On the other hand, C. S. Lewis, particularly as a young man, shared many ideas and beliefs in common with the young Bill Wilson. And a study of C. S. Lewis' world would give a person a lot of insight into the intellectual world in which the young Bill Wilson moved. Lewis would indeed have known James' The Varieties of Religious Experience very well indeed, and he and Bill W. would have read many of the same books, or at least books which contained many of the same ideas.

If we try to understand Bill W.'s mind by ONLY reading Oxford Group literature, we will obtain a gravely distorted picture of his ideas. The Oxford Group was a conservative evangelical movement.

But we must also read Adolf Harnack's What Is Christianity? -- the great manifesto of classical Protestant liberalism. Early A.A.'s used The Upper Room for their meditational literature before Richmond Walker wrote Twenty-Four Hours a Day in 1948, and The Upper Room was classical Protestant liberalism in its purest form, also incorporating the basic ideas of Horace Bushnell, whose major work, Christian Nurture, talked about spiritual growth as "an educational experience" (to use the Big Book's language). Bushnell (and the Upper Room) were very hostile to the conservative evangelists' insistence that you HAD to have had a highly emotional conversion experience to be a real Christian at all.

And we must also read some of the representatives of what was called New Thought, like Emmet Fox, who wrote The Sermon on the Mount, to understand some of the other influences on Bill W.'s thought.

People who over-emphasize the Oxford Group also tend to totally neglect the Roman Catholic influence on early A.A. Sister Ignatia frequently had alcoholics read selections from St. Ignatius Loyola's Spiritual Exercises, which pointed out the need for something like the Tenth Step, that is, the need to CONTINUE our regular moral inventories, in order to make real spiritual progress. Father Ed Dowling noticed that the minute he read a copy of the Big Book -- it might look "Protestant" in some ways, but there was a deep Catholic influence on its spirituality too. Some of the early Roman Catholic influence on A.A. ideas came from contact between Sister Ignatia and Dr. Bob -- they were both working at the same hospital, and both working with alcoholics (Sister Ignatia actually started trying to work with alcoholics at St. Thomas before Bill W. and Dr. Bob had met) -- while other influences came from Roman Catholics who joined A.A., and unconsciously assumed Catholic positions on various issues when the early A.A.'s were discussing how to handle the spiritual aspects of the program.

A book which has recently come out, Sgt. Bill S., On the Military Firing Line in the Alcoholism Treatment Program, is written by a man who got sober in A.A. in 1948, fifty-five years ago, and Bill's book reminds us that there was also an important group within early A.A. which chose to talk about the program in language almost completely devoid of traditional religious concepts. They turned to psychological explanations and so on.

Bill is held in enormous respect, almost awe even, by the good oldtimers, because of the way he works his program, and also because his methods for working with alcoholics work so well. At Lackland Air Force Base in the early 1950's, Bill was achieving a totally documented 50% success rate among people who went through his program the first time, with additional alcoholics getting the message later on, as the result of the seeds which he had planted. In other words, up in the same league as early Akron A.A.

Bill says that he had no luck at all in getting military personnel sober as long as he used any kind of traditional religious language -- it was the kiss of death among hard-bitten military people -- and Dr. Joe Zuska found the same thing later on when he set up his incredibly successful Navy alcohol treatment program. You HAD to have A.A. people working with the patients, and the patients HAD to go to A.A. meetings, but most military personnel would not come into your program at all if they heard too much religious language. They would literally rather die.

The phrase at the end of Step Three, "God as we understood Him," was designed to make room in the program for people like Bill, and even -- at the time the Twelve Steps were first written -- for one good sober A.A. member who still insisted that he was a total atheist.

So to understand Bill W.'s thought world thoroughly, we must also learn something about the psychological and psychiatric theories of the time (William James, Sigmund Freud and particularly the Neo-Freudians, Carl Jung, and so on) plus the people who were involved in the Emmanuel Movement and the Jacoby Club, who were trying to work out a spiritually based therapy, but who were also sometimes "practicing psychotherapy without a license" as far as the mental health professionals were concerned.

The Big Book says that each of us is allowed to develop our own kind of spirituality. C. S. Lewis has been a big influence on my own spiritual development, and it is a very good kind of spirituality indeed. Lewis himself as a young man was very much like the young Bill Wilson, and exposed to many of the same books and ideas, so reading Lewis, and finding out more about him, can help a person to understand Bill W. better.

But there seems to be no real connection between C. S. Lewis and Frank Buchman. And although a study of Buchman's Oxford Group is absolutely vital for understanding the origin of the Twelve Steps and certain other things about early A.A. practices -- we absolutely have to study the Oxford Group and the early linkage between A.A. and the Oxford Group -- I think that the main reason why reading C. S. Lewis could be useful to an A.A. member would be to introduce us to some of the other kinds of ideas which were influencing the spirituality of early A.A.

And C. S. Lewis' own spirituality would definitely work as part of a good A.A. program -- it would be one of the many excellent choices that A.A. members have to choose between for working out a strong spiritual program in the modern world. But A.A. gives us the freedom to make these choices ourselves, and there are many other kinds of spirituality which also obviously work. There is no one RIGHT A.A. spirituality, and never has been -- the VARIETIES of Religious Experience is what they learned from William James.

Glenn Chesnut, Indiana University (South Bend)

SOURCES:

Roger Lancelyn Green and Walter Hooper, C. S. Lewis: A Biography.

C. S. Lewis, Surprised by Joy: The Shape of My Early Life.

Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, s. v. Frank Buchman, Oxford Group, Adolf Harnack, Horace Bushnell, also Fundamentalism (the early twentieth century reaction to classical Protestant liberalism).

The internet has a good deal of material on New Thought and Emmet Fox.

I talk about some of these issues in The Higher Power of the Twelve-Step Program: For Believers & Non-Believers.

----- Original Message -----

From: rdb4002

Sent: Sunday, September 14, 2003 9:23 AM

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] C.S. Lewis & Oxford Groups

Does anyone know of the connection between C.S. Lewis and the Oxford groups? I know Lewis was at Oxford University as a dean during the 20's, and Frank Buchman was there at that time. I know Lewis was critical of the open confession practiced at that time. I know Lewis began a spiritual journey and re-newal afterward. Lewis had a core group of friends at the time who spent much time discussing and debating the various movements of the day. Lewis became the chief Christian apologist of his day after returning to his Anglican roots. "Pilgrim's Regress", an alegory of Lewis' own spiritual journey, has many veiled refrences to differing philosophies that tempted him and he rejected. Any knowledge of the obvious, yet ill defined connections?

----- Yahoo! Groups Sponsor ----->
Buy Ink Cartridges or Refill Kits for Your HP, Epson, Canon or Lexmark
Printer at Myinks.com. Free s/h on orders $50 or more to the US &
Canada. <http://www.c1tracking.com/l.asp?cid=5511>
<http://us.click.yahoo.com/l.m7sD/LIdGAA/qnsNAA/219oIB/TM>
----->

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to

Grapevine, Jan 47

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

Growth in New England. -- In less than three years, A.A. groups in Massachusetts have increased from two to 36, or a gain of 1800 percent, while Connecticut shows a 700 percent gain, according to a member of the Newtonville, Mass., Group. Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and Rhode Island, starting from scratch, now have 13 groups. The formation of an efficient Central Service Committee in Boston last spring has been a vital factor as was the attendance of about 600 at the sixth anniversary banquet. New England groups now include the following, which the A.A. Grapevine has been asked to list:

Massachusetts: Boston, Brockton, Brookline, Brookline Village, Cambridge, Cape Cod, Hyannis and Falmouth, Dorchester, Edgartown, Fall River, Fitchburg, Greenfield, Haverhill, Holyoke, Hyde Park, Lawrence, Lynn, Malden, Mattapan, New Bedford, Newton, Norwood, Pittsfield, Rutland, Salem, Somerville, South Ashburnham, South End, South Shore-Quincy, Springfield, Upham's Corner, Watertown, Wellesley Hill, Woburn, Worcester, and Lexington;

Connecticut: Ansonia, Bridgeport, Bristol, Danbury-Bethel, Greenwich, Hartford, Kent, Manchester, Meriden, Middletown, New Britain, New Haven, Norwalk, Norwich, Saybrook, Stamford, Stratford, Torrington, Waterbury, Westport, Winsted;

Maine: Bangor and Portland;

New Hampshire: Dover, Manchester, Portsmouth and Hanover;

Rhode Island: Providence;

Vermont: Bennington, Burlington, Montpelier, St. Johnsbury and Windsor.

No Strike in A.A.--The Tacoma A.A. Group reports progress after settlement of a recent six weeks' bus strike which hampered attendance and affected the usual A.A. activities, although there were enough cars to pick up regulars needing transportation. Increased attendance and interest is manifest at meetings and round-table discussions and at the time of writing the group was looking forward to the visit of M. M., scheduled to address the Tacoma Kiwanis club.

Happier Birthdays. -- Double celebrations of sobriety and the holidays are reported from many areas. The Ottawa, Canada, Group's first birthday was celebrated by about 100 members and guests in the parish hall of Blessed Sacrament Church. An open meeting followed the dinner, with the founder of the Toronto Group as the first speaker, using the topic of the 12 Steps. He was followed by other members from Toronto. A guest soloist and two short moving pictures were included on the program.

. . . A full column in the Daily Sentinel of Nacogdoches, Texas, told of the 20 members from that city who attended the area meeting of A.A. in Palestine recently where about 100 heard an outstanding member of A.A., a prominent Dallas business man.

Cities and towns represented included Nacogdoches, Center, Henderson, Douglass, Longview, Crockett, Palestine, Athens, Centerville, Fort Worth, Dallas, Amarillo and Waco. Three ministers and the sheriff-elect of Anderson county praised the organization's efforts. . . An overflow crowd of members, wives and friends flocked to the second anniversary banquet of the Montpelier, Vt., Group recently, A steak dinner was enjoyed by 132, including members from Barre, Burlington, Ely, Newport, Northfield, Richford, St. Johnsbury and Windsor, as well as Lyme, N. H., and East Orange, N. J. Prominent business men, ministers and state authorities were speakers.

. . Columbus and Central Ohio A.A.s celebrated the fifth anniversary in Columbus
with a meeting attended by 700 who heard an Ohio physician define alcoholism as "soul sickness." . . The Huntington, L. I., N. Y., Group held its first annual dinner
on January 8 with several fine speakers and a delicious dinner.

Going It Alone. --When a man who had been hospitalized by the Alkanon Club
of Binghamton, N. Y., was taken home and left on his own resources it was decided
to carry him as a corresponding member, to write to him each week, telling of
the discussions, carrying some of the problems to him, or asking him to write something for club members to discuss. After either the Wednesday or Sunday night meeting
some one of the members starts a letter and leaves it on the desk where it is available to all members to add whatever they wish and by so doing cover the meeting.
Every
member has written and to show the results a letter from the man, who 40 miles from
the group, was received recently addressed to "all of the Happy Family" and expressing appreciation of the letters. To the Group he writes, "My sobriety has been since
June
10 and now I feel quite safe. Of course, one is never really safe--life isn't even that, but I am happy and all of you help me feel that way. I can imagine a light down the road and I want to make it without any turns or byroads, and with the help
of you all, I think can make it. You can see you are playing a big part in my life." .
. .
Still more on his own a correspondent from Ronceverte, W. Va., who says that here in the hills we don't have the meetings and all we got to talk to are drunks and preachers." Left as the only member of a group of five who started out about a year ago, this man sought out A.A. in various places and finally worked out a system of mental exercises, talking A.A. an hour a day, stressing church attendance, creating an A.A. bank account which is used for activities and "all in all has had a fine time and hopes to be having a fine time when the end of this day comes."
"back

Alaska Thawing Out.--How A.A. is beginning to flourish in Anchorage, Alaska, in spite of a frontier atmosphere and bad weather is related in letters from an Army officer at Ft. Richardson. A woman who had been a member of a group in the States made arrangements before her return in August for a notice to be placed in the Anchorage paper when "Lost Week-End" was to be shown. The officer and another man got together on it, arranged for the use of a Sunday school room, helped to cut lumber and line it, and contacted others. Classified ads have been run every night and letters have been pouring in. At least 10 members formed the nucleus of a group which is attacking a big field, complete with lots of liquor, high prices, 30 to 40 below temperatures, and other rough and ready conditions.

Doctor, Psychiatrist Speak.--Signing the letter "A-lways A-chieving," the A.A. Grapevine correspondent from New Orleans reports Tuesday night open meetings have heard a prominent doctor of psychiatry, who agrees with the A.A. program, and a national business executive who recommends it. Visitors from many places have visited the club room at 1113 Chartres Street in the basement of General

Beauregard's
former home and good Louisiana coffee is promised to all who come that way.

Group Gets Going Again.-- After a small start in Wooster, Ohio, several years ago,
the Group there dissolved, but in March of this year four alcoholics and two wives began attending meetings in Ashland and eventually decided to build a group
in Wooster again. A local church has provided rooms, programs and refreshments have been planned, a weekly bulletin called "Blue Monday" is being put out and a program
of social visits with new members is used.

New Quarters for Two Groups.--Tampa, Fla., A.A.s are justly proud of the new
club house into which they moved recently. Located at 405 Tyler Street, it is a two-story former residence, which is being completely renovated inside and out and rearranged to provide with its 12 rooms, a lounge, assembly hall, buffet and kitchen, quarters for the resident secretary, office and study room and a game room. Financing was made possible by a building committee, open to any members of Tampa Groups who wish
to make a small monthly contribution in addition to their regular ones. The new building is the central headquarters for all groups. Tampa A.A.s are about ready for the third annual banquet scheduled for Sunday, January 26. Out of town guest speakers will
be on the program. The Tampa Groups also enjoyed a visit from S. R., formerly
of Alaska, who visited her mother here, and gave several talks during her stay ... In Rochester,
N. Y., the Central Groups announce a move to larger quarters in the downtown district, with room for 300 people. Meetings are held every night in the week at 8:30, with a Monday morning group for shift workers. The new Monday night

group,
recently formed, had the first meeting, with attention concentrated on men under 35 years and ex-G.I.s. The new address is 12 Andrews Street.

More Meetings--Freeman Group of the Salvation Army meets at the Salvation Army
Hall, 1514 Freeman Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio, every Monday night at 8, with an average attendance of about 40. A meeting is held the first Sunday of each month in conjunction with an open religious service. About 80 attended a dinner recently
to hear a Cleveland speaker as well as one from Lakewood and solos by a member
of
the Cedar Group of Cleveland. . . The Haverhill, Mass., Group was recently informed
by the management of the Hotel Whittier in that city that there would be no more charge for the meeting rooms on account of the good work being done! Gatherings at the hotel are held Friday at 8:30 p.m. . . The St. Mary's, Ohio, Group, numbering five
members, had its first meeting in December with visitors from the Lima Group which helped
them
get started...The Essex County Group No. 2 will meet every Sunday at 7:30 p.m.
at 139
Walnut Street, Newark, N. J., following its recent founding. Calls and letters
are invited.

Hopes Husband's a Member The weekly broadcast of the Towson, Md., Group over station
WFBR brought a note from a Pittsfield, Mass., woman who asked the members to aid
in her search for her husband from whom she has been separated for 10 years.

The woman hopes her husband may have become a member of a group somewhere and says that "his wife and three grown children want to hear from him and see him," although he may "feel we have no use for him." He is described as being W.F.B., born July 10, 1897, at Whiteheads, Va., 5 ft. 11 in., blue eyes, was red-headed, probably gray now, and not too heavy. He is an expert machinist. The radio program which brought in the appeal has been changed from 7:15 Monday to 7:15 p.m. Saturday, the Group reports. The Towson Group went in a body to attend formation of the Hagerstown, Md., Group and attended a later session.

Billings Keeps Trying. -- After a former Atlanta, Ga., member brought A.A. to Billings, Mont., the Group enjoyed a growth for a while, only to dwindle to two, who kept trying until now there are six or seven members with about half a dozen others listed as dependables and about as many more who may make the grade. The Rotary Club invited the secretary to speak on A.A. at a recent luncheon and the reaction was favorable.

Raking In the Chips.--The founder of the Elmira, N. Y., Group received his blue chips recently at a meeting to which a local paper devoted considerable space. When members of the Group start out they are given a white poker chip as an A.A. reminder. After three months an A.A. red chip is given out and after a year a blue chip goes into the pocket. At the blue chip presentation the hostess brought out a now unused cocktail shaker, draped with a black ribbon, and used it for serving coffee. Speaker for the occasion was a member who joined the original Group in Akron, Ohio, more than 10 years ago. Guests were present from Addison, Elkland, Endicott, Ithaca and Sayre. The Group schedule included a New Year's Eve party.

Mixer Starts Whirling. --Vancouver, B. C., A.A.s have a new periodical, The Mixer, produced by the West End Group. Its 12 pages contain news, serious articles, humor and personal notes. Arrangements are being made to extend its circulation throughout the district, including Victoria.

Austin Is Host.---The Austin, Texas, Group was host to the statewide convention which was held in the Driskill Hotel this fall with a national officer attending. Another feature was the distance traveled by some members, one coming 600 miles from El Paso, five coming 500 miles from Amarillo, and three from the Rio Grande Valley. Nearly all Texas groups were well represented.

Proud of Achievement. -- Proud of the growth from two members to 15, the A.A. Group of Princeton, W. Va., numbers many who have been sober the full six months since the founding. The Group reports a large field in which to work and feels confident of results. Meetings are on Thursdays and information for visitors can be obtained at 115 Bluefield Avenue.

Hospital Asked for Alcoholics-- Construction of two 150-bed institutions for the treatment of alcoholics will be recommended to the next legislature by the state

( The comments in (brackets ) are strictly my own based on my own experience and naturally I will respect your sharing of your experiences in such matters and not doubt you will respect mine?)

Further to recent discussions on the above with a well respected member, I confirmed to them that the Reviver had an Article on the above mentioned subject in their July 2003 issue. I suggested that They (The Members at The Reviver) might send out multiple copies, if you so order same. The order phone number is 02 9799 1199; email : aacroydon@bigpond.com.au.

As I said during the above mentioned discussion that the Morisset Group has a very good Guide for the Chairperson to follow, Lenny from Morisset may fax you or email (if he has it electronically) you a copy if you so request. And a good number of general concerns that are often raised in regards to Charing meetings are covered in the Morisset Group Guidelines, on Charing a meeting.

From the great Article in the July Reviver, the below are the suggested guidelines resulting from the Revivers' review of the problems resulting from what Bill W called the greatest killer of long term sober members, that of Complacency!!!!

- Start on time, and finish on time.
- Start the Meeting with a strong speaker - other than yourself.
- Finish the Meeting with a strong speaker - other than yourself.
- Listen to each speaker, and show it by looking interested (and not reading the Reviver while they are speaking) (JR comment, in brackets)
- Don't try to attract attention away from the speaker.
- Lose the inter-speaker commentary (Don't tell the "rest" of your own storey between speakers) (JR Comment, in brackets).
- Try to remember people's names - but don't only call the names you remember. (Show you are responsible enough to be such to ask people other than those you know, by finding out before hand who else is there besides your friends)(In such places as S.A. They have a book at the door and everyone puts their name and group in it, is not left there it is then passed around the room on the way up to the Chairperson, to insure that everyone is all included). (JR Comment, in brackets).
- Look over the last week's speaker list to see who's been called recently and who hasn't.
- Take a risk - scan the room for new or seldom seen members and call them up. ( I, personally, do not agree with always calling "seldom seen members" I have found that often only encourages those who come to grace us with their presence from time to time, to expect to be asked to speak and then often leave after they have spoken. Bill W was concerned about those who got well and did not come back to help carry the load. There is more to carrying the road than turning up on seldom occasions and our egos being fed by being asked to speak) (And in my opinion and that of a lot of Oldtimers who have gone to the Big Meeting, members coming in regularly late, to meetings should go to the bottom of the list. I often see these days folk coming in late, asked to speak, talk for 15 minutes, then leave early. This does not help the ego of those who grace us, or those folk who had the discipline to turn up on time and are regular, one member asked at one Group, after he had been turning up for 7 years, to help set up, attended all Group Conscience Meetings, etc., asked at one Group Business Meeting, how long do you have to be in tis Group, before one gets asked to speak, he had been sitting there loyally for 7 years, not asked to share) (JR Comment, in brackets).

· Try to strike a balance of OSM (Oldtimers, OSM as a newer terminology in A.A. sounds like a hangover from the war days, which I hope are over for most of us) and newcomers, group member and visitor, male and female, it easier than it sounds. (The Morisset Group, covers these aspects well) (JR Comment, in brackets).

· Ask people to share their time - but resist the temptation to do so after a longwinded speaker which is a subtle way of shaming people. (Some of the best structured Groups I have belonged to have had a bell or egg timer, to keep folk like myself a bit better disciplined). (JR Comment, in brackets).

· At topic meetings, give occasional reminders of the topic.

· When inviting members with less than 90 days to identify, do so in a manner that offers them encouragement and comfort.

· As you open the Big Book to read How It Works, don't encourage people out the door with quips about smoke breaks, loo brakes and tea breaks.

· Finish up with an upbeat reading - e.g. the Twelve Promises on page 449 of the Big Book. ( While I agree, but not another reading, at the expense of say not hearing from say a member with circa nearly 50 years sobriety who has not spoken at the Birthday Meeting) (JR Comment, in brackets).

· When reading How It Works, read it from the Big Book - it's an important pointer to newcomers looking for the source of all this new information.

It is an excellent Article and as suggested by the Grapevine, they recommend Articles from the Grapevine, as Group Discussion Topics. In my humble opinion this sure would make a good Group Topic. Stan from Ramsgate said "everyone in A.A. is sincere but you can be sincerely wrong". I often see well intended folk in the chair who are great A.A. members but obviously have not had much training or appropriate Sponsorship in how to make a good meeting turn out another productive spiritual result. (Russ J spoke about the half truths in A.A. One of them being "The only requirement for me being in the chair is that I have not had a drink today" But again every Group is autonomous, but sometimes Groups that are pleading for support, to stay open perhaps could learn from the suggestions in the Reviver? But then again I could be wrong!!!). (JR Comment, in brackets).

Kind Regards, John R

The Reviver

(Comments attributed to being my own on this occasion and in brackets are not for Publication)

( The comments in (brackets ) are strictly my own based on my own experience and naturally I will respect your sharing of your experiences in such matters and not doubt you will respect mine?)

Further to recent discussions on the above with a well respected member, I confirmed to them that the Reviver had an Article on the above mentioned subject in their July 2003 issue. I suggested that They (The Members at The Reviver) might send out multiple copies, if you so order same. The order phone number is 02 9799 1199; email : aacroydon@bigpond.com.au.

As I said during the above mentioned discussion that the Morisset Group has a very good Guide for the Chairperson to follow, Lenny from Morisset may fax you or email (if he has it electronically) you a copy if you so request. And a good number of general concerns that are often raised in regards to Charing meetings are covered in the Morisset Group Guidelines, on Charing a meeting.

From the great Article in the July Reviver, the below are the suggested guidelines resulting from the Revivers' review of the problems resulting from what Bill W called the greatest killer of long term sober members, that of Complacency!!!!

- Start on time, and finish on time.
- Start the Meeting with a strong speaker - other than yourself.
- Finish the Meeting with a strong speaker - other than yourself.
- Listen to each speaker, and show it by looking interested (and not reading the Reviver while they are speaking) (JR comment, in brackets)
- Don't try to attract attention away from the speaker.
- Lose the inter-speaker commentary (Don't tell the "rest" of your own storey between speakers) (JR Comment, in brackets).
- Try to remember people's names - but don't only call the names you remember. (Show you are responsible enough to be such to ask people other than those you know, by finding out before hand who else is there besides your friends)(In such places as S.A. They have a book at the door and everyone puts their name and group in it, is not left there it is then passed around the room on the way up to the Chairperson, to insure that everyone is all included). (JR Comment, in brackets).
- Look over the last week's speaker list to see who's been called recently and who hasn't.
- Take a risk - scan the room for new or seldom seen members and call them up. ( I, personally, do not agree with always calling "seldom seen members" I have found that often only encourages those who come to grace us with their presence from time to time, to expect to be asked to speak and then often leave after they have spoken. Bill W was concerned about those who got well and did not come back to help carry the load. There is more to carrying the road than turning up on seldom occasions and our egos being fed by being asked to speak) (And in my opinion and that of a lot of Oldtimers who have gone to the Big Meeting, members coming in regularly late, to meetings should go to the bottom of the list. I often see these days folk coming in late, asked to speak, talk for 15 minutes, then leave early. This does not help the ego of those who grace us, or those folk who had the discipline to turn up on time and are regular, one member asked at one Group, after he had been turning up for 7 years, to help set up, attended all Group Conscience Meetings, etc., asked at one Group Business Meeting, how long do you have to be in tis Group, before one gets asked to speak, he had been sitting there loyally for 7 years, not asked to share) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- Try to strike a balance of OSM (Oldtimers, OSM as a newer terminology in A.A. sounds like a hangover from the war days, which I hope are over for most of us) and newcomers, group member and visitor, male and female, it easier than it sounds. (The Morisset Group, covers these aspects well) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- Ask people to share their time - but resist the temptation to do so after a longwinded speaker which is a subtle way of shaming people. (Some of the best structured Groups I have belonged to have had a bell or egg timer, to keep folk like myself a bit better disciplined). (JR Comment, in brackets).

- At topic meetings, give occasional reminders of the topic.

- When inviting members with less than 90 days to identify, do so in a manner that offers them encouragement and comfort.

- As you open the Big Book to read How It Works, don't encourage people out the door with quips about smoke breaks, loo brakes and tea breaks.

- Finish up with an upbeat reading - e.g. the Twelve Promises on page 449 of the Big Book. ( While I agree, but not another reading, at the expense of say not hearing from say a member with circa nearly 50 years sobriety who has not spoken at the Birthday Meeting) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- When reading How It Works, read it from the Big Book - it's an important pointer to newcomers looking for the source of all this new information.

It is an excellent Article and as suggested by the Grapevine, they recommend Articles from the Grapevine, as Group Discussion Topics. In my humble opinion this sure would make a good Group Topic. Stan

7. We will lose interest in selfish things.
8. Self-seeking will slip away.
9. Our whole attitude and outlook on life will change.
10. Fear of people and economic insecurity will leave us.
11. We will intuitively know how to handle situations that used to baffle us.
12. We will realize that God is doing for us what we couldn't do for ourselves.

-Woody W., Derived from the AA "Big Book", pp. 83-84.

I send this note as well

Note: One will not actually find "Twelve Promises" listed in the Big Book, and these promises are not officially OA Conference Approved, as they represent an individual interpretation of the Big Book. However, many serious students of the Big Book and the Twelve Steps have looked at these pages and found a set of promises, promises of benefits to be derived from earnestly working the Twelve Step Program. There have been a number of interpretations of how these promises should be stated, with the above being one of the more popular interpretations. It would seem obvious that "twelve" is a fitting number with which to present these promises, in honor of the Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions.

Hope this helps.

Peace & Love, to you and yours,

Joe N.

From: Lash, William (Bill) [mailto:wlash@avaya.com]
Sent: Wednesday, September 17, 2003 6:15 PM
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Subject: RE: [AAHistoryLovers] (a) Charing A.A. Meetings, good one from The Reviver

(Thanks for the below! Please note that there is no such thing as the "Twelve Promises" -

they're the 9th Step promises, & they certainly are not found on page 449 of the Big Book - that's where the acceptance piece is). (BFB comments, in brackets).

Just Love,

Barefoot Bill

-----Original Message-----

From: John Reid [mailto:johnyr1@iprimus.com.au]

Sent: Tuesday, September 16, 2003 12:02 AM

To: John E Reid

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] (a) Charing A.A. Meetings, good one from The Reviver

(Comments attributed to being my own on this occasion and in brackets are not for Publication)

( The comments in (brackets ) are strictly my own based on my own experience and naturally I will respect your sharing of your experiences in such matters and not doubt you will respect mine?)

Further to recent discussions on the above with a well respected member, I confirmed to them that the Reviver had an Article on the above mentioned subject in their July 2003 issue. I suggested that They (The Members at The Reviver) might send out multiple copies, if you so order same. The order phone number is 02 9799 1199; email : aacroydon@bigpond.com.au.

As I said during the above mentioned discussion that the Morisset Group has a very good Guide for the Chairperson to follow, Lenny from Morisset may fax you or email (if he has it electronically) you a copy if you so request. And a good number of general concerns that are often raised in regards to Charing meetings are covered in the Morisset Group Guidelines, on Charing a meeting.

From the great Article in the July Reviver, the below are the suggested guidelines resulting from the Revivers' review of the problems resulting from what Bill W called the greatest killer of long term sober members, that of Complacency!!!!

- Start on time, and finish on time.
- Start the Meeting with a strong speaker - other than yourself.
- Finish the Meeting with a strong speaker - other than yourself.
- Listen to each speaker, and show it by looking interested (and not reading the Reviver while they are speaking) (JR comment, in brackets)
- Don't try to attract attention away from the speaker.
- Lose the inter-speaker commentary (Don't tell the "rest" of your own storey between speakers) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- Try to remember people's names - but don't only call the names you remember. (Show you are responsible enough to be such to ask people other than those you know, by finding out before hand who else is there besides your friends)(In such places as S.A. They have a book at the door and everyone puts their name and group in it, is not left there it is then passed around the room on the way up to the Chairperson, to insure that everyone is all included). (JR Comment, in brackets).

- Look over the last week's speaker list to see who's been called recently and who hasn't.

- Take a risk - scan the room for new or seldom seen members and call them up. ( I, personally, do not agree with always calling "seldom seen members" I have found that often only encourages those who come to grace us with their presence from time to time, to expect to be asked to speak and then often leave after they have spoken. Bill W was concerned about those who got well and did not come back to help carry the load. There is more to carrying the road than turning up on seldom occasions and our egos being fed by being asked to speak) (And in my opinion and that of a lot of Oldtimers who have gone to the Big Meeting, members coming in regularly late, to meetings should go to the bottom of the list. I often see these days folk coming in late, asked to speak, talk for 15 minutes, then leave early. This does not help the ego of those who grace us, or those folk who had the discipline to turn up on time and are regular, one member asked at one Group, after he had been turning up for 7 years, to help set up, attended all Group Conscience Meetings, etc., asked at one Group Business Meeting, how long do you have to be in tis Group, before one gets asked to speak, he had been sitting there loyally for 7 years, not asked to share) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- Try to strike a balance of OSM (Oldtimers, OSM as a newer terminology in A.A. sounds like a hangover from the war days, which I hope are over for most of us) and newcomers, group member and visitor, male and female, it easier than it sounds. (The Morisset Group, covers these aspects well) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- Ask people to share their time - but resist the temptation to do so after a longwinded speaker which is a subtle way of shaming people. (Some of the best structured Groups I have belonged to have had a bell or egg timer, to keep folk like myself a bit better disciplined). (JR Comment, in brackets).

- At topic meetings, give occasional reminders of the topic.

- When inviting members with less than 90 days to identify, do so in a manner that offers them encouragement and comfort.

- As you open the Big Book to read How It Works, don't encourage people out the door with quips about smoke breaks, loo brakes along to anyone directly if they'd like.

Namaste! Barefoot Bill

1 - If we are painstaking about this phase of our development, we will be amazed before we are half way through.

2 - We are going to know a new freedom

3 - We are going to know a new happiness.

4 - We will not regret the past nor wish to shut the door on it.
(which actually could be two promises)

5 - We will comprehend the word serenity

6 - We will know peace.

7 - No matter how far down the scale we have gone, we will see how our experience can benefit others.

8 - That feeling of uselessness will disappear.

9 - That feeling of self-pity will disappear.

10 - We will lose interest in selfish things.

11 - We will gain interest in our fellows.

12 - Self-seeking will slip away.

13 - Our whole attitude and outlook upon life will change. (which also could be two promises)

14 - Fear of people will leave us.

15 - Fear of economic insecurity will leave us.

16 - We will intuitively know how to handle situations which used to baffle us.

17 - We will suddenly realize that God is doing for us what we could not do for ourselves.

-----Original Message-----

From: Joe Nugent [mailto:joegent@sympatico.ca]

Sent: Thursday, September 18, 2003 3:44 AM

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Subject: RE: [AAHistoryLovers] (a) Charing A.A. Meetings, good one from The Reviver

Hi Bill,

I have been a member of AA since 1964 and I believe We have the Twelve promises on pages 83-84, it also says on page 84 "it asks are these extravagant promises?"

The Twelve Promises

1. We know a new freedom and happiness.
2. We will not regret the past nor wish to shut the door on it.
3. We will comprehend the word "serenity".
4. We will know peace.
5. We will see how our experiences would benefit others.
6. That feeling of uselessness and self-pity will disappear.
7. We will lose interest in selfish things.
8. Self-seeking will slip away.
9. Our whole attitude and outlook on life will change.
10. Fear of people and economic insecurity will leave us.
11. We will intuitively know how to handle situations that used to baffle us.
12. We will realize that God is doing for us what we couldn't do for ourselves.

-Woody W., Derived from the AA "Big Book", pp. 83-84.

I send this note as well

Note: One will not actually find "Twelve Promises" listed in the Big Book, and these promises are not officially OA Conference Approved, as they represent an individual interpretation of the Big Book. However, many serious students of the Big Book and the Twelve Steps have looked at these pages and found a set of promises, promises of benefits to be derived from earnestly working the Twelve Step Program. There have been a number of interpretations of how these promises should be stated, with the above being one of the more popular interpretations. It would seem obvious that "twelve" is a fitting number with which to present these promises, in honor of the Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions.

Hope this helps.

Peace & Love, to you and yours,

Joe N.

From: Lash, William (Bill) [mailto:wlash@avaya.com]
Sent: Wednesday, September 17, 2003 6:15 PM
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Subject: RE: [AAHistoryLovers] (a) Charing A.A. Meetings, good one from The Reviver

(Thanks for the below! Please note that there is no such thing as the "Twelve Promises" -

they're the 9th Step promises, & they certainly are not found on page 449 of the Big Book - that's where the acceptance piece is). (BFB comments, in brackets).

Just Love,

Barefoot Bill

-----Original Message-----

From: John Reid [mailto:johnyr1@iprimus.com.au]
Sent: Tuesday, September 16, 2003 12:02 AM
To: John E Reid
Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] (a) Charing A.A. Meetings, good one from The Reviver

(Comments attributed to being my own on this occasion and in brackets are not for Publication)

( The comments in (brackets ) are strictly my own based on my own experience and naturally I will respect your sharing of your experiences in such matters and not doubt you will respect mine?)

Further to recent discussions on the above with a well respected member, I confirmed to them that the Reviver had an Article on the above mentioned subject in their July 2003 issue. I suggested that They (The Members at The Reviver) might send out multiple copies, if you so order same. The order phone number is 02 9799 1199; email : aacroydon@bigpond.com.au.

As I said during the above mentioned discussion that the Morisset Group has a very good Guide for the Chairperson to follow, Lenny from Morisset may fax you or email (if he has it electronically) you a copy if you so request. And a good number of general concerns that are often raised in regards to Charing meetings are covered in the Morisset Group Guidelines, on Charing a meeting.

From the great Article in the July Reviver, the below are the suggested guidelines resulting from the Revivers' review of the problems resulting from what Bill W called the greatest killer of long term sober members, that of Complacency!!!!

- Start on time, and finish on time.
- Start the Meeting with a strong speaker - other than yourself.
- Finish the Meeting with a strong speaker - other than yourself.
- Listen to each speaker, and show it by looking interested (and not reading the Reviver while they are speaking) (JR comment, in brackets)
- Don't try to attract attention away from the speaker.
- Lose the inter-speaker commentary (Don't tell the "rest" of your own storey between speakers) (JR Comment, in brackets).
- Try to remember people's names - but don't only call the names you remember. (Show you are responsible enough to be such to ask people other than those you know, by finding out before hand who else is there besides your friends)(In such places as S.A. They have a book at the door and everyone puts their name and group in it, is not left there it is then passed around the room on the way up to the Chairperson, to insure that everyone is all included). (JR Comment, in brackets).
- Look over the last week's speaker list to see who's been called recently and who hasn't.
- Take a risk - scan the room for new or seldom seen members and call them up. ( I, personally, do not agree with always calling "seldom seen members" I have found that often only encourages those who come to grace us with their presence from time to time, to expect to be asked to speak and then often leave after they have spoken. Bill W was concerned about those who got well and did not come back to help carry the load. There is more to carrying the road than turning up on seldom occasions and our egos being fed by being asked to speak) (And in my opinion and that of a lot of Oldtimers who have gone to the Big Meeting, members coming in regularly late, to meetings should go to the bottom of the list. I often see these days folk coming in late, asked to speak, talk for 15 minutes, then leave early. This does not help the ego of those who grace us, or those folk who had the discipline to turn up on time and are regular, one member asked at one Group, after he had been turning up for 7 years, to help set up, attended all Group Conscience Meetings, etc., asked at one Group Business Meeting, how long do you have to be in tis Group, before one gets asked to speak, he had been sitting there loyally for 7 years, not asked to share) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- Try to strike a balance of OSM (Oldtimers, OSM as a newer terminology in A.A. sounds like a hangover from the war days, which I hope are over for most of us) and newcomers, group member and visitor, male and female, it easier than it sounds. (The Morisset Group, covers these aspects well) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- Ask people to share their time - but resist the temptation to do so after a longwinded speaker which is a subtle way of shaming people. (Some of the best structured Groups I have belonged to have had a bell or egg timer, to keep folk like myself a bit better disciplined). (JR Comment, in brackets).

- At topic meetings, give occasional reminders of the topic.

- When inviting members with less than 90 days to identify, do so in a manner that offers them encouragement and comfort.

- As you open the Big Book to read How It Works, don't encourage people out the door with quips about smoke breaks, loo brakes and tea breaks.

- Finish up with an upbeat reading - e.g. the Twelve Promises on page 449 of the Big Book. ( While I agree, but not another reading, at the expense of say not hearing from say a member with circa nearly 50 years sobriety who has not spoken at the Birthday Meeting) (JR Comment, in brackets).

- When reading How It Works, read it from the Big Book - it's an important pointer to newcomers looking for the source of all this new information.

It is an excellent Article and as suggested by the Grapevine, they recommend Articles from the Grapevine, as Group Discussion Topics. In my humble opinion this sure would make a good Group Topic. Stan from Ramsgate said "everyone in A.A. is sincere but you can be sincerely wrong". I often see well intended folk in the chair who are great A.A. members but obviously have not had much training or appropriate Sponsorship in how to make a good meeting turn out another productive spiritual result. (Russ J spoke about the half truths in A.A. One of them being "The only requirement for me being in the chair is that I have not had a

At the same time, the phrase "AA has no dues or fees" was clarified to read as it presently does: "There are no dues or fees for AA membership; we are self-supporting through our own contributions. The current version of the Preamble appears on page one of every issue of the Grapevine.

When reprinted, the Preamble should carry the following credit line:
Copyright © by The AA Grapevine, Inc.

AA PREAMBLE©

Alcoholics Anonymous is a fellowship of men and women who share their experience, strength and hope with each other that they may solve their common problem and help others to recover from alcoholism.

The only requirement for membership is a desire to stop drinking. There are no dues or fees for AA membership; we are self-supporting through our own contributions. AA is not allied with any sect, denomination, politics, organization or institution; does not wish to engage in any controversy, neither endorses nor opposes any causes.

Our primary purpose is to stay sober and help other alcoholics to achieve sobriety.

Copyright © by The AA Grapevine, Inc.

----- Original Message -----

From: Irene E. Sekros

To: AAHistoryLovers

Sent: Thursday, September 18, 2003 4:21 AM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] - "Dr. Bob & the Good Oldtimers"

Hi, my name's Irene and I'm an alcoholic from Athens, Greece. My home group is the North Corner Group of Athens. I'm a new member of this list and have just begun reading the old messages from the start. Wonderful information, thank you!

At the moment, I'm participating in a Big Book Study Group and have a question for which I haven't been able to find an answer. Maybe you could help?

In "Dr. Bob and the Good Oldtimers", page 240, line 11, it reads:
"...in

happiness. We will not regret the past nor wish to shut the door on it. We will comprehend the word serenity and know peace. No matter how far down the scale we have gone, we will see how our experience can benefit others. That feeling of uselessness and self-pity will disappear. We will lose interest in selfish things and gain interest in our fellows. Self-seeking will slip away. Our whole attitude and outlook upon life will change. Fear of people and of economic insecurity will leave us. We will intuitively know how to handle situations which used to baffle us. We will suddenly realize that God is doing for us what we could not do for ourselves.

Are these extravagant promises? We think not. They are being fulfilled among us - sometimes quickly, sometimes slowly. They will always materialize if we work for them.

Richard K.
Haverhill, MA
goldentextpro@aol.com

|||||

+++Message 1345. . . . . Re: - "Dr. Bob & the Good Oldtimers"
From: t . . . . . 9/18/2003 9:42:00 PM

|||||

Rob White wrote:
> Another related change they made was in Step 7. It use to read "Humbly
> , on our knees , holding nothing back , we asked God to remove our > shortcomings". I think I prefer the original but I understand the > reason they made the change.

That was in the mimeographed draft version of the Big Book. It was changed before actual publication due to feedback Bill got from the group members.

Irene wrote:
> At the moment, I'm participating in a Big Book Study Group and have a > question for which I haven't been able to find an answer. Maybe you > could help?
>
> In "Dr. Bob and the Good Oldtimers", page 240, line 11, it reads:
> "...in
> the foreword to the Big Book, stating, "The only requirement for > membership is an honest desire to stop drinking".

>

> Now my question: when was the word "honest" omitted, why and by whom?

>

At my group they read something at the end of each meeting about reconciling

what you hear with the Big Book.

Checking ... page viii of First Ed, page xiv of the Second, Third & Fourth Eds

...

there it is, "The only requirement for membership is an honest desire to stop drinking."

Perhaps you are confusing what is in the Forward to the First Edition with

Tradition

Three, which states "The only requirement for AA membership is a desire to stop drinking." Honest is not mentioned there, but it never has been. The familiar

'short

form' of our 12 Traditions were probably written within a year before being adopted by the fellowship at the 1950 first international convention in Cleveland.

Or another possibility is that you are confusing the Forward with the Preamble.

Which

was first published in the Grapevine in June 1947, and at first did contain the phrase "honest desire to stop drinking" from the Forward to the First Edition.

The change to the Preamble (dropping the word 'honest' along with further clarifying

the 'no dues or fees'), was adopted at the 1958 General Service Conference.

A delegate pointed out that the word 'honest' does not appear in the Third

Tradition,

and suggested that it should be deleted from the Preamble. Many delegates felt

that

the Santa Fe, N. M., Group. The first booklet, 'Ha De Ser Esto Nuestro Sino?' was a translation into Spanish of the Salt Lake No. I Group's 'Who? Me?' and portions of Akron's 'Guide, to the 12 Steps'. The material chosen and the translation will, therefore, not duplicate any work in process of the Alcoholic Foundation in its future publications in Spanish. The translator is a newspaper columnist and ex-editor of Spanish periodicals, whose forte previously had been politics. Since becoming an active member his forte is A.A. His columns are being printed in Spanish weekly newspapers throughout New Mexico.

Clicking in Canada. -- Really tremendous advances are reported for 1946 by the A.A. Grapevine's correspondent of the Toronto Central Group which has meetings every night in the week. Open Saturday night social meetings have filled a distinct need with attendance around 100 while the Sunday meetings for beginners run about the same with both new and old members attending. The year's work got underway with a big banquet in March with formation of a central committee at the end of the first six months. This group has built A.A. into a solid unit. There is a monthly meeting with all groups attending at the Central club rooms at 1170 Yonge. According to our correspondent, this is the largest group in Canada and lends considerable help and direction for other groups. Members are proud that L.T.M., one of the founders, was made a magistrate in Toronto last year, an event accompanied by much favorable newspaper publicity. other favorable newspaper stories have had to do with A.A. success where churches have failed in the work with alcoholics.

More San Francisco Groups. -- The San Francisco Group, which began the development of neighborhood groups slightly more than a year ago, ended 1946 with five such organizations. It began 1947 with six and the prospect of two or three more in the next month or two. All such groups retain their affiliation with the central San Francisco Fellowship. Holiday week was observed at the clubhouse in the usual happy fashion while more than 100 attended the Christmas dinner at the club and 275 attended the annual New Year's Eve dance. Outside pioneering activities of the group were extended with the inauguration of an A.A. fellowship at the U. S. Army Letterman General Hospital, at the Presidio of San Francisco. The year's closed meeting activities were marked by visits from B.B. of the New York Central Office and M.M. of the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism. The former said it was the largest closed meeting she had ever addressed. M.'s address was transcribed and the records are now in the hands of several Northern California groups. Both visitors addressed meetings of approximately 500 A.A.s of Northern California.

A.A. on "Skid Row." --How A.A. came to some of those needing it most is described in the December issue of 'The Volunteers Gazette', national publication of the Volunteers of America, in an article called "A.A. Joins V. of A.," written by the Omaha Group. "Mohammed doesn't come to the mountain so we'll bring the mountain to Mohammed," quoted one fellow to Lt. Col. Jeannette Spencer, district V. of A.

E.G. of
officer. The article continues: "He means that A.A. has clubrooms in what folks
in this end of town consider the Cadillac-and-caviar-district of Omaha.
They don't come out there, so we would like to hold A.A. meetings in your chapel every week, here on the fringe of Skid Row, where A.A. is needed." Next day a new showcard read: "Is Drinking Your Problem? Welcome to Alcoholics Anonymous Meetings. Here
Every Wednesday, 8 P.M." The article then tells how two dozen members and wives met
with seven men and women from Skid Row with Colonel Spencer an interested spectator.
The work has continued with new faces appearing and the meetings have moved from the chapel to club rooms at the V. of A. headquarters. Members of the Skid-Row Group donated a sizable voluntary collection for toys for children who attended its Christmas party. In addition, the Omaha Group has completed redecorating and refurnishing its clubrooms at 109 North 40th Street and celebrated the grand reopening with a gala housewarming.

A.A. Gets Namesake.--Celebrating his second year in A.A. recently, J.W.R. of the Mt.
Vernon, Wash., Group reports that it was a "double-header celebration, namely,
two years of sobriety and happiness, and the arrival of an addition to our family, a baby girl! Having one of God's best gifts bestowed on the second anniversary of A.A.

may merely be coincidental, but Ruth and I rather think it's just another one of those spiritual awakenings which occur in the lives of A.A.s At any rate, we could think of no more appropriate name for our daughter than Alice Ann and for the sake of brevity
she will be known as A.A.R. It will be easy to calculate the years
I've been in
A.A.
as the years roll up by adding two years to the age of my daughter.
Our son was born about seven months after my entry into A.A. so you can see we certainly have been receiving invaluable rewards during the two years."

Group Branches Out. -- Covington , La. Group has started to include the towns of Hammond, Bogalusa and surrounding rural areas since its founding in November,
1945.

After the usual growing pains about a dozen are continuously sober with two new members celebrating their first year at a supper recently. Bogalusa will have its own group in the near future and Hammond is expected to have a separate one soon.

The three towns may then hold an open meeting each month with each town holding its own weekly meeting. Much cooperation has been received from the New Orleans Group.

Picture, Letters, Happy Ending.--The October 27, 1946, issue of 'The American
Weekly' carried a series under "Letters to The Editor" which resulted in what looks like another good member for A.A. An attorney wrote the magazine asking for a cover picture drawn by Percy Crosby several years ago depicting a family on the verge

of divorce with the child inquiring how he would explain the situation to his friends.
The article accompanying it said the lawyer had shown this picture to several hundred prospective divorce clients with the result that a majority of the cases were dismissed. The magazine sent the picture, asking about the case, to which the attorney responded with a case history, reporting the wife an alcoholic. Letters came to the Austin Group from A.A.s all over the country and the lawyer also received many. A.A.s called on the lawyer but he said the woman had "sworn off" and was trying. Four days later the lawyer reported the woman wanted help, the
A.A.s responded, and Austin has another woman who shows every indication of following
the program sincerely.

Meet in Miami.--The Anona club rooms and meetings of the Miami, Fla., Group have
a national convention air as ambassadors of A.A. from many states meet at the coffee
bar. One visitor flew over from Cuba and reported that he is starting a group in Havana. At a recent Sunday night open meeting The program featured two married couples, all members of the group. December saw the first anniversary of the Lake Worth Group, attended by a delegation from Miami. January 26 was the anniversary
of the Tampa Group, also attended by many from Miami, while Hollywood started its first meeting with a new group last month. The big party this year was held at Sts.
Peter

and Paul through cooperation of the Catholic fathers, with more than 400 present.

Anniversaries Adding Up. --Anniversary celebrations ranging from first to fifth have been reported. The third annual banquet of the Tampa, Fla., Group was scheduled at the Bayshore Royal Hotel January 26, with an excellent menu, speakers from Jacksonville and Atlanta, and many out of town members welcomed. The Brooklyn, N. Y., Group plans include a dinner on Lincoln's Birthday, February 12, in the Hotel St. George, for the fifth annual celebration. Ottawa, Ont., reports the first anniversary banquet with over 90 present to hear six members of the Toronto Group among the speakers. January 26 marked the second anniversary of the Ft. Dodge, Iowa, Group at the Wahkonsa Hotel with a speaker from Minneapolis and an entertainment program. The Kent, Ohio, Group made a trip to Cleveland on the anniversary of 8005 Lorain A.A. Group. Sixty made the trip, including eight from Ravenna. The way A.A. grows was beautifully demonstrated at the Morton Hotel in Grand Rapids, Mich., at the fifth annual dinner commemorating the start of A.A. in West Central Michigan. More than 150 attended with groups up to 25 coming from Benton Harbor, St. Joseph, Kalamazoo, Greenville, Lansing, Holland, Muskegon and one member from Traverse City who made a trip of approximately 300 miles. All five of the original group are still dry and four attended the meeting.

Young Groups Growing. -- The Maiden, Mass.. Group started last September with 18 members and more than doubled in 90 days with an attendance at the opening meeting of 65. Meetings are every Thursday at 8:30 p.m. in the Spanish War Veterans Hall, 156 Pleasant Street. St. Mary's, Ohio, reports a new member, total now six, with a local physician and a minister working with the group on contacts. For the present the members are attending Wednesday meetings at Lima. Present enrollment of the Pensacola, Fla., Group is 19 after less than a year. The Clarksburg, W. Va., Group is nearly a year old, has 15 members and expects to increase due to the large supply of "timber." Members meet Wednesdays at 8 p.m. at 100 Summit Court. With Essex County Groups Nos. I and 2 of Montclair and Newark, N. J., well launched and meeting respectively on Thursday at 7:30 p.m. at St. Peter Claver's, Montclair, and 7:30 p.m. Sunday at 139 Walnut, Newark, an announcement of a third group is expected soon. The first group started in September.

Hold Information Meeting.--The Muncie, Ind., Mission Group has changed its name to the Muncie and Inter-County Group, although still meeting weekly at the Muncie Mission until a larger room can be found. Workers report a great need for A.A. work in Muncie and an attempt to meet a lack of information led to a meeting last month at the YWCA in Muncie with speakers from Dayton and Indianapolis, including a minister, priest, physician and an A.A. member. About 300 invitations were sent to clergymen, doctors, judges and others and about 250 copies of 'Medicine Looks at A.A.' and the A.A. booklet were obtained for the meeting which is expected to result in better contacts for 12th Step work.

Happier Holidays. -Weeks after the Christmas and New Year's celebrations, reports of the way various groups rejoiced have continued to trickle into The 'A.A. Grapevine' office, telling of toys for the kids, dinners complete with turkey and ham, coke and coffee, decorations, trees, dances, trips, Santa Clauses, elaborate programs and entertainment. Christmas parties were big affairs at Kent, Ohio, Tampa, Fla., Passaic, N. J., Lincoln Park, Mich., Upper Arlington of Columbus, Ohio, Amarillo, Tex., Charleston, W. Va., Nacogdoches, Tex.; and Des Moines, Iowa. New Year's also had parties and open houses at Cambridge, Mass., Nacogdoches, Tex., Jefferson City, Mo., Louisville, Ky., Miami, Fla., and Rochester, N. Y.

=====

+++Message 1348. . . . . Re: - "Dr. Bob & the Good Oldtimers"
From: ny-aa@att.net . . . . . 9/20/2003 10:31:00 AM

=====

Short Answer to:

> In "Dr. Bob and the Good Oldtimers", page 240, line 11, it reads:
> "...in the foreword to the Big Book, stating, "The only requirement

The wording of the 1958 advisory action can erroneously give the impression that a change was made to Tradition Three. For the straight, historical scoop, the information below is posted on the AA Grapevine web site (and published in the Best of the Grapevine, Volume 1 pgs 274-275).

The A.A. Preamble: Background Information

Service Material from the General Service Office

THE PREAMBLE was introduced in the June 1947 issue of the AA Grapevine magazine. It was written by the then-editor, who borrowed much of the phrasing from the Foreword to the original edition of the Big Book, Alcoholics Anonymous.

In those early years, the Grapevine had just begun to circulate among nonalcoholics, and the Preamble was intended primarily to describe for them what AA is and is not. It is still often used for public information purposes. As time passed, it began appearing in all Conference-approved publications, and many AA groups now use it to open meetings.

The original version differed in two ways from the familiar form we all know: 1) It stated that "the only requirement for membership is an honest desire to stop drinking," and 2) it contained only the very brief statement "AA has no dues or fees.

People often ask why the word "honest" was deleted. At the 1958 General Service Conference, a delegate asked about the words "honest desire to stop drinking," suggesting that since "honest" does not appear in the Third Tradition, it might be deleted from the Preamble. In discussion, most Conference members felt that as AA had matured, it had become almost impossible to determine what constitutes an honest desire to stop drinking, and also that some who might be interested in the program could be confused by the phrase. Thus, as part of the evolution of AA, the phrase had been dropped from common usage. The midsummer 1958 meeting of the General Service Board of Trustees ratified the deletion, and since then the Preamble has read simply "a desire to stop drinking.

At the same time, the phrase "AA has no dues or fees" was clarified to read as it presently does: "There are no dues or fees for AA membership; we are self-supporting through our own contributions. The current version of the Preamble appears on page one of every issue of the Grapevine.

Regarding the Forewords to Various Editions of the Big Book:

Someone in the AAWS publications department did try to fiddle with the foreword to the second edition. The 1978 Conference responded with the advisory action shown below:

The next printing of Alcoholics Anonymous the foreword to the second Edition be included as originally published in the second Edition.
(Literature Committee.)

Someone in the AAWS publications department got a bit creative with the foreword to the fourth edition. The 2002 Conference responded with the advisory action shown below.

Although the committee acknowledged the importance of electronic meetings to some AA members, the sentence "Fundamentally, though, the difference between an electronic meeting and the home group around the corner is only one of format" in the last paragraph of the Foreword to the fourth Edition, be deleted in future printings of the Big Book.
(Literature Committee)

Aside from the Preamble, the foreword to the first edition also reflected the seeds that would later blossom into the Twelve Traditions.

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: Jon Markle

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Saturday, September 20, 2003 3:52 PM

Subject: RE: [AAHistoryLovers] - "Dr. Bob & the Good Oldtimers"

I don't think that is significant, except that the Foreword to the all editions are exactly reproduced for historical record, not meant to be reflected upon as instruction, but information.

It's just standard publishing practice in this case. A foreword is a foreword. The original foreword appears in later additions ONLY as it is a historical exact copy of the original, which, for publishing purposes, cannot be changed. Has nothing to do with the intent of AA as a whole to alter or not altar the phrase in later works, which we have.

We cannot, therefore, read intent into a *copy* of the foreword.
Because it is just that, a copy. What is important to understand is that the intention of AA is to NOT use the word "honest" in later publications, for whatever reason.

I have always understood AA to go with the INTENT of suggestions, not the letter of the law. And this is one of the best examples I can see of
the intention of AA to be best suited for alcoholics who do not have much in the way of honesty when we first darken the doors of the rooms. Leaves us lots
of wiggle room to get sober.

Jon

-----Original Message-----

From: ny-aa@att.net [mailto:ny-aa@att.net]
Sent: Saturday, September 20, 2003 11:31 AM
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] - "Dr. Bob & the Good Oldtimers"

Short Answer to:

> In "Dr. Bob and the Good Oldtimers", page 240, line 11, it reads:
> "...in the foreword to the Big Book, stating, "The only requirement > for membership is an honest desire to stop drinking".
<
> Now my question: when was the word "honest" omitted, why and > by whom?

Other uses of the phrase "desire to stop drinking" in Tradition
Three
and in The A.A. Preamble are derivative works. It is significant
that the wording "honest desire to stop drinking" remains unchanged in later editions where it appears in "Foreword to the First Edition."

---

a vice-president, a membership committee, membership rules. We also incorporated for the whole of the state. We were going to give out charters for starting groups.

AA

We even put in Roberts' Rules of Order for a while (talks limited to three minutes, etc.). Well, all hell broke loose. Mort, the president, couldn't be at a meeting, so he asked someone other than the VP to run the meeting. This made the VP mad, and

he got drunk (haven't seen him since). The secretary's husband got drunk because he wasn't given a title (he rejoined five years later). The membership committee got mad

because the people they screened out came anyway (we wanted only "pure alkies").

We had a "goon squad" for the slippers. When someone slipped, the goon squad

would find him, take him home, and get him sober (whether he wanted to get sober or not).

One night, Mort got a call from two members who had slipped. He sent tow of the goon squad to save them. An hour later, he got a call from one of the squad. They were drunk also. He sent four more goons. Another call. Now there were eight drunks,

and so on. It damn near wiped out the group!

Finally, we took stock and figured out we were all chiefs and no Indians. So we threw out all the titles and committees. For a membership committee, we figured we had

the best in the world: John Barleycorn and Mama Fate. They worked 24 hours a day, salesman. He moved from Little Rock, along with his wife and two small children to New Orleans for a fresh start. Three months later he was drinking. The search for a solution to his problem began with various clergymen. He continued to drink. Psychiatric counseling also failed. Richard C. Peabody had written a book entitled "The Common Sense of Drinking", which Sterling saw advertised in a magazine - he sent for it. This book was to have a profound effect on his life for the next six years. The book lacked the spiritual and fellowship approach to the problem; however, it did outline a program of action to retrain the mind, including continuous self-inventory.

Thinking he had a handle on his problem now, he re-applied for a job with his former company. They replied that if he could stay sober he could join the office in Memphis, but his dismissal would be automatic should he resume drinking.

In Memphis for six months, fighting liquor all the time, Sterling slipped again on his first trip out of town. On his return he sought the advice of clergy - again

- and became acquainted with Dr. Blazel, rector of the Calvary Episcopal Church.

Dr. Blazel agreed to try to help, and counseling sessions were set up twice a week.

Business required Sterling to be out of town again - and soon, on July 22, 1935, he was drunk. Remorse, failure, defeat, and finally - the bottom.

Sterling had promised to resign his job should this happen, but before he could get to the office he learned that his boss, the man to whom the promise was made,

had died during the night. Immediately he went to Dr. Blazel and told him what had happened. Dr. Blazel, recognizing a different man, said to him, "Sterling, I think something very important has happened in your life, and whatever it is I want you to cling to it. Say nothing to anyone, do a lot of praying and realize a very profound 'something' has happened in your life." Sterling never found it necessary to take another drink.

The next few months, following his surrender, Sterling developed along more spiritual lines with Dr. Blazel and also continued to refer to Peabody's book.
Christmas, 1935, he returned to Little Rock for the express purpose of making amends
and restitution.

Alcoholics Anonymous had begun to take root at this same period of time unknown
to Sterling, but he stayed sober practicing his own version and began to work with others (with little success.)

Three and a half years passed when a call came from Harlan N.'s boss asking Sterling
to help Harlan. With patience, tolerance, hope and despair the sponsor-prospect relationship continued into its seventh month. The two became aware of a magazine article in the September 30th issue of 'Liberty Magazine' by Morris Markey

entitled
"Alcoholics and God" and told a little of the new groups being formed in New York,
Akron and Cleveland. On January 26, 1940, Harlan wrote for the book.
When it arrived in Little Rock Harlan was drunk, and the book sent COD, was returned to New York.

Sterling's new boss noted with interest an article in the February 19, 1940 issue of
'Time' concerning a dinner given by 'the' most outspoken teetotaler of the day,
John
C. Rockefeller, which culminated an investigation of two years. Mr.
Rockefeller
was expected to lead other philanthropists and endow AA with hospitals and centers throughout the country. Bill W., Dr. Bob and other AA people in attendance were very disillusioned when told that money might ruin the good thing they had started.
The article mentioned the book and the beginnings of new groups nationwide. Foster Vineyard wrote, on insurance company stationery, the second request for the book.
Dubious of the motives an insurance company might have for wanting a book about alcoholism, New York, by return mail, questioned the request. Finally, after Sterling
wrote a third letter telling some of his story, the book arrived and was paid for in March, 1940.

Sterling read it eagerly. He called Harlan and said, "Boy, this is just what we have been waiting for. I've been trying to tell you some of these thing and now, here

it is all in black and white." It seems at that moment AA was born in Arkansas -
when one sober alcoholic with the AA book contacted one sick alcoholic with a message of hope.

The next link in our Arkansas AA chain of recovered alcoholics was Glenn "Bud"

G.
He had committed himself for life in the "nut house" and had given up all hope
of ever being able to live without alcohol. Harlan, informed of Bud's condition,
decided to pay him a visit. Bud was offered the book and read it three times the week he was allowed to keep it, which was the second week in May of 1940. State Psychiatrist, Dr.
Nick Hollis, could see a remarkable change in Bud. He was so impressed with him
that he ordered the second AA book for Arkansas.

Sterling, Harlan and Bud met in the home of Sterling's folks in late May and this was the first AA meeting held in our state. The meeting was somewhat of a 12th step discussion on how to carry the message to others in the area. It was decided to run
some blind ads in the newspaper and rent a post office box for replies.
Responses
were mostly from families and friends of problem drinkers. Sterling, Harlan and Bud kept busy answering the various inquiries. Non-alcoholics were also willing to help:
Dr. Hollis, a supporter from the start; Rev. Oscar Egger, Harlan's pastor;
Gordon
Campbell and Foster Vineyard, Sterling's employers; along with the families of many alcoholics.

Bud brought T. D. A. from the hospital with him to the first meetings.
Joe M., who hadn't had a drink in a year, joined the group. Gerald M. had sobered up much
the same as Sterling by studying Peabody's book and wanted to help. Rev.
Egger allowed the group to meet twice weekly in his church. Some of the church members were opposed, and subsequently Rev. Egger was fired as the result of his interest.

The original three were very promotionally minded due to Sterling's and Harlan's professions as salesmen and Bud's as a newspaperman. They advertised an open
meeting to be held in the YMCA. An assortment of people responded; ministers, exhausted wives, do-gooders, and some drunks who continued to sneak drinks during the
meeting.
After three such meetings at the "Y" the experiment with open meetings
was discontinued.

Gordon Campbell offered a room in the insurance agency's office in the Wallace
Building at Markham and Main, and for several months the group met at this location.
The content of the meetings consisted mainly of Sterling's reading of the Big Book followed by Bud G's "witnessing." One night Sterling suggested they close the
meeting
by repeating the Lord's prayer in unison. The practice was adopted and soon spread to other groups throughout the country. The meetings at this time were attended by

fifteen to twenty alcoholics.

There was soon the need to "qualify" the prospects in order to devote more time to the more serious ones. The new man was asked four questions: 1. Are you convinced you cannot handle your alcohol problem? 2. Are you willing to let a group of fellows who had the same problem as you prescribe a course of action. 3. Will you do anything to eliminate alcohol from your life? 4. Do you believe in a power bigger than yourself? If the prospect could not answer all four in the affirmative, he was told to come back when and if he could. He also was asked if he was willing to go to the nut house (State Hospital) or Uncle Purl's rescue Mission (often as only a test of his sincerity.) From the beginning there was some dissension among the membership regarding the merit of qualifying a prospect other than a desire to stop drinking.

Ed I. M., Attorney, advocated a very rigid plan for new prospects before they could be inducted into the group. Perfection was sought for the entire membership to remain sober. He was given the job of designing such a program using the AA book as a guide. This resulted in the creation of the Little Rock approach program. The prospect was required to: read the Big Book in three days; keep a twenty-eight day book; write a case history; make a time and money budget; take a two week leave of absence, if employed, in order to devote two weeks full time to the plan; and to accomplish

other assignments. The plan provided for an individual sponsor for each new man and outlined for the sponsor the methods which had proven to be successful even though less than a year old. Sponsorship then, as now, varied from lily white to hard shell
and was the reason for the first split of the group.

In June of 1942 Ed I. M., Newton F. and D. L. T. did not agree with the majority
on the methods designed to accomplish certain objectives of the AA program and left,
only to return one by one in the fall of 1942.

After the approach plan was approved by the small membership, the need for a more permanent home for the group was felt, and Harlan's family offered a large cabin
on Jennings Lake (several miles out Arch Street Pike from Little Rock) for a dormitory and meeting place. The house "dick" was Fred L. and one of his first clients was Mack
H. followed by Max H.

Two non-alcoholics, Judge Harper Harb and Dr. Nick Hollis, were presented plaques as honorary members in recognition of their support. Others joining the group about
that time were Bob M., Pat., Julian H., Henderson J. and Ladd M.

In 1942 as more and more new people associated themselves with AA another move
was necessitated and a large room was acquired at 213 1/2 Louisiana. Macie

H., a real
"stemwinder," approached the group and kept everyone busy for a while, but she didn't really stick with the program until later. New prospects were not permitted to meet with the regular group until they had completed the approach plan to
the satisfaction
of their sponsors. Buddy K., Jack E., Lee H., Bert C., Bill M., George S and Andy S.
were among the inductees. There were also a few out in the state who came,
sobered up
and returned to carry the message to their communities.

Phonies and floozies came to AA as they do to anything that is open.
The phonies
were soon gone, but one day in walks "Floozie" in tears, broke, hungry, alone, with a black eye, many bruises and, of course, a sad tale. Macie H. had moved from Little
Rock, but three more women had joined the group. Two of the three were assigned
to work with "Floozie," but she preferred the male attention. A week passed and then the news spread, "Floozie" and six of the prospects were over in a hotel room naked
and drunk. Then the full truth came out. In addition to the prospects, three "old timers"
were in on the deal and were acting as errand boys to the liquor store. The new girl and one of the girls with some sobriety had joined the party. Great were the rumblings, head shaking and finger pointing. Meeting time finally came and the decision was made: NO WOMEN IN THE GROUP.

Bud G. had been appointed Director of the State Publicity Commission, and in the spring of 1943, on state business, he was in New York. He contacted Bill W. and was asked to be the guest of Bill and Lois at their home. The result of the visit was a continuing correspondence, culminating in their visit to Little Rock in January of 1944. Bud, returning to Little Rock found another move under way, this time to the Bathurst Building on West 2nd. Three years had elapsed since Sterling and Harlan had received the AA book, and it was time for some recognition of the success. Twenty-four individuals were still active, with over a year in the program. There were others, but World War II had been disruptive to any records. Bud G., acting as chairman, gave a capsuled story of each of the twenty-four. Those who have not been previously mentioned were Sam K., Marvin W., Ed P., Hyder L. and Earl N.

The fall of 1943 Bill and Lois made a speaking tour from coast to coast that included Little Rock on their agenda for January 17 to 20, 1944. Plans made for their visit included sight-seeing trips, a dinner dance in the Skyway room atop the Lafayette Hotel, bull sessions at the club and ending with a speech by Bill at the Robinson Auditorium. For two weeks prior to their visit both Little Rock newspapers printed case-histories of some of the AA members. The publicity worked beautifully, and

on

Sunday the auditorium was filled with 1,500 guests. A local member, who had gone

to hear Bill in Los Angeles noted that there were only about 500 there.

Newspaper publicity not only attracted a lot of folks to the open meeting, but attracted a lot of drunks who wanted to get sober. Frances P. was among them.

They

told her in no uncertain terms that they did not accept women.

Frances later stated, "They should have told me they didn't want me! I could have understood that." Three times the AA book was left for her to read in the prescribed three

day period, but she continued to drink. Totally frustrated, she went to office. "Chick, you have a woman member whether you like it or not," she said.

Chick W.'s

Chick

replied, "You will have to do everything I tell you to do." Frances answered,

"I'll

walk down Main Street in a 'G string' if that will keep me sober."

Chick said,

"Your

hair's not long enough. Go home and get sober." Her desire for sobriety had not convinced the majority of voting members and she was still denied the right to attend

the regular Thursday night meetings. However, squad meetings (usually one or two members meeting with several new prospects) were held weekly in her home. One day

while cleaning house and still in shorts and halter and carrying a broom she impulsively set out to find Doyle W. Doyle gave her a list of members to call on

and after seeing them all she finally was allowed to attend the group meetings on Thursday evenings.

Other women followed Frances, but Ruth P. was the only other constant recognized.

Macie H. returned to Little Rock and Frances sponsored Vi D. and Myrtle T. A lot of problems lay ahead, but the successful challenge to the "no women" rule had been initiated.

Larger space was needed after Bill W.'s visit. Sterling located an ideal place at 120 1/2 Main Street at a nominal rent. All hands were put to work cleaning, painting, plumbing and wiring the new location. Furnishings were acquired whereby some of the new prospects could have sleeping quarters.

For the next thirteen years, 120 1/2 Main was the hub of AA activities in the state.

The "Grapevine" characterized it as the "mother group of the southwest" because so many new groups could trace their origin to someone who had carried the message after finding sobriety at 120 1/2 Main. The building was sold for remodeling in 1957.

The group moved to the Glover Building for a short time followed by moves to: 14th and Scott, 9th and Scott, 2619 West 13th and today functions as the 120 1/2 Club here at 2725 West Twelfth Street.

In 1961 the expanding need for dormitory facilities at 120 1/2 could be better administered by a separate foundation and the Twenty-four Hour Club was established to operate in that capacity. Soon thereafter a detoxification unit started operation

On the plus side, it provides a really good discussion item.

Cheers

Arthur

PS: Who made the quote "Statistics are the best of slaves but the worst of masters."

-----

From: goldentextpro@aol.com

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Cc: Goldentextpro@aol.com

Sent: Sunday, September 21, 2003 9:40 PM

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] - "Dr. Bob & the Good Oldtimers"

>I have always understood AA to go with the INTENT of suggestions,
>not the >letter of the law. And this is one of the best examples I can see
>of the >intention of AA to be best suited for alcoholics who do not have >much in the >way of honesty when we first darken the doors of the rooms. Leaves >us lots
>of wiggle room to get sober.

>Jon

Also leaves us lots of wiggle room NOT to get sober.
However, your remark on the Forewords has merit. This includes the success rate percentages in the Foreword to the Second Edition. "50% stay sober, 25% after a slip, etc." People still quote these today, and it's woefully inaccurate. Success rates are between 2.4 - 4.8% today, and have been consistently similar since 1977.

It's basically an argument of the so-called "authoritarian" AA vs. the "acceptance of limitations" AA. Many current thinkers are just turned off by the early AA (Akron) program, the Four Absolutes, etc. Some of these writers state that the socio-political and religious climate of the times should be taken into account. I would suggest that we should also examine what natural inclinations the writer possesses due to his own view of life experiences within his own five years are difficult to determine. Anecdotal reports indicate that A.A. Members enjoy periods of sobriety up to fifty years.

--- In AAHistoryLovers@yahoo.com, "Arthur Sheehan"

<ArtSheehan@m...> wrote:

> Pinning down success rates is not a trivial proposition. Sometimes things written in the Big Book or other AA literature are placed in the same vein as scripture and elevated to holy writ (i.e. their reinforcement is far more a function of belief and repeated recitation as opposed to fact).

>

> My concerns relate to the statistical validity of the sampling method that goes into the construction of quoted rates and whether it rises to a level that yields statistical confidence in the numbers produced. Even today with the membership surveys that are conducted by AA, I have concerns with the sampling method used.

>

> The deadly characteristic of alcoholism is the inclination of the alcoholic to repeatedly return to drinking even in the face of compelling evidence that shows they have no business taking a drink (the jay walker analogy in the literature is right on).

>

> A fair number of alcoholics will fall into the "unsuccessful" tally a number of times, hit bottom, and then move into the "success" tally. All too often an underlying presumption exists that if somebody doesn't participate in AA any longer then they are likely to have returned to drinking. That is just flat out wrong. There are many paths to spiritual living and being helpful to others. I think the Achilles heel of quoted rates lies not in the determination of the number of folks who are around and sober, but in pinning down the number of folks who are not around and have returned to drinking.

>

> Those who stay sober in AA are clearly 100% successful and that population can be approximately determined. As for the determination of the number of those who have come to check out AA and then departed to drink again, each member will have their anecdotal account but in terms of coming up with a statistically valid census, I really have my doubts if it can be done.

>

> Other things that increasingly cloud today's figures are "chemical dependency" folks that enter AA with no drinking history who undergo a metamorphosis into an alcoholic (usually because that don't want to attend NA and want to go to AA instead). There also is an emerging fundamentalist element that likes to toss around "old time" success rates in claims of asserting that they have something to offer other than the opportunity to spend dollars on their retail recovery products.

>

> On the plus side, it provides a really good discussion item.
>
> Cheers
> Arthur
>
> PS: Who made the quote "Statistics are the best of slaves but the worst of masters."
>
> -----
> From: goldentextpro@a...
> To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
> Cc: Goldentextpro@a...
> Sent: Sunday, September 21, 2003 9:40 PM
> Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] - "Dr. Bob & the Good Oldtimers"
>
>
>> I have always understood AA to go with the INTENT of suggestions, not the >> letter of the law. And this is one of the best examples I can see of the >> intention of AA to be best suited for alcoholics who do not have much in the >> way of honesty when we first darken the doors of the rooms. Leaves us lots >> of wiggle room to get sober.
>
>> Jon
>
> Also leaves us lots of wiggle room NOT to get sober.
> However, your remark on the Forewords has merit. This includes the success rate percentages in the Foreword to the Second Edition. "50% stay sober, 25% after a slip, etc." People still quote these today, and it's woefully inaccurate. Success rates are between 2.4 - 4.8% today, and have been consistently similar since 1977.
>
> It's basically an argument of the so-called "authoritarian" AA vs. the "acceptance of limitations" AA. Many current thinkers are just turned off by the early AA (Akron) program, the Four Absolutes, etc. Some of these writers state that the socio-political and religious climate of the times should be taken into account. I would suggest that we should also examine what natural inclinations the writer possesses due to his own view of life experiences within his own period in time.
>
> This is just one of those arguments that will probably never be resolved. Although one argument simply cannot be avoided, at least much longer:

meetings, and attracts twice as many at open meetings. Three shoots are growing out of this parent group--Liverpool, Cazenovia and Pulaski. The secretary of the recently organized Hollywood, Fla., Group writes that meetings are held Monday nights at St. John's Lutheran Church. A.A.s in Norfolk, Va., marked their first anniversary with a banquet, attended by two members of the Richmond, Va., Group who presided at Norfolk's first open meeting a year ago. Three charter members of the Norfolk Group traced the growth from the start of eight to the present enrollment of nearly 200, about 125 of whom remain active. The principal speaker, a Norfolk minister, highly commended A.A. from his pulpit two days later.

He Didn't Lose His Lodging, But.-- A new group has been formed at Wallaceburg, Ontario, about 50 miles up the Detroit River from Windsor. The founder is a fellow who had a habit of breaking up furniture. It didn't cost him his living quarters, for it was his own furniture--he runs a hotel!--but it made plenty of people unhappy nonetheless. He first met A.A. in Windsor but didn't completely succumb, he had another good drunk, then a friend got D.T.'s and 12th Step work came into play. The innkeeper took the pal to Windsor for treatment. Together they decided to try the program, and held their first meeting with the chairman of the Windsor South Group assisting. The Windsor A.A.s turned out in a body for the second meeting in Wallaceburg, and the new group is off to a flying start now, with five charter members. Attendance runs about 90 per cent in the new Woodland, Cal., Group, an offshoot of the Sacramento Group. Starting with eight, there are now 13 active members, meeting Tuesday evenings in members' homes. Socials, with wives and husbands joining in, follow the closed sessions.

Advertise for A.A.s.-- The St. Johnsbury, Vt., Group has recently received several letters and phone calls in response to advertisements in the local paper. One ad said, "Is alcohol your downfall? If so, let the A.A.s give you a hand. We have helped many overcome this and we can help you. Write to Alcoholics Anonymous, P.O. Box 342, St. Johnsbury, Vt." One of the letters read "I saw your ad in the paper. Would like to know if anyone could do this to anyone and not let them know about it. Please let me know and what the results would be!" The group recently held its first anniversary banquet.

On the Air and In Clinics. -- A woman member of the Washington, D.C., Group appeared on Ruth Crane's "Modern Woman" program recently on WMAL. Last year the speaker was one who had attended the summer school session of alcoholic studies at Yale. There were questions and answers about A.A. objectives and principles, together with detailed and local information about the alcoholic clinic operated by the District of Columbia at which A.A. volunteers work. The program was aimed at housewives in

the hope some member of a household might jot down the information and telephone numbers given for future reference. From Washington it is also reported that due to the constantly increasing number of patients and need for relief the Bureau of Mental Hygiene in the District of Columbia has extended its services in the two district alcoholic clinics. Dr. Leopold Wexberg, director of the Department of Mental Hygiene, is in charge of the clinics to which local A.A. groups lend their services.

Visiting with Australia. -- Father Dunlea, sponsor of A.A. in Australia, and founder of its Boys' Town, recently spoke to the Omaha, Nebr., Group and said that he wished those attending might visit his group "down under." As a result a recording machine was set up, a special program was recorded during a regular meeting and talks
and greetings were sent to the Australian group. Getting together through the columns of the A.A. Grapevine the Balboa (Canal Zone) and Omaha Groups plan to exchange
letters and ideas on a regular basis. Members of a neighborhood unit of the Omaha Group met last month at a suburban district fire station at the request of the firemen.

Meet in state Hospital. -- In response to a call for speakers for a new group at Rockland, N. Y., State Hospital the Passaic, N. J., Group recently took over a meeting there with 16 alcoholic patients attending. The Passaic Group, eight months old, hopes to have larger meetings for both men and women at the institution

soon.

Club Ownership Changes. -- Three years after the San Francisco, Cal., Fellowship opened its first clubhouse, it turned over its second club at 143 Bush Street,
with all physical assets, to the newly incorporated Alano Club, thus completing separation of the administrations of the Fellowship and the Club. Requirement for the Club membership is voting membership in the Fellowship. Guest memberships will be extended to new A.A.s, visiting A.A.s and relatives of members. The first club
was outgrown in a year, after beginning with 35 at a meeting in February 1944. The second club has a seating capacity of about 250 and served as central meeting spot until nine months ago when it was necessary to rent an outside hall. The A.A. office will remain
at the Club for the time being. San Francisco membership is estimated between 400 and 500 with ten weekly meetings.

New Club Started. -- Approximately 150 members from various metropolitan groups
have secured a clubhouse at 400 East 35th street, New York, N. Y., as a social center. It will not be considered an A.A. group nor will it function in that capacity, the members planning to continue their other A.A. activities through their respective groups. The club is open from noon to midnight under the usual rules and an additional order suspending for 30 days anyone entering while drinking. Members say the only difference between this and other social clubs will be the discussion of alcoholic problems as the principal conversation.

Miami Gets Visitors.---Many visiting A.A.s are reported from the Anona Club, Miami, Fla., with representatives from all over the United States. The Northwest group of Miami continues to grow while Ft. Lauderdale A.A.s heard Dr. R. S. recently.

Anniversaries Rolling Up. -- Montclair, N.J., will celebrate the fifth anniversary as a group on March 28. Starting with ten, the group now numbers 90, though many have left to form new groups. Five of the original eight remain. One of The members spoke recently before the Baptist Ministerial Association of Northern New Jersey with 50 members present. At Tampa, Fla., the third annual banquet was held at the Bayshore Hotel with Jacksonville, Atlanta, and Cleveland, Ohio, speakers on the program and 300 attending. A fish fry with 97 A.A.s from the various groups in Northwestern Ohio was staged as the third anniversary of the Port Clinton Group recently, members being present from Sandusky, Fremont, Bellevue, Norwalk, Milan, Bowling Green and Toledo. A solitary A.A. in Oak Harbor reports prospects of a group there. First anniversary of the Tallahassee, Fla., Group was celebrated at the Cherokee Hotel with a speaker from Jacksonville. An offshoot of this group, Thomasville, Ga., is using the Detroit WWJ records after which they will go to the Federal Correctional Institution in Tallahassee. The group founded there a year ago is functioning with seven members. A two-year observance is reported from Springfield, Mo., while Columbia, Mo., had the first anniversary party at the Daniel Boone Tavern in Columbia. This group has also gotten a new club room. Council Bluffs, Ia., with the cooperation of the parent Omaha, Nebr., Group celebrated its first year recently with several hundred members and guests from Iowa and Nebraska attending the banquet at the Hotel Chieftain to hear three Iowa A.A'.s. A breakfast in the clubrooms and a two-day open house followed. About 200, including delegations from Minneapolis, Des Moines, Pocohontas, Marshalltown, Waterloo, Boone, Dubuque, Sioux Falls, Chicago, Carroll, Algona, Kanwha, Britt, Spencer, Spirit Lake, Fonda, Rockwell City, Alden, Paton and Ogden attended the second anniversary at Ft. Dodge, Ia.

Hear Psychiatrist. -- Dr. Theo. E. Tetreault, psychiatrist, who has had three years service with the Army in Europe, Africa and the Philippines, discussed what he had seen of alcoholism, especially while in England, before the Kent, Ohio, Group. A delegation of 36 Kent members went to Cuyahoga Falls to help celebrate the fifth anniversary there.

Entertainments Scheduled. --The Token Club, social arm of the'

Louisville, Ky.,

A.A.

Groups began a series of entertainments under the guidance of a newly appointed activities committee. At its first meeting the committee discussed formation of a soft-ball league, fishing parties and other hobbies. A publication, "Friend Al," will keep members informed.

Holds First Open Meeting.--The Virginia Beach, Va., Group, which got under way only three months ago, held its first open meeting February 5. More than 150 visiting A.A.s and friends of the group from other Virginia cities and from North Carolina were welcomed by the mayor and other city officials. Five A.A.s from points in Virginia and one from Georgia originally were on the program. Because of family illness, the Georgia A.A. telephoned that, he was unable to attend. At the last minute, a speaker from New York rushed down to Virginia Beach to pinch-hit.

Getting Going and Growing. -- E. K., a member from Hastings, Nebr., who made the program the hard way out on the lone prairie, conducted the first meeting of the Hastings Group at the Clarke Hotel there recently. Thirty-four attended including many who have pioneered different groups in the Middle West, with speakers from North Platte, Nebr., Jefferson City, Mo., Grand Island, Nebr., Des Moines, Ia., Fremont, Nebr., and Ord, Nebr. A short time ago a North Platte contingent of two members started a series of district visits which called for much travel and long hours, but which paid off with groups now operating in Fremont, North Platte,

Grand Island,
Hastings, Lincoln and other cities. Seven members and wives of the Danville,
Ill., group, organized about seven months ago, visited with Decatur recently. San Mateo,
Cal., is introducing its year-old group which is one of the Peninsula Groups,
which include Palo Alto, parent group, and Redwood City. The Peninsula Groups held an open house for the general public recently with three A.A. speakers, a clergyman, psychiatrist and a judge on the program. Small groups attend meetings in Agnew
State
Hospital and in Veterans Hospital, weekly and in San Quentin Prison monthly with good results. The Northeast Nebraska Group got going at Norfolk recently with a dinner at a hotel attended by 30 members including three from Sioux City, Ia., and four
from Yankton, S.D. Dr. Charlton of the Norfolk State hospital allowed four patients
to attend and has given his permission to hold meetings in the hospital.
A doctor
from the hospital staff spoke briefly as did Father Robert Byrnes.
Portland, Ore., now has three groups with possibility of having to start a fourth as the result of continued growth. Nine A.A.s who have been members in Duluth, Minn., recently started the Superior, Wis., Group which now numbers 19. Meetings are held Thursday evenings
at Room 103, 1923 Hammond avenue. A high attendance record with only three slips and a growth from eight to 15 members in a few months is reported by Indianola, Miss.,

with some members in Greenville. In less than a year the Wichita Falls, Tex., Group
has grown to 38, although no women are active as yet. Wives of the members recently started their own meetings. After getting going some time ago as Eau Claire,
Wis.,
Group No. 2, the organization is changing its name to the Chippewa Valley Group
of that city. Our reporter says the A.A. transcription is getting good attention
under sponsorship of the Eau Claire Group No. 1. A.A. came quietly to Springfield, Mass., about three years ago in the person of a doctor from Boston, who was joined by a few others who fell away, leaving him alone again. However, he held steadfast and
the group now numbers 106 in spite of withdrawals that saw the birth of successful
and growing groups in Holyoke, Pittsfield and Greenfield. Springfield A.A.s have a regular schedule of talks at the State Hospital in Northampton, the Veterans' Hospital in Leeds, the county jail and before church, civic and educational organizations. To accommodate ever increasing attendance the open meeting on Wednesday night is now held at South End Community Center where over 200 gathered recently to observe the group's third birthday.

Succeed After Eight Years. --For the first time in its history the Saturday
Night
Group of Dayton, Ohio, has established a real Saturday Night group, holding a regular meeting at 8:30 in Anna May's Tea Room, 717 West Third street. This would begin working with people (see Dr. Bob & the Good Oldtimers). If you have a good eye, you can always increase your success rate by prescreening in this fashion.

Sgt. Bill S., in his book which just came out (On the Military Firing Line in the Alcoholism Treatment Program), explains how he obtained a similar success rate in the strongly A.A.-linked alcoholism treatment program which he set up at Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio in the early 1950's: 50% got sober and stayed sober the first time around, and additional people, after being bumped from the program, eventually realized how they had missed the boat and came back to A.A. meetings on their own and got sober. Sgt. Bill S. (who got sober on Long Island in 1948, and now has 55 years of sobriety) also prescreened people before he would begin working with them: there had to be evidence of strong motivation (one of Dr. Bob's key criteria), and Sgt. Bill also excluded people who had serious mental problems. His criterion for the latter was that he refused to admit Air Force personnel into the program whose mental problems were so serious that they would have had to be released from the service anyway.

After Dr. Bob's death, Sister Ignatia continued to have high statistics at St. Thomas Hospital because she made the A.A. people do her prescreening for her, and insisted that an Akron A.A. member in good standing had to "sponsor" the newcomer, which meant agreeing to pay that newcomer's hospital expenses if he dropped out and didn't make it -- you can bet your boots that this made the prescreening rigorous indeed!

Also, Sister Ignatia normally allowed people only one chance to make it. On rare occasions, she would let a patient come back for a second try, but that patient would be completely isolated from the other incoming alcoholics, so as not to tear down morale. And no one at all got a third chance. That also increases your statistics on "successes," because when an alcoholism treatment center allows people to come back for treatment fourteen or fifteen times in a row, this greatly pulls down your observed success rate. See Mary Darrah's biography of Sister Ignatia, and the chapter in Sgt. Bill's book on the year he spent visiting Sister Ignatia at St. Thomas and seeing how she did it.

In Nancy Olson's recent book, With a Lot of Help from Our Friends, she has a couple of chapters on the successful treatment program which Dr. Joe Zuska set up for the Navy in the late 1960's. This was the one which Betty Ford and Billy Carter were later sent to in order to get sober. A whole book needs to be written on Dr. Joe, who is a marvelous man, and Dick J., who helped him start it. This program was a team effort, in which an A.A. member, a retired Navy Commander named Dick J., was given major input at all times, and in which Dr. Joe (a nonalcoholic himself) learned to listen to Dick J. and take him seriously. I am close friends with Submarine Bill, a retired submarine commander who went through the Navy program that Dr. Zuska originally devised, and they still did very careful prescreening, and also booted people out of, not only the treatment center, but the Navy, if they refused to work the program. So they too had those very impressive official success statistics.

Can A.A. still obtain similar success rates today? Submarine Bill and I have done a study of an excellent small A.A. meeting in Osceola, Indiana, which follows good old-time A.A. practices and procedures. Over the past twelve years plus, 90% of newcomers who attended every Tuesday evening without fail for a full year stayed sober for that whole year. And 90% of those who stayed sober that year, even if they later moved and started going to other A.A. meetings, are still sober today. That is around an 80% success rate, measured that way.

Obviously, we were using the other strategy for producing high measured success rates, one which was mentioned in a previous posting: we excluded those people who only attended a relatively few meetings and then dropped out because of lack of any real internal motivation.

Also, as Sgt. Bill explains in his book, there were both good A.A. groups and poor A.A. groups even in the old days, and even in the greater Akron area (he gives an account of a group not far from Akron in the mid 1940's which did an abysmally poor job of helping newcomers, and explains in detail why it failed to help nearly as many people as it could have).

There is a moral dilemma involved in doing prescreening or excluding certain groups from A.A. meetings (like court appointed attendees, most of whom have no real motivation, and therefore do not make it, and who lower the apparent success rate). If you set the standards too high, you will refuse to work with some alcoholics who could have made it, and condemn them to a miserable fate, perhaps even condemn them to the death penalty. If you set the standards too low, you tear down everybody's morale (as Sister Ignatia emphasized) and that too will mean that alcoholics who should have made it will end up failing and going to their doom. I am not sure there is an easy answer to this dilemma. I at least do not have one.

Glenn C.

-----
Get more from the Web. FREE MSN Explorer download :
<http://explorer.msn.com>

A.A. Benefits Community. -- Members of the Wilmington, Del., Group heard a leading industrialist and the head of the medical department of the duPont company praise the efforts of the organization as a contribution to industrial stability and happiness in the home when the annual dinner meeting was held recently. Dr. G. H. Gehrman, the medical director, was quoted at considerable length in newspaper accounts of the meeting in one Wilmington paper while another carried an editorial headed "Manifold Benefits" saying in part "both for the industries concerned and the individuals affected it is obvious that the gains have been impressive." A further report from Wilmington goes on to say that A.A. was part of the program during a four-day conference of company physicians from all over the country and that the two local company psychiatrists work very closely with the group. Founded about three years ago with the help of the Philadelphia group, Wilmington A.A.s have an outstanding record of community cooperation. Their operation includes a rotating committee for managing group affairs with keen participation by women members. Besides three regular meetings a week the activities committee arranges for visits to the Delaware State Hospital twice a month and there is always a car load to visit at Dover each week. Plenty of social affairs are scheduled and the wives hold separate closed meetings and prepare coffee for the social hour afterward.

Discussions in Two Languages.--The Norwegian Sunset Group had scheduled an open house at the Norwegian Seamen's House, 62 Hanson Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., on April 10 according to advice received at press time. This is to be an anniversary meeting with the talks in English. Recently the group conducted an open meeting at the same location with discussion in Norwegian only.

"A.A. Inside."--The tenth anniversary publication of 'The Clarion' published at the California Institution for Women, Tehachapi, Cal., carries the name of D. G. as editor and one of the articles "A.A. Inside" tells of the story of A.A. in institutions in that state since the first group was formed at San Quentin in 1942.

The group at Tehachapi started in 1945, according to the article, which says in part,

"Parole officers are most enthusiastic in their reports of the success of A.A.

members on parole. After four years of concentrated effort, it has been proven that the percentage of violation among A.A. members throughout the country is less than two percent. We, of course, have not had as many people paroled, who had worked

at

the program, as the groups who had been working a longer time.

However, there are now

several members in the community. So far our record is 100 percent.

Believing

that

A.A. is of no value unless it goes through the portals we have worked to that end.

The moral psychological program worked on our inner selves has resulted in the overcoming of complexes, fears, resentments and self-pity."

Participate in Conferences. -- A.A.s in California and Minneapolis have participated recently in conferences on the alcoholic problem. In Minneapolis, Minn., the second Institute on Chronic Alcoholism, sponsored by the Hennepin County and State Bar Association at the University of Minnesota heard representatives from the Midwest Council on Alcoholism and A.A. during a program built around the theme of handling the chronic alcoholic. Principal agreements at the conference indicated opinions that existing treatment by incarceration, medication, admonitions and release should give way to a modern clinical service, that chronic alcoholism requires the introduction of the concept of the latter as a disease into legal codes and practices, and that the recognition of the almost invariable association of neurosis or psychosis with chronic alcoholism requires the introduction of new methods into the pratique of social service institutions. Many national authorities spoke. In Los Angeles, Calif., alcoholism was viewed as a public health problem during a conference of leading doctors, psychiatrists and social workers under the sponsorship of the Welfare Council, The Southern California Society for Mental Hygiene and individual members of A.A. F. R., active Los Angeles A.A. who died recently, had worked for some months toward the conference and had met frequently with Dr. Anton Carlson of the Research Council on Problems of Alcohol in the interest of such a conference.

Not Out in the Cold --The North Group of Windsor, Ont., having been pushed about for several months on account of the housing problem, has finally found permanent quarters for Sunday meetings in the Y.M.C.A, while Tuesday meetings are in a member's home. Attendance, including members from all groups in Windsor, Detroit and other outside points has increased from five to 35.

Omaha Keeps Stepping. -- The Omaha, Nebr. Group continues to throw off sparks of activity, the latest being what is described as a "new hopped-up group bulletin to be printed on our old mimeo" and called 'The Twelve Stepper', according to the newly elected secretary. The publication will reprint articles from 'The A.A. Grapevine' and other group publications each week. A new hospitalization set-up has made considerable progress with the medical centers and Omaha A.A.s now feel that the next step is public, education on alcoholism. The group has been asked for material to publish in The magazine section of the 'World-Herald' and members' articles will also be printed. On the lighter side the group recently had a big bingo party plus a floor show and refreshments.

Progress at Dallas. -- Dallas, Texas, A.A.s now number over 300 with about 200 of these in the downtown group and the others in the suburban organization. The downtown group recently hired a full time manager, a nonalcoholic formerly associated with a Dallas institution devoted to treatment of alcoholics and nervous ailments. He is paid through voluntary contributions of members who believe it will aid in a more business-like operation of the club. Dr. E. M. Jellinek, professor of physiology at Yale and director of its department of alcohol studies is scheduled to visit Dallas late in April and will speak at a public meeting sponsored by the local unit of The National Committee for Education on Alcoholism and later at a closed meeting of A.A. groups.

Drouth Spreads.--Estimates of A.A. membership are likely to be revised upward soon according to the rate new groups are being formed! The Delray Beach, Fla., Group, an outgrowth and affiliate of the Palm Beach County Group, is now under way while members of the Fremont, Ohio, Group have started a morning group in the home of a member to accommodate those who could not attend other sessions. Members from other towns have been attending the meetings which begin at 10 o'clock Saturday morning. A two man group has been created at Newport, Ark., according to the Batesville, Ark., Group which also reported growth. In the Nevada state Prison, at Carson, The first meeting was attended by 14 alcoholic inmates and five members of the Reno and Carson Groups. The move is supported by Warden Richard Sheey and Gov. Vail M. Pittman.

The Fair Lawn, N. J., Group held its first meeting at the Warren Point Lutheran church recently with one of the winter's worst storms failing to keep 65 members and friends away. The group will meet in the church on Route 4, which is the main route from the George Washington Bridge to Paterson. A member from Artesian, S.D., who has been talking the matter over with the Mitchell group, has decided to get a group going in his own town and has written for 'A.A. Grapevine' subscriptions, books and literature.

Clubs Want A.A. Speakers. --Civic organizations, principally Kiwanis and Rotary in Tampa, Fla., and surrounding cities, have recently been requesting speakers from the Tampa Group to explain the A.A. program to members, indicating a recognition in that section. Lakeland Kiwanians made the first request and the talk of one of the older Tampa members was highly complimented, the program director hailing it as the best since his tenure of office. The president of the club, who is editor of the Lakeland paper, was so favorably impressed that he printed a two-column article. Similar requests have followed. An appreciative letter was sent to the A.A. secretary by the Lakeland club program secretary.

Memberships Mount. -- Including a few who are "playing hard to get" the Battle Creek, Mich., correspondent reports a roll call for 65 members as opposed to 13 two years ago. After functioning for a little over a year, Columbia, S. C., has about 50

members and the group has acquired two nice rooms for a club. During the past several months weekly meetings have been held at a church, but are now being changed to
the well-furnished club rooms at 819 Harden Street, Five Points, Columbia, with club
phone 2-1045, an alternate day phone 2-1095 and a night phone 2-0346.
Traveling members may make contact at the night phone or with H.B. at 203 Harden Street.

Anniversary Celebration. -- The second anniversary of the Pine Bluff, Ark.,
Group
will be observed at a banquet April 24 with Rev. Sam D. of Rome, Ga., as guest
of honor and principal speaker. Open to the public, the affair will include guests
from 15 to 20 other groups in the area. Founded two years ago by Bill F., Memphis,
the group in turn fostered the Fordyce Group about a year ago. Lexington, Ky., held its first anniversary with one of the original members, J.J. and H.H. of Cincinnati
as principal speakers. Four of the original group as well as members from Mt.
Sterling,
Paris, Cynthiana, Frankfort, Versailles, Louisville and Cincinnati attended. The Lexington Group has grown to 40 with the central meeting on Thursday night and smaller meetings in Frankfort Monday, Cynthiana on Friday, at the Narcotic Farm
Sunday afternoon at 1:30 and the Veterans Hospital at 3 o'clock. A banquet

attended by 115 marked the recent first anniversary of the Niagara Falls, N. Y.
Group
which has grown from the original six to 25 at the present time. Speakers included the first local member, dry three years, first Tonawanda member, dry five years and first Buffalo member, dry seven years. The group recently went to St.
Catherine's,
Ont., and helped form a group there. Little Rock, Ark., has sent out notices that its seventh anniversary will be marked April 27. Principal speaker will be Dr. A. L.
of Jacksonville, Fla.

Clubs Open. --The Longview, Wash., Club has opened new quarters in The Alano
Club, 215 Empire Building, Hudson and Commerce Streets. Regular meetings are each Wednesday and Saturday at 7:30 with visitors invited. The Longview Group is also putting out a card bearing the P.O. Box number 1028, and phone, 3075-J, with the admonition
"Let us help you solve that drinking problem" and a four page leaflet with questions to determine whether the reader is an alcoholic and A.A. information.
Clearwater, Fla., members have what our correspondent describes as "ideal" quarters for the group
of 25, the former headquarters of the Garden Club with a palm tree which came to grief, and blew over, arching the doorway. The palm, a real alcoholic, has risen again
and put out shoots. In spite of a small membership the Butte, Mont., Group found a good

place with a kitchen adequate to prepare much coffee. A good many members are reported familiar with the surroundings, (formerly a speakeasy) but redecorated considerably, from new wall paper out. The ambition is to have the club open every night and that goal is being approached. About 50 volunteers showed up in Des Moines, Iowa, to help put the arch through the wall to take on 600 square feet of additional space for the club there and it was reported as a great cooperative effort. One member brought a crew of five with three trucks and air and hand hammers.

Short Snorts.--The Rev. Fr. James P. Timmins of Hartford, Conn., addressed an open meeting in Strong Vincent High School auditorium, Erie, Pa., recently with about 450 attending. After the meeting there was a closed session at Perry Hall. Father Timmins, editor of the 'Connecticut Catholic Transcript', described his work with A.A. over the past five years. The Southington, Conn., Group is giving each member a year's subscription to 'The A.A. Grapevine'. Good newspaper stories and a favorable editorial in the local paper have also been obtained in Southington. Recently the Linda Vista, Calif., Group presented "Junior" with his first birthday cake, "Junior" being 78 years old and with a record of drinking for 74 years!

Buckeyes Get Together.--The North Western Ohio Groups, which include Bellevue, Norwalk, Sandusky, Fremont, Tiffin, Milan and Port Clinton, recently had a joint session at Fremont celebrating the fifth anniversary of G.C. of

Grapevine, May 1947

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

S.R.O. for A.A. -- Police and firemen were needed to turn away over 300 while 700 enthusiastic A.A.s and friends crowded into Brown Hall in Boston recently when

the

Central Service Committee there sponsored the largest meeting ever held in the area.

M.M. of New York was the speaker. She also addressed the New England Hospital Association and the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism as well as a local professional group and several citizens' groups. Newspapers gave A.A.

a great deal of fine publicity as the result of these efforts. The report from Boston says there

are now more groups functioning under the Boston Central Service Committee

than

there were members in the Boston Group in March, 1942.

Austin gets Club-- Austin, Texas, A.A.s report that a six-room house at 405 West

18th

Street has been rented for clubhouse quarters. Partitions have been removed in order to provide space for holding meetings on Tuesday and Friday nights and afternoons. Out of town visitors are invited to pay visits.

Sunday

"Doubles" Record Claimed-- The Indian Village Group of Detroit announces that out of a membership of 55 there are seven married couples who are active members.

They're

inclined to believe that this might be some sort of record, and would like to know if it is.

Radio Programs in Baltimore-- The Central Baltimore, Md., Group now has four meetings a week in the clubhouse at 857 North Eutaw Street. Monday at 8:30 there is a meeting for alcoholics and their immediate families; Wednesday an open meeting and Friday evening, also at the same time a closed meeting of the discussion type. Sunday at 3:30 there is a beginners' meeting which new members are asked to attend for four consecutive Sundays. An older member reviews the 12 Steps with longer discussions of three of them. Besides these meetings there are neighborhood discussion groups at North Baltimore Friday evenings, East Baltimore on Tuesday evenings and the Valley, Monday evenings. The Towson Group meets three times each week, Tuesday and Friday at 8:30 and Sunday from 3 to 5. Since last September the Central Group has had a 15-minute spot on Station WITH on alternate Sundays with a script written and staged by A.A.s. The Towson Group broadcasts every Saturday over WFBR at 7:15. A.A. members answer questions for 15 minutes without a script. Response is reported good.

Invitation to Breakfast-- Visitors are invited to attend the 9 A.M. Sunday breakfast of the Indianapolis A.A. Groups held in the St. Clair Room of the Antlers Hotel. A change was made recently to this more spacious meeting place which offers a fancier

breakfast and a two-story ceiling for the better accommodation of the tobacco addicts.

Growing Up Fast-- Last month the Wallkill, N. Y. Prison Group celebrated its second anniversary with more than 50 members as compared to the handful who began the work.

This is an inmate group, first of its kind to become active in the State

Department

of Correction which includes all prisons and reformatories. Members have expressed their thanks for the interest of the warden, Dr. Walter M. Wallack and his sponsoring committee as well as the visitors from outside groups, many of whom have conducted meetings. The Wallkill Group is proud of the fact that 70 percent of

A. A.

members leaving the institution have become active outside and are making good records.

"We
are happy to know that on leaving here we will be welcomed into A. A. groups on

the outside. With this knowledge we can face the future unafraid," the report concludes.

Six Year Olds-- Open house was held in Kansas City, Mo., to celebrate the sixth

A.A.

anniversary there. Visitors were present from Missouri, Texas, Oklahoma,

Nebraska,

Colorado, Arkansas, Illinois and many other states. The tenth member of A.A.,

from

New York, and the founder of the Chicago Group were principal speakers. A buffet supper and refreshments at the open house helped to make it a real party.

Another
sixth anniversary was observed recently at Kent, Ohio, when 160 heard Dr. L. of Dover
as leader for the event. In the foreign language department, the Sunset
Norwegian
Group was organized a year ago last month with the aim of helping Norwegian sailors in New York, many of whom, it was felt, would feel more at home in a closed
session of a Norwegian group. First meetings were used to train the charter members to speak
A.A. in Norwegian and to translate the 12 Steps into that language.
The 12 Steps
and an explanation of A.A. have been printed in Norwegian and copies have been sent
to the Alcoholic Foundation while others have been mailed to friends in Norway.
This group meets Thursdays in the Norwegian Seamen's House, 62 Hansen Place,
Brooklyn, N.
Y., with the first open meeting held in March. The anniversary was celebrated in
the assembly hall of the Seamen's House with an open session in English.
Marshalltown,
Ia., had plenty of visitors for the third anniversary April 26 with a dinner at
the Tall Corn Hotel. Father Dowling of St. Louis was the speaker. Down in Tuscaloosa,
Ala., some 40 ex-problem drinkers who used to pride themselves on drinking like Southern gentlemen marked completion of their first six months in A.A. recently.
Two of the founders were patients in the Veterans Hospital nearby and talked over
the idea of starting a fellowship in town. Members of the Birmingham Group helped

and home meetings started, with a later transfer to the courthouse where they are now held Wednesday and Saturday evenings. One of the Tuscaloosa pioneers recently uncovered a paper written in 1936 in which he had drawn a striking similarity to
the first seven Steps, but had not talked it over with another alcoholic and went through ten more alcoholic years before he found the complete program.

Saginaw Records Saga-- A two-page history of A. A. in Saginaw, Mich., written by Bill
M. for the second anniversary, tells of growth from 12 to 60 members.
The start
came when an A. A. came to town after affiliation in Des Moines and Omaha and met a Saginaw member who had been attending Bay City meetings. They found two more and started home meetings, put an ad in the paper and continued to grow until they moved to the Y.M.C.A. About a year ago the group blossomed out in the present quarters
at the Metropolitan Club with open meetings, continuing closed sessions at the "Y".
A coming-out party, active support by The Saginaw News and townspeople aided in further growth with the renting of clubrooms at Genesee and Washington while retaining
the Metropolitan headquarters. The group finally has ended up with the Metropolitan Club
as the permanent headquarters.

Groups Serve Special Interests-- San Diego, Calif., reports three groups operating with real success. The Alcoholic Women's Group has held regular meetings for over a year and has grown from four to over 70 members with 23 with more than a year of sobriety. The Non-Alcoholic Group started about the same time, meeting twice a month on the same night as the Alcoholic Women in the same building, after which the two groups get together for coffee and doughnuts. This group has had considerable success in achieving better understanding and filling social needs of alcoholics. The Young Men's group is composed entirely of men under 40 and has grown so fast that it will soon become two groups or the age limit will be lowered. In this activity San Diego members feel they have found a solution as to how the "old goats" can help the younger people in spite of the difference in outlook of the two generations. These groups, meeting in closed session, are supplemented by an open meeting for all interested. A central office with a full-time secretary is open five and a half days a week. A central committee for A.A. public group relations and a management committee to look after the office and business complete the San Diego picture.

New Chairman Every Three Months-- In an outline of activities Ben B., secretary of the Jersey City, N. J. Group says that this organization elects a new chairman every three months, who with the secretary, books all meetings both at home and away during the period. Jersey City has an average attendance of 125 to 150 at the

Friday
night sessions, having started three and one-half years ago with two. Two other
groups,
Union City and Jersey City Heights, have been formed partially from the original group which has continued to grow in spite of these losses. In conjunction with
the regular meetings the group conducts two meetings each week at the Medical Center's Psychopathic Ward with a "graduate" of the ward and secretary and results have led to quips that "A.A. may put them out of business." Anniversaries are observed with presentation of pins after three months and group celebrations of a year the last Friday of the month. An agreement has been established between the Round Top
Group of Providence, R. I., and officials of the Charles V. Chapin Hospital in Providence designed to supplement the physical treatment of alcoholics with the group therapy of A.A. Several beds will be made available for treatment of individuals recommended by the local A.A. group which will hold meetings from time to time at the hospital.
These meetings were requested by the authorities. Previously only alcoholics
committed by local authorities were accepted. There will be no obligation on the patients' part to attend meetings. Waverly and New Hampton Groups in Iowa held a joint meeting recently with visitors from Tripoli, Osage, Allison, Clarksville
and Waterloo.

The Doctor Calls-- A.A.s in Columbia, S. C., are still glowing over a visit by Doctor
R. S., one of the founders of A.A., and his wife who dropped in on their return

from a Florida vacation. Dr. and Mrs. S. visited the newly opened club rooms and joined in a general conversation which lasted several hours and during which members
learned,
as the result of many questions, of the start of A.A., and absorbed a lot more knowledge of how it works.

Plans and Ideas-- The Control Board of the Central Baltimore A.A.
Group has asked each group to ask a member to report to The A.A. Grapevine each month.
All members in the Tacoma, Wash., Group are "in the chips," carrying them in their pockets and purses instead of on the shoulder. A white chip given at the first meeting is exchanged for a yellow one after 60 days; the yellow for a red at the end of three months and the red for a blue at the end of a year of sobriety. At present
Tacoma has four blue chip members with one holding three blues while over half have one or more red chips. These chips are felt to signify and symbolize an honest effort to live the
A.A. program. Although founded only in January 1947 the members of the Tyler,
Texas,
Group have prepared a booklet entitled Slaves of Drink Find Peace of Mind. In addition to explanations of the A.A. program the booklet includes discussions of alcoholism as a public health problem, questions to determine whether the reader
is an alcoholic and how to make A.A. work. Hamilton, Bermuda, A.A.s report a visit
from
Carla P. of the Manhattan Group who gave first-hand information on the Central

Office, as well as a visit and talk from Rita S. of The Boston Group.
Bill P. of Cape
Cod and Horace B. of Manhattan are reported attending regular Wednesday meetings
in Bermuda. A large bulletin board with group news, items and letters of interest
is used by the Passaic, N. J., Group to save time usually taken up with
meeting
announcements. Passaic held a spring party during which 90 members enjoyed entertainment and refreshments.

Empty Jug Discontinued -- Because of the death of its editor, The Empty Jug, publication of the Chattanooga Group has been suspended.. However, if those who had subscribed wish the publication continued, they are asked to write to the secretary,
P.O. Box 905, Chattanooga 1, Tenn.

New Groups Reported-- A good crop of new groups is springing up in various sections of the country according to reports to The A. A. Grapevine. Bay Pines Veterans
Group
at Bay Pines Hospital, near Strasbourg, Fla., got underway with the help of several members from St. Petersburg and with speakers from New Jersey and Long Island.
Clearwater and Tampa Groups are also expected to be of much help. Five members
at Carroll, Ia. have selected Monday as their meeting night after a send-off meeting by groups from Ft. Dodge and Pocahontas. The local paper carried an account which
was extremely helpful. A new venture at Butte, Mont, is the organization of a group

at the state hospital at Warm Springs with 18 to 20 patients reported at each
meeting.
Butte members have been attending and Dr. G. V. Holmes has taken a great interest in the project. An article in the hospital paper, Steam, recommends the
A.A.
program.
Butte members urge visitors to drop in at their place or visit the new
group.
Meetings are at 8 o'clock Wednesday. Easton, Penn., also reports a new group formed within the past few weeks. About 80 Northern Iowa members and friends helped the Algona Group get its start. Pocahontas, Estherville, Spencer, Britt, Kanawha, Fonda,
Emmetsburg, Livermore, Linn Grove, Spirit Lake, Sioux Rapids, Laurens, Havelock,
Humboldt and Ft. Dodge were all represented at Algona. Organized only a few weeks ago the Newport, R. I., Group has more than a dozen members and has meetings every Tuesday night at the Rochambeau House.

Along the Grapevine -- Members of the Atlanta, Ga., North Avenue Group
recently enjoyed a visit to the daffodil gardens of Joel Chandler Harris, Jr.
Son of the creator of the immortal "Uncle Remus" and inheritor of his wit, Mr.
Harris has spoken twice to the group and although a non-alcoholic has attended several open
meetings.
Within the past six months this group has grown over 100 percent. In a town of 1,800
the Cambridge, Minn., Group has 18 active members, its own club room and a lot
of prospective new members which leads A.A.s there to wonder if they don't have a
"per capita" record, especially in a dry county. Much of the progress is attributed to the Minneapolis Group, 45 miles away. Members from the latter have been active with the Cambridge Group since its start a little over a year ago. The fourth A.A. minstrel show was given by Cleveland A.A.s at the Little Theater with both recent performances sold out. At our press time a city A.A. bowling championship was getting under way in Cleveland as another activity.

On other Pages-- "What A.A. Has Done for Me" is the title of an article in the Anahgram, monthly publication of Anah Temple A.A. O.N.M.S. of Bangor, Me., in which a prominent Anah noble says he is glad to tell his brother Shriners how A.A. helped him. The Mid-Ocean Times of Hamilton, Bermuda, continues to give considerable space to A.A. with such articles as "New Way of Life for Alcoholics Based on 12 Steps," "A.A. Member Sums Up Aims of Growing Organization" and "A.A. Member Makes Community-Wide Appeal on Dangers of Alcoholism," all by members and another, "Wife of Former Alcoholic Reviews Benefits Gained by A.A. Membership." A combination column of news, favorable editorial comment and feature material was put together by the Maryville, Mo., Forum, praising A.A. activities in that community. Northern New Jersey papers are contributing much favorable space to A.A. The Fair Lawn-Radburn News has an editor's note together with contents of a letter sent by The A.A. Grapevine correspondent; The Paterson Morning Call has an article by a staff writer who has a regular assignment to cover A.A. there. A series has been stalled in

The
Boonton Times-Bulletin. They are prepared by a member of the Passaic Group who is an employee of the paper. The Passaic Herald-News has run a number of good articles prepared by a specially assigned staff reporter. Under the headline
"24 in
'Exclusive Club'," there is a lengthy article in a recent issue of The Pantagraph
of Bloomington, Ill., while the Columbus, Ohio, Dispatch carries a two-column
picture with the headline "Lawyers Hear 'Mr. Anonymous'." The story tells of this lawyer's experiences before finding A.A. His face is blocked out in the picture. The Post
of Cincinnati, Ohio, in the column "Cincinnatus" says in its headline
"Being the Story
of Joe, the Alcoholic Anonymous, Who Calls to Report 450th Day." The column is an account of Joe, newspaperman, and his gratitude and satisfaction at being an
A.A.

New Publications-- The A.A. Beacon, bearing the picture of a lighthouse and the question "Are you on the beam?" has been started by the Beacon Mill Group,
Victoria,
B. C., Canada. The first issue spells out "Sobriety" with a thought for each letter and its well-edited material includes news of hospitalization, visits to other groups, correspondence, radio news and a back page map showing locations of
groups
and members. The second issue reports participation in a delegation (Akron) group disagreed with his plans. Fortunately, Clarence stuck to his principles and the growth of A.A. was phenomenal.

This is from "How It Worked," the authorized biography of Clarence Snyder by Mitchell K. Chapter 5.1 "The First A.A. Meeting in the World" begins:

---

<http://silkworth.net/chs/chs05.html#c51>

---

On May 11, 1939, one month after the book had been published, a meeting was held. It was a meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous. It was a meeting held by, and for alcoholics and their families only. Historian, Mary C. Darrah, wrote:

"In the years 1935-1939, the Oxford meetings provided a group experience for the early alcoholics. A.A. did not meet as a separate group officially named Alcoholics Anonymous until May 1939 at the home of Abby G. in Cleveland."

Nell Wing* stated in an interview with the author: "Clarence was rightly the first to use the initials, A.A." She was, however, referring to Clarence's use of the initials "A.A." and not to his use of the name Alcoholics Anonymous.

A fellowship of anonymous drunks had in fact existed prior to May 11, 1939. But it was the Cleveland meeting which first used the name Alcoholics Anonymous, that it took from the book. Cleveland's May, 1939 meeting is the first documented meeting which used the name Alcoholics Anonymous, separate and apart from the Oxford Group.

According to the records of the Cleveland Central Committee's Recording Statistician, Norman E. (which were compiled in the middle of June 1942) the following took place:

On 5/10/39, nine members left the Akron meeting of the Oxford Group to form the G. group. The location of the group was 2345 Stillman Road, Cleveland Heights, Cleveland, Ohio. The sponsors of the group were; Clarence Snyder, Al G., Geo. J. McD., John D., Dr. Harry N., Lee L., Vaughn P., Chas. J., and Lloyd T. The first secretary of the group was Clarence Snyder.

The preceding information was taken from a survey form sent out to all Cleveland groups on June 18, 1942. The G. group information was filled out and signed by, Albert R. G., and dated June 24, 1942.

has announced that in six months it has changed a deficit of nearly $5,000 into a healthy surplus through a series of various activities and prompt dues paying. Alanon now has a yearly functioning cost of $50,000 for a tremendous list of activities. Copies of 'The Alanon News' list community sings, parlor nights, women's card parties, booster club meetings, dances, game room entertainment and good restaurant facilities, in addition to monthly Inter-Group mass meetings and other major events in the auditorium. Plans for the future are equally ambitious with modernizing the wiring and light, providing adequate fire exits and possible changes in the restaurant operation are under consideration. Alanon has had a swift, mushroom growth from 70 members who bought the club two and a half years ago to nearly 400 who own it today. A steadily growing number use it daily and nightly.

Women A.A.s Meet Monthly --Women alcoholics in the Kansas City, Mo., Group are now holding monthly meetings at group headquarters for the purpose of making it possible for new members to meet most of the women members, who now number 54. These meetings supplement the central neighborhood discussions and the social meetings but are not offered as a substitute for them. Sessions are informal, but a carefully planned program is presented, followed by an open discussion in which new members are urged to participate. Subjects discussed deal with phases of the A.A. program and problems peculiar to women alcoholics. Attendance has been good and it is felt

the meetings
have a definite place in the Kansas City program.

Institution Feels A.A. Effect -An article, "Five Years of Progress," published
in
'The Clarion' of California Institution for Women, says: "In December, 1945, the initial meeting was held of Alcoholics Anonymous with a membership of 15. That
group has now grown to 120 with regular meetings every Monday and open meetings with outside groups the first Sunday of each month. The entire campus has felt the effect of this A.A. program for a better way of living." In another part of
the anniversary publication is an account of the visit of an A.A. Group from North Hollywood
which concludes, "Live one day at time. Be selfish to the extent that you let nothing
come between you and your sobriety. Outside influences cannot affect you if you build
from the inside out."

Organizers Are Busy--The Ossining, N. Y., Group, organized late in March, with its first meeting in April, now has about 100 at its official sessions.
New groups
have been formed in the northwest part of Rochester, N. Y., to be known as the North-West
Groups of A.A., with meetings every night except Sunday so that members can attend
the open meetings of the Rochester Central Groups at 12 Andrews Street. The new meeting room is in the Riviera Theatre Building, 1451 Lake Avenue, with meetings

starting at 8:30. Answering a definite need in the San Fernando Valley, a daytime meeting has been organized to meet each Monday at 12:15 in the North Hollywood
club house at 4343 Radford Street. The Group is described as "co-ed."
Wauchula, Fla., reports organization of a group which now numbers 10, doing well with 12th Step
work.
Visitors are welcome. Starting as a branch of the Sacramento Group in September,
1946, the Woodland, Calif., Group has grown from eight members to 21.
Meeting on Tuesday nights at members' homes, the present problem is to find more space, as
the wives usually attend.

GI's Group -Ex-GI members of the Omaha, Nebr., Group have organized a group within the group, open to all ex-servicemen, which meets each Wednesday evening to discuss servicemen's problems as well as servicemen's alcoholism, which are often mixed together. Local veterans' organizations have been contacted. World War
I veterans are also attending. Since starting almost a year ago the Chapel Hill, N.
C., Group
has branched out with groups started in Burlington, Raleigh and Durham.
Although losing some members to the new organizations, stimulating programs have kept
the attendance
between 20 and 40 and members report it has not been "to difficult to keep interest alive." About 15 attended the first meeting, an open one, in Atlantic, Ia., with visitors from Council Bluffs, Ia., and Omaha, Nebr., present to help get things

started. The three Atlantic members have arranged to meet Wednesday nights at the Hotel Whitney in Atlantic. Two members of the Binghamton, N. Y., Group have joined a couple of others to start a Norwich, N. Y., Group and have reported to 'The A.A. Grapevine' that an open meeting in conjunction with public spirited citizens, city officials, doctors, and others is planned soon. Visiting A.A.s may make contact at 83 Mitchell Street. With an attendance of 32 and an actual membership of eight, the Neosho, Mo., Group got launched with a strictly "town hall" meeting as the result of a request to the Joplin, Mo., Group. There were visitors from seven towns in response to invitations and an advertisement in a local paper, which also carried a favorable news article written by 'The A.A. Grapevine's' correspondent. Organized in January, 1946, the Clinton, Okla., Group now numbers 18 active members and about three months ago was split into two groups, the other being at Cordell, with many members attending sessions of both each week.

Discuss Northwest Conference--Possibilities of a Northwest conference have been discussed recently, according to the Beacon Hill Group of Victoria, B. C., Canada, with Vancouver and Vancouver Island Groups to join with those from Washington and Oregon. Victoria has been mentioned as a possible locale with a two or three day meeting suggested. Seattle, Spokane, Tacoma and other Northwest groups are reported as welcoming the idea and promising to send good representations if it is held.

Victoria A.A.s are also following the amendments and debates on a brief presented recently to the Provincial Cabinet by Vancouver, Victoria and New Westminster A.A.s concerning education on alcoholism.

More and Better Clubs--Formal opening of new clubrooms last month was held by Mankato, Minn., A.A.s, with speakers from Colfax, Wis., and Minneapolis. A local member gave a brief history and a letter from Bill W. was read.

According to the president of the Alano society there, the group was two years old early this spring and has grown from two men, who started out in July, 1944, and by March, 1945, had drawn in five others. First meeting in homes, a local hotel room was used later and served until March, 1946, when two rooms were leased in a downtown building.

This year 2,600 square feet of space in a new building were leased for four and a half years. The 46 regular members spent about $4,000 in fixing up The quarters.

Mankato has four women members, one of whom is the oldest in sobriety.

Quarters for the club

in Denver, Colo., have been enlarged substantially during the past six months and the membership is still growing. In Omaha, Nebr., a drive for the building fund closed last month. About $2500 was put into the clubroom, including; a kitchen with modern, complete equipment for social activities. Redecoration, remodeling, lighting

and modern furniture were included in improvements. The recreation room in the basement is not complete, but the final drive is expected to take care of this.

Birthdays Recall Growth--More than 400 persons attended the third anniversary of
A.A.
in Memphis, Term., at the Hotel Chisca recently. From three members in April,
1944,
Memphis now has three groups, Downtown, 152 Madison, closed meeting
Friday;
Crosstown, Character Builders Hall, closed meeting Tuesday, and Overton Park, at
the clubhouse, Monday, all sessions being at 8 o'clock. In addition there is an A.A. breakfast at Britling's on Madison Avenue, open, 9:30 A.M. Sunday; 12th Step discussion at 152 Madison, closed, 3:30 Sunday afternoons; open house, open at 8
Tuesday nights; and Questions and Answers, closed session for new members at 8
Wednesday nights. Since many of these sessions are closed, the Overton Park
Group has been holding "Family Open Meetings" about once a month with local people in charge.
The open meeting at the anniversary party was addressed by a well-known Des Moines, Ia., attorney, who told how he came in to A.A. through a man whom he had prosecuted for drunkenness. In Memphis there is also considerable interest in neighboring
groups
throughout the region in Mississippi, Arkansas, Tennessee and even in Southern
Kentucky. The Central Club room at 152 Madison is open every day from 9 A.M.
until midnight for visitors, with a member in charge. With the cooperation of a physician

in a nearby veterans' hospital, weekly visits are being made by Memphis A.A.s to the hospital. The San Antonio, Tex., Group held its second birthday party recently with the singing of "Thank God, We Have A.A." to the tune "The Eyes of Texas" as one of the features. It has been printed on small cards for distribution by the group.

In Kansas city--At the sixth anniversary of A.A. in Kansas city, Mo., it was recalled to the attendance of 550 that the group was started when two local men, unknown to each other, were brought together by a traveling A.A. Today the membership of 350 includes 54 women. Ten have been dry five years; nine, four years; 10, three years; 33, two years; 77, one year. There are 10 husband and wife teams, six who have brothers or sisters in some group; two father-son combinations; one man sponsored his son-in-law, one non-alcoholic woman has a husband and brother-in-law in the Kansas City Group and a brother and sister in other groups. None of the original three are now in Kansas City's Group, but all are still in A.A. and two have been dry since the beginning. More than 20 groups have been started by Kansas City A.A.s, including two at the Federal Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans. Recently 40 of the 68 members and 11 visitors from Kansas city groups helped observe the second anniversary at Leavenworth. This group has grown from five members under the Kansas City which has provided books, literature and subscriptions to 'The A.A. Grapevine'.

sponsorship

At

the request of members who had been transferred to the honor farm a group was started

there last August. Two members of the Kansas city Group attend each of the weekly

meetings. Less than 10 percent of the 80 members who have been released since

the group started have been returned to the penitentiary or are known to have encountered

legal or alcoholic difficulties. This figure is substantially lower than the percentage of the entire number of men released from the penitentiary.

Eighteen

members of the Jefferson City, Mo., Group took a local bus to attend the Kansas anniversary sessions. First anniversary for Wooster, O., A.A.s was held last month with a dinner at Weitzell Hall and speakers from Columbus and Toledo, O. About 175 attended the Daytona Beach, Fla., fifth anniversary at the Hotel Osceola, coming

City

from as far away as Sarasota, Fla., and Savannah, Ga. Judges, doctors and clergymen

were among those attending. Five speakers, including A.A.s from Orlando, and Washington,

D. C., as well as Father Brunton of the Episcopal Church, spoke and there was an open house at the clubrooms, 105 Ivy Lane, where the pool table had been transformed

to serve as a buffet supper table.

Seven Originals--the seven original members of the Passaic, N. J., Group spoke

at the first anniversary there last month. The thought was expressed that success in
the growth of membership has been of educational value to the city.
Interest and backing of clergy, doctors, and good coverage by a daily paper are reported as having helped.

Interest on the part of a reporter resulted in friendly, intelligent, sympathetic
columns stressing the spiritual foundation of the 12 Steps. The Rev.
F. R.

Edward
Dowling, S.J., of St. Louis, Mo., was principal speaker at the third anniversary
of
the Marshalltown, Ia., Group at the Hotel Tallcorn recently. Four Marshalltown
men representing industry, law enforcement, the clergy and medicine spoke briefly summarizing the A.A. program with regard to their vocations. In the afternoon
Father
Dowling conducted a Cana Conference and a smoker was given at the hotel for visitors.

What Some Are Doing -- The Atlanta, Ga., Group recently heard a fine talk by a
Red
Bank, N. J., member visiting there, who also spoke to the Rome, Ga., Group. Fair
Lawn, N. J., recently elected officers by secret ballot with all but one member participating. A secretary, chairman, treasurer, 'Grapevine' correspondent and committee members were chosen. Cards bearing the heading, "Is Alcohol Your Problem?"
and another telling of A.A. meetings have been put out by the Dodd Town Group of East
Orange, N. J. Meetings for wives have been planned by the Spirit Lake-Milford-Spencer, Ia., Group. A new leader for May, June and July
was selected recently by Plainfield, N. J., A.A.s. Both groups in Eau Claire, Wis., are reported growing with good liaison. Many A.A.s take advantage of good roads to attend

other meetings in a radius of 100 miles. The Bellflower, Calif., Group is trying out a scheme by which four leaders were elected at once, the one getting the greatest number becoming chairman, while the other three preside in weekly rotation with
the chairman in an effort to bring more initiative into the group and promote better
12th
Step work. Alcansia Inc., of the South Los Angeles, Calif., Group, held a free gala dance May 31 with many prizes and refreshments. Proceeds went to the building fund.
From Charlotte, N. C., 'The A.A. Grapevine' hears that the Myers Park Group
held its first meeting in February and has grown fast since that time. Meetings are Monday
nights at 8 at the Myers Park Methodist Church. The workings of A.A. were explained at an open meeting sponsored by Cleburne, Tex., A.A.s at the First Baptist Church. A member of the Shawnee, Okla., Group who works for a Wewoka paper has been running
A.A. articles there, telling of the program and pointing out that A.A.s from Holdenville, Ada and other towns have been attending the meetings.

Church Welcomes A.A.-- The Church in Aurora (community) program recently carried
a bulletin saying, "We are honored to have a meeting of A.A. here at the church
every

Sunday afternoon. There is real "togetherness" in those meetings, and a spirit of humility, honesty and mutual helpfulness not often encountered in these times. Perhaps the methods and the spiritual dynamic which have helped alcoholics so much could be well used in other areas of life, too." The program was sent to 'The A.A. Grapevine', by a member of the Kent, O., Group.

A.A. on Sports Pages--In connection with the Kentucky Derby A.A. drew mention from two 'New York Herald Tribune' sports columnists. Writing in "Views of Sport" Red Smith in describing the week said in part "The Kentucky metropolis is called the Fall City, presumably out of respect, for the fall guys who rent hotel beds here during the first week in May under the preposterous delusion that the beds will be slept in. However, it cannot be said that the hotel managements are not both forehanded and considerate. In one hotel, for example, there is furnished to each guest, free of charge, the local address of Alcoholics Anonymous together with the hours of its meetings and the notation. "Everybody welcome." In another 'Herald Tribune' column Joe H. Palmer wrote "And a great many who do see The Derby have only a fragmentary idea of what they are looking at. It is a combined picnic, old home week, fashion show and a national reunion for all persons who have resigned from Alcoholics Anonymous." A United Press story sent out from New York says "Don Black, former big league bad boy whose escapades sent him back to the minors, was following the soda pop trail today to a comeback with the Cleveland Indians" and goes on to say that he has joined A.A.

Publications Change--'The Screwball', publication of the Deep East Texas Group of Nacogdoches announces in a recent issue that it is "reborn" with a present circulation of about 250. It serves all groups affiliated with the Deep East Texas group. Editorial policy "will cling close to the 12 Steps." From Omaha, Nebr., it is reported that 'The Twelve' has grown up and become a bi-monthly publication, being mailed on the first and fifteenth of each month. Its purpose is to give a more complete report of local and national A.A. activities, to publish excerpts from other publications and to feature articles and news from members of the Omaha groups, including those in neighboring towns and cities.

=====

++++Message 1372. . . . . 1. Richmond Walker 24 Hr Book
From: Glenn Chesnut . . . . . 9/29/2003 9:08:00 PM

=====

[Richmond Walker Part One of Four Parts] Posted as a gesture of appreciation for the planners and participants in the national archival conference held this past weekend (Sept. 25-28, 2003) amidst the palm trees and sunshine and good A.A. fellowship of sunny Florida.

*****

RICHMOND WALKER & THE TWENTY-FOUR HOUR BOOK

Glenn C. (South Bend, Indiana)

Talk given at the 8th Annual National A.A. Archives Workshop, Fort Lauderdale, Florida

Sept. 27, 2003

*****

Introduction

The three most published A.A. authors are Bill W., Richmond Walker, and Ralph Pfau, in that order. Ralph, who lived in Indianapolis, became in 1943 the first Roman Catholic priest to get sober in A.A., and under the pen name "Father John Doe," wrote the fourteen Golden Books along with three other books, all of them still in print and read by A.A. people today. Richmond Walker got sober in Boston in May 1942, and later moved down to Daytona Beach in Florida, where in 1948 he published Twenty-Four Hours a Day, which became the great meditational book of early A.A. from that point on.

The oldtimers in my part of the country say without hesitation that they got sober by using two books: the Big Book and Richmond Walker's Twenty-Four Hour book. Phrases and topical advice from both books are sprinkled throughout everything they say when they talk about their own experience of the program, and when they give advice to newcomers. A.A. people carried the little black book with them everywhere they went. It was always considered permissible to read from the Twenty-Four Hour book during A.A. meetings, and to base the discussion on a topic from that book. By 1959, it had sold over 80,000 copies, which means, given the number of people in the program at that time, that roughly fifty percent of the A.A. members owned their own copies, and most of the rest had attended meetings where it was read from or used. As of 1994 (the latest figures which I have), it had sold six and a half million copies (see note 1).

In the Big Book, the eleventh step said "Sought through prayer and meditation to improve our conscious contact with God as we understood Him, praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out." But there were only a handful of extremely short prayers in the Big Book to use as examples, and even if one added the Lord's Prayer and the Serenity Prayer, this was still an unworkably short list. Early A.A. people often used the Methodist meditational book called the Upper Room, and listened to the radio broadcasts of Bishop Fulton J. Sheen, but they had nothing of their own. The traditional western books on spirituality and meditation were, most of them, tied to the life of the medieval monasteries and convents and religious orders, and were not tailored to people who were married and had jobs in the secular world, nor were they, most of them, designed to deal with people who had suffered the kinds of trauma, violence, internal torment, and degradation which many alcoholics had experienced. There was an acute and desperate need for something which would teach recovering alcoholics how to pray effectively, and how to meditate on the spirit of the twelve steps.

So Rich produced a little book which I myself would put on my short list of the world's ten or fifteen greatest spiritual classics -- and I include eastern as well as western writings in my assessment. I have been a scholar and a professional in this field for forty years now, and I have seen an incredible number of people make far more spiritual progress in their own lives by meditating daily on that little book, and accomplish this far more quickly, than with any other spiritual work I know of.

The Walker family background

Richmond Walker's world during his youth centered on the wealthy city of Boston, the grand old homes on Beacon Hill, the fancy new houses in Brookline, and the political power residing under the shiny gilded dome of the great state house overlooking the green grass of Boston Common. Rich's family were personal friends with presidents of the United States, like William Howard Taft and Theodore Roosevelt. The family money and political prominence came from Rich's Grandfather Walker, who had started out in Worcester, forty-four miles west of Boston, and made his fortune in the shoe manufacturing business. He was not only a successful and wealthy businessman, but got himself elected to the U.S. Congress as the representative from Worcester, and spent many years in Washington continually building his political power in the halls of Congress (Ld 2).

Rich's father and mother (his mother also came from a moneyed manufacturing family) lived in a new house in the fashionable Boston suburb of Brookline at 108 Upland Road at the time Rich was born. Rich's father also went into politics, and got himself elected to the Massachusetts state legislature as the representative from Brookline, where he eventually rose to be speaker of the house from 1905 to 1907 (Ld 1 and 3). He ran for governor of Massachusetts once and failed, and in 1912 decided to run again. He was a Republican, and personal friends, as we have said, with both President Theodore Roosevelt and President William Howard Taft. 1912 was unfortunately the year the Republican party split in half. Taft controlled the old machine politics and the patronage system, and easily obtained the Republican nomination at the convention. Teddy Roosevelt, in outrage, formed a third party, nicknamed the Bull Moose party, made up of reformers and progressives and the honest politicians, and made his own separate run at the presidency.

Rich's father cast his lot with Teddy Roosevelt and the break-away Bull Moose party, but alas, half of the Republican vote was not enough to gain Roosevelt the presidency nor Rich's father the governorship (Ld 3). Rich turned twenty during the summer of that year. At one level, this was very heady stuff: your father, a prominent and well-known politician, running for governor, the whole house abuzz with talk of the bitter split between Taft and Roosevelt at the national political level, and with major political figures regularly dropping by either to plan strategies with Rich's father, or to try to shift him over to their side with threats or promises. And after the bitter results of the election came in, and when it became clear that the family had gone down in humiliating defeat, the atmosphere of depression, resentment, and hurt must have been overwhelming. That was the year, 1912, and that was the situation in which the twenty-year-old Rich started drinking and trying to flee into the bottle.

Rich's childhood and youth

That was the catalyst, but the pressures had already been there since Rich was a small child, and he had already become, long before that point, a very unhappy and rebellious person. He was one of six children, he explained. Joseph was the eldest, born in 1891, then came Rich, who was born on August 2, 1892, then Dorothy (who died of diphtheria while still a baby), and then George, Katharine, and Evelyn. The baby Dorothy's death created a psychological barrier of some sort, which separated Joe and Rich later on from their three younger siblings and created a special linkage between the two older brothers. It is doubtful whether the parents paid much attention to the two boys at all for a while, as they fell into the throes of grief over the death of Dorothy, and only slowly began recovering. Joe, a year and a half older, weathered it better than Rich, who was at an extremely vulnerable age. Poor Rich became convinced from that point on that his parents neither loved nor cared for him at all, and began acting accordingly, which only made matters worse (Ld 5).

His older brother Joe was the only one in the family whom he felt close to, but he resented even Joe: "I always played second fiddle to my brother Joe," he said, in part simply because of the age difference, but Joe was also "stronger and better loved than I was." Rich felt unnoticed and always shoved into the background, so he isolated himself more and more. He says that he became "a lonesome kid who felt he was not loved enough or appreciated enough by [his] mother and father. They considered me a problem child, which I was." He misbehaved and rebelled to try make his parents notice him (Ld 5, see also 10).

Rich felt that his family did not love him, and this may have been partly just a misunderstanding in his own head, but he also said that, although they were skilled and brilliant politicians and businessmen, at a deeper level they were people who did not understand love in the true sense, real love, the kind he later discovered in A.A. There was too much emphasis on surface things, grand (and fairly impersonal) social schemes, and personal achievement, and not enough real caring about other human beings at a deeper level. As soon as he was old enough, he went off rebelliously and pretended that they did not even exist.

He and Joe were both sent off to private schools, Joe to Volkman's School in Boston, and Rich to St. George's School in Newport, Rhode Island. Rich then went to a very prestigious school, Williams College in Williamstown, Massachusetts, which had been founded in 1785. In the world's eyes, he was an enormous success at every point along the way. The problem was that Joe had gone to Yale instead. No matter how well you did at Williams College, it could not compare to a degree from Yale. Rich had once again been surpassed and outshone by his older brother (Ld 6 and 10).

And yet Rich had been enormously successful, so bright that he was able to finish college in just three and a half years -- magna cum laude, with a Phi Beta Kappa key -- and then take a grand tour through the great historical and artistic centers of Europe (Ld 6). He was a highly educated man, as shows up repeatedly in his Twenty-Four Hour book, knowledgeable about literature and science, art and psychology, philosophy and theology -- but he regarded himself as a failure.

He won a gold medal for his ability in classical Greek, which is important, because it meant that he had read and understood Plato. In the Foreword to the Twenty-Four Hour book, Rich explains how he took God Calling, a work of traditional Christian piety, and converted these religious statements into what he called "universal spiritual thoughts," which make up part of the small print sections at the bottoms of the pages in the Twenty-Four Hour book. It was not the beliefs of a specific religion which he was interested in, but the Platonic ideas which lay behind them, which were equally accessible to people of all religions, or no particular religion at all.

It was the vision of the sunlight of the spirit in Plato's parable of the cave which Rich was trying to teach, and the eternal ideas which became visible when the prisoners in that cave managed to escape the dark shadow world in which they had been enchained, and finally emerged into that radiant light above. And like all good Platonists, he realized that the material world was a complex hall of mirrors, reflections of reflections of reflections of those shining eternal truths, which were alive with the Eternal Life.

Rich also learned in college about the German philosopher Kant, whose Critique of Pure Reason in 1781 created the central problem of all subsequent western philosophy and theology. Our human minds are imprisoned in a box of space and time, as Rich comments repeatedly in his Twenty-Four Hour book, and the normal scientific method does not allow us any contact with the eternal and infinite ground of the universe which lies outside this box.

But he also learned, at first or at least at second hand, about the German philosophers and theologians of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, who had proposed ways to get past the barrier which Kant seemed to have erected. In his Twenty-Four Hour book, Rich talks in language sometimes reminiscent of Jakob Friedrich Fries or Friedrich Schleiermacher, sometimes of Rudolf Otto or the early Karl Barth, sometimes of Albrecht Ritschl or even Adolf von Harnack. These theologians taught us that, in spite of the Kantian problem, we could still obtain some sort of real contact with God via Ahnung (the realm of intuitive knowledge and the hints we could see in the world around us of the infinite), Gefuehl (the realm of feeling and emotion), and by focusing on the moral dimension of human life. This kind of knowledge could only be expressed in symbol and metaphor, in Platonic images and icons and parables and what Rudolf Otto called ideograms ("picture writing"), but it was real knowledge also, just different from scientific knowledge.

In spite of his brilliance in school, Rich was not the kind of person who hid in the library and did nothing but study all the time. He was able to use the family political skills to get himself elected class president, captain of the football team, president of his fraternity -- whatever kind of recognition he set his eye on. And yet, in spite of all the time he spent participating in sports and various social groups, and his ability and enormous skill in manipulating other people, he had no one with whom he was genuinely close. In the lead which he gave at an A.A. meeting in Rutland, Vermont, in 1959, he says:

"Although well-respected, I did not make class friends. I was wrapped in a cloak of reserve; there was a wall between myself and other people. I did not go halfway to make friends, and there was no love in my life. In fact, true love has always been a mystery to me. As a child I was not loved, and as a result I have never learned to truly love others. I was poorly adjusted to life, being self-contained, egocentric, immature, easily hurt, and overly sensitive."

It was the typical alcoholic mind-set: feeling alone even in the midst of a crowd, and unable to feel any real sense of connection with others. He was incredibly thin-skinned and wore his feelings on his sleeve: even a slight word could wound or enrage him to the core (Ld 10-11).

He began drinking when he was halfway through college, and yet at first he regarded himself as a very controlled and moderate drinker. "I thought that those who drank a lot were very foolish." Then, after leaving college, he began to drink more and more heavily, and he began to feel even more isolated (Ld 8). As he says in the reading for January 30 in the Twenty-Four Hour book:

"A drinking life isn't a happy life. Drinking cuts you off from other people and from God. One of the worst things about drinking is the loneliness . . . . Drinking cuts you off from other people, at least from the people who really matter to you, your wife and children, your family and real friends. No matter how much you love them, you build up a wall between you and them by your drinking. You're cut off from any real companionship with them. As a result, you're terribly lonely."

Underneath the surface egotism, the aura of apparent total self-confidence, the glad-handing, the shrewd massaging of other people's fears and desires, was an inferiority complex which turned every achievement to dust in his mouth. In the reading for June 6, he comments:

"Alcoholism is usually a symptom of some underlying personality problem. It's the way we alcoholics express our maladjustments to life. I believe that I was a potential alcoholic from the start. I had an inferiority complex. I didn't make friends easily. There was a wall between me and other people. And I was lonely. I was not well adjusted to life."

And what did Rich mean by that interesting phrase in his 1959 lead, "true love has always been a mystery to me"? (Ld 11) He did not mean it in the romantic sense, where the man sends a Valentine to a woman with a gushy, sentimental message talking about how "when I found you, I found true love at last." He talked repeatedly about not being loved when he was a child, and not knowing how to love anyone else, even family members or friends his own age, in any kind of truly deep way.

He talked about this twice in his Twenty-Four Hour book. March 5th says that he finally discovered that the kind of real love he lacked in his life could only come from the indwelling of God in the human heart, a divine love which drove out fear and pathological dread of closeness with other human beings: "There is no room for fear in the heart in which God dwells. Fear cannot exist where true love is or where faith abides." But we need even more than that. In the reading for May 21, Rich says that we not only need God, we also need the fellowship of the program in order to be healed and to learn how to share, which is one of the most important parts of loving. A.A. taught him how to share with others.

After college

After finishing up at Williams College in June of 1914 (Rich turned twenty-two that summer), he threw himself into drinking and parties in a way he never had before. As he put it in his lead (Ld12), "I found that drinking loosened me up and allowed me to enjoy the company of others -- especially drinkers like myself. Soon alcohol became a crutch to me, which enabled me to enjoy life: the companionship of girls, parties, football games, and all of my activities."

Rich pointed out in one of the essentially autobiographical sections of the Twenty-Four Hour book, the reading for April 4th (see also June 24), that his out-of-control alcohol consumption was a symptom, which pointed towards an even more serious underlying disease. People who came into A.A. not only had a drinking problem, they had an even more destructive thinking problem:

"Every alcoholic has a personality problem. He drinks to escape from life, to counteract a feeling of loneliness or inferiority, or because of some emotional conflict within himself, so that he cannot adjust himself to life. His alcoholism is a symptom of his personality disorder. An alcoholic cannot stop drinking unless he finds a way to solve his personality problem. That's why going on the wagon doesn't solve anything. That's why taking the pledge usually doesn't work."

Sgt. Bill S., the Air Force sergeant who came into the A.A. program on Long Island in 1948 (the year Rich wrote the Twenty-Four Hour book), explores the nature of the kind of emotional conflicts which Rich was talking about in the book he recently wrote, On the Military Firing Line in the Alcoholism Treatment Program. Old-time A.A. people knew that we had to do two things in order to be healed: we had to quit fighting God and start making a little better friends with him, and we had to deal with all the character defects and personality problems which underlay our alcoholic compulsion. Not either-or, but both-and.

Rich put the problem very simply: "Alcohol is our weakness," but underneath that is the seething morass of "our unstable emotions." So Rich partied and he played, a son of the wealthy and prominent, and if he seemed to be drinking a tremendous amount, he and everyone else just put it down to youth.

---

Get more from the Web. FREE MSN Explorer download :
<http://explorer.msn.com>

went off to New York city and had a simple ceremony at the Little Church Around the Corner, as it was called, and then came back to Boston and rented an apartment in Brookline. The part of this story that is especially strange and bizarre -- the part that makes it clear that Rich had very serious psychological problems of some sort by this point -- is that Rich never bothered to tell anyone in his family that he was married until Hilda, their first child, was born. He says that the family accepted this block-busting news just fine. So there was no hint that Agnes was fundamentally socially unacceptable to the family, or that marrying her was in and of itself an act of rebellion. In Rich's version of the story at least, he seems to have just decided perversely that he was not going to tell anyone that he had gotten married (Ld 14).

Joe in particular instantly came to Rich's support, and built them an extremely nice new house in the Chestnut Hill section of Brookline, over in the Boston suburbs. Joe, the family caretaker, attempted to make everything right again. Rich and Agnes ended up having four children: Hilda, Caroline, John, and David. Rich of course did not stop drinking, and looking back at that period of his life from thirty-some-odd years later, he realized that he had never really spent any time with his wife or their young children. He had married in the first place because he felt so alone, and so desperately wanted human companionship, but once he had it, he continually fled from it and went out drinking instead (Ld 7, also see 8).

Once he and Agnes were ensconced in their fancy new house, Rich decided to make his partying bigger and more extravagant:

"We became friends with a family who lived nearby, and together we went on several trips to the West Indies, Havana, and Canal Zone. I was drinking a lot on these journeys, and my alcoholism was becoming more evident as time passed. After we had been married for two years, I bought a summer cottage in Siasconset on Nantucket Island, where we spent our summers. Our friends there were a heavy drinking crowd, and my alcoholism developed rapidly."

It should be said that one reason for the trips abroad was that the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act had introduced the Prohibition era to the United States by the beginning of 1920, and alcohol was illegal for fourteen years, all the way down to the end of 1933. This did not mean that alcoholics could not obtain alcohol whenever they wanted -- it could easily be smuggled in by boat onto the beaches of Nantucket Island, where Rich indicates that he was able to get all he wanted to drink every summer without any problem -- but a nightclub in Havana, Cuba could operate a good deal more openly, extravagantly, and flamboyantly than a speakeasy in a dark basement in Boston. And you could pretend that there was more glamor to it that way too.

Rich talked about the fancy nightclubs and the romantic trips to the tropics in some of the autobiographical sections of the Twenty-Four Hour book, and took pains to make it clear that the reality was not so glamorous at all, if you looked at the whole picture (24H 2/6â€"2/7):

"A night club crowded with men and women all dressed up in evening clothes looks like a very gay place. But you should see the men's room of that night club the next morning. What a mess! People have been sick all over the place and does it smell! The glamour of the night before is all gone and only the stink of the morning is left."

"A long mahogany bar in the tropical moonlight looks like a very gay place. But you should see the place the next morning. The chairs are piled on the tables and the place stinks of stale beer and cigarette stubs. And often we are there too, trying to cure the shakes by gulping down straight whiskey."

In his Twenty-Four Hour book in the January readings, particularly the 25th, Rich stressed that this was an unnatural and abnormal way of living, that craved an artificial life of continuous excitement and a hyper kind of "good times" feeling for every waking hour.

The worst of it though, Rich said, was the long-term effect of his drinking on his family and his career and his mind (24H 2/18): "After I became an alcoholic, alcohol poisoned my love for my family, it poisoned my ambition in business, it poisoned my self-respect. It poisoned my whole life, until I met A.A. My life is happier now than it has been for a long time. I don't want to commit suicide." Such a simple, poignant way of summing up what A.A. did for him: I no longer am tormented by such pain and self-hate that I yearn to commit suicide now.

The downhill slide begins

On Black Friday (October 28, 1929), the U.S. Stock Exchange in New York crashed, and the economic crisis got worse and worse. By March 6, 1933, Franklin D. Roosevelt had to close all the banks in the country for four days by presidential proclamation.

The two brothers were able to keep their business going, but times were so tough that in 1932, Rich and Agnes had to sell their fancy home in Chestnut Hill. They decided to try to make something positive of it, so they got a smaller house in Cohasset, Massachusetts. It was twenty-five miles south of Boston, but it was right on the harbor, so this gave it some charm. In his lead, Rich talked about his discouragement at that point (Ld 16, see also 7): "I continued to take the train to Boston and go to the office, but my heart was not in it." Naturally enough, being an alcoholic, he began to drink even more and neglected his wife even further. In the readings for March 29th to 30th, he says, "My few friends were only drinking companions, not real friends."

"I lied to my wife constantly about where I had been and what I'd been doing. I took time off from the office and pretended I'd been sick or gave some other dishonest excuse. I was dishonest with myself, as well as with other people. I would never face myself as I really was or admit when I was wrong. I pretended to myself that I was as good as the next fellow, although I suspected I wasn't."

They were desperately short of money, and in truth, it was not all due to the Great Depression which had struck the country. Rich was drinking up a lot of their available cash. In his Twenty-Four Hour book, he says that one of the things A.A. had given him was that it did in fact "make me happy to see my wife have enough money for herself and the children" now.

In the Twenty-Four Hour book, he says that he acted that way in part out of gross selfishness. In the reading for March 28th, he says: "I wanted my own way in everything. I don't believe I ever grew up. When things went wrong, I sulked like a spoiled child and often went out and got drunk. [I was] all get and no give." And in the reading for May 10th, he said that he had no feelings of loyalty to anyone or anything: "When I was drinking, I wasn't loyal to anybody. I should have been loyal to my family, but I wasn't. I let them down by my drinking." He betrayed his wife, he betrayed his own children, and he didn't even care.. He let them down at a point when they were totally dependent on him. An alcoholic has to face a lot of bitter truths about himself when he does a fourth step and an eighth step.

His daughter Hilda's death: the plummet downhill quickened

Money problems there during the great depression had already thrown Rick into considerable despair. But then came the worst blow of all. Around 1935, he managed to scrape together the money to send his twelve-year-old daughter Hilda to a summer camp on Cape Cod. While she was there, she caught spinal meningitis and died. Rich plunged into such grief that he resigned his position as a partner in the firm. "Agnes and I took a trip to Sweden, and upon our return I went back to the office, not as a partner, but as a clerk working on statistics." Rich was around 42 to 43 years old at the time. The next seven years were the worst of his life: "I was arrested three times for drunken driving," he said in his lead, "and landed in several hospitals," as his drinking just continued to get worse and worse (Ld 17).

The party was over

It had not been like that, he said, back when he was in his twenties. He could still remember those good old days (24H 2/8): "All of us alcoholics had a lot of fun with drinking. We might as well admit it. We can look back on the good times . . . . But the time comes for all of us alcoholics when drinking ceases to be fun and becomes trouble." The party was over now, for good. The only parts of his later drinking years of which he could remember much at all, was the hangovers the mornings after (24H 6/01, 6/02, 6/03, see also 1/28):

"Some things I do not miss since becoming dry: That over-all awful feeling physically, including the shakes, a splitting headache, pains in my arms and legs, bleary eyes, fluttering stomach, droopy shoulder, weak knees, a three-day beard and a flushed complexion. Also facing my wife at breakfast and looking at my breakfast. Also composing the alibi and sticking to it. Also trying to shave with a hand that won't behave. Also opening up my wallet to find it empty."

"Some more things I do not miss since becoming dry: Wondering if the car is in the garage and how I got home. Struggling to remember where I was and what I did since my last conscious moment. Trying to delay getting off to work. Wondering how I will look when I arrive at the office. Dreading the day ahead of me."

"Some more things I do not miss since becoming dry: Running all over town to find a bar open to get that "pick-up." Meeting my friends and trying to cover up that I feel "lousy." Looking at myself in a mirror and calling myself a damn fool. Struggling with myself to snap out of it for two or three days. Wondering what it is all about."

And it was not just the hangovers and the morning after, but the other things alcohol did to him. As his drinking got worse and worse, he had to lie even more each time around: to his wife, to his brother Joe, and to everyone else with whom he came into contact (24H 1/27):

"What a load lying puts on your shoulders! Drinking makes liars out of all of us alcoholics. In order to get the liquor we want, we have to lie all the time. We have to lie about where we've been and what we've been doing. A man who's lying is only half alive, because of the constant fear of being found out. When you come into A.A., and get honest with yourself and with other people, that terrible load of lying falls off your shoulders.

Caught between the times: the terror of remorse and dread

Increasingly, Rich said, he was caught between a past filled only with remorse and a future filled only with dread (24H 1/28 and 3/20).

"What a load remorse puts on your shoulders! That terrible mental punishment we've all been through. Ashamed of the things you've said and done. Afraid to face people because of what they might think of you. Afraid of the consequences of what you did when you were drunk. What an awful beating the mind takes!"

"When we were drinking, we used to worry about the future. Worry is terrible mental punishment. What's going to become of me? Where will I end up? In the gutter or the sanitarium? We can see ourselves slipping, getting worse and worse, and wonder what the finish will be. Sometimes we get so discouraged in thinking about the future that we toy with the idea of suicide."

Only by learning to live well within the now -- the Eternal Now of the divine Spirit -- could an alcoholic be freed from this hell of remorse and dread. Rich placed a proverb at the beginning of his Twenty-Four Hour book which laid out the only route which he had found that he could follow and be happy and unafraid. Notice that he took it from the Hindu spiritual tradition -- Rich was trying to put us on notice, from the very beginning of the book, that the "universal spiritual thoughts" which would save us could be found in all the religions of the world, not just in the Judeo-Christian tradition:

Look to this day,

For it is life,

The very life of life.

In its brief course lie all

The realities and verities of existence,

The bliss of growth,

The splendor of action,

The glory of power --

For yesterday is but a dream,

And tomorrow is only a vision,

But today, well lived,

Makes every yesterday a dream of happiness

And every tomorrow a vision of hope.

Look well, therefore, to this day.

Today well lived was the secret to hope and happiness, provided it was lived with a sure faith in a God of compassion and grace. Only trust in God's compassion can free us from the shame and guilt and remorse over our pasts.

Feeding my pride vs. nurturing the real, eternal, imperishable me

Rich had done his early drinking in fancy nightclubs, and on Nantucket Island where the wealthy had their summer homes, and on expensive trips to the Caribbean. But during his last seven years of drinking he went progressively down the ladder till he was drinking in cheaper and cheaper bars, and with lower and lower companions. He talks about that in the readings for May 4th in the Twenty-Four Hour book. "I used to hang around the lowbrow barrooms so I could feel superior to the other customers." "I used to tell tall stories about myself. I told them so often that I half believe some of them now, even though I know they aren't true." "I had to show off and boast so that people would think I amounted to something, when of course both they and I knew that I really didn't amount to anything. I didn't fool anybody."

Rich said he learned an important lesson from that: "If I'm going to stay sober, I've got to keep myself small." He had to learn to quit feeding his pride, and playing the phoney, and find out who he really was. As A.A. began to teach him to live well within the eternal now, Rich said, he was able to begin regaining contact with his own essential being, what he called "the real, eternal, unperishable me." (24H 1/14)

"I will learn to overcome myself, because every blow to selfishness is used to shape the real, eternal, unperishable me. As I overcome myself, I gain that power which God releases in my soul. And I too will be victorious."

The Eternal Me is the true spiritual self, which dwells within the Eternal Now, untouched by the material world, in immediate communion with the Great Spirit who presides over the universe. "The eternal life is calmness and when a man enters into that, then he lives as an eternal being." (24H 3/10 and 3/17) This is the ancient pre-Christian Platonic tradition at its best.

His brief period in the Oxford Group: 1939th 1941

In 1939 Rich did what Bill W. and Dr. Bob had done before him: he joined the Oxford Group in an attempt to get sober (Ld 18). He was

Hitting bottom: Spring 1942

Toward the end of those nine months, Rich finally hit his first bottom, and decided, in total desperation, that he had to reach out once again to whatever kind of God actually ruled this universe, and make a naked plea for help (Ld 19).

"While I was drinking alone in the room on Beacon Street in Boston, I became disgusted with my life and suddenly decided I would do something about it. I talked with some members of the Oxford Group, and the next morning, in my lonely room, I prayed to God to show me how to live a better life. I went to Jim's home in Newtonville for two weeks until I had sobered up."

It was the Spring of 1942. His father died that year, and he went up to his wife at the funeral and, in typical alcoholic fashion, swore a mighty oath that he was off of alcohol forever. "She took me back on the basis that I would never drink again -- I fully believed I never would." (Ld 19) Of course it could not last long. Rich had his second slip. When we read the passages about slips in the Twenty-Four Hour book, it is important to remember that Rich was talking about something which he himself knew about at first hand.

Finding A.A. -- May 1942 -- early Boston A.A.

This time he really hit bottom, and as he tells us in his lead (Ld 19), "after one week of drinking, I walked into the A.A. clubroom at 306 Newbury Street in Boston." He had finally come to the people who had the real answers. This was in May of 1942, and Rich never drank any kind of alcoholic beverage again for the rest of his life (Ld 20). After the painful nine-month separation, he and Agnes got back together, and ever since that point, Rich said (Ld 9), "I have enjoyed a happy married life and the companionship of my children. Joining Alcoholics Anonymous was the best thing I had done in my life since I started drinking at the age of twenty."

In May 1942, A.A. had not been established in Boston for very long. The story of how A.A. got to that city actually began with Marty Mann, the first woman to get sober in A.A., who had been forced (by Harry Tiebout, the psychiatrist) to read one of the advanced multithed copies of the Big Book while she was being confined at Blythewood Sanitarium in Greenwich, Connecticut. The recent book by Sally and David Brown tells her story in detail. She resisted the program at first however, and did not go to her first A.A. meeting until April of 1939, the same month the Big Book actually came off the presses. The Boston connection arose because Marty subsequently brought a man named Paddy K. to Blythewood, and Paddy decided to start working the A.A. program, and then started the first A.A. group in Boston. And one of the first two Bostonians whom Paddy brought in was Jennie B., the first woman to get sober in that city, the daughter of a Back Bay family (see note 3). In spite of his snobbiness back in his drinking days, Rich had to respect a group which included people like Jennie.

The first regular A.A. meeting in Boston was begun in March 1941, only fourteen months before Rich came into the program. It is important to note that the first Boston A.A. meetings were held at the Jacoby Club at 115 Newbury Street. Early Boston A.A. was linked to the Jacoby Club in the same way that the earliest history of A.A. in Akron and New York was intertwined with the history of the Oxford Group. The Boston A.A. group obtained its own meeting place in June of that year, at 123 Newbury Street, but the same end of the block, and they kept up their connection with the Jacoby Club. Both groups were located only two blocks away from the Public Garden and Boston Common in the heart of downtown Boston, which meant that they were only two blocks away from Emmanuel Episcopal Church at 15 Newbury Street, where the Emmanuel Movement and the Jacoby Club had first begun. The A.A. group then moved four and a half blocks further west shortly before Rich came in, and had just started meeting at 306 Newbury Street. They had just made their final break with the Jacoby Club, but many of the comparative oldtimers at the first meetings Rich attended had come into the A.A. program when the Jacoby Club linkage was still intact (see note 4).

The Emmanuel Movement and the Jacoby Club were started in Boston in the first decade of the twentieth century, and had demonstrated a good deal more success than the Oxford Group in not only getting alcoholics sober but keeping them sober. In fact, in the 1940's, thoughtful students of alcoholism treatment would tell you that an alcoholic's best bet was to join either A.A. or the Jacoby Club, which both worked, because psychiatry only worked in two or three percent of the cases. The Jacoby Club believed that alcoholism could be treated only by combining real spirituality with techniques that dealt with psychological problems, using what they called moral suggestion techniques. They also realized that fellowship among recovering alcoholics was absolutely vital to success and made this the centerpiece of their program.

The teaching of Richmond Walker's Twenty-Four Hour book is really much closer to the spirit of the Emmanuel Movement and the Jacoby Club than it is to the spirit of the Oxford Group. Rich had tried the Oxford Group, and had not been able to obtain permanent, long-term sobriety there.

Renewal and the taste of heaven

Boston-style A.A. worked. When he walked into the A.A. clubroom on Newbury Street in May 1942, Rich was a man who had fallen into total hopelessness. What he found there was like a pool of fresh water to a man dying of thirst (Ld 19, 24H 4/29 and 4/04). He saw people who had gone through the same hell which he had, but had managed to recover. Working the program required a great faith, but it was not a blind faith. We could see a demonstration (an Emmet Fox term, see note 5), right before our very eyes, that this kind of faith actually worked (24H 4/22).

"People believe in A.A. when they see it work. An actual demonstration is what convinces them. What they read in books, what they hear people say, doesn't always convince them. But when they see a real honest-to-goodness change take place in a person, a change from a drunkard to a sober, useful citizen, that's something they can believe because they can see it." He saw people at his first meetings there in Boston who had genuinely changed (an Oxford Group term), and he had to admit to himself that whatever they were doing, it actually worked (April 25).

So Rich's life story turned from one of tragedy into a story of renewal. He had found new life. But a total personal transformation of that sort required real work on his part. As he says in the reading for January 18, we alcoholics have to re-educate our subconscious minds (an Emmanuel Movement and Jacoby Club idea).

"The new life can't be built in a day. We have to take the program slowly, a little at a time. Our subconscious minds have to be re-educated. We have to learn to think differently . . . Anyone who tries it, knows that the old alcoholic thinking is apt to come back on us when we least expect it."

How do we re-educate the subconscious? One way is to take a meditational book like Rich's and read from it every morning when we first get up. The Emmanuel Movement and the Jacoby Club had had great success with what they called the moral suggestion technique. Rich's method embodied richer and more sophisticated techniques for doing this. The subconscious mind is especially susceptible to impression at that point, and the effect will start building up over time, even if ten minutes after we read the passage, we seem to have forgotten all about what it was talking about. The subconscious will not have forgotten, not if it was a book like Rich's, which was especially designed to contain images and metaphors and ways of speaking which spoke directly to the subconscious. That is why early A.A.'s found his book to be the most powerful meditational work they had ever encountered.

The principles of this new way of life were eternal, heavenly principles (24H 1/10): "I pray that I may learn the principles of the good life. I pray that I may meditate upon them and work at them, because they are eternal." They are the taste of heaven itself. When we stay in the Now, and live by these eternal values, we ourselves are living in the eternal life of God. So Rich made the daring statement (24H 1/25):

"I do not look upon [God's promise of eternal life] as referring only to the after-life. I do not look upon this life as something to be struggled through, in order to get the rewards of the next life. I believe that the Kingdom of God is within us and we can enjoy "eternal life" here and now."

It was a biblical statement which Rich was citing -- Luke 17:21, "the kingdom of God is within you" -- but Rich carried it out to its full radical conclusion. He was teaching a realized eschatology as opposed to a future eschatology, to use the terminology which the Christian existentialist theologian Rudolf Bultmann was expounding at the University of Marburg over in Germany at that time. Or to use the terminology of the history of religions scholar Mircea Eliade, Rich was using language about the end time as a symbolic way of talking about how we could learn to cross through the barrier which separates ordinary profane space and time from the realm of sacred space and time at any time that we wished to (see note 6). The two realms actually coexist simultaneously. Where is heaven? Heaven can be right here and right now, if we are willing to grow enough spiritually to enter it.

The move to Florida

Rich helped in the formation of the A.A. intergroup in Boston, and at some point moved to Daytona Beach, Florida, where he also helped in the formation of the A.A. intergroup there (see note 7). He said that (24H 2/20â€"2/21) "my main business now is keeping sober. I make a living in business, but that's not my main business. It's secondary to the business of keeping sober." He became one of the great heroes within Florida A.A., which is why I am so pleased to have the opportunity to talk about him here in Fort Lauderdale.

Twenty-Four Hours a Day

Rich talked in his lead (Ld 24) about writing the Twenty-Four Hour book in 1948 (see note 8). It has a page for each day of the year, with each page divided into three sections. The large print section at the top is called the Thought for the Day: some of this material was adapted by him from a work he wrote earlier, called For Drunks Only, and he also included an extended selection of excerpts from the Big Book as part of the large-print section for one period of the year. The section in smaller print that followed was called the Meditation for the Day, and then at the very bottom of the page was a short Prayer for the Day.

God Calling by Two Listeners

For the small print sections at the bottom, Rich drew heavily on a book he had discovered, entitled God Calling by Two Listeners, which had been edited and published by A. J. Russell, one of the most famous Oxford Group authors (see note 9a). The book had a strange origin. One of the two women (whose names are unknown to this day) explained in an introduction how they were inspired to begin their spiritual exploration:

"In the autumn of 1932, I was sitting in the lounge of a hotel when a visitor, quite unknown, crossed over and handing me a copy of For Sinners Only asked if I had read it. I answered no, and she left it with me. On returning home, I bought a copy for myself. I was curiously affected by the book and . . . there came a persistent desire to try to see whether I could get guidance such as A. J. Russell reported, through sharing a quiet time with the friend with whom I was then living. She was a deeply spiritual woman with unwavering faith in the goodness of God and a devout believer in prayer, although her life had not been an easy one. I was rather skeptical, but, as she had agreed, we sat down with pencils and paper in hand and waited . . . To this day, I cannot obtain guidance in this way alone. But with my friend a very wonderful thing happened. From the first, beautiful messages were given to her by our Lord Himself, and every day from then these messages have never failed us . . .

"Certainly we were not in any way psychic or advanced in spiritual growth, but ordinary human beings who had more suffering and worry than the majority and who had known tragedy after tragedy. [And yet] always, and this daily, He insisted that we should be channels of love, joy, and laughter in His broken world . . .

"We, or rather I, found this command difficult to obey; to others it might have been simple. Were we to laugh, to cheer others, to be always joyful when our days were pain-racked and our nights tortured by chronic insomnia, when poverty and almost insupportable worry were our daily portion . . . ? Still came this insistent command to love and laugh and bring joy to the lives we contacted. Disheartened, one of us would gladly have ceased the struggle and passed on to another and happier life . . . [Yet] He encouraged us daily . . . Continually He exhorted us not to lose heart and spoke of the joy that the future held for us . . . He stressed, most strongly of all, the immense power given to two souls praying together in close union and at one in their desire to love and serve Him."

This was the kind of message that could actually speak to struggling, tormented alcoholics. Rich decided to take it and use it freely in the small print sections in each day's meditation in his own compilation. He had to shorten the work enormously, and eliminate references to calling on the name of Jesus or contemplating Christ on the cross. Instead of prayers to Jesus, he turned it all into prayers to God instead, which was very, very important in the A.A. context. He clarified passages that were difficult to understand, and often almost totally rewrote the material.

He also added copious material of his own which was vitally important, explaining what the concept of a higher power was really about, for the help of alcoholics who literally did not have the foggiest idea of what was actually meant by the word God (see note 9b).

Perhaps the best way of summing up what Rich actually did would be as follows: God Calling was a nice little work of early twentieth-century Protestant piety, replete with the sentiments of the popular hymns from that period, hymns like "I walk in the garden with Him, while the dew is still on the roses, and the voice I hear, whispering in my ear, the Son of God discloses." It was nice, but not exceptional. Rich remolded it, reshaped it, added copiously and cut away equally vigorously, and came out with what I would regard as one of the ten or fifteen true classics of spiritual literature -- a masterpiece, measured by the standards of the past three or four thousand years, and including both eastern and western spiritual writings.

Publishing the book

Rich finished putting the Twenty-Four Hour book together in 1948, and at first handled the printing and the distribution on his own. He did not place his name on the book in any way, merely putting at the very back the simple words "Compiled by a member of the Group at Daytona Beach, Fla." The book sold over 80,000 copies during the first ten years alone (Ld 24), which means that over 10,000 copies a year were eventually having to be packaged and shipped out year after year, just to keep up with the demand. It did not take long for Rich to become totally overwhelmed by the task. In 1953, he asked the New York A.A. office if they would take over this job, but his request was turned down. In their defense, New York was desperately short on money, staff, and space; they also already had their hands full with the Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions, which came out in April of that same year. They only just barely managed to cobble together a financial deal to get that vital book published. The next year, 1954, Patrick Butler at Hazelden offered to take over the mammoth job of printing and distributing Twenty-Four Hours a Day to keep the book available. Mel B. says that this was the publication that got Hazelden started as a major publisher of recovery materials (see note 10). As of 1994, nearly six and half million copies of Twenty-Four Hours a Day had been sold, and the little book is still doing fine today.

Rich's credo

Rich regarded himself as the teacher of an intelligent faith in the Great Intelligence behind the universe. In language partly similar to Emmet Fox's (see note 11), he says for June 21st that:

"Intelligent faith in that Power greater than ourselves can be counted on to stabilize our emotions. It has an incomparable capacity to help us look at life in balanced perspective. We look up, around and away from ourselves and we see that nine out of ten things which at the moment upset us will shortly disappear. Problems solve themselves, criticism and unkindness vanish as though they had never been."

God was, he said in the language of the Platonic philosophers, "the Great Intelligence behind the universe," which meant that we do not have to sacrifice our own minds and intellects in order to talk about God. But God, as any good Platonist knows, is infinite and eternal, which means that to approach him, we must rely on faith and intuition and feeling and vision, not the language of the scientists. Ultimately, we can only be saved by faith alone.

When Rich gave his lead at Rutland, Vermont, in 1958, he was around sixty-six years old and knew that his days were fundamentally numbered, so he talked about not only life but also death, in deeply moving fashion. Death was returning to God, and that was where faith alone could carry us across the great divide which separates our world of space and time from the realm of the eternal ideas and the infinite reality which lies beyond all else (Ld 26, see note 12):

"Above all, my faith in the Great Intelligence behind the universe, which can give me all the strength I need to face whatever life has to offer, is the foundation of my present life. When I die, my body will return to dust. Heaven is not any particular place in the sky, but my intelligence or soul, if it is in the proper condition, will return to the Great Intelligence behind the universe and will blend with that Great Intelligence and be at home again whence it came. My problem, in what is left of my life, is to keep my mind or intelligence in the proper condition -- by living with honesty, purity, unselfishness, love, and service -- so that when my time comes to go, my passing to a greater sphere of mind will be gentle and easy."

Notice that in that last sentence, he refers to the four central Oxford Group virtues: Honesty ("Is it true or is it false?"), Purity ("Is it right or is it wrong?"), Unselfishness ("How will this affect the other fellow?"), and Love ("Is it ugly or is it beautiful?"). But

Based on the researches of David and other Florida A.A.'s whom I have talked to, it appears that Rich was probably for many years what the Florida people call a "snow bird": he would go back to New England for the hotter months and keep up his links with friends and family there -- which is presumably why he was able to give his lead at the A.A. meeting in Vermont in 1958 without having to travel too far -- but then he would return to Daytona Beach for the colder months. But it is clear that, by the time the Twenty-Four Hour book was published, he had come to regard Florida as his real home.

In the Twenty-Four Hour book, Rich said that (2/20â€"2/21) "my main business now is keeping sober. I make a living in business, but that's not my main business. It's secondary to the business of keeping sober." David W. says that, on the basis of his research, by the end of his life Rich had gotten an inheritance from his brother, and was basically living during his retirement years on the investment proceeds from those funds.

The "second book"

I cannot help but think that reading Rich's little black book as their "second book," surpassed in importance only by the Big Book itself (which was of course the all-determining and foundational source), was one of the things that helped A.A. to grow and prosper so much during its greatest growth years. It is clear that, back in those days, people could form a good A.A. group simply by getting a copy of the Big Book and doing what it said, even if they had no personal contact with anyone already in the program from elsewhere. But it seems to me that the people who also read the little black book formed even better A.A. groups. It told you how to keep the fellowship strong and healthy, and inspired you to commit yourself even more deeply to A.A. service work. It reminded you over and over that loyalty to your group, and to A.A. itself, was one of the primary virtues, and would give you life abundant. The members who were the most dedicated also frequently carried the little black book with them instead of the Big Book, for instant help in times of spiritual crisis -- that was one of the other things they found it especially useful for.

I think it is significant to note how early A.A. in Indiana and Michigan treated three different groups of material. You had to have a copy of the Big Book: you read from it and quoted from it at meetings, and used it to define the essential principles of the program. Rich's little black book was the only book not coming out of New York which was universally acknowledged by the early tradition as appropriate to read from at official A.A. meetings, and to quote from freely when speaking at meetings -- but it was not the "defining" book on matters concerning essential program principles. That was the all-important distinction. Many early A.A.'s in the United States and Canada also read Ralph Pfau, the third most published early A.A. author, who had produced his little Golden Books under the pseudonym of "Father John Doe" to preserve his anonymity and maintain the spirit of the Twelve Traditions. But in Indiana at least, when small groups would meet in someone's home to read and study the Golden Books, or to listen to phonograph records of Father Ralph speaking, they felt that it was not appropriate to call these little groups "A.A. meetings" in the official sense. And the Golden Books were certainly never regarded as "defining" statements of official program principles. So there were three levels of importance, and three different kinds of ways that A.A. people could use wise and healthy spiritual literature. Richmond Walker's Twenty-Four Hours a Day was the major work at the level of the second tier of importance.

One human soul touching another

David W. says that when Rich first began writing the material which shows up in the small print sections at the bottoms of the pages, he never intended to publish a book. He prepared these little meditations simply for himself, and carried them around on little cards. Other people at the A.A. meetings in Daytona Beach saw some of these, and were so impressed by the depth and profundity of what they said, that they finally talked him into putting them together into a book, so other people could use them too.

I think this is one of the things which gives the small print sections in the Twenty-Four Hour book so much power: they were not written by someone "preaching at" us, and trying to tell other people what the author wanted them to believe. They are simply the very private and very personal jottings of a person of extraordinary spiritual depth, reaching out simply for himself, to try to touch God and feel his presence and open himself up to the workings of God's healing and empowering grace. When he finally agreed to publish these little private prose poems and personal exercises in guided imagery, he opened up his own soul to us. He does not "teach at" us, but invites us to accompany him on his own spiritual journey, as a soul-mate and a trusted friend. When we open up the little book to read the selection for the day, what Rich is really saying to us is, "This is what I see and hear and feel and touch when I pray and meditate and try to draw closer to the living presence of the Great Intelligence behind the universe. What do you yourself see and hear and feel and touch?" He says to us, "This is what I learned when I thought about these particular images and principles, which helped me to grow spiritually. What have you learned about this part of the spiritual life by this point in your spiritual journey and how do you plan, on the basis of that new insight into these universal spiritual thoughts, to start living and acting a little differently today?"

Along with Bill W. and the other good old-timers, Rich is saying to everyone who reads his little volume the same essential words which conclude the first major section of the Big Book (page 164 in the 3rd edition):

"Abandon yourself to God as you understand God. Admit your faults to Him and to your fellows. Clear away the wreckage of your past. Give freely of what you find and join us. We shall be with you in the Fellowship of the Spirit, and you will surely meet some of us as you trudge the Road of Happy Destiny.

"May God bless you and keep you -- until then."

*****

NOTES

*****

24H = Richmond Walker, Twenty-Four Hours a Day, Compiled by a member of the Group at Daytona Beach, Fla. (Center City MN: Hazelden Foundation, 1975 [orig. pub. 1948, 1st Hazelden edit. 1954]).

Ld = Richmond Walker, lead given at an A.A. meeting in Rutland, Vermont, in 1958, paragraph number in the text as given in the Northern Indiana Archival Bulletin 4 (No. 1, 2001): 14. See the foreword to the 40th Anniversary Edition of Twenty-Four Hours a Day for the date and location where Rich gave this talk.

1. Mel B. (Toledo, Ohio), special foreword to the 40th Anniversary Edition of Twenty-Four Hours a Day (Center City MN: Hazelden Foundation, 1994).

2. Ibid.

3. Pass It On: The Story of Bill Wilson and How the A.A. Message Reached the World (New York: Alcoholics Anonymous World Services, 1984), pp. 203, 210-13, 257-8.

4. See Richard M. Dubiel, The Road to Fellowship: The Role of the Emmanuel Movement and the Jacoby Club in the Development of Alcoholics Anonymous, Hindsfoot Foundation Series on the History of Alcoholism Treatment (forthcoming, Fall 2003).

5. See Emmet Fox, The Sermon on the Mount.

6. This is actually the Platonic concept of participation. As the twentieth-century theologian Paul Tillich has pointed out in his writings on religious symbolism, the material thing which is the shadow or symbol (the "icon" or holy image in the Greek) does not just point toward something else from the outside (like a signpost beside the road which points the way to the Grand Canyon), but participates in that higher reality to which it leads our minds.

7. Foreword (p. iii) to the edition of Twenty-Four Hours a Day printed to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Hazelden Foundation (no actual date given). This version is a reprinting otherwise of the original 1954 Hazelden edition.

8. Richmond Walker, The 7 Points of Alcoholics Anonymous, rev. ed. (Center City MN: Hazelden/Glen Abbey Books, 1989).

9a. God Calling, by Two Listeners, re-edited by Bernard Koerselman (Uhrichsville OH: Barbour and Company, 1993). One of the two women had what scholars of comparative religion call the gift of ecstatic prophecy (compare the way Mohammed received the verses of the Koran): caught up in a trance, she would deliver the meditations verbatim, while the other woman wrote down the words with a pencil on a piece of paper. But there were also similarities to a phenomenon which the early twentieth century called automatic writing.

9b. An account is given of some of the other major motifs in Rich's spiritual teachings in Glenn F. Chesnut, The Higher Power of the Twelve-Step Program: For Believers & Non-Believers, Hindsfoot Foundation (San Jose: Authors Choice/iUniverse, 2001), Chapter 5, "Two Classical Authors of A.A. Spirituality," pp. 115-129, and also pp. 81-82 and p. 213 n. 10: maintaining soul-balance, finding inner calm, the prayer without words (a contemplative technique similar to the Hindu discipline called transcendental meditation, but using guided imagery and a Zen-like contemplation of nature instead), faith (trust, courage, and a willingness to commit, based on intuition and feeling, coupled with pragmatic experience), becoming one of the Friends of God, and guidance.

10. Mel B., foreword to the 40th Anniversary Edition of Twenty-Four Hours a Day.

11. Compare Emmet Fox's Golden Key (described in Chesnut, The Higher Power of the Twelve-Step Program, pp. 91-96).

12. In Cleveland A.A., it is actually the Four Questions which accompany the Four Absolutes which are at the center of the spiritual path. This helps to avoid the flavor of "absolutism" which made Bill W. apprehensive about that way of speaking about the spiritual life. The kind of absolutism which Bill W. wanted to avoid was the sort of moralistic, Pharisaic rigidity which will either lead us astray into hypocrisy and arrogance and boasting, or commit us to the kind of ruthless perfectionism which leads ultimately to despair. See Bill W.'s letter to McGhee B., 30 October 1940, as quoted in Ernest Kurtz, Not-God: A History of Alcoholics Anonymous, p. 51:

"The principles of honesty, purity, unselfishness and love are as much a goal of A.A. members and are as much practiced by them as by any other group of people, yet we found that when the word absolute was put in front of these attributes, they either turned people away by the hundreds or gave a temporary spiritual inflation resulting in collapse. The average alcoholic just couldn't stand the pace and got nowhere."

See Chesnut, The Higher Power of the Twelve-Step Program, pp. 58-59, and also 129-133 (discussing the way Father John Doe makes the same point in his Golden Books), on pathological perfectionism as a great spiritual danger, and also as one of the frequent major contributing sources of chronic depression.

In Cleveland A.A. however, it was the Four Questions which were emphasized in actual practice. We are instructed to remind ourselves every morning to go through the day asking the following simple questions before speaking or acting: "Is it true or is it false?" (Honesty), "Is it right or is it wrong?" (Purity), "How will this affect the other fellow?" (Unselfishness), and "Is it ugly or is it beautiful?" (Love). Almost anyone who is dedicated to living the spiritual life could benefit from the exercise of reading these four questions every morning for a month, and trying to live by them throughout the day for every day of that month. See the little pamphlet which the Cleveland A.A. intergroup still publishes on the Four Absolutes.

Richmond Walker, following Bill W.'s suggestions, omits the dangerous word "absolutes," but does weave an emphasis upon those four great virtues throughout the pages of his little book. So it is clear that his two and a half years in the Oxford Group did have a lasting influence on his ideas. But he learned from his contact with the Jacoby Club too, and added that fifth vital item, the virtue of Service, as of co-equal importance. The continual emphasis in his meditational book on doing A.A. service work and above all on maintaining the fellowship (a Jacoby Club theme), is one of the most important continuing themes in his book. It helped make A.A. vital and strong back during that period of its history.

---

Get more from the Web. FREE MSN Explorer download :
<http://explorer.msn.com>

program to prospective members. Newspaper articles in both local papers carried these announcements. In addition Chattanooga A.A.s have made talks on alcoholism to the Pastors Association, at a dinner meeting at the First Christian church and at an open meeting at Head House where they appeared with prominent visiting speakers. Some members of the Chattanooga Group met with Rome, Ga. members at Lafayette, Ga., recently to help start a group in the latter town. City authorities lent the courtroom of the city hall and promised cooperation. Chattanooga members and their wives have a Dutch treat dinner at a restaurant or hotel the first Saturday night in each month.

Miami Activities "Growing -- After admitting "it is possible that no other group has remained dormant as long as Miami (six years)," a correspondent reports considerable activity. The delayed growth is reported as "probably due to failure to recognize the importance of the new member -- the consequences being that our turnover has been tremendous." However, four neighborhood groups as well as the downtown group are now operating under an inter-group steering committee made up from a representative of each group. This provides Greater Miami with three open and three closed meetings a week as well as a women's auxiliary club. A hospitalization fund set up to underwrite the expenses of new members has been operating two months with 23 patients receiving benefits; all are meeting their obligations. Along with the expansion has come 'The Anona News', a mimeographed publication.

Michigan Visitors Invited -- The Clare-Mt. Pleasant Central Michigan Group extends an invitation to A.A.s vacationing in Michigan to attend meetings at Clare every Wednesday night and at Mt. Pleasant every Thursday evening at 8:30 at St. John's Parish house, corner Locust and Washington. Further information may be obtained from Box 121, Mt. Pleasant or Box 28, Clare. This group was formed a little over a year ago with four members and now has over 20.

School Class Studies A.A. -- Recently the secretary of the newly formed Neosho, Mo., Group received a letter from a high school student at Grandby who said that his high school health class had been studying A.A. via magazines and requested literature and information on how A.A. is run, its financial backing and other features. The new secretary wrote in part, "the health point of view on A. A. is a hard one to grasp. We are not doctors nor scientists. We are amateurs, 40,000 strong, who have pooled our information, and who have many times been the guinea pigs for experiments which determined eventually what makes an alcoholic. The conclusions are simply this: Alcoholism is an incurable disease. Any alcoholic can arrest the ill effects and bodily ailments caused by drinking if he abstains. He can never drink normally, and perhaps never completely rid himself of the desire to drink. Alcoholism is the sixth greatest health menace in the United States, and those afflicted should be treated as people who are very ill. To finance our efforts we, as members, voluntarily take care of the expense we go to in order to help other alcoholics. There is, of course, a central office, and it is also kept solvent by voluntary contributions, the sale of the A.A. book and other literature. Should you need further explanation you should write to P.O. Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York. Maybe this will make you the top man in your health class."

California Suggestions -- No charge for ideas is made by the Central Group of Los Angeles, Calif., which has recently passed along a couple. When one member died recently a few others decided instead of buying flowers in his memory to donate four A.A. books to the Public Library. Each book has a suitable inscription on the flyleaf and a copy of the meeting directory pasted in the back. Members feel the volumes will help carry on the work the former member loved so well. Another idea from Central which has worked well is having a meeting conducted by a woman A.A. with all women speakers once every six weeks.

Working With Veterans -- "Consider Perry Point" is the conclusion of the Baltimore, Md., Central Group after experiences at the U.S. Veterans' Hospital for the mentally ill about 40 miles from Baltimore. Although Baltimore A.A.s do not believe that they are alone in sponsoring this sort of program, they hope that others will be interested in the results of their work with patients and personnel. They estimate that about a third of the patients at Perry Point and in other veterans' hospitals are alcoholic. Two A.A.s who joined the Baltimore Group after being released from Perry Point decided to visit friends made while they were patients. These became bi-monthly visits and arrangements were made to hold regular meetings. At first some members of the staff were uncertain as to reaction of the patients but after a few sessions they not only sanctioned the meetings but urgently requested that they be continued, and one enthusiastic doctor considers the meetings part of patients' treatment although they are not required to attend. Meeting attendance has grown from about ten a year ago to around 50 and is continuing to expand. Many who have been discharged from the hospital have joined A.A. groups in their respective localities. Baltimore A.A.s have found that four speakers each limited to 12 minutes, with a few remarks by the physician in charge, makes up a good hour's program. They also believe the spiritual angle should be brought into the meetings, but should be handled cautiously at first as most of the patients are transients and their reactions should be studied carefully. Women speakers have proved useful in showing that drinking is not a male problem alone.

New Papers Received -- 'The Sahara' is the name of a new publication from Birmingham, Ala., with an illustrated front cover, and a full explanation of A.A. in its first issue. In addition to articles the 10 pages carry a considerable amount of news. Although listed as the eighth issue the May 25th 'Alky Argot' of Wisconsin State Prison at Waupun, Wis., is the first issue received by 'The A.A. Grapevine'. Consisting of eight mimeographed pages it contains articles, news and humor.

Tulsa Reports "Happy Group" -- When about 200 A.A.s with an additional 100 relatives and visitors celebrated the third anniversary of the Tulsa, Okla., Group recently the general opinion was that "disagreements are few and bickerings aren't allowed to occur." Tangible evidence of the spirit is shown in such items as rent paid in advance for a year, $6,000 worth of furniture and equipment and $1,000 in the treasury. A.A. came to Tulsa in 1944 when a young business man got a copy of the book and as he had graduated from several institutions from Texas to New York, began attending meetings in Oklahoma City, 125 miles away, twice a week. Then came a luncheon meeting in Tulsa with visiting A.A.s and two other prospects including the chief of police. Small office meetings, then a meeting with Oklahoma City Group members in a union hall and the group was really launched. Meeting in various homes, with wives aiding in serving luncheons, the group has continued to expand, graduating to larger meeting places, aided by newspaper and radio publicity. By 1945 when the group numbered about 40, a hall was secured and reconditioned as a clubroom which was formally opened with visitors from Kansas City, Dallas, Houston and other cities. Our correspondent writes, "Almost every conceivable business, profession and trade is represented. About 25 percent of our members have never had a slip and probably another 50 percent have sailed a straight course after getting their bearings. We have about 20 women members and some 10 or 12 husbands and wives, both alcoholics. We have classes for new members, membership meetings and open houses. We employ a full-time secretary and clubroom manager and are open 10 or more hours every day. Come out and see us sometime."

R.I.C.E.A. Incorporated -- Recently incorporated as The Rhode Island Committee for Education on Alcoholism, a group of the state's citizens, including representatives of the Round Top Group of Providence has laid the foundation for a campaign to "increase public understanding of alcoholism, its nature and its treatment." The unit will be affiliated with the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism. An executive committee has been named and sub-committees are to be chosen.

Neighboring Groups get Together -- Members of the Atlanta, Ga., Group held joint meetings with three other Georgia Groups in Griffin, LaGrange and Thomaston recently with from 20 to 30 of the Atlanta Group making each trip. In Griffin and Thomaston the meetings were held in homes of members and in LaGrange at the First Methodist church, whose pastor, Rev. Charles S. Forester, attended the Yale Clinic seminar last summer. The groups in Griffin and Thomaston were both formed recently and being only about 30 miles apart, plan to alternate attendance at each other's meetings. An Intergroup Hudson Valley meeting at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., heard speakers from eight Hudson Valley towns, Kingston, Newburgh, Middletown, Liberty, Peekskill, Ossining, Hudson and Poughkeepsie. The March of Time movie "Problem Drinkers" was shown to the attendance of over 150. Poughkeepsie speakers later went to Liberty to conduct a meeting.

Tells of "Patron Saint" -- A talk on the life of Malt Talbot, an alcoholic who stayed dry through prayer for 40 years until his death in 1925 was given by the Rev. Fr. James McCloskey of St. Mary's R.C. Church, Plainfield, N. J., to the group there recently. From the story the speaker termed Talbot the "patron saint" of A.A.

and

said his own work with heavy drinkers of all creeds has been made much more successful since he himself has been reading and studying the A.A. program.

Many Attend Open Meetings -- Orange County and Harbor Groups sponsored a huge

joint meeting in the New Masonic Temple, Long Beach, Calif., recently with the six Orange County Groups, three Long Beach Groups, San Pedro, Wilmington, Signal Hill and

Downey

joining together. Special invitations were accepted by many clergymen, doctors, welfare and civic officials, police and juvenile officers and others interested

in the problems of alcohol in their communities. Reservations for the 750 seats

in

the hall were made with standing room for others. A university professor was the principal speaker with others giving typical A.A. talks. The Ottawa, Can.,

Group

was

host to members and friends at an open meeting at the Justice Building Annex with three members of the group speaking and one giving the story of A.A. and the Ottawa

Group, while others told of the advantages of A.A. and ways to combat alcoholism.

Several clergymen were among the 100 attending, this being the first meeting to

which they were invited. Visitors were present from many places including Hull, Quebec, Arnprior, Ont., Renfrew, Ont., and Smith Falls, Ont. Recently there were visitors from Vancouver, B.C. and from the Beacon Hill Group of Victoria, B.C., both of whom spoke.

Seventh Anniversary in Baltimore -- About 250 members and guests attended the seventh annual dinner of Baltimore, Md., A.A. in the grand ballroom of the Lord

Baltimore Hotel. Non-A.A. speakers and guests included the Rev. Thomas Guthrie of Brown Memorial church, Dr. Edward Kerman, T. J. S. Waxter, director of public welfare of Baltimore, Warden Price of the state penitentiary, Lonnie Staar of

Speers

Station

WFBR, Dr. John Krantz, head of the University of Maryland School of Pharmacology, Dr.

John Evans, Dr. Hood, superintendent of Perry Point Veterans' Hospital and Dr.

Ayd,

psychiatrist of the same hospital and specialist on alcoholism. Guests were present from Philadelphia, Washington, Wilmington, Hanover, Los Angeles, New York, Richmond, Alexandria and other cities.

Convention Marks Fourth Year -- the Richmond, Va., Group celebrated its fourth anniversary by holding a two-day regional A.A. convention. At the first day banquet speakers from Fayetteville, N. C. and from Arlington, Va., were heard by approximately 300 A.A.s and wives from Virginia, North Carolina, Washington and Baltimore. The Richmond Group has redecorated its club quarters at 203 North Jefferson Street. Open meetings are held every Friday at 8:30 and Sunday at 4:30.

WLEE, Richmond radio station, recently completed a six-months weekly A.A. rebroadcast of programs originating in Detroit. State officials and judges attended the Richmond banquet. Governor W. M. Tuck sent an official representative while state officials present included Hunter Miller, incoming chairman of the state alcoholic beverage control board and Dr. Joseph E. Barrett, state commissioner of mental hygiene and hospitals.

Memphis and Madison Celebrate -- In anticipation of the third anniversary of A.A. in Memphis, Tenn., 400 attended an open meeting held at the Hotel Chisca. Among other activities in Memphis is the redecoration of the club room with a brighter and pleasanter effect although Clubroom Director Bess W is reported to have lost 10 pounds in the process. Called the first annual dinner, since it is planned

to make it a yearly affair, The get-together of the Badger Group in Madison, Wis., was attended by about 120 members and guests. Speakers came from the Minneapolis and Chicago
Groups. Founded in December, 1946, the Badger Group numbered 37 members after five months, and is the second in Madison.

Skid Row Feels A.A. Impact -- A San Francisco newspaper article begins "Down along San Francisco's Skid Row, for a little army of approximately 300 persons who were bums once and are men again, the talking mice don't climb out of the necks
of bottles any more." Then the article goes on to tell of the transformation of their lives
when on January 20 the big sun-flooded club at 235 Minna Street was opened. A one-time Catholic shelter, it became Unit Fourteen of A.A. in San Francisco. By way
of creating atmosphere a big American flag and a picture of firm-chinned Admiral Halsey were tacked up to encourage the fighting spirit. The article goes on to tell
of
the brave struggles made by many who are finding a way out and concludes:
"Medicine
and the clergy have tried for years to cure these people and failed. Now, with something in their own souls, they are curing themselves. Some day, brother, there won't be any Skid Row."

Report Growing Pleasures -- On July 3 the Delray Beach, Fla., Group passes
the six-months mark with a growth from the original three founders to at least 16
members and several prospects. Still meeting in homes, they hope to have a permanent place

before winter when many visitors from the North are expected. The group pays tribute to the Palm Beach County Group for assistance as well as to the one in Ft. Lauderdale while a visit by Dr. Bob, co-founder of A.A., encouraged the members. Although the Fairmont, W. Va., Group is only about seven months old it has already sponsored a district banquet with more than 40 present. There were guests from six neighboring groups present. Plans are being made to make this a quarterly affair with different group as hosts. The Fairmont Group was started by a woman. During the first five months, attendance at the new group meetings in Hollywood, Fla., have grown 50 percent. Much of this success is credited to support from Ft. Lauderdale and Miami Groups while a local pastor has been very cooperative and has spoken at meetings. Many visiting A.A.s from all over the United States have given talks and all others are urged to drop in Monday evenings at St. John's Lutheran church, 1746 Buchanan St.

Church Cooperates -- At its 119th annual convention the Episcopal diocese of Kentucky adopted a plan to provide psychiatric treatment for alcoholics in cooperation with A.A. The new wing being constructed at Norton Memorial Infirmary, the diocesan hospital, will be given over to the program. In connection with such activities the Rev. Canon Sydney B. Peters of Bay Shore, L. I., N. Y., who has been active in cooperation with A.A. calls attention to E. M. Jellinek's 'Recent Trends in Alcoholism' which says on Page 38, concerning admissions to mental hospitals, "While first admissions for alcoholic psychoses to veterans' hospitals show a small decrease after 1940 with a sharp upturn in 1943, first admissions for alcoholism without psychosis show a sharp decline after 1940, and this continued even in 1943

or
became even more pronounced in that year. The years 1942 and 1943 were the last years
of the first substantial increase in the membership of Alcoholics Anonymous and it
is suggested that the quite considerable drop in first admissions for alcoholism
without psychosis to veterans' hospitals may reflect absorption of this part of the alcoholic population into groups of A.A."

Tyler Hears About A.A. -- The alcohol problem in Tyler, Tex., was brought realistically before the public at a meeting conducted by the local unit of
A.A.
Principal speakers were a prominent Dallas business man and a Shreveport newspaper man. It was stressed throughout that members are not reformers. The Tyler unit
has listed P.O. Box 1074, for those desiring confidential information or a call by a member of A.A.

New Groups Report -- "Another group in Iowa, Storm Lake organized Tuesday night
with six members. Spencer and Pocahontas Groups aided. How can the Storm Lakers lose?
Their post office box number is 711," says a telegram to 'The A.A.
Grapevine',
from Spencer, Ia. Since its start in March the Centralia, Ill., Group feels that it
is being helpful in the community and the members are acquiring experience
which will help them to become even more so. Members of Decatur and East St. Louis, Ill.,
and
St. Louis, Mo., Groups are given credit for assisting and encouraging.
Members
meet in homes on Mondays and Thursdays with an attendance of up to 15 members. A highly

favorable newspaper article recently revealed that A.A. has been operating in the Tenth Ward in Rochester, N.Y. with Room 7, Riviera Theatre Building on Lake Avenue as the meeting place every night except Saturday and Sunday at 8:30. Newest group listing reported by the Central Office, Oakland, Calif., is that of District No. 7.

Mortgage Burned -- The board of trustees of Alanon Association, Inc., club unit for Newark, N. J., A.A.s, paid off in full the second mortgage on the clubhouse amounting to $2,550 and the occasion was celebrated by a "mortgage burning" and big party.

Cooperation Helps -- The Ossining, N.Y. Group, started early in April, is growing steadily, thanks to the cooperation of Westchester and Connecticut Groups and local newspaper support. Nearly 100 were present at the first meeting. White Plains took over the second meeting, the third was a home meeting and the fourth found many Yonkers members present while Stamford followed and a closed meeting preceded the Ossining Group's first out-of-town invitation to lead a meeting at Yonkers. The membership roll now totals more than 20.

Deland Runs Ad -- Started with nine members the Deland, Fla., Group had 16 on the roll at the end of five weeks although the town has only 6,000 population. Importance of 12th Step work and quality of sobriety are being stressed. The group has donated the book to the County Stockage and plans to visit there every two weeks. A permanent ad is run in the local paper. A young ministerial student appeared before all local civic groups explaining A.A. The telephone number is 164M and the post office box is 1364. The group hopes to have permanent quarters soon.

Still We Spread -- The Calcasieu Parish Group of A. A. with membership from Lake Charles, Sulphur and Maplewood, La., has been formed with other towns nearby listed as Vinton, De Ridder, De Quincy, Kinder and Jennings. Meetings are at the Charleston Hotel in take Charles, Room 201 at 7:30 on Thursday. The phone number is Lake Charles 4287 and the post office box 2584, Maplewood. Members of the Alconon Group of Ft. Wayne, Ind., who number about 30 and who have been meeting at the Y.M.C.A, on Wednesday evenings and Sunday afternoons, have announced the organization of a group of five of their former members at Van Wert, Ohio, 35 miles away. Another happy and active group is reported at Bellingham, Wash., where four members got together in January, and at the time of reporting had at least a dozen on the active list. They, too, have had calls from Everett and other nearby groups. A new group called Riverside recently held its first meeting at Blessed Sacrament School, 147 West 70th Street, New York, N. Y.

"Tramps" Do Some Traveling -- A double claim to the title of "Tramp Group" is made by our correspondent at Vacaville, Calif., who says his organization uses the name because the members are so widely dispersed and because they meet in different localities. Seven towns are represented from three counties with some driving 70 miles to attend and with an average of 30 miles traveled to meetings -- and there is little absenteeism. Originally the charter members belonged to a group in Sacramento, none of them living there. Finally a few organized a group in Woodland and begun to obtain recruits from neighboring towns so that the group now numbers 27 with about three new members a month being added. Wives travel to the meetings with husbands to enjoy the social hour. Meetings follow the usual plan except there is no "Beginners' Class," some going to Sacramento for that part of the program. The group varies widely in age and has three women members. Present growth may force formation of a new group soon although members feel it might be like breaking up a family. Members often attend meetings in San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley, Sacramento and Stockton.

First Open Meeting -- The Staunton-Waynesboro, Va. Group held its first public meeting in the Veterans' Home at Staunton recently with an attendance of about 100. Guest speakers, six in all, were from Lynchburg and Richmond and all of them emphasized A.A. beliefs and principles. This was the first public meeting although the unit was organized several years ago.

Glances at Groups -- 'The Rope Yarn', publication of the A.A. Seamen's Club, New York, N.Y., is now appearing in pamphlet form with attractive illustrated cover. Squad One of Washington, D.C. has returned its meetings to Force School, 1740 Massachusetts Avenue N. W. on Monday nights at 8:30. The Pinehurst, N.C. 'Outlook' carried a glowing account of a public meeting and dinner given by the Southern Pines Group under the feature "Pinehurst Scoreboard" recently. Kent-Ravenna and Aurora, Ohio, Groups held a joint meeting at Aurora recently with the 8005 Lorain Avenue Group of Cleveland coming by bus, accompanied by two clergymen. Attendance was

"He's helped hundreds and hundreds of people," said Edwin Train Caldwell, a San Francisco attorney who knew him.

"He's saved countless lives, and this agency more than once," said Michael Sullivan, executive director of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, a charitable organization that Mr. Brennan greatly admired.

The society named its public service award for Mr. Brennan, someone they called "the indispensable volunteer."

Mr. Brennan's own story sounds like one of those old adventure novels merchant seamen used to read. Born in Syracuse, N.Y., and raised in an orphanage, he went to sea in the merchant marine and wound up in San Francisco in 1934, just in time for the big waterfront strike of that year.

In polite company, he was described as a "union activist" but in fact, he beat up people like strikebreakers and their sympathizers.

He was in the Navy in World War II and saw action in the Pacific. He was also a boxer in the Navy and though he earned battle ribbons and commendations, he also spent time in the brig, often as the result of alcohol-fueled fights.

In the winter of 1946, he hit bottom. Just out of the service and working on San Francisco's waterfront, he had turned into a falling-down drunk. He was sick, his weight had dropped from 192 pounds to 128 and he was arrested for manslaughter.

His lawyer steered him to a recovery program and probably saved his life. Mr. Brennan was fond of saying he hadn't had a drink since Jan. 4, 1946.

He then embarked on his life's work, which was to help individuals recover from addictions, particularly alcoholism.

Mr. Brennan never forgot how tough it was to quit drinking. "He never gave up on anybody," said Caldwell. Mr. Brennan went to at least one Alcoholics Anonymous meeting every day. "For me, it's still one day at a time," he said.

He was a familiar sight on the old waterfront and later in the Tenderloin. He had the face of a boxer and the rolling gait of a

Grapevine, Aug 1947

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

Prison Group Gets Hope -- From the Attica, N. Y. State Prison an A.A. member writes as follows: "A new venture has come to Attica Prison; its members -- inmates whose shortening of their days of liberty to a great extent can be placed on alcohol and who seek recovery; its object -- to prove to these same men that A.A. knows them. The standards are high but there are specific steps to remedy the terrible situation of the prison alcoholic. Thanks to the warden, Dr. Waller H. Martin, various members of A.A. visit each Thursday for an hour with the men, who now number 20, a nucleus expected to increase. Thus far 14 meetings have been held. The hopes of the Attica Prison Group lie today with the methods of A.A. We are helpless without them. The observer can be certain of one thing. A.A. is here to stay. Appreciation for these A.A.s who spend their valuable time with walled-in alcoholics is very great. May this group, who are attempting to lead prison alcoholics away from alcoholism, see their efforts rewarded."

Memorial Day Celebration -- What may become an annual affair was the observance of Memorial Day by the A.A. Groups of Washington, D.C., at the last open meeting before that date. Colonel F. G., one of the first members in Washington, a veteran of World War I who also saw service with the U.S.A.A.F. in the C.B.I., spoke in memory of deceased members of the group and in particular of two who served in the late war,

Lt. Col. H. C. and J. H. M., founder of the Washington Group. On Memorial Day
members of A.A. placed a wreath on the grave of the former in Rock Creek Cemetery while
a second group went to West River, Anne Arundel County, Md., and left a wreath
on
the grave of the second in the Christ Church graveyard.

Public Asks Information -- People in the vicinity of Kansas City, Mo., are becoming more interested in the problem of alcoholism and in the help A.A. offers, judging from the fact that there have been more than 20 requests for speakers answered
by the public relations committee during the last eight months. Most of the requests
have come from churches but there have also been calls from business men's clubs, women's organizations and one from the Mental Hygiene Association whose membership includes the medical profession and municipal welfare officials.

Proud Parent -- The Spencer, Ia., Group is proud of the fact that while the
group itself is less than a year old it is the parent of two other flourishing
groups
in the area. Late in May a group of Spencer A.A.s went to Storm Lake and helped get six members started. That group now numbers 11. In June the Spencer representatives went to Estherville and helped about 10 get going. In spite of the losses to the new groups, Spencer still has about 25 to 30 active members. A group in Emmetsburg is the next step in a campaign to establish a group in every county seat in Northwest
Iowa.

Years Add Growth -- About a year ago the South Bronx, N.Y., Group started with 16 members. At the June celebration of the first anniversary in St. Jerome's School there was an overflow crowd of more than 600! An eight-year member from Manhattan and a five-year member from South Orange, N. J., were the speakers while groups from Metropolitan New York, Westchester County, and Connecticut were represented. Dr. W. D. Silkworth was also a guest. After the meeting there was cabaret style entertainment, dancing and entertainment by several Broadway favorites, and by a group from the Alanon Club of Newark, N. J. The Rev. Fr. Clement J. Rieger of St. Jerome's praised the organization's work and said it was the "talk of the neighborhood" ...Six oldtimers were on the platform when the Kearny, N. J. Group celebrated its fourth anniversary recently. The spirit of A.A. embodied in the talks gave an insight into the strength of purpose and the fortitude making A.A.'s earlier members successful, according to those attending...In Jamestown, N. Y. the anniversary celebration was at the Hotel Jamestown where more than 250 heard speakers from New York and Cleveland. Speakers praised the Jamestown General Hospital for its cooperation as well as the local press and radio... On July 25 and 26 the Deep East Texas Group celebrated the second anniversary of its existence with several entertainment features including a barbecue at a lake near Nacogdoches. The public was invited to an open meeting at the high school auditorium .. The Pocahontas, Ia., Group held its anniversary dinner with Dubuque and Des Moines men as speakers.

Patients Make Good Record -- A.A. groups have been started in the Montana State Hospital at Warm Springs and the State Prison at Deer Lodge with gratifying results.

Of approximately 15 patients released from the hospital only one so far has been known to slip, while many others are active in groups in their home towns, and at least two groups are being formed in Montana by former patients who joined A.A. while at the hospital. Members of the Butte, Montana, Group have attended all the Saturday meetings since the group was founded, and members have also attended from the capital city, Helena.

Holiday Meetings Suggested -- Since holidays were the days when alcoholics formerly looked forward to drinking, the members of the Northwest Groups of Rochester, N. Y., held a Memorial Day meeting at 10 a.m. instead of the evening meeting and had such a good turnout that members decided to have another gathering on July 4. They are passing along the idea to other groups to give a thought to holidays to come!

A.A. Crusoe Looking for Fridays -- Since an A.A. member expects to be 30 miles "as the fish swims" on Nantucket Island this summer he has asked any visiting A.A.s to contact him through P.O. Box 452, Nantucket, Mass. He says the police and the island paper, 'The Inquirer and Mirror', also know of him and he hopes that with the aid of visitors he can start a permanent group that will remain to function when he and his wife leave. He believes this would be the easternmost group in the United States.

Fly to Anniversary Dinner -- The Lewes-Rehoboth, Del., Groups were well represented at the 13th anniversary dinner in Cleveland, two members from Rehoboth and two

from Berlin, Md., flying there in the plane of one of the members. They reported royal treatment after going through some threatening weather on the crosscountry hop.
One
of the men, a former paratrooper, said he enjoyed it, though, as he didn't have to jump.

Starting Off Well -- With about 75 members, friends and observers in attendance, the newlyformed Westerly, R. I. Group got off to an auspicious start at a recent open meeting at Caledonia Hall. Moderator was a member of the Providence Round Top
unit who was accompanied by a good sized delegation from that group. In the audience
were District Judge Walter S. Flynn, representatives of the state probation department, and members of the Norwich, Conn. Group...The Durham, N. C. Group was reorganized early this year with five members, one former member of the old group, and it
now numbers about 30, all new except the one mentioned. Progress is felt to be on a solid basis. The Durham Group, with the cooperation of the Chapel Hill, Burlington
and Raleigh Groups, hopes to hold a public meeting soon. Several Durham members
recently visited New York and enjoyed a visit to the Alcoholic Foundation.

Meet in Bank -- Four members of different groups meeting with a new man who had just lost his wife caused the start on March 14 of the Oakman Boulevard Group in Detroit, Mich., Membership is now 38 with an attendance averaging 95 at the open meetings and 40 at the instruction sessions on Friday evenings. The group, affiliated with

the Greater Detroit office, has excellent facilities for meetings in the hall of
the Hostess Banking Co. at Oakman Boulevard and Twelfth.

Last Chance Group -- From the 'Eye Opener' of Los Angeles, Calif., comes the following account: "One day the writer went to Lincoln Heights Jail with J.L.V.

to carry the message of A.A. to the women there. Although they listened intently I seemed to sense an unexpressed reaction from them which said, 'This is all very well, but what about me? I am here now. I have no clothes, no money, no friends.'
Driving home the nagging thought persisted. Could anything be done to complement the splendid work J.L.V. is doing? An idea took shape. Could a group of alcoholic women be formed whose main activity would be to make personal calls in Lincoln Heights, the hospitals and institutions to sponsor a girl before her release so that when she regains her freedom her outlook is toward A.A. with its abundant living instead of toward
the first bar? The idea materialized into a new group for women alcoholics --
the Last
Chance Group. It has met with outstanding success so far."

Advertises for Prospects -- A woman alcoholic who has stuck it out for over two years
as the only female member of a group has inserted an ad in a San Bernardino, Calif., newspaper, calling for women interested to attend a session at the Y.W.C.A.
or
to write PO. Box 1096. Although she regards San Bernardino as a difficult spot
for women
drinkers she is hoping for a good response.

Issue Letter in Booklet -- A letter by a Seminole, Tex., doctor to another doctor who requested information on A.A. has been printed in booklet form by the San Angelo, Tex. Group. The San Angelo Group is making it available at low cost to other groups who wish to write to Box 943 in their city. The San Angelo Group also reports that its new address at the permanent club is 19½ East Harris Avenue and the telephone number is 4662. Now numbering 58 members, the group keeps a daily register at the club which shows the visitor average of 16.5 per day in April rising to 24.92 per day in May and about 30 for June. The figures are regarded as significant because many members travel from towns as far as 82 miles away. In addition to furnishing membership information the register gives a permanent record of visitors from other cities, all of whom are welcome.

Inside Prison Walls From Wallkill, N.Y State Prison 'The A.A. Grapevines' correspondent writes: "The average A.A. member may be interested to learn how A.A. can flourish and grow in prison. At Wallkill we have the wholehearted cooperation of the clergy, the warden and his staff in our work, but it is the task of the inmate members to obtain inmate speakers. At first glance it may seem difficult to the outsider for us to contact men willing to tell their story before the group. The public, perhaps, thinks of men in prison as being cynical and intolerant and it is likely that at one time these men had those characteristics. However, for most, that is a thing of the past, due to the A.A. program. Each speaker, as he unfolds his life story, is listened to attentively by all and there is no scoffing as one might expect from an audience of inmates. As the listeners note the changes that have come over men who have made frank admission of their faults they are encouraged to speak also. These men see that the speakers are not looking for sympathy but are gaining courage through A.A. to face life again when they are released. They have come to the realization that there is nothing they can do about the past but there is much they can do in the future. The program committee, consisting of 10 members and a chairman, acts as a contact in arranging for inmate speakers and our programs have never been lacking for material."

Grapevine Sprouts -- At a recent meeting of the Kent, Ohio, Group there were four clergymen as guests, both Protestant and Catholic, one of the latter having been located in Kent several years ago when he was helpful in getting the group started. An increasing number of A.A.s are war veterans, it is reported from Minneapolis, Minn., where one member estimates at least 25 percent of the 2,000 in that city are veterans, including several women. Re-establishment of a city farm for working out Corporation Court fines would aid in the rehabilitation of Dallas, Tex., alcoholics, members of the city administration were told recently. Favorable consideration has been given the matter. A carnival staged by Des Moines, Ia., A.A.s to furnish a hospital room for the treatment of alcoholics had a goal of $580 for the necessary cost. When the receipts were counted it was found that the affair brought in $750, which minus $170 expenses, netted just the amount needed! Santa Fe, N.M., A.A.s went to Albuquerque recently for the opening of the clubhouse of the Duke City Group. About 35 went in a motor cavalcade.

Score Slam in Clubs -- When it comes to achieving new club rooms or quarters, A.A.s still don't seem to let the housing shortage bother them. North Hollywood, Cal., recently held a housewarming at the new clubhouse at 4343 Radford Avenue, the group having outgrown its original building on Chandler Boulevard. The celebration was old time Western style...The Tacoma, Wash., group now is quartered in attractive rooms on Pacific Avenue. Many hours of scrubbing, painting and other work went into the conversion of an old bootleg joint. On opening night main addresses were given by one of the founders of the Salem, Ore., Group and Chuck Y. This group has continued to grow with an average attendance of 50 to 60 instead of the 15 to 20 of a year ago. Influence in the community is demonstrated by opinions expressed by a member of the police department who was impressed to see a number of his old "regulars" sober. A Methodist minister recently requested one of the group to occupy his pulpit and talk on the principles of A.A. Twelve members of the group have blue chips representing a year of sobriety.

Texans Have Big Ideas -- Spacious new club rooms in the down town area are now occupied by the San Antonio, Tex., Group, the new address being 503½ West Commerce

Street. The club occupies the entire upper floor of a commercial building, having a total floor space of 6300 square feet of which 4500 square feet is given over to an assembly room for meetings and social gatherings sponsored by the club. The room has been completely redecorated and renovated. It is fluorescent lighted, and a water heater, cabinet sink, electrically cooled water fountain and public address system have been installed. There are also candy, cigarette and coke vending machines. The club membership is increasingly rapidly and with the employment of a full time paid secretary the goal is to be the largest club in the largest state. San Antonio members are also holding regular weekly meeting at the State Hospital with a patient attendance of 25 to 35. The doctors are cooperating fully and each week some patients are brought to closed meetings...A dinner dedicated the new club rooms at Marshallowtown, Ia., with meat and coffee furnished by the group and members bringing the rest of the food in covered dishes.

Permian Basin Goes Plural -- The Permian Basin Group started in November, 1946 at Monahans, Tex., in an informal session, had its first regular meeting at Odessa in December with four members and now has several groups located at Odessa, Monahans and Midlands. Big Spring is also one of the Permian Basin Groups although it did not originate from the first small meeting. These groups visit each other virtually every week. Average attendance at Odessa and Monahans is about 20 while Midland had nine at the first session. Addresses are Odessa -- Box 2567, Monahans -505 West Lang, and Midland-807 West Texas Street.

New Nursing Home -- Over 600 visited the recently established Cleveland Alcoholic Clinic at 7809 Euclid Avenue, and consumed uncounted gallons of coffee and ice cream.

An innovation in nursing homes is the spacious third floor club rooms providing billiard, cards, ping pong and other diversions as well as the usual A.A. sessions.

On the first floor there is a completely equipped dining room open to A.A.s and their guests. A doctor will give a thorough physical examination and trained nurses will be in attendance at all times.

Iowa Veterans Hear About A.A. -- Over 100 A.A.s gathered at a dinner at the University of Iowa in Iowa City, to get an idea of how A.A. handles the drinking problem. A good representation of G.I.s and about 125 A.A.s attended, the latter being from Dubuque, Iowa City, Cedar Rapids, Waterloo, Oelwein, Marengo, Davenport and Fremont, Nebraska, while guests included the sheriff, county attorney and the press. An Iowa City man was chairman with the main speakers from Des Moines and Dubuque. Emphasis was placed on working with younger people. The sheriff and county attorney pledged their support. . . . C. G. K. of the New Orleans Group writes in to say that he went to his first meeting on May 10, 1944, when the membership was about 15. Nobody could have told him then, he writes, that three years later the group would number approximately 150, with another 400 or so A.A.s active elsewhere throughout the state.

Stedman's Medical Dictionary (for example) has only 2 definitions for the term bipolar:
"1. Having two poles; denoting those nerve cells in which the branches project from two, usually opposite, points. 2. Relating to both ends or poles of a bacterial or other cell."

The older term, of course, was manic-depression, but there is no exact correspondence between the two terms. The diagnosis of manic depression originally required that the patient have manic episodes which were characterized by clearly abnormal behavior which was readily distinguishable from the patients normal behavior, alternating with well-defined depressive episodes.

When it was noted that some patients who did not qualify as manic-depressive by the older definition nevertheless had depressive episodes alternating with behavior which was normal or only somewhat "hyper", the terminology was changed to reflect the range of bipolar conditions which had been identified. The new term (bipolar) is therefore more inclusive than the older term (manic-depressive), and has several subtypes.

My understanding is that there was no one, in Bill Wilson's lifetime, who actually said that he had manic-depression. And, given the strict diagnostic requirements he would have had to meet to be so diagnosed, I would be surprised if anyone had.

What people probably mean when they say he was bipolar is that, given today's broader use of the concept, it is possible he would have been diagnosed with one of the bipolar-other cell."

>

> The older term, of course, was manic-depression, but there is no exact correspondence > between the two terms. The diagnosis of manic depression originally required that the > patient have manic episodes which were characterized by clearly abnormal behavior > which was readily distinguishable from the patients normal behavior, alternating with > well-defined depressive episodes.

>

> When it was noted that some patients who did not qualify as manic-depressive by the > older definition nevertheless had depressive episodes alternating with behavior which > was normal or only somewhat "hyper", the terminology was changed to reflect the range > of bipolar conditions which had been identified. The new term (bipolar) is therefore > more inclusive than the older term (manic-depressive), and has several subtypes.

>

> My understanding is that there was no one, in Bill Wilson's lifetime, who actually said > that he had manic-depression. And, given the strict diagnostic requirements he would > have had to meet to be so diagnosed, I would be surprised if anyone had.

>

> What people probably mean when they say he was bipolar is that, given today's broader > use of the concept, it is possible he would have been diagnosed with one of the bipolar-> spectrum disorders if he had been born 50 years later.

>

> Cora

>

>

>

>

>

>

>

>

> To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:

> AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

>

>

>

Mark First Year -- The Fellowship Group of Windsor, Vt., held its first anniversary dinner July 19, with 118 in attendance. Guests came from St. Johnshury, Montpelier, Burlington, St. Albans, Bethel, Lyme, Randolph, Bennington and Rutland, and guest speakers from Haverhill, Mass., South Orange, N. J., Mt. Kisco, N. Y., and the New York City Seamen's Group.

Cleveland Troupers Plan New Show -- Though performances of the musical revue staged far and wide by Cleveland A.A.s have been curtailed during the summer months, members are busy planning a new show to take to the local boards in the fall. The show was originally the outgrowth of a purely amateur stunt night program last February. An invitation from another group to repeat the 30-minute revue led to more requests, and the show was polished and expanded and engagements were played in many nearby towns. The show has not been used as a money-raising venture, but purely for its entertainment value and fun.

Growth Keeps Pace -- As the population of Houston, Texas, continues to expand, so too, do the A.A. activities there. Group No. 2 was formed less than five months ago, with an initial membership of 17, which has now grown to 47 active participants. Meetings are held twice weekly in the Parish house of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church, and the rent for the hall is donated to the alcoholic ward of St. Luke's Episcopal Hospital which will be part of the medical center to be constructed in Houston. Among the speakers at the open Monday night meetings have been prominent physicians, judges and others. The closed sessions on Thursday are given over to round-table discussions of the 12 Steps. Sometimes the discussions follow the form of the "Information, Please" radio program, with four of the older members answering questions submitted by others as to their interpretations of the A.A. program. Saturday evening parties in members' homes have helped members of the group to become better acquainted.

Advertising Pays -- In last month's A.A. Grapevine there was a brief item about an ad run in the San Bernadino, Cal., newspaper by the lone A.A. woman in the city, asking that others interested communicate with her. Now she reports that the Women's A.A. of San Bernadino was organized at a meeting June 18 in the Y.W.C.A. with seven active members attending! An open meeting on July 2 attracted 20, and the chairman, herself an A.A., lead the meeting by passing out papers for questions about the program, and she and a non-alcoholic woman who has been helpful in establishing the group both provided answers. Others who have offered their assistance include a clergyman and a physician. The editor of the daily newspaper has cooperated by running weekly items about the meetings.

Nurses Hear A.A.s -- Two members of the San Antonio, Texas, Group responded to a call from the City Health Nurses to make talks before that group. The San Antonio Group, now numbering 140, finds increasing support for its activities from city officials and law enforcement agencies, it reports. During the past few weeks, San Antonians have entertained visitors from Chicago, Denver, Minneapolis, Oklahoma City, Chattanooga, Mexico City and several other Texas groups in the new clubrooms in the heart of the business district. One of the members has organized a Thursday night discussion group for men on various aspects of the program and pertinent reading. The first book read and discussed was "Alcohol -- One Man's Meal." Another new venture in San Antonio has been the inauguration of a meeting for wives of members, at the same time the members hold closed meetings. Two copies of "Alcoholics Anonymous" have been placed in wards of the State Hospital and two others in the San Antonio Public Library.

Winonans Advertise, Too -- The A.A. Group in Winona, Minn., runs a classified ad daily in the 'Republican-Herald', the local newspaper, changing the wording every six or eight weeks. The current ad has read: "Is drinking a problem that is affecting you domestically, socially, economically, and physically? Possibly we can help you.

Write

Alcoholics Anonymous, P.O. Box 122. No treatment, confidential, no dues."

Twenty

members from Winona were among 300 who attended the first anniversary dinner of the Alano society of Rochester (Minn.) A.A. in July.

Georgians Get Around -- Members of the Atlanta, Ga., Group have been active lately in aiding in the establishment of new groups. One member on vacation in Selma, Ala., felt the need for a group there and helped form one. Another started a group in the

Lawson Veterans' Administration Hospital with the cooperation of the psychiatric staff. In answer to a request from Athens, Ga., another went there and assisted in getting a group underway. Atlanta plans to invite several of these nearby groups to conduct some of its meetings this fall and winter.

Elbow Bending A.A. Style -- The Monday following the picnic held by the Kingsport, Johnson City and Bristol, Tenn., Groups, several members sported sore right arms, in this case the result of horseshoe pitching, so the "hangovers" were fairly painless. The picnic was held during the summer at the Tri-City airport, and there was ham, chicken, coffee, coke and watermelon. The three groups plan more of these get-togethers.

Notes From Correspondents -- Next month, the Duluth, Minn., Group will be two years old. starting with a nucleus of three on . Oct. 2, 1945, it now numbers over 200.

Duluth helped start groups in Superior, Wis., and several other neighboring towns. .

. . Erie, Pa., now boasts six groups, with meetings every week night, and on Sunday a meeting of the men's training class. . . . Patients, members, or employees are invited to regular Wednesday night meetings of the Los Angeles Veterans' Administration A.A. Group in the Gray Ladies' Hut. . . . An A.A. Group has been formed at Grenada, Miss., with ten at the first meeting, some of them coming from Greenwood. The Grenada address is P.O. Box 1010.

Overflow Crowd -- Although none of the speakers was introduced by name, an overflow crowd jammed the Little Theatre of the Sacramento (Calif.) memorial auditorium to attend the first open meeting staged by the Sacramento A.A. Group. A businessman, a housewife, an insurance man and a shoe salesman told the audience, which included clergymen, physicians, judges, nurses and other interested persons, how they had arrested the disease of alcoholism through following the A.A. program. A.A.s from the vicinity got together following the meeting at the clubhouse.

Milwaukee Women Organize -- A women's group has been formed by A.A. in Milwaukee, with meetings every other Wednesday in the Alano Club at 1012 North 3rd Street.

The

Alano Club is now 16 months old, and occupies a suite of six rooms in downtown Milwaukee.

Dr. Jellinek A Visitor-Dr. E. M. Jellinek of the Yale University School of Alcohol

Studies was a surprise visitor to the 1947 Texas state Conference of A.A. held in Austin during the summer. The biggest event in A.A. history in Texas, the two-day meeting was attended by approximately 400 A.A.s representing 25 groups.

Members

from
Austin, Dallas, Houston, Fort Worth, Schulenberg, Seminole, Waco, San Antonio, Taylor, Nacogdoches and New York City spoke at the various meetings. There were also movies and recorded talks by Bill and Marty M.

60 At First Open Meeting -- The Calcasieu Parish Group held its first open meeting at Lake Charles, La., in July, with M. H. of Memphis as the guest speaker and 20
A.A.s and about 40 friends and relatives attending. Not only have several calls been received by the group since the meeting; the newspaper announcement of it also brought forth a couple who were formerly affiliated with the Kansas City, Kan.,
and Corpus Christ! Groups, and didn't know of the existence of a chapter in their new home.

|||||

+++Message 1394. . . . . Re: Singleness of Purpose History
From: gratitude . . . . . 10/9/2003 4:45:00 AM

|||||

I have just finished reading Dr. Milton's Maxwell's article "The Washingtonian Movement" (1950), and have found some excellent points to address "Singleness of Purpose". This is the theme for the next General Service Conference this coming up in April, 2004: Singleness of Purpose. In our California Area 9 General Service we have started the cycle of developing the conversation in workshops on this issue so that our districts might benefit from material we could make available to them to take to their home groups, and then from the Home Groups to the GS Conference. We are in the middle of developing workshop material for our district and I am looking for historical perspectives on this tradition, and am bringing my request for information to you.

Currently what is very prevalent on many of the fellowship's minds concerns the sustained objection of a group's desire to address alcohol issues only by those who have other "addictions", and how to address objections of a group's perceived selfishness by the alcohol-addict who insists on taking us down the "drug-alley" memory lane with their pitch. I can imagine some responses to a scenario, and we all can suggest responses, but how has the fellowship responded when other issues have tested our Singleness of Purpose?.

The tentative program follows. When we have information as to which meeting you will attend - location and time can be determined. You can help by writing NOW.

CONFERENCE MEETING - (Saturday, July 29, 2 P.M.)....The Conference Meeting will be devoted to discussing, defining and action on the Twelve Traditions of A.A., and other matters of international importance.

"BIG MEETING" - (Sunday, July 30, 1 P.M.)....Doctor Bob and Bill will be the only speakers at the General Meeting. Husbands and wives will be welcome. Need more be said?

A.A. WOMEN'S MEETING - (Friday, July 28, 1:00 P.M.)....Certainly this meeting will be important. The purpose of A.A. itself "carrying the word to those who don't know", should prove a most productive topic. We can't promote women into A.A., but we can attract them.

NON-AA AFFILIATE MEETING - (Friday, July 28, 1:00 P.M.)....At this meeting of non-alcoholic husbands and wives of A.A. members, Lois (Mrs. Bill) will be one of the principle speakers. A discussion period will follow the meeting. Learn what the program can mean to the non-alcoholic members of the family.

TEA - (Friday, July 28, 3:30 P.M.)....Where the A.A. women and the wives of A.A. can get acquainted and do some "dishing".

INDUSTRIAL MEETING - (Friday, July 28, 10:00 A.M.)....This meeting will disclose the growing influence of A.A. in industry. The movement has gained recognition in many of our large industrial plants such as duPont, Eastman Kodak and Thompson Products. Representatives of industry will take an active part in the meeting, as well as well qualified A.A. speakers.

HOPITALIZATION - (Friday, July 28, 10:00 A.M.)....Experience has shown that hospital, beds, equipment, and time of personnel is not misused when they accept A.A. sponsored alcoholics. Doctors and hospital superintendents will tell others with less experience of results obtained by cooperating with A.A.

A.A. PUBLICATIONS MEETING....We cannot underestimate the role these publications have played in the development of the movement. At this meeting editors and managers will pool their experiences and plan for future service to A.A.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETING....Many AA's "under 35" feel they have special problems. This meeting will give them a chance to discuss them together.

INSTITUTIONAL GROUPS MEETING....Our new Directory discloses ninety hospital groups and seventy prison groups. Doctors, hospital workers and prison wardens deeply appreciate the help A.A. is giving in their work with the many individuals affected. They are eager to learn more through sharing

Grapevine, Oct 47

Norwegian Group Among New Ones

From July 1st to August 14th, the following new groups registered with the Central Office:

NORWAY -- Lillibro Drobak.

CANADA -- Camrose and Red Deer, both Alberta; Kamloops, British Columbia; Brantford and Kinsway Group (Toronto) both Ontario; Moncton, New Brunswick.

ALABAMA -- Brewton, Fairhope and Wetumpka.

ARKANSAS -- Warren.

CALIFORNIA -- Benicia, Camp Meeker, Cathedral, Glendale Central Group, East Bay Group of Long Beach, Los Gatos, Crescenta Valley Group (Montrose), Group No. 2 in Sacramento, San Bernardino Women's Group, San Jose Men's Group, Southern Marin Group (Sausalito), Taft, Trona, Twenty Nine Palms.

COLORADO -- -Pike's Peak Group (Colorado Springs).

CONNECTICUT -- Greater New Haven Group, Wallingford.

FLORIDA -- Belle Glade, Murray Hill Group of Jacksonville, Miami Beach, Coral Way Group of Miami, Panama, West Palm Beach.

GEORGIA -- Athens, Cairo, LaFayette.

ILLINOIS -- Christopher, Macomb.

KANSAS -- Mission, Salina.

LOUISIANA -- Welch.

MARYLAND -- Annapolis, Cumberland.

MASSACHUSETTS -- East Milton, Taunton.

MICHIGAN -- Alpena.

MISSISSIPPI -- Grenada.

MISSOURI -- Camdenton, Rocket Group of St. Louis.

NEVADA -- Fallon, Hawthorne, Donner Trail Group (Verdi).

NEW HAMPSHIRE -- North Conway Group (Kearsarge), Rochester.

NEW JERSEY -- Central Group of Newark, East Side Group of Passaic, Penns Grove.

NEW MEXICO -- Loving.

NEW YORK -- Beacon, Cortlandt, Hispano Group of New York City, Harlem Valley Group (Pawling), Rochester, Southwest Group of Rochester, Wellsville.

NORTH CAROLINA -- Kings Mountain, Lincolnton.

OHIO -- Barnesville, Pioneers Negro Group of Cleveland, Hamilton, Lima, Portsmouth, Struthers, Wakeman.

From: gratitude

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Thursday, October 09, 2003 4:45 AM

What issues have historically brought our singleness of purpose to conversations? What illustrations AA's experience might assist groups to understand Singleness of Purpose, and Traditions as we now know them.?

-----
-----

from the A.A. Grapevine April 1948 used with permission of the A.A. Grapevine, Inc.

Tradition Five

by Bill W.

Says the old proverb, "Shoemaker, stick to thy last." Trite, yes. But very true for us of AA. How well we need to heed the principle that it is better to do one thing supremely well than many things badly.

Because it has now become plain enough that only a recovered alcoholic can do much for a sick alcoholic, a tremendous responsibility has descended upon us all, an obligation so great that it amounts to a sacred trust. For to our kind, those who suffer alcoholism, recovery is a matter of life or death. So the Society of Alcoholics Anonymous cannot, it dare not, ever be diverted from its primary purpose.

Temptations to do otherwise will come aplenty. Seeing fine works afoot in the field of alcohol, we shall be sorely tempted to loan out the name and credit of Alcoholics Anonymous to them; as a movement we shall be beset to finance and endorse other causes. Should our present success continue, people will commence to assert that AA is a brand-new way of life, maybe a religion, capable of saving the world. We shall be told it is our bounden duty to show modern society how it ought to live.

Oh, how very attractive these projects and ideas can be! How flattering to imagine that we might be chosen to demonstrate that olden mystic promise: "The first shall be last and the last shall be first." Fantastic, you say. Yet some of our well-wishers have begun to say such things.

Fortunately, most of us are convinced that these are perilous speculations, alluring ingredients of that new heady wine we are now being offered, each bottle marked "Success"!

entertainment for the members' children. . . An article written by Bill Cunningham, 'Boston Herald' columnist, dealing with A.A., brought many inquiries and phone calls to the Boston Central Office at 30 Huntington Avenue with an average of 10 new persons a day coming into the office for the three weeks following publication, for literature and contact with the nearest group. . . A recent affair which sent many A.A.s away on an overnight trip was the establishment of a new group at North Conway, N.H., well-known resort. The opening session was at Mitchell's Ski Ranch, Kearsarge, N. H., with members from various groups in Massachusetts, and New Hampshire lending support. . . The Portsmouth, N. H., Group had a gala picnic recently at Perkins Cove, Ogunquit, Me. . . The Central Service Committee, which sponsors the All-Group meetings every Wednesday night at 30 Huntington Avenue, Boston, has been trying out a program at which old-timers are chairmen and round up their own speakers. Previously individual groups ran these sessions, but the oldtimers have been doing a good job. . . The secretary of Central Service has had so many calls from the Boston City Hospital for A.A.s to visit, and for additional help in carrying out work with the Boston Psychopathic Hospital, that an appeal has been made for more volunteers from the Greater Boston groups. . . Two large open meetings, designed to inform the community of A.A. activities and directed at giving help to those wanting it, were held in Malden and Norwood during September. On Sept. 12 the Malden Group, on its first anniversary, held a big meeting at Rotary Hall in that city while the Norwood Group welcomed many visitors with special speakers at K. of C. Hall on Sept. 26. . . Some of the Greater Boston groups have moved to larger meeting places. The Arlington Group now meets at Spanish War Veterans hall, which is the old town hall, Arlington Center, on Friday nights. Worcester No. 2 Group has changed to CIO Hall, 74 Main Street, third floor, on Thursday nights. . . Another newcomer to the Greater Boston groups during the summer was East Milton, which holds sessions Sunday nights at Ellsworth hall. . . The Manchester, N. H., Group now meets at the Franklin Congregational Church on Tuesday nights, starting at 8 instead of 8:30. . . Record attendances were set at two unusual Wednesday night all-group meetings at 30 Huntington Avenue, one a "Women's Night" with the women taking over the whole affair, and another the "Mr. and Mrs. Alcoholic Night" with married couples as the speakers.

Spreading the Word -- The Lampasas, Tex., Group, recently organized, is doing all it can to let people in the locality know about A.A. The nine members recently staged an open meeting at the court house, with Dr. David Wade, prominent Austin psychiatrist, as the main speaker and five other speakers, all alcoholics, from other towns.

Into Another Prison -- Firmly convinced "A.A. has come to stay" at Stillwater, Minn., Prison, our reporter there says the first meeting of eight members was held recently under the sponsorship of Warden L. F. Utrecht and the guidance of members of the Midwest Council on Alcoholism, Inc. By the time the third meeting was held there were 17 members and several more applications on file. Meetings are every Saturday afternoon from 1:30 to 3:30 with A.A.s from Minneapolis, St. Paul and Stillwater in charge. The fourth Saturday meeting will be conducted by inmates. "We are not proud of our status as a prison group," the reporter writes, "but we are extremely grateful to the warden and the outside groups who have made and will continue to make these meetings possible. Physically and mentally there is little to distinguish between the alcoholic who occupies a cell and the one in a penthouse. Each is a sick man, each must meet and master the same tragic reality -- he can't take that first drink. Of course, the alcoholic in prison can't get his first drink but that doesn't eliminate his craving, nor his desire to get drunk and shut out the reality he must face each day, nor the fear that is constantly with him -- 'Can I leave it alone once I get out?' We sincerely believe that A.A. philosophy is the answer to his problem." The group hopes to publish its own paper soon. Its first printed matter is an attractively gotten-up commemoration of the first meeting.

Speakers Exchanged -- In the interest of getting varied views and opinions the Austin, Tex., Group has inaugurated an exchange of speakers among neighboring groups. Austin has sent at least two speakers to talk at Waco, Houston, Lampasas and San Marcos. The Waco Group recently sent two members to the Tuesday open session at Austin and the idea is proving so mutually beneficial that other groups are expected to join the "speakers' circuit" soon.

News from Newark -- Judging from the variety of activities, past and planned, the publication of the Alanon Association of Newark, N. J., is well named 'The News'. Included in the September issue are announcement of a bowling season, report of a Monte Carlo Night, a venture in sound moving pictures, a corn cob and hot dog party, a series of games, a fall dance, a "Monster Ball," rehearsals for the second annual "Show Boat," a contemporary art exhibit and tea as well as a report of the regular monthly inter-group meeting and announcement of the first annual New Jersey Inter-Group banquet to be held at the Terrace Ball Room October 16.

Growth Fast and Good -- The San Angelo, Tex., Group believes it has duplicated in less than a year the phenomenal growth of A.A. in the nation. From four "founding fathers" in November, 1946, membership has grown to around 75 with new prospects almost every day and a surprisingly low number of slips. It is a matter of chest-thumping pride that the majority of members "get it" and maintain sobriety after the first contact. Spark plug in the first hard days was Dan W., at whose home the first meetings were held with his wife serving coffee and cake. In March, 1947, the club rented an office and club rooms in a downtown office building. Closed meetings are now held in the club rooms with open meetings in the ballroom of the Cactus Hotel. At the present rate of growth larger club quarters will be necessary soon. The San Angelo Group has acted as parent to groups in Menard, Brady and Coleman with detachments of oldtimers driving regularly to meetings in these towns. In May, 1947, the group sponsored publication of "The Doctor's Letter" by Dr. Andy T. of Seminole, Tex. This letter was given wide circulation and was reprinted in the July 1947 issue of 'The A.A. Grapevine.'

We're the Prize! -- To help the A.A. program in Washington, D. C., a raffle is held at each Friday night meeting with the two winners each receiving a year's subscription to 'The A.A. Grapevine.'

Ship Comes In -- First issues of 'The Derelict' Schooner have drifted into our office. Appropriately headed with the picture of a listing ship, the Jacksonville (Fla.) Group's publication carries a lively assortment of news, ideas and remarks in four long mimeographed pages.

Meeting Interests Public -- The Roanoke, Va., Group was well pleased by the number of interested citizens and A.A.s from Charleston, W. Va., Martinsville, Charlottesville and St. Petersburg, Fla., who attended an open meeting held recently at the Lee Junior High School. The two local papers, 'The Times' and 'The World-News' and three radio stations, WDBJ, WROV and WSLS were also most helpful in publicizing the meeting. In the past several months members have been asked to address the ministers' conference and speakers have been requested for Bible classes. Although the Roanoke Group is fairly new it now has a membership of about 40 with meetings on Mondays and Fridays in the YMCA at 8 P. M.

Prison Group Grows -- The first session of the A.A. Group at Montana State Hospital, Warm Springs, Mont., had only three members but there are now 40. The hospital

secretary who conducted the first meetings reports he has now turned the programs over to the inmates themselves and that they are as "sincere a bunch of fellows as I've met from Chicago to San Francisco at A.A. meetings."

Commission Named -- Governor Robert F. Bradford of Massachusetts has appointed a commission on alcoholism which will serve for four years and report annually. The commission is unpaid, will make a continuous study of methods of treating alcoholism and other practices relative to the problems arising from alcoholism in the Commonwealth, and is empowered to request any information necessary for its work from all departments, boards, offices or other commissions of the Commonwealth. Named to posts were Dr. Sarah M. Jordan, Marblehead; Dr. Robert Fleming, Boston; Dr. J. Morrison Faulkner, Brookline, Arthur F. Desmond, Brookline, and George C. Wiswell, Winchester.

Clam Bake on Anniversary -- -The Corning-Addison Group marked its first anniversary by playing host to New York State groups recently at Seneca Lake. A member's estate on the west side of the lake offered plenty of space for Softball, quoits, swimming, boating and other games. The crowd of about 75 found a large tent with tables and chairs, soft drinks, cold cuts, cheese and cold clams ready for afternoon enjoyment. Dinner was served after an afternoon of games with hot clam broth, chicken, sweet and Irish potatoes, carrots, hot rolls, sliced tomatoes, steamed clams in butter, iced watermelon and plenty of coffee.

Barbecue for Visitors -- "The general idea was visitation with neighboring groups who have helped us immeasurably in establishing this completely happy little group of 14 and our wives," the St. Mary's, Ohio, Group reporter says of the barbecue for visiting members held recently at the shelter house at Lake St. Mary's. Two prominent speakers in the state led afternoon and evening meetings with the rest of the time spent in getting better acquainted.

Anniversaries Celebrated -- Recently about 150 attended the third anniversary at Camarillo, Cal., State Hospital. Present were members of the hospital staff, patients, ex-patients, former leaders of the group and visitors. After brief talks cake was served and an informal social hour enjoyed . . . About a year ago six men and one woman alcoholic met at the country home, of one near Vincennes, Ind., to form a group after attending meetings in Evansville for a long period. This year a picnic supper and meeting at the same country home found 22 alcoholics and their families present with all of the first seven there. Seven or eight other regular attendants could not be present. Members of this group come from Bicknell, Bruceville, Oatstown, and Washington, Ind., and Lawrenceville, Ill. . . . First anniversary of the Spencer, Ia., Group was celebrated September 14 at Camp Okoboji-Walther League. The program listed dinner, music, speaking, singing by a quartet and the group, dancing and other entertainment and attendance at the famous Clay County Fair.

Entertain at Banquet -- Members of The St. Cloud, Minn., Group were hosts to about 250 A.A.s and their wives from other groups in the state at a banquet at the country club just south of town. L. C. was the principal speaker and an A.A. orchestra furnished music and entertainment.

Prisoners Publish Paper -- Active since March 1 the group at the Federal Correctional Institution, Sandstone, Minn., has been allowed to publish 'The A.A. Visitor' twice a month. The pamphlet features editorials which have been widely quoted. Begun through the cooperation of the Minneapolis Group and Warden C. W. Humphrey, the group has followed a program fashioned after the set-up at San Quentin. There is a beginners' class on Monday and Wednesday evenings and a meeting on which is attended by a visiting group from Minneapolis, St. Paul, Superior, or Duluth.

Sunday

More New Groups -- 'The Eye Opener' of Los Angeles, Cal., reports a new group at Torrance with meetings on Saturday, and formation of the Glendale Central Group with meetings every night in the week throughout the Glendale area . . . A group to be called Lake of the Ozark Group with the address, P. O. Box 67, Camdenton, Mo., has been announced. A group from Jefferson City helped get things going.

A.A. in Other Papers -- the Roswell, N. M. 'Morning Dispatch' has recently published under "Sidelights on The News" an article discussing the 12 Steps and telling of the local group . . . Half a column in a recent issue of a Richmond, Cal., paper is devoted to A.A. ideas . . . A Seattle, Wash., paper tells of police plans for a rehabilitation farm for chronic alcoholics with A.A. included among agencies cooperating . . . From Galena, Kans., comes announcement of the opening of the Tri-State Clinic there with Dr. Frank W. James, Galena physician in charge and the Tri-State Group working with him . . . Houston, Tex., papers carried lengthy, favorable advance notices and reports of a talk on A.A. by Dr. Andrew W. Tomb, West Texas physician who told of the organization's work in bringing persons back to useful lives . . . A story of the first annual picnic of the Winona, Minn., Group was carried on the first page of 'The Republican' and reported about 50 present.

Report from Stillwater -- "We have ten members and are doing fine," happily reports the correspondent at Stillwater, Okla., which has a comparatively young A.A. group.

-----s-h-o-r-t---c-o-l-u-m-n---f-i-l-l-e-r-----

--\
-

Ten Los Angeles Groups Stage Round-Robin Picnic

to Maine from Baldwin. L. I., N. Y.

Program Strengthened --When the Plainfield, N. J., Group was in its infancy and the meetings small, new members attending their first gatherings were the center of attraction and got plenty of A.A. help. Growth was so rapid during the next year and the attendance so great at the Friday night meetings that new members were quite often taken for oldtimers from neighboring groups and unintentionally neglected during a period when A.A. was required in big doses. To overcome this condition a New Men's meeting was inaugurated and has been held each Monday night, the purpose being to indoctrinate quickly the new men in the program principles and to acquaint them better with their fellow alcoholics. Meetings are of an informal, educational nature and attendance has averaged over 30. Few who have attended regularly have had trouble regaining or maintaining sobriety. . . Finding that many women had difficulty in making the A.A. program, the Plainfield Group decided to give women early and proper A.A. help to carry them past the first enthusiasm, which was found to wane too often. To remedy this and to promote better understanding and friendship a New Woman's meeting was inaugurated about three months ago. Successful from the start, they are held semi-monthly at members' homes and are patterned very much along the same line as the New Men's meetings. Many women who previously had trouble with the program are reported to have benefited.

Good and Hot--With a gain of a member or more every meeting, members of the Woodland, Cal., Group report that they are "hot" and their aridity is good. Troubles are few and even those who were really hospital cases have recovered.

Second Fall Festival -Inaugurated as an annual affair last year to regenerate enthusiasm for the winter season and rededicate combined efforts to A.A. work and study, the second annual Omaha, Nebr., groups' Fall Festival was attended by more than 200 members, many with their wives and families. Saturday evening at the Elks club they attended a banquet with no speeches, but with a program featuring an array of professional talent which starred "Miss Omaha," Madalyn King, whose fast dancing won the talent award in the Atlantic City Miss America Beauty Pageant. Song leaders from two Iowa groups competed in leading the community sing with a Council Bluffs member winning over one from Des Moines, Ia., both putting on excellent shows. A free Bingo game with several hundred dollars worth of prizes was followed by dancing, cards and impromptu entertainment. Sunday morning members and guests had breakfast at the Alano club, then visited Father Flanagan's Boys Town and other places in Omaha. The meeting of the day was at the Elks club with Omaha's oldest member as chairman and members in attendance from Iowa, South Dakota, Missouri, Illinois, Colorado and Nebraska. The principal address was delivered by Roy M. of Chicago. The open house session at the club ran into morning hours.

New Quarters, New Group--The Permian Basin Group at Odessa, Tex., has moved in, set up shop and begun holding meetings in its new and first clubroom. Moving wasn't difficult, The Grapevine hears, as possessions consisted of a couple of dripolaters, a pound of coffee, some cups and a dozen folding chairs. The club is at 219½ West Third Street, or as members point out, between the city jail and an undertaking parlor. Meeting night has been changed from Wednesday to Tuesdays and Thursdays, while plans are being made to include a regular Saturday night open house. . . . Another Group, the Andrews-Seminole, has been home by the already prolific Permian Basin Group, bringing the number to four. Regular meeting night will be announced later. . . The Odessa-Permian Basin Group held the first of a series of regular monthly open meetings about two months ago with A.A.s from Big Spring, Midland, Seminole, El Paso, Hobbs, N. M., and San Angelo on hand for brief addresses.

St. Mary's Is Host--Simplicity and punctuality helped to make the gathering of more than 250 guests a success when the St. Mary's, O.. Group entertained neighboring A.A. groups at the National Guard clubhouse on take St. Mary's. The affair was so successful that it has been suggested that this be made an annual affair at the same place. Guests attended from Lima. Marion, Toledo, Defiance, Findlay, Dayton, Van Wert, Columbus, Bellefontaine, and Canton, O., and Ft. Wayne, Muncie, and Richmond, Ind. Two prominent speakers led meetings in an afternoon and evening session with a substantial lunch and social time in between. The St. Mary's group was started January 31, 1947, and now numbers 15 members.

North Carolina Groups Solid--From Kings Mountain, N. C.. The Grapevine's correspondent reports that not only his own Group with 12 members, but others, are "solid." The Kings Mountain Group was started some years ago by Paul M., a non-alcoholic, who provided transportation to Shelby for anyone wishing to try the A.A. way. The group reports a gain of about a member each week. . . The Shelby Group is over six years old and has been aiding men from all over the South. . . Lincolnton is growing and has a fine clubroom open all the time, while Hickory, too, has a growing Group and good quarters. . . The Gastonia Group has started for the third time, with new determination to succeed. . . Rockhill now has about 30 members. They meet with men from York, Chester and Fort Mill each Wednesday. Members from other towns also attend. . . Andrews Group has also been growing and helping Conway, S. C., and Myrtle Beach get going. Bennettsville, S. C., and Rowland. N. C., are holding regular weekly meetings with good results. . . Average attendance at Charlotte

has been about 50 with six to eight new men at each meeting. The new club room is ready to go. The Myers Park Group meets at Myers Park Methodist Church Monday and Friday
nights at 8, with open sessions and fellowship gatherings following. New men
and women from all groups meet at the YMCA on Sunday night to the number of about 85
to 90, starting with a general subject and splitting up into three discussion groups.

Another Women's Auxiliary--Along with a list of 10 subscriptions to The Grapevine,
the Hickory, N. C., Group reports that all these new subscribers are part of a recently formed A.A. A u x i l i a r y of 36 members who plan to study A.A. as well as help other women who are "going through what we have, and maybe through the wives
bring other men into A.A." There are two meetings and one social every month.

Chicago A.A.s at Retreat -- Twenty-eight members of Chicago, Ill., A.A. attended
a retreat at Childerly, a country estate owned and maintained by the Calvert club
of the University of Chicago, principally for its Catholic students and alumni, near Wheeling, Ill., recently. Both Catholics and non-Catholics were in the group
which included a Catholic priest who was the retreat master, and a brother who belonged to one of the Catholic orders, eight salesmen, two insurance adjusters, two tax collectors, a lawyer, accountant, advertising writer, buyer, advertising agent,
business agent, broker, advertising art director, mechanic, physician, manufacturer,
storekeeper and printer.

History and Humility--Members of the Spencer, Ia., Group report that they are having a hard time getting rid of a little tinge of human pride since the recent celebration of the first anniversary recalled the history of the group. . . Organized on August
6, 1946, the Spencer Group now has 50 active members on its rolls. Besides

that 13 men, residents of Estherville, came to their first meetings in Spencer and now
have their own group. The Storm Lake Group also was founded through Spencer, making
a total of 77 individuals who got their start there. . . Some 316 A.A.s and their friends joined at the Walther League Camp on take Okojobi for the birthday party
and heard the principal speaker, Carlos C. of Sioux City, who, a year ago, made three trips from his home town to help the original three members get launched as an active group. He traced the history of alcoholism and the handling of its problems.
other speakers included Ray H. of Des Moines, Ia., and Spencer representatives. . .
Eleven Estherville members were present with four from Storm Lake, while there were others from Ft. Dodge, Pocahontas, Sioux City, Des Moines, Cedar Rapids, Algona, Ida Grove
and Knoxville, Ia., and Minneapolis, Minn.; Fremont, Wakefield and Omaha, Nebr.,
and Yankton and Sioux Falls, S. D.

Advertising Draws Many--A series of advertisements run in Winona, Minn., papers
have brought many inquiries, some for the local Group and others for information in other places. The Winona Republican-Herald carried a good account of the open meeting
at the Senior high school auditorium on October 20 where A.A.s, as well as local physicians, clergy, judges and others, spoke. There, was much favorable publicity on the radio as well as in the press. The Winona Group held its final picnic recently in the form of a birthday celebration for three members, one having two years'
sobriety and the others one year each. Attendance was about 50 with representatives of one family each from Dubuque, Ia., and Rochester, Minn.

Speakers to Montreal --the Forest Hills, N. Y., Group recently made plans to send three representative members to speak at the opening meeting of Montreal

groups
which comprises eight groups joining in the first session of the season.

Public Forum Planned--On October 17 the Danville, Ill., Group held a public forum with guest speakers from Indianapolis, Ind. This is a part of the community activities of the Group which recently sent members to speak before a civic group at Sawville, Ill., to disseminate knowledge of A.A. Members have also been calling
on patients at the local Veterans Hospital, where one of the chaplains has been conducting meetings for patients. Two patients now out of the hospital are attending the Danville meetings. In addition The members were recently asked to participate in an open meeting before some 60 people to help start a group in the Champaign-Urbana area. Officially organized in September, 1946, with three members, the Danville
Group
now numbers 24 and meets Saturday nights at the YWCA at 8 with the women
meeting
in an adjoining room. Out of the present active members only three have had slips.
All
are back on the plan and doing well.

Goshen Growing--The Goshen, Ind., Group now numbers 14 members.

Group Interest Helps--Although a relatively small group of 21 members, the Greenville, Mich., A.A.s find that active interest in social and business affairs of the organization pays. Picnics, fish fries, annual banquets and get-togethers help to make good fellowship possible. This Group also reports it has the sheriff's office and the probate and circuit court judges behind the program. Sheriff Walter Arntz
frequently attends the meetings, accompanied by one of his "pupils" and has frequently said, "Jail is no place to cure an alcoholic." Probate Judge Rasmussen and
Circuit Court Judge Morris K. Davis of Ionia and Montcalm counties.

Card System Inaugurated -- A card index of all members has been started by the West Palm Beach, Fla., Group. Cards have also been printed listing the place and time of meetings and these are being mailed to a l l hotels, churches and police stations, along with a letter asking them to place it where everyone interested can see it. Other activities include the appointment of two correspondents for The Grapevine; naming three men and three women as a welcoming committee to receive new members who arrive at meetings without sponsors; and having the 12 Steps printed on a banner which is hung back of the speaker's stand at each meeting. With the annual influx of winter visitors the group anticipates many old and new friends.

Happy Birthdays--Helping the Niagara Frontier Area celebrate its sixth anniversary at a banquet at Hotel Buffalo were delegations from Toronto, Hamilton, Guelph, St. Catharines and Simcoe, Canada, Eric and Bradford. Pa., Cleveland, O., and Elmira, Corning, Rochester, Salamanca, Lockport, Jamestown, Eden, Niagara Falls, Tonawanda and North Tonawanda, N. Y. Trustee Dick S., formerly of Akron, O., and now of New York, was the speaker, taking as his theme the traditions and the need of unity. Among the 500 in attendance were several guests who have been good and helpful friends of the Buffalo groups, including Chief Judge of the City Court John J. Hillery, Dr. Donald C. O'Connor, superintendent of Meyer Memorial Hospital, and Sunderland P. Gardner, chairman of the Committee on Alcoholism for the Council of Social Agencies. Invocation was pronounced by Rev. Robert F. Kilroy, O.M.I., who authored an article on A.A. that was widely circulated in Catholic publications earlier this year. Through the courtesy of RKO, the film, "I Am an Alcoholic," was shown as a finish to the largest and most successful A.A. demonstration ever held on the Niagara Frontier. . .

"Remember Des Moines in November" was the slogan for the fourth anniversary holiday, November 1 and 2, at Des Moines, Ia., where the two day program started on Saturday with a noon lunch at the club, followed by a closed meeting for alcoholics, while the women were entertained at Hotel Ft. Des Moines at a tea with Betty Wells, radio commentator, as speaker. Saturday evening there was a banquet and floor show at the hotel. Sunday morning began with a free "chuck wagon" breakfast at the club, followed at 2 o'clock by an open meeting in the grand ballroom of the hotel with Clem. L. of Chicago as speaker. Des Moines gestures of thoughtfulness included a transportation committee to take guests any place in the city and a committee to carry luggage.

The fourth anniversary banquet of the St. Cloud. Minn., Group was attended by 235 from all parts of the state. Members of the Minneapolis and St. Paul Groups spoke briefly and to the point, while other talks were given by public officials and members of the clergy.

Scheduled for November 16 and 17, the third anniversary plans of the Wichita, Kans., Group were not complete at the time for Grapevine copy. Open house at the club rooms, 536 North Broadway, on Saturday afternoon and night with the dinner and main meeting to come Sunday afternoon are the principal plans. Good representation from groups in Kansas, Oklahoma, Missouri and Texas is expected.

Jamestown, N. D., Group, which was organized September 28, 1946, observed its first anniversary recently with the two members of the St. Paul, Minn., Group who started the organization returning for the meeting to present year pins to three of the original group. During the year the Group has tripled in growth and in becoming associated with the North Dakota State hospital in the city has aided with hospitalized alcoholics as a major part of its 12th Step work. More than 30

patients
have been exposed to A.A. through this group and have been sent out to other
groups or to organize their own groups in some other part of the state. The project for
the coming year will be to acquaint better the local and civic community with the workings and benefits of A.A.

First anniversary celebration .for the Park Slope, Brooklyn, N. Y., Group was observed with a dinner-dance at Michel's restaurant on October 23. Starting
with eight members in August, 1946, and without quarters, the Group has had its own clubhouse since March, at 80 Sterling Place.

The club is open every night from 7:30 to about midnight and from 1 p.m. on Saturdays and Sundays. The Saturday night open meetings have long since outgrown the club, which holds about 100. Meetings are now held in the school across the street.

The Rosemead, Cal., Group celebrated its first year in the Rosemead Women's club
with a home-prepared super-colossal spaghetti dinner. Over 250 members and guests
from surrounding A.A. groups were present. A year ago the average attendance of the Rosemead Group was around 30, while now it runs between 100 and 125. The women's group, started last spring with seven members, has grown so large that meetings
are now held in a hall at 1921 E. Valley Boulevard, Rosemead, on Thursdays at 8 o'clock.

Into Larger Quarters--Since September the Kansas City, Mo., Group has been holding its Friday night meetings in the ballroom of the BPOE at 612 Grand Avenue.
After
many months of searching the committee decided the Elks ballroom to be the most suitable place as it offers parking facilities as well as direct public transportation
from any part of Greater Kansas City. The hall, at 34th and Main Streets, will continue in use for other activities.

Dubuque, Waterloo and Cedar Rapids, Ia.; Eau Claire, LaCrosse and Sparta, Wis.; Rochester, Faribault and Owatonna, Minn., helped swell the crowd. The Winona A.A.s used considerable newspaper advertising space and received much favorable comment in the columns of the 'Republic Herald,' local paper.

A. A. Lands on Okinawa -- "Happy to inform you that we now have an A.A. group started and going on this island, with the help of my A.A. friend E. W. of the Miami, Fla. Group," our correspondent writes from that spot in the Pacific. "We've had five meetings; at the first one, we were only three and at last week's meeting we were 20. Both E. W. and I have been on the beam here in Okinawa, thanks to A.A. and the A.A. way to stay sober. Will you please send 'The A.A. Grapevine' air mail, as it takes about six to eight weeks to get here by boat."

Bowl Over Pins, Not Bottles -- Cleveland, Ohio, A.A. bowling leagues are again in full swing playing host to some exceptionally fine keglers as well as those satisfied to settle for enjoyment rather than high scores. Growth of the leagues has been phenomenal with about 300 men taking part and finding not only pleasure but a good way to let off steam. Many new members find new and mutually helpful friendships on the lanes. Cash prizes are awarded each learn in the order of its average at the season's end; matches are strongly contested with many A.A. spectators as well as bowlers. Cleveland A.A.s are looking forward to the holiday party season with many plans made.

Badge Shows Squad Pride -- A blue triangle with the figure "5" and letter "P" in a yellow monogram identifies the wearer as member of Squad Five or the Perseverance Squad of Washington, D.C. Adopted some months ago, the emblem is worn at group meetings and other A.A. gatherings. The figure is defined as the first five

Steps of the A.A. program with members of the squad attempting to aid each other up and through the first five Steps. The color of the figure and letter is symbolic
of
the light that is necessary for members to seek to accomplish the task. The blue field of the triangle denotes the caliber of personality necessary to aspire to such an undertaking. The letter stands for the name of the squad and the important human quality which manifests itself at meetings.

Mississippians Meet -- One of the largest and most enthusiastic A.A. meetings ever held in the state of Mississippi was staged at Philadelphia, Miss., recently
when members of the Columbus, Jackson, Louisville and Meridian groups convened for a big barbecue and open meeting. The feature speaker of the four-city joint session
was Maryan H. of Memphis, chairman of the southeastern regional meeting held in
the Tennessee city in September.

Cincinnatians Active -- Under the auspices of the Salvation Army's Men's social center a banquet at the Cincinnati, Ohio, Club recently attracted more than 250 men and women. Major Paul Harvey of the Salvation Army served as chairman and introduced Major Peter Hofman of Cleveland, the man who first infiltrated A.A. into the work of reclaiming men. The Akron, Ohio, member who styles himself "the first guinea pig
in the A.A. operation" gave a much enjoyed talk. Cities represented from outside Cincinnati with its seven units, were Hamilton, Springfield, Dayton, Columbus,
Middletown, Cleveland, Indianapolis, Covington, Lexington and Frankfort. Plans
are under way to make the dinner an annual affair. In Cincinnati at present the
A.A.
Group of Greater Cincinnati operates out of the Palace Hotel. The Cincinnati Fellowship Group occupies its handsome home at 405 Oak Street with a full nightly schedule of meetings and a secretary in daily attendance. The Freeman Group

(Salvation Army) meets weekly at 1508 Freeman Avenue and the Covington, Ky., Group meets weekly in the Cathedral Lyceum in that city. Four suburban home-meeting groups are now operating and all things point toward a record year for A.A. in this locality. A Hallowe'en party staged at the clubhouse was heavily attended by members, their wives and children.

Tacoma Attendance Gains -- Attendance is picking up in Tacoma, Wash., our reporter writing that there were 14 new faces, eight of them women, at a recent meeting. A.A. in the Northwest is receiving considerable help from a series of much appreciated articles written by Byron Fish of 'The Seattle Times' which give a good picture of how A.A. works. The reporter also writes that during a recent vacation he visited groups in Portland, Ore., and 10 in the Los Angeles area.

Omaha Women Organize -- A group composed entirely of women has been organized in Omaha, Nebr., and a series of meetings scheduled. While this group retains membership and attendance in their respective groups, members meet each week in a session for women only and discuss their special problems and development of practicable and effective 12th Step activity.

Discussion by Letter -- The Polk County Group, composed of A.A.s from Lakeland, Mulberry, Barlow, Winter Haven and Lake Wales, Fla., feel they have something novel in the way of meetings. John G. wrote to the Rome, Ga., Group and asked that they put on the program, which they did by letter. Different members of the Rome Group explained different Steps, and after the letter was read there was a general group discussion which lasted three meeting nights. Our reporter, who lives in Lake Wales, reports only four members there. They have group meetings Thursdays and then go to Barlow for the Polk County meeting. By next spring each town hopes to have its own

group but it will have the county group as the "parent."

Nominations Made Easy -- "We have found a good way to appoint committees," the secretary of the South Charleston, W. Va., Group writes. "Just let some bird holler

for something -- he is right away made a committee of one to do it. Sometime ago someone suggested a Thanksgiving party. He was IT. Someone else suggested that it was getting so hot that we should have a fan. Guess who was at once nominated to get

it.

I am hoping that someone suggests getting another secretary. Boy, do I know who

is going to get that job!"

Seamen's Group in Montreal -- A new group for seamen has been inaugurated formally at the Montreal Sailors' Institute, Place Royal, Montreal, Canada. The four charter members have the cooperation of the Rev. William MacLean, manager and chaplain of the institute, who sat in on the first meeting, offering all the facilities of the Institute. The group was well received by the press, 'The Montreal Herald' in particular.

Sponsor Prison Group -- The Springfield, Mo., Group has been sponsoring an A.A. meeting at the federal prison in that city for more than three months. The prison, known as the U. S. Medical Center, has inmates here for treatment from all over

the

U. S. and many have had previous experience with A.A. Notice of the first meeting carried in 'The Prison News' brought dozens of applications to attend.

However,

Warden Pescor and Educational Director Bowman carefully screened the applicants

and allowed only eight, of whom five had had previous A.A. experience, to come.

Meetings

are held at 6 o'clock on the first and third Tuesdays of each month with at least two members from the Springfield Group attending and with at least one new man going each time.

Hold Vermont All-State Dinner -- More than 350 Vermont A.A.s, guests and friends attended the first annual statewide A.A. dinner at Montpelier, Vt., on October 18.

The dinner was also the occasion of the third anniversary of the Montpelier , Vt.

Group. Principal A . A . speaker was Bill W., cofounder of A.A., who emphasized the need for attention to the principles of A.A. and declared that these principles would go far to assure its perpetual unity. Principal non-A.A, speaker was Father James Timmons, editor of 'The Sign'. The large crowd caught the Vermont A.A.

Intergroup

Committee, sponsor of the meeting, unaware and hastily erected seats had to be prepared to handle it. The committee reports, however, that everyone was comfortably seated and that the dinner was a huge success.

For A.A. Grapevine 100% -- Subscriptions received from the Fairport-East Rochester, N. Y. Group make all nine members subscribers. Formed early this year the group

has started a policy of giving a year's subscription to 'The A.A. Grapevine' to each member reaching a three months' period of sobriety and hopes to keep up its 100

per cent subscription record in this manner.

Mankato Proud of Club -- A barren warehouse room has been transformed into a modern and attractive clubroom by Mankato, Minn., A.A.s to serve as the official meeting place and recreation center for that city and much of Southern Minnesota.

Located at

502 North Front Street, the new club is described in the Mankato 'Free Press'

as comprising a foyer, office, squad room, a large attractive lounge, a completely equipped kitchen and serving counter and large assembly and game rooms, with bright, attractive furniture. The newspaper article describes the growth of the group from its start three years ago, to 60 members and in the editorial columns the paper supports the A.A. program.

Houston Judge Helps -- Through the influence of a prominent Houston, Texas city court judge, a new building has been erected at the penal farm where old offenders are placed and held in a clean, sanitary abode until they are released and returned to the city, where A.A. and other organizations can aid them. The judge, who spoke at a recent meeting of the Suburban Group, deplored conditions and treatment and said many could be restored to useful citizenship. The executive secretary for the Houston Committee for Education on Alcoholism followed the judge to cite the work being done for the establishment of an alcoholic clinic and the contacts now being made with all Houston hospitals to accept alcoholics as such and render the necessary treatment. It is hoped the civic authorities, the committee and the four local A.A. Groups will cooperate to remedy conditions. The Houston Suburban Group has opened its new club house at 1959 West Alabama Street and extends a cordial welcome to A.A. visitors.

Take 11 steps -- The Twin City Group, composed of members from Benton Harbor and St. Joseph, Mich., have formed the A.A.A. or Alcoholics Anonymous Auxiliary. The members are trying to live by 11 Steps, all but the first of the 12. They advocate attending all open meetings and lectures, as well as social gatherings in order to learn all they can about alcoholics, their own associates in particular.

Busy in Beloit -- The Beloit, Wis., Group, an offspring of the Chicago Group, has grown from one member less than two years ago to 25 at present with one or more newcomers at each meeting. Originally the group included Janesville, but seven months ago the latter group became so large that it was necessary to split, although the two groups get together for the weekly Saturday night social gathering when husbands and wives attend. Beloit membership includes A.A.s from the surrounding towns of Delevan and Elkhorn as well as Rockton, Ill., while recently several summering at Lake Geneva drove down for the mid-week discussion. Chicago A.A.s are frequent visitors and their talks have been inspiring. One of the Chicago members will discuss A.A. before the local Kiwanis club soon. Recently families of the Janesville and Beloit Groups joined in an all-day picnic at Big Hill park with a baseball game between the two groups as a highlight. Much cooperation from representative citizens including the police chief, ministers, doctors and hospital staff and the editor of the 'Daily News' has been received, the letter's publicity bringing in several new members as well as educating the public. One of the moving picture houses ran the movie short, "I Am an Alcoholic."

Family Hour Enjoyed -- Wonderful success in enjoyment of "the Family Hour" is reported from Sacramento, Cal., where it was first urged by a member coming in from Portland, Ore. Fortunately another member helped and managed to get Sunday night set aside for the meeting, which was greeted with eagerness and understanding. One member has effected a reconciliation with his wife and son after 17 years of separation. Every Sunday morning five or six men from this group go up to the Folsom Prison Group. Many other activities center around the Billois Club, named for Bill and his wife, while recently 37 chartered a bus and went to Stockton to bear M. M., as they also did to start a new group in Marysville. Many went to Roseville for the second birthday of that group.

Non-Alcoholics Speak -- A Cleveland, Ohio Group recently heard two non-alcoholic wives of alcoholic husbands and a non-alcoholic husband of an alcoholic wife in a program which proved helpful and illuminating. Major purpose of the discussion period was an attempt to arrive at the best and most helpful kind of cooperation with the alcoholic on the part of nonalcoholic members of the family. It was felt the expressed reaction was of great value to the group.

Open Meeting at San Quentin -- the third quarterly open meeting of the group at California State Prison, San Quentin, recently was attended by 109 members from the Bay Area Groups in addition to 150 members of the group in the prison. A.A.s from San Francisco, Oakland, Alameda, Richmond, Vallejo, Santa Rosa, San Rafael, Burlingame, San Mateo, Palo Alto, Pittsburgh and Redwood City were among invited guests. The general session was devoted to discussions by both men and women A.A.s and non-alcoholic visitors. Dr. D. G. Schmidt, acting chief medical officer at San Quentin, spoke from the point of view of a psychiatrist while Warden Clinton T. Duffy, long a supporter of A.A., and Associate Wardens D. C. Rig and H. O. Tees were also invited to speak. 'The San Quentin News', prison newspaper, carried an advance news story and an editorial praising and explaining A.A.

Judge Advises Joining A.A. -- Two men before North Adams, Mass., district court on drunkenness charges were advised to join A.A. by Special Justice William A. O'Hearn recently in an action which is believed by members of the Pittsfield Group to set a precedent for Massachusetts and perhaps for the country. Stating that the commonwealth classifies drunkenness as a crime and does little or nothing to bring about rehabilitation, Judge O'Hearn said he feels it is a disease and "we should begin to do something about it." The judge continued one case for a year and placed the other on a year's probation, concluding by saying, "I had little faith in A.A. when it was first organized but I have watched the growth of this organization and know some of its splendid accomplishments. I feel that today it perhaps offers the greatest opportunity in overcoming this terrible curse." The Pittsfield Group, which includes members from North Adams is following through on this by planning a big open meeting at the Hotel Richmond in North Adams soon. With the splendid cooperation of the local radio and press it is hoped that this will be successful and result in the formation of a North Adams Group.

Steps to Sobriety -- Ten steps to sobriety have been worked out by S. R., secretary of the Springfield, Mo., Group and printed on small cards for distribution. The final steps express the thought that through the A.A. program he can achieve "a peace of mind; a tranquility that will enable me to live in serenity of spirit with my family and friends; and to be in harmony with whatever Higher powers there are that guide the universe and that I accept as living proof the thousands of men and women who have been helped." It concludes with the statement, "I strongly desire a life of sobriety and will try with honesty and sincerity to practice charity and tolerance with all people."

Prison Group Planned -- A.A.s of Santa Fe, N. M., recently proposed to officials of the state penitentiary' that a group be formed there in the near future. A.A. officers met with inmates recently and distributed literature in Spanish and English and asked those interested to consider forming a group.

Forum at Danville -- Four Indianapolis A.A.s conducted an open forum at Danville, Ill., recently which was attended by about 200 and drew good comment and favorable newspaper publicity. A small printed pamphlet was widely distributed by members to friends, churches and other civic groups while at the door of the forum meeting one of the member's wives handed out another pamphlet to each one entering as well as slips of paper for questions, the latter resulting in good discussion. One Danville member was on the platform with the visitors. The audience included members of the clergy, social workers and those with alcohol problems in their families. Several calls have resulted from the session.

Winnipeg Has Open Session -- A large theatre was rented for the first public meeting at Winnipeg, Canada, on December 4, with Mr. R. of Wisconsin as the speaker. It is reported that the public there is becoming more conscious of the alcoholic problem and that the Winnipeg Group now numbers 100 with the majority doing well.

Happy Sobriety -- A dramatic contrast between five and one-half years of sobriety marked by restlessness, dissatisfaction, resentments and a relapse into drinking was made by Bill H. of the West Palm Beach, Fla., Group on the anniversary of his four years of A.A. coming into A.A. in South Orange, N. J., The speaker said that in some mystic manner he had changed from an agnostic. After The meeting there was a party with anniversary cake, and for a joke Bill was first presented with a neatly iced

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">Year US/Canada

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1990 1,100,155

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1991 1,170,454

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1992 1,230,381

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1993 1,231,271

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1994 1,223,017

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1995 1,251,192

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1996 1,257,570

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1997 1,268,578

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1998 1,268,713

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">1999 1,261,691

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">2000 1,260,928

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">2001 1,257,775

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">2002 1,265,090

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">In other words membership peaked in 1998 and has been, by and large, stagnant since 1997. It did rise significantly last year versus 2001.

10.0pt;font-family:Arial;color:navy;">Since we don't keep membership lists, our membership numbers are only as good as the figures each group reports to GSO in our annual updates. How good are the counts for your home group? Is it the number that you'd consider that group their one or PRIMARY home group--or do they count attendance. When I was area registrar I cut over 1500 members off our count simply by reviewing groups I was familiar with for reasonability and urging our DCMs to do likewise.

-----

*From:* james

be exact.

Exact membership statistics in AA, however, are not and never will be available, since protection of individual members' anonymity guarantees that general membership rolls will not be kept. The latest count of total members in 58 countries around the globe is based on reports from 5,243 groups and 127 "loners." And, as all observant group members know, the active membership of a group may vary at any given moment, sometimes according to the interpretation of "when is a member?" In addition, many groups fail to report new membership figures from year to year.

Another variable which follows an unpredictable pattern is the precise method of "counting noses" used by the various groups. Some suggest that those who attend and take part regularly in meetings declare themselves members (or not, as the case may be) of that group; others may count everyone who has been dry and shows up fairly regularly for at least three months; still others base the count on a rough division of the average financial collection; some count only those who come out in bad weather, never turn down a Twelfth Step call, and are always willing with the broom or dish-pan! There may even be some, it has been unauthoritatively suggested, that count the cigarette butts after a meeting . . .

Since General Service Headquarters never issues instructions, rules and regulations or anything else that might suggest an AA "government," the compilers of AA's annual census rely, by and large on the faithful reporting by each group secretary of what appears to be the more or less stable core of membership in the group. In New York a staff of four toiled for three months, processing the thousands of information cards, and the countless letters received from the groups who preferred supplying the desired information in that form, to produce the new Directory.

The 1953 total membership figure represents an increase of 13,637 individual members over 1952, or about 12 per cent. The total number of groups increased from 4,205 to 5,243 or roughly 24 per cent. At Directory press time there were 2,324 members in 98 hospital groups, an increase of 16 new groups in hospitals and rest camps; 9,304 members in 173 prison groups, an increase of 40 new prison groups; 15,675 members in 773 groups outside the United States, including 51 loners and 91 Internationalists (AA seamen). AA is now on the map in 17 places where it never was before, bringing the total number of countries with alcoholics recovering in AA to 58 (including the United States).

Some of these far-flung areas are at present represented only by "loners," people in remote sections who are following the AA program "on their own," sustaining their sobriety through the AA Big Book and correspondence with each other and with their General Service Headquarters. Each loner is the nucleus of a potential new group.

The new AA World Directory indicates that membership growth of Alcoholics Anonymous appears to be leveling off and settling down to steady progress, reflecting the gradual spread of information and education about the disease of alcoholism which afflicts upwards of 4,000,000 individuals in the United States alone. The 1953 world "census" of AA completes an eighteen-year record:

Year Members

1935 3
1936 15
1937 40
1938 65
1939 100
1940 500

standards.

In between these two extremes are dozens of other methods and approaches to "counting noses" in AA, with some groups holding to the idea that the principle of anonymity rules out the keeping of membership records entirely. Last year, in fact, some 500 groups indicated no membership figures at all on their registration cards sent to General Service Headquarters for listing in the annual Group Directory!

Nevertheless, for the past few years an annual AA "census" has been taken and published, despite the innumerable difficulties encountered in compiling the record and the heroic effort required for even an approach to accuracy.

Is the Directory an accurate record of AA membership figures? How reliable a guide is it to AA's actual growth during the past few years? Why is it desirable to have

a

"census" ? How can the groups help in the compiling of a reasonably exact accounting of the size of membership? Should there be any general guides in determining membership in a group, as distinct from the fellowship of AA, for census purposes?

To answer these and other questions frequently raised both in correspondence and in conversation, The Grapevine talked with the "census-takers" at General Service Headquarters, studied the Directory figures of the past few years, and heard some of Bill's ideas on the subject.

The most important idea garnered in this research is this: membership figures in the Directory represent group membership only, as reported to General Service Headquarters by the groups themselves, plus the addition of lone members and Internationalists (seamen) from Headquarters records. The Directory was never intended to reflect the total of the undoubtedly vast numbers of alcoholics who

are

now, or who have been, sober through contact with Alcoholics Anonymous and the application of its principles to their drinking problem.

That this figure is far greater than the actual reported membership is obvious,

and,

if those who sobered up in AA and went sober to their graves during the past nineteen years were added to the total, it would be a still greater figure.

It is the concept of total recoveries, probably, that leads individual AAs to quote membership figures which in some cases approach the astronomical. This, of course, is the individual's right, to have and to express a personal opinion as to how many alcoholics have found the AA road to recovery. Actual reported membership in groups, however, is another matter, and can easily be checked by reference to the latest Group Directory. Every group registered at General Service Headquarters receives a copy of the Directory, which is entitled The Group Secretary's Handbook and Directory. In using the Directory, however, several facts should be borne in mind. First, as mentioned above, since no uniform standards for counting members exist, the figures reported by groups can not be regarded as an exact measure. Second, an unknown number of groups are in existence which have never registered with General Service Headquarters and hence do not appear in the Group Directory. Third, groups registered with General Service Headquarters which fail to provide up-to-date information for each new Directory are listed with the last information available, which in most cases is obsolete. (If such groups do not respond to inquiries after two years of silence have elapsed they are, by approval of the General Service Conference, dropped from the Directory. Last year 234 groups were dropped from the active registration list for this reason.) Fourth, of those groups registered, many do not give membership figures. Until recently, such groups were counted, for the sake of the record, as consisting of two members. In the latest (1954) Directory, however, a more realistic estimate has been reached through the device of projecting the average number of group members on these non-reporting groups. In other words, each group failing to report membership figures is assumed to have twenty members, on the basis of the average of members in those groups which did report membership figures. Total worldwide membership, as in the 1954 Directory, is 128,296 in 5,401 groups. Groups or lone members are reported from 58 countries.

reported
The 1954 Directory, according to its compilers, comes closer, within the limitations outlined, to reflecting group membership than previous ones which sidestepped the problem of listing groups with "no" members. There are indications also of greater exactness on the part of groups in reporting active membership, since the inauguration, in 1952, of the system of listing group contributions to General Service Headquarters in the Directory. In this connection, it is emphasized that listing in the annual Directory does not depend upon contributing to Headquarters; all that is necessary is for the group to fill out a registration card. Also, it is pointed out, those groups who do contribute to the cost of General Service are by no means required to observe the full "$2 a head per year" yardstick, which, Bill explains, was selected as a convenient guide for groups in apportioning their finances.
Those members who are amazed that the official Directory of Alcoholics Anonymous does not show some 200,000 members by now are advised to bear in mind the many loopholes and problems inherent in the whole question of "counting noses" in AA, and to take note, year after year, of the steadily growing numbers of new groups reported. In 1953, for instance, there were 435 new groups formed and registered at Headquarters
... a good bit better than one a day!
To return to the question as to why a "census" is desirable and how the groups may assist in achieving a reasonably accurate one . . . during the first years of AA's existence there were no problems relative to size of membership. Practically everyone could crowd into an old-fashioned kitchen. As AA grew it fortunately did not employ a host of professional sociologists intent on numerical data instead of AA's spiritual objective. As a result, figures as to AA membership have not, as explained earlier, been compiled in accordance with rigorous scientific methods. So what? Why is that important? AA has come a long way since those early days around a pot of coffee in Lois and Anne's kitchens. Today many scientific organizations are interested in alcoholism and we welcome their cooperation as well as that of press and radio. From time to time we are asked for information, and rarely is our answer accepted that "AA keeps no records." The inquirer invariably urges "just give a rough estimate." Therefore we try to supply figures that are as accurate as we can compile with reasonable effort. Moreover, reliable figures are needed if we are to have any clear idea as to whether we are continuing to make adequate progress. In addition to the inherent difficulties previously described, the local group secretaries, who are the chief source of information, are not likely to be trained statisticians; but even if they were they would need precise instructions as to what and how to count, so that the reporting would be consistent both geographically throughout all of AA's structure, and chronologically from year to year so that annual comparisons would have meaning. To aid consistency of reporting, can there be, without violating the spirit of Tradition Three, some fundamental agreement about basic concepts such as "who is a member of AA?" and "who is a member of this group?" Printed definitions and suggestions setting forth answers to these questions, for census purposes only, could go a long way towards achieving a reasonable uniformity of reporting within a fairly short time. We might try, by way of illustration, to see if we can develop some basic concepts that might be helpful in achieving consistency in membership tabulation. Who, for example, is a member of AA ? As suggested before, there is ample authority in the prepared literature for agreeing that a person is a member of AA whenever he chooses to say so. Elsewhere the statement is made that the only qualification for AA membership is an honest desire to stop drinking. This is one principle that might well be rephrased. Of the many thousands of present members of AA, about how many would you guess came in with an "honest desire to stop drinking?" About how many had no desire at all to stop drinking but were simply desperate or were casually "looking about" at some

other person's insistence? The fact is that a substantial percentage, if not an overwhelming majority, need to be in AA for some time in order to acquire "an honest desire to stop drinking." The prior principle, then, at least for census purposes, is preferable: a person is a member whenever he chooses to say so.
That seems simple enough, but what about such statements as, "More than 150,000
men and women have found recovery (or a happy sobriety) in AA" ? What is recovery or happy sobriety? A problem drinker seeks AA's help today and accepts all his new-found sponsors tell him. Tomorrow he tells a dozen people he is in AA. He is. But has
he really found sobriety? Isn't it a little too soon to tell? Should not the new member be dry for some period of time before he can be said to have recovered ? A week,
a month, three months? Some groups set three months as a desirable preliminary
to giving a talk at an open meeting, or going on a Twelfth Step call.
Suppose a person is dry six months or six years and has a slip? He continues,
of course, to be a member of AA unless he decides otherwise, but should he not accumulate a reasonable period of sobriety, even as the newcomer, before being counted among those who have found recovery?
Being a member of AA and being a member of a specific group, as pointed out earlier, involve two quite different and distinct ideas. A person gets sober in Old Town
and subsequently moves a thousand miles away to New City but never goes near the New
City
AA group. He surely cannot be counted with the New City membership. However,
our transplanted member no longer maintains any connections with Old Town, either.
How to get him into the AA census? There is a way, which will be described shortly. Duplication of reporting can occur in those areas where there are many groups and where some members regularly attend two to four group meetings a week. Obviously each member should be counted by only one group. Each member, it would seem, ought to have a group with which he clearly establishes this. Ordinarily, but not in every case, it will be the group in the community where he resides. To be considered a member of a group, should not a person attend the group's meetings at least occasionally, participate in group activity in some manner, take occasional Twelfth Step calls, and introduce to his group new prospects who live in the vicinity? It is hardly fair to a group with certain financial responsibilities involved in "carrying the message" to consider someone a "member" who attends one meeting in a year and drops a quarter in the collection box. Each case, of course, should be considered on its merits, but the total picture is bound to be confused when a secretary counts as an active member of the group a person who in fact is completely inactive and who has neither displayed any interest in the group nor in any way contributed to its welfare during, perhaps, the past six months. Can we, then, in view of what has been said evolve some general principles that may be helpful in achieving a reasonable uniformity of method when making membership tabulations? The following may be a beginning:

Suggested Guides in Determining Membership in The Fellowship and in The Group for Census Purposes

1. A person is a member of AA whenever he or she chooses to say so.
2. When reference is made to those who have found recovery in AA, the figures quoted should include only those who have had a definite period of uninterrupted sobriety at the time of tabulation.

The length of this period may vary from group to group, unless a general agreement could be reached on an approximate period.

3. An AA member should be counted as an active member of a specific group only if he displays some interest in that group and periodically contributes to its welfare

by attending meetings or by carrying out other group responsibility at least on a minimal basis.

4. A member should be counted for census purposes by one group only, generally the group geographically nearest his home, unless he has established clearly defined affiliations with some other group.

5. In addition to active members affiliated with a local group, there may be in

the community persons who at one time were actively associated with AA and who are believed to be still affiliated with AA in spirit. They are believed to be sober

and are not known to belong to any group. They might be termed inactive members, for census purposes.

In the community also may be some former members of AA who neither display any interest in the local group nor achieve any success at maintaining sobriety.

There is no reason, it would seem, for including them in any current tabulation. If they really belong, time will tell and they can be included in a later edition.

Summary

In reporting membership for census purposes the secretary or other officer might use the following guides in arriving at the total number of members to be reported to General Service Headquarters:

(a) active members sober (for example) three months or more.

(b) active members sober less than three months (or whatever period the group decides).

(c) inactive members in the community who are believed to be affiliated with AA

in spirit, who maintain sobriety, and who are believed not to be affiliated with any specific group.

These suggested classifications would be solely to guide secretaries in determining the group's size. They would not give us any new kinds of membership, nor set up any arbitrary membership "rules." All are AAs exactly as before. If observed, the classifications would merely facilitate counting and help to eliminate duplication. They are doubtless far from perfect and it is perhaps altogether impossible to devise definitions covering such broad concepts as "recovery" and "membership" to fit every case. Yet, if some definitions such as those given were used and if the groups were given an opportunity to become completely familiar with them over a reasonable period of time, more precise reporting of census figures would almost certainly follow. An individual group would know exactly where it stands today as compared with a year ago and with two years ago. The same could be said with respect to the movement as a whole or with respect to any geographical section, such as a city or a state. What do you think ?

-----T-A-B-L-E-S-----

AA Worldwide Membership
Spring 1954*
GROUPS MEMBERSHIP
4,159 Groups in U.S.A 92,548
504 Groups in Canada 9,149
Groups outside U.S.A.
354 and Canada. 9,359
151 Hospital Groups 4,425
233 Prison Groups 12,149
-- Lone Members 168
-- Internationalists 98
5,401
128,296

* as reported to General Service Headquarters for publication in The Group Secretary's Handbook and Directory, April 1954

-----

to combine its annual dinner with a regional meeting and ask the cooperation and participation of all groups in the region. The assembly is scheduled for the entire day of January 31 at the hotel with the forums and gatherings in the morning and afternoon. The dinner in the evening will climax the day.

A.A. Pilots Friendship Train -- The Milwaukee Railroad had the choice of its crack engineer to carry the Friendship train as far as Dubuque, Ia "And whom do you think got the honor?" asks Hildagarde of the A.A. 'Tribune'. "Old Dingbat who had been fired under Rule G and who is now back at the throttle because of A.A."

Institute Shows Results -- Effects of the recent Institute held at the University of California at Berkeley, Cal, are already beginning to be felt in the San Francisco Bay Area and the Bay Area Groups are very happy over it. Two municipal court judges have come out recently with public statements regarding the "drunk" problem, one of them, Municipal Judge Twain Michelsen of San Francisco saying "eighty per cent of the county jail population consists of inebriates." Judge Michelsen said he fully intended to free all men brought before him on drunkenness charges, unless they seemed in need of medical care. In this way, he said, he hoped to focus public attention on the problem. He reached his decision after a tour of the "drunk tanks" in San Francisco police stations on which he was accompanied by the executive secretary of the San Francisco Committee for Education on Alcoholism. Judge Christ B. Fox of the Oakland Municipal Court is turning the consideration of the problem of drunks appearing before him over to two probation officers, one of whom spent last summer at the summer session of the Yale clinic. Judge Fox said that while he cannot sentence men to A.A. he can at least guide their footsteps that way. . . . The Richmond Group reports that it is fortunate in having a very liberal minded newspaper publisher who has given a full column, written by a member of the group, every Thursday afternoon. This has appeared for seven months and the group has been advised that it will appear as long as copy is provided. . . . The Richmond Group also furnished the main luncheon speaker at the Kiwanis Club luncheon recently and the same speaker will be scheduled for several other civic group meetings.

That Wagon Again -- What is probably the first police raid on an A.A. group was the distinction received by the Tidewater Group at Norfolk, Va., recently. A few members of the group were sitting around the still unopened new quarters one evening discussing improvements to be made when the police vice squad received information that the "joint" (the quarters had been illegally used by preceding tenants), recently padlocked, was open again. The police burst in on the preoccupied alkie, proclaiming a raid. They were considerably more embarrassed than the A.A.s . . .

The move to these new quarters at 505 and 517 Colley Avenue, Norfolk, is the second in 17 months as the result of the growth of the group. Ironically both the first quarters and the new ones were lavishly equipped with the most adequate facilities for dispensing alcoholic beverages. The bars left by previous tenants provided quite a familiar atmosphere for the incoming group and serve well as coffee bars.

Social Calendar Full -- San Antonio, Tex., A.A.s had a full social calendar for fall, with the women of the auxiliary inaugurating a series of Sunday evening suppers.

The first was an all-Mexican affair with a spaghetti supper, a barbecue and others following. For the fall party for the children and members, there was professional entertainment including a skilled hypnotist who put several members "under." .

For the first time in the history of the club there was a one year birthday party for both a husband and wife with a beautiful cake served during the social hour. .

Recent speakers at the meetings have included the Rev. Everett H. Jones, bishop of San Antonio, Star Dailey, U. S, Congressman Paul Kilday and others.

Episcopal

.
. .

For the fall party one of the members arranged and had printed 200 copies of a song book for social gatherings and the holiday season.

Many Cakes Cut -- An increasing number of one year sobriety anniversaries is making the West Palm Beach, Fla., Group, proud of its "step away from infancy."

Recently

four were celebrated in one night with the cutting of the symbolic, cake and presentation of books to the men and flowers to the women. A little later a party was given for one member, originally from the pioneer Greenwich, Conn., Group who was celebrating his eighth year. . . . A policy of visiting group speakers has been inaugurated in cooperation with Ft. Lauderdale and Miami.

Visitor Finds Growth -- On a recent trip through Eastern Canada, New York and Chicago, a member of the Beacon Hill Group, Victoria, B. C., Can., found steady growth in the various groups he was able to visit, according to the Beacon Group publication. In Winnipeg he found a membership of well over 100 with two groups, Winnipeg No. I and the Assiniboine Group. The latter, showing good progress since its formation a year ago, recently held a successful week-end at a well known holiday resort a few miles out of Winnipeg. . . . The Capital City Group of Ottawa is now meeting in St. Patrick's College after holding their meetings for a long time in

the Justice building, headquarters of the famed RCMP. . . . The group in Montreal Canada's largest city, is really going to town with several English speaking groups and a recently-formed French speaking group. An open meeting in Montreal recently attracted more than 250. . . . The club room at 1170 Yonge Street, Toronto, is well patronized, too.

Open Meeting Series -- The combined groups of Rochester, N. Y., recently inaugurated a series of open meetings in the auditorium of the Brick Church Institute, 121 North Fitzhugh Street, with outstanding A.A. members as speakers. A New Rochelle speaker was heard at the second meeting. At 'The Grapevine's' press time it was reported that the third meeting would be in with the Western New York regional conference. . . .

Another new group has also been formed in Rochester.

Ministers are Guests -- Two closed meetings are held each week by Spartanburg, S. C., to each of which two of the local ministers are invited. Invitations will be continued until all ministers in the c i t y have been asked. Members feel that they need the ministers' help while the ministers in turn have been asking for help from A.A. on numerous occasions. . . . The group is also sending a year's subscription to 'The Grapevine' each month to one doctor and one minister until it will be in the hands of all doctors and ministers in Spartanburg. . . . The group has just moved into new quarters at 109 Wall Street in the heart of the city which provide a meeting room, four small rooms which are used for showers, telephone and coat room, game room, kitchen and another large room which is the club room. . . . Family night is enjoyed the first Friday of each month and members of the group go out for a supper get-together once each month.

Big Open Meeting -- the Montgomery, Ala., Group recently invited all others to a big open meeting in the city auditorium where a member of the Jacksonville, Fla.. Group, was the speaker, introduced by an Andalusia member. The club room at 16½ South Perry was open throughout the day and immediately after the program there was an informal social session with refreshments in the club room.

Secretary Dies - Death of its secretary for many years, Bill M. was reported recently by the Indianapolis, Ind., Group. All regular services and activities are continuing without interruption and with as little change as possible, the mail address, P.O. Box 1474 and phone FR 2743 remaining unchanged. One of the members has been serving as temporary secretary until a permanent selection can be made.

Films Shown - An overflow crowd of 400 attended a recent special meeting of the South Bronx Group at Jerome school, 222 Alexander Avenue, New York, N. Y. In addition to three outstanding speakers the film, "I Am An Alcoholic" and last year's picture, "Problem Drinkers," were shown with sound. A motion picture executive, a non-alcoholic friend of A.A. donated the equipment and operated the machine.

Asheville Into New Quarters -- Formed in March, 1944, and now numbering 60 members, the Asheville, N. C., Group recently moved into its new club and celebrated with open house. Included in the new home are a spacious lounge, comfortably furnished club rooms, coffee bar, large logburning fireplace, a pool table and two bowling alleys.

New Groups Announced -- Inauguration of several new groups has been reported to 'The A.A. Grapevine.' Because their work on night shifts prevented them from attending their regular evening meetings, 11 members from the seven Grand Rapids, Mich., Groups have formed their own daylight group, the first meeting being held November 26 in the YMCA where the members met for lunch, followed by the first session. Members of other groups in the city have been invited to attend the meetings and from the enthusiasm shown the daylight group gives promise of becoming important. Meetings are held

Wednesdays from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. and afford an opportunity for many A.A.s who lunch downtown as well as visiting members to attend a midday meeting.

Two members of the Aberdeen, S. D., Alno Group were instrumental in forming a
group at Britton recently. Starting November 6 with the Aberdeen Alno Society coming up about 20 strong, the group recently had eight new members. At the first session
the Methodist minister and state attorney were present. The address is P.O. Box 82, Britton, S.D.

The organization meeting of a group at Vernal, Utah, was held at the Uintah County courthouse November 30 with representatives of A.A. from Salt Lake City, Provo,
and Spokane, Wash., on hand to help. The first gathering, an open one, was helped by local radio broadcasts and newspaper publicity.

Six members were present from Lake Wales and four visitors from Tampa and Barlow
when the Lake Wales, Fla., Group got under way early in November. This group is affiliated with the Polk County Group in Bartow, which will continue to aid the new organization. . . . The county organization was aided greatly by the 'Lakeland Ledger's' favorable publicity. . . . At a recent Barlow meeting there were 55 present
and it was necessary to move from the club rooms to a furniture display room.
The
Adelia Group of Tampa was in charge with visitors from Sebring.

The new group recently formed in Ypsilanti, Mich., has announced that it is holding closed meetings on Wednesdays at 8 o'clock at the Kaiser-Frazer chapel, Willow Run.
Mailing address is P.O. Box 210, Ypsilanti, Mich.

Nearly 50 members of the Dubuque, Ia, Group, along with similar caravans from
other cities went to the Amvets hall in Manchester recently to attend the first meeting of the group's there.

Emulate Mates -- The Associates, so named because of the members' desire for close association to their A.A, mates has been formed in Santa Rosa, Cal., following the pattern of the Family Group in San Francisco. Meetings are held once a week in separate quarters, but in the same building us the Santa Rosa Group. After the meetings the two groups join for a social hour. Influenced by the article "Husband Sees Rich Rewards for Non-Alcoholics" in the April issue of 'The Grapevine', the members met early in May and drew up a series of "steps" similar to those of the Family Group, including the recognition of alcoholism us a disease and through study and meditation to aid the other in maintaining sobriety, to apply the 12 Steps to every day living, to give moral and material support to families of the group, and In substitute tolerance and understanding for resentment and fear.

Broadcasts Bring Response -- Reaction from listeners to a series of broadcasts begun November 23 over station WCSH are reported as gratifying by A.A. members in Portland, Me. Heard at 1:15 Sundays, the series calls for nine broadcasts. . . .
Portland A.A.s are also pleased with their progress in the last six months. A new club room was acquired about that time and has been furnished mostly by gifts. Coffee facilities, telephone and radio are available. . . . Meetings are held twice a week with an average attendance of about 30.

Watertown Reports -- From "this high, dry and windy country," the Watertown, S. D., Group asks, "How about recognition of our group? We are 16 strong with periods of absolute sobriety ranging from one to 16 months." The address is P.O. Box 398, Watertown, S. D. . . . In this area the open meeting of the Bismarck-Mandan Chapter held recently received a large amount of newspaper publicity which has been helpful in making contacts.

No Customers -- From San Diego, Cal., comes an account from a column in the 'Daily

Journal 'which says, "A few evenings back as the Continental room of the Hotel San Diego was being prepared for a banquet, a barman burst into the scene, hurried to the darkened bar off to one side and complained to waitresses within hearing that he hadn't been notified, had no chance to get extra help and had to try to service people alone. An assistant manager heard his grumbling. 'I guess you don't know what banquet this is,' he told the barman. 'You can put your bottles away.' It was the annual dinner of A.A. The bar remained dark all evening."

500

Anniversaries Adding Up -- The Orchard Grove Group was organized eight years ago

as the first group on the west side and the second in Cleveland, O. A roundup of the old timers who contributed much to Cleveland's A.A. growth was held in Lakewood Community Center recently with the Lakewood and Lakewood-Clifton Groups collaborating to make a memorable meeting.

The fifth annual banquet sponsored by the Life Group of Grand Rapids, Mich., set

a new attendance record of 165 at the Rowe Hotel where a turkey dinner was enjoyed

and a member from Chicago talked. In addition to representation from the seven Grand Rapids Groups, A.A.s came from Muskegon, Battle Creek, Kalamazoo, Allegan, Greenville and Saginaw. A member from each group was invited to speak briefly by the chairman, and the growth of A.A. in Western Michigan and unity of spirit were the favorite topics.

"Wichita did it again," it is triumphantly reported from that city in Kansas with regard to the third anniversary which drew about 350 persons, representative members from eight states. Included in the two day session were speeches by the founder of the Des Moines, Ia, Group, the founder of the Amarillo, Tex., Group, a woman member, and Dr. R. M. Gouldner, prominent non-A.A. Wichita physician and surgeon who has assisted the group.

In observance of its second anniversary the Wakefield, Nebr., Group met at the American Legion hall, after which there was a social hour with refreshments.

At the evening banquet a steak dinner was served to 89 members, wives and guests, while a nine-piece orchestra provided music. . . . In connection with the observance it was recalled that the first meeting in the vicinity was held July 12, 1945, with four members and three visitors from the Sioux City, Ia, Group. After five meetings were held the group was disbanded, the members affiliating with the Sioux City Group.

On January 17, 1946, meetings were resumed with five members from Pender, two from Wayne and two from Wakefield. Eight members from Sioux City assisted in getting the Pender-Wakefield Group started. Of these members six are still active and one has died. For about a year meetings were held in homes, after which meetings were held in Wakefield as being most centrally located of the towns represented which include Rosalie, Bancroft, Pender, Wakefield, Wayne, Pilger, Madison, Stanton, Norfolk, Pierce, Wausa, Bloomfield, Crofton, Hartington, Newcastle and Ponca. Total active membership is 36, with four of more than two years' standing, three with 18 months or over and six a year or longer. About 125 A.A. members and guests gathered in Lutheran Parish church, Waverly, Ia, to honor the Waverly, Tripoli, Allison, New Hampton and Clarksville members celebrating their second year. Dinner was served by the women, while a member from Cincinnati was chairman and introduced a Minneapolis member who gave the address of the evening.

church

The Alconon Group of Ft. Wayne, Ind., had its first anniversary banquet at the YMCA.

Seating space being limited, invitations were confined to those groups who had cooperated in an exchange of speakers and visitors. The speaker of the evening was a member from Indianapolis. Among those present were members of the Defiance, O.,

Warsaw, Lagro, Logansport, Muncie, Kendallville and Albion Groups.

Exchange Leadership -- "Reciprocal A.A." is a new plan being tried by groups in the Long Beach, Cal., area, meaning that on a given date another group is requested

to take over the meeting with leader, co-leader, speakers and others from the visiting group. Since there are some 80 to 100 groups within easy driving distance it is regarded as being possible to set up a long time program avoiding too frequent appearance of the same speakers. . . . The East Bay Group, which reports this plan to

'The Grapevine' now has grown to 34. Since there are only 103 chairs available at the Naples hotel dining room and attendance is usually more than that, a set of "wall stretchers" or a division of the group may soon be necessary.

A.A. In Veterans Facility -- What 'The Grapevine's' correspondent believes to be

the first group formed in a Veterans Bureau Facility was started recently at Mountain Home, Tenn., with the full cooperation of Col. Lee B. Harr and the staff doctors. The

Johnson City Group helped in the organization which includes members from Maine

to

California. Meetings are held in the staff doctor's consulting room.

Cleveland Over 2,000 Mark -- The result of the annual census conducted by the Cleveland, O., district office shows that there are now approximately 2,300 persons in Greater Cleveland actively participating in the A.A. program. This total is comprised of group membership figures submitted to the office by secretaries.

Boston Birthday -- The Boston banquet celebrating the seventh anniversary of A.A.

there drew a capacity attendance -- 800 -- at the Hotel Copley Plaza on Wednesday evening, Nov. 19. This sellout of banquet tickets was an indication of the strides

A.A. itself has made. In the same hotel, 510 attended last year and 225 in 1945.

A.A.

co-founder, Bill W., discussed the 12 Points of Tradition. He told his audience

"we will avoid any exclusiveness, material wealth, tempting alliances, controversy, professionalism, promotion and public pressure. We are weaker than the average and we need not take such risks. You and I, as alcoholics, can sit down and talk over our problems with our brothers and sisters -- and that's all. The less we have to do

with

organization and prestige, the better."

Other speakers included A.A.s from Maine, New Hampshire and Connecticut.

Special

guests were the newly appointed members of Massachusetts Governor Bradford's Commission of the Study of Alcoholism which will serve for four years. Helen

B.,

the

Boston secretary, reported a membership of 1,450 associated with the Boston office.

Since March of 1946 when the Boston Central Service Committee of A.A. opened, membership of A.A. groups has mounted from 13 to 59 in Massachusetts, Maine

and

New

Hampshire.

Massachusetts Notes -- The East Milton Group held a pre-Christmas party on

.Sunday

night, Dec. 14. There were presents, etc., and as a feature, an "all-A.A. orchestra" provided the music for dancing . . . Southbridge, Group has become associated with Central Service Committee in Boston. Meetings are held Monday nights at 8:30 and

is an outgrowth of Worcester No. 1 Group . . . Waltham Group has opened up with meetings on Friday nights at 8:30 at 712 Main St. . . . Attleboro Group has shifted its meeting hour from 8:30 to 8 p.m.

Reciprocity Move -- Salem, Mass., Group put on an open meeting that packed the large hall in Town House Square on Friday night, Nov. 28, when the members of Manchester, Conn., Group conducted the meeting. Salem A.A.s had previously gone down to Manchester to put on a meeting there. The Rev. Fr. James P. Timmins of Manchester, a non-alcoholic but long a supporter of the A.A. group there, was the guest speaker in Manchester.

New Hampshire Jottings -- East Jaffrey, a new group started several weeks ago, held an opening meeting in the Town Hall on Wednesday night, Dec. 3, with Massachusetts visitors providing all the speakers. Malden, South End, Woburn, Somerville, Quincy, Arlington, Medford, Cambridge, Fitchburg and other Bay State group members made the trip by auto to lend support. The group meets on Saturday nights at the Firemen's Hall at 8 p.m. . . . Nashua Group is holding its meetings on Sunday nights at 8 p.m. at the Church of Good Shepherd hall.

Boston Experiments -- The Central Service Committee at Boston is letting delegates thresh out the method of running the All-Group meetings on Wednesday nights at 30 Huntington Ave., Boston, next year. Earlier this year, the old practice of having each group associated with Central Service conduct a meeting was followed and then some experiments were tried: "a married couples' night," "a women's night," and several "oldtimers' night." Then the delegates switched to the appointment of individual A.A. members to have complete charge of the program and selection of speakers. This made for variety in speakers and enabled the meetings to get away from

What he said was—and there was a touch of grimness in the way he said it: "You can chalk that victory up for Alcoholics Anonymous."

To pitch a no-hit game in these days of power-hitting demands a rare combination of skill, endurance, intelligence and plain luck. The pre A.A. Don Black could have contributed none of them.

Like the thousands of other ex-drunks who have banded themselves together for mutual protection in Alcoholics Anonymous, Black asks and accepts no personal credit for the startling reformation that lifted him from the brink of obscurity into the company of baseball immortals.

Black didn't drink because it was fun. He drank because he couldn't help himself. But Alcoholics Anonymous helped him as it has helped thousands.

In his gratitude, Black has voluntarily renounced his anonymity that is one of the foundation stones of A.A., in order to publicize the job that the organization can do for the thousands who are afflicted as he was.

Connie Mack, 85 year-old manager of the Athletics, was easily the most surprised person in the Cleveland Stadium the night Don Black shut out his hard-hitting team without a hit or anything resembling one.

Connie, noted for his patience with base-ball's problem children, lost patience with Black after several years of trying to induce him to give up liquor and capitalize on his baseball talents. Connie appealed to Don's pride, to his pocketbook and to his sense of loyalty to his wife and two pretty young daughters. Nothing worked.

The Athletics finally were glad to let Black go to the Cleveland Indians.

In 1946 Black won only one game for Cleveland. He was shipped down the river to Milwaukee where against minor league opposition, he lost five games, won none.

Shortly after Don had been sent to the minors, Bill Veeck, a 32-year-old ex-marine whose father had been president of the Chicago Cubs, organized a syndicate that bought the Cleveland franchise. Veeck knew how badly the Indians needed pitchers and he knew that the alcoholic Black couldn't help them. But he also knew about A.A.

When the Milwaukee season ended Veeck asked Black to stop off in Cleveland on the way to his Virginia home. He and his business manager talked long and earnestly with the wayward pitcher. They found only one encouraging sign: Black admitted despairingly that the stuff had him licked.

"Not if you can say that," Veeck assured him.

He sent for some representatives of Alcoholics Anonymous. They told Don that every one of them had been a drunken sot who had been restored to a respected place in the community through the understanding offices of A.A. With a shrug that said: "What can I lose?" Don agreed to give it a trial.

Veek obtained a winter job for him in Cleveland and the A.A. organization went to work.

Don made his first semi-public appearance at a dance given by Veek. Some acquaintances failed to recognize the good-looking clear-eyed man who, accompanied by a pretty young woman, smiled a hello, asked if he might sit at their table, and ordered a coke.

The acquaintances responded with a vague "good evening," prepared to resume sipping their highballs and then, with a "double take" straight from the Hollywood studios, saw that the late arrivals were Don Black and his wife, Betty.

Don's first pitching assignment in the 1947 season was against the Detroit Tigers. He won 5 to 3, but it was a tough game. In one of the middle innings, when he was engaged in pitching his way out of a jam, a press box cynic speculated: "I wonder what he'd give for a slug of bourbon."

Black answered the question later with a smile.

"All I wanted in that situation was a fresh stick of chewing gum. Bourbon doesn't even tempt me."

Later he was subjected to a stiffer test when he lost a succession of extremely well pitched games through the batting weakness of his teammates. But A.A. was still on the job to encourage him.

"I'm living a new life," Black said recently. "I'm beginning to appreciate friendships I almost ruined. Physically, I'm 100 percent improved. I'm grateful to a lot of folks in and out of A.A. who helped to keep me from sliding all the way down."

Betty Black's eyes were moist as she added her testimony:

"It's hard to put into words. Just say we're happy now."

With the 1948 season well under way. Black was pitching well for Cleveland and still a total abstainer.

Black is not the first ball player to be saved by Alcoholics Anonymous. Rollie Hemsley was a notorious drunkard when, several years ago, he placed himself in the hands of A.A. At that time there was no A.A. group in Cleveland, and Hemsley had to go to Akron to meetings. Today Cleveland has more than 70

The page numbering of the basic text was 1-179 in the 1st edition. The Doctors Opinion was originally page 1. Bill's Story became page 1 in the 2nd edition (nobody really knows why Bill did this but there is a lot of speculation).

As early as the 2nd edition Bill sensed that the Fellowship was resistant to changing the basic text and in his presentation to the 1955 General Service Conference, he was careful to inform them that the main objective of the 2nd edition was to change the personal stories to better reflect the makeup of the membership. His report stated: "Not an iota" of the first part of the text dealing with recovery principles had been changed. The inside flap of the 2nd edition dust jacket carries the statement "Of course, the basic text itself, page 1 to page 165 [sic], remains substantially unchanged. To the minds of most A.A.s, this should stand as first written."

The foreword to the 3rd edition reinforces this, and probably best describes the prevailing sentiment with the statement "Because this book has become the basic text for our Society and has helped such large numbers of alcoholic men and women to recovery, there exists a sentiment against any radical changes being made to it. Therefore, the first portion of this volume, describing the A.A. recovery program, has been left untouched in the course of revisions made for both the second and third editions."

While there have not been any radical changes to the basic text of the Big Book, there have been many selective wording changes over the years (including two wording changes to Step 12). Among the changes:

§ The wording of Step Twelve changed in the 2nd printing of the 1st edition Big Book. The term "spiritual experience" was changed to "spiritual awakening" and "as a result of these steps" was changed to "as a result of those steps." Appendix II Spiritual Experience was added.

§ In the 11th printing of the first Ed. Big Book, the term "ex-alcoholic" was replaced by the terms "ex-problem drinker" or "non-drinker." (www)

§ The wording of Step Twelve was changed back to "these steps" in the 2nd printing of the 2nd edition.

§ In places that expressed values, terms were updated to express growth (e.g. "scores" changed to "hundreds" changed to "thousands" etc). Also, foot notes were added.

Several web sites have tables that detail the changes from edition to edition.

Punctuation Changes

In the 4th edition, punctuation changes were made to Dr. Bob's Nightmare. I've witnessed members assert that this reflects the Trustee's Literature Committee being non-responsive to the Conference's advisory actions that the story "remain as is."

My own take on it is that it was likely an honest mistake and the Conference has only itself to blame for the outcome due to far too many advisory actions being passed on the matter. In two of the advisory actions, the Conference authorized the literature folks to make punctuation changes if they were done to correct errors. It could very easily be interpreted to include all the "remain as is" sections. On the other hand, it can very easily be interpreted that "remain as is" means "remain as is." The 2003 Conference allowed the changes to stand.

"Protection" of the Traditions, Warranties of Article 12 and Steps

There are some Conference advisory actions on other matters that appear to be getting intermingled with the notions of protecting the Big Book. These matters form a crucial part of the resolution passed at the historic 1955 "coming of age" 20th Anniversary Convention which allowed the Conference to act for Alcoholics Anonymous and become the successor to its co-founders.

The ending paragraph of the original resolution stated a requirement to have 3/4 of "the registered A.A. Groups of the world" approve any amendment or change to the Twelve Traditions or warranties of Article XII of the Conference Charter.

The 1976 Conference, by resolution, expanded upon this with the following:

It is resolved by the 1976 General Service Conference that those instruments requiring consent of three-quarters of the responding groups for change or amendment would include the Twelve Steps of AA should any such change or amendment ever be proposed.

In case a change is needed in the Twelve Traditions, the Twelve Steps, or the Six Warranties of Article 12, wherever the words "registered AA groups of the world", "registered groups" or "directory-listed groups" appear in the AA Service Manual and Twelve Concepts for World Service, a bracketed sentence be inserted to state, "This would include all AA groups known to the GSOs around the world."

There is good information on this in the Service Manual & 12 Concepts for World Service.

Hearsay versus History

Your posting reflects something that pops up quite a bit in AAHistoryLovers and I want to be careful and respectful in how I address it.

The "verbal tradition" seems to be strongly entrenched within AA (often I fear to the detriment of accuracy). There is a prevailing notion among AA members that duration of dry time somehow equates to degree of accuracy - that if someone is an "old-timer" they are automatically passing on accurate information by virtue of their being sober for some time.

I love our old-timers and respect them deeply, but they can be just as misinformed as a day-one newcomer. It all depends on what the old-timers are relying upon as their source of information. Too often we presume old-timers are direct observers when in fact they are simply repeating something they heard from somebody else. Repetition then gives rise to a sense of reliability of whatever is being passed on when, in fact, it may amount to nothing more than propagating myth.

Anecdotal information is probably the least reliable of all. People can very sincerely state something that they believe is true but which turns out to be quite inaccurate - this is the difference between myth and fact. There is an awful lot of misinformation floating around AA by virtue of giving preference to verbal, rather than written, sources.

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: Ed Adami

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Sunday, October 19, 2003 8:55 AM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] 1st 164 pages, not protected from changes?

Hi all,

My curiosity has been aroused about the first 164 pages of the book "Alcoholics Anonymous" AAWS publication. I have been told by a several members that have been sober quite some time, that the "Big Book" content of the first 164 pages is protected from change, unless agreed upon by a significant majority of the membership. I was informed by a Trustee upon questioning that this is not the case. He told me that a number of the materials are protected as such, but the "Big Book" is not currently protected in any such manner.

Further, I would like info. on what materials are protected, and by what measures.

Before I close, I would like to say that, there was information passed along at a "Forum" that the publication is currently in the process of having some punctuation changes made back to the original, or at least previous

Cincinnati,
Ohio,
Fellowship of A.A. a friendly pat on the back recently in an order exempting its property from taxation. Exemption of the Group's residential property at 405 Oak
Street was granted on the ground that it is used exclusively for charitable purposes.
The order applied only to the Cincinnati Fellowship. Other units of A.A. operating in Ohio are understood to rent the property used for meeting places. Along with
the order came a commendation from the board which said in part: "As this is the first exemption asked by an institution of this character the board feels that it should receive such consideration and comment as it richly deserves. Many applications
come to this board for exemption on charitable grounds wherein it is extremely difficult to ascertain that charity is actually dispensed. The present requests are indeed refreshing in that herein is found affirmative answer to Cain's question, 'Am I
my brother's keeper?'" The news story in the 'Cincinnati Enquirer' then goes on
to praise A.A. and tell of its work.

New Members in Earnest -- The Dumont, N. J., Group, founded in December, 1946, as an offshoot of the large Hackensack Group, continues to help alcoholics in North Bergen County. In the past six months the attendance has grown from about 15 to 30 active members at closed meetings, every other Friday, and more than 50 for open meetings, these latter not including the public. New members are reported as following
the program in an especially serious way. Most of these are in their late thirties,
one in the late twenties. Recently meeting was held for members of the clergy, medical profession and police of North Bergen County, about 300 being invited. One of
the speakers was Dr. E. Blaisdell, senior director, Rockland State Hospital, Orangeburg,

N. Y.

Attend Tri-State Banquet -- Thirteen members of the Pioneer Group of Winona, Minn., recently went to Madison, Wis., where they attended the Tri-State anniversary banquet and open meeting sponsored by the Madison Group. One carload got lost on the return trip, not from nipping, and traveled back by way of Black River, a considerable distance out of line. The Pioneer Group has been advertising in the personal column of the 'Republican Herald' as follows, "Problem or Compulsive Drinkers. We help ourselves by helping you. Write Alcoholics Anonymous, Pioneer Group, P.O. Box 122, Winona."

Non-A.A.s Aid Growth -- Non-alcoholic wives and husbands of the members of the Houston, Texas, Suburban Group have banded together to understand better the program and in an attempt to adjust themselves to any possible change which occurs in a member of the family upon accepting the program and working closely with the 12 Steps. This auxiliary has been successful in many ways in promoting the growth of the Suburban Group, which now meets in its new clubhouse at 1949 Richmond Road. "Like a 'voice crying in the wilderness' we are endeavoring to offer a way of life to more than 36,000 known alcoholics in this city," the report to 'The Grapevine' says. "We are accomplishing this growth, not by shouting our wares from the roof tops but as a result of a quiet, dignified presentation of the drinking problem as we understand it, to both the medical profession and clergy. In this manner many alcoholic cases are presented to us and more than a few have accepted the program and are well on the way to complete rehabilitation. Like other groups, we have social functions as a part of our therapeutics, but the primary purpose of the group is never lost. We intend to safeguard the sobriety of our members and acquire the necessary knowledge and experience of the group to pass on to others having a similar problem."

Army Co-operates -- Things are looking up for the Pioneer, Group on Okinawa with a regular attendance of between 10 and 15 at the two weekly meetings on Monday and Thursday. Quite a few have been coming in from the States who have been members there. An effort is being made to obtain clubrooms for use of the men in their spare time. Recently an Army chaplain and a chief psychiatrist, Captain Horneck from the Army base hospital were present. This hospital cares for men from the camp, which now includes about 2,000 men.

Brady Tries Open Meeting -- Although started only in August, 1947, the Brady, Texas, Group recently held its first open meeting for the public. The group numbers less than 10 members and there was some doubt as to public response. However, more than 300 representatives of business, professions, civic clubs and churches turned out, although the city's population is only about 7,000. Speakers from the San Angelo, Coleman and Seminole Groups helped to give the session a lift.

What Newspapers Say -- Discussing the flourishing branch of A.A. in the State Prison at Waupun, Wis., of which John H. Woodhouse of the prison record office has been adviser, the 'Milwaukee Tribune' concludes in an editorial, "A.A. at the Prison," that A.A. is an excellent form of group therapy and that "perhaps there is a clue to the direction we should take in the success of A.A. at the prison. It is at least worth thinking about."

A feature story in the Pittsburgh, (Pa.) 'Press' recently ran to more than a column with a description of how a hospitalized alcoholic became a member. 'The Press' praises the more than 500 Pittsburgh members who celebrated the seventh anniversary of their group in Carnegie Music Hall recently.

Recently a newspaper editor from Prince Albert, Sask., Can., who has been "lone wolfing" it, in his efforts to start a group there, made a 2,800-mile trip to attend a third anniversary celebration in Winnipeg. Since that time in a column in "The Herald," Speaking for Myself," he has written a series of articles discussing various phases of A.A.

Pat Paterson, writing in the Paterson, N. J., 'Morning Call' heads a recent column "Tipplers' Tip," or "Better the Slip Before Cup Reaches Lip" and points out that of 29,000 chronic alcoholics in New Jersey less than 800 each year are given treatment in private and public hospitals. Less than 50 per cent of the general hospitals refer alcoholics to other institutions or organizations," he writes, but of those who do 21 per cent of their patients are referred to A.A. Nine out of 12 mental hospitals report that they refer their patients to A.A. and at one institution investigating professors learned there is a chapter there."

Want Clubroom in '48 -- Members of the Aberdeen, S. D., Group have adopted the slogan "A clubroom in 1948" and three energetic members have been assigned to combat the housing shortage in the community and find suitable quarters. Members of the group, founded in March, 1946, were entertained at a special Christmas party by the Gerhard Kiddie Troop, ages 4 to 12, who put on various dances. Several members of the Britten Group, started by three former Aberdeen members, attended. The group meets every Wednesday and Sunday night in the Milwaukee Women's clubrooms.

Six Complete Year -- Six men observed their first 12 months of sobriety at a recent meeting of the Pioneer Group of Winona, Wis., with members, their wives and guests gathering at the Steak Shop. Four visitors from Eau Claire were present.

Business Men Endorse A.A. -- A resolution adopted by a unanimous vote of the directors of the Front Royal, Va., Chamber of Commerce recently read: "Whereas it has come to the attention of the hoard of directors of this chamber that a chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous has been organized in Front Royal . . . and whereas the members of this board are in thorough sympathy and accord with the purposes, aims and objects of the said organization: Therefore be it resolved . . . that this board . . . endorse the purposes, aims and objects of the said organization which has thus far resulted in accomplishments not heretofore believed possible of consummation."

Open Meeting Draws 900 -- An estimated 900 people thronged to the First Christian Church of Palestine, Texas, recently to attend the first open meeting of the group there. Although some guests were from surrounding counties, the attendance was believed outstanding for a city of 15,000. Among the speakers was Bishop Clinton S. Quin of Houston.

Get Clubrooms -- Clubrooms have been secured by members of the Staunton, Va.( Group, which reports it hopes to be installed in the quarters by the time this issue appears.

Attendance Wins Subscriptions -- At a recent meeting of the Endicott, N. Y., Group, it was voted to give all of those who have attended three meetings a yearly subscription to 'The Grapevine'. Fourteen names were included with the notice to this magazine.

Many Holiday Parties -- Although the holidays are weeks past, reports of a considerable number of observances have been sent to 'The Grapevine'.

Goshen, Ind., A.A.s joined with members at Elkhart, 10 miles distant, in celebration of New Year's, which was marked by an informal program, a short talk and a buffet supper, enjoyed by about 100 persons. The same two groups plan to join early in February for the third anniversary party of the Elkhart organization which held its first meeting February 6, 1945. The Goshen Group will be a year old next July 21 and now numbers about 20 members who meet twice weekly.

An afternoon party at Kent, Ohio, was given over to the children with toys of all kinds to fit their ages. Ice cream, cake and balloons were handed out around a large tree. Presents were exchanged at the regular evening meeting and there was a songfest and dancing. Over 150 enjoyed the celebration.

About 50 children from the Polk County Juvenile Home in Des Moines, Iowa, were guests at the club there for a dinner, entertainment and gifts.

The Chattanooga, Tenn., Group gave food, clothes and toys to a family in which both parents are alcoholics. The kitty one meeting night before Christinns supplied the funds and the family was designated by the Salvation Army.

Los Angeles, Cal., A.A.s went to the Camarillo State Hospital for a party with alcoholic patients for an annual party and Christinas meeting. Many former patients, now members of outside groups, returned for the gathering. Two subscriptions to 'The Grapevine' were given as presents.

Music, coffee, a floor show, buffet turkey dinner and dancing made up the New Year's party program for Kansas City, Mo., Group members at Garrett Hall. A party for the youngsters was also arranged.

New Year's Eve was celebrated by Niagara Frontier A.A.s with a party at the Food Craft Hall in Buffalo.

The Guild hall of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church was the scene of the New Year's Eve party in Spencer, Iowa, with many visitors from other groups in that section.

Wichita, Kans., A.A.s had two parties, a Christmas dinner at the club, and a New Year's Eve party.

With a guarantee in advance of "no headaches" the Rutland, Vt., Group celebrated New Year's at the club rooms with food, favors, punch, dancing and cards.

The first annual Christmas party of the Brighter Side Group, Waterloo, Iowa, was held before Christmas in the Sacred Heart Church basement parlors with an attendance of nearly 100 members and families. Visitors were present from Grundy Center, Reinbeck, Tripoli and Independence.

Like Open Meetings -- With regard to open meetings, our correspondent in San Luis Obispo, Cal., writes, "We began a group effort here on the 'open' basis largely because our members drove in from fairly great distances and the couples just naturally attended together.

"The same tendency was noted in general family relationships such as sister bringing brother. This was an open territory on the California Coast, and we have watched with interest the founding of other groups nearby. They have all seemed to grow in the open tradition, without any decisions taken by the founders.

"We have felt that the wives and close relatives of the alcoholics have helped in all phases of group work.

"Advantage has been taken of meetings in which we found ourselves 'closed' by accidents in attendance to sound out the members on the matter of holding closed meetings. There has been no desire for a change in that direction thus far.

"These comments are from small town experience. We shall be interested in reactions from areas of heavier population." .

Indiana Anniversaries Observed -- That there were only two A.A.s in Ft. Wayne, Ind., five years ago, while now there are three groups in the city as well as others in Warsaw, Kendallville, Wabash, Monroeville and North Manchester was recalled at the recent anniversary banquets in Ft. Wayne and South Bend. Group I of Ft. Wayne observed its fifth anniversary with a banquet at the Chamber of Commerce with representatives of the groups mentioned as well as from Marion, Indianapolis, Lima and St. Mary's, Ohio, together with representatives of the clergy, medicine, business, professional leaders and city officials. A magazine writer of national renown was chief speaker. The South Bend banquet was held at the Oliver Hotel with 225 present.

Some New Groups -- Although a regular meeting hall had not been obtained at the time 'The Grapevine' was informed, Olean, N. Y., now has a group formed of members who formerly attended meetings in Salamanca and Bradford. Starting in October, these cities inaugurated a regular monthly joint meeting the second Sunday of each month with each group taking its turn as host. '

Another new group in this area is the Amherst Group in North Buffalo, whose members are meeting in the Main-Fillmore rooms at 2629 Main Street on Friday and Sunday evenings at 8 o'clock with the former a closed session.

Building on the foundation laid some months ago by J. M., Sioux Falls, S. D., attorney, a group has been formed in the South Dakota State Penitentiary at Sioux Falls. J. M. was aided by F. O., an inmate of the prison. Address is the South Dakota Penitentiary Chapter of A.A., Box 911, Sioux Falls, S. D.

First meeting of the Hutchinson, Kans., Group was held late last fall at the Leon Hotel and now numbers five men and one woman. Four of the present members were associated with the Wichita Group. Meetings are held twice weekly in members' homes,

Thursdays and Sundays.. Address is P. O. Box No. 845, Hutchinson.

The Johnson City, Tenn., Group recently sponsored a group at the National Soldiers' Home just outside the city and another at Elizabethton, both of which are growing well. The Elizabethton Group meets Tuesday night at private homes and ministers are honorary members. The Mountain Home Group has changed its meeting night to Friday at the Veterans' Administration Hospital staff room. Members of the two groups attended the Johnson City meetings in the basement of the public library.

A.A.s of the new Parkchester Group, Bronx, N. Y., have been meeting in St. Helena's School since the founding in October and report things going well. A leaflet put out by the church says that the meetings represent "a practical, well-working society which has done wonderful work. We are proud to have them with us." Meetings are held Tuesday nights.

Wichita, Kans., A.A.s are proud of the groups they have sponsored in nearby towns with three established and two others in process of formation.

According to 'The Derelict Schooner' of Jacksonville, Fla., the St. Augustine Group had its first meeting just before the holidays at the home of G. W. with four members present. Three members of the Murray Hill Group also attended.

Seven new members at Manchester, Ia, started their own group recently with the aid of 130 other members from Dubuque, Cedar Rapids, Maringo, Oelwein and Waterloo. Principal speakers were from Dubuque and Wisconsin. Meetings will be held Monday nights at the home of T. C.

Frontier Has Paper -- 'The Niagara Frontier A.A. Bulletin' is the latest of the new exchanges to reach 'The Grapevine' office. The fourth issue is an attractive mimeographed sheet carrying a good selection of news as well as a table

English Coffee Improved -- "We report progress both in spiritual strength and in materially improving the potability of English coffee," reports our correspondent from London, England. "One stalwart who met A.A. through the Bermuda Group makes weary and frequent journeys from Portsmouth to help and to keep in touch. The members have gladly welcomed nine trans-Atlantic visitors since Bert T. and Grace O. did so much to get the movement started some months ago, but they still regard American and Canadian A.A.s as too much a stay-at-home crowd. We feel that with rationing and travel difficulties, numerous small groups adaptable to 'home visiting' will show the greatest rewards." The London members would like to hear from any other readers to help maintain and further a good relations policy. The contact is BM/AA1, London, WC 1.

A.A. Properly Tax Exempt -- The state board of tax appeals gave the Cincinnati, Ohio, Fellowship of A.A. a friendly pat on the back recently in an order exempting its property from taxation. Exemption of the Group's residential property at 405 Oak Street was granted on the ground that it is used exclusively for charitable purposes. The order applied only to the Cincinnati Fellowship. Other units of A.A. operating in Ohio are understood to rent the property used for meeting places. Along with the order came a commendation from the board which said in part: "As this is the first exemption asked by an institution of this character the board feels that it should receive such consideration and comment as it richly deserves. Many applications come to this board for exemption on charitable grounds wherein it is extremely difficult to ascertain that charity is actually dispensed. The present requests are indeed refreshing in that herein is found affirmative answer to Cain's question, 'Am I my brother's keeper?'" The news story in the 'Cincinnati Enquirer' then goes on to praise A.A. and tell of its work.

New Members in Earnest -- The Dumont, N. J., Group, founded in December, 1946, as an offshoot of the large Hackensack Group, continues to help alcoholics in North Bergen County. In the past six months the attendance has grown from about 15 to 30 active members at closed meetings, every other Friday, and more than 50 for open meetings, these latter not including the public. New members are reported as following the program in an especially serious way. Most of these are in their late thirties, one in the late twenties. Recently meeting was held for members of the clergy, medical profession and police of North Bergen County, about 300 being invited. One of the speakers was Dr. E. Blaisdell, senior director, Rockland State Hospital, Orangeburg, N. Y.

Attend Tri-State Banquet -- Thirteen members of the Pioneer Group of Winona, Minn., recently went to Madison, Wis., where they attended the Tri-State anniversary banquet and open meeting sponsored by the Madison Group. One carload got lost on the return trip, not from nipping, and traveled back by way of Black River, a considerable distance out of line. The Pioneer Group has been advertising in the personal column of the 'Republican Herald' as follows, "Problem or Compulsive Drinkers. We help ourselves by helping you. Write Alcoholics Anonymous, Pioneer Group, P.O. Box 122, Winona."

Non-A.A.s Aid Growth -- Non-alcoholic wives and husbands of the members of the Houston, Texas, Suburban Group have banded together to understand better the program and in an attempt to adjust themselves to any possible change which occurs in a member of the family upon accepting the program and working closely with the 12 Steps. This auxiliary has been successful in many ways in promoting the growth of the Suburban Group, which now meets in its new clubhouse at 1949 Richmond Road.

"Like a 'voice crying in the wilderness' we are endeavoring to offer a way of life to the more than 36,000 known alcoholics in this city," the report to 'The Grapevine' says.
"We are accomplishing this growth, not by shouting our wares from the roof tops but as a result of a quiet, dignified presentation of the drinking problem as we understand it, to both the medical profession and clergy. In this manner
many alcoholic cases are presented to us and more than a few have accepted the program and are well on the way to complete rehabilitation. Like other groups, we have social functions as a part of our therapeutics, but the primary purpose of the group is never lost. We intend to safeguard the sobriety of our members and acquire
the necessary knowledge and experience of the group to pass on to others having a similar problem."

Army Co-operates -- Things are looking up for the Pioneer, Group on Okinawa with a regular attendance of between 10 and 15 at the two weekly meetings on Monday
and Thursday. Quite a few have been coming in from the States who have been
members
there. An effort is being made to obtain clubrooms for use of the men in their spare time. Recently an Army chaplain and a chief psychiatrist, Captain Horneck from the Army base hospital were present. This hospital cares for men from the camp, which now includes about 2,000 men.

Brady Tries Open Meeting -- Although started only in August, 1947, the Brady, Texas,
Group recently held its first open meeting for the public. The group numbers less than 10 members and there was some doubt as to public response. However, more than 300 representatives of business, professions, civic clubs and churches turned out, although the city's population is only about 7,000. Speakers from the San Angelo,
Coleman and Seminole Groups helped to give the session a lift.

What Newspapers Say -- Discussing the flourishing branch of A.A. in the State Prison at Waupun, Wis., of which John H. Woodhouse of the prison record office has been adviser, the 'Milwaukee Tribune' concludes in an editorial, "A.A. at the Prison," that A.A. is an excellent form of group therapy and that "perhaps there is a clue to the direction we should take in the success of A.A. at the prison. It is at least worth thinking about."

A feature story in the Pittsburgh, (Pa.) 'Press' recently ran to more than a column with a description of how a hospitalized alcoholic became a member. 'The Press' praises the more than 500 Pittsburgh members who celebrated the seventh anniversary of their group in Carnegie Music Hall recently.

Recently a newspaper editor from Prince Albert, Sask., Can., who has been "lone wolfing" it, in his efforts to start a group there, made a 2,800-mile trip to attend a third anniversary celebration in Winnipeg. Since that time in a column in 'The Herald,' Speaking for Myself," he has written a series of articles discussing various phases of A.A.

Pat Paterson, writing in the Paterson, N. J., 'Morning Call' heads a recent column "Tipplers' Tip," or "Better the Slip Before Cup Reaches Lip" and points out that of 29,000 chronic alcoholics in New Jersey less than 800 each year are given treatment in private and public hospitals. Less than 50 per cent of the general hospitals refer alcoholics to other institutions or organizations," he writes, but of those who do 21 per cent of their patients are referred to A.A. Nine out of 12 mental hospitals report that they refer their patients to A.A. and at one institution investigating professors learned there is a chapter there."

Want Clubroom in '48 -- Members of the Aberdeen, S. D., Group have adopted the slogan

"A clubroom in 1948" and three energetic members have been assigned to combat the housing shortage in the community and find suitable quarters. Members of the group, founded in March, 1946, were entertained at a special Christmas party by the Gerhard Kiddie Troop, ages 4 to 12, who put on various dances. Several members of the Britten Group, started by three former Aberdeen members, attended. The group meets every Wednesday and Sunday night in the Milwaukee Women's clubrooms.

Six Complete Year -- Six men observed their first 12 months of sobriety at a recent meeting of the Pioneer Group of Winona, Wis., with members, their wives and guests gathering at the Steak Shop. Four visitors from Eau Claire were present.

Business Men Endorse A.A. -- A resolution adopted by a unanimous vote of the directors of the Front Royal, Va., Chamber of Commerce recently read:

"Whereas it has come to the attention of the hoard of directors of this chamber that a chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous has been organized in Front Royal . . . and whereas the members of this board are in thorough sympathy and accord with the purposes, aims and objects of the said organization: Therefore be it resolved . . . that this board . . .

endorse the purposes, aims and objects of the said organization which has thus far resulted in accomplishments not heretofore believed possible of consummation."

Open Meeting Draws 900 -- An estimated 900 people thronged to the First Christian Church of Palestine, Texas, recently to attend the first open meeting of the group there. Although some guests were from surrounding counties, the attendance was believed outstanding for a city of 15,000. Among the speakers was Bishop Clinton S. Quin of Houston.

Get Clubrooms -- Clubrooms have been secured by members of the Staunton, Va.( Group, which reports it hopes to be installed in the quarters by the time this issue appears.

Attendance Wins Subscriptions -- At a recent meeting of the Endicott, N. Y., Group, it was voted to give all of those who have attended three meetings a yearly subscription to 'The Grapevine'. Fourteen names were included with the notice to this magazine.

Many Holiday Parties -- Although the holidays are weeks past, reports of a considerable number of observances have been sent to 'The Grapevine'.

Goshen, Ind., A.A.s joined with members at Elkhart, 10 miles distant, in celebration of New Year's, which was marked by an informal program, a short talk and a buffet supper, enjoyed by about 100 persons. The same two groups plan to join early in February for the third anniversary party of the Elkhart organization which held its first meeting February 6, 1945. The Goshen Group will be a year old next July 21 and now numbers about 20 members who meet twice weekly.

An afternoon party at Kent, Ohio, was given over to the children with toys of all kinds to fit their ages. Ice cream, cake and balloons were handed out around a large tree. Presents were exchanged at the regular evening meeting and there was a songfest and dancing. Over 150 enjoyed the celebration.

About 50 children from the Polk County Juvenile Home in Des Moines, Iowa, were guests at the club there for a dinner, entertainment and gifts.

The Chattanooga, Tenn., Group gave food, clothes and toys to a family in which both parents are alcoholics. The kitty one meeting night before Christinns supplied the funds and the family was designated by the Salvation Army.

Los Angeles, Cal., A.A.s went to the Camarillo State Hospital for a party with alcoholic patients for an annual party and Christinas meeting. Many former patients, now members of outside groups, returned for the gathering. Two subscriptions to 'The Grapevine'

were given as presents.

Music, coffee, a floor show, buffet turkey dinner and dancing made up the New Year's party program for Kansas City, Mo., Group members at Garrett Hall. A party for the youngsters was also arranged.

New Year's Eve was celebrated by Niagara Frontier A.A.s with a party at the Food Craft Hall in Buffalo.

The Guild hall of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church was the scene of the New Year's Eve party in Spencer, Iowa, with many visitors from other groups in that section.

Wichita, Kans., A.A.s had two parties, a Christmas dinner at the club, and a New Year's Eve party.

With a guarantee in advance of "no headaches" the Rutland, Vt., Group celebrated New Year's at the club rooms with food, favors, punch, dancing and cards.

The first annual Christmas party of the Brighter Side Group, Waterloo, Iowa, was held before Christmas in the Sacred Heart Church basement parlors with an attendance of nearly 100 members and families. Visitors were present from Grundy Center, Reinbeck, Tripoli and Independence.

Like Open Meetings -- With regard to open meetings, our correspondent in San Luis Obispo, Cal., writes, "We began a group effort here on the 'open' basis largely because our members drove in from fairly great distances and the couples just naturally attended together.

"The same tendency was noted in general family relationships such as sister bringing brother. This was an open territory on the California Coast, and we have watched with interest the founding of other groups nearby. They have all seemed to grow in the open tradition, without any decisions taken by the founders.

"We have felt that the wives and close relatives of the alcoholics have helped in all phases of group work.

"Advantage has been taken of meetings in which we found ourselves 'closed' by accidents in attendance to sound out the members on the matter of holding closed meetings. There has been no desire for a change in that direction thus far.

"These comments are from small town experience. We shall be interested in reactions from areas of heavier population." .

Indiana Anniversaries Observed -- That there were only two A.A.s in Ft. Wayne, Ind., five years ago, while now there are three groups in the city as well as others in Warsaw, Kendallville, Wabash, Monroeville and North Manchester was recalled at the recent anniversary banquets in Ft. Wayne and South Bend. Group I of Ft. Wayne observed its fifth anniversary with a banquet at the Chamber of Commerce with representatives of the groups mentioned as well as from Marion, Indianapolis, Lima and St. Mary's, Ohio, together with representatives of the clergy, medicine, business, professional leaders and city officials. A magazine writer of national renown was chief speaker. The South Bend banquet was held at the Oliver Hotel with 225 present.

Some New Groups -- Although a regular meeting hall had not been obtained at the time 'The Grapevine' was informed, Olean, N. Y., now has a group formed of members who formerly attended meetings in Salamanca and Bradford. Starting in October, these cities inaugurated a regular monthly joint meeting the second Sunday of each month with each group taking its turn as host. '

Another new group in this area is the Amherst Group in North Buffalo, whose members are meeting in the Main-Fillmore rooms at 2629 Main Street on Friday and Sunday evenings at 8 o'clock with the former a closed session.

Building on the foundation laid some months ago by J. M., Sioux Falls, S. D., attorney, a group has been formed in the South Dakota State Penitentiary at Sioux Falls. J. M. was aided by F. O., an inmate of the prison. Address is the South Dakota Penitentiary Chapter of A.A., Box 911, Sioux Falls, S. D.

First meeting of the Hutchinson, Kans., Group was held late last fall at the Leon Hotel and now numbers five men and one woman. Four of the present members were associated with the Wichita Group. Meetings are held twice weekly in members' homes, Thursdays and Sundays.. Address is P. O. Box No. 845, Hutchinson.

The Johnson City, Tenn., Group recently sponsored a group at the National Soldiers' Home just outside the city and another at Elizabethton, both of which are growing well. The Elizabethton Group meets Tuesday night at private homes and ministers are honorary members. The Mountain Home Group has changed its meeting night to Friday at the Veterans' Administration Hospital staff room. Members of the two groups attended the Johnson City meetings in the basement of the public library.

A.A.s of the new Parkchester Group, Bronx, N. Y., have been meeting in St. Helena's School since the founding in October and report things going well. A leaflet put out by the church says that the meetings represent "a practical, well-working society which has done wonderful work. We are proud to have them with us." Meetings are held Tuesday nights.

Wichita, Kans., A.A.s are proud of the groups they have sponsored in nearby towns with three established and two others in process of formation.

According to 'The Derelict Schooner' of Jacksonville, Fla., the St. Augustine Group had its first meeting just before the holidays at the home of G. W. with four members

Grapevine, March 1948

A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

Junket by Bus -- Thirty members of the Upper Darby, Pa., Group chartered a bus and journeyed 50 miles to spend the evening with the newly formed Bridgeton, N. J., Group, January 28 . . . Passaic, N. J., now has three groups -- East Side Group, Central Group and the Passaic Group.

Head of the Lakes -- Continued steady growth of the Duluth, Superior and Two Harbors

Groups is reported from Minnesota, highlighted by the first big open meeting held

January 6 in the city hall at Duluth. Exactly 189 persons, nearly all of them attended, our correspondent reports. The chief speaker was a member from Minneapolis, an attorney, who described three types who come into A.A.--the first who just "lays bricks," the second who comes in only for personal gain and what he can get out

A.A.s,

of

A.A., and the third type, who dedicates himself to helping others and who symbolically "builds a beautiful cathedral" that inspires others. . . .

Members

of

the Pioneer Group of Winona, Minn., had so much fun at their first New Year's Eve party that they have decided to make it an annual affair. Twenty-five attended and all enjoyed the experience of waking up New Year's morning without hangovers.

Later

in the month five members traveled to Dubuque, Iowa, to participate in that group's third anniversary celebration, and recently an Iowa member journeyed to Winona to talk to the Winona Junior Chamber of Commerce about A.A., with the Winona Group represented at the meeting by two of its members.

For the Public -- Sponsored by the five Lake Wales members of the Polk County (Fla.)

Group, a successful open meeting was held in Lake Wales January 22 for -- as the local paper expressed it -- "drinkers, non-drinkers and curiosity seekers."

Approximately 75 guests and members from Lakeland, Winter Haven, Bartow, Mulberry, Tampa, Daytona Beach and Wauchula attended. The Lake Wales correspondent reports that the meeting brought one recruit and the possibilities of two more. The Polk County Group, with which the Lake Wales members are affiliated, now numbers more than 30 members.

Newark Has Full Calendar -- The latest issue of the Newark, N J., 'Alanon News' (which incidentally was the first anniversary issue) listed for February a card party on the 7th; a Valentine party and dance with a Sweetheart contest on the 14th; a night of games the 21st, and a Leap Year dance with a male popularity contest on the 28th. A dance and chowder party on January 31 was the last of that month's many events. The Alanon Club's television programs draw good attendance, for the boxing bouts on Mondays, Tuesdays and Fridays, and other programs on Wednesdays and Thursdays. The latest addition to the extensive entertainment facilities is a grand piano, a gift to the club.

Caracas New Outpost -- Bob N., a former North Jersey A.A., who has been in South America for two years, writes that he has started spreading the word in Caracas, Venezuela. He first ran a personal ad in the local paper, which has since carried a story reporting organization of a group in that city.

What's a Little Snow? -- The Bayside, N. Y., 'Times' noted that a snowstorm which all but paralyzed rail, air and highway traffic was no deterrent to the town's local A.A.s. "The regular weekly open meeting of the Bayside Group of Alcoholics Anonymous was held . . . as scheduled, despite the howling snowstorm which raged outside. Little or nothing was as it should have been that night, but nine, sober, happy alcoholics and three friends -- non-alcoholics -- met and enjoyed themselves."

Six Out of Seven -- New quarters for the Henderson (N. C.) Group are ready for occupancy, the membership roll totals about 30 and the record shows two open banquets, with 80 persons in attendance at each, in addition to the regular weekly meetings -- all in scarcely five months. The group held its first meeting last October 1, with seven alcoholics present. Of those original seven, six have gained and maintained their sobriety.

'Eye Opener' Suspends -- The 'Eye Opener', publication of the A.A. Central Committee published at Los Angeles, Cal., was suspended with the December issue due to the amount of work and financial problems involved, according to a front page notice.

Form Social Group -- Members of the Durham, N. C., Group have formed an organization for social activities called the Dalco Club, Inc., "a nonprofit corporation to aid in Alcoholics Anonymous work whenever possible." New club quarters have been obtained and the organization will be financed through dues, with membership open to all A.A.s in the Durham area.

New Groups -- Salem, Va.. got onto the A.A. circuit recently with the organization of a new group with six members. Meetings are held at the First Methodist Church on College Avenue, and the group can be addressed at P. O. Box 189 . . . The Laurens, S. C., Group was formed January 6 with 11 charter members attending. An open meeting is being planned for the near future. The group's mailing address is P. O. Box 215

. . .
The Janesville, Wis., Group became so large that members from Edgerton and Delevan recently branched out on their own and established groups in each of their communities. Once a month all of the groups in the Beloit area hold a joint meeting, and on another night once a month the two Beloit groups, East and West Side, get together for a joint meeting. Weekly meetings are held at the homes of members and a social gathering for all groups is held each Saturday night for members and their wives . . . Manchester, Iowa, is another new addition, a group now meeting there every Monday night . . . Five members of the Marshalltown, Iowa, Group traveled to Eldora, Iowa, recently to attend the inaugural meeting of the new group there .

. . . A classified advertisement appearing in the paper in Jerome, Idaho, testifies to the efforts of an A.A. to found a group there. He's a former member of the New Orleans, La, Boise and Twin Falls, Idaho, Groups.

Okinawa Growing -- "Slow but sure" growth on Okinawa is reported by the secretary of the Pioneer Group there who writes that two meetings a week are now being held regularly with attendance ranging from 12 to 15. Although members are leaving the island periodically for the States, as they complete their work, their places are taken by others. New members also are now joining the group from the military forces on the island, introduced to A.A. by the Army chaplain.

Fun for Wives, Too -- For the Kansas City, Mo., Group, the last Saturday in the month has become "party night, with arrangements by the group's Ladies' Auxiliary. Large parties were held on Hallowe'en, Thanksgiving, Christmas, and the schedule calls for similar events to be held until spring. One of the objectives of the Auxiliary is to help make the wives of new members feel at home.

Visiting "Firemen" -- The West Palm Beach, Fla., Group might lay claim to something of a record for having visitors from the greatest number of different cities. Recent visitors in the group came from Detroit, Bronx, N. Y., Brockton, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., New York City, Stamford, Conn., Hartford, Conn., Passaic, N. J., Toledo, Ohio,

Park Ridge, Ill., Hillside, N. Y.

From Here and There -- The Beckley, W. Va., Group has an active membership of 20 . .

. Twenty months ago three men with the assistance of a member of the Kings Mountain,

S. C., Group founded the Bennettsville, S. C., Group. Today the group numbers 12 regular members who have helped organize additional groups in Roland, Cheraw and Marion. On three occasions they have chartered a bus for treks to group meetings

in neighboring cities. The wives of the Cheraw and Bennettsville Groups have formed

an auxiliary which meets once a month, and at Christmas they gave a party for 60 people

. . . The Chippewa Valley Group began the year with a regular membership of 15, including one of the youngest members in the country. He's 23 . . . New club quarters have been obtained by the Kilgore, Texas, Group . . . Only two years old, the Wichita Falls, Texas, Group has grown from the original six to approximately 100 members, with a club house, two large meeting rooms and office. Members have helped establish groups in Vernon and Goree, and in the Wichita Falls State Hospital. The Goree Group is only a little over six months old but already has 15 members who, incidentally, are reported to average over 200 pounds per man! The Vernon Group has six members and holds an open meeting each Wednesday while the Wichita Falls Group now has a meeting every evening in the week except Saturday and Sunday. The wives of members also

meet

one evening a week, with an average attendance of about 50. The local radio station, KTRN, broadcasts, a recorded A. A. program one evening) a week.

Planning Convention -- The Jacksonville, Fla., Group has sent out an inquiry asking for an expression of preference of dates for the annual Southeastern Regional Convention this year, suggesting that the two most logical times would be either

the last weekend in August or the first week-end in October. The date chosen will be reported in the next issue.

Vancouver Camels -- Organization of a Camels Club is reported from Vancouver,
B.
C., where the group now numbers more than 400. Members of the A. A. group there who join the Camels Club will participate in plans for the construction of club quarters.

Passing the Word -- Since its start a year ago, the York, Pa., Group has distributed
A.A. literature to physicians and members of the clergy, provided articles for newspapers and recently inaugurated a weekly broadcast over radio station WSBA
in the form of a round table discussion patterned after the Towson, Md., Group program.
The
York Group now numbers 18 members and holds two meetings a week, one open and one closed.

Prison Librarian Helps -- Due to the constant turn-over of patients in the institution, the Wilmar, Minn., A.A. Group at the state hospital in that city has found it necessary to have someone who will keep complete records of membership
and advancement and to help in securing educational data and maintain a current
and permanent file on group matters. Mrs. Eleanor Johnson, hospital librarian, has accepted the task along with the title of honorary chairman of the group.

To Make 19th Hole a Meeting -- An annual golf tournament open to all members
of Southern California A.A. Groups is being planned. The course will be selected according to the number of members showing interest, with Fox Hills at Culver regarded as most likely at present. A nominal entrance fee of 25 or 50 cents will be charged with prizes donated by golf professionals and others. Only other expenses will be greens fees. Those interested should contact Ed I., Mayflower Group, phone
City
PL 1-7083.

Happy Birthdays -- One hundred and sixty-eight people attended a banquet given by the Savannah, Ga., Group to celebrate its third anniversary January 31, in the Gold Room of the De Soto Hotel . . . Speakers from Chicago, Kansas City and Jefferson City took part in the third anniversary program of the Springfield, Mo., Group, at a dinner held at the American Legion Memorial Home January 17. Approximately 200 attended. The membership of the group has reached about 50 . . . Anniversary meetings held by the Jefferson City, Mo., and Wichita, Kan., Groups were augmented by visitors from the Kansas City, Mo., Group. About 90 members traveled to Jefferson City, 30 going in a chartered bus, and about 45 traveled to Wichita for that group's birthday. Members of the K.C. Group also have gone visiting lately to group meetings in Des Moines, Iowa, Galveston, Texas, and Springfield, Mo.. . . Wives of members of the Grand Island, Neb., Group were the beneficiaries when the group celebrated its first anniversary. The occasion was turned into a dinner for the wives at the Yancey Hotel . . . A two-day celebration marked the first anniversary of the Hastings, Neb., Group January 25 with A.A. visitors from Fremont, North Platte, Kearney, Grand Island, Broken Bow, Ogalalla and Sioux City, Iowa, and Minneapolis, Minn. More than 120 attended a banquet held at the Hotel Clarke in Hastings . . . Blytheville, Ark., also can now mark up its first year in A.A. Although the group is small it is very active and continued growth is indicated for the second year . . . About 100 "happy men and women" attended the third anniversary of the Ogden, Utah, Group, celebrated with a dinner, speaking program and a dance . . . The St. Mary's, Ohio, Group celebrated its first anniversary at the Westwood Supper Club January 27 with 46 present, including the wives of members. The guest speaker came from Columbus to help the growing

and active group mark its birthday, with the rolls showing 19 regular members.
Plans
are already underway for the second annual fall barbecue . . . It was number three in the way of anniversaries for the Stag Group of Erie, Pa., on February 6. The anniversary
was marked by a special program and buffet supper.

|||||

++++Message 1424. . . . . new book about The Serenity Prayer
From: aaosb . . . . . 10/22/2003 12:33:00 PM

|||||

For those who are interested, W.W. Norton & Company has just published "The Serenity Prayer: Faith and Politics in Times of Peace and War" by Elisabeth Niebuhr Sifton, daughter of Reinhold Niebuhr. A review by Publishers Weekly is available at amazon.com.

John Blair

|||||

++++Message 1425. . . . . Re: Gv Feb 48 - News Circuit
From: t . . . . . 10/22/2003 3:16:00 PM

|||||

Richard,
All I have to go on is the actual Grapevine, and they don't give an actual date.
I would guess, based on this being reported in the March issue, and with copy
and printer deadlines, the story in that Cincinnati paper would have likely been
in January, or possibly early February of 1948.

If that paper is still in operation, you may be able to contact them. Many papers have an archives person or librarian who may be better able to pin down the actual date. Otherwise it will take someone going to the library and scanning through

the old papers, or micro fiche till they find it.

Although, one other possibility ... there is a man on AAHistoryLovers who posts a lot of articles from newspapers and periodicals. You could contact him to see if he knows or even has the article. Or even try GSO Archives in New York. They might could tell you.

Sorry I couldn't be more specific.

t

Richard Bement wrote:

> *What is the date of the Cincinnati Enquirer article?*

>

> ----- Original Message -----

> *From:* t <mailto:tcumming@airmail.net>

> *To:* AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

> <mailto:AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com>

> *Sent:* Tuesday, October 21, 2003 6:48 AM

> *Subject:* [AAHistoryLovers] Gv Feb 48 - News Circuit

>

> Grapevine, Feb 48

>

> A.A.'s Country-Wide News Circuit

>

> English Coffee Improved -- "We report progress both in spiritual strength and in materially improving the potability of English coffee," reports our correspondent from London, England. "One stalwart who met A.A. through the Bermuda Group makes weary and frequent journeys from Portsmouth to help and to keep in touch. The members have gladly welcomed nine trans-Atlantic visitors since Bert T. and Grace O. did so much to get the movement started some months ago, but they still regard American and Canadian A.A.s as too much a stay-at-home crowd. We feel that with rationing and travel difficulties, numerous small groups adaptable to 'home visiting' will show the greatest rewards." The London members would like to hear from any

- > other readers to
- > help maintain and further a good relations policy. The contact is
- > BM/AA1, London, WC 1.
- >
- > A.A. Properly Tax Exempt -- The state board of tax appeals gave the
- > Cincinnati, Ohio,
- > Fellowship of A.A. a friendly pat on the back recently in an order
- > exempting its
- > property from taxation. Exemption of the Group's residential
- > property at 405 Oak
- > Street was granted on the ground that it is used exclusively for
- > charitable purposes.
- > The order applied only to the Cincinnati Fellowship. Other units of
- > A.A. operating in
- > Ohio are understood to rent the property used for meeting places.
- > Along with the
- > order came a commendation from the board which said in part: "As
- > this is the first
- > exemption asked by an institution of this character the board feels
- > that it should
- > receive such consideration and comment as it richly deserves. Many
- > applications come
- > to this board for exemption on charitable grounds wherein it is
- > extremely difficult
- > to ascertain that charity is actually dispensed. The present
- > requests are indeed
- > refreshing in that herein is found affirmative answer to Cain's
- > question, 'Am I my
- > brother's keeper?'" The news story in the 'Cincinnati Enquirer' then
- > goes on to
- > praise A.A. and tell of its work.
- >
- > New Members in Earnest -- The Dumont, N. J., Group, founded in
- > December, 1946, as an
- > offshoot of the large Hackensack Group, continues to help alcoholics
- > in North Bergen
- > County. In the past six months the attendance has grown from about
- > 15 to 30 active
- > members at closed meetings, every other Friday, and more than 50 for
- > open meetings,
- > these latter not including the public. New members are reported as
- > following the
- > program in an especially serious way. Most of these are in their
- > late thirties, one
- > in the late twenties. Recently meeting was held for members of the
- > clergy, medical
- > profession and police of North Bergen County, about 300 being
- > invited. One of the > speakers was Dr. E. Blaisdell, senior director, Rockland State > Hospital, Orangeburg,

> N. Y.
>
> Attend Tri-State Banquet -- Thirteen members of the Pioneer Group of > Winona, Minn., > recently went to Madison, Wis., where they attended the Tri-State > anniversary banquet > and open meeting sponsored by the Madison Group. One carload got > lost on the return > trip, not from nipping, and traveled back by way of Black River, a > considerable > distance out of line. The Pioneer Group has been advertising in the > personal column > of the 'Republican Herald' as follows, "Problem or Compulsive > Drinkers. We help > ourselves by helping you. Write Alcoholics Anonymous, Pioneer Group, > P.O. Box 122,
> Winona."
>
> Non-A.A.s Aid Growth -- Non-alcoholic wives and husbands of the > members of the > Houston, Texas, Suburban Group have banded together to understand > better the program > and in an attempt to adjust themselves to any possible change which > occurs in a > member of the family upon accepting the program and working closely > with the 12
> Steps. This auxiliary has been successful in many ways in promoting > the growth of the > Suburban Group, which now meets in its new clubhouse at 1949 > Richmond Road. "Like a > 'voice crying in the wilderness' we are endeavoring to offer a way > of life to the > more than 36,000 known alcoholics in this city," the report to 'The > Grapevine' says.
> "We are accomplishing this growth, not by shouting our wares from > the roof tops but > as a result of a quiet, dignified presentation of the drinking > problem as we > understand it, to both the medical profession and clergy. In this > manner many > alcoholic cases are presented to us and more than a few have > accepted the program and > are well on the way to complete rehabilitation. Like other groups, > we have social > functions as a part of our therapeutics, but the primary purpose of > the group is

- > never lost. We intend to safeguard the sobriety of our members and
- > acquire the
- > necessary knowledge and experience of the group to pass on to others
- > having a similar
- > problem."
- >
- > Army Co-operates -- Things are looking up for the Pioneer, Group on
- > Okinawa with a
- > regular attendance of between 10 and 15 at the two weekly meetings
- > on Monday and
- > Thursday. Quite a few have been coming in from the States who have
- > been members
- > there. An effort is being made to obtain clubrooms for use of the - > men in their spare
- > time. Recently an Army chaplain and a chief psychiatrist, Captain
- > Horneck from the
- > Army base hospital were present. This hospital cares for men from
- > the camp, which now
- > includes about 2,000 men.
- >
- > Brady Tries Open Meeting -- Although started only in August, 1947,
- > the Brady, Texas,
- > Group recently held its first open meeting for the public. The group
- > numbers less
- > than 10 members and there was some doubt as to public response.
- > However, more than - > 300 representatives of business, professions, civic clubs and
- > churches turned out,
- > although the city's population is only about 7,000. Speakers from
- > the San Angelo,
- > Coleman and Seminole Groups helped to give the session a lift.
- >
- > What Newspapers Say -- Discussing the flourishing branch of A.A. in
- > the State Prison
- > at Waupun, Wis., of which John H. Woodhouse of the prison record
- > office has been
- > adviser, the 'Milwaukee Tribune' concludes in an editorial, "A.A. at
- > the Prison,"
- > that A.A. is an excellent form of group therapy and that "perhaps
- > there is a clue to
- > the direction we should take in the success of A.A. at the prison.
- > It is at least
- > worth thinking about."
- >
- > A feature story in the Pittsburgh, (Pa.) 'Press' recently ran to
- > more than a column
- > with a description of how a hospitalized alcoholic became a member.
- > 'The Press'

- > praises the more than 500 Pittsburgh members who celebrated the
- > seventh anniversary
- > of their group in Carnegie Music Hall recently.
- >
- > Recently a newspaper editor from Prince Albert, Sask., Can., who has
- > been "lone
- > wolfing" it, in his efforts to start a group there, made a
- > 2,800-mile trip to attend
- > a third anniversary celebration in Winnipeg. Since that time in a
- > column in 'The
- > Herald,' Speaking for Myself," he has written a series of articles
- > discussing various
- > phases of A.A.
- >
- > Pat Paterson, writing in the Paterson, N. J., 'Morning Call' heads a
- > recent column
- > "Tipplers' Tip," or "Better the Slip Before Cup Reaches Lip" and
- > points out that of
- > 29,000 chronic alcoholics in New Jersey less than 800 each year are
- > given treatment
- > in private and public hospitals. Less than 50 per cent of the
- > general hospitals refer
- > alcoholics to other institutions or organizations," he writes, but
- > of those who do 21
- > per cent of their patients are referred to A.A. Nine out of 12
- > mental hospitals
- > report that they refer their patients to A.A. and at one institution
- > investigating
- > professors learned there is a chapter there."
- >
- > Want Clubroom in '48 -- Members of the Aberdeen, S. D., Group have
- > adopted the slogan
- > "A clubroom in 1948" and three energetic members have been assigned
- > to combat the
- > housing shortage in the community and find suitable quarters.
- > Members of the group,
- > founded in March, 1946, were entertained at a special Christmas
- > party by the Gerhard
- > Kiddie Troop, ages 4 to 12, who put on various dances. Several
- > members of the Britten
- > Group, started by three former Aberdeen members, attended. The group
- > meets every
- > Wednesday and Sunday night in the Milwaukee Women's clubrooms.
- >
- > Six Complete Year -- Six men observed their first 12 months of
- > sobriety at a recent
- > meeting of the Pioneer Group of Winona, Wis., with members, their
- > wives and guests

- > gathering at the Steak Shop. Four visitors from Eau Claire were present.
- >
- > Business Men Endorse A.A. -- A resolution adopted by a unanimous
- > vote of the
- > directors of the Front Royal, Va., Chamber of Commerce recently
- > read: "Whereas it has
- > come to the attention of the board of directors of this chamber that
- > a chapter of
- > Alcoholics Anonymous has been organized in Front Royal . . . and
- > whereas the members
- > of this board are in thorough sympathy and accord with the purposes,
- > aims and objects
- > of the said organization: Therefore be it resolved . . . that this
- > board . . .
- > endorse the purposes, aims and objects of the said organization
- > which has thus far
- > resulted in accomplishments not heretofore believed possible of
- > consummation."
- >
- > Open Meeting Draws 900 -- An estimated 900 people thronged to the
- > First Christian
- > Church of Palestine, Texas, recently to attend the first open
- > meeting of the group
- > there. Although some guests were from surrounding counties, the
- > attendance was
- > believed outstanding for a city of 15,000. Among the speakers was
- > Bishop Clinton S.
- > Quin of Houston.
- >
- > Get Clubrooms -- Clubrooms have been secured by members of the
- > Staunton, Va.( Group,
- > which reports it hopes to be installed in the quarters by the time
- > this issue appears.
- >
- > Attendance Wins Subscriptions -- At a recent meeting of the
- > Endicott, N. Y., Group,
- > it was voted to give all of those who have attended three meetings a
- > yearly
- > subscription to 'The Grapevine'. Fourteen names were included with
- > the notice to this
- > magazine.
- >
- > Many Holiday Parties -- Although the holidays are weeks past,
- > reports of a
- > considerable number of observances have been sent to 'The Grapevine'.
- >
- > Goshen, Ind., A.A.s joined with members at Elkhart, 10 miles
- > distant, in celebration

- > of New Year's, which was marked by an informal program, a short talk
- > and a buffet
- > supper, enjoyed by about 100 persons. The same two groups plan to
- > join early in
- > February for the third anniversary party of the Elkhart organization
- > which held its
- > first meeting February 6, 1945. The Goshen Group will be a year old
- > next July 21 and
- > now numbers about 20 members who meet twice weekly.
- >
- > An afternoon party at Kent, Ohio, was given over to the children
- > with toys of all
- > kinds to fit their ages. Ice cream, cake and balloons were handed
- > out around a large
- > tree. Presents were exchanged at the regular evening meeting and
- > there was a songfest
- > and dancing. Over 150 enjoyed the celebration.
- >
- > About 50 children from the Polk County Juvenile Home in Des Moines,
- > Iowa, were guests
- > at the club there for a dinner, entertainment and gifts.
- >
- > The Chattanooga, Tenn., Group gave food, clothes and toys to a
- > family in which both
- > parents are alcoholics. The kitty one meeting night before
- > Christinns supplied the
- > funds and the family was designated by the Salvation Army.
- >
- > Los Angeles, Cal., A.A.s went to the Camarillo State Hospital for a
- > party with
- > alcoholic patients for an annual party and Christinas meeting. Many
- > former patients,
- > now members of outside groups, returned for the gathering. Two
- > subscriptions to 'The
- > Grapevine'
- > were given as presents.
- >
- > Music, coffee, a floor show, buffet turkey dinner and dancing made
- > up the New Year's
- > party program for Kansas City, Mo., Group members at Garrett Hall. A
- > party for the
- > youngsters was also arranged.
- >
- > New Year's Eve was celebrated by Niagara Frontier A.A.s with a party
- > at the Food
- > Craft Hall in Buffalo.
- >
- > The Guild hall of St. Stephen's Episcopal Church was the scene of

- > the New Year's Eve
- > party in Spencer, Iowa, with many visitors from other groups in that
- > section.
- >
- > Wichita, Kans., A.A.s had two parties, a Christmas dinner at the
- > club, and a New
- > Year's Eve party.
- >
- > With a guarantee in advance of "no headaches" the Rutland, Vt.,
- > Group celebrated New
- > Year's at the club rooms with food, favors, punch, dancing and cards.
- >
- > The first annual Christmas party of the Brighter Side Group,
- > Waterloo, Iowa, was held
- > before Christmas in the Sacred Heart Church basement parlors with an
- > attendance of
- > nearly 100 members and families. Visitors were present from Grundy
- > Center, Reinbeck,
- > Tripoli and Independence.
- >
- > Like Open Meetings -- With regard to open meetings, our
- > correspondent in San Luis
- > Obispo, Cal., writes, "We began a group effort here on the 'open'
- > basis largely
- > because our members drove in from fairly great distances and the
- > couples just
- > naturally attended together.
- >
- > "The same tendency was noted in general family relationships such as
- > sister bringing
- > brother. This was an open territory on the California Coast, and we
- > have watched with
- > interest the founding of other groups nearby. They have all seemed
- > to grow in the
- > open tradition, without any decisions taken by the founders.
- >
- > "We have felt that the wives and close relatives of the alcoholics
- > have helped in all
- > phases of group work.
- >
- > "Advantage has been taken of meetings in which we found ourselves
- > 'closed' by
- > accidents in attendance to sound out the members on the matter of
- > holding closed
- > meetings. There has been no desire for a change in that direction
- > thus far.
- >
- > "These comments are from small town experience. We shall be

- > interested in reactions
- > from areas of heavier population." .
- >
- > Indiana Anniversaries Observed -- That there were only two A.A.s in
- > Ft. Wayne, Ind.,
- > five years ago, while now there are three groups in the city as well
- > as others in
- > Warsaw, Kendallville, Wabash, Monroeville and North Manchester was
- > recalled at the - > recent anniversary banquets in Ft. Wayne and South Bend. Group I of
- > Ft. Wayne
- > observed its fifth anniversary with a banquet at the Chamber of
- > Commerce with
- > representatives of the groups mentioned as well as from Marion,
- > Indianapolis, Lima
- > and St. Mary's, Ohio, together with representatives of the clergy,
- > medicine,
- > business, professional leaders and city officials. A magazine writer
- > of national
- > renown was chief speaker. The South Bend banquet was held at the
- > Oliver Hotel with
- > 225 present.
- >
- > Some New Groups -- Although a regular meeting hall had not been
- > obtained at the time
- > 'The Grapevine' was informed, Olean, N. Y., now has a group formed
- > of members who
- > formerly attended meetings in Salamanca and Bradford. Starting in
- > October, these
- > cities inaugurated a regular monthly joint meeting the second Sunday
- > of each month
- > with each group taking its turn as host. '
- >
- > Another new group in this area is the Amherst Group in North
- > Buffalo, whose members
- > are meeting in the Main-Fillmore rooms at 2629 Main Street on Friday
- > and Sunday
- > evenings at 8 o'clock with the former a closed session.
- >
- > Building on the foundation laid some months ago by J. M., Sioux
- > Falls, S. D.,
- > attorney, a group has been formed in the South Dakota State
- > Penitentiary at Sioux
- > Falls. J. M. was aided by F. O., an inmate of the prison. Address is
- > the South Dakota
- > Penitentiary Chapter of A.A., Box 911, Sioux Falls, S. D.
- >
- > First meeting of the Hutchinson, Kans., Group was held late last

- > fall at the Leon
- > Hotel and now numbers five men and one woman. Four of the present
- > members were
- > associated with the Wichita Group. Meetings are held twice weekly in
- > members' homes,
- > Thursdays and Sundays.. Address is P. O. Box No. 845, Hutchinson.
- >
- > The Johnson City, Tenn., Group recently sponsored a group at the
- > National Soldiers'
- > Home just outside the city and another at Elizabethton, both of - > which are growing
- > well. The Elizabethton Group meets Tuesday night at private homes
- > and ministers are
- > honorary members. The Mountain Home Group has changed its meeting
- > night to Friday at
- > the Veterans' Administration Hospital staff room. Members of the two
- > groups attended
- > the Johnson City meetings in the basement of the public library.
- >
- > A.A.s of the new Parkchester Group, Bronx, N. Y., have been meeting
- > in St. Helena's
- > School since the founding in October and report things going well. A
- > leaflet put out
- > by the church says that the meetings represent "a practical,
- > well-working society
- > which has done wonderful work. We are proud to have them with us."
- > Meetings are held
- > Tuesday nights.
- >
- > Wichita, Kans., A.A.s are proud of the groups they have sponsored in
- > nearby towns
- > with three established and two others in process of formation.
- >
- > According to 'The Derelict Schooner' of Jacksonville, Fla., the St.
- > Augustine Group
- > had its first meeting just before the holidays at the home of G. W.
- > with four members
- > present. Three members of the Murray Hill Group also attended.
- >
- > Seven new members at Manchester, Ia, started their own group
- > recently with the aid of
- > 130 other members from Dubuque, Cedar Rapids, Maringo, Oelwein and
- > Waterloo.
- > Principal speakers were from Dubuque and Wisconsin. Meetings will be - > held Monday
- > nights at the home of T. C.
- >
- > Frontier Has Paper -- 'The Niagara Frontier A.A. Bulletin' is the > latest of the new > exchanges to reach 'The Grapevine' office. The fourth issue is an > attractive > mimeographed sheet carrying a good selection of news as well as a > table showing how > 62 years of sobriety were reached by various members in the last two > months, the > times ranging from one to seven years.

>
> Forms Own Group -- F.A.R., writing to 'The Paradox' of Kansas City, > Mo., says that he > has formed a group of his own. After association with groups in > Galveston, Houston,
> Dallas and Kansas City he took a job on a paper in King City, Cal., > where he has been > trying unsuccessfully to found a group. His previous experiences had > convinced him > that without God's help he was hopeless, but now he writes: "I > found myself in > Phoenix, stiff as a plank. So I went back to Galveston where I came > to realize that > only with the help of God could I quit drinking. That's when I took > the 3rd Step and > God and I formed our group. You won't find it listed in the A.A. > directory, but > there's a group in King City, Cal. Its members are God and F.A.R."
>
>
>
> To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
> AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com
>
>
>
> Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to the Yahoo! Terms of Service > <<http://docs.yahoo.com/info/terms/>>.
>
>
> *Yahoo! Groups Sponsor*
> ADVERTISEMENT
> click here
>
<<http://rd.yahoo.com/M=194081.4074964.5287182.1261774/D=egroupweb/S=1705237878>
>:H\

M/A=1706996/R=0/SIG=11p5b9ris/*http://www.ediets.com/start.cfm?code=30509&medi
a=\

|      |              |           |                              |
|------|--------------|-----------|------------------------------|
| 1935 | 5            | 2         | AACOA 310                    |
| 1936 | 15 200%      | 2         | AACOA 310                    |
| 1937 | 40 167%      | 2         | AACOA 310                    |
| 1938 | 100 150%     | 2         | AACOA vii                    |
| 1939 | 400 300%     | ?         | AACOA 180, 310               |
| 1940 | 2,000 400%   | ?         | AACOA 310                    |
| 1941 | 8,000 300%   | 200       | AACOA 192, 310, PIO 266      |
| 1942 | ?            | ?         |                              |
| 1943 | 10,000       | ?         | LOH 181                      |
| 1944 | 10,000 0%    | 360       | BW-FH 166-167, PIO 304       |
| 1945 | 15,000 50%   | 560 56%   | NG 113, BW-FH 163, 180       |
| 1946 | 30,000 100%  | 1,000 79% | BW-FH 163                    |
| 1947 | 48,613 62%   | 1,650 65% | GTBT 22                      |
| 1948 | 60,000 23%   | 2,000 21% | BW-FH 163, DBGO 287          |
| 1949 | ?            | ?         |                              |
| 1950 | 111,765      | 4,216     | BW-FH 185                    |
| 1951 | ?            | 4,420 5%  | Data from Conference reports |
| 1952 | 118,632      | 4,925 11% | For 1951 - 2002              |
| 1953 | 117,978 -1%  | 5,401 10% |                              |
| 1954 | 126,057 7%   | 5,927 10% |                              |
| 1955 | 139,798 11%  | 6,779 14% |                              |
| 1956 | 104,294 -25% | 6,779 0%  |                              |
| 1957 | 139,795 34%  | 6,976 3%  |                              |
| 1958 | 145,830 4%   | 7,765 11% |                              |

|      |           |     |        |     |                          |
|------|-----------|-----|--------|-----|--------------------------|
| 1959 | 151,606   | 4%  | 8,211  | 6%  |                          |
| 1960 | 162,037   | 7%  | 8,615  | 5%  |                          |
| 1961 | 176,474   | 9%  | 9,305  | 8%  |                          |
| 1962 | 189,702   | 7%  | 10,070 | 8%  |                          |
| 1963 | 209,434   | 10% | 10,956 | 9%  |                          |
| 1964 | 217,967   | 4%  | 11,752 | 7%  |                          |
| 1965 | 232,105   | 6%  | 12,444 | 6%  | Est. members > 350,000   |
| 1966 | 251,615   | 8%  | 13,279 | 7%  |                          |
| 1967 | 263,026   | 5%  | 14,154 | 7%  |                          |
| 1968 | 283,329   | 8%  | 14,747 | 4%  |                          |
| 1969 | 297,077   | 5%  | 15,624 | 6%  |                          |
| 1970 | 311,450   | 5%  | 16,459 | 5%  |                          |
| 1971 | 329,907   | 6%  | 17,776 | 8%  | Est. members > 500,000   |
| 1972 | 395,244   | 20% | 20,829 | 17% |                          |
| 1973 | 421,151   | 7%  | 22,467 | 8%  |                          |
| 1974 | 502,733   | 19% | 25,030 | 11% |                          |
| 1975 | 533,590   | 6%  | 26,456 | 6%  |                          |
| 1976 | 574,318   | 8%  | 29,352 | 11% | Est. members > 1,000,000 |
| 1977 | 612,876   | 7%  | 31,587 | 8%  |                          |
| 1978 | 627,456   | 2%  | 33,241 | 5%  |                          |
| 1979 | 868,171   | 38% | 39,964 | 20% |                          |
| 1980 | 907,575   | 5%  | 42,105 | 5%  |                          |
| 1981 | 937,705   | 3%  | 47,797 | 14% |                          |
| 1982 | 1,065,299 | 14% | 53,576 | 12% |                          |

1983 1,191,946 12% 58,576 9%
1984 1,351,793 13% 62,860 7% 1985 1,445,999 7% 67,019 7%
1986 1,556,316 8% 73,192 9% 1987 1,617,296 4% 76,184 4%
1988 1,734,734 7% 85,270 12%
1989 1,793,834 3% 87,696 3%
1990 2,047,469 14% 93,914 7%
1991 2,120,130 4% 96,458 3%
1992 2,048,954 -3% 89,215 -8%
1993 2,062,380 1% 90,155 1%
1994 1,790,528 -13% 89,239 -1% 1995 1,922,269 7% 95,156 7%
1996 1,959,829 2% 96,997 2%
1997 1,967,433 0% 97,568 1%
1998 1,989,124 1% 98,710 1%
1999 1,990,504 0% 99,024 0%
2000 2,160,013 9% 100,766 2%
2001 2,215,293 3% 100,101 -1%
2002 2,092,460 -6% 103,768 4%

Citations    AACOA    AA Comes of Age

BW-FH    Bill W by Francis Hartigan

DBGO    Dr Bob & the Good Old-timers

GTBT    Grateful to Have Been There

*****

_the text of a two-sided 4x5" printed card, distributed by Chicago's Central Office._

*****
*****

—

—

* *

===

*HOW TO MAKE A 12th STEP CALL***

=====

--

...the A.A. way, as we understand it, with excerpts from 'the basic text of our society', the book 'Alcoholics Anonymous' Chapter 7, entitled 'Working With Others.'

When a 12th Step call is received, we begin with the assumption that another human being's life is at stake, literally. This means that without delay, this call is to be answered at once.

1st - Arrange for another member to go with you.

2nd - Have a Quiet Time; read Chapter 7 in the Book.

3rd - Maintain Anonymity.

4th - Talk to the prospect alone, if possible.

5th - Congratulate him on wanting to do something about his drinking.

6th - Give him the 4-page folder 'Just What is Alcoholics Anonymous' calling his attention to the 20 questions.

7th - Note well what the Book says at the bottom of page 94, 'On your first visit tell him about the fellowship of Alcoholics Anonymous. If he shows interest, lend him your copy of this book."

8th - Each of you tell him "What you used to be like, what happened, and What you are like now."

9th - If he wants to talk, let him.

10th

- At the top of page 95, it advises you, 'Give him a chance to think it over. Sometimes a new man is anxious to proceed at once, and you may be tempted to do so. This sometimes is a mistake; if he has trouble later, he is likely to say you rushed him.'

Continuing, it says, 'If he is sincerely interested and wants to see you again, ask him to read this book in the interval.' (At least urge him to read the first 164 pages.) 'After doing that (reading the book), he must decide for himself whether he wants to go on.'

11th - When you are ready to leave, tell him that you will call on him the following day if he wants, and will have had time to read the first 164 pages; or, whenever he would suggest.

12th - Note that the 2nd paragraph of page 96 says, 'Suppose you are making your second visit to a man. He has read this volume, and says he is prepared to go through with the 12 Steps of the Program of Recovery.'

At this point, you review the 12 Steps with him; and arrange to bring him to your Group Meeting.

If he does not want to go on; or he feels he can do it some other way, pick up your copy of the Book; and invite him to call you again if he changes his mind later on; or whenever he feels A.A. can be of help.

And finally, note how the Book, at the top of page 96, says, 'We find it a waste of time to keep chasing a man who cannot, or will not work with you. If you leave such a person alone, he may soon become convinced that he cannot recover by himself.'

two and one-half years. A Spanish-speaking group was started a short time ago among members of that race who found it difficult to discuss their problems and capture the spirit of A.A. with English-speaking A.A. members.

All the Ships at Sea -- The Seven Seas Club has been recently opened in San Francisco, Calif. Primarily for the benefit of the sailors and men around the Embarcadero it is open to all who wish to do something about their drinking problem.

One of the club's major activities is keeping a steady flow of literature on alcoholism going to all the ships at sea. The new club numbers approximately 50 in permanent membership but has an additional 200 who drop in while in port. It also serves about 50 luncheons everyday.

Lest They Forget -- Just to remind members of meeting night the Bloomington, Ill.

Group sends a penny postcard reading "A Date Tuesday Night." The first large "A" is above the printed line and another "A" with a question mark after it is placed below, thus forming the initials A.A.

Birthday Meeting -- Celebrating its second anniversary, the Atlantic City Group will hold a meeting on May 22, to acquaint the public with the A.A. Program. Dr. C. Nelson Davis of St. Luke's Hospital, Philadelphia, Pa., and A.A. members will speak.

Growing Up -- After nine months of steady growth, the Philadelphia, Miss., Group has moved into a large and modern club room. The room is equipped with chrome furniture, an electric coffee urn and game tables. Besides the regular weekly meeting a study group for beginners is held each Monday evening.

Judge Lauds A.A. Warm commendation of the work of the Richmond Group is given by Judge J. Hoge Ricks of the Juvenile and Domestic Relations Court, Richmond, Va.

In his annual report he stated: "The court has tried for years to find an answer to

the liquor problem. To this end it has used probation, good behavior bonds, treatment in the various state and local hospitals, suspended sentences, confinement in the city
jail and state farm, all with little success. The one ray of hope in this dark picture is seen in the splendid activity and fine cooperation of Alcoholics Anonymous, a group of citizens who have found an effective method of dealing with this problem. About two years ago, the court began referring cases to this organization. When the person referred followed our advice and contacted the organization, he was invariably helped. However, we discovered that many of those referred did not go to the A.A. meetings. In recent months members of the A.A.
group
have been attending court three days a week when domestic relations cases are heard.
They are ready to give information concerning the A.A. and its activities to any man or woman who indicates a desire to stop drinking, and they extend a cordial invitation to such persons to participate. Many individuals who have been before
this court time and again for drunkenness in past years are now keeping sober and have been rehabilitated in their homes."

New Meeting Places -- What is to be known as the Alcoholics Anonymous Assembly
was formed recently in Jacksonville, Fla. The Assembly is located in new quarters where any member of A.A. or anyone desiring help is welcome. From Winona, Minn., comes
the report that the Pioneer Group is moving into new clubrooms. The permanent rooms
are located in a downtown building and are now in the process of redecoration.

Mississippians Meet -- The first annual Mississippi A.A. Conclave was held at Allison
Wells, Miss, on May 8 and 9. Founders of the first A.A. Group in Mississippi were invited as guest speakers.

A New Baby -- The first meeting of the Morrisville, Vt., Group was held late
in

In the three years since the inception of this service, approximately 3,100 men and women have been treated. Knickerbocker Hospital officials feel that the three-year experience in caring for alcoholics justifies the following statements:

"The alcoholic is a sick person and, in many cases, can be helped by proper medical and psychiatric treatment.

"It is quite feasible to care for such patients in a general hospital if they are properly screened before admission.

"Such a service need not interfere with other hospital services.

"It poses no great nursing problem.

"It is less expensive to operate than a general surgical or medical service.

"It lends itself readily to inclusion as a regular medical service for teaching purpose.

"It is desirable to operate such a service in close cooperation with Alcoholics Anonymous.

"It is highly worthwhile because of the number of sick people who are restored to useful and vocational life."

A Plea from Brazil -- A plea for 12th Step work by mail has come to 'The Grapevine' from Brazil. An A.A. member and his wife would like to have some new ideas, experiences, case histories, happy domestic situations and sponsorship procedures. Letters on these subjects would be of tremendous interest to the A.A. members in South America.

The A.A. asking for correspondence arrived in Rio de Janeiro several months ago only to find himself without the benefits of A.A. Following a logical procedure he looked around for another A.A. or a prospect. The group now numbers six.

Because of the handicap of unfamiliarity with the language the little group feels that the transmission of experiences loses through the interpreter. It is difficult for the Brazilian members of the group to realize the scope of the A.A. organization. Letters would stimulate interest in the group and help to get across the idea that A.A. is a bond of fellowship that extends to all parts of the globe.

New Group in Federal Prison -- A new A.A. group was recently formed at the Federal Prison, McNeil Island, Puget Sound. Meetings are held every Wednesday night with two members from the Tacoma Group in attendance.

Liquor has been responsible for the imprisonment of many on McNeil Island, and A.A. offers new vistas of courage, hope and security on their release. Many are attending the meetings regularly, digesting the A.A. literature and the Big Book.

These boys have an understanding friend and sympathetic counselor in the chief medical officer, who while not an alcoholic has seen the results of A.A. throughout the country and is in complete accord with the Program.

Near Fort Lewis the state of Washington has an "Honor Farm" where prisoners are brought from Walla Walla. Many of these trustees are in A.A. and are not neglecting their weekly meetings while in this camp. Several of the Tacoma Group have attended these meetings and have found them interesting and refreshing. Two men recently released have jobs, attend the meetings and are doing a good job as A.A. members.

A Snowbound Trek -- Visions of venison, done to a turn in true Southern style, or fellowship the A.A. way, brought some 40 members, families and friends together recently in Andrews, S. C. A member of the Andrews Group opened his cabin for a venison barbecue to A.A. members from groups in the surrounding territory. The chosen evening turned out to be one of the most fiendish in years. Over icy roads and through blinding snow guests came from Columbia, 106 miles from Andrews (each way), Georgetown and Charleston. Despite the hardships, those sturdy souls from "down yonder" report a good time was had by all.

Housing Problem -- From Chicago comes the report that a group of hungry A.A. members are facing a housing problem. Overcrowded conditions have occurred, says a spokesman of the group, because a simple little luncheon held in 1946 has grown, like all A.A. activities, to huge proportions. A few members started meeting for luncheon in a "Loop" department store restaurant. Soon they had outgrown one table and moved to a private dining room. At present the daily luncheon guests number more than 30 and are increasing each day. If the increase continues the diners may spill over to such an extent that they will occupy most of the main dining room! Also from the Chicago area comes the news that the Skokie Group has grown to such proportions that a split was necessary. The group also boasts of three husband and wife combinations and one mother and son.

From Honolulu, Hawaii -- The Honolulu Group, like most A.A. groups, has outgrown its small home and school meeting place. Since June meetings have been held in conveniently located club rooms in downtown Honolulu. Though not lavish, the rooms are well equipped and adequate for three weekly meetings.

Monday and Friday meetings are devoted to educational study for members only, while the Wednesday meeting is for members and their wives or husbands. An outside speaker usually addresses this meeting. The first Monday evening in each month is an open meeting to which anyone interested in A.A. work is invited.

Hope has spent the last 33 years thanking The Men's Center for saving his life.

"My dream is that there is a room for every man who wants to get sober. This is my way of giving back to people who have helped me," Hope said.

To this day, the 150 residents of The Men's Center are required to get a job, pay rent, attend three Alcoholics Anonymous meetings a day and one house meeting a week.

Hope, who estimates the center has helped 25,000 men through recovery in its 45-year existence, has operated with little outside help.

"I don't want any money from the government because they'll tell you what to do with it," he said.

No lavish Houston-style, private fund-raising events have supported the center.

Still, over the years, Hope has managed to acquire virtually every piece of property in the 3800 blocks of Main and Fannin growing from four buildings in 1976 to eight today.

Hope said he has run into a lot of talent on the streets of Houston, including his latest protégé, and brand new director of development, Jeff, not his real name due to the anonymous aspect of Alcoholics Anonymous.

"I was a Foley's doorman," said Jeff, referring to his spot on the street.

"I had to get up every morning and move for them to wash down the sidewalks," he said.

The tumble to Foley's doorman was from such jobs as music director of a Chicago radio station to marketing researcher with firms from New York to Dallas, including clients such as Pepsi and ironically, Seagram's liquor.

On his road to recovery, Hope offered Jeff a job as a cook in his restaurant, The Original New Orleans Po Boys, 3902 Main St., across from the center. From there Jeff moved to cooking at the center, and now director of development.

Jeff plans to play a key roll in Hope's next dream to turn some property behind the George R. Brown Convention Center into the center's new home. The center has purchased a 45,000-square-foot facility at 2720 Leland. Hope estimates that $4 million is needed to renovate the facility for future residents. Jeff wishes to follow in Hope's footsteps by redeeming some of the years lost to alcohol by raising money for the new facility.

"My dad is just floored that I'm sober. The rest of my family's still skeptical. I've done a lot of damage. They say for every alcoholic there are 20 people hurt. But I'm starting to hopefully reverse some of that now by touching others positively," Jeff said.

Jeff said it's amazing how talent and effectiveness can emerge from recovering alcoholics.

"Give me five sober alcoholics, and I'm rockin'," Jeff said.

Source: The Houston Chronicle, July 2, 2003

|||||

+++Message 1438. . . . . Periodical Literature/Movie review,
The Austin Chronicle 06-06-1997
From: Ed Adami . . . . . 10/26/2003 10:24:00 AM

|||||

Drunks

Directed By: Peter Cohn
Starring: Richard Lewis, Dianne Wiest, Faye Dunaway, Amanda Plummer, Parker Posey, Liza Harris, Spalding Gray, Howard Rollins
(R, 88 min.)

The great insight of 12-step programs is that chronic substance abuse is less about thrills than finding a system for living and a source of daily comfort. Like Lou Reed said about The Big H: 'It's my life and it's my wife.' In this film adaptation of Gary Lennon's play Blackout, the characters are all members of a New York City Alcoholics Anonymous group for whom the corny A.A. rituals and mantras ('By the grace of God, one day at a time, I've got 70 days sober. Thank you.') are substitutes of a sort for less manageable regimens of boozing and doping. Most of the action happens during one nighttime meeting, from which Jim (Lewis) disappears in a funk after delivering an emotional speech about his lifelong problems with self-medication. In alternating scenes, new members passionately describe why they got on the wagon as the long-sober Jim hits a series of Times Square liquor stores in preparation for a disastrous swan-dive off. Like many standup comics before him, Lewis displays an innate flair for dramatic acting and more than holds his own among the talent-packed roster of co-stars. The agonizing scenes in which he wavers on the brink of his epic bender vividly illustrate the torment of a man who knows that self-destruction is his most natural mode of behavior, and that living straight for "drunks" a sentence in the state penitentiary including the use of the whipping post four times a day as a reward for the crime of drunkenness. It is reported that the press and intelligent citizens of Mississippi took the senator strongly to task for such an expression. A.A. took no part in the controversy but could not fail to note some of the fine things said about that organization by friends and the public press.

To the Travel-Wearry -- Texarkana, Texas-Ark., it is said, is the gateway to the Southwest. This location brings many travelers to the city. The Texarkana Group wants A.A. travelers to know that the welcome mat is out at new club rooms located at 102 Gazette Building.

From Small Beginnings -- The group at Filmore, Utah, was organized last August with five members. It now has 12 with more becoming interested everyday. The most recent member drove 115 miles for help from the Filmore Group. Meetings are held every Monday, evening for members and their wives.

Will Welcome Advice -- In order to reach the man under 30 with a drinking problem a new group was recently formed in Rochester, N. Y. The newly organized Young Men's Group would like suggestions from other groups of this type.

Speakers Wanted -- Since its organization in September, 1947, the Cumberland, Md. Group has moved to new and larger quarters. Being relatively new in A.A. work this group would welcome speakers from other towns. Any group wishing to sponsor speakers may contact the secretary at P.O. Box 323, Cumberland, Md.

Seven Years Old -- The Kansas City, Mo. Group recently celebrated its seventh anniversary. This was the second group organized in Missouri. More than 500 A.A.s and their friends were present at the two day celebration which was highlighted by speakers who had "dried out" during each of the seven years of the group's existence.

The featured speaker was the founder of the Des Moines, Ia Group. There are now approximately 450 active members of the Kansas City Group, including 88 women.

Open New Club -- Beginning with one member and one dollar in December, 1947, the Alano Club, San Diego, Calif., now boasts more than 100 members.

Officials "Sold" -- Officials of Santa Clara County, Calif, are "sold" on Alcoholics Anonymous. So firmly do they believe in the group therapy offered by A.A. that Judges, the Sheriff and the District Attorney have agreed to the use of the County Jail Farm and the County Hospital for rehabilitation of those who cannot afford hospitalization or treatment in private institution. Alcoholics who have hit "bottom" and desperately need care and confinement may approach a group committee and make known their need for confinement. If the screening committee believes them to be sincere, the cases are turned over to a "contact man" for the four San Jose, Calif, groups. He in turn notifies the District Attorney and applicants are sent to the "farm" without submitting to legal red tape. Should the alcoholic require hospitalization he may be transferred from the Jail Farm to the County Hospital for treatment. Facilities at both County institutions are excellent. The plan is now in operation and Alcoholics Anonymous members as well as officials of the county regard it as a step forward in the move to consider alcoholics as sick people rather than moral parasites.

Just a Line to Tell You -- That nearly every A.A. group in Vermont was represented at the first anniversary meeting of the Valley Group, Bethel, Vt. . . . The Montrose, Calif. Beginners Group uses this bit of wisdom for a motto; "There is no limit to the amount of good a man can do so long as he doesn't care who gets the credit." .

.

Out of town speakers go over big in Louisville, Ky. Any travelers who want to exchange ideas with the Kentuckians can get in touch with the Token Club. . .

.

An

A.A. of a year's sobriety found himself in Okanogan, Wash. He contacted two alcoholics. Result: A thriving little group. . . . A hangover on May 12, 1947 developed into a new group on May 27, 1947. That was in Storm Lake, Iowa. Now a year

later it is going strong as the Buena Vista County Group -- The Mayfield, Ky.

Group

has a husband and wife who do their 12th Step work as a team. They would like to hear about the methods other husbands and wives use. Do they work together or separately?

. . . The Mishawaka, Ind. Group while still one big happy family, has divided into three sections for closed meetings. . . . The group down in Brazil that wants letters now has a post office box: Alcoholics Anonymous, Caixa Postal 254, Rio de Janeiro.

Never Underestimate -- The ladies took charge of a meeting held recently in Tacoma,

Wash., when four members of the Seattle Women's Group spoke. In the audience were ten persons, attending an A.A. meeting for the first time. Proof of the power of a woman came the next week at the Step Meeting. Of the ten who came to listen, eight returned to learn. The County Sheriff also spoke.

It Is Rumored -- The Jefferson City, Mo., Group is tossing around the idea of organizing a "Slipper Group." It will be designed for those boys and girls who really want A.A. but for some reason or another fall off the beam now and then.

Weekly Radio Program -- The Fairmont, W. Va., Group is sponsoring a weekly program over the new radio station WVVW. The program, heard at 12 noon every Saturday, has been running successfully for several weeks. Four members of the group appeared recently on an open forum which proved so successful that more programs of this in Marty's New York apartment when they first talked about a magazine devoted to AA and alcoholism.

It would be about eight pages, rather like a tabloid, with beautiful print that would be easy to read. Priscilla, who was the art editor of Vogue, designed the title page.

She drew the grapes, hanging on the vines as a background. Then she drew "The Grapevine" as the title in big black letters almost an inch high. You can see this beautiful title page and read all eight pages when you visit the Grapevine office or the AA archives in New York City.

I had a letter addressed to AA in that famous first edition. I said I was so grateful to be sober. For a year and a half I had not had a drink. I said to myself in part,

"All right -- you're fifteen years behind in your life. Fifteen years behind in your career. (I am a professional writer.) Thank God you came into AA when you did. Now you can begin to get your life back." I ended by saying I felt I had to write this letter because I was grateful to AA for seeing me through the growing pains of early sobriety.

I signed the letter Felicia G., which is my maiden name and the one I write under. In the last thirty years I've been signing my Grapevine articles with the initials F. M. I was married to another AA, John M. We both stayed sober through three and a half years of perfect hell. Then, thank God, we got divorced.

Priscilla had wanted me to write something for that first edition and I had said I would. But I was pretty new in AA and my self-esteem was wobbly. Although I was earning my pork chops writing for such slicks as Colliers, Mademoiselle, and the Saturday Evening Post, I felt the eyes of the Grapevine founders fixed upon, me. My Lord, this piece had to be great. It had to be as good as Shakespeare - maybe even a little better than the Bard. I wrote and wrote and tore it up and wrote and tore it up.

Priscilla phoned from her office at Vogue and said I was late with it. They were going to press in hours. She was coming right up herself to get it.

I burst into a sweat. I went back to the typewriter and typed out a piece with a beginning, a middle, and an end.

I jerked the last page out of the typewriter, read it over, and said aloud, "This stinks."

I ran down my five flights of stairs and, happily, the garbage man hadn't come by

yet. The garbage cans outside my New York apartment house were filled with refuse, and so I plunged my typed pages down into the first can, and ran back up my five flights.

I was going to be all sweet and nonchalant when Priscilla arrived. Unfortunately, I was still sweating and close to tears when she rang the bell downstairs. I was a little afraid of her. She was my friend, to be sure. But she never put up with nonsense, and she had a very sharp tongue.

She came through the door of my apartment, in a chic beautiful suit and a pair of spanking clean yellow cotton gloves.

"All right, darling," she said. "I'll take it just as it is. We'll correct it if need be."

"You - you -- you won't take it," I said. "It isn't here."

"Where is it?"

"It's elsewhere."

"And where is elsewhere?"

"I couldn't write it."

"You mean you haven't written it? Come, come, my girl, you said -"

"Oh, I typed out a few pages of stuff, and it just wasn't any good, Priscilla.
You

see, I'm a fiction writer, probably because I have a very weak grasp of fact.
I mean, a fiction writer is a failed journalist. This is well known."

"Where did you put what you wrote?"

She wandered toward my wastebasket, which was filled with torn up manuscript.

"No, no," I said. "It's down on the street. It's in a garbage can."

Priscilla turned and ran down the five flights and I ran out on my rooftop terrace

and looked down. I saw Priscilla put one beautiful glove into the stinking mess, take out the pages, straighten them, shake garbage off them, read a few words, and then turn toward Park Avenue to hail a cab.

Why, heaven help me, it was worth running in the Grapevine! Or so it seemed. I let out a sigh. But then I said to myself, "They sure are desperate for material."

Marty had written an article for that inaugural issue too, though she did not sign hers, which is just a little longer than my letter. It's called "AA Goes to Sea." She says, in part, "Doctor Florence Powdermaker, a well known psychoanalyst, sent us a patient who promptly dried up, pleasing the good doctor no end. Then Doctor

Powdermaker (this being World War II) put on a naval uniform and took up the problems of tired or shell shocked seamen. Oddly enough she found that many of them had just the same problem we landlubbers are cursed with...they were alcoholics and they wanted in the worst way to get over it."

Well, I was the patient whom Doctor Powdermaker sent to AA. She had gone to a meeting of psychiatrists in New York to hear Bill W. speak and she said to me, "These people were active alcoholics and they've stopped drinking. Perhaps you ought to go and see them." I had been rolling around on her couch for a couple of years, either drunk or terribly hung over and filled with guilt at my behavior.

Dear Florence. Of course, I resisted her at first. Finally I went down to Vesey

Street, in the Wall Street section of New York, where Bill and his staff had a small office called The Alcoholic Foundation.

Bill said, "Do you think you are one of us?" The greatest thing anyone had ever said to me. Drinking alone in bars in Greenwich Village, I had been cast out by most of my friends. I hadn't been part of any group for a long time. I nodded my head and said "yes" to Bill. "Yes." This outrageous, immoral behavior of mine -- why, it entitled me to be part of a group! Here was Bill, here was Bobby B., Bill's assistant. They were like me, sick not bad. Bill, having explained this to me, sent me to see Marty, who became my wonderful sponsor. Priscilla was a sort of second sponsor. Both of them are gone now, but the three of us became lifelong friends.

After two years, I think it was, the Grapevine was taken over by Chase and his pigeon and friend, Tom Y. They agreed to run it for a couple of years. Chase and his wife, Josephine, owned and ran the Washington Square Bookshop, which was on 8th Street between Fifth and Sixth Avenues, down in Greenwich Village. On this lively block, crowded with eccentric Village types, this bookshop was well known as an oasis for local artists and writers, who dropped in all day long. On the same side of the street was a gay bar called "Main Street." Also the bar where I used to drink most evenings. This was called "The Old Colony Bar and Grill." I was such a good customer that the bartenders always got me into a cab and gave the driver my home address.

Chase got sober after he had a major miracle. He was drunk in someone's apartment in the Village, using the John, next to a wide open window at night. He stood there swaying with his pants down. Suddenly he fell out of the window. He landed in a barrel of soft ashes. The next day, he went, all hung over, to look at that barrel. Right next to it was a barrel of broken glass. He could have landed in that. He had resisted AA, but now he joined in a hurry.

And he became another sponsor of mine, after I was sober. Being the co-owner closed meeting in another part of town, and that was it. To get to an extra one, some of us used to have dinner at the Oyster Bar in Grand Central and then take a train out to a very small meeting in Forest Hills, Long Island.

Now, we have about a million members all over the world and round-the-clock meetings in New York. Of course, I'm delighted that AA has grown. I've done my infinitesimal best to help it grow. But Marty and I sometimes talk about the old days, and we get nostalgic.

We talk about old Tom, the caretaker at the 24th Street Club. Tom's wife had once committed him to a state institution for life, but some AA men got him out. He was staying sober to spite his wife. He was bad-tempered and talkative, and he cussed, and he wouldn't let too many people into his kitchen. When a formal discharge from the state institution came through, Tom got drunk to celebrate. Ila P., one of our early members, took him to Towns Hospital in a cab. Tom's false teeth kept dropping, and Ila kept pushing them back. Tom sobered up after that and stayed on the program, still cussing with every other breath.

The old clubhouse had a long hallway and one downstairs room with an empty fireplace. The speakers stood in front of it. Over the mantel was a portrait of Bill W. that had a discernible halo. Bill and some of us made fun of it. The last people to get to the meeting had to sit in the hallway or on the stairs leading to the second floor. There was a big room upstairs, too, plus a bath and a small bedroom where Bill used to stay when he was in town.

The secretary's desk was upstairs, near a wall telephone where calls for help used to come in. It was the secretary's job to answer the phone and send people out on Twelfth Step calls. A bunch of men who were out of work sat upstairs and played cards all day. They were sober but practically useless. They almost never went out on a call. When I was secretary, I got tired of them. They made such a noise that you could hardly hear anything on the phone. I made them move their everlasting card game downstairs. One huge, redheaded man got so mad at me that he went out and got drunk. He came back and leaned over the desk and told me what I could do with the club.

There was a character called Frances F. who used to come and sit right behind my desk and kibitz. She told the redheaded drunk what he could do. Beautiful! (And, alas, unprintable.) There was a rumor around AA that Frances had been a madam. She was big, tough, coarse, kindhearted, and killingly funny. Her hats, which she made herself, were covered with flowers, birds, and butterflies. When she made a forceful point, the birds flew and the flowers trembled.

People used to come in for help and sit at the secretary's desk and talk. A vague little blond waif was there one day, and Frances passed me a note: "Know good."

Later, I said, "Frances, that's spelled N-O."

"I don't care what it's spelled," she said. "It's still no good."

And that, unfortunately, was true. Of course, I helped some people, but I used to despair over the ones we couldn't seem to help. I used to drag intoxicated women to meetings and hand out AA literature to drunks in restaurants. It took me a while to understand that I couldn't sober up the world.

Tough old Frances, however, had great success with people who got into the alcoholic ward at Bellevue Hospital or the Women's House of Detention, that old jail at Sixth and Greenwich Avenues. She would sit and give them lectures on alcoholism, her knees apart and yards of bloomers showing. She would hand out old clothes to the destitute and give them carfare to get to a meeting when they were released. Many wonderful old-timers owed their sobriety to Frances.

Tony, Frances' husband, was a slender little man who had occasional slips. They were always short, because she "slapped him sober."

A very different Frances, called Sister Frances, started High Watch Farm in Connecticut. (It was one of the first rest farms for alcoholics; after hospitalization, many still go there for a rehabilitation period, with intensive use of the AA program.) Sister Frances did not belong to any established religious order, but she had studied with a pupil of Mary Baker Eddy (founder of the Christian Science Church). She had three farms to begin with: one for children, one for adults, and one for older people, which was a sort of rest home. Everybody was to learn metaphysics, and baskets were hung outside the front doors to collect money. This didn't work very well.

A pigeon of Marty's knew Sister Frances and took Bill W. and Marty up to High Watch to see her. Bill started talking about AA. Of course, there was nobody to beat him at that, unless it was Marty. When Sister Frances heard their story, she said, "I'm giving you this place." They explained that AA couldn't own any property, so a board was set up with some AA members on it, and AAs and new people started going up there.

Sister Frances' father was a former governor of Massachusetts. Her real name was Ethelred Folsom Helling, which I am sure she was glad to shed. She was small, eccentric, and highly intelligent, with a great sense of humor. She didn't believe in killing animals, so she wouldn't eat meat or wear fur or leather. She wore sneakers summer and winter. She and Marty became great friends. During that first summer, Marty was still out of work and had her own cottage up there, where she could stay whenever she liked. Marty's mother spent a year there and did all the cooking and baking. She was a soothing influence and a wonderful cook.

Back in New York, we always had a Christmas party at the old clubhouse, with a tree, entertainment by some of the members, and a nice big spread. Some of us had no place to go on Christmas. I once organized a Christmas Day party in the old Dutch Reform Church, when we moved there from the clubhouse in the 1940's. It was a huge barn of a place, with a stage, an auditorium, and a big kitchen. A lot of people said, "Nobody will come on Christmas Day."

And I said, "What do you bet?"

We sold fifty meat pies for fifty cents apiece, which was what they cost. We had salad, dessert, and gallons of coffee. A bunch of men, some of them off the Bowery, cleaned up for me. Some AA members put on a great stage show. Rudy P. from the Philharmonic played "Silent Night" on the French horn. Gradually, the auditorium filled up. Many AAs came after their family parties were over. It was a great success.

The first interracial group in the New York area started in the late 1940's. It was a slow process. There was a black group in Washington, D.C., which was then segregated. Its founder, Jim S. (whose story is in the Big Book), his wife Viola, and other members of the group used to come to New York on weekends to help us. They were simply wonderful. The black men and women in this area usually would show up at our downtown meetings, one at a time, and never come back. We tried to make one of the Greenwich Village meetings into an interracial group, and that didn't work.

Then, I heard about the Reverend Shelton Bishop, the rector of St. Philip's Church on West 134th Street. He was a great leader in Harlem. I talked to him, and he said we could have the basement area of the church and use the kitchen for our weekly meetings. A lot of people, including Bill, went up there to speak. But we'd get only one black member, then two, then three, then one again. I once got so discouraged that I called Bill on the phone and burst into tears.

But Chase, my other sponsor, who worked up there, too, said, "Once this gets rolling, you won't be able to stop it."

He was right. The St. Nicholas Group, up there in St. Philip's, began to grow,
and now there are many groups in Harlem.

Never be discouraged if your pigeons or would-be pigeons don't seem to make it.

Sometimes, you'll see them years later at a meeting, and they'll come up and tell you that something you said to them long ago really helped to get them sober. Once, on Thanksgiving Day, I invited a brand-new woman to dinner with a couple of older members. I never heard from her again until years later. She sent word that she was sober in AA and living in Baltimore. She was so grateful for that long-ago dinner that she always invited some new person to her house on Thanksgiving.

Yes, I love the way AA has grown, but I'd like to go back magically through time and relive the old days. I'd like to visit with some old friends who are no longer here, like Pat C., who used to ship for Standard Oil, and who used to call me when he got to New York and say, "Put on the coffeepot. I'll be right up." I'd like to go to the old clubhouse again and have a talk with Bill again.

But the present has its rewards.

Some of my old friends are still here, and I have many new ones a generation younger -- even two generations younger! I am a sober, reasonably happy great-grandmother. I love my family, and they love me. We do things together. I still go to meetings and try to work the program. I do a little Twelfth Step work when I can, though nowadays I'm better at helping somebody who's sober and having problems.

I like to think about other people and not about myself. Controlled nostalgia is okay, but I don't want to be a compulsive reminiscer, an old rocking-chair bore. I like living a day at a time. My nostalgia is laced with gratitude.

F. M., New Canaan, Conn.

|||||

+++Message 1444. . . . . Gv July 48 - News Circuit
From: t . . . . . 10/30/2003 3:43:00 AM

|||||

Grapevine, July 1948

News Circuit of A. A. Groups From All Parts of The World

New Latin-American Group -- The Downtown Latin-American Group has recently been formed in Los Angeles, Calif. At present the group activities are confined to discussions with Anglo-American visitors.

Alcoholic Ward Group -- Working in close association with doctors and the chaplain of State Hospital No. 2, St. Joseph, Mo., the Downtown Group of that city has formed an A.A. group in the alcoholic ward. Patients of the ward, after a period of isolation, are paroled to a member of the Downtown Group on Saturday and Sunday nights. At this time they attend regular meetings of the A.A. Group. Weekly meetings are held at the hospital with the assistance of the discharged patients who are permitted to return.

With True A.A. Enthusiasm--The Fresno, Calif. Group heard some of Bill W.'s talks over wire recorders. The members were so enthusiastic about them that they took up a collection and bought the recordings. The enthusiastic group supposed, of course, that it could rent a recording machine to play back the spools and recordings. Such was not the case. So being true A.A.s they took up another collection and bought the reproducing machine. Now that the group owns the recordings and the machine the members feel that it would be a real privilege to take them to surrounding groups for meetings.

New "Baby"--San Diego County, Calif, now has 30 group meetings each week. The newest "baby" is the Pacific Beach Group. This group conducts a purely informal meeting. There is no leader, the 12 Steps are read by a member and a discussion follows.

Seating is arranged so that members and guests may talk easily and freely without having to address the chair.

Sunday Brunch--The groups of Flint, Mich., have recently inaugurated a Sunday Brunch.

Eggs, toast, juice and coffee all add up to a very successful project the members report.

Another Anniversary--The Westerly, R. I. Group celebrated its first anniversary recently with an open meeting. Civic minded men and women were the guests for the evening speaking program.

Indianapolis A.A.s Open Club---A three story brick building, used during the war as the USO Center, is now the new Alano Club of Indianapolis. The clubhouse is complete with a large room for dancing, lounges and coffee and sandwich bar, equipped with a brass rail so that the members will feel at home. The opening was attended by approximately 500 members and friends. The clubrooms are open at all times and groups from all parts of the city hold meetings there.

Large Turnover--Only two members of the Anchorage, Alaska, Group have lived in the territory for more than five years. The membership of the little group is therefore made up of roving A.A.s, many of them construction workers.

New Women's Group--Beginning three years ago with a few members the Bakersville, Calif. Group now has approximately 100 members. The newest project to be undertaken by the organization is a Women's Group. These meetings held each Tuesday are open to both A.A.s and non-alcoholics.

Second Birthday Party---Called by the press, London, Ontario's most exclusive fraternity, the group there recently celebrated its second anniversary. The London Metropolitan Group which numbers about 90 members toasted the anniversary in ice water and black coffee.

become an accepted part of American culture. In Tim Robbins's 1992 film, "The Player," the title character attended AA meetings not because he drank too much but because that's where the deals were being made. In 1995, New York magazine suggested that single women attend AA to meet men.

But today, the recovery movement -- with its emphasis on childhood victimization, lifetime attendance at 12-step groups and complete abstinence from all psychoactive substances -- has fallen from pop culture favor. "There was a time when it was almost the 'in thing' to say you were in recovery," says William White, author of "Slaying the Dragon," a history of addiction treatment. Thankfully, that is no longer the case.

Vogue, Elle and the New York Times Magazine have recently run articles critical of the recovery movement. The "addictions" section of the bookstore -- once taking up several bookcases in superstores -- has shrunk to a few shelves, with a growing proportion of critical books. By the late '90s, the number of inpatient rehab facilities offering treatment centered on the 12-step process was half what it had been earlier in the decade. And AA membership, which grew explosively from the late '70s through the late '80s, has held steady at about 2 million since 1995.

Still, it is difficult to say goodbye to an organization and philosophy that may have helped save my life. Between the ages of 17 and 23, I was addicted to cocaine and then heroin. For the next 12 years, I was an often enthusiastic participant in 12-step recovery. Eventually, however, it became difficult to imagine defining myself for the rest of my life in relation to behavior that had taken up so few years of it.

During my last five years in the program, I had become increasingly uncomfortable with what it presented as truth: the notion, for example, that addiction is a "chronic, progressive disease" that can only be arrested by 12-stepping. The more research I did, the more I learned that much of what I had been told in rehab was wrong. And yet, I'd indisputably gotten better. Once an unemployed, 80-pound wreck, I had become a healthy, productive science journalist. That science part, however, became the root of my problem with a model based on anecdote as anodyne.

The 12-step model has always been rife with contradiction. Its adherents recognize, for example, that addiction is a disease, not a sin. But their treatment isn't medical; it's praying, confession and meeting. And while they claim that the belief in a "God of your understanding" on which the program rests is spiritual, not religious, every court that has ever been asked whether ordering people into such programs violates the separation of church and state has disagreed with the "non-religious" label.

So why have the contradictions come to the fore now? For me, the first step came in 2000 when I wrote about New York's Smithers Addiction Treatment and Research Center and its attempts to modernize treatment. Its director, Alex

DeLuca, saw that options needed to be expanded beyond AA. Guided by DeLuca, Smithers began publishing studies funded by the National Institute on Alcoholism and Alcohol Abuse showing that adding treatment options, including support for moderation rather than abstinence, was effective.

However, when a group of people in recovery learned that those options included moderation, they protested, and DeLuca was fired. Imagine cancer or AIDS patients demonstrating against evidence-based treatment offering more options. This deeply distressed me, as did AA's religious aspects. In any other area of medicine, if a physician told you the only cure for your condition was to join a support group that involves "turning your will and your life" over to God (AA's third step), you'd seek a second opinion.

The insistence on the primacy of God in curing addiction also means that treatment can't change in response to empirical evidence. Which leaves us with a rehab system based more on faith than fact. Nowhere is this clearer than in the field's response to medication use. The National Institute on Drug Abuse is pouring big bucks into developing "drugs to fight drugs" but, once approved, they sit on the shelves because many rehab facilities don't believe in medication. Until 1997, for example, the well-known rehab facility Hazelden refused to provide antidepressants to people who had both depression and addiction.

Those who promote just one means of recovery are right to find medication threatening. When I finally tried antidepressants, after years of resisting "drugs" because I'd been told they might lead to relapse, my disillusionment with the recovery movement grew. Years of groups and talking couldn't do what those pills did: allow me not to overreact emotionally, and thus to improve my relationships and worry less. I didn't need to "pray for my character defects to be lifted" (AA's 6th and 7th steps) -- I needed to fix my brain chemistry.

This is not to say that I didn't learn anything through recovery groups. The problem is their insistence that their solutions should trump all others. Many recovering people now use medication and groups both -- but within the movement there is still an enormous hostility toward this and a sense that people on medications are somehow cheating by avoiding the pain that leads to emotional growth.

Another contradiction in the notion of 12-step programs as a medical treatment shows up in the judicial system. Logically, if addiction were a disease, prison and laws would have no place in its treatment. However, to secure support from the drug-war establishment, many 12-step treatment providers argue that addiction is a disease characterized by "denial" -- despite research showing that addicts are no more likely to be in denial than people with other diseases, and that most addicts tell the truth about their drug use when they won't be punished for doing so.

Because of "denial," however, many in-patient treatment providers use methods applies to overeaters trying to cope in a season overflowing with treats and too much food.

Sheila (whose identity is not being revealed in compliance with Alcoholics Anonymous rules) has been sober for 12 years. Her first sober winter was fraught with intense desires to drink.

"It's just the stress and the pressure of the holidays," Sheila recalled. "If you're an alcoholic, you don't need an excuse to drink, but the holidays was an excuse for you to do it openly because everyone else is doing it."

Elaine Crnkovic agrees. She is the director of clinical services at Mesilla Valley Hospital in Las Cruces, which specializes in chemical dependency and psychiatry.

"Most get-togethers include at least some alcohol," Crnkovic said. "For many, it's the first time where they won't be using or drinking, and they're unsure of what to do."

The holidays are a high-risk time for recovering addicts for other reasons as well.

"We have such an idealized expectation for the holidays. If you think of your favorite Christmas song, the movies that we see, they all promote a very idealized reality," said Crnkovic.

Crnkovic said that when reality doesn't match up with the Norman Rockwell view some recovering alcoholics may have of the holidays, they drink because alcohol has been their coping mechanism in the past.

But for every obstacle the recovering addict faces during Christmastime, there is a solution. In fact, some in recovery say they don't feel more tempted to drink during the holidays than at other times of the year.

"An alcoholic like myself doesn't need a particular occasion or reason to drink," said Ken (another Alcoholics Anonymous member whose identity is not being revealed at the organization's request). "When I was drinking, I would rarely go out on holidays like Christmas and New Year's. We used to joke that's when the amateur drinkers were out there."

Crnkovic recommends that those in recovery take their own beverages when attending holiday gatherings.

"If you have a glass in your hand, someone's not going to offer you something to drink," she explained.

Bobby Ashworth, a licensed chemical dependency counselor at the Peak Hospital of Santa Teresa, suggested finding something to do that's not going

American Medical Association. Dr. Seliger is chief psychiatrist of the Neuropsychiatric Institute, Baltimore, Md. Terming alcoholism a symptom of emotional or nervous illness Dr. Seliger said that the alcoholic cannot stop drinking or handle alcohol at will because it handles him. This domination,' Dr. Seliger continued, 'is shown by alcohol's interference with one or more of his important life activities, such as his job standing and ability, his reputation or the harmony of his home. For any or all of these reasons, the alcoholic should be recognized as being a sick person who needs competent treatment.' Workers in all fields of public health and welfare are finding that alcoholism creates turmoil of all types. The psychiatrist also sounded a warning to the more than 3,000,000 'heavy social drinkers in the U.S.A.' He said, "The dangers of heavy social drinking should be more thoroughly understood. In industry, heavy social drinking produces inefficiency, absenteeism and serious errors in judgment.' "

Successful Prison Meetings--For the past 18 months the Upper Derby, Pa. Group has been conducting weekly A.A. meetings at the county prison farm. In addition to being a benefit to the men behind the walls, this meeting has proven an excellent testing ground for new speaker material. Embryo orators appear to have fewer qualms over addressing 40 or 50 inmates than half that number of fellow A.A.s.

Honolulu Calling--After a slow beginning the members of the Honolulu Group report that the group is now well organized and rounded out. A big step forward in educating the public about A.A. was an open meeting held recently. Much of the success of this gathering was due to the help of the Junior Chamber of Commerce. The group is now co-operating with other civic organizations in order to gain the recognition that A.A. enjoys in other parts of the world.

Growing Up--The Bronxville, N. Y. Group recently celebrated its second anniversary. An active membership growth from 12 original members to 60 is reported. Open meetings have trebled and it is planned eventually to split the group and organize a new one in the nearby Cedar Knolls section.

Banquet Marks Anniversary -- The Alano Club, Spokane, Wash., recently observed the third anniversary of its founding with a banquet and open house. From the original four members the group has grown to nearly 300 and is steadily gaining.

Dedicate New Club Rooms--The high spot in the recent dedication of the new club rooms of the North Side Group, Louisville, Ky., was a funeral service for John Barleycorn. The "funeral" was complete with casket and flower offerings. Other neighborhood groups in Louisville are planning headquarters which may serve as social centers as well as meeting places.

News Notes--The Lawrence, Kansas Group reports a growing membership. They now have seven members. From Portland, Maine, comes the word that a raffle is held at each meeting. The prize to the winner is a choice of the book Alcoholics Anonymous or a year's subscription to The A.A. Grapevine.

Another N.A.A. Group--A Non-Alcoholic Anonymous group has recently been organized in Pasadena-Altadena, Calif. The group meets weekly in the homes of the members.

Celebrate Eighth Anniversary Approximately 200 members and guests were present at the eighth anniversary dinner meeting of the Harrisburg, Pa., group held recently. The meeting was addressed by an attorney from New York, N. Y.

Vacation Invitation -- The Edmonton Group, Alberta, Canada, extends a hearty welcome to any members of A.A. who may be passing that way while on vacation, Edmonton's "House" is open 24 hours a day and a call will insure the visitors of being met and personally escorted to the group headquarters. The members also volunteer to give any information wanted regarding that section of the country.

Sponsor Picnic--The Birmingham Service Guild sponsored a July 4th picnic for all Birmingham A.A. members. The Service Guild is composed of wives and relatives of A.A. members. Its aim is to promote the growth of A.A.

Unsuccessful
"Remember this, wavering A.A. friend, if you used to get drunk to build up the feel that you were a "big shot" you never really succeeded, and you won't the next time. As a matter of strict truth, you (all of us) came nearer to being a full-fledged "rat" when we were in our cups--and we'd accomplish no more if we got drunk again this very day."--The Screwball, Nacagdoches, Texas.

Calendar Of A.A. Events
September 3-4--Southeastern Regional Convention, Jacksonville, Fla.
October 23-24--Iowa Conference, Des Moines, Iowa.
November 5-6-7--North Carolina Groups; First Annual Convention, Charlotte, N. C.

few months, with nearly twice as many released patients making satisfactory readjustments to normal life as previously.

=====

+++Message 1452. . . . . Periodical Literature: Seattle Post-Intelligencer, February 15, 1971
From: Ed Adami . . . . . 11/4/2003 12:45:00 AM

=====

Seattle AA Remembers Founder 'Bill W.'

=====

by: George Foster

The faces in the crowd -- some showing the strain of harder times past, some bespectacled business types, others youthful -- ran the gamut of the American experience.

In another perspective, they were the faces of reclaimed lives from all walks of life.

Seattle's members of Alcoholics Anonymous were gathered to honor and memorialize the cofounder of their organization.

Bill W., whose real name was William G. Wilson, died of emphysema Jan 24 [1971] in New York. He helped to found AA in 1935 with Dr. Robert H. Smith.

Wilson's 15-year battle with the bottle had washed him out of a successful career as a Wall Street broker before he "went sober " and started a group attack on alcoholism.

"We know that many of us would be long dead and gone, had it not been for the founding of this organization," said one speaker at memorial services here at AA's 64-year-old meeting hall on East Pine Street.

The crowd of more than 300 heard speakers reflect on the good works of Bill., who like all members of AA, use their first and initial of the last name to maintain anonymity.

"Bill W. will never be gone as long as we do our job," said one man.

Another speaker commented, "He is one of the gifted few who left the world in a different way than he found it."

Wilson, who described himself as "just another guy named Bill who can't handle booze," wrote four books as a leader of AA since its founding, "Alcoholics Anonymous," "Twelve Steps and Twelve Traditions," "AA Comes of Addiction Medicine included the term "denial" in its latest definition. Talk of harm reduction just feeds the denial.

Most research fails to adequately separate true alcoholics from problem drinkers, which makes reports of success misleading. We can't know how many of the latter may progress into true alcoholism. The most thorough research (Helzer and Associates, 1985) studied five- and seven-year outcomes on 1,289 diagnosed and treated alcoholics, and found only 1.6 percent were successful moderate drinkers. Of that fraction most were female and none showed clear symptoms of true alcoholism. In any case, it would be unethical to suggest to any patient a goal with a failure rate of 98.4 percent.

We psychologists know that conditioning is limited in its ability to produce behavioral changes. To attempt to condition alcoholics to drink socially is asking of behavior modification more than it can do. Some have thought one value of controlled-drinking experiments could be that the patient learns for himself what he has not been able to accept from others, that he cannot drink in moderation giving all that extra scientific help might destroy the rationalizations of the alcoholic who still thinks he can drink socially "if I really tried." Actually, most uses of conditioning in the field have been to create an aversion against drinking, to condition alcoholics to live comfortably in a drinking society and to learn how to resist pressure to drink. In that we have been reasonably successful, since this is in accord with the physiology and psychology of addiction.

The discussion about turning recovered alcoholics into social drinkers started in 1962, but no scientific research had been attempted until 1970, when Mark and Linda Sobell two psychologists at Patton State Hospital in California with no clinical experience in treating alcoholics, attempted to modify the drinking of chronic alcoholics, not as a treatment goal but just to see whether it could be done. The research literature is largely a record of failure, indicating that the only realistic goal in treatment is total abstinence.

The prestigious British alcoholism authority Griffith Edwards (1994) concluded that research disproved rather than confirmed the Sobell position. Drs. Ruth Fox, Harry Tiebout, Marvin Block and M.M. Glatt were among the authorities who responded in a special reprint from the 1963 Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol to the effect that never in the thousands of cases they had treated was there ever a clear instance of a true alcoholic who returned to drinking in moderation. Ewing (1975) was determined to prove it could be done by using every technique known to behavior modification, but he also did careful and lengthy follow up - and at the end of four years every one of Ewing's subjects had gotten drunk and he called off the experiment. Finally, Pendery and Maltzman (AAAS Science, July 9, 1982) exposed the failure of the Sobell work, using hospital and police records and direct contact to show that 19 of their 20 subjects did not maintain sobriety in social drinking, and the other probably was not a true alcoholic circuit eluded him. Finally in the late 1970s, Vaughan formed Triple Threat with Lou Ann Barton, Chris Layton, and Jackie Newhouse. This group evolved into Double Trouble, with Tommy Shannon and Reese Wynans replacing Newhouse and Barton. By the early 1980s the group had built a solid following in Texas and was beginning to attract the attention of well-established musicians like Mick Jagger, who in 1982 invited Vaughan and the band to play at a private party in New York City. That same year Double Trouble received an invitation to play at the Montreux Jazz Festival in Switzerland. They were the first band in the history of the festival to play without having a major record contract. The performance was seen by David Bowie and Jackson Brown, and Stevie gained even more acclaim as a talented and rising young musician. Jackson Brown invited Vaughan to his Los Angeles studio for a demo session at which Stevie recorded his 1983 debut album, Texas Flood. David Bowie had Vaughan play lead guitar on his album, Let's Dance, and join him on his 1983 tour. Vaughan's fame immediately soared. The band signed a record contract with CBS/Epic records and came to the attention of veteran blues and rock producer, John Hammond, Sr. Texas Flood received the North American Rock Radio Awards nomination for Favorite Debut Album, and Guitar Player Magazine Reader's Poll voted him Best New Talent and Best Electric Blues Guitarist for 1983. A track off the album also received a Grammy nomination for Best Rock Instrumental performance.

Vaughan's subsequent albums met with increased popularity and critical attention. Double Trouble followed Texas Flood with Couldn't Stand the Weather (1984), Live Alive (1985), and Soul to Soul (1986). All of the albums went gold and captured various Grammy nominations in either the Blues or Rock categories. Throughout the 1980s Vaughan and his band also became consistent nominees and winners of the Austin Chronicle's Music Awards and Guitar Player Magazine Reader's Polls. In 1984, at the National Blues Foundation Awards, Vaughan became the first white man to win Entertainer of the Year and Blues Instrumentalist of the Year. At the Grammy's that year he shared in the Best Traditional Blues honors for his work on Blues Explosion, a compilation album of various artists. Although he rapidly gained prestige and success in the music world, Stevie also lived the stereotypical life of a rock and roll star, full of alcohol and drug abuse. On his 1986 European tour he collapsed and eventually checked into a rehabilitation center in Georgia. He left the hospital sober and committed to the Twelve Step Program of Alcoholics Anonymous. Following his recovery, he released his fifth album, In Step, in 1989. It won him a second Grammy; this time for Best Contemporary Blues Recording. In 1990 Vaughan collaborated with Jimmie Vaughan, his brother and founding member of the Fabulous Thunderbirds, on Family Style, which was released after his death. This last album would bring his career total of Grammys to four. After his death Epic records went on to release two more albums of his work, The Sky is Crying (1991) and In the Beginning (1992). Stevie married Lenny Bailey in 1980, and they divorced in 1986, when he was at the low point of his struggle with drug and alcohol abuse. At the time of his death, he had a girlfriend, Janna Lapidus. Stevie Ray Vaughan died on August 27, 1990, in a helicopter crash on the way to President Clinton. But at lunch, he sipped one cocktail, then three more. When the meeting was delayed, he gulped another two.

Andrew is just one member of Capitol Hill's least talked about, but most regularly attended, meetings: Alcoholics Anonymous. Founded on the Hill in July 1979, AA groups today convene usually three times each weekday in offices throughout the Capitol.

With names such as "Yeas and Nays," which is the oldest group, "Attitude Adjusters" and "Old Fashion Beginners," AA, much like a Women's Caucus or Republican Whip meeting, has become a fact of life on the Hill.

Although one group is restricted to only members of Congress, most include staffers, lobbyists, custodians, reporters, police and even members sitting side by side. "Alcoholism knows no bounds. It treats everybody the same," says Rep. Bill Emerson (R Mo.), who went public with his alcoholism in 1988, during his fourth term in Congress.

Indeed, at the epicenter of the nation's democracy, AA functions as a kind of ideal body politic, in which there is no partisanship or hierarchy. There's even a consensus vote taken at meetings to decide on policytype matters, such as smoking or opening the meeting to a visitor.

Ironically, though, the egalitarian nature of the meetings can make for some awkward circumstances. Deirdre, a member of AA who works for a Senate committee, recalls how a colleague she knew for many years once plopped down beside her in the middle of a meeting. "'We hide it well, don't we?' he said."

At another meeting, she says, a first timer walked into the room and froze when she saw her boss--a senator. Eventually, though, "she just hid among the others."

It took Deirdre herself several weeks before she went to her first meeting, even though she made up her mind well beforehand. "I wouldn't even walk up to read the posting [of times] on the door," she says. "I was too terrified of exposure and rejection."

Doctors as well as AA members dispel any notion that alcoholism is more rampant on the Hill than other workplaces, despite the irregular hours and hard work. But the Washington power culture, where image is often everything and martinis a part of negotiations, can make dealing with alcoholism on the Hill unusually difficult.

"Politics," said Rep. Jim McDermott (DWash.), a psychiatrist, "is a profession where appearance becomes reality."

But the strength of AA, he says, "is that people can't buffalo each other. At that point you're not a Republican or a Democrat, you're just a person."

McDermott, who helped found the Navy's first alcoholic rehabilitation program nearly 30 years ago, said, "It takes real strength of character to admit 'I've got a problem and I'm going to do something about it.' But if you deal with it, that in my opinion is what you want in a leader: strength."

Several lawmakers, like Emerson, confront the process. And sometimes, as in the case of former Sen. Bob Packwood (ROre.), their dissolute behavior becomes frontpage news.

While the drinking problems of celebrities or public figures are the most wellknown, for many alcoholics anonymity is central to the recovery process. For one thing, on Capitol Hill, as elsewhere, alcoholics fear being seen as incompetent or even losing their jobs.

The Hill is "saturated with ego" says Robert, a former Hill staffer and longtime lobbyist with a Washington trade association who's been in AA for more than 30 years. And ego is often an obstacle to getting over denial, the biggest challenge for recovering alcoholics.

Some say fear of exposure has been exacerbated by the Republican takeover in the last election. With the loss of many Hill jobs due to reform initiatives, some AA members say attendance has dropped at meetings because some alcoholics are afraid their drinking problem might cost them their job. "It's been a hostilelike environment," said Kevin, who no longer works at the Capitol but still attends AA meetings there.

But whether it's Democrats or Republicans in charge, alcoholics face a difficult time confronting their disease.

"I wasn't afraid of the stigma of alcoholism per se," but people's responses to it," said Mark, a top committee aide who has been in AA for 18 years.

When he later told some colleagues that he joined AA, he said, "The reaction wasn't unsympathetic, but they had a hard time believing I had a drinking problem. I mean, I was functioning well: working and going to school at night.

"What nobody knew was that I was dying inside," he adds.

Despite the hindrances faced by many alcoholics on the Hill, many also view it as an oddly ideal place to recover.

"The meetings are a cocoon where you can be yourself, you can ventilate and get the love you need," says Charles, who has been going to AA on the Hill since meetings began.

And once alcoholics begin honestly treating their disease, their experiences can breed wisdom and prove to be assets in their everyday life. "You can be a better employee than the people who are still in denial," Charles says.

He notes also that the noon meetings help alcoholics get through a tough day. "When you see people [from the meeting] in the hall, that helps you too."

Mark agrees. "I regard alcoholism as a gift because it's been a source of perspective in my life," he says. "It's very easy when we work here to think the most important thing in the world is the continuing resolution or tax bill or Bosnia or clean water bill. It's easy to lose sight of other things important in our lives, like family and community."

Last month when the government shut down, dozens of furloughed Hill employees suffered when they were deemed by their bosses "nonessential."

"I don't think someone in AA would have a real difficulty with this," said Sharon, who attends AA meetings four times a week, "because they have more self worth."

SIDEBAR

Rep. Emerson's experiences inspire friends and colleagues

On March 28, 1988, Rep. Bill Emerson (R-Mo.) stopped by his office before leaving Capitol Hill for the night. Unexpectedly meeting him there were two of his House colleagues, a few personal friends, his wife and his 10 yearold daughter.

Tired of standing by silently while Emerson drank too much Scotch or vodka or beer, they chose to confront him.

Two hours later, with a prepacked suitcase in hand, the 50 yearold legislator was on a plane to California. "A member of Congress doesn't just disappear for one month and not explain where he is," Emerson said last week as he recounted the evening he says changed his life.

So on the plane, he pulled out a notepad and wrote a public statement to say he was on his way to the Betty Ford alcoholic rehabilitation center.

"I used to kid people, if you're going to drink, drink!" Emerson said. "That should have told me something."

made said statement. I would hate to take something out of context or use a false quote in an article condemning that very thing.
Thank you and Take Care Jarvis M

=====

+++Message 1457. . . . . Re: INFORMATION ON BILL W. QUOTE
From: Richard K. . . . . 11/5/2003 4:04:00 PM

=====

Hello Jarvis,

This quote is taken from Bill Wilson's Grapevine article "God As We Understand Him: The Dilemma of No Faith," April 1961.

For a full transcript, reference the AA book "The Language of the Heart." The article is on pp. 251-254, and the quote itself is on p. 252.

Hope this helps.

Regards,
Richard K.
Haverhill, MA

=====

+++Message 1458. . . . . Re: Information on Bill W. Quote
From: ny-aa@att.net . . . . . 11/5/2003 4:13:00 PM

=====

That quote is from an April 1961 "AA Grapevine" article "The Dilemma of No Faith" by Bill W. The article is on-line in the Grapevine Archives at:

<http://www.aagrapevine.org/archive/billw/NoFaith.html>

I've seen the "BEWARE; Hard Drinkers & Fakers Inside!" On brief reading, it seems to me that it contains some of the same "spiritual cocksureness, pride and aggression" that Bill condemns in his Grapevine article.

You say the "Fakers.." article is "copyright 1957 Floyd H" which puts it years before the Bill W quote. The version I found on the web says "Copyright 1997 Floyd H." which seems more likely.

In AA such breakthroughs are everyday events. They are all the more remarkable when we reflect that a working faith had once seemed an impossibility of the first magnitude to perhaps half of our present membership of three hundred thousand. To all these doubters has come the great discovery that as soon as they could cast their main dependence upon a "higher power"--even upon their own AA groups--they had turned that blind corner which had always kept the open highway from their view. From this time on--assuming they tried hard to practice the rest of the AA program with a relaxed and open mind--an ever deepening and broadening faith, a veritable gift, had invariably put in its sometimes unexpected and often mysterious appearance.

We much regret that these facts of AA life are not understood by the legion of alcoholics in the world around us. Any number of them are bedeviled by the dire conviction that if ever they go near AA they will be pressured to conform to some particular brand of faith or theology. They just don't realize that faith is never a necessity for AA membership; that sobriety can be achieved with an easily acceptable minimum of it; and that our concepts of a higher power and God as we understand Him afford everyone a nearly unlimited choice of spiritual belief and action.

How to transmit this good news is one of our most challenging problems in communication, for which there may be no fast or sweeping answer. Perhaps our public information services could begin to emphasize this all-important aspect of AA

more heavily. And within our own ranks we might well develop a more sympathetic awareness of the acute plight of these really isolated and desperate sufferers. In their aid we can settle for no less than the best possible attitude and the most ingenious action
that we can muster.

We can also take a fresh look at the problem of "no faith" as it exists right on our own doorstep. Though three hundred thousand did recover in the last twenty-five years, maybe half a million more have walked into our midst, and then out again.
No doubt some were too sick to make even a start. Others couldn't or wouldn't admit their alcoholism. Still others couldn't face up to their underlying personality defects. Numbers departed for still other reasons.

Yet we can't well content ourselves with the view that all these recovery
failures were entirely the fault of the newcomers themselves. Perhaps a great many didn't receive the kind and amount of sponsorship they so sorely needed. We didn't communicate when we might have done so. So we AAs failed them. Perhaps more often than we think, we still make no contact at depth with those suffering
the dilemma of no faith.

Certainly none are more sensitive to spiritual cocksureness, pride and aggression than they are. I'm sure this is something we too often forget. In AA's first years I all but ruined the whole undertaking with this sort of unconscious arrogance.

God as I understood Him had to be for everybody. Sometimes my aggression was subtle and sometimes it was crude. But either way it was damaging--perhaps fatally so--to numbers of nonbelievers. Of course this sort of thing isn't confined to Twelfth
Step work. It is very apt to leak out into our relations with everybody. Even now, I catch myself chanting that same old barrier-building refrain, "Do as I do, believe as I do--or else!"

Here's a recent example of the high cost of spiritual pride. A very tough minded prospect was taken to his first AA meeting. The first speaker majored on his own drinking pattern. The prospect seemed impressed. The next two speakers (or maybe lecturers) each themed their talks on "God as I understand Him." This, could
have been good, too, but it certainly wasn't. The trouble was their attitude, the way
they presented their experience. They did ooze arrogance. In fact, the final speaker got far overboard on some of his personal theological convictions. With perfect fidelity, both were repeating my performance of years before. Quite unspoken, yet implicit
in everything they said, was the same idea--"Folks, listen to us. We have the only true
brand of AA--and you'd better get it!"

The new prospect said he'd had it --and he had. His sponsor protested that this wasn't real AA. But it was too late; nobody could touch him after that.

He also had a first class alibi for yet another bender. When last heard from, an early appointment with the undertaker seemed probable.

Fortunately, such rank aggression in the name of spirituality isn't often seen nowadays. Yet this sorry and unusual episode can be turned to good account. We can ask ourselves whether, in less obvious but nevertheless destructive forms, we are not more subject to fits of spiritual pride than we had supposed. If constantly worked at, I'm sure that no kind of self-survey could be more beneficial.
Nothing could more surely increase our communication with each other and with God.

Many years ago a so-called "unbeliever" brought me to see this very clearly. He was an M.D. and a fine one. I met him and his wife Mary at the home of a friend in a Midwestern city. It was purely a social evening. Our fellowship of alcoholics was my sole topic and I pretty much monopolized the conversation. Nevertheless,
the doctor and his lady seemed truly interested and he asked many questions. But one of
them
made me suspect that he was an agnostic, or maybe an atheist.

This promptly triggered me, and I set out to convert him, then and there. Deadly serious, I actually bragged about my spectacular spiritual experience of the year before. The doctor mildly wondered if that experience might not be something
other than I thought it was. This hit me hard, and I was downright rude. There had been no

real provocation; the doctor was uniformly courteous, good humored and even respectful. Not a little wistfully, he said he often wished he had a firm faith,
too.
But plainly enough, I had convinced him of nothing.

Three years later I revisited my Midwestern friend. Mary, the doctor's wife, came by for a call and I learned that he had died the week before. Much affected, she began to speak of him.

His was a noted Boston family, and he'd been Harvard educated. A brilliant student, he might have gone on to fame in his profession. He could have enjoyed a wealthy practice and a social life among old friends. Instead, he had insisted on being
a company doctor in what was a strife-torn industrial town. When Mary had sometimes asked why they didn't go back to Boston, he would take her hand and say, "Maybe
you are right, but I can't bring myself to leave. I think the people at the company really need me."

Mary then recalled that she had never known her husband to complain seriously
about anything, or to criticize anyone bitterly. Though he appeared to be perfectly well, the doctor had slowed down in his last five years. When Mary prodded him to go out evenings, or tried to get him to the office on time, he always came up with a plausible and good-natured excuse. Not until his sudden last illness did she know that all this while he had carried about a heart condition that could have done

him in at any moment. Except for a single doctor on his own staff, no one had an inkling.
When she reproached him about this, he simply said, "Well, I could see no good
in causing people to worry about me--especially you, my dear."

This was the story of a man of great spiritual worth. The hallmarks were plain to be seen: humor and patience, gentleness and courage, humility and dedication, unselfishness and love--a demonstration I might never come near to making myself.
This was the man I had chided and patronized. This was the "unbeliever"
I had presumed to instruct!

Mary told us this story more than twenty years ago. Then, for the first time, it burst in upon me how very dead faith can be--when minus responsibility.
The doctor had an unwavering belief in his ideals. But he also practiced humility, wisdom
and responsibility. Hence his superb demonstration.

My own spiritual awakening had given me a built-in faith in God--a gift indeed.
But I had been neither humble nor wise. Boasting of my faith, I had forgotten my ideals.
Pride and irresponsibility had taken their place. By so cutting off my own light, I had little to offer my fellow alcoholics. Therefore my faith was dead to them.
At
last I saw why many had gone away--some of them forever.

Therefore, faith is more than our greatest gift; its sharing with others is our drinking since the 1970s, when a quarter of the New Yorker magazine's cartoons portrayed someone with a drink, and the three-martini lunch was very much alive. Nowadays you can drink Perrier all night at a party and guests don't wonder if you're a recovering alcoholic. The cocktail hour before corporate board meetings is a relic, and eyebrows go up invisibly if at a business lunch.

From which it is tempting to conclude that demon rum just isn't much of a problem anymore, except for grizzled old men living under bridge abutments, right? Sorry, bud. It seems most of that slow down in drinking occurred among people who weren't very interested in alcohol anyway. The portion of the population deemed to have abused alcohol in the past year--for example, 14% of men in their 30s and early 40s, and 4% of women--hasn't changed much.

And as Drew Lewis, chairman of the Union Pacific railroad, can attest, education, income, and a spectacular career don't offer much immunity against the perils of alcohol. His problem controlling alcohol surfaced last year right in the middle of a battle to acquire Santa Fe Pacific, a rival railroad, in a hostile takeover. He screwed up, so bravely and publicly stepped down for five weeks to enter a treatment center. Wow, you say. This alcohol sounds like powerful stuff How can I tell, without getting a sermon, if I'm at risk, or if my after-work Manhattans will leap up and bite me just when I'm trying to acquire a railroad? Listening to warnings about alcohol from recovering drinkers often has that overwrought flavor, like getting lectures on firecracker safety from two-fingered monitions handlers. Diagnose-it-yourself questionnaires seem hopeless too, with questions that often sound like: "(1) Have you ever tried alcohol? (2) Are you frequently surprised to find yourself waking up with a splitting headache in a Las Vegas hotel room, surrounded by gerbils and naked showgirls? If you answered yes to either of these questions, you may already be an alcoholic! "It turns out, though, that researchers have recently come up with surprising predictors of who is at risk for alcoholism and when it is likely to surface. They may have spotted more than one variety of alcoholism, and they have developed plausible theories of why some people have a stronger urge to drink than others.

IF YOU HAVE CROSSED OVER the line to join the huge mass of other competent, successful people who have a booze problem, you will be relieved to know that attitudes toward alcoholism have changed a lot. Twenty years ago it was seen as the product of personal weakness and incurable personality flaws. Incredibly, some psychiatrists even argued it was a form of suppressed homosexuality (drinking is oral, see, and ...). But as 40-year-long studies of Harvard students and kids from inner-city Boston have determined, there's no clear-cut future-alcoholic personality. In fact, the people who seemed most likable and well adjusted when young turned out to be a tad more likely to run into trouble.

There is no litmus test for borderline alcoholism, and if you're interested in finding out exactly how much you can drink without technically qualifying as a person with a drinking problem, don't bother. The only important judge of whether you're an alcoholic is yourself, because that's who has to correct the problem, and as everyone knows, alcoholics are fabulous at coming up with reasons why their excessive consumption doesn't mean they qualify. It's part of being a salesman, I can hold it, I can stop anytime, etc. The simplest definition is almost a tautology: If alcohol is causing you problems, and you keep drinking anyway, you've got a problem with alcohol.

Don't gauge yourself by whether you're having alcohol-related difficulties at work, Says George Vaillant, the professor of psychiatry at Harvard Medical School who runs those studies of Harvard students: "The Last symptom before you're sleeping in the Bowery is trouble at work. Everything else occurs first." For a variety of reasons, executive and professional types probably can hide alcohol abuse from co-workers better than most. Much earlier indicators: spats with the wife, falling asleep and ignoring the kids, warnings from your doctor that certain liver enzymes are high, gastric trouble, sexual dysfunction, car accidents.

You want numbers anyway. Ounces, probably. First, a not-so-amusing observation that researchers have made when they ask people how much they drink: The numbers don't add up. Of the 447 million gallons of pure alcohol consumed annually in the US--that's equivalent to more than 500 cans of beer per adult--mysteriously, 40% to 60% cannot be accounted for in surveys. Some of that is because pollsters didn't quiz the folks living under the bridge abutments. But more often, people report their most common drinking pattern--what they have on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays- -and ignore poker night on Wednesdays, happy hour on Fridays, all-day sipping and parties on Saturday, and six-packs with football on Sundays. It adds up very quickly, and a lot of people who find themselves neck deep in trouble with booze are stunned to realize how much they really consume.

These are the numbers, and be careful how you use them. First, experts do not define a "drink" as a large water goblet brimming with scotch. A drink is a half-ounce of ethanol, the amount in one 12- ounce beer, an ounce and a half of 80-proof liquor, or four ounces of wine.

Two drinks a day are almost always okay for a healthy adult male. For many it's downright pleasant, in fact. One of alcohol's great charms is that it is an excellent, fast-acting muscle relaxant, something like Valium. If you're tense from work or from three hours of driving, alcohol, in those doses, will make you feel better, unless you're allergic. Bigger doses won't do much more for your tight muscles, though many people keep trying. And, of course, alcohol reduces inhibitions and makes people feel expansive. In small doses it's okay--you may be more likely to chat with your spouse than curl up on the sofa and sulk about your day. People who consume up to two drinks a day actually reduce the risk of heart disease and live longer than teetotalers and serious boozers. (Downing two belts of vodka on an empty stomach and zooming home on a rain-swept, winding road, however, will not extend your life.)

Women, even large women, should not drink as much as men. Both men and women have an enzyme in their liver, alcohol dehydrogenase, that breaks down alcohol in their blood. But men also have the enzyme in their stomachs, where it breaks down 30% to 40% of alcohol before it causes a lot of trouble. Women do not.

Three and four drinks a day are tolerable for a large man who doesn't have to drive or perform, but dumb. Motor control and inhibitions keep declining with bigger doses, so you'll get sloppy. They add calories (by volume, vodka and ice cream are about equal in calories), may make you drowsy or snappish, and slightly increase the risk of illness. Five a day, even once a week, counts as "frequent heavy drinking" and means you're getting pretty plastered pretty regularly. Eight drinks in a day at least weekly is very serious. Lorraine Midanik, a researcher at Berkeley, says that kind of drinking is strongly associated with true dependence on alcohol.

Heavy and binge drinkers are more likely to have car accidents and pull really dumb stunts in public. Steady, daily drinkers are more likely than bingers to have medical problems. In France problem drinkers rarely get bombed (the only alcoholics are tourists, the French like to brag). But they consume liters of red wine over the course of a day and the cirrhosis rate is twice that of the U.S.

As drinking customs from the 1970s reveal, though, gallons consumed is a far-from-perfect barometer of alcohol trouble. Jerry Della Femina, the advertising executive, describes the astounding days of the three-martini lunch. First off, they were huge martinis; six ounces of gin and a drop of vermouth, topped with a sliver of lemon "because olives took up too much room." And they were routine. "It was as much habit as anything," he says. "We'd do it without thinking or ceremony, like coffee." Sometimes the drinking involved more than three martinis. Della Femina recalls lunches in which he and three other people also drank two bottles of wine and finished their meal with some scotch. How could any executive function, much less compete, after all that? "It wasn't a problem," he says. "It wasn't just the advertising business where people drank like that. Everybody was in the same condition, so nobody noticed or cared. Every afternoon in New York this fog--this big alcoholic fog--rolled in over the city."

But all that drinking didn't make everyone an alcoholic. For reasons Della Femina can't fully explain, and without his realizing it at the time, that kind of heavy drinking faded out of fashion in the early 1980s. He suddenly realized a few years ago that he and his friends had gradually shifted to nonalcoholic lunches. For old times' sake, he tried recreating the three-martini lunch. "After the first one, my head was spinning. If I'd tried to have three, the last one would have arrived at the same time as the ambulance," He concludes that his tolerance declined, and his desire to be sober increased. The only people who kept drinking were the people who had a problem with alcohol.

"Robert was supposed to make partner, but there was a bear market on Wall Street that year in the 1970s, and all promotions were canceled. As a consolation prize, he was given a membership in an exclusive club downtown, where his food and drinks were free. At the same time his job expanded. He was responsible for operations over a large portion of the company. He'd been comfortable in the previous assignments, but this one came with a lot of pressure. Eventually he found himself drinking every day at lunch.

"After a while it was two or three martinis. I'd always try to arrange lunch with friends. If that didn't work, I'd go by myself. Funny. If there was a staff meeting called for lunchtime, it wouldn't bother me that I couldn't drink. But otherwise, I always did. About ten years ago my doctor started telling me my liver readings were high, that I had high blood pressure and my heart was slightly enlarged. I was drinking two or three bottles of vodka a week. I tried stopping at least six times, but the longest I went was two months. I was doing very well at work. I wound up very high in the organization. Drinking didn't affect my performance. But I was extremely impatient with people on the staff--demanding, bordering on abusive.

About five years ago I was put in charge of an extremely demanding project. I also got responsibility for all work on the stock exchanges. There is an unwritten rule on Wall Street that nobody on the floor drinks until the market closes. Meanwhile, my compulsion to drink was increasing. Because of that stock exchange custom, and because I was in my 60s and worried that drinking would ruin my life after retirement, I decided I had to quit. I talked to my doctor and she helped me get into Alcoholics Anonymous."

Why did Robert find martinis so addicting when Della Femina did not? Parents get some blame, but not in ways you'd expect. It has been obvious for centuries that children of alcoholics are about four times more likely to become alcoholics than kids of parents who don't have drinking problems. But everyone assumed children learned this behavior by watching Mom or Dad get drunk. Not so. Dr. Donald Goodwin, professor emeritus of psychiatry at the University of Kansas Medical Center in Kansas City studied male children of alcoholic fathers in Denmark who had been adopted very young and raised away from their biological parents. It turned out that 20% wound up as alcoholics--the same percentage as kids who grew up with alcoholic fathers.

Exactly what alcoholic parents pass along to their children isn't clear, but one important trait is the opposite of what you might expect. Children of alcoholics are much more likely to have a high tolerance for alcohol. And those two-fisted drinkers who could put their friends under the table from the very beginning, researchers have discovered, are actually at much greater risk than those who get dizzy or sick or drunk on a few drinks.

Beginning about 17 years ago, Dr. Marc Shuckit, of the veterans' hospital in San Diego, gave controlled doses of liquor to more than 450 college students. About half were the sons of alcoholics, and half were not. Shuckit found that roughly 40% of the students with alcoholic fathers had low reactions to alcohol, based on several measures, while only 10% of the other students could hold liquor well. Ominously, he found in follow-up studies that 60% of the sons of alcoholics who could drink a lot without much effect went on to become alcoholics. Only 15% of the students who got drunk quickly became alcoholics.

Why? Nobody knows for sure. Shuckit says he can't find evidence that the hollow-leg students had personalities different from the easily sloshed ones. It seems, though, that people who get drunk easily simply drink less. They are less likely to consume so much that their bodies adapt to the high doses and need ever bigger amounts to get high. If they drink a lot with their fraternity brothers on Friday, they're too sick on Saturday to do it again. The two-fisted drinkers, admired in some perverse way by their peers for their prowess, are ready to party again on Saturday. They may gradually develop a circle of other high-tolerance friends, where everyone is drinking two or three times as much as a normal person just to get the same effect.

In retrospect, Mike Neustadt realizes he had an enormous tolerance from the beginning. In college he could out drink older students. "It made me think I was a heavy hitter--I could drink with the big guys. But with high tolerance there were fewer effects on my behavior that might have caused me to slow down. I got a false sense of control. I'd drive drunk friends home, I'd help people who got sick. My circle of friends changed. I needed friends to drink with every day."

It didn't hurt him at first. At 21, Neustadt was one of the youngest people ever to get a seat on the Chicago Board of Trade. Five years later he lost his job. "I got into some bad positions because of my drinking," he says. What bothers him as much as losing the job was the "ethical deterioration" that took place because of alcohol. He didn't steal or cheat, but the standards he set for himself declined. "When I first got that seat on the board, there was nothing in the world more important to me. Five years later I could say to myself 'It's no big deal. I can always get another job.' Alcohol was more important.

Do alcoholics develop a greater appetite for drink from their first taste than the rest of the population? It certainly seems so to people close to the matter. When former Senator George McGovern's 45-year-old daughter was found dead in the cold this winter in Madison, Wisconsin, after battling alcoholism for most of her adult life, he said she'd had a craving for alcohol almost immediately after trying it as a teenager. Scientists aren't so sure, though some think they have identified two conditions that could be predictors of later problems: antisocial personality disorder, or ASPD, and attention deficit disorder with hyperactivity, or ADD-H. The first describes incorrigible schoolyard bullies who are robbing gas stations by 14. They are highly impulsive and undeterred by punishment. The ADD-H types aren't so malevolent but can be extremely unfocused, energetic, and impulsive.

Both types are in danger of intense drinking problems that surface in their teens and 20s, prompting some researchers to argue that there is an "early onset" form of alcoholism. Others disagree, pointing out that these conditions run in families and may predispose certain people to get into trouble with a lot of things, including alcohol.

Still, even though there is no conclusive proof, it seems likely that people who become alcoholics do crave the stuff differently. Dr. Joseph Volpicelli, at the University of Pennsylvania Medical Center, says most normal people will have a few drinks and lose the desire for more. But people with alcoholism in both generations preceding seem to find their craving increases after three drinks. "I call it the corn-chip effect," says Volpicelli. "Give me two or three corn chips, and suddenly the rest of the bag becomes irresistible. For some people, alcohol is that way." He thinks receptors in the nervous system for naturally occurring opiate-like hormones called endorphins may be the culprit. For some, small doses of alcohol stimulate production of a bit of these endorphins. When they wear off, the opiate receptors are jangling for more, creating what feels like a craving for alcohol. Stress may have a similar effect, says Volpicelli: The body produces feel-good endorphins while under stress, but when the stress is gone and the endorphins wear off, those corn-chipped opiate receptors are still hungry, begging for a belt of Old Overshoe. Conceivably, says Volpicelli, colossal stress--like a few years in Vietnam--might fry even a normal person's opiate receptors, creating long-lasting cravings. The link between opiates and alcohol has long been suspected, observes Dr. Goodwin in his engaging book, Alcoholism: The Facts. Volpicelli says a compound called naltrexone, which blocks the craving for opiates, also seems to work with alcohol. Marketed under the name Revia, it reduces relapses among recovering alcoholics.

AND NO, DEPRESSION doesn't lead to alcoholism, at least not among men. Many alcoholics eventually become profoundly depressed, but that seems to be a result of the depressant effect of the alcohol itself as well as the mess they've made of their lives, and it usually goes away within a few weeks of recovery. There are lots of people who are genuinely depressed and who are alcoholics, but that's because they are unlucky enough to have both problems. Donald Rosen, head of (he Professionals in Crises program at the Menninger Clinic in Topeka, says antidepressants don't help alcoholic men stop drinking unless they have a depression as well. If you're a man and not an alcoholic by the time you're 45, you almost certainly will never be. (All you 46-plus men who just went "Whew, now I can get drunk whenever I want," are probably already in trouble.) Says Goodwin: "The typical white male alcoholic begins drinking heavily in his late teens or 20s, drinks more throughout his 20's, starts having serious problems in his 30s, has his first brush with hospitalization in his middle to late 30s, and is clearly identified by himself and others as an alcoholic--a man who cannot drink without trouble--between 40 and 50."

If you have a drinking problem, chances are fairly good that your boss and most coworkers don't know how serious it is, "Successful executives are street smart as well as smart smart," says Joseph Califano, a former Cabinet Secretary and top corporate attorney who now runs an addiction research and education program with Columbia University. "If they're alcoholics, they don't drink in the morning. They use eye drops to hide the red. They don't drink in front of the board. "Executives can hide in part because of the fuzzy descriptions of exactly what it is they are supposed to do. Few will return from a liquid lunch bumping into the furniture or forwarding a half-finished memo to the boss. "The impact isn't so much on the quality of the work done as the quantity," says Laura Altman, head of the behavioral health practice for Towers Perrin, an employee benefits consulting firm. "People who have several drinks at work go over and over their work, trying to eliminate errors that would give them away." They are likely to be irritable or abusive of coworkers. Often, the first on-the-job alarm bell for an alcoholic is a sexual harassment complaint, says Jeffrey Speller, a Belmont, Massachusetts, psychiatrist, who specializes in troubled executives. Even if the exec does all his drinking at home, or binge-drinks on weekends, it eventually has an effect. "There's slippage," says Gene Gaeta, head of AT&T's employee assistance programs. "Imagination and creativity are affected. They aren't producing the ideas they once did. It takes a while to spot." And sometimes, you screw up big time, and publicly.

Drew Lewis, chairman of Union Pacific, the nation's biggest railroad, had been struggling off and on with alcohol for years, says a close acquaintance. But last year the problem was getting worse. After a few drinks before a speech in Philadelphia, he joked about buying Conrail. For people who knew him, it was typical of his dry humor, but some in the audience thought he was tipsy. A few weeks later he had a car accident and required 11 stitches on his head. In June two rival railroads, the Burlington Northern and Santa Fe Pacific announced plans to merge. Robert V. Rebs, head of Santa Fe reported later that Lewis promptly called him and said he wouldn't oppose the merger. Then, after months of deliberation, Union Pacific made an offer to buy Santa Fe. It was rejected. On October 5, Lewis called Krebs, insisted on a meeting, flew that day to Santa Fe headquarters near Chicago, and met with him. Lewis had some drinks before the meeting. Krebs rejected UP's offer of $17.50 a share. As Lewis was leaving the meeting, Lewis suggested $20 a share. News of Lewis's second offer stunned colleagues, who were not expecting it. Board members were even more stunned, because they had not authorized it. When he came back from the meeting with Krebs, Lewis admitted to friends on the board that he had a drinking problem. Then he immediately stepped down to enter a treatment facility. He was back on the job after five weeks but declined to speak of his experience to Fortune, explaining that treatment counselors urged him to remain silent for a year.

Some board members knew of Lewis's drinking problems, others thought he was a teetotaler. "I never saw Drew take a drink or be incapacitated," said one, "but apparently, in talking to people in the course of the tender offer that day, it was clear he was not sober." One board member once offered him an expensive bottle of wine for Christmas. He replied that he didn't drink wine but would accept it and give it to his wife.

A few days after he left for treatment, the UP board and top executives met and decided to make an announcement about Lewis's treatment. Some were concerned that Lewis's alcoholism was a significant business matter that had to be revealed to Santa Fe and Union Pacific shareholders; some thought it should be announced because it would be impossible to hide his absence; some viewed it matter-of-factly as a medical condition to be mentioned without fanfare or embarrassment. Lewis learned of the announcement while in treatment. He told a UP colleague his first reaction was "Holy smackers, do we have to do this?" But he got hundreds of letters from well-wishers, including several who said he had inspired them to quit too. He attends 12-step group meetings with other recovering alcoholics virtually every day, says a UP executive, and even prepares a list of 12-step meetings he can attend while he is traveling. In February, Union Pacific announced it was no longer seeking to acquire title Santa Fe.

WHAT IS IT LIKE cutting down or giving up drinking? It varies, of course, but generally it's not too tough. If you're up around four or

A.A. DIGEST

Excerpts from Group Publications

'A.A. Tribune', Des Moines, Iowa: "If there is someone that needs information on alcoholism, send them to the Alcoholic Information Center. There they will be given literature about alcoholism, will talk to non-alcoholics who will tell them something about alcoholism, and we hope it will help a lot of people that we are not reaching in A.A. . . . Since Marty has been to Des Moines we have had 36 new men and women in A.A. . . . FLASH: Des Moines Committee for Education on Alcoholism AIRS ITS FIRST SHOW ON KRNT. And, what a show it was."

'Hi and Dri', Minneapolis, Minn.: "Our Bart P. may be the instigator of starting some good A.A. work among the Salvation Army group at Hibbing, after personally making it a point to explain his view of the program and what it had done for him, to the Salvation Army head at Hibbing. The week-end was thoroughly enjoyed by all those who had the privilege of making the trip and we thank all of Hibbing for the unusually warm hospitality. . . . Use what talents you haveâ€"the woods would be very silent if no birds sang there except those who sang the best."

'Dubuque Alanews', Dubuque, Iowa: "TO THE OTHER TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT. Well, fellows, we had you and lost you, why I do not know and deep down in your own hearts I don't think you can answer the question. First of all, I don't think that one of you really had the program. By that I mean you came and supported the organizationâ€"you were friendly, but you were afraid. . . . Maybe we are at fault. I sometimes think so. . . . Well, fellows, you are welcome back . . . come on down."

'The Brighter Side', Waterloo, Iowa: "Frank gave a talk before about 50 representatives from social, civic, law and fraternal groups on what A.A. is and how it works. Judging from the number of questions Frank was called on to answer after his talk, there must have been a lot of interest created. More good constructive publicity. During the day, we held open house at our rooms and coffee and cake was served, in charge of our angel, Florence. Good attendance and both outsiders and home folks enjoyed this part of the day's doings."

|||||

+++Message 1464. . . . . The Glass Crutch
From: eze_kiel03 . . . . . 11/10/2003 5:57:00 AM

|||||

Have just read The Glass Crutch: the biographical novel of William

Wynne Wister, by Jim Bishop; Doubleday, Doran and Co., Inc., New York, 1945. In it Wister tells of his chronic alcoholism and his recovery after meeting R.R.Peabody, author of The Common Sense of Drinking, in 1934. Wister set himself up as a paid lay therapist on Peabody lines first in New York then in California helping alcoholics with, according to him, some success, but met resistance from the medical establishment and, disillusioned, at age 42 took up a career in advertising. In his reading he mentions a book on alcoholism by Strecker and Chambers. Does anyone know anything about their approach? He also describes how in 1938 he heard of "an organised research group in New York...an association of hundreds of doctors who met irregularly to exchange ideas on alcoholism". Any information about this group? Did Dr Silkworth attend? He adds, "It was there (at this group) that he met Dr Luis Albanese, a psychiatrist on the staff of the Wagner Institute, New York (who) had been working on a paper on alcoholism." Was that paper ever published? In 1942 he met Thaddeus Brown "a rich man with a brother who was a chronic alcoholic" who wanted to open a clinic in Newark, New Jersey "... and he had already asked the Rockefeller Foundation to put up a grant to start it...Mr Brown had contacted Dr Lee Bergen of the Foundation and Dr Bergen had brought the idea before the Rockefeller board and they had made a liberal grant to finance the first year." In view of AA's approach to the Rockefellers, were other groups helping drunks applying for help as well? An editorial footnote (page 302) says: "William W. Wister is an accredited psychotherapist in alcoholism, endorsed by the two leading authorities on the cure of alcoholism in the country today (i.e. 1945): Dr Edward A. Streckner, professor of psychiatry, School of Medicine, University of Pennsylvania; and Francis T. Chambers, Jr, associate in therapy, Institute of the Pennsylvania Hospital, Philadelphi." Do they feature in AA's history? Wister does not mention AA in his story. What became of him?

|||||

++++Message 1465. . . . . NCCA articles
From: jimmy . . . . . 11/10/2003 12:41:00 AM

|||||

Greetings fellow history lovers. Quite by accident, I stumbled across a website with a variety of transcripts from talks given by folks from AA's past. It's the National Catholic Council on Alcohol and Related Drug Problems (NCCA). NCCA was founded by Father Ralph Pfau.

There's a section called "NCCA Blue Book Archives" which contains articles and transcripts from talks by a variety of folks including Marty Mann, Fr. Terry Richey, Bill Wilson and others.

The site is at: <http://www.nccatoday.org/resources.htm>

Below is a list of articles:

Alcoholics Anonymous, by Bill W. (Co-founder of AA) Bill W. spoke at the NCCA national symposium in New York in 1960. This is adapted from his talk on that occasion.

A Conversation with Bill W. Questions by participants and comments by Bill W following his talk at the NCCA in 1960.

Counseling the Alcoholic, by Mrs. Marty Mann. Mrs. Mann is the founder of the National Council on Alcoholism. She spoke at the NCCA national symposium in Florida in 1966.

Spirituality: A Facet Of Wellness, by Sister Maurice Doody, O.P. Sister Maurice is a Dominican religious on the Board of Directors of the NCCA and is active in retreat work throughout the U.S.

Historical Perspective of Father Ralph Pfau and the NCCA, by Monsignor William J. Clausen. Msgr. Clausen reviews the history of the NCCA on the occasion of the organization's 50th anniversary celebration in Indianapolis in 1999.

Addictions: One Catholic Response, by Monsignor Kieran Martin. Msgr. Martin highlights local efforts in the Catholic Church addressing alcohol and drug abuse prevention and treatment.

The Clergy's Role in Alcohol Problems, by Father Raymond J.H. Kennedy. Asks clergy to examine attitudes toward abstinence and moderation in drinking, and alcoholism. Touches on confession.

Rehabilitation of the Alcoholic through AA, by Mary Harkin. How AA came to be and how it frees a person of a threefold compulsion.

The Priest and the Sober Alcoholic - Sobriety and Spiritual Progress, by Father Bernard Lenarz. The sober alcoholic still is an alcoholic who needs spiritual development in order to maintain sobriety.

The Bishop and Alcoholism in Priesthood, by Bishop Ernest L. Unterkoefler. Those who have gone through the whole gamut of living in psychological isolation and in spiritual isolation realize that there is always hope, and this hope is based on our union with Christ, the Priest.

Alcoholism and the Clergyman, by Richard Paddock. There is no group of dedicated people on earth who have felt the ignominious degradation of alcoholism more than clergymen.

The Scope of the Problem, by Judge Eugene K. Mangam. "If it so be that you labor all of your days and bring one soul unto me, how great shall be your reward."

Diocesan Policies, by Father Mark Mindrup, OFM Conv. On the development of practical policies and realistic methods of dealing with the problem of alcoholism within the ranks of the clergy and religious.

What the Clergy Can Do, by Ralph Daniel. The Church may be a little peeved because it was by-passed by some of God's knowledge. Many churchmen have washed their hands of alcoholism and have turned to AA. They have said, "See ye to it."

Wrong Images of the Alcoholic, by Dr. Russell Smith. None of us can approach alcoholism without becoming emotionally involved. Every one of us has pre-programming and pre-conceived ideas as to what that term means.

Parish Preaching on Alcoholism, by Father John Fulford. At one time or another your voice may be the one voice in all God's world that can penetrate the barrier of resistance that alcoholic has built in front of himself or herself. Let your voice not only be a voice of compassion, but let it be a voice filled with knowledge as well.

The Past and Future of the NCCA, by Very Rev. Joseph L. Kerins, C.Ss.R. The basic educative function of the NCCA is ongoing and never-ending.

Special Problems of the Teenage Alcoholic, by Richard R. Schnurr. Insights from a pioneer in the field.

The People of God and Alcoholism, by Rev. Terry Richey. What I would say if I were the one to write a statement for the Bishops of the United States concerning alcoholism and drug addiction to Catholics and to all the citizens of this country.

Alcoholism and the Religious Community, by Sr. Janet M. Rolando, B.V.M. Discussion of issues in the recovery process by a woman religious in community.

Know, Understand and Deal with It, by Archbishop Fiorenzo Angelini. It is our duty to do all that is necessary -- and more than the barely necessary -- but always with the understanding that without the help that comes from God our efforts will not be enough.

Co-Dependency in Religious Community, by Rev. Mike McAndrew, C.Ss.R. Our concern about alcoholism in religious community goes beyond the alcoholic, to those affected by living with an alcoholic community member, and to those affected by having lived with alcoholism in their families.

The Catholic Remedy - Spirituality and the 12 Steps, by Rev. Msgr. R. Joseph James. Catholic spirituality and recovery, plus a recipe for making gravy.

Religious Life and Alcoholism, by Sister Therese Golden, O.P. Religious and clergy are but a microcosm of the world in which we live. It is naive for us to believe that alcoholism cannot and does not penetrate the hallowed walls of religious / clerical life.

Guidelines for Setting Formation Policy Dealing with ACOAs, by Paul White. A 12-Step spiritual program, a mentor and group counseling are key elements.

5 Moments: Spiritual Direction for ACOAs, by Paul White. Offering ideas on a way people can learn more about themselves, their family, the impact of their family, and be converted in their heart to a belief in God.

Intimacy in Celibate Life, by Rev. James F. Schwertley. Essentially the problem is one of loneliness.

A Dynamic Employee Assistance Program, by Gavin Griffith, O.F.M. While the basic principles of Employee Assistance are simple, their application leaves room for variety in style. Employee assistance can be more than work. It is an art. With an annotated bibliography.

Treatment for the Uninsured and Poor, by Rev. James W. Thornton, C.S.C., Ph.D. No one is born on Skid Row and there is no such person as a hopeless alcoholic. The story of the De Paul Center.

The Pain that Jesus Heard, By Eugene LaVerdiere, SSS. The ultimate purpose of what Jesus did when he healed people was not just to alleviate the pain or ailment. The purpose, seen through the lens of the Gospel, was connected with their

"Information given out for 3 radio broadcasts."

'Central Bulletin', Cleveland, Ohio: "An absent-minded A.A. sent in a dollar for a subscription to the Bulletin and asked for a squib about his one-man group which was functioning for the past six months and going strong. "We've given him his writeup" now will he please write us and give us his name and address, so we can send him a Bulletin for a year. Tsk! Tsk!" ...

". . . The new procedure adopted by these ex-patients (from Charity Hospital) will be to hold nightly half-hour meetings for patients to fully acquaint them with A.A. procedure. These meetings will be conducted by the volunteer workers who are on duty each night. This enables the patients to get an insight of how A.A. works before they leave the hospital and when they leave it will make them feel more at home in group meetings."

'The Toss Pot', Charleston, W. Va.: "If we are resentful of things among ourselves (in the Group) we divert the purpose of A.A. . . . A.A. can never be hurt from outside" only from within....

"The greatest danger to progress in A.A. is the danger of being satisfied with accomplishments."

'Hi and Dri', Minneapolis, Minn.: ". . . Suppose we have a look at an article . . . in the Yale Review on the 'Physiology of Alcoholism'. The piece is written by one Dr. Haggard who . . . heads up Yale University's current studies on what physical causes contribute to an alcoholic's misery. The ultimate hope of the study is to find a 'Penicillin' or possibly a 'Sulfa' which, when administered to an alcoholic, will cure him of his ailment. Dr. Haggard discusses the whole matter of alcohol from the physical side, and seems to believe that there are definite physiological reasons why one man is an alcoholic and why another man standing next to him at a bar may be merely a 'normally excessive drinker.' He does not claim to know what those reasons are, but at least it seems the 'men in white' are in there pitching, trying to find the answer.

"Is alcohol an allergy? Dr. Haggard thinks not. Is it a glandular condition? Well, perhaps, he says. In any case, he agrees with us in the belief that until a specific cure is uncovered, an alcoholic's only hope is to stay away from the stuff. . . . Our 24-hour program makes this possible."

'Camel Club Chronicle', Marshalltown, Iowa: "Well, The Chronicle is just beginning its second year of publication. It was founded just a year ago by a great fellow who has had his share of trouble; and here's hoping it is past. . . . He said: 'Do you fellows mind if I start a sheet and >to put up a grant to start it...Mr Brown had contacted Dr Lee >Bergen of the Foundation and Dr Bergen had brought the idea before >the Rockefeller board and they had made a liberal grant to finance >the first year." In view of AA's approach to the Rockefellers, were >other groups helping drunks applying for help as well? An editorial >footnote (page 302) says: "William W. Wister is an accredited >psychotherapist in alcoholism, endorsed by the two leading >authorities on the cure of alcoholism in the country today (i.e.

>1945): Dr Edward A. Streckner, professor of psychiatry, School of >Medicine, University of Pennsylvania; and Francis T. Chambers, Jr, >associate in therapy, Institute of the Pennsylvania Hospital, >Philadelphi." Do they feature in AA's history? Wister does not >mention AA in his story. What became of him?

>
>

>----- Yahoo! Groups Sponsor

-----~>

>Buy Ink Cartridges or Refill Kits for your HP, Epson, Canon or Lexmark >Printer at MyInks.com. Free s/h on orders $50 or more to the US & Canada.

><http://www.c1tracking.com/l.asp?cid=5511>
><http://us.click.yahoo.com/mOAaAA/3exGAA/qnsNAA/219oIB/TM>

>-----~

>
>

>To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
>AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

>
>
>

>Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to <http://docs.yahoo.com/info/terms/>

>
>

-----
Great deals on high-speed Internet access as low as $26.95.*

[18] * Prices may vary by service area.

|||||

+++Message 1468. . . . . Re: The Glass Crutch
From: goldentextpro@aol.com . . . . . 11/10/2003 5:08:00 AM

|||||

Quite a few inquiries here to address. Here are some answers:

1. Richard Peabody published a book titled The Common Sense of Drinking in 1934, based on his therapy for alcoholism (utilizing a form of relaxation therapy). By most accounts, it wasn't too successful. Peabody himself died a drunk not long thereafter.

An interesting postscript to Peabody was that Bill Wilson had read his book at some point in 1938. According to an historian, both AA co-founders had owned copies of Peabody's book. Stepping Stones has Bill's copy, and an inscription in it reads: "Dr. Peabody was as far as is known the first authority to state, 'once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic,' and he proved it by returning to drinking and by dying of alcoholism - proving to us that the condition is incurable."

The following are actual quotes from Peabody's book:

"Halfway measures are of no avail..." (p.99)

"Suffice it to say, once a drunkard always a drunkard - or a teetotaler! A fairly exhaustive inquiry has elicited no exceptions to this rule."
(p. 82)

It is almost certain that Bill Wilson's Big Book pronouncement "Once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic" had indeed been influenced by Peabody. (More on the "incurable" idea later.)

2. The Strecker and Chambers approach is elaborated somewhat in William L. White's Slaying the Dragon: The History of Addiction Treatment and Recovery in America (pp. 103-104):

"They believed that the foundation of recovery from alcoholism was the hope of the therapist. In their view, the lack of true hopefulness on the part of the therapist would always be discovered by the hypersensitive alcoholic, and, in a kind of self-fulfilling prophecy, lead to failure...Strecker and Chambers spent considerable time with their patients on a reconstruction of daily lifestyle. They emphasized the need for new hobbies and relationships to fill the periods of boredom, restlessness, and dissatisfaction that occurred when one gave up drinking."

3. The group of physicians in question was the Research Council on Problems of Alcohol, based in New York. The group was originally named the Sponsoring Committee of the National Conference on Alcohol (SCNCA), of which Strecker was a member. The RCPA was the epicenter of alcohol problems/alcoholism research in the late 1930s and 1940s. The RCPA spawned the Yale Summer School of Alcohol Studies, which included Dr. Elvin Jellinek and Seldon Bacon. It was here at the Yale Summer School that Bill Wilson, Marty Mann and other early AAs had attended and had become educated in alcoholism.

4. Dr. William D. Silkworth was also a contributor to the RCPA, though his allergy theory was highly questioned and subsequently dismissed by several RCPA contributors to the Quarterly Journal of Studies on Alcohol.

5. In December 1937, Bill Wilson had attained the interest of John Rockefeller through contacts. Rockefeller dispatched public relations associate Frank Amos to Akron to investigate the burgeoning group. In a later summary of these events, Amos recalled a meeting at Rockefeller's office in Dec. 1937 (Rockefeller himself was not present) with Albert Scott, William Richardson, A. LeRoy Chipman and Amos (all of whom were Rockefeller associates), and included Dr. Silkworth, Dr. Leonard Strong. In attendance were Bill Wilson, Hank Parkhurst, Bill Ruddell, Ned Poynter, Joe Taylor and Fitz Mayo (all NY-based AAs), and Dr. Bob and Paul Stanley from Akron.

Amos summarized the statements made by Dr. Silkworth, which are most interesting:

"Dr. Silkworth, Psychiatrist at Charles B. Towns Hospital in New York, which is rated as a leading hospital in this country for the treatment of alcoholics, made the statement that he had treated a number of these ex-alcoholics present, some of them several times, and that not one of them, in his opinion, could have been permanently cured by any means known to medical science or to Psychiatry. He went on to state without reservation that while he could not tell just what it was that these men had which had effected their 'cure,' yet (sic) he was convinced they were cured and that whatever it was, it had his complete endorsement. He stated that alcoholism is, medically, an incurable disease." Quite a statement, especially in light of Bill Wilson's later Big Book comments influenced by Richard Peabody.

6. Being a philanthropist, Rockefeller had been approached by several organizations in New York. The RCPA and the unnamed AA were but two of them. It is interesting that Rockefeller's contributions to them were all quite similar. These groups had all asked for a certain sizeable amount, and Rockefeller matched 1/10th of their requests.

Postscript: In the fall of 1939, the RCPA had shifted its focus from "alcohol problems (i.e. alcohol-related accidents, alcohol problems in the workplace, etc.) to alcoholism in order to accept financial support from the alcohol beverage industry, thereby absolving the beverage industry and the RCPA from accusations of collusion, and in effect beginning the now-modern studies on alcoholism. Sociologist Ron Roizen contributed an outstanding review of the RCPA and related studies in his work "The American Discovery of Alcoholism, 1933-1939." This can be down any spiritual references to make his program more acceptable to professionals. I do remember when Francis Chambers was working in the field, and his standing appeared to be very good. Ms. McCarthy thought that the Peabody counselors were pretty much gone after the 1950s and quotes a person as saying that his method never had the magic of AA. But I do think it made a great contribution and it is interesting to me that Peabody's home and office were in Gramercy Park, right next to Sam Shoemaker's Calvary Church, which had such an important role in Bill W.'s recovery.

Mel Barger

~~~~~

Mel Barger

melb@accesstoledo.com

----- Original Message -----

From: J. Lobdell

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Monday, November 10, 2003 7:57 AM

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] The Glass Crutch

Just off the top of my head, the organization is probably the Research Council on the Problems of Alcohol(ism), funded in part by the Rockefellers, and connected with the Science & Society movement and with Yale and thus Bunky Jellinek. There's a good account in Richard Roizen's dissertation, available (I think) on the web. ALCOHOL: ONE MAN'S MEAT, by Strecker and Chambers, is mentioned in Marty Mann's PRIMER: Chambers was a Peabody-trained lay therapist who took formal instruction in psych from Strecker at Penn: he was active in the field into the 1950s. More later (but you'll probably get a lot of responses) -- Jared Lobdell

>From: "eze_kiel03"

>Reply-To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

>To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

>Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] The Glass Crutch

>Date: Mon, 10 Nov 2003 10:57:58 -0000

>

>Have just read The Glass Crutch: the biographical novel of William >Wynne Wister, by Jim Bishop; Doubleday, Doran and Co., Inc., New >York, 1945. In it Wister tells of his chronic alcoholism and his >recovery after meeting R.R.Peabody, author of The Common Sense of >Drinking, in 1934. Wister set himself up as a paid lay therapist on >Peabody lines first in New York then in California helping >alcoholics with, according to him, some success, but met resistance >from the medical establishment and, disillusioned, at age 42 took up >a career in advertising. In his reading he mentions a book on

NY member, Horace C, suggested printing the prayer on a card and sending it in the mail going out from the NY office and personally paid to have the cards printed.

Reference citations: AA Comes of Age (pg 196), Pass It On (pg 252), Grateful To Have Been There (Appendix B - a very detailed account).

Nell Wing's exposition on the Serenity Prayer, in Grateful To Have Been There, appears quite thoroughly researched. Two of her references credit Niebuhr with writing the prayer either (1) prior to the US entering World War II, or (2) as early as 1935.

The bottom line though appears as Mel asserts - Niebuhr is cited by Nell wing as stating "Of course, it may have been spooking around for centuries."

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: Mel Barger
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Sent: Wednesday, November 12, 2003 7:52 AM
Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] The Serenity Prayer

On November 2nd, the New York Times Book Review carried a review of a book by Reinhold Niebuhr's daughter. She doesn't seem to like it that the prayer is used by AA. But since she gave the summer of 1943 as the time he authored it, I felt it necessary to point out that AA was using it more than a year earlier and had found it in an obituary. This is documented on page 196 of "Alcoholics Anonymous Comes of Age." It does appear that Bouton wasn't the proper person to send the letter to, but she emailed me that she had forwarded it to the right editor:

Katherine Bouton, New York Times Book Review

Dear Ms. Bouton,

Apparently Elizabeth Sifton (Reinhold Niebuhr's daughter) dislikes the form of The Serenity Prayer widely publicized by Alcoholics Anonymous (Book Review, Nov. 2nd). But if she is correct in stating that her father composed its larger form in the summer of 1943, then

AA's use predates her father's authorship by more than a year. According to "Alcoholics Anonymous Comes of Age," a brief history of AA published by AA World Services in 1957, the prayer was discovered in a newspaper obituary and quickly reprinted and sent out in routine mailings by Ruth Hock, who left the AA general service

Clyde; alcoholic,
I found this on Google: <http://open-mind.org/Serenity.htm> , hope it's of some value to your search!

In sobriety, Love Clyde

|||||

+++Message 1478. Serenity Prayer info from the Grapevine
From: t 11/13/2003 6:32:00 PM

|||||

I ran across these three short articles [pasted below] about the Serenity Prayer
in some old Grapevines.

The publication date of "Dr. Robbins' book of prayers" [from the Jan 50 article]

A check of the Library of Congress found:
Robbins, Howard Chandler, 1876-1952.

Way of light : a manual of praise, prayer and meditation / compiled by Howard
Chandler Robbins. 1933

CALL NUMBER: BV4801 .R6 1933

Still might want to try look at a copy to confirm that pray is included in the work.

It would also be nice to clarify if the slight wording changes had already occurred
as of that printing.

Grapevine, January 1950

The Serenity Prayer
...it's origin is traced...

AT long last the mystery of the Serenity Prayer has been solved!

We have learned who wrote it, when it was written and how it came to the attention of the early members of AA. We have learned, too, how it was originally written, a bit of information which should lay to rest all arguments as to which is the correct quotation.

The timeless little prayer has been credited to almost every theologian, philosopher and saint known to man. The most popular opinion on its authorship favors St. Francis of Assisi.

It was actually written by Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, of the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, in about 1932 as the ending to a longer prayer. In 1934 the doctor's friend and neighbor, Dr. Howard Robbins asked permission to use that part of the longer prayer in a compilation he was making at the time. It was published in that year in Dr. Robbins' book of prayers.

Dr. Niebuhr says, "Of course, it may have been spooking around for years, even centuries, but I don't think so. I honestly do believe that I wrote it myself."

It came to the attention of an early member of AA in 1939. He read it in an obituary appearing in the New York Times. He liked it so much he brought it in to the little office on Vesey St. for Bill W. to read. When Bill and the staff read the little prayer, they felt that it particularly suited the needs of AA. Cards were printed and passed around. Thus the simple little prayer became an integral part of the AA movement.

Today it is in the pockets of thousands of AAs; it is framed and placed on the wall of AA meeting rooms throughout the world; it appears monthly on the back cover of your magazine and every now and then someone tells us that we have quoted it incorrectly. We have.

As it appears in The A. A. Grapevine, it reads:

God grant me the serenity
To accept things I cannot change,
Courage to change things I can,
And wisdom to know the difference.

Many tell us that it should read:

God grant me the serenity
To accept the things I cannot change;
The courage to change the things I can;
And the wisdom to know the difference.

The way it was originally written by Dr. Niebuhr is as follows:

God give me the serenity to accept things which cannot be changed; Give me courage to change things which must be changed;
And the wisdom to distinguish one from the other.

Dr. Niebuhr doesn't seem to mind that his prayer is incorrectly quoted. . .a comma. . .a preposition
. . .even several verbs. . .the meaning and the message remain intact.
"In fact," says the good doctor,
"in some respects, I believe your way is better."

Grapevine, July 1950

ORIGINAL CLIPPING

Reprinted below is the original clipping of The Serenity Prayer which appeared in the New York Times obituary columns. An early AA member saw it and thinking, it particularly fitting for AAs, brought it to the old

Vesey Street office. Soon it began to appear on cards and in AA literature until it became an integral part of the AA way of life.

Mother--God grant me the serenity to accept things I cannot change, courage to change things I can, and wisdom to know the difference. Goodby.

Grapevine, November 1964

The Serenity Prayer

God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, courage to change the things I can, and wisdom to know the difference.

THERE'S nothing new under the sun? Well, perhaps there is in the area of material things. Telstar and moon probes are new. As a matter of fact, so is AA, which celebrated a young twenty-ninth birthday this year. But in the spiritual life, when we make a discovery, we're usually waking up to an old truth.

When the Grapevine last reported on the origin of the Serenity Prayer (January, 1950, issue), we had traced it to Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, who set it down in 1932 in very much the form given above. AA first used it on printed cards and at meetings in 1939. Dr. Niebuhr said at the time that he thought it "might have been spooking around for years, even centuries...."

Now an alert AA has sent us a clipping from the Paris Herald Tribune of an article written by its away from this at first, don't be alarmed. Better to wait until that person is receptive and can give A.A. a chance, than to put, when he is not ready, another defeat in his or her life."

'The Rope Yarn' (A.A. Seamen's Club). New York City: "It's nice to have money and the things that money can buy" but it's nice too to check up once in a while and make sure that you haven't lost those things that money can't buy, and Sobriety is one of those things."

'Central Bulletin', Cleveland, Ohio: "In seven cases out of eleven of persons who had difficulty with the A.A. program, . . . what bothered them most was their inability to pay up all their debts. They owed so much to Joe, so much to Frank and so much to Jim and others that they would offend two if they paid up one, et cetera.

"We know of one man who solved this problem who once a week regularly paid as low as 50 cents in installments until $300.00 was paid off to seven persons. He explained to each what he was doing and each at first was inclined to humor him. Before he was paid up, his reputation for absolute honesty soared throughout the city.

"We all would like to make the grand gesture and 50 cents on a ten dollar debt seems so little. We fear we're losing face by admitting we cannot pay more. Determine what you can afford to spare from your income, figure up all your debts, and commit yourself to regular weekly payments and though you think you are humbling yourself unnecessarily you'll be surprised how you gain in stature.

"You must pay up your debts. You can if you really want to."

'Weekly Bulletin' (Top o' Texas Group), Amarillo, Texas: "Those who made the trip to McLean recently were very much impressed with the brief talk Brother Langino gave on that occasion. (He is pastor of the McLean Methodist Church.) . . . The committee on zoning the city for calling on prospective new members decided on four districts, marked east and west by 6th street, and north and south by Polk. . . . Remember always that you are under no obligation to the member or members who helped you, but that you are obliged to go to the aid of the unknown man out yonder who is calling for help."

'Camel Club Chronicle', Marshalltown, Iowa: "When you hear 'em talking about friction in A.A., don't let it throw you and don't let it get you down. If you do, John will step in and help throw you DOWNER and that's the truth. . . .

"Making a moral inventory of the other guy was one of the most popular indoor and outdoor sports of most of us before we came into A.A. and perhaps all of us should be a little tolerant of those of

A. A. Digest " Excerpts from Group Publications

'Weekly News Letter' (Deep East Texas Group), Nacogdoches, Texas:
"The Deep East Texas Group was one year old July 25. On that date in 1945 the first meeting was held in Nacogdoches with one member present from Palestine and one from Nacogdoches. The following week six members of the Houston group and five members of the Dallas group spent up to three days with us helping us get started."

'The Eye-Opener', Los Angeles, Calif.: It is better for the newcomer to put his faith in the "Principles" of A.A. rather than in the "Personalities" of A.A. The 12 Steps will never let you down! ...

For our Egotists:

You see a man wise in his own eyes, There is more hope for a fool than for him.

For our Tempers:

Like a city breached and defenseless Is a man who has no control of his temper.

For Gossip:

An evil man pays heed to wicked words, A false man gives ear to mischievous speech."

'A. A. Tribune', Des Moines, Iowa: "The Information Center can be financed by the Community Chest, and that would definitely put it where it belongs, namely, making it a public health problem. . . . What alcoholic bought a new house here lately and then tore off the front porch in fixing it up? Brother, he'll have a new front porch on it soon the way, I hear, he's working. Funny how in A.A. we start buying homes, start fixing them up, and start living again like we were humans once more. Great deal, that permits such happiness."

'Central Bulletin', Cleveland, Ohio: "Gossip is one of the cardinal sins . . . An old Italian legend tells the following: In the old days, a peasant confessed to a priest that he had slandered an innocent man. The priest said to him, 'For your penance do this now. Take a bag of chicken feathers. Go to every yard in the town and drop one bit of down into each garden. Do not miss one yard. When you have finished, return to me.'

"The sinner believed the punishment was light. With his bag of down he made the circuit of the village and carefully dropped one soft feather into each garden. Then he reported to the priest saying: 'I have done my penance.'

" 'No, my son,' replied the old abbe. 'You will not have done your penance until you take the bag, go again on your rounds, collect every feather you have dropped, and bring it here to me.' The gossip protested that it would be impossible! He could not find the bits of down in a lifetime; many of them had blown far away.

" 'So it is with gossip,' replied the priest. 'It is easily dropped. But never again, no matter how hard you try, can you gather back the words you have so thoughtlessly scattered!'"

'Camel Club Chronicle', Marshalltown, Iowa: "There is no A.A. member who is proud of the funny things, the silly things, the mean things, the awful things, he did in his drinking days. They are gone and past forever. Our past lives cannot be lived over again nor can they be changed. So to think about our past lives unduly, to condemn, berate, or belittle ourselves for having done what we did do, is wrong. It is unsound. It is bad psychology. It is just plain damn crooked thinking. We should be thankful that we are not drinking now, and we should show our thankfulness by helping others who need our help."

|||||

++++Message 1488. detox 1930"s style
From: leodbil 11/17/2003 5:08:00 PM

|||||

hi everyone, during our BB study a question came up about detox procedures during the time the book was written. We were on the doctors opinion pg XXVI 2nd ed.

"Of course an alcoholic ought to be freed from his physical craving for liquor, and this often requires a definite hospital procedure, before psychological measures can be of maximum benefit.

We were wondering if anyone here knows any particulars about 'hydrotherapy' 'belladonna' or any of the standard stuff back then. By the way, i already did an archives search at "buffs" and got the info on the samaratin treatment. Very interesting read, more of the same ilk would be much appreciated.

thanks bill

"The failure of a great many members to grasp the 12 Steps can be traced to the fact that they have never taken the 1st. . . . Their wishbone is where their backbone should be."

'Camel Club Chronicle', Marshalltown, Iowa: ". . . Most of us came into A.A. primarily with a selfish motive based on fear. On that single motive alone one can go 'dry' and perhaps stay 'dry' indefinitely, but unless we accept the whole program without reservations and work unceasingly at it we merely become 'dry alcoholics' and our last state is worse than before, or at least our friends and acquaintances may be inclined to think so. When we were drinking, and not too far gone, we did have our periods of amiability. . . .

"So if we go 'dry' on the 1st Step only, and ignore the spiritual angleâ€"neglect to make a moral inventoryâ€"neglect to ask the 'Power greater than ourselves' to remove all our defects of characterâ€"these defects and obsessions will remain to plague us and our associates, and we will be unable to obtain even the dreadful oblivion afforded by the bottle. We shall be living a life of continuous fear, and where there is fear there is neither love nor peace of mind."

'Central Bulletin', Cleveland, Ohio: "Partial digest of a typical days business at Cleveland Downtown District Office. . . .

"A director of veteran personnel called and asked for literature to be given to veterans who should be interested. . . . A member called for an attorney. . . . Member's wife calledâ€"a message to her husband who will be in office today . . . Call for information about A.A. office hours and general information . . . Call from an interested third party who wanted information on A.A. groups in Pittsburgh . . . Call from a member re hospitalizing new patient . . . Call from man interested in A.A. for himself . . . Call from a new member who wanted some help in hospitalizing a patient . . . Personal call from home . . . Call from a member leaving his name and phone, and is available for call during the day . . . Call regarding office hours and if there was a charge for A.A. . . . Call from a member re hospital routine . . . Call from a member regarding a legal problem . . . Member called seeking employment for another member . . . Call from a family friend regarding A.A. . . . Call regarding hospitalizing former member . . . Call re member who is in hospital . . . Call for out-of-town speaker tomorrow night . . . Wrong number . . . Call from man seeking help for himself . . . Call requesting location of a particular meeting . . . Call from a man attempting to locate his sponsor . . . A drunken woman who had been unable to make program work . . . A woman reporting fine treatment belladonna. The belladonna treatment at Towns had been developed by Dr. Sam Lambert, a reputable

N.Y. physician...."

Bill was admitted to Towns Hospital on 12/11/34 at 2:30PM & underwent belledonna treatment, hydrotherapy & mild exercise. Dr. Lambert described the belladonna treatment as follows (this is from "AA - The Way It Began" by Bill Pittman, pages 164-166, 168):
"Briefly stated, it consists in the hourly dosage of a mixture of belladonna, hyoscyamus & xanthoxylum. The mixture is given every hour, day & night, for about 50 hours. There is also given about every 12 hours a vigorous catharsis of C.C. pills & blue mass. At the end of the treatment, when it is evident that there are abundant bilious stools, castor oil is given to clean out thoroughly the intestinal tract. If you leave any of the ingredients out, the reaction of the cessation of desire is not as clear cut as when the 3 are mixed together.
The amount necessary to give is judged by the physiologic action of
the belladonna it contains. When the face becomes flush, the throat dry,
& the pupils of the eyes dilated, you must cut down your mixture or cease giving it altogether, until these symptoms pass. You must, however, push this mixture until these symptoms appear, or you will not obtain a clear cut cessation of the desire for the narcotic.
The exact contents of each ingredient is below:

Belladonna Specific:

Tincture belladonnae (62. gm.)

Fluidextracti xanthoryli.

Fluidextracti hyoscyami (.31 gm.)

Belladonna - Atropa belladonna

Deadly nightshade; a perennial herb with dark purple flowers & black berries.

Leaves & root contain atropine & related alkaloids which are anticholinergic.

It is a powerful excitant of the brain with side effects of delirium (wild & talkative), decreased secretion, & diplopia.

Xanthoxylum - Xanthoxylum Americanum

The dried bark or berries of prickly ash. Alkaloid of Hydrasts.

Helps with chronic gastro-intestinal disturbances. Carminative & diaphoretic.

Hyoscyamus - Hyoskyamos

Henbane, hog's bean, insane root from the leaves & flowers of Hyoscyamus Niger.

Contains 2 alkaloids, hyoscyamine & hyoscine. Nervous system sedative, anticholinergic, & antispasmodic.

Close observation is necessary in treating the alcoholic in regard to the symptoms of the intoxication of belladonna, as alcoholics are sensitive to the effects of belladonna delirium. According to Lambert, it is a less furious & less pugnacious delirium than that of alcohol. The patients are more persistent & more insistent in their ideas & more incisive in their speech concerning hallucinations. The hallucinations of alcohol are usually those of an occupation delirium; those of belladonna are not. The various hallucinations of alcohol follow each other so quickly that a man is busily occupied in observing them one after another. The belladonna delirium is apt to be confined to one or two ideas on which the patient is very insistent. If these symptoms of belladonna intoxication occur, of course, the specific must be discontinued; then beginning again with the original smaller dose. Towns believed the attending physician would find it most difficult to differentiate between alcoholic delirium & belladonna delirium. After this treatment, with its vigorous elimination, the patient would feel languid & relaxed, but the craving for alcohol would have ceased."

My comments:

Bill W. had been detoxed 3 or 4 times that year (or more) so his detoxing was from smaller periods of alcohol use, so it's possible that the doctors did not have to give him the full treatment (mentioned above) as they would have if he had come in after years of uninterrupted alcohol abuse. In Bill's Story (Big Book pages 13 & 14), it says that Ebby told him again about the Oxford Group spiritual solution. After doing most of the work (what later became the 12 Steps) & fully accepting the Oxford Group solution, he THEN had what has been affectionately referred to as "Bill W.'s Hot Flash" - a white light, life changing spiritual experience. He shared the experience with Dr. Silkworth on 12/14/34 so this happened 3 to 4 days AFTER he was admitted to the hospital & 1 to 2 days AFTER the belladonna treatment would have been over with IF used for the FULL 2 days, which it might not have been. Was the spiritual experience Bill W. had influenced by belladonna or inner surrender? Those against AA sometimes say it was drug induced & those with AA say it wasn't, depending upon the answer they are looking for. Either way, the experience changed his life, as well as millions of people now living the 12 Steps ever since. I DO KNOW THIS. I was more than 3 & 1/2 years clean & sober of any drugs (including belladonna) & alcohol when I had my spiritual experience AS THE RESULT of the EXACT same course of action that Bill W. followed, & COINCIDENTALLY I got the EXACT SAME results he did - a life changing spiritual experience. These are facts from MY experience & NOT speculation, so you know which way I lean on this issue.

Thanks for the question, the research was interesting for me. I always thought that the belladonna side effects I heard about were extreme but now drink firewater. Him bad man; fight white squaw. White squaw go 'way; take white papoose. White man quit drink firewater. Squaw come back, papoose come back. White man good man now. Indian no quit drink firewater. No squaw, no papoose, no come back. Indian heap sick. Ugh. HOW white man quit drink firewater? Indian want to quit drink firewater, too. How-HOW? WHITE MAN READ 'A.A. Tribune'. Him drink no firewater. Have A.A. in Cheyenne too, 27 faces, we gettum round campfire. No firewater. (Signed) Hiawatha.' "

'Dubuque Alanews', Dubuque, Ia.: "From doing stormy penance in the night, to stand still and proud as these; from wailing litanies of remorse, to the lilting lullabies of peace. All this in a few months time? It isn't possible! No, it just isn't possible. But it happened! These were our thoughts and the thoughts of many another, as we formed a part of that amazing event at Des Moines. And where is the word to use when anything impossible becomes a fact? We couldn't find the word, but H.R. did. He knows them all. When he gazed over the packed auditorium he turned to the Judge and said: "There's only one word to describe this. It's miraculous.' "

'The Thought Starter', Minneapolis, Minn.: Recent issue of this A.A. publication begin with inspirational poems, such as the favorite of the late Dr. George W. Carver, world famed scientist and humanitarian, and then go on to trace a story and to make comments.

Of Dr. Carver's life the publication says, "It has been said some people grow under responsibility and advancement to positions of authority; others only swell," and after a discussion of Dr. Carver's humility in attributing his accomplishments to God, adds, "true humility is the consciousness of the need of a power greater than our own and a willingness to let that power control our lives. Humility is teachability and an open mind to the truth."

'Weekly Bulletin' (Top o' Texas Group) Amarillo, Tex.: "KGNC is running a new 13-week program on Alcoholics Anonymous, scheduled at 10:30 p.m. Wednesday nights."

'The Aridity Review' (Spirit Lake-Milford-Spencer Group) Spencer, Ia.: "That 1st Step is a toughie for most guys BUT it must be taken 100 percent and sincerely or the other 11 Steps aren't going to be of much use to us. In fact if we don't take that 1st Step and admit freely, sincerely and wholeheartedly that we are powerless over alcohol we do not need the other 11 Steps because those 11 Steps are the blueprint for putting our lives on a new basis.

"Just a passing thought. The A.A. program gives the soul-starved alcoholic a mental banquet in 12 courses. Take the courses IN THEIR PROPER ORDER starting with course (Step) number one and DON'T hurry

"That guy's thinking may be all right for him (though we doubt it) but even if he does stay dry himself he has revealed a selfishness which in itself, is a 100 to 1 shot to upset him in the long run.

"May we humbly submit that the guy who stays away from meetings simply because HE no longer needs them is shirking a solemn obligation inherent in A.A. doctrine. It is the duty of those of us who have enjoyed the benefits and blessings of A.A. to pass them on. It is not only our duty but, strangely enough, we must pass them on or we lose them ourselves."

'Dubuque Alanews', Dubuque, Ia.: "Tabloid biographical sketch"

High chair

High school

High position

High hat

High balls

High jinks

Hi, warden!"

'Central Bulletin', Cleveland, Ohio: The early pioneers have earned our everlasting gratitude for the adherence to the high standards set by Bill and Co. 'Just think,' one of our members said, 'how long would this have lasted had Bill and Doc lowered their standards a little and permitted one binge a year? A program like this would certainly still have been better than either of their records had shown before!"

"Yes, fortunately for us they set their standards high, and the entire philosophy has permeated into 30,000 families, probably, affecting the lives of from four to five times that many people. Just getting sober wasn't the answer. All of us had gotten sober by ourselves many, many times"and got drunk again. It was the application and absorption of each of the ever important 12 Steps that changed our decadent lives into purposeful ones."

'Rope Yarns', New York, N. Y.: "At the request of Major Nobile, commandant of the detention barracks at Fort Jay, four vets in our group (A.A. Seamen's club) went over. They had an audience of about 50"reception reserved at first but interested and enthusiastic at end. Pamphlets snapped up. Major Nobile keenly interested and wants

'The Paradox', Kansas City, Mo.- "What we are going to be in the future depends on what we do now. The future is a reflection of our thoughts and acts in the present. Sobriety, tolerance and creative thinking will build for us a peace of mind never to be found in a bottle."

'Camel Club Chronicle', Marshalltown, Ia.-"It will help us to make peace with ourselves if we realize that in this battle for self-discovery or recovery we need not emerge either a genius or a saint. It will be enough if we hang two comforting mottoes on the inner walls of our individual souls. First is, 'Respect yourself.' The second is 'Trust yourself.' Respect yourself with all your shortcomings and achievements. Trust yourself to master the undesirable traits of your character and to achieve both relative inner decency and outer confidence. Such knowledge and trust will tend to eliminate our all-too human tendency to self-contempt. They will be fertile sources of that true love of self, which neither exaggerates its powers nor minimizes its worth."

'The Clarion', California Institution for Women, Tehachapi-"There are those who wonder how A.A. can be of benefit inside an institution, in that we are of necessity physically dry. To be mentally dry is another story and it is upon that which we work, trying to remove the character structures which create problems in our everyday life."

'The A.A. Beacon', Victoria, B.C., Can.-"The enthusiasm and apparent insight shown by some patients at the beginning of treatment is not due to a true understanding, but is due to an alcoholic euphoria; it may be followed in a few weeks by revolt; only after that can full cooperation be expected."

'Alanews', Dubuque, Ia.-"Sponsorship is both an individual and a group responsibility. It is entirely unfair, impractical and even uncharitable to expect one or a few individuals to take care of every potential new member. Yet this happens all too often. When several persons are in need of help at the same time, no individual can give the necessary attention to any of the cases. Even the ordinary case requires special attention, not for a day, but for weeks. In many groups this process of rehabilitation of alcoholics is a continuous job, even if there are only a few candidates each month. When the sponsoring duties are left to, or are assumed by a few individuals, there's bound to be a notable lack of success. Sponsors, like anyone else, have businesses or jobs to attend to, and while they are willing to make any sacrifice called for, it is simply impractical and even imprudent to continue such sacrifices month after month and even year after year. Further, when the work often do the trick just as effectively. A feeling of a need for punishment and guilt are synonymous: one and the same. Mingle with this a fear of the consequences to follow and one has a diabolical poison in his system for which he must seek an antidote in a hurry. The antidote? Steps 10, 11 and 12 . . . if you want additional insurance for your sobriety, the 5th Step will add double indemnity."

'The Eye Opener', Los Angeles, Calif.-"After being a member of A.A. for a few months I often find myself wondering, when I hear the word 'dry' used, if there were others who, like myself, were on a 'dry' program. A.A. is not a 'dry' program. There's nothing arid about it; it is life itself-a life that teems with vitality; that is filled with serenity and happiness."

|||||

+++Message 1506. Grapevine A.A. Digest column, Nov. '47
From: NMOlson@aol.com 11/27/2003 2:58:00 AM

|||||

Nov. '47

A.A. Digest-Excerpts from Group Publications

'A.A. Tribune', Des Moines, Ia.-"At the house committee meeting last night we discussed sponsorship, and the lack of it, and how we are trying, with growing numbers, to hang onto close sponsorship. And then we also named several new men and women who came in on their own, who were not coddled, who just got from A.A. what we hoped they would get and they are doing such a wonderful job. We concluded that at least in some instances, if a man wants sobriety strongly enough, he'll get it with attendance at one meeting, whether he's chauffeured to the meeting or not and whether or not he's coddled into A. A."

'The Screwball', Nacogdoches, Tex.-"Are you willing to forget what you have done for other people and to remember what other people have done for you; to ignore what the world owes you and to think what you owe to the world; to put your rights in the background and your duties in the middle distance and your chances to do a little more than your duty in the foreground; to see that your fellowmen are just as real as you are and try to look behind their faces into their hearts; to own that probably the only good reason for your existence is not what you are going to get out of life, but what you are going to give to life; to close your book of complaints against the management of the universe and look around you for a place where community and to the alcoholics numbered in that citizenry. We do not believe that the group should operate as a missionary unit, either collectively or as individuals. We hardly have the time or the ability to ferret out all the alcoholics in a community; nor can we presume they would be willing to listen to us if we did. Nor yet can we sit back idly in the hope that anyone who needs our help will hear about us and come to us of his own accord. We can arrange to make our presence and our purposes known to the community. The public is interested and willing to learn."

|||||

++++Message 1508. Grapevine A.A. Digest column, Jan. '48
From: NMOlson@aol.com 11/29/2003 2:47:00 AM

|||||

Grapevine, Jan. '48

A.A. Digest-Excerpts from Group Publications

'Squad One', Washington, D. C.-"Eliminating, but not judging, those alcoholics who are not serious, it is possible that slips can be divided into two classes: (1) Those which happen during the first weeks or months and occasionally continue for a longer period. In this case it is probable that the member has not yet been blessed with the vital spirit of A.A., the spiritual experience, the personality change, the brand new happy attitude toward God, toward life and toward fellowmen; (2) Those which happen to a member who has been so blessed. In this case it is probable that the briefest and best answer is given by our book, 'Something has happened to his spiritual status.' "

'Blue Monday', Wooster, Oh.-"Each person on this earth has magnetic power. We have the power to draw friends and also to make our choice of friends. If we are drunk we are a strong magnet and draw many other drunks our way. If sober we draw sober persons. There is some power beyond the lives of men that draws them to nobler, higher living. When we live by God's will a stronger magnet than our own leads us through each day."

'The Screwball', Nacogdoches, Tex.-"There's a lot more to 12th Step work than picking someone out of the gutter and urging A.A. upon him. Every good deed, every kind attention, every worthy act is the result of your experience in A.A. and can rightly be termed good 12th Step work, as we see it."

'Twelve Stepper', Omaha, Neb.-"The good A.A. knows that the motive power of A.A. is the Higher Power. He has a firm intellectual conviction that this Higher Power deals with us through the ministry of A.A. He observes the two-fold rule of anonymity, never giving the name of another member without permission of that person, and realizing that we are but the messenger boys for carrying the word, the channels through which flow A.A. ideas."

'Alky Argot', Wisconsin State Prison.-"It seems to me that we must love ourselves not as a master but more as a servant. If we have accepted the 3rd Step we find the key to the self-centered evil in our lives. Using this key is a permanent life-time protection against ending up in a bouquet of table flowers. We are now working for the betterment of ourselves with an ally whose advice is medicine for the soul. Now we can be free by breaking the vicious circle of our egocentricity and substituting a new nucleus in His all-embracing love."

'Alanews', Dubuque, Ia.-"It is during those first weeks, or months, of a man's sobriety that the ladies face their most difficult test. A male in the drying up process is not a very companionable person. The fact that the little woman may be suffering from fainting spells, malnutrition, muscle twitching and nervous prostration is a set of minor inconveniences not to be mentioned lest it disturb his majesty. After all, he has no remembrance of the past 20 years. All he remembers is his regal role of the past three weeks. It's tough, girls, but you've got to remember that at this stage the old boy considers a woman as something that boils at nothing, freezes in a minute, highly explosive; in inexperienced hands, something that can't be avoided because she exists wherever man is found. We know a lot of you have put up with 20 years of hell. And we praise the Lord that you are and were kind to us, especially during those first few months. Few of us, maybe none of us, would have made the grade if it had not been for your long suffering, your tolerance and understanding. None of us deserves any special consideration for going sober, but the fact that you are and were considerate is one of the reasons. We especially hope that all of the wives of the new men will profit by your example. We know that none of you will get much of a reward on earth but the great St. Anonymous has informed us that there's a special heaven waiting for you."

'Aridity Review', Spencer, Ia.-"Speaking of slips, which we don't like to do, we are always going to have them. We must remember at all times that our membership is comprised solely of alcoholics and everyone knows that God only knows what an alcoholic is likely to do. It is important for our own safety that we do not let the other fellow's slip upset us too much. Sympathize with him, yes; try to help him get back on the beam if, as, and when he decides that he wants to come back. But, we must never let a friend's slip send us haywire to a slip of our own or what good will we be to him when the time comes when he again needs our help?"

'The Paradox', Kansas City, Mo.-"One A.A. was recently heard to say that he did not have the multiplicity of troubles hanging over him that is customary for most neophytes to bring to A.A. for solution. His wife had left him, the mortgage company had taken his home, the finance company had picked up his car, he had lost his job, his health was ruined and he was overdrawn at the bank. Drinking was his only problem."

|||||

++++Message 1509. Grapevine A.A. Digest, "48
From: NMOlson@aol.com 11/30/2003 2:27:00 AM

|||||

Grapevine, Feb. '48

A.A. Digest -Excerpts from Group Publications

'The Visitor', F.C.I., Sandstone, Minn. -"I've tried many different reforms, churches and institutions in my pursuit for truth, but as yet, I have found none which gives the satisfactory answers to the questions I naturally put to them. Actual faith in anything which does not come under the feeling of my own two hands is extremely difficult for me because I can't believe in things which to me are magical promises. The greater power which guides me is an A.A. member who has maintained sobriety for a decade. He is the living proof that I will have peace of mind and contentment for as long as I want it. He is stronger than I. He is a power greater than I. I look up to him, not in adoration as one would to a God, but in humble respect. I can only respect A.A. members and earnestly strive to imitate them."

'The Brighter Side', Waterloo, Iowa -"Remember, someone needs us for a friend. Let us be that friend. Remember always those who were good to us in those dark days at the start while we were still picking up pieces of our personality and trying to fit them into new and lasting forms. Once we do that, we have cast off the old shell of self-pity and self-interest and we begin to care deeply about what happens to others. When we learn to be happy in their happiness, hurt with their hurt, we are delivered from all indifference to others. Thus A.A. lights the lamps and charts the sea so unhappy, distressed folk can find the way to a higher, joyful life of sobriety."

'Aridity Review', Spencer, Iowa-"As a thought for the week let your editor repeat the statement on membership printed in 1939 in the first edition of the Big Book: 'The only requirement for membership is an honest desire to stop drinking.' And there is no provision setting us up as judges of the sick man's honesty of desire. We can, and must, assume that his openly expressed desire is honest and go on from there to help him as we can to accomplish the same end for himself which has been such a miracle for those of us who are more fortunate in that we have been the recipients of the A.A. miracle. In one word, tolerance, not just when a man comes to us at first, but every minute of our lives."

'Alky Argot', Wisconsin State Prison -"A good business man advertises his wares, either sending a salesman out or going out to solicit business himself. In either case, he benefits. After an A.A. member has reached the point where he is thoroughly familiar with the working principle of his organization he can advance himself by securing new customers, thereby guaranteeing his success for the future. So you see, A.A. is a sound business, a good one, and it's ours for the taking. We need no capital or investment, yet we can establish ourselves in the prosperous business of right living if only we heed the voice of opportunity."

'The Weekly', Jefferson City, Mo. "Did you ever raise a child from a handful of scrawny, squalling humanity to a full grown individual, to fit himself into his little niche in this universe and live the life of a normal citizen in his community? Did it give you a thrill? Well, we have the same feeling of thankfulness, only intensified, nearly every time we attend an A.A. meeting, just to know that we have some little part in helping a fellow man onto the broad, bright road of the A.A. way of living. Would I miss it? I'm going to make a good hard try to help another one today. I don't mean just stand around and talk about it. I mean I'm going to contact someone who wants what we have and try to help him get it."

'The Screwball', Nacogdoches, Texas -"Time heals the scars of sorrow and erases or glosses over the memory of pain and suffering of the dying, but for the alcoholic there seems to be no surcease from living suffering and no solace in dying. He is the epitome of misery. But, my fellow sufferer, the alcoholic does have a friend. We can find comfort for our miseries; the balm of Gilead for our soul is available. Why do we say there is hope of such a friend? Because we know, for we have found Him!"

'Rope Yarns', Seaman's Club, New York -"A.A. is the personification of democracy, for in A.A. all are equal, all are given the same chance to help themselves. Each one can speak his mind, do his part, is, that we are willing to grow along spiritual lines. The principles we have set down are guides to progress. We claim spiritual progress rather than spiritual perfection."

'Thought Starter', Minneapolis, Minn.: "Consulting engineers employed to study defects in a big factory system usually make their notes on their first visit. They know that on later visits they will be less observant. The reason most of us are slow to correct our own faults or habits is that we have ceased to notice them."

'Weekly', Jefferson City (Mo.): "When everybody thinks alike, nobody thinks."

'Camel Club Chronicle', Marshalltown, Iowa: "Making friends reminds me of a little dog that trotted up to me wagging his tail as though he was genuinely happy to see me. I leaned over and patted him and he was overjoyed. I wondered just how many friends he made in a day, probably more than I make in a year; yet he had never read any books on psychology, but by the divine instinct, he was interested in people."

'Rope Yarn', Seamen's Club, New York City: "My Blarney lies over the sea. A sea of suds. That's the way it is. When we are hanging over a bar we are the most wonderful people in the world. What a sparkling wit we have! What wonderful repartee! After a few drinks, how brilliant we can be! It really is amazing how so much brains could be contained in one head! But next morning it appears more amazing still how such a headache could be contained in one head. Truly the way of the transgressor is hard, and this is most true of the poor drunk. But virtue actually can be its own reward and a clear head is the reward we get for being sober, and it is not the only one."

'The Screwball', Nacogdoches, Texas: "Don't be alarmed if you fail to catch the full vision of A.A. like a bolt from the blue. Was not your full-fledged plunge into the limbo of alcoholism a progressive business from an occasional social drink to absolute drunkenness? Wouldn't it be just as reasonable if your final, richer, more complete A.A. experience came about by easy stages -- from the first glimpse of the happy way to its ultimate fruition? ... One of the main reasons for anonymity in A.A. is that it helps those who need aid most. It also helps to keep the guy who decides to quit A.A. and go back to his old drinking ways from being pointed out as a 'bright and shining example' of A.A."

'The Paradox', Kansas City, Mo.: "Alcoholics Anonymous -- Analysis & Adjustment. To the explanation of the initials A.A., which we use to describe our association . . . we might well add the terms 'analysis' and 'adjustment'; for no matter what method we use to velocity. That gave him the opportunity to attend our evening meeting. During the meeting I was looking over my portfolio (an old shoe box that I keep for the club correspondence) and in it I found a letter from a lady at Grundy Center -- just one of those pitiful letters that we get all the time. This lady wanted us to write and have someone call on her father in Birmingham, Ala. And what do you know -- the flying member who was grounded was from Birmingham, Ala. I know it's easy to say that the wind velocity that grounded the flier, thus allowing him to attend the meeting, was coincidence, BUT I prefer to think it is something else. And, with a call that got a start like that one, I'll be willing to wager that the man will make A.A. Any takers?"

'A.A. Deacon', Victoria, B. C.-"There is not a member of A.A., who is really sincere, who has not had experiences which, looked upon in the proper light, cannot help but have a lesson to teach to someone. This lesson cannot be taught -- or learned -- if we continue to remain silent and only listen to the other fellow. Everyone must have some sort of an opinion and idea on the philosophy of Alcoholics Anonymous -- if he hasn't he had better get one in a hurry -- and that idea or opinion will surely be of benefit to someone else. If we refuse to give these thoughts to others we are either being very selfish -- and selfishness can soon return us to drinking -- or we are hanging on to our original self-consciousness which is a result of the inferiority complex which originally had to do with the start of our problem, and if we continue to hang on to it and do nothing to rectify it we are very apt to be drinking again."

|||||

+++Message 1512. AA History Lovers "Doctors, Alcoholics, Addicts" Questions
From: Ildog 12/2/2003 12:40:00 PM

|||||

I was told, "Expectations are pre-meditated resentments" and was referred to page 552 of the story "Doctor, Alcoholic, Addict." (In the current 4th edition it is called "Acceptance was the Answer " and is on page 420). QUESTION: What was this story called when it was published originally in The Grapevine? Question: page 552 of the story "Doctor, Alcoholic, Addict, what edition of the Big Book is this in? Was it published under a different title?

Thank you,
Jane

Ildog@prodigy.net

Answer " and is on page 420). QUESTION: What was this story called when it was published originally in The Grapevine?
Question: page 552 of the story "Doctor, Alcoholic, Addict, what edition of the Big Book is this in? Was it published under a different title?

Thank you,
Jane

Ildog@prodigy.net

To unsubscribe from this group, send an email to:
AAHistoryLovers-unsubscribe@yahoogroups.com

Your use of Yahoo! Groups is subject to the Yahoo! Terms of Service [2] .

=====

+++Message 1515. Grapevine Clip Sheet column, Jan. '46
From: NMOlson@aol.com 12/4/2003 3:23:00 AM

=====

This begins another thin slice of A.A. history, the Clip Sheet columns from the Grapevine, Jan. '46 through April '48, courtesy of Tony C.

Nancy

The Grapevine, Jan. '46

The Clip Sheet, Comments from the Public Press

"Four per cent of the nation's drinkers are chronic alcoholics,' said the Associated Press in a release from Syracuse, Dec. 14. The AP was reporting an address by Prof. Selden Bacon, chairman of Connecticut's new Board for the Study, Care and Treatment of Inebriates, made before the New York State Conference on Social Welfare. Dr. Bacon was quoted as saying that 50,000,000 Americans indulged in alcoholic beverages to some extent and 2,000,000 were alcoholic."

From the New York "Herald-Tribune," Dec. 14:

"Children of alcoholic or psychotic parents, placed in foster homes at an early age, have as good a chance as children of normal parents of becoming well adjusted adults, it is indicated in a recent study published at Yale University.

The "Herald-Tribune" was reporting on a paper written by Dr. Anne Roe of Yale University and the late Dr. Barbara Burks, entitled, "Adult Adjustment of Foster Children of Alcoholic and Psychotic Parentage and the Influence of the Foster Home."

The newspaper noted that "the actual conclusions of the study are confined to 78 children placed 20 years ago in foster homes," and continued: "No child of psychotic parentage was found psychotic ... no child of alcoholic parentage was found alcoholic...."

"It can be concluded," the report stated, "that such parentage does not preclude good adjustment. ..."

Ann Arbor, Mich., "Tribune": "Women alcoholics, increasing so rapidly in the last few years, have become such a serious medical and social problem that many leading physicians and psychiatrists have joined together in a survey and study of the situation. Twenty-five years ago there was only one woman alcoholic to 25 men alcoholics. Today the ratio is one woman to six men, taking a cross country figure. A reliable checkup, made by a director of the Psychiatric Institute of the Municipal Court in Chicago, shows that in about 12 years women and men drunkards appearing before the court increased in ratio from one to five to an alarming comparison of one to two.

"Psychiatrists are of the opinion that women's nerves and brains degenerate more rapidly with constant drinking because of a more sensitive nervous system. The woman alcoholic might feel helpless and hopeless. But if she wants to follow a program that will insure sobriety she should contact Alcoholics Anonymous. ..."

|||||

+++Message 1516. Re: Origin of BB prayers
From: archives31 12/5/2003 2:03:00 PM

|||||

--- In AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com, "Maria E. Hoffman" <jhoffma6@t...> wrote:

> A question has come up in discussion: Is it written anywhere the origin or inspiration for our Third Step Prayer pg. 63 and our Seventh Step Prayer pg. 76? Were these products of Bill's creative writing, or were they found elsewhere?

>

> We would appreciate any input on this.

> Thanks,

> Maria

in aa comes of age bill wrote about sending the original form of book to the catholic publishing in new york. they suggestd he take the word heaven out and keep utopia in at the end of his story, but he also said that they made some suggestions in regards to prayers which he found helpful and used them. so maybe some of the prayers came from that source. hope this is in some way helpful to your question in friendship and fellowship archives31.

=====

++++Message 1517. "3rd Step" prayer
From: Ted Cullen 12/5/2003 8:25:00 PM

=====

I recall somewhere reading in the GSO NY archives when I as there last, that when asked about that prayer and if Bill wrote it or nor not , Lois W replied that she thought not, as 'Bill was not in the habit of doing same' or something along those lines. As for the name "Third Step Prayer" (a misnomer), the prayer encompasses ALL of the Steps. It APPEARS on page 63 of the BB where the Third Step is described.

=====

++++Message 1518. Grapevine Clip Sheet column, Feb. '46
From: NMOlson@aol.com 12/6/2003 2:53:00 AM

=====

Grapevine, Feb. '46

The Clip Sheet

Worry Clinic

Atlantic City, N. J., "Press": "We need to launch a new society called N.N. or 'Neurotics National' so that millions of 'Worry Birds' and other psychoneurotics will realize they have a lot of company. This is one of the first benefits received by the drunkard who looks around at the large gathering of Alcoholics Anonymous that pack the auditorium."

The Clip Sheet

Betting On the Drunk

By Wireless to the "New York Times": "STOCKHOLM, Sweden -Sweden is a land ... of many odd ways.

"Today's example: The population of Sandhult County in western Sweden is taking up a collection for the first drunk to qualify for lodging in the new county jail.

"That part of Sweden is virtually crimeless, and an inebriate is the district's only hope to inaugurate the new lock-up. The village drunk in Sjoemarken, where the jail is situated, is the logical favorite to win the jackpot, but he has said he will be back, hoping the fund will grow bigger."

Aid New Clinic

Washington, D. C., "Times-Herald": "Eight new patients and six who were formerly treated at the Force School presented themselves as willing subjects for an alcoholic cure when the Polk Health Center Alcoholic Clinic for Negroes went into operation January 15.

"Cooperating with the new clinic is the Washington Negro Group of Alcoholics Anonymous, which meets Fridays and Sundays at 8:30 p.m. in the Y.M.C.A, at 1816 Twelfth St. NW. The group supplies volunteer clerical help for the clinic, and alcoholics who require group therapy are referred to the organization by the doctors."

We Know-We Paid and Paid

Phoenix, Ariz., "Arizona Republic": "King Alcohol, with his satellites, beer, wine, and whiskey, is the largest single source of federal revenue, if the income tax be excluded.

"Last year, government taxes from this source totaled $2,300,000,000."

Alcoholic, Not Anonymous

Brockton, Mass., "Enterprise & Times": "A desk officer at police headquarters jovially inquired of a jocose 'guest' why he was visiting,

" '0, just a bit alcoholic, I suppose, but for the sake of the record, I'm not anonymous,' came the smart reply. 'For the sake of and massages. I had to look rich and that was some job. I haven't worked so hard since. My husband belonged to three golf courses, I belonged to three bars, and I never let his golf interfere with my drinking. I had terrible hangovers but I'd take care of them with the hair of the dog that bit me. I kept a stash of booze in a roasting pan in the kitchen. I made sure I always had a backup.

I couldn't stop drinking and I knew it; I also knew that I'd drink for the rest of my life. I loved to drink. I only felt normal when I drank; when I wasn't drinking, I felt very, very weird. When I came into AA, they asked me if I took a morning drink.

"No," I said, "I don't get up in the morning. But I take a drink as soon as I get up."

My sister Katharine tried everything to get me sober. One day she came to my house with a chocolate cake; a doctor had told her that what alcoholics really wanted was sugar not booze. So there I was in bed, about halfway through a bottle, and I couldn't wait to get rid of Katharine and she knew it. "If you'll eat a piece of this cake," she said, "I'll leave you to your drinking." "I can't eat the cake," I said,

"but give me the Manhattan telephone directory -- there's an outfit in New York called Alcoholics Anonymous that has a bead on this drinking thing. I'll call them and see what they do." Then Katharine told me that her husband's best friend was an A.A. member, and she asked me if I'd like to see him. I said yes just to get her out of the room.

I don't know how it happened, but I didn't finish that bottle, and somehow I got up, got dressed, and waited for Mr. A.A. He didn't show then and he didn't show the next day. On the third day, I called my sister and said, "Where is this genius who's going to stop my drinking?" She said, "He and his fellow members are discussing whether or not you qualify for AA." I had a short fuse, and I was incensed that anyone would think I wasn't eligible for A.A. Later, the man's ten-year-old son came over with the Big Book in a brown paper bag; he shoved it at me and ran. I liked children, and I was disturbed that he was so scared of me.

I read the book from cover to cover; I couldn't put it down. I saw myself on every page. And the stories: I could see that the way they drank was the way I drank. I could see that it had gone bad on them and I knew it had gone bad on me too. I put the book in the fireplace behind the logs -- it was summertime -- because I didn't want anyone in the house to read it and decide I ought to join. I didn't want to join. I had looked at the Twelve Steps and I didn't think a spiritual way of life was for me.

I continued to drink until the fall of that year. Then one morning I was having a very hard time of it, and I called my brother-in-law's friend, the A.A. member. "You know," I told him, "I read that entire book. I know all there is to know about alcoholism; I'm very well informed. So how come I'm still drinking?" He didn't answer my question, but he asked me if I'd like to go to a meeting that night. I said, "I don't know. What's it like?" He said, "Everyone there will be just like you -- an alcoholic.

You'll feel very comfortable." I said, "What do they look like?" and he said, "They look just like you." "Well," I said, "they must be gorgeous!"

I went with him to the meeting. There weren't any women. This was 1944 and there were maybe a total of three or four women in New York, and that was it. There were six men at this meeting -- three lawyers, a butcher, a cop, and a guy who worked in a malt factory who said he couldn't stay sober because the malt went into his pores. That was solved easily enough -- we got him another job. I loved it; they were wonderful men. I decided that they were far too wonderful to have to stay sober. "Give me three months," I told them, "and I'll get us all out of this." I thought that if we had all crossed over this invisible line, I could find that line and we could all cross back again! They knew I was an alcoholic and they just let me go about my business.

Taking it on the road

I decided to do some research, to interview AA members. There weren't many meetings in those days; you had to travel. I covered a radius of about 100 miles, which included Manhattan, Long Island, Westchester County, Albany, and parts of New Jersey and Connecticut. I'd go to meetings, listen to the stories, pick the best one, and interview that person. This was hard work and I was plenty thirsty -- it was nuts. In about three months, I came to the conclusion that:

1. It was the first drink that activated the obsession -- if I took that first drink, I was gone.

2. Alcoholism is progressive -- once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic.

I talked it over with the membership. I told them yes, I knew I would have to quit, but I was only thirty-one and I wanted to wait until I was in my forties. They didn't tell me no. They told me to put my car up on blocks -- don't drive. A fellow who happened to be a guard at a woman's hospital told me that if I landed in jail, he knew someone who could get me out. Meanwhile, this thing kept hammering in my brain: "What are you waiting for? What are you waiting for?"

Suddenly I decided it would be a good idea if I became a member of A.A.. I wrote an acceptance note, like you would do for a wedding invitation: "Nancy O. accepts with pleasure the kind invitation of Alcoholics Anonymous to become a member." Along with the acceptance, I put a clean piece of paper that would be a letter of resignation if I slipped (everyone in those days talked about slips because a lot of us were slipping).

Nobody ever gave me a hard time, nobody tried to reform me. How smart can you get? They knew how it was with me because they knew how it was with themselves. It was love. And all of sudden -- sober now -- there was this tug at my heart, the love of one alcoholic for another. ...

I'll remember you for the rest of my life:

At three months I had to speak -- everybody did. I had to go over to Jersey. I was sick and nervous, throwing up all day, and I called Lois K., my sponsor, and asked, "Why is this good for alcoholics?" She said, "You're thinking about impressing them tonight -- that's not the purpose. The purpose is to help one other person in the room, if you can." When I spoke that night, I told the group what my sponsor had said and how nervous I felt. After the meeting, a blind woman came up and asked me, "May I feel your face?" She touched my face and she said, "I knew you looked like that. I'll remember you for the rest of my life." I went home and cried for an hour and a half, to think that I could help someone who was blind and in an alcoholic mess. For the first time in my life, I realized I had done something worthwhile. That was my first taste of humility.

Working with others

When I was new, I was the only woman around, so team leaders would call me up to be on their team to speak with them. My family was having fits because I was doing this, and finally they said to me, "Nobody has ever disgraced us like this." I said, "No, we all died, and I want to live." One person said to me, "It's like wearing a sign on your back, Nancy." Well, I took exception to that, so I went out and bought a fire-engine-red dress. Whenever I spoke, I'd say, "The reason I'm wearing this red dress is because there might be a woman around, and I don't want her to miss me in the crowd. I just want her to know I'm here, I'm for her, and I'm with her."

Lois K. had been sober for four years when she became my sponsor. She lived in White Plains, and I lived in Yonkers; I asked her if I could call her and that started the relationship. We were in touch every day, and we did a lot of Twelfth Step work together, helping women in Westchester County, and it was hard. The first women's meeting was at my house. It was Lois who came up with idea for the Grapevine. Lois was also very involved with her sponsor, Marty M., and the National Council on Alcoholism. I could have been, but I never cared for the idea. I liked working with alcoholics in AA better.

My group was very active working with alcoholics in jails and hospitals and mental hospitals. One day I went to see a woman in the hospital, and on my way out, her psychiatrist asked to speak to me. He told me that his parents had spent thousands of dollars on his education, and the woman I'd just seen wouldn't say two words to him. He wanted to know why he was failing and I was succeeding. I told him that I had a story and he didn't. He had the education, but I was an alcoholic with a story that she identified with and understood. I talked to the woman, told her to cooperate with the doctor, and maybe she could be helped by him. I did Twelfth Step work with this doctor for five years; we did a lot of good work with alcoholics. I said to him, "Don't ask them why they drink. They don't know. They expect you to know, and you don't know either -- nobody does. So don't ask them."

Keeping it green

I'd give people the Big Book and tell them to read what I'd underlined because I knew they wouldn't read the whole book at first. I'd underline parts like the jaywalker, the Steps, "no human power," and anything I thought they could identify with. This would prompt them to go on and read the rest of the book, and then they'd call me. It helped me a great deal, and it still helps me. It keeps my sobriety green, it keeps it alive. I'm not one who says, Let the newcomers do it. There's plenty of work for old-timers. I haven't been into jails for a while, but I'm still doing hospital work.

The second woman I ever sponsored was a prostitute. She was always landing in jail, and they would remand her to my custody. I didn't care that she was a prostitute but I did care that she was an alcoholic. One time I called the jail to tell her I'd come and pick her up. "Wait 'til this afternoon," she said, "I'm playing cards with the warden and I have him on the hook for a few dollars." After she got sober and embarked on a spiritual way of life, her life began to change. She got a job, and later she moved to a new place, where nobody knew her, and started a group. Another gal I went to see in jail greeted me with, "St. Paul was in jail, you know." "Yeah," I said, "but not for burning tents." She was in because she had burned her apartment and been labeled a pyromaniac. I explained to her jailers that she was an alcoholic -- possibly a pyromaniac too but definitely an alcoholic. I'd been to her apartment and taken out a bushel basket full of bottles from underneath her mattress. She was a schoolteacher, a very, very quiet woman. I took her to meetings with me, and then she went back home to start a group of her own. That's how AA grew in those days. That's how we helped each other.

Once a man came over from Bronxville to ask our group to help him start a group there. During the discussion that followed, someone said, "There are too many snobs in Bronxville. Nobody will come to a group there." I said, "I don't see why snobbery should carry the death penalty. I think we should give this man our support." Later on the man thanked me, and when I asked why he was thanking me, he said, "Because I'm a Bronxville snob."

Growing through trial and error

At this time, we called AA a loosely-knit organization. I said, "It's so loosely knit we're all going to fall through!" It wasn't an organization because nobody could organize us. We wouldn't accept any outside contributions because we didn't want anyone telling us what to do. There were no leaders, so we had to figure it out for ourselves, and that was mighty difficult.

There were many differences of opinion, and that's the way the Fellowship grew. Let someone get a resentment and we'd have a new group! For instance, there was a woman who baked a cake every week; we called it a nut cake -- good name for it! -- but some people didn't think it was a good idea, so we had a controversy over this foolish cake. Those who wanted the cake stayed, and those who didn't, left and started another group.

I remember I called my first sponsor one time and exclaimed, "I don't know what I'm doing!" "None of us do," she replied. We used to take alcoholics off stools in bars and bring them to meetings drunk. Finally somebody said, "I don't think we're doing the right thing." And then the publicity problems -- alcoholics bragging about how they saved this one and that one. We made a lot of mistakes. On the basis of our mistakes, Bill W. put together the Twelve Traditions. He did it with a whole lot of help from all of us. The early members brought us one Tradition at a time, in the long form -- for our group conscience and vote. We discussed each one, took out anything that we didn't want, made amendments, and then voted. I consider the Twelve Traditions to be the foundation of AA. There were a great many other things that contributed to this foundation, but this was the first really progressive step for our Fellowship.

A twenty-four-hour program

When I was about seven years sober, I started doing Twelfth Step work with alcoholics who were in relapse, and I did this exclusively for the next seven years. The first question I would ask someone was, "Were you on the twenty-four-hour program?" I never got a yes.

You work differently with relapsers; they've been around AA, they know people, they know open meetings, they know closed meetings, they know names.

Sometimes they're well-known because they used to do a lot of Twelfth Step work themselves. When I was living in Westchester, I'd pick people up and take them into Manhattan to one of the big meetings. This was 1951 or later. I'd say, "We're going to sit in the back; never mind the speaker, just look around the room and tell yourself that all these people are getting sober. They don't know me, they've never seen me before in their lives, they're just getting sober the way I am. And if I practice the AA program, I'll get sober too." I would never talk about anything except getting reestablished as a member of A.A. that and the twenty-four-hour program -- and so I was forced to practice it.

There's probably nothing more important than a home group. I've been going to the same home group since I moved to California, thirteen years ago. I couldn't have gotten sober without a home group. What I like about a home group is this: you never have to make a decision, it's automatic. You know that's where you're going. This is where the Twelfth Step gets fulfilled, in all meetings really, but particularly in the home group. That's where we reach out to newcomers, we greet people. Everything comes out of the home group: invitations to speak, people to sponsor, being active in AA -- it all comes out of the home group.

From wagon trains to jets

I sometimes get asked if AA has changed since I first encountered it, and I think how, when I came in, people were fascinated by the wagon train feeling of AA -- that we were small, and all knew one another, and were close despite our differences. Now it's like the Concorde jet. It's fast. People come in, they get sober or they go out, they get busy with life, they move away, they go to other groups. When I came in, the membership was estimated at 5,000. Today you and I are members of an international Fellowship of more than two million alcoholics. Think about that! When we go to sleep tonight, there will be alcoholics working with each other somewhere in the world. It never stops. That's a long way from 1944, when I came in. One thing will never change, though: I need you just as much as you need me. We need each other -- and our Higher Power. That's where the strength is.

Nancy O., Lafayette, Calif.

statistics show 2,700 women arrested for drunkenness last year," continues Neff. "That the problem is nationwide as well as local is indicated by an article in the February 'American Mercury' by Dr. Alson J. Smith, a pastor of St. Paul's Methodist Church in Brooklyn.

"Dr. Smith writes, 'many a homecoming soldier is returning to face a problem he never suspected -- his wife, or sweetheart or sister has become an alcoholic.'"

Obsolete and Inadequate

Antigo, Wis., "Journal": "For many years it has been recognized by those who have given thought to the problem of treatment of alcoholics that state legislation and institutional facilities are sadly inadequate and way behind modern knowledge of how alcoholics should be treated. But one state, Connecticut, has ventured to take a real forward step through adoption of a law for the study, treatment and care of inebriates. Prof. Selden D. Bacon of Yale University calls it 'the first new legislation designed to meet the problem of alcoholism.'

"Important features of the law singled out by Prof. Bacon are: 'It recognized that alcoholics are sick people ... the fact that alcoholics can be rehabilitated ... a responsibility on the part of the government to meet this problem. It calls for public education on the subject of alcoholism, It omits all mention of punishment as a means of controlling the problem. ... It offers free service to those requesting it. ... If Wisconsin intends to move forward in this field its legislators, judges and others should not only study the Connecticut law but also the valuable knowledge obtained by such organizations as Alcoholics Anonymous.'"

Alcoholic Vets May Get Help

Dallas, Tex., "News": The Veterans Administration is considering offering care to alcoholics in its hospitals, Mrs. Marty Mann, executive secretary of the National Committee for Education on Alcoholism, said here.

VA officials have been giving serious study to plans proposed by the national committee, she said, and have expressed a favorable reaction.

29,000 Alkies in Jersey

New York "Herald Tribune": New Jersey should establish state-operated centers to aid its estimated 29,000 chronic alcoholics, two Rutgers University sociologists said recently. ...

I never thought much about settling down. I thought anyone who got under the dominance of another human being was pretty foolish, but when I was twenty-nine I did get married. I was never trained to live with anyone else, and I took on a pretty big job I wasn't capable of handling. After I was married I was in much more trouble with myself and I drank a great deal more, but now I had someone to blame it on. All my life I had blamed everything that ever happened to me on someone else, and I usually could find someone. Now I had a husband. If I was drinking worse now, it must be his fault.

One night I was out drinking by myself, which I didn't do as a rule. I sat in a bar drinking martinis for a long time, and somewhere on the way home I fell down in the street, and a cop came along and picked me up and took me to St. Vincent's Hospital. They pronounced me drunk and disorderly and took me over to Bellevue.

When I came to the next morning, I was in the psychopathic ward. The doctor who tested me and asked me a few personal questions was a psychiatrist. I asked him to call where I worked and tell them I wouldn't be in. I thought they'd just give me my clothes and let me leave quietly. They told me that I was not able to go out on the street alone, that I was not a responsible citizen. They said someone would have to call for me. To someone as arrogant as I was, who had taken care of herself, that was kind of rough.

I thought I would never get in such a situation again, and I thought the way to get over it would be not to drink. I was so naive that I thought that would be possible--just by wishing not to drink! I didn't take a drink for three months, but on

New Year's Eve everybody was drinking, and about two-thirty in the morning I started. In about one hour I was drunker than anyone there. I kicked someone in the shins and slammed the door on his fingers. I knew I shouldn't be drinking, and I was scared to death. I was in real trouble. I didn't know why I was drinking, and I didn't know why my behavior had changed so. I thought if I left my husband things would be different. I thought I would be different if I could live by myself again. Which I did -- and proceeded to drink worse than ever before.

Then I decided that I was in trouble because I was living in New York and everyone knew me, and I used to drink too much with people, and maybe I didn't know the right people. So I moved away. I never thought about changing myself, I always thought about changing people, or changing places.

I went down to Virginia, of all places, to stop drinking. I was down there one month when I bumped into a fellow I knew from Greenwich Village who was on the same army post. We were glad to see each other, and he invited me out, and I said, "Oh, I can't go out. I don't drink any more." I really thought if you didn't drink, you couldn't go out! And he said, "Oh, that's all right. Come on over to the club and have a few beers." And I said, "Well, that I can do." About midnight that night, when they wanted to close up the club, they announced that if anybody was missing his companion, she was in the ladies' room, passed out. That was me, in my brand new environment, with the right people!

So I left there and went to another army post, where some Red Cross workers took me out on a date with some British officers. I got drunk with the British officers, and I don't need to tell you what I told the British officers, I being Irish. I left the next day, telling my boss that I needed a very serious operation, and he agreed with me. I never had the courage to wait to be fired. I left every place I'd ever been. I ran away from life. I never knew myself until I got into AA.

I had heard about AA about a year before I came in, but I thought it was some organization that helped you out financially, and I was always too independent for that. But on June 1, 1945, I had lost all of that kind of independence. I had been drunk for nine days, sick and alone and desperate. They didn't have to tell me that alcoholism was a sickness. When you take a bottle and lock that door and go in by yourself, that is death.

This day I decided to give up. I don't know why you give up one day and not another -- I have never been able to understand that. I had suffered on drunks before, but as they explained it to me in AA, that particular day I hit bottom. I decided to call up AA, but I didn't know that the clubhouse didn't open until noon. So I kept drinking and calling up, and drinking and calling up. Finally, I got someone on the telephone, and I told her I was in trouble and asked what I should do. The girl asked me if I could walk. And I said to myself, "My God, how understanding! Somebody who knows that you couldn't walk and why you couldn't walk!" I said to her, "I don't know, I haven't tried." She said, "Well, the only reason I ask is, if you can't we'll come over to you." And I reared up in all my arrogance and I said, "You'll never come to me, but I'll go to you!" It took me until four o'clock that day to get there.

I shall never forget how comforted I felt that there was a building, there was a place, there were people who were interested in what was wrong with me. I walked in that door and the girl asked me my name, and I said, "I'd rather not give you my name." She said, "We don't care if you haven't got a name, just so you have an alcoholic problem!" Well, I was put to shame, and I told her my name. She assigned me to another girl who took me upstairs. I looked into this girl's eyes, and I thought, "If only my eyes would ever be that clear again, then I'd be grateful for that alone." Little did I ever think that many more things would happen to me than clear eyes.

The first thing I learned that day was that if I never took another drink I would never have another problem with alcohol. That went over in my mind like a Victrola record. I had never thought about that first drink. I had schemed and stolen drinks, but it was never the first one. And here I had a very simple problem -- one drink, and that's all I was able to understand.

About seven o'clock someone came over to this girl and asked her to speak at a meeting in Brooklyn. I was scared this girl would leave me. It was the first time in my life I ever had needed someone, and I knew it. I looked at her to see what she would say. She looked at me and said, "Would you like to go to Brooklyn?" I don't like to go to Brooklyn when I'm cold sober! But I wanted to stay sober, and I went to Brooklyn. I don't know who spoke first, last, or what, but someone got up and said he had been in Bellevue thirty-five times. I thought, "Oh, my God! I'll look like St. Cecilia here!" I was so glad to be able to tell this dark secret that I had had for eight years that I nudged a man alongside of me and said, "Mister, do you know I was in Bellevue once?" He said, "Okay, girlie, you'll get the program." I guess he figured I was just another psycho!

The next day I started back for the clubhouse. On my way over, that thick head of mine started saying to me, "I don't know that you're such a drunk. I think you're far too dramatic about this whole thing. Why do you have to go over there with that bunch of people?" I was walking along a Bowery sort of street, with music playing and those awful neon lights all around, and suddenly a little man started to follow me. Not the kind of man that follows nice girls. And suddenly I said to myself, "Listen, Toots, there's something the matter with you when a guy like that follows you, and you better get over to the clubhouse and find out what it is!" I always like to say that on my second day I was "wolfed" into AA.

I had heard that I had to make amends, and do something good for someone -- that I was too self-centered. I thought of a girl friend who had a brand new baby, and she liked to get drunk on Saturday night. And I thought, "That'll be it. That'll be good." I called her up and told her I'd mind the baby while she went out and got drunk. That's how much I knew about doing good! The next day I called my boss and told what happened to me and asked if she would take me back to work. It was the first time in my life that I ever showed any sort of humility, that I ever asked anybody for anything. And I went back there to work. I learned that going back and facing something unpleasant, regardless of how tough it is at the time, is a lot easier than running away.

I went to meetings every night in the week, because I'm that kind of person. I either do a thing or I don't do it. I didn't have to give up very much, because my life before AA was very empty, very lonely, and very superficial. Then I was always afraid of being a sucker, for some unknown reason -- I always thought people were taking advantage of me.

One day a call came in to the clubhouse for someone to go out and do a Twelfth Step job. And they looked at me and said, "How long are you in?" and I said, "A week or so." And they said, "Oh, you can't go. You have to be sober three months." And then I realized that here I had spent all my life afraid that people were trying to get something out of me, and I had nothing to give! Now I was in an organization where they needed someone that had something I didn't have; someone who was sober three months, who had some sort of stability; someone that had kindness in their hearts for other human beings, and compassion for their suffering. I had to wait until these people gave it to me so that I could go out and give it away.

Then I began to have trouble with myself, and I went to see Dr. Silkworth and he explained to me what honesty was. I always thought honesty had something to do with telling other people the truth. He explained that it had to do first with telling myself the truth. I spent most of my life worrying about myself, thinking that I was unwanted, that I was unloved. I've learned since being in AA that the more I worry in one clubhouse.

GV: It was a small world, wasn't it?

Nancy F: Absolutely, and we were all together. In those days, nobody was anybody. Not like today. Nobody had any money, everybody was poor. Everybody was coming back from the war, so nobody had anything really. I don't mean we were hungry, I don't mean that. I had an apartment and so forth. But we were all sort of starting from scratch. We used to go down to Greenwich Village and eat for fifty cents by candlelight.

There was great camaraderie in the clubhouse. It was on Ninth Avenue and Forty-first Street. Nobody was on Ninth Avenue and Forty-first Street in those days, so the first time I went to a meeting, I thought there would be a bunch of bums. Then I thought, you're one too, so you better get over there. I decided not to get dressed up because I didn't want to look better than everybody else, and when I got there, Park Avenue was there and everybody was there. So I learned my lesson -- never think you're better than anybody else, just go. It was quite an education to see how everybody was suffering the same disease. I met people like Felicia [see "Stars Don't Fall" interview in the August 1995 Grapevine]. I never knew a princess before. I never knew a countess before! I can tell you, I never could have gotten anything like that anywhere else. And there was a humanity in all of us for each other. I was so welcome. It was the first time I felt welcome.

GV: You did a lot of Twelfth-Step calls in those days.

Nancy F: Oh yes, we went everywhere. We'd go on buses all over to speak. People's houses, or rented rooms. So many lived in such lonely rooms, all by themselves, no bathroom.

When I came into AA I was about thirty-nine years old. That was in 1945. There was another woman who was as young as I was, and they picked us to go to hospitals and drying-out places because we were younger and presentable. In those days, if you were a drunk from a rich family, they put you away. You were hidden in hospitals and all kinds of places. So she and I bought little hats with flowers on them and we had little black dresses and pearls, and that's how we'd go. I was very naive; I said, "Gee, there's bars on the windows and no doorknobs." I saw so many young, young rich women, incarcerated by their families.

Once we went to the apartment of Miss X [a celebrated actress] and she told us such wonderful stories, we forgot why we were there. We didn't have the nerve to tell her that she was a drunk. Later she did get sober.

GV: Did you take literature on Twelfth Step calls?

Nancy F: There wasn't much literature. We'd just go and talk and be friendly and say how long we were in AA and where to go to meetings. But our intensity when we were talking to drunks was very effective, because they knew how we felt. They knew that we cared about them. And nobody had cared about them in so long. So that's how it worked for us. We didn't have any spiel of any kind. We'd say, "You'll be okay, and you'll go to meetings with us and we'll come and get you, and if you have any trouble, call us right away." It was very simple but very effective.

I didn't like the families in the beginning. I was mad at the families. I wouldn't talk to anybody but the alcoholic. A friend of mine said to me, "Nancy, I think that it's time that you begin to accept families." And I said, "Do I have to?" She said,

"I think that it would be a good idea." I respected her but I thought, I'll think it over but I'm not ready yet.

I had never felt like I was anything in my whole life, that I had anything to give and then here I was told that I had something to give someone -- well, I could hardly wait to go on those Twelfth Step calls. I didn't care if somebody lived in Philadelphia or Hoboken or Timbuktu, I would go. I was so eager to give what I had. I went right from the First Step to the last Step. For me it was just wonderful. I got in with people and I cared for somebody. You see, I had never cared for anybody, not even myself. When you care for somebody, you begin to heal yourself. You don't even know it.

I left home when I was fourteen. My mother died when I was three, my father remarried when I was fourteen, and my step-mother threw me out. When you're thrown out, you don't feel like you're anything. You know something's got to be wrong with you or they wouldn't have thrown you out. And they tell me that psychologically I felt abandoned by my mother. So here I was in AA and there were people who told me I had something and that they had the same thing that I had -- you can't imagine how important that was.

One woman at the clubhouse was a scrublady and I think I learned more from her than anybody. She lived in a tenement house, happy as a lark. Her name was Annie and she came in when she was sixty-seven and she died when she was about seventy-four. I was in a beginners meeting when she came in. And she laughed at me and said, "You're jealous of me because I've had a few drinks and you can't have any." I said, "You're so right." The rich ladies used to come down from Connecticut on Friday night and they'd look at Annie, and she was poor, she was uneducated, she had nothing, and she was having a ball. She was having the best time she'd ever had in her life. And there was no way, looking at Annie, that you could complain. These women couldn't say their alimony was cut off or they were getting divorced because Annie was sitting there with not a word of complaint. She had a quality that was so easy, so simple. She used to curse a lot when she spoke and a priest would be in the audience and she'd say, "Excuse me, Father, but I'm trying to be careful."

GV: Was this Annie the cop-fighter, whose story was also in the Big Book?

Nancy F: That's right. She lived on First Avenue across from a church. She got sober and then she got drunk again and she went up to High Watch Farm, and when she came back, I said to her, "Now you have to make an amends list, but don't tell me your story because you'll hate me if you do. You've got to find somebody you can tell your story to. You can have a priest or Dr. Silkworth or whoever you want." She said, "I'll take a priest." So we found a good old fellow of a priest and I said, "Now remember, he's no better than you are so don't be afraid of him. This isn't confession, you're just going to tell your whole story." They met at my apartment and I made coffee and then I told Annie, "You come over afterward to the meeting." We had a Friday night meeting a couple of blocks from there on Fifty-Eighth Street. So she came over afterward and she was so relieved. The first time she did go to confession, she said, "Father, I'll tell you everything, but don't ask me how many times."

I was in the hairdressing business and Annie used to come to the beauty shop I had and I used to charge her a dollar because I never wanted her to think I just gave her anything because she was very proud. So I'd charge her a dollar. One time she got a job up in the country and they charged her six dollars and she said, "Hell, I can get it done for a buck up on Park Avenue." I gave more permanent waves to people who had never seen a beauty shop. Every time somebody wanted a job, I'd grab them and give them a permanent wave, set them up to get the most.

GV: You mentioned Dr. Silkworth. Did people regularly talk to him or see him?

Nancy F: Oh yes. If we were in trouble, we'd go to Dr. Silkworth. If we were in a situation and we didn't know how to get out of it or were afraid we might get drunk, we could talk it over with him. He was a very simple, wonderful man. He said to me once, "The day that you can sit down and just be honest with yourself in this situation, you will know what to do." That was the kind of a man he was.

GV: You knew Bill W. Did you ever go to Bill to talk?

Nancy F: No, no!

GV: Why not?

Nancy F: I was in awe of Bill. It would be like going to God! Also I didn't think that was his job. But he was around all the time.

GV: Did he speak at meetings a lot?

Nancy F.: Yes, he did and he was a lousy speaker. He said so himself -- he laughed at himself. He always thought it was kind of funny.

GV: Why wasn't he a good speaker?

Nancy F.: I don't think he was interested really. It just wasn't his main thing. He knew he wasn't any good and he didn't care and it wasn't really important to him. He always used to say, "If they want me to get sober on, they'll never get sober." He meant if you wanted Bill W. to get you sober, that's the first thing that would get you drunk.

GV: What about meetings? Did you go to one a day?

Nancy F.: I went to the clubhouse every day from eleven o'clock in the morning when they opened up until they closed at night. It was the only place I felt safe. It was a church and they held the meetings in the church part and then in the basement they had a card game, which I never knew. But I heard later there were very hot card games down there. You could eat at the clubhouse too -- upstairs we had a restaurant. You could have coffee any time of the day and night. Eventually we went broke. I remember we had two refrigerators and we used to say that only drunks would buy two refrigerators since we only needed one. Excessive behavior cost us. We were $5,000 in debt and the landlord didn't trust us and wanted us to get out.

Norman B. was a great member and he gave everybody money; he was a rich man when he came in and he gave all his money away. We had a meeting of a hundred people, and Norman got up and said, "You bunch of drunks, you've spent all the money at bars -- threw it away. Now go home, search your conscience, write a check, and send it in. Let's move out of here with honor." And that's what we did.

GV: Do you see a big difference in meetings today?

Nancy F.: There's not as much giving and Twelfth Step work. People are busy and working harder, I guess, than we did. We seemed to have more time. But I don't know. I know we didn't get eased off alcohol as people do now in treatment centers. We went through it and I think it was a different experience in humility and suffering. You'd be getting off a drunk for days. And never be so miserable, never. I didn't know anything about pills. I never knew what a sleeping pill was. If you were not in that "set" you didn't know about drugs. I never heard of cocaine, people didn't have it in those days. So it was different. It was only alcohol. Now it's quite different.

People will say, "I'm a druggie," and make some of the alcoholics mad. I think if you're suffering, you're suffering, but I don't have a strong opinion about it.

GV: Tell us more about your early days.

Nancy F.: I was in a women's group for many years. Marty M. had asked a woman named Elizabeth to have a women's meeting in her home, because she lived on Fifty-Eighth Street in midtown Manhattan. Elizabeth's husband was the alcoholic; she was not. For fifteen years I went there every Friday night until she gave it up.

Once I had to hospitalize my landlady; this woman was a drunk and I put her into Knickerbocker Hospital. And that night Elizabeth said, "Nancy did the most wonderful thing today." And I thought, what did I do? I had never been praised before and I felt so warm inside and I thought, This is wonderful. And then I thought, Maybe there is something about me that she sees. If a woman like that sees something in me, maybe there is something. Elizabeth started me off, she encouraged me. Whatever she told me to do, I did. She took me in sort of as a member of their family. For the first five years, I did nothing but go to AA. I couldn't do anything else -- didn't know anything else to do.

GV: Then you started your hairdressing career?

Nancy F: I was in business for twenty-six years on my own. I always said to Elizabeth, "I'm afraid of everything." And she said, "But that never stops you from doing things." She just nurtured me. I told her I should take lessons in English, and she said, "No, you should take lessons in speech." So she sent me to George Dixon who coached Rex Harrison in "My Fair Lady." He had a sign up over his door which said, "Create yourself; everything else has been done." I went there for a year. I went everywhere: churches, psychology, therapy. Whatever she suggested, I would do. She was the one that taught me that there was something inside of me -- that I could do things.

You know, Marty M. [a founder of what is now the National Council on Alcoholism] was going to hire me as a speaker. She sent me to Yale to take alcoholic studies and I was thrilled. Oh my God, I thought, I won't have to work hard, I'll go there and I'll go around speaking. Oh it will be marvelous. Because I had to go out to hairdressing shows and I was scared to death to do that; I had to improve my skills and work hard and go into business and learn about labor laws and all that. See, I didn't want to do that. Then Elizabeth said to me, "Do you think you should earn your living over what's wrong with you?" "Oh," I said, "is that what I'd be doing? No, no that's not what I want to do." So I came back and told Marty that I wasn't going to work for her. I want to tell you, I never had such a difficult thing. But I had to do it. I wouldn't have liked myself if I didn't.

GV: You were married?

Nancy F: I met my husband when I worked on a ship. He was an officer on a ship; he was a big tough man, very handsome. He was in the Navy during the war. He could drink and never get drunk. Well, he got drunk but he was never like I was. I was sloppy. Sometimes I'd go to sleep and sometimes I'd fight. I'd say things that I didn't have the courage to say when I was sober. One day he beat me right down to a pulp and I took care of myself from that day on. When I left him, I just took my coffeepot, no furniture. He put his mother in our house. She was a sweet lady, and I went up to see her and I looked at that furniture and I said to myself, "The next time you belittle yourself for sticks of wood, let me know." And I never asked anybody for anything again. I found the answers in myself, which was the greatest thing that ever happened to me.

GV: You went back to school in sobriety?

Nancy F: I went to high school in my fifties and went to college when I was seventy.

I called up a therapist I'd gone to and I said, "How can I prevent myself from being frightened of old age? I'm watching a friend of mine who's scared to death about getting old -- and she's got a companion and children and everything. How can I prevent it?" And he said, "Go to school." So I did.

GV: What did you study?

Nancy F: Behavioral science. A lot of psychology and sociology.

GV: Did you have a career goal in mind with that major or did you just like the subject? Nancy F: I just knew I wanted to spend my time in some way and I loved to learn and I liked to write. I went to college for nine and a half years. Saturday night I'd go out. I always went out on Saturday night. And at six-thirty on Sunday morning, I'd get up and write my papers. I got people to help me. The day I passed algebra, I was coming down Fifth Avenue and I was crying and laughing. I thought, "I know what makes me happy -- accomplishment, doing something that I never thought I'd be able to do." I was exhilarated.

A friend told me, "Work hard and try to get an A." He was working for me to get cum laude and I didn't know what he was doing and I said to myself, "I'm lucky if I stay in school, let alone get an A." But he nurtured me, you know. Everybody nurtured me. I graduated cum laude. I really enjoyed it. When I graduated, the graduates had to walk several blocks -- I was on my cane then -- and all my friends were in the car driving along behind me. They thought I was going to faint and they said, "Get in the car." And I said, "Get in the car? My God, I worked nine and half years for this. If you think I'm not going to walk in this parade, you're crazy!" It was a wonderful experience.

GV: Do you miss it, a little bit?

Nancy F: No, I live in a Quaker community where there's a lot of things being done.

I'm teaching English to migrant workers.

GV: Are you a Quaker?

Nancy F.: Yes, now I am. I've been a Quaker for two years. They do things. I like that. It impressed me that a lot of women had lived wonderful lives, men too. So I said to them, "How do you get to be a Quaker?" And they said, "You just write a letter." So I said okay, and I wrote a letter.

GV: How did you feel about a Higher Power when you came into AA?

Nancy F: I didn't believe in God, and I didn't want to hear anything about it. But I said maybe there's a power without him. I was mad at my father and I was mad at men and I didn't want any authority figures. I had a human being in my mind as God. I didn't know if I was more scared of God or my father. But after I got sober I went everywhere. I went to a man who taught that if you think right, you'll be all right. I went to places for two or three years. I went searching around. I

The "Minneapolis Star-Journal," commenting on the meeting, noted that the state hospital at Willmar has been too short of funds to employ adequate psychiatric care; while the Minneapolis General Hospital treats alcoholics only in its psychotic ward.

"The most effective attack upon chronic alcoholism has been made by Alcoholics Anonymous," continues the paper. "Minnesota and Minneapolis could help the good work by providing additional facilities for care."

Indianapolis, Ind., "Star": "In Times Square 26 people rushed to join Alcoholics Anonymous when they saw part of a fur coat walking in the B.M.T. subway. It was a live pet marmoset looking for its marmor."

NAUTICAL SHOE CAUSES DUNKING

Plainfield, N. J., "Courier-News": "What first appeared to be a duck floating sedately down Green Brook ... turned out on closer scrutiny on the part of park strollers to be a large-sized man's shoe, enthusiastically if not expertly pursued by two potential members of Alcoholics Anonymous.

"The shoe steered a steady course in the middle of the stream for several hundred yards, blandly staying out of reach of the outstretched sticks of the two tipplers. Climax came when the shoe moored on a rock in the middle of the stream and both stimulated gentlemen fell simultaneously into the water in their efforts to reach the nautically-minded footgear.

"The shoe's owner meanwhile slept soundly on the bank of the stream while his companions pursued their salvage operation."

COMMUNITY BENEFITS

Fayetteville, N.C. "Observer": "Alcoholics Anonymous since the establishment of its chapter here has served to help a number of local citizens snap their fingers in the face of the devil of intemperance and prove to themselves and their friends and families that they had what it took to stop drink before drink stopped them.

"The personal reward of getting out of the clutches of the alcohol habit is tremendous, and at the same time the benefit to the community is not inconsiderable when one considers the transformation of a citizen, who was apt to become a community liability, into a citizen who pulls his own weight, stays sober, earns money and pays taxes."

The Independent Blonde -- that's how I was described in my story in the Big Book of Alcoholics Anonymous* soon after I arrived in AA on June 1, 1945.

The first thing I heard was "Don't take that first drink. You are sick. You are allergic to alcohol. AA knows how to help you get well, as many before you have. Work with the AA program because it works." That gave me hope. If others could do it, I could do it.

One day while I was on duty as a volunteer at the club for AAs on West 41st Street in New York a call came in to hospitalize a woman. She lived in a duplex apartment beautifully furnished with oriental rugs and Louis XV chairs. There she sat, drunk, her mother by her side, bewildered, her brother angry, frustrated in his helplessness. We went to a posh hospital for her withdrawal treatment. There the nurse told me that I had to be sure she drank plenty of orange juice to avoid dangerous convulsions.

This was my first experience with this kind of treatment, and I was scared that something would happen to this beautiful woman -- not because she was beautiful but because I was responsible for her. I stayed with her for hours, well into the next morning, and she drank plenty of orange juice.

This was my introduction to what it feels like to take care of another human being. In that one call I learned that I was not an alcoholic because my mother died when I was three. I learned I was not an alcoholic because my father and my second stepmother didn't want me. I learned that a woman could have a mother, a brother and money and still be an alcoholic. I learned that what caused me to drink was not important. And I learned that what was important was what I was going to do about it. The message for me was clear: "You know what to do, so do it. Use the Twelve Steps as a guide in creating a new, productive, satisfying life." That I set out to do.

One night I attended a meeting in the home of a woman who was not an alcoholic. But she did know about alcoholics because her husband was in AA. The meetings were held in her home every Friday night for fifteen years, and every Friday night for fifteen years I was there unless I had to be out of town.

In those meetings I was supported, nurtured and encouraged to become what I could be and wished for and dreamed about. Every AA meeting has the same format but the messages are very individual. It is not unusual for a person to hear a new idea that is exactly what that person wanted and needed to hear at that moment.

One meeting I reported that I had hospitalized my landlady, who had been drunk for weeks. The members began to praise me. That was the first time I had ever been praised for an action of mine, and I shall never forget the warm wonderful feeling that bubbled up inside. I can remember that feeling right now.

Another of our Friday night meetings fell on my birthday, and the group had a cake with candles and sang "Happy birthday, Nancy." I started to cry and cried and cried so much that I had to leave the party with the remains of the cake in a box under my arm. I cried all the way home and for hours into the night. That was another first -- the first birthday cake I had ever had, and the gesture, the attention, the celebration struck me in a vulnerable spot.

The episode, gratifying as it was, was also alarming. My hysterical response made me understand that I had big troubles that needed to be investigated and worked on. That was the beginning of my search for ways and means of becoming emotionally mature. I learned that there is no instant cure. It takes insight, honesty and patience over a long, long period.

The next episode that impressed me came on VJ Day in August 1945. I was working in a first-class hotel in New York and around eleven o'clock that morning there seemed to be an explosion and everybody just let themselves go. The atmosphere in the entire hotel was wild. All the guests opened their doors, blew horns, sang and popped champagne corks. I got so scared I would drink that I ran out into the street and began to make my way to the 41st Street clubhouse. All New York seemed to be in the middle of 42nd Street, waving flags, crying, laughing, hugging each other, dancing -- all at the same time. When I opened the door of the clubhouse, I saw more people, whooping it up, celebrating with good feelings -- and with coffee.

Having a place to go, where I belonged, where I could share important feelings without the aid of alcohol, was turning out to be a reliable support when I felt overwhelmed by events and experiences that I had coped with earlier only with the unreliable, indeed dangerous, recourse to alcohol.

I reached out to every suggestion and learned what other people were doing and trying. One led me to a lecture about self-understanding.

As I entered the lecture hall I saw a sign that said "Discover Yourself. Everything Else Has Been Done." I have never forgotten that admonition, nor have I ceased discovering myself. It is a great way to keep life interesting. Don't think I'm a Pollyanna; I'm not. My AA life was not without troubles. All life has troubles. The difference now is that I know how to cope with troubles -- by realizing it is a challenge to find solutions, constructive solutions. I am convinced that finding solutions to my problems is my responsibility, and that conviction has worked for me almost always.

When I learned to forgive my father for what I thought he had done to me, and for what he did do to me, I was helped to resolve that problem. It was a healing experience and helpful in establishing much better relationships with men friends. It was a great day when I caught on to the idea of developing what nature had endowed me with instead of complaining about what I didn't have. From then on I didn't have to use a lot of energy trying to justify difficulties by insisting that I had no good points. In my pursuit of a better way to live, even at this late date, I remind myself that it is fruitless to envy those who found a good way in their youth. They were fortunate. My present and future depend on my continuing to learn to live richly, joyously, rewardingly.

After fifteen years of sobriety, however, I had a slip. Why? In retrospect I had forgotten that AA had to be my priority. My self development was important, but in the process I had forgotten the AA philosophy of giving and receiving help, and I had forgotten the power of the Twelve Steps. I have had no trouble since then, thank God, for AA works when you work it.

Growing emotionally was a long, slow process and a most difficult task. It takes years. But along the way the rewards are so satisfying and enriching that one realizes the value of the process and therefore is willing to work at it -- one day at a time. Being in A.A., where one encounters many people, different people, who are also learning to grow up gives one the support that is so necessary.

Growing up spiritually is also a never-ending process, and an exciting process. The Twelfth Step, for example, gave me an instant awareness of how important it is to care for someone. Caring for another alcoholic helped me overcome self-centeredness and that is a relief and a tremendous reward in exchange. It was a wonderful day when I left a life of dependency and recognized that I was an interdependent member of the human race.

Growing up financially was also necessary for me, and I started by developing greater skills in my work -- hairdressing. I wanted to be the best I could be. That took lots of time, energy and patience, but improvement of my skills rewarded me for I became recognized and respected, nationally and internationally, in my craft. I was offered opportunities to teach advanced hairdressing skills at workshops around the country and at international conventions. Teaching is a very gratifying experience and a wonderful way of paying back, in passing on to others, all that I had received. By this time I had my own business that lasted successfully for 26 years, until I retired at the age of 79.

Growing socially was yet another major task. I went to my first AA meeting feeling that nobody wanted me. While I didn't admit it, I didn't want very many of them, either. Fortunately for me, when I met another alcoholic my perceived negative notions about people vanished. What I saw was someone who was suffering as I suffered, and there was immediate rapport. As time went on I was able to apply these positive feelings toward nonalcoholics, and this was the beginning of knowing how to be a friend and help a friend.

And social growth paid rich dividends in business as well. From a tongue-tied technician I had grown into an entrepreneur capable of understanding, responding to, and enjoying a clientele of cultivation and breadth of experience.

As I grow older, I realize that my friends are the most important pleasure in my life, along with my very good health.

Growing educationally, as we all know, is a lifelong process. I left school in the 8th grade. Not until my 50s did I go to high school at night after work. In my 70s I watched an old friend who was scared to death of getting older. She was in comfortable circumstances and there didn't seem a reason for her fear, at least not a financial reason. She had a job, a pension, a

Regarding the St. Francis Prayer, I have suspected that it was never really written by him but does reflect his general approach to life. According to something I read recently, the Prayer has only appeared since 1915, thus strongly suspecting that somebody created it and then gave it attribution to Francis in order to promote it. There have been other examples of that sort. We haven't been able to authenticate the Herbert Spencer quote in the Big Book and, in another connection, I pursued a fine quotation that could not be authenticated. The famous quotation from Voltaire about defending one's right to free speech cannot be authenticated. A scholarly group called The Jesus Seminar has even suggested that at least four-fifths of the sayings attributed to Jesus cannot be authenticated. So where does this leave us? I suggest that we accept any saying that works for us without worrying too much about the identity of its author. Bill W. found some help in the St. Francis Prayer and thought it important enough to include in the 12&12. Its value will be what it can do for us in our own lives, no matter who created it. Of course it's still useful for us to try to authenticate materials when we can. But if something is good and seems true, let's use it!

Mel Barger

~~~~~

Mel Barger

melb@accesstoledo.com

----- Original Message -----

From: "vratical" <vratical@yahoo.com>

To: <AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com>

Sent: Tuesday, December 09, 2003 3:27 PM

Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] Eleventh Step Prayer

> The 11th Step Prayer (Prayer of St Francis) as written on page 99 of > the 12&12 is a translation that I have not seen elsewhere. I am > assuming that the prayer was originally in latin. The prayer as it is > usually seen is somewhat different from the AA version, and I was > wondering if anyone might have information on the origins of ours

and > why it is different. Thanks for any input - this has bothered me
for > many years.

=====

+++Message 1530. . . . . Re: Eleventh Step Prayer
From: Arthur Sheehan . . . . . 12/10/2003 2:30:00 PM

=====

While the prayer is often attributed to St. Francis of Assisi, and called the Peace Prayer of St. Francis, it appears to have actually originated in the early 20th century by an anonymous author. Endearingly, Bill W. was consistently inconsistent. The version of the prayer that is in AA Comes of Age (pgs 270-271) is different than that in the 12&12 (pg. 99).

The information below was taken from www.Franciscan-archive.org.

-----

The Story Behind the Peace Prayer of St. Francis

The Peace Prayer of St. Francis is a famous prayer which first appeared around the year 1915 A.D., and which embodies the spirit of St. Francis of Assisi's simplicity and poverty.

According to Father Kajetan Esser, OFM, the author of the critical edition of St. Francis's Writings, the Peace Prayer of St. Francis is most certainly not one of the writings of St. Francis. This prayer, according to Father Schulz, Das sogennante Franziskusgebet. Forshungen zur evangelishen Gebetslitteratur (III), in Jahrbuch fur Liturgik und Hymnologie, 13 (1968), pp. 39-53, first appeared during the First World War. It was found written on the observe of a holy card of St. Francis, which was found in a Normal Almanac. The prayer bore no name; but in the English speaking world, on account of this holy card, it came to be called the Peace Prayer of St. Francis.

More information about this prayer can be found in Friar J. Poulenc, OFM, L'inspiration moderne de la priere « Seigneuru faites de moi un instrument de votre paix », Archivum Franciscanum Historicum, vol. 68 (1975) pp. 450-453.

have felt up and down, young and old, according to my own inner state of being. I know now that in my attitude, not in the state of the world, lies the kernel, the heart of the matter. That is the essence of what I have learned through all of you. It's what keeps me sober. And I am sober, thank God.

I want to talk about the last two years since I've moved up here to Connecticut. Life on the whole has been extremely pleasant, not to say meaningful. But at the meetings around this neck of the woods, I seemed to be settling down to AA old age. To be candid about it, I think I was getting a slight case of glue-dry, which is the occupational disease of both antique furniture and the AA old-timer who's coasting.

I was embarrassed by compliments from young people. Things like "You are such an example to others!" made me feel like a mini-monument to sobriety -- something slightly above it all, and not at all with it. But believe me, if several meetings went by and nobody remarked upon my physiological and/or AA age, I would work it into a talk as fast as you can say Bill W., with remarks like "There was only one open meeting in all New York! Think of it!"

There I was, above it and out of it, going to meetings to speak more than to listen, when what should come into my life but an infant pigeon, a man two years younger than I was when I joined! He says he likes me as a sponsor because I clearly don't have any of the answers and my confusion at this late date is most encouraging to him.

I now go to a lot of meetings quite regularly, something I haven't done in years. He often takes me in a long, silver gray, streamlined, many-gadged sports car. And we go levitating through the night, along dark, winding country roads, with the top down and with ourselves strapped in like a couple of World War I stunt pilots. Between my feet is a large cardboard box of goodies, and upon my lap is a freshly frosted layer cake. Both of us have gotten into secretarial and KP work.

I not only go to more meetings, I really get into them. The "new" AA -- a new approach, less formality, less "God business" for many new people -- is something to get used to. In trying to swing with it, I sometimes get thrown. "Please, everybody!" I shouted at a very small meeting. "Please stop talking all at once. Grandma can't hear."

There was dead silence and then solicitude. "We'll move our chairs up closer to you," they said.

I also went through a self-conscious stage where I was trying not to

The Clip Sheet

St. Paul, Minn. "Dispatch": "Women drunkards are on the increase in St. Paul, in the opinion of those who study the problem here.

"Increase is noted both in those women who drink 'socially' and those who drink 'hard' and often alone.

"Total number of such women alcoholics ranges from estimates of 500 to 1,000. These estimates are based on a report by the Mayor's Committee on Alcoholism."

Brockton, Mass., "Enterprise and Times": " ... A local organization interested in helping each other solve a personal problem, presented a book to the library. The book is 'Alcoholics Anonymous' and the Brockton Group of that organization is the donor. We admire the group and the manner in which its members have attacked their own problems. In presenting this volume to the library, they have done so in the hope that others who may wish to know more about Alcoholics Anonymous may do so easily."

Marquette, Mich. "Mining Journal": "One hundred eighty Marquette residents heard discussions on 'Alcohol and Modern Life' by a public health physician, a member of the licensing and enforcement division of the Michigan Liquor Control Commission and an attorney who is a member of Alcoholics Anonymous at a conference in Guild hall here. ..."

New Rochelle, N. Y., "Standard-Star": "Appeals for greater awareness of the magnitude of the problem of alcoholism in Westchester and throughout the country, more sympathetic understanding of the chronic alcoholic as a sick person on the part of the physician, and recognition of this illness as a public health problem requiring facilities for care and treatment in both voluntary and public hospitals, were made by speakers at a meeting of the Westchester Medical Society on the general subject of 'Alcoholism.' ... Three hundred doctors and laymen attended."

Another recent AP story . . . this one from Atlantic City, N. J.:

"Don't use sleeping tablets in the barbiturate family when you're drinking (or vice versa) unless it's a long sleep you're after.

"This was the gist of a report to the American Therapeutic Society by Dr. H. B. Haag who, with two research workers at the Medical College of Virginia, has concluded a series of experiments illustrating the dangers of combining certain sleeping pills and

This veteran of a thousand meetings finds

she always takes away something of value

OF COURSE, some meetings are dull. I've been to thousands of them, and some of the speakers haven't appealed to me. But then my talks don't fascinate everybody, either. This is all par for the course.

Live and Let Live.

But there is a kind of boredom that is simply me. This is the restless, wriggling kind; the chair is too hard; my fanny aches; I cannot sit still. Honestly, I have lost my judgment; I don't know whether this is a good meeting or a bad one. The truth is that I am anxious or worried or resentful or depressed about something, and that is why my mind just won't stay with the speakers.

But whether the meeting is really a dull one, as far as I'm concerned, or whether I am not being receptive, I almost always come away feeling better. Something does happen, after all. Maybe I catch one sentence: "I found when I joined AA that I was not alone." This sinks into my consciousness and stirs a response. I leave the meeting in a different mood. The glow of belonging and the stirring of hope, as described at the meeting, are mine, too. I have had my own need answered again.

As an old-timer, I find that the simplest truths, reiterated, are necessary for me.

And when I forget this, attendance at a meeting is likely to remind me. When I squirm on a hard chair and wish I had my top bureau drawer with me, or my guestroom closet, so that I could be straightening things out while listening to the speakers, this is when I'm in exactly the right place for my own good, for my sobriety, my lifeline.

"I feel sorry for people who don't have AA," someone says. Yes, and I feel sorry for those who don't have an opportunity to help others at deep and meaningful levels.

"Dear Sponsor," says one of my pigeons in a recent letter. "You have been such a help to me in my life, my sobriety, and in everything, that I do not know how to thank you. Whenever you feel low, just count up the people who are alive and sober today because you took the time to give of your love and help."

cause of many of the divorce cases. Drinking seems to accentuate the mental and physical maladjustments which are chiefly responsible for separations. The report said nothing about how to eradicate the drink habit, though there are many ways. One of the best has been developed by Alcoholics Anonymous, which has a chapter in nearly every large city. Certainly the A.A. leader should be a member of any judge's advisory committee. So should a good doctor, an understanding preacher and a bright teacher."

Chapel Hill, N. C., "Weekly": "James S., the novelist who lives in Chapel Hill, is a member of Alcoholics Anonymous. ...

"One day recently he got a telephone call from a fellow member, a business man in a town not far from here, who felt the mania coming on. 'Come right on over here,' said Mr. S. The man did come, but on the way he obtained a supply of liquor, and when he arrived late in the afternoon he was roaring drunk.

"There was no hospital to take him to, so Mr. S. decided he would ask the police to let him stay overnight in the jail in the basement of the Town Hall.

"The initial trouble was that the police did not know Mr. S. Not being familiar with Alcoholics Anonymous, naturally they did not at once understand his explanations.

" 'No wonder they thought there was something queer about me,' he said afterward. 'I had just come off my farm. I was in old dirty clothes and had a heavy growth of beard.'

"He named several persons in Chapel Hill with whom he was acquainted. The jail was empty at the time, and the police willingly took the stranger in. Mr. S., seeing that there was plenty of room, asked if he could stay there, too. The police said yes, and he went to bed in one of the four bunks in the cell. Next morning the stranger, sobered up, was attended to according to the approved A.A. method."

Indianapolis, Ind., "Star": "Indianapolis women who formed their own group of Alcoholics Anonymous a year ago report that there have been few slips among those who have decided to stop drinking. Ages of the women in the group are from 24 to 55 years. Housewives outnumber the business career women in the group."

Elberton, Ga., "Star": "Drinking far outranked all other male faults in a recent Gallup Poll of the ten worst faults of husbands and wives. Among wives' faults drinking was number four, while nagging was number one.

"From wide experience with alcoholism, it is my firm conviction that nothing but the power of God can break the habit. Other so-called 'cures' are only temporary.

"Alcoholics Anonymous, now a nation-wide organization, of growing proportions, with clubs in all principal cities, shows men how the power of God can cure alcoholism. To the increasing number of those who write the Everyday Counselor concerning alcoholism, I again say, seek out your nearest club, or write to Alcoholics Anonymous, Box 459, Grand Central Annex, New York 17, N. Y."

New York "World-Telegram": "Simplicity, sincerity, mark A.A.'s program over WNYC," said Harriet Van Horne, radio columnist. "This man's testimony, mercifully lacking in the smug fervor usually found in reformers, was far more persuasive than anything I ever heard from the dry crusaders. He didn't preach abstinence for everybody. Just those suffering from alcoholism."

"Drink to me only with thine eyes, and you won't have to join those anonymous guys," writes H.I. Phillips in the New York "Sun."

=====

+++Message 1538. . . . . More from Felicia, A.A. Grapevine, September 1982
From: NMOlson@aol.com . . . . . 12/13/2003 1:49:00 AM

=====

A.A. Grapevine, September 1982

Hellos and Hugs

A banquet honoring old-timers spurred memories of old times

LAST YEAR, on October 31, New York Intergroup gave its annual dinner honoring Bill W.'s AA birthday in advance. If he had been alive, December 11 would have seen the start of his forty-eighth sober year! Intergroup was celebrating the completion of its own thirty-fifth year. And on top of all that, Intergroup was kind enough to honor the real old-timers in the area, those moss-covered monuments like me who have been sober thirty years and more.

There were, in all, 2,500 people at the dinner. And thirty of us oldtimers were in good enough shape to come and sit on the dais, in a long row in front of the speakers' table.

The New York Hilton Hotel understands how to handle big crowds. The Intergroup Dinner Committee was heroic, having sweated for ten months over the preparations. All the Intergroup people were on hand to welcome us. They wore name badges and steered us through the happy mob waiting outside the dining hall. We old folks were adroitly zigzagged through over two thousand hellos, hugs, and how-are-you's, hearing joyful laughter and shrieks of reunion.

We were taken clear back to what the Hilton, alas, calls the VIP Room. We old old-timers are not VIPs. We are just like anybody else in AA. We've stayed sober on the program twenty-four hours at a time, while I, for one, couldn't stay on the wagon more than a week. Believe me, you younger ones: If we could do it, you can do it, too.

The VIP Room is where banquet speakers and special guests are assembled, so that they can be sorted out and marched onto the stage in the right order. There was a long row of hard chairs marked with our names. There was also a gigantic coffeepot, so of course we all milled around that. We drank coffee like mad, and we all met old friends we hadn't seen in years.

By and by, Lois W., Bill's widow, arrived in a wheelchair -- not because she couldn't walk, but she is ninety-one and tiny. When I started toward Lois, she saw me coming. She waved and said, "Why, hello, F. How great to see you!" She hadn't seen me in quite a number of years. She goes to conventions all over this country and abroad. She has been greeted by tens of thousands of people. And here she knows me right away! I have never had a memory like that!

At a given moment, Intergroup people went around and said to us all, kindly but firmly: "Please go and sit in the chair with your name on it." They wanted to be sure we would walk out and take our seats in the right order. And we obediently did.

Now, I am not used to doing anything at all with 2,500 pairs of eyes fastened upon me. I thought of my beloved friend and sponsor, Marty M. Countless times, that dear old war-horse spoke in front of thousands of people without turning a hair. As I walked onstage, I thought, "Oh Marty, if you were only here to help me!" I tried to walk as if I had a heavy jar of water on my head. How I wished that I could put my thumb under my sagging chin and hold it up. Then, at least from a distance, I would look reasonably well-preserved.

We were seated, and hundreds of waiters put coffeepots on every table. I was cheered by the fact that the three speakers were all my friends. I began having a wonderful time. The men on either side of me were in my age group. It's a treat to see people my age in AA. Up here where I live, almost everybody is a generation younger, and a whole lot of them are two generations younger. They are perfectly wonderful to me. They help me up and down steps, which is unnecessary, but so sweet of them. They also bring me coffee, and someone always gets up to give me the one comfortable chair. I love it. But often, when I'm alone at home, I think about the old faces, to say nothing of my old friends. Most of them are gone, and oh Lord, how I miss them. They've left a hole as big as the moon.

The man sitting on my right at the dinner was great fun to talk to. But he was small and silver-haired and rather frail. "Does my smoking bother you?" I asked him.

"Not at all." The place was well air-conditioned. "But I did have a lung operation," he added. I extinguished my cigarette.

When the talks began, my new friend dropped his head, closed his eyes, and rested his forehead on his hands. I noticed that his breathing had become labored. "Are you all right?" I whispered.

"Compared to what?" he asked me. He was obviously in distress. I was alarmed.

Nell Wing spoke first; she isn't an alcoholic, but she has served AA for thirty-five years, as Bill W.'s secretary and currently as AA archivist. Then came H. U.; I remember him as one of the first members of an interracial group in Harlem a long time ago. I'm going to have to listen to tapes of both talks -- it's that divided attention business, when you half hear spoken words and your mind is on something else.

I thought, "Maybe this man is having a heart attack. I'll have to do something right away." I turned to the man on my left and whispered, "Aren't you a friend of his? Didn't you come here together? Change places with me. He's sick. He needs help."

Under the circumstances, it wasn't surprising that this nice fellow was slow on the uptake. I couldn't get him to move. So I stood up and said, "Please! Change places with me right now! Please! I tell you, he's sick."

He moved, and I breathed a sigh of relief. I was able to hear the last of H.'s talk and enjoy his reminiscences, which I had shared as one of the founders of the St. Nicholas Group.

My old gentleman and his friend kept their seats, so I knew things weren't too bad. I was able to concentrate on the third speaker's talk. He said, among other things, that we weren't VIPs just because we were up on the dais -- that the most important person in the whole room was the man or woman who was the most recently sober -- sober for a day -- sober for an hour.

That night, after I got home, I suddenly thought, "Why, you darned old fool, you stood up and gesticulated in the middle of a talk. You made a mini-scene in front of twenty-five hundred observers! You could have explained the situation quietly to that man while simply keeping your seat." But lying in bed, waiting for sleep, I had to smile. "After all," I told myself, "you weren't very important up there. It's conceivable that nobody noticed you at all."

And then, I remembered another banquet in another ballroom long, long ago. That time, I was conspicuous. I was very, very drunk and completely out of hand.

The occasion was a newspaper editors' dinner, also in New York. Wendell Willkie was to be the main speaker. At dinner, the wine flowed freely. There had been cocktails before that. I drank everything I could get my hands on.

I sat next to a beautiful and famous woman, who was done up in an expensive evening dress and wearing a lot of fabulous jewelry. I said to her, "What's the most exciting thing in your life?"

Her face lit up, and she said, "My race horses. I love them. I love to watch them work. I love it when they run."

I cut her short. "Come clean, doll," I told her. "What about your sex life?"

Without a word, she moved her chair around, so that her back was to me, and began talking to the person on her other side.

That did not dampen my spirits at all. "Get her," I told the world in general, in a carrying voice. "She's stuck-up, that's what she is. Just because she invented a face cream."

My poor editor-relative, alerted by this maxi-scene, got a woman photographer on her paper to lead me out of the room. I went swaying past all the tables, hardly able to walk. This gal had me firmly by the elbow. In the ladies' room, she said to me, "Come on. I'm taking you home." I don't remember what I said -- but I went back to my seat. Some man was making a speech.

The next day, my unhappy relative called me in mid-morning, when I was enjoying one gorgeous hangover.

"Who was that man up there talking?" I asked her.

"Wendell Willkie. He's running for president, remember?"

"Oh, that's right," I said.

"Remember anything else?"

"Vaguely."

But my heart seemed to tighten up. I began remembering, only too well. I had stolen the show. Fear and shame and remorse flooded me.

Today, I feel very grateful and humble. Years later, I was able to write the beautician lady an apology and tell her that I was now in AA. I was rather surprised to get a letter in reply, a beautiful letter in which she said that she understood perfectly. She said it must have taken a lot of courage to write that apology. She never knew that it wasn't courage, but rather a desperate need to make amends.

I am humbly grateful that I am in a wonderful, sui generis organization that has saved my life, restored me to sanity, and

A couple of weeks ago, my husband asked me if I could recall my last drunk, and I said, "Yes, I can." I was driving along one day, wanting to go home but afraid to because I couldn't face anyone, and I ended up in San Francisco. Now I couldn't go home for sure -- it was the next day. What was I going to do? Shaking, sweating, eyes bloodshot, face puffed up, I'd run out of lies, and I thought, if I go home right now it's going to be too late. I can't think of a lie that will wash.

I parked the car and I walked, and I saw this sign, "Sultan Turkish Baths." I decided I could sweat it out there and get myself in shape, but I thought I'd better have something to read. So I stopped at the newsstand and bought a 'Saturday Evening Post' -- five cents. It was dated March 1, 1941, and on the cover it said, "Alcoholics Anonymous, by Jack Alexander." I was stunned because I had read about AA in 1939, in the "Liberty" Magazine, I believe, one little paragraph about an inch big. Even that impressed me and I intended to cut it out and save it but I hadn't. But here it was. So I took the magazine with me, had the Turkish bath, and even though I was just too sick to think, I knew there was hope.

I somehow got the impression that there was an AA hospital or clinic or something, but at the bottom of the article it said if you need help, write to Box such-and-such in New York. I rang the bell for the bath attendant and asked for pencil, paper, envelope and a stamp, and I think I wrote a rather pitiful letter to New York. I said, I am a desperate alcoholic and I'll take the next plane back there and take your cure.

The answer came a few days later, airmail special delivery, from Ruth Hock, God bless her. She was Bill W.'s nonalcoholic stenographer and had been for many years when Bill was in Wall Street. And now she was still working for him and she answered all the mail from that "Saturday Evening Post" article. She answered my letter and said, You needn't come back to New York, there's one group in Los Angeles. That's for all of California. It's very small and it has been a struggle for them. They have met in a couple of hotel lobbies but they are now meeting in the Elks Temple every Friday night at 8:30. And she said, You'll be very welcome, I'm sure. They have no women alcoholics in California.

I seemed to have unbounded faith that it was going to be okay. I got dressed, but I couldn't comb my hair so I tied a turban thing on my head and I poked my hair all up under it, and down I went. When I got to the Elks Temple they directed me into a small dining room, and seated around the table were ten or twelve men, and a couple of women. I made myself invisible, if that's possible, because they all looked so happy and were laughing and talking. I thought, well, they're the doctors and the nurses and so forth and I thought they would be giving me a pill any minute now -- the magic pill, the cure-all.

Eventually a man got up and rapped on the table for order. And he said, "This is a regular meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous in California. We are a band of ex-drunks who gather to obtain and maintain our sobriety on an all-time basis with no mental reservations whatsoever." I thought to myself, What an order; I can't go through with it. Well, I didn't have to go through with it that night. I didn't get a chance because he continued with, "But as is our custom before this meeting starts, all you women leave." And these two women that I hadn't even noticed particularly because I was so desperately frightened, they just strolled out into the lobby. I later found out they were the wives -- there was no Al-Anon then, and the women were quite used to leaving the meeting and waiting in the lobby; they came back later for coffee and donuts. But I thought this had been cooked up to throw me out. And it worked, because I put my hands over my face and I ran out into the lobby. I lurked around in the ladies' room awhile and then I went into hysterics and I got in my car and I headed for a bar and I got very drunk.

I thought, How exclusive can you get! To kick me out like that. And as I drank and got more livid, I turned to the people beside me at the bar and I said, "I'm a member of Alcoholics Anonymous." And they said, "So what!" Then at 2 P.M., when the bartender was trying to get me out of there, I called Cliff, who's in the book 'AA Comes of Age.' Cliff and Dorothy had been taking care of all the Twelfth Step calls for California since the group started in 1939. I was very indignant. I said, "Well, I went down to your group tonight and they threw me out." He said, "Oh no, no, I'm sure they did not do that. Did you tell them you were an alcoholic?" I said, "Of course not. No, they threw me out all right." He said, "Well, we need you, we need you. Please come back. We haven't had a woman alcoholic." When I heard the words "we need you," I thought, well, I am a good typist and maybe I should volunteer my services. Then I said, "All right, now, I've had about enough of this and I want you to send your AA ambulance." He said, "We don't have any such thing. You go back next Friday night and tell them you're an alcoholic. You'll be as welcome as the flowers in May."

I don't know what I did that week. Probably was drunk and sober and drunk and sober, but I know this: that it was a miracle I ever went back, and thank God I did. But I didn't go back alone. Because during that week my brother Tex came to see me. He came in the house and he picked up the pamphlet Ruth had mailed me from New York, the only one that AA had. It was a thin pamphlet and gave a few basic facts on the Steps, and as he read it he had a pint bottle in his hip pocket, as usual. He was reading and saying, "That's good stuff, Syb. They really know what they're doing there. So you're going Friday, huh?" And I said, "That's right, Tex." So he says, "Well, I'm going with you." He said, "I'll tell you the truth -- the reason I want to go there. Those guys that are working for me down on Skid Row. I can't get a regular crew together." He was a vegetable peddler then, with a truckrun around four in the morning, and the winos sometimes didn't show up. He said, "If I can sober them up, I'll make a lot of money. So what I'm going to do is take them all down there and get them all fixed." So it was with fear and trembling that I looked forward to that Friday night, because Tex pulled up in front of my house in his vegetable truck and standing in the back were eleven winos. I crawled up in the cab of the truck with Tex and down we go to the meeting. There were a few more people there that week, but the full impact of the "Saturday Evening Post" hadn't hit. But I got to hear the Twelve Steps read, and also the fifth chapter.

At the conclusion of that meeting, Frank R., God bless him -- he was my sponsor and so was Cliff -- reached over and got a bushel of mail that had come because of the article. Hundreds of letters from alcoholics. He looked at that skinny little crowd there with Tex, and his winos, and me, and about fifteen others, and he said, "Well now, we got to get all these drunks down here by next Friday night. So we're going to have to cut this crowd up in sections. And if there's anyone here from Riverside County, come down and get these Twelfth Step calls." Tex went down in front and Frank gave him forty or fifty of the letters to read and answer from alcoholics who asked for help. Then he said, "Anyone from the beaches?" This guy raised his hand, Curly from Long Beach, and he went down and got forty or fifty letters. And this went on -- Pasadena, Santa Monica, and one guy from Fresno, one from Santa Barbara and so forth, until there was one remaining stack of letters, about a fifth of them.

And he said, "I've been saving this stack up for the last because we now have a woman alcoholic. Her name is Sybil. Come up here, Sybil. I'm putting you in charge of all the women." I had to be honest. I went up there and I said, "Well, I'll probably be drunk next Friday. I always have been." And then I said, "What are you going to do tonight? What are you going to say to me that is going to make it different? So that when I walk out that door tonight during the week that I'm out there by myself I won't get those butterflies and the sweating palms?" I said, "What's going to be different? You got to do something tonight. How can I stay sober for a week? I'd like to be able to go and ring doorbells and bring all those drunks down here. But I haven't read the Big Book." He said, "I know that."

I said, "Truthfully, I haven't read your pamphlet. I haven't felt well enough to read." He said, "I know that. You're not expected to know very much." But he said, "You asked me how you could stay sober until next Friday. Now I'll tell you it's in that Big Book that you haven't read. Somewhere in that Big Book it says that when all other measures fail, working with another alcoholic will save the day. Now I'm going to tell you what to do quite simply. You take this basket of mail and tomorrow morning you start ringing the doorbells, and when the girl answers the door you say to her, 'Did you write this letter asking for help with a drinking problem?' And when she says, 'Well, yes I did,' say, 'Well, I wrote one like that last week and it was answered. I went down there and I looked them over. I didn't find out how they're doing it but they're doing it, and they look good. So if you want to quit drinking as badly as I want to quit drinking, you come with me and we'll find out together.'"

"Oh," I said, "I think I can do that all right." So I took the mail and I went home with it, and I was getting ready the next morning to get in my car and start ringing doorbells, and my brother Tex came over. He said, "I'm going to ride around with you for laughs." Well, it wasn't for laughs. We made all those calls and out of fifty we may have gotten a dozen or more. Some of the letters were from landladies who wanted the guy upstairs not to make so much noise on a Saturday night, and sometimes it turned out the wife had written in for a husband who was an alcoholic, and Tex came in handy there. And some of them were from women who wanted help.

We did take a number of women down and a few men. The meeting grew -- and I mean it mushroomed. But here's what happened. Frank had said, "I'm putting you in charge of the women." Well, to me that was like a neon sign that was going on and off, "charge, charge, charge." And I could be real big because Frank and Mort gave me a notebook and they said, "Now you write down all the names of women and then you get them a sponsor. And you have the sponsor report back to you. Then, when you look in your notebook, you will know who you gave the call to. You'll have the report on it. That's a good system." And I took it oh so seriously because I'd go down to the mother group -- now we had two, three, four hundred people possibly, microphone and everything -- and as the forty or fifty women came in and they were seated, I could think, "There's Eva. She called on Bonnie. Bonnie called on so-and-so, and Fran, and yeah, yeah." And it checked out perfectly, beautiful. Then I would tell Frank and Mort it was working fine. They'd say, "That's nice. You're doing a good job."

But one night I went to the mother group and a gal came down the aisle and she had six strangers with her and they hadn't been cleared through me. And I walked up to her and I said, "Where did you get these women? You know what Frank and Mort are going to say about the system." She said, "To hell with the system! I have friends who have a drinking problem same as I do, and they found out that I was getting sober and staying sober. They asked me how I was doing it. I told them I joined AA. They said, 'Can I go with you?' I said, 'Yes.'" She said, "It's as simple as that and anytime anybody wants to come to an AA meeting with me for a drinking problem that's the way it's going to be, and I'll never report to you again."

Well, when she told me that, tears came to my eyes and I couldn't get out of there fast enough. I wanted to run up to Huntington Park and tell my brother Tex all about it. But he wasn't there, and you want to know why? He had been excommunicated. Because he had started a group. The powers that be, the boys downtown, called Tex on the carpet and said, "Tex, fold the group up. Where's your loyalty to the mother group?" He said, "I'm loyal to the mother group. I'm just sick of picking up guys in Long Beach and driving them thirty-five miles to Los Angeles, so I started a group at the halfway point. Some of my boys are down here tonight. You come out to our group next Friday night and we'll just kind of visit back and forth." And they said, "No, you're excommunicated," and he laughed and laughed and laughed.

About a month later they called him down. They had a committee meeting and they asked, did he decide to fold up the group and he said, "Nope. Doing fine. Got a lot of the boys down here with me tonight and you're welcome to come to my meeting. It's a participation meeting where alcoholics all talk." Well, at the mother group, we had two speakers, Frank and Mort, for two years. So they said, "We thought you'd say that, so we have incorporated Alcoholics Anonymous in California." And they had. Those that are still around down there will tell you. It took us about a year to laugh that one off, until Tex began to visit the mother group and the mother group members began to visit the Hole in the Ground Group -- it was called that because they met in the basement.

Tex advised me to resign my job of being in charge of the women. He said, "Tell them you're too busy helping your brother with his group and suggest that they have a secretary of their very own." I did that, but how it hurt. But it had been good for me at the time, because I had no ego. My ego had been smashed for so many years, and it was good to feel that I was wanted and needed and that I had this little job to do. It was good for me at the time and it was good that I gave it up.

Several years later, they called me up and told me to come down and be the executive secretary for the Central Office of Alcoholics marked in this area.

" 'These people are suffering from a disease and are treated the same as people appearing in court for assault and battery or rape,' he declared. ...

" 'The time has come when we should remember that burning people at the stake was a rather poor method of ridding the communities of witches in days gone by. Punishment is not what these people need, but kind, sympathetic cure and treatment.' "

Dayton, Ohio, "News" "City approval Tuesday was given a request of the Dayton chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous to aid in the treatment of a man sentenced to the workhouse for a three year term as an habitual drunkard.

"The approval came from the city parole board after a member of A.A. outlined his plan to help restore the man to the position of a useful citizen.

"The man will be permitted to attend the regular meetings of the organization but will be confined to the workhouse at other times during his sentence."

Philadelphia, Pa., "Tap and Tavern": "Using former addicts who were cured of the disease of alcoholism through the help of the Alcoholics Anonymous organization as participants, WIP is presenting a new series of broadcasts titled, Alcoholics Anonymous, which does not pull any punches in recounting the autobiographical confessions of the people on the program.

"Slotted late Tuesday evenings (10:15 to 10:30 p.m.), in order to reach only an adult audience, the series does not campaign against social drinking, but its members from all strata of life (bankers, truck drivers, accountants, attorneys, actors, middle-class business people and often high-school and college-aged boys and girls) recount their own case histories on how they acquired the disease and the climactic point at which they turned onto the road to recovery through the help of A.A.

"A.A., which is working in close cooperation with the country's leading medical and psychiatric authorities, is receiving strong popular reception from listeners and is mailing a series of booklets of informative literature on request."

A UP story carrying a Utica, N. Y., date line tells of a wealthy Alder Creek resident, who was held for grand jury action on a second degree manslaughter charge in the fatal shooting of a Utica lawyer

"In Ottawa, A.A. came into being after a man, an alcoholic, answered an advertisement a year ago in a New York newspaper in hope of finding a way out of his trouble. He became interested in the movement. Last spring, when several of his acquaintances who had a similar problem had become interested, they inserted advertisements in the Ottawa newspapers. They received between 100 and 150 inquiries."

Schenectady, N. Y., "Union-Star": "Mutual words of praise have been exchanged between the office of the Schenectady County sheriff and Alcoholics Anonymous.

"A.A. has lauded Sheriff Harold Armstrong and Undersheriff Dimont Rector for cooperation extended in granting access to the jail for the purpose of interviewing men serving sentences on charges of intoxication.

"An A.A. spokesman revealed that a group of members visit the jail each Friday and spend a few hours with men who have been sentenced to jail for intoxication. The A.A.s do not preach, the spokesman emphasized, and usually play cards with the inmates while carrying on their campaign."

Fostoria, Ohio, "Review Times:" "Professor Selden D. Bacon of Yale University maintains that there are many potential alcoholics.

"He told a conference on parole, probation and crime prevention there are 750,000 alcoholics and 2,250,000 chronic drinkers in the United States.

"Said Professor Bacon: 'After 10 to 12 years, it often happens that the person who took two cocktails before dinner and two highballs after dinner finds himself losing his social facilities, losing his job and eventually his control. Alcoholism is a disease. The sick can be helped when it is regarded as a public health menace. The work of Alcoholics Anonymous has been invaluable.'"

Yakima, Wash., "Herald": "The Vancouver, B. C., unit of Alcoholics Anonymous has received support that really counts.

"A group of Vancouver women formed an organization called the 'Ladies Auxiliary to Alcoholics Anonymous.' Among other things spokesmen for the organization said they would provide refreshments at A.A. meetings."

Asheville, N. C., 'Citizen': "With more than 300 delegates registered, and 100 more expected to arrive, the annual Southeastern convention of Alcoholics Anonymous held its sessions in the main ballroom of the George Vanderbilt Hotel here.

"The delegates represented 139 Groups from 13 states. Throughout the convention, several nationally-known members of the organization were speakers."

Burlington, Vt., "News": "The importance of Alcoholics Anonymous in the recovery of World War II veterans suffering from chronic alcoholism was stressed at a meeting of the Burlington Group of A.A. at a meeting recently.

"The 28-year-old guest speaker, who had alternately flown in combat over Europe and languished in a number of the Army's best psychiatric hospitals, told the gathering of his addiction to alcohol over a period of years.

"Finally, after years of struggle to overcome the problem, he encountered another soldier in a hospital who had been able to put his drinking behind him through the A.A. program. The speaker said: 'Thanks to A.A., I have come through my first sober season in many years.' "

Miami, Fla., "Herald": "Miamians are sobering up so fast that Alcoholics Anonymous, its AnonA club room only nine months old, needs more space already.

"There are now 225 members. The program has expanded so greatly that to preserve the personal touch, which is an integral part of A.A. activity, two neighborhood meetings are held each week in addition to four in the club room."

New York "World-Telegram": "So you don't drink. Good. No need to fold yourself like a napkin under the tablecloth every time a waiter asks you what you'll have. Look him straight in the eye and order a drink that looks as wicked as a sidecar, but is no more potent than a lemonade.

"Marco, who has presided over the Colony bar since it opened more than 25 years ago, has whipped up many a "softie" for drinkers nonalcoholic: Long and Cool -- ½ grape juice, ½ soda, juice of one lemon. Pour over ice in a tall glass and serve with ½ lemon or lime."

Jackson, Miss., "Clarion-Ledger": "The speaker at a recent public meeting of Alcoholics Anonymous told one of the most gripping and amazing stories of a man's fall into the curse of alcoholism and his recovery through A.A.

office recently to ask for help. Seems she was unable to buy dill pickles; that she was 'addicted' to dill pickles. We confess that we couldn't think of a thing to help our caller. Had she been addicted to the demon rum, we could have recommended her to Alcoholics Anonymous, but pickles is another story. We've never heard of Pickles Anonymous."

Tulsa, Okla., "Tribune": "Tulsa bootleggers are taking an awful beating from one organization in this city. Members of the Tulsa chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous at a meeting recently estimated that when its members quit patronizing bootleggers their combined 'boycott' cut bootleg income $190,000 a year."

Syracuse, N. Y., "Herald-Journal": "How often have we heard it said that: 'He is a fine fellow but drinks too much. I cannot rely on him.'

Thousands of valuable employees have lost their jobs through drinking because in many cases the employee did not know he was an alcoholic and the employer did not realize that his employee was suffering from a disease. Can anything be done for the valuable employee whose drinking is out of control? Yes, in many cases, straightening out these men can be accomplished by the employer taking them to 'task' and discussing their condition with them as they would any other routine business matter. Generally, these employees have a high regard for their positions but being alcoholics and not understanding the reason for their obsession, they stumble helplessly along until it is 'too late.'

"It is not expected that an employer understand the problem of alcoholism, he has enough on his hands to run his business, but if employers understand that alcoholism is a disease and talk to their slipping employees on this basis, many valuable men would be saved to industry."

Batesville, Ark., "Guard": "If we were to be given the job of selecting the organization in our community which has contributed the most in the past year to solving the problems of excessive drinking, we would unhesitatingly select the local chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous.

"This group has performed a service that has all of the earmarks of modern miracles. In case after case right here in Batesville we have seen men lifted from the gutter of habitual drunkenness to places of respectability and constructive service in the community. They credit the A.A. program for their salvation and are found hard at work in the community helping others who need their help."

worry, darling, or you'll start me worrying about you. " She had put her arms around Rick's neck and pulled his head down level with her eyes and he had felt her quiet strength going through him. God, how had he ever managed to live without her all these years! How did Joe manage without ... and there he was back in the old fretful puzzle of Joe's binge.

Hank maintained that Joe had been heading for trouble for a long time. "Seen it comin', " Hank said, "the way you can feel a storm blowin' up the Sound. It weren't only Sylvia -- he was as full of the jitters as a porkypine is of quills afore that." But Hank couldn't explain why, couldn't see how completely Joe's continued drinking knocked the props out from under Rick. Joe had helped him -- he had to help Joe now. Not only for Joe's sake but for his own. And he didn't seem to be getting anywhere -- except deeper and deeper into a feeling of hopeless uncertainty.

Rick had brought Joe out from Townes Hospital in New York to the "shack," as they called the house on Cognewaugh Road -- a sick-looking, self-cursing Joe. But being with Rick and Emily -- seeing their evident happiness in each other -- had only seemed to make matters worse. Joe, after a few sober, moody, irritable days, had walked out of the house one morning, headed for a wop joint in Mianus famous for good beer in big steins, and had been picked up late that night by Hank Frost. A cop friend of Hank's had called him and Hank had called Rick. "Reckon we better pop Joe into High Pines, " Hank had suggested, much to Rick's amazement. "Seems like that Doc. Joe sets such store by it could do somethin' for him now." Rick had agreed, had telephoned and made the arrangements, remembering Wales' tall figure in a blue suit standing on the steps and returning Pell's exaggerated military salute. Wales had caught on fast to Pell's absurd play-acting. Wales was a real guy. Emily had been driving Joe over to High Pines every afternoon, but this way Wales could really keep an eye on Joe.

Still Rick went on worrying and the heat continued. At the Cos Cob station the next afternoon he looked at the tide. It was high. A swim in salt water would be a hell of a lot more refreshing than a dip in his own pool which was now only a few degrees cooler than the air.

Swimming out to the raft with long lazy strokes, he pulled himself up, shook the water out of his eyes and saw a broad brown back against the upright of the diving platform. The back turned and Rick recognized Wales' thick white hair and lean, humorous face. This was luck, especially as the raft was deserted by its usual mob of kids.

"I don't suppose you remember me ... " Rick began, squatting on the edge of the raft, his long legs dangling in the cold water.

Wales smiled -- it was a wide, generous smile. "Of course I do. You're Light Horse Harry Lee," he laughed, "or you were when I first met you. And what's more important," he added, "you're Joe Kelly's friend."

Rick nodded, his eyes squinting from the red glare of the sun on the water. He jerked his head to face the doctor. "God, I hope you can help Joe -- and fast. "

Wales studied the emphatic angular features, noted the twitch of Rick's left eyelid. Here was another one headed for trouble if he didn't watch out -- all alcoholics seemed to be driven by the same frenzied impatience. "In my business," he said with deliberate slowness, "we learn not to hurry. You can't go fast when you're trying to get at things that have taken a long, long time to grow and a long, long time to be concealed, buried under layers and layers in the unconscious."

He grinned suddenly and pointed across the harbor at the steeple of a Greenwich church rising serenely against the orange and violet sky. "Hell, this is no time or place for a lecture on psychiatry. Tell you what you do, Rickham, if you're interested. Come on up to New Haven with me tomorrow. I'm giving a speech at the Yale School for Studies on Alcohol. You might learn something," he said in his humorous, lazy voice. "Or if that doesn't tempt you, this might -- your Bill Griffith of A. A. is scheduled for the closing talk."

"I'll bet he won't turn up," Rick said. "There's some sort of jinx on Bill Griffith and me. I've been in A. A. nearly a year and I still haven't met the guy, but I'd like to hear you." Rick had made the same complaint to Kidd Whistler at the New York meeting in February. He had been peeved then; now he found it hard to get in a rage, sitting on the float surrounded by orange-green water with this big reposeful man.

The next morning Rick sat in a rattly day coach beside Dr. Sam Wales. It was noisy, dusty and NOT air-conditioned. As midsummer heat and cinders poured through the open windows, Rick took back all his former diatribes against air-conditioning. Both men folded their coats and put them on the rack over their heads, but even in shirtsleeves they were perspiring constantly, constantly mopping. Rick wanted to question the doctor about Joe but he hesitated, thinking that Wales probably needed time to go over his speech, not knowing how to begin anyhow.

"Go ahead and ask me about Joe Kelly," Wales said suddenly, pulling down his newspaper. "I gather he's pretty much on your mind."

"Well, sure," Rick stammered, "but I don't quite know what I can ask -- or rather how much you can tell me."

"But I do," Wales laughed and looked at Rick with his large, humorous blue eyes.

"Of course, a psychiatrist, like any doctor -- even more than any other doctor -- keeps his patients' confidences. But in dealing with an alcoholic who is a member of A. A. there are some things I like to talk over with other members. You belong to a remarkable organization, Rickham."

Two large colored women in the seat ahead got up and waddled to the door as the train pulled into Bridgeport. Rick reached over and pushed the seat back, getting his long legs out of the aisle and stretching them out on the dusty plush. "What puzzles me about Joe is ... well, he isn't half as up-one-minute and down-the-next as I am. What Hank Frost calls the perigee tides of an alky."

"That's good, " Wales said. "Damn good way to express it. Tell you how one of my colleagues put it. Look ..." He took his big saddle leather shoes off the seat and ran his hand along the horizontal edge. "We'll call this line the normal tension level of a normal person. Your so-called normal guy may go a few inches up when he's high, " Wales' strong brown hand rose slightly above the plush seat, "or a few inches down when he's low, but an alcoholic goes way up -- several feet -- and way down to the floor. Erratic curve, see?"

"Like my fever chart when I had malaria," Rick nodded. "Same idea," Wales agreed. "You're sick people. Only you're apt to forget that fact when you stop drinking. The pattern is still there, see? The big swing from high to low," Wales gestured again, "is always in the alcoholic -- or neurotic -- personality. And alcoholics are neurotics. Liquor exaggerates the swing. Some people drink when they are on the up-curve -- to celebrate, others when they are hitting bottom -- to drown their sorrows. That's fairly obvious, but the thing that a lot of you guys who quit drinking may not understand is that even after you've cut out alcohol you haven't changed your emotional pattern."

"That's right." Rick nodded again. "I'm not quite as bad as I was when I was boozing but I still get unaccountable elations and damnable depressions -- sometimes over nothing. And I've been 'dry' nearly a year."

Wales was fanning himself with the folded newspaper. The motion was leisurely, soporific. "You'll probably have to guard against those moods for more than a year. Maybe the rest of your life. But knowing about them usually helps and there are ways to cope with them when you feel them coming on -- call up an A. A. friend, go to a ball game, read a mystery, go for a swim the way you did yesterday and sort of keep that normal level of tension in mind." He drew his finger along the edge of the dusty red plush neat again.

Rick look out a pack of cigarettes, offered one to Wales, he felt more relaxed, more at peace with himself and the world, than he had since he had turned the knob of the radio over a week ago to the horror of Sylvia's suicide. Joe was in good hands.

"Another thing my colleague says -- as a matter of fact he hasn't said it publicly yet, but it is to appear in an article in the December issue of the 'Quarterly

Journal of Studies on Alcohol' -- he calls alcoholism 'a disease of growing ego-centricity.' How does that strike you?" Wales' humorous blue eyes studied Rick.

"Hits me below the belt," Rick laughed. "That's the kind of a guy I am -- or maybe was -- but it's not so true of Joe. At least I don't think it is."

Wales didn't answer directly. He went off at what seemed to Rick a sudden tangent. "Ever meet any of Joe's family?"

"You mean Monica and Jimmy?" Rick asked. "No. I was in Central America when that happened."

"I was thinking of his mother and father and an older sister he seemed to be pretty fond of."

"You mean it goes back that far?"

"H-m-m." Wales didn't pursue it. "I was talking to Miss Willard when she drove Kelly over one day. She had a theory that Joe is over-romantic about women. Feels he's let them down. Could be. Fits in with his childhood picture.

Joe's psychiatrist, Dr. Wales. Together, Wales and Rick have gone up to New Haven where Wales is to address the Yale Summer School for Studies on Alcohol. Rich hopes to meet and talk to Bill Griffith, the co-founder of Alcoholics Anonymous, who will be there.)

Chapter XXI ... continued

Two men were already seated there. One, "a long, lean, humorous, intelligent Vermont Yankee, " must be Bill Griffith, from Joe's description. The heavier man, Dr. Jellinek, Director of the School, spoke briefly ... introducing Bill Griffith. Rick watched the lean Vermonter unfold himself, look over the audience, walk down the steps from the rostrum to the main floor and say with a grin and a slight drawl that he welcomed the spirit of informality and would like to talk as if this were an A.A. meeting. "Some while ago," he began, "a few of us from A. A. met with a group of distinguished physicians who were studying what they called 'recovered alcoholics' and 'un-recovered alcoholics' -- medical terms. They mentioned a third group, 'normal people.' Maybe some of us who had been 'dry' several years were hurt to find that we were still not considered 'normal.'

"The doctors were very humble -- like our good friend Dr. Sam Wales, here -- they admitted that medicine has not done much for the alcoholic. They seemed to think that alcoholics are more sensitive, more emotionally childish than normal people and this hurt us -- we had always considered ourselves intellectually precocious.

"In other words, they were describing the alcoholic character much as I would have put it. Let's say -- the alcoholic tends to the grandiose.

"I was that way myself even as a child on a Vermont farm. I can remember the day my Granddad told me about the boomerang of Australia which came back to you if it missed the animal you were throwing it at. Granddad concluded with the dogmatic statement that nobody but an Australian could make a boomerang. That made me mad. You see, I had grandiose ideas. I determined to show him that I, Bill Griffith of Vermont, could make a boomerang. I neglected my lessons. I forgot to fill the woodbox. I spent all my time reading all the books on Australia in our town library -- except for the time I spent with drawshave and saw on every likely piece of limber I could lay my hands on. My Granddad got good and mad when I sawed the headpiece out of my bed.

"As luck would have it, this turned out to be the right piece of wood for a boomerang. I threw it around the Congregational Church steeple and it came back to me. Then I called my Granddad out for a demonstration. I threw the boomerang, it went around the steeple, came back and nearly decapitated Granddad." Bill paused while the audience, laughed. "Now there was an example of the grandiose. I had spent an utterly unreasonable amount of study and exertion for no useful purpose -- simply to prove my own importance.

"I could give you other examples that might look as if I had been developing some admirable qualities, such as persistence -- actually I was developing my ego. In school and in the war. It was during the war that I made the great discovery that a few drinks released me from self-consciousness.

"After the war I went to New York. I was overcome by the vastness of the place, the numbers of sophisticated people. I felt a great urge to show these city folks that a Yankee from the Vermont hills could hold his own with them. I went to night law school. My wife and I lived in cheap rooms to save money -- we had decided that money was all-important in getting ahead. My social drinking increased. Little did I realize that I was building a boomerang that would comeback and nearly decapitate me.

"From a legitimate means of relaxation and release, liquor was becoming a necessity to me. And I was pouring it into a body that was very sensitive to alcohol. We have a way of stating it in A.A. -- alcoholism is an allergy of the body combined with a compulsion of the mind. That was what was happening to me. My hangovers became worse. Each time I drank I got drunker than I intended. But my business career was going ahead. I was making money in Wall Street, getting the social recognition I craved. Only I couldn't seem to live without liquor -- or live very happily with it. I was a drunk by 1924.

"By the time the depression hit, I was being supported mainly by my wife, Lois, who is down there now in the fourth row." He waved a long arm toward a gray-haired woman with a gentle face, gentle and strong, and with the same look of serenity his own face had.

"Then came, my big chance. I was offered a job as manager of a large syndicate. I had succeeded in staying sober during the preliminary talks -- six or eight weeks, I guess -- but they all knew about my drinking and before the deal was closed one of them came to me and said, ' Bill, are you sure you can stay off liquor; not take one single drink?'

"'Oh sure,' I said, 'of course I can.'

"'Well, would you mind if we put that in the contract?'

"'Not at all, not at all.'

"So they wrote in that if I look one drink my job as manager was ended."

Rick knew what was coming -- it was the same sort of thing that had happened to him when he'd tried to go on the wagon on account of an important job -- and landed behind the eight ball. The A.A.s around him were all grinning reminiscently as Bill Griffith went on to tell how he had gone out to New Jersey to inspect the plant and gotten into a poker game afterward at his hotel with some of the company engineers. They had had a jug of "Jersey Lightning" and offered him a drink. He had refused repeatedly, but late in the evening he had gotten to thinking that in all his long drinking career he had never lasted "Jersey Lightning." So he had had a drink. Three days later he had come to on his bed in the same hotel. The phone was ringing. It was his new boss, telling him his job was ended.

"Now I submit to you," Bill undid the buttons of his coat and pulled at a dark blue tie with white curlicues, "that is not the habit of drinking. That is an infinite projection of habit which might well be called an obsession."

From then on things had gone from bad to worse pretty rapidly. Bill had been in Towns Hospital in New York, where Kidd Whistler had taken Joe. Even his doctor and his wife had about lost hope for him. Then one day an old friend, a former drinking pal, had come to see him. Bill had offered him a drink and Ebbie had refused. Ebbie had looked different. He said he had got religion. He had talked to Bill about it.

"Now I never thought much of the God business," Bill smiled, "but Ebbie called it simply 'a power greater than ourselves' and I had always believed in such a power. After Ebbie left I began to ask myself, 'Can beggars be choosers? Does a cancer patient quibble about cures?' No, he goes to the best physician in utter dependency.

"This thought kept sticking in my mind through two or three more weeks of drinking. Then suddenly I cried out in abject desperation, 'I am willing to do anything. Anything. If there is a God, will He show Himself?' I had no faith at all but suddenly I was overcome with a feeling of being surrounded by Something. I felt transported to a mountain top ... I had a sense of light and ecstasy, followed by great peace.

"'Oh, so this is the peace that passeth understanding,' I told myself. But I became cautious. Scared, I called the doctor. I thought I was going crazy.

"'No, boy, you're not insane,' he said. 'Whatever it is you've got hold of, you'd better hang on to it. It's a lot better than what you had before.' I did hold on ... That was ten years ago and I haven't had a drink since."

He looked around the solemn gathering and grinned. "Some of my irreverent friends in A. A. call my religious experience 'Bill's hot flash,' but it is very similar to several described in William James's 'Varieties of Religions Experience.' You could call James a founder of A.A. although he never heard of it, and Ebbie, certainly, and a man in Akron, Ohio, who believed that what had happened to me could help other drunks.

"I am not saying that every man and woman in A.A. gets this sudden type of 'conversion,' as our doctor here called it. As a matter of fact," and here Rick felt as if Bill Griffith were looking directly at him, speaking to him, "most of our members approach the spiritual angle of our program tentatively -- some of them skeptically -- but it comes. Slowly, often. Unobserved by the person himself, perhaps, but the personality change, is just as much of a miracle.

"It may come through faith -- or it may come through works. You see we get people both ways. The 12th step of our program is helping other alcoholics. That is religion too.

"Our program has been borrowed from both religion and medicine. For instance," he raised his left hand, "the doctor recommends analysis and catharsis." He raised his right hand. "The priest, or minister, advises examination of the conscience and confession." He looked at his left hand again. "The psychiatrist says, 'You have stepped out of the herd. You are an introvert. You cannot be happy unless you can make contact with your fellowmen.'" He turned to his right hand. "And what does the religious man say? 'Think of others and you will be at peace. Practice the Brotherhood of Man.' The medical man tells his patient to 'find a hobby, some new compelling interest,' and the religious man talks about the 'explosive power of a new affection.' They are saying the same thing in different words, and we have found that what they say is true.

"So ... A.A. is a synthesis of religion and medicine -- plus our own experience. We have added two main things: first, transmission by alcoholics -- we've proved that only a drunk can help another drunk; second, group therapy -- membership in our society takes away an alcoholic's feeling of being a pariah and gives him a new, compelling interest in life. A newcomer feels more important each day that he does not drink. And we've been told pretty often that we are all the type that has to feel important. That's another reason for A.A.'s success."

Rick was impressed by the way Bill Griffith handled the questions which followed the enthusiastic applause. ...

When the audience swarmed around Bill Griffith, Rick moved forward and joined Dr. Wales. Suddenly Bill detached himself from the persistent questioners, his arms outstretched.

"Well, Rick. I'm glad to see you at last."

"How the devil did you know me?"

"Wales whispered to me on the platform that you'd come with him. But I guess," Bill laughed, "I'd have recognized your famous high bottom anyway. Joe's talked a lot about you. You're, his prize case.

Rick's face darkened.

"Joe Kelly will be all right." Bill Griffith put his hand on Rick's arm. "Joe has come, too far along in A.A., helped too many other people, to fold up permanently now. Right, Doctor?"

It wasn't a question, really. Rick felt that Bill Griffith's confidence would have stood up even to a negative answer from Wales.

Wales smiled. "Doesn't the Bible say that faith can move mountains, and Kelly is just a man -- a man who's had a bad blow but who has your faith. It's the thing that will help him most now. And I'm speaking as a psychiatrist," he added.

"It didn't help Sylvia," Rick said. "Joe didn't help her. None of us helped her."

Bill Griffith looked at Rick's dark, unhappy face. This was harder than any of the questions he had had to answer after the meeting, but he faced it with the same honesty. "Maybe, we did help Sylvia for a while. She said she was happier in A.A. than she had ever been in her life. Maybe we failed. Look at it this way, Rick. A.A. may fail once or twice -- or a dozen times -- and we may be sick at heart and full of self-reproach, but that isn't a healthy attitude. It isn't even statistical. We've, got to keep our minds on the hundreds of men and women A.A. has helped -- the hundreds more, it is helping every day. Sylvia was a lovely person, but Sylvia was one and we are many."

Rick could see Sylvia in her white dress leaning against the column of Joe's porch, her lovely, pointed medieval face lifted in challenge, hear the ringing certainty of her voice. "A.A. keeps on -- men and women learn how to live without alcohol, even if some of them learn slowly, even if some of them fail. It doesn't matter."

|||||

++++Message 1546. . . . . Grapevine Clip Sheet column, Feb. '47
From: NMOlson@aol.com . . . . . 12/19/2003 3:07:00 AM

|||||

Grapevine, Feb. '47

The Clip Sheet

New York, N. Y., "Herald-Tribune": "Dr. Anton J. Carlson, professor emeritus of physiology at the University of Chicago School of Medicine, speaking at the New York Academy of Medicine on the treatment of chronic alcoholism by the general practitioner, said:

"There must be an entire change in the social attitude and public understanding of the problem (alcoholism). A recent survey of facilities for the treatment of alcoholism in New York City showed that probably less than 40% of the doctors here treat alcoholics.

"Yet compare this,' he said, 'with the following situation -- no matter how contemptible, or how down-and-out a person may be who has contracted pneumonia or who has broken a leg, the medical profession will treat him.

"Frequently, if the alcoholic reaches a doctor, the doctor sends him to a psychiatrist or some sort of institute when, in many cases, immediate medical attention is needed.'

"Dr. Carlson said that the general practitioner here and elsewhere is handicapped by the fact that most hospitals refuse to take alcohol addicts as patients. He said that there were a few exceptions to this but cited as one exception the facilities at Knickerbocker Hospital where alcoholics can be kept for a few days,

"The commission, which has received wide recognition throughout the country for its program on alcoholism, is financed by approximately nine per cent of liquor license fees."

Glasgow, Scotland, "Bulletin": "While during the festive season thousands throughout the world will be thinking of Scotland, one Scot, by the name of Beveridge, will be dreaming of his native country as a place where habitual drunkenness is unknown.

"Determined to make his dream as close to reality as possible, Mr. Beveridge-Charles, 53 years of age, a machine-shop worker, of 182 Boreland Drive, Knightswood, Glasgow, and 'no bigoted teetotaller' -- is engaged in a one-man crusade to form groups all over Scotland of an American organisation which claims to have cured thousands of alcohol victims.

"Nor is the organisation, which carries the name of Alcoholics Anonymous -- A.A. -- and already has branches in a number of countries outside the U.S., a temperance society in the ordinary sense. Its one purpose is to help the sick alcoholic recover if he wishes.

"Principal point about A.A. is that it is run for alcoholics by alcoholics and former alcoholics. Its prospective Scottish founder, however, is none of them. But, he said, the need for such a body was so urgent that he had taken on himself the task of starting it.

"Plans include the formation of a committee of interested people and a public meeting in Glasgow with a view to starting a group in the city."

Akron, Ohio, "Beacon-Journal": "Postwar improvements in home environment were credited today with cutting juvenile crime by 40 per cent in Portage County (Ohio) in 1946. This was disclosed by Juvenile Judge Clay Deitrich in his annual report to the Portage County Youth Commission last night.

"Alcoholics Anonymous also received a pat on the back for salvaging many households that were being destroyed by booze, the judge said. Fathers who before drank and would not support their families are now model parents, thanks to the A.A.s, Judge Deitrich said."

Nashville, Term., "Banner": "A plan that would permit the General Sessions Court and Davidson County to treat alcoholism as 'the disease which it is' instead of a moral issue which holds that every intoxicated person is steeped in sin, was proposed today by Judge Henry K. Todd.

"Most radical, for Davidson County, was Judge Todd's plan to have at least eight beds as a starter set aside in some hospital for such alcoholics who are sent there by General Sessions judges, instead of bundling them off to the workhouse or imposing fines."

Dayton, Ohio, "News": "'Alcoholism begins at home,' Alson J. Smith, writing in 'The Woman,' says in an article illustrated by a drawing of a grim looking papa pouring his toddler a slug of whiskey.

"An alarming number of children drink, Smith reports, adding that 'even when children do not drink, the roots of a future addiction to alcohol are to be found in childhood.'

"Statistics reveal, he says, that the majority of America's chronic alcoholics began their drinking as children. Alcoholics Anonymous recently distributed a questionnaire, and of those replying, he says: '65.3% confessed that they had become drunk for the first time between the ages of 15 and 19; 6.1% between the ages of 10 and 14; and 1% under the age of 10.' The figures, he emphasizes, indicate only the first drunk -- not the first drink.

"It has been found, he also notes, that one of the characteristics of the average alcoholic is that he is neither the oldest nor the youngest child in the family. Explanation is that the 'in-between' child is most likely to feel discriminated against or unloved."

Boston, Mass., "Christian Science Monitor": "Alcoholics Anonymous undoubtedly represents the most promising therapeutic resource for alcoholism now available, Dr. Harry M. Tiebout, psychiatrist and authority on inebriety, said in a radio broadcast last night on the problem drinker.

"'Twelve years ago a most hopeful present-day treatment for alcoholism had its inception when the man who founded A.A. had the experience which brought sobriety to him,' Dr. Tiebout told his audience.

"'Spurred by what had happened to him, he was able to help others, and with them formed a group which worked out a set of principles, the following out of which could produce sobriety.

"'Basically religious in inspiration, but drawing strength from the group fellowship and from the practice of helping other alcoholics, A.A. now has a membership of more than 30,000. They estimate that 50 to 75% are free of their former compulsion to drink! '"

Philadelphia, Pa., "Record": "A Kentucky gambler has started an organization called Gamblers Anonymous, modeled after Alcoholics

Detroit, Mich., "Free Press": "A fine step in practical rehabilitation has been taken by Alcoholics Anonymous who are holding regular Sunday meetings at the House of Correction. They started the meetings for men only, now plan another series for women. From 40 to 50 inmates attend. A.A. hopes to break the circle of a stay in the House, return to Skid Row, and back to the House again."

Franklin, Ind., "Star": "Dr. Howard W. Stone, in a letter to the editor, says: 'Alcoholics Anonymous has invaded Franklin. I was a guest at their first meeting in our town.' Leaving the meeting with a feeling that something important had come to Franklin, Dr. Stone says: 'Let us analyze A.A. Why has it helped so many thousands to recover? First, there is spiritual therapy. Second, there is group therapy. Third, there is service therapy. The alcoholic invokes the power of God to aid him in his illness. Next, he is with a group of similar individuals who are fighting the same hard battle. And, finally, each A.A. is a missionary. He will go out at any time of the day or night to carry his story to another sick alcoholic. No one can talk to another alcoholic with such sympathetic understanding as a fellow alcoholic.' "

Washington, D. C., "Star": "Judge Walter J. Casey of the Municipal Court, in an article entitled, 'A Judge's View of Alcoholism,' says: 'We have insisted upon treating the alcoholic as a criminal, and we have subjected him to penalties as severe as those imposed upon offenders whose acts are vicious in character and antisocial in nature -- deliberate law breakers. If the alcoholic is a sick person, as I believe him to be, common sense dictates that his restoration to health should be the responsibility of those who, by training and experience, are equipped to handle the problem from the time it is placed in their hands. Therapies have been devised through years of study and patient experimentation which today are considered sound by recognized authorities in this field. Punitive measures are being discarded and the workhouse and jails abandoned as corrective institutions in the handling of the problem.'"

Southington, Conn., "News and Cheshire": "Bob, who describes himself as not only a veteran of the Battle of the Bulge but of the Battle of the Bottle, told his story on the Monday night broadcast over WTIC. Bob said he was stationed two years in an overseas station where no liquor was available. After that length of time, he figured, he could drink again like a gentleman -- without trouble. But he was mistaken and his troubles with alcohol began all over again, he joined A.A. and found peace. 'Nobody wins the Battle of the Bottle,' said Bob, 'at least, no alcoholic. Our only hope for victory is first to admit defeat. Then, in the skirmishes following, Catholics, Protestants and Jews. They are all as one, standing on common ground, with sincere desire to help others who want to get well."

Passaic, N. J., "Herald-News": "Let me tell you the reason for A.A.'s traditional anonymity. It is of supreme importance. First, for protection of ourselves, our families, jobs, from harmful gossip and criticism. Second, and more important, A.A. deals, not with personalities, but with ideas -- to think honestly, to forget ourselves, to look with courage at our problems and stop being afraid."

New Orleans, La., "States": "This evening A.A. makes one of its rare public appearances, the purpose being to explain to the public its manner of throwing the life-line to tragic, helpless and all but hopeless members of society. New Orleans has its share, and probably more, of the 300,000 alcoholics in the nation and the 7,000,000 persons in the country who drink more than they should or is good for them. The excessive drinker has a sickness, It is not a sickness that yields to ordinary medical or surgical treatment. it is not one that can be treated in clinic or hospital with a good prospect of success. But it can be treated, and is, with conspicuous success by this organization of anonymous practitioners."

Burlington, Vt., "News": "The Vermont Tax Department has ruled that payments made to Alcoholics Anonymous are not deductible from personal incomes because 'we cannot strain our law sufficiently' to permit this practice. A.A., says the state tax body, is neither religions, charitable nor educational. This failure of a state unit to recognize an educational organization having the all-out support of the ministry, the medical fraternity and most welfare officials is a result of an entirely understandable ignorance. Happily, A.A. members would be the last persons to protest this ruling. Anything which they contribute for the support of their organization is a mere pittance in exchange for the sober newness of life possible to them only through A.A.'s good offices."

Wilmington, Del., "News": "To thine own self be true, and it must follow, as night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man,' was the quotation used by a speaker and member of A.A. when he addressed an open meeting of more than 300 persons here last night. The speaker, a resident of Massachusetts, alighted from a train here when he heard of the local group's meeting and attended as a spectator. However, he was requested to speak when a speaker scheduled was unable to attend. The theme of his talk, 'Honesty with One's Self,' was brought out when he said, 'Sincerity means the difference between those who accomplish their aims in A.A. and those who don't.'"

Happy Holidays
Lester G

----- Original Message -----

From: rogerwheatley2004
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Sent: Thursday, December 25, 2003 7:14 AM Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] First Edition Inscription and information

I recieved a First Edition of "Alcoholics Anonymous" from my loving wife for Christmas.

It is an 11th Printing (Jun 1947). It was purchased via eBay and shipped from a book dealer in Fayetteville, AK. It has two inscriptions in the front cover, and I am aware it is a longshot but

I thought it would be fun to try to trace the two inscriptions.

"Best of Luck Hank from your brother Bert March 7, 1953"

"To Jim Best of Luck Bert"

Maybe Hank or Jim didn't stick and gave the book back to Bert at least once.

Also I am curious if anyone knows which printing the chapter

"Now we are thousands" was included. It seems obvious that had to be added to page 391 later when it became true. I was surprised to see this chapter in a First Edition.

Roger W

|||||

+++Message 1556. . . . . Re: First Edition Inscription and information

From: goldentextpro@aol.com . . . . . 12/25/2003 7:02:00 AM

|||||

Roger asks:

>Also I am curious if anyone knows which printing the chapter "Now we >are thousands" was included. It seems obvious that had to be added >to page 391 later when it became true. I was surprised to see this loving > wife for Christmas.

> It is an 11th Printing (Jun 1947). It was purchased via eBay and > shipped from a book dealer in Fayetteville, AK. It has two > inscriptions in the front cover, and I am aware it is a longshot

but

> I thought it would be fun to try to trace the two inscriptions.

> "Best of Luck Hank from your brother Bert March 7, 1953"

> "To Jim Best of Luck Bert"

> Maybe Hank or Jim didn't stick and gave the book back to Bert at > least once.

>

-----

How AA Got Started In Arkansas

Alcoholism, the plague of modern man, cunning, baffling, powerful and deadly had afflicted Sterling C. and in 1934 at age 33 he was fired from his job as insurance salesman. He moved from Little Rock, along with his wife and two small children

to

New Orleans for a fresh start. Three months later he was drinking.

The search

for a solution to his problem began with various clergymen. He continued to drink.

Psychiatric counseling also failed. Richard C. Peabody had written a book

entitled

"The Common Sense of Drinking", which Sterling saw advertised in a magazine - he sent for it. This book was to have a profound effect on his life for the next six years.

The book lacked the spiritual and fellowship approach to the problem; however,

it did

outline a program of action to retrain the mind, including continuous self-inventory.

Thinking he had a handle on his problem now, he re-applied for a job with his former

company. They replied that if he could stay sober he could join the office in Memphis, but his dismissal would be automatic should he resume drinking.

In Memphis for six months, fighting liquor all the time, Sterling slipped again on his first trip out of town. On his return he sought the advice of clergy - again

- and became acquainted with Dr. Blazel, rector of the Calvary Episcopal Church.

Dr. Blazel agreed to try to help, and counseling sessions were set up twice a week.

Business required Sterling to be out of town again - and soon, on July 22, 1935, he was drunk. Remorse, failure, defeat, and finally - the bottom.

Sterling had promised to resign his job should this happen, but before he could get to the office he learned that his boss, the man to whom the promise was made, had died during the night. Immediately he went to Dr. Blazel and told him what had happened. Dr. Blazel, recognizing a different man, said to him, "Sterling, I think something very important has happened in your life, and whatever it is I want you to cling to it. Say nothing to anyone, do a lot of praying and realize a very profound 'something' has happened in your life." Sterling never found it necessary to take another drink.

The next few months, following his surrender, Sterling developed along more spiritual lines with Dr. Blazel and also continued to refer to Peabody's book. Christmas, 1935, he returned to Little Rock for the express purpose of making amends

and restitution.

Alcoholics Anonymous had begun to take root at this same period of time unknown
to Sterling, but he stayed sober practicing his own version and began to work with others (with little success.)

Three and a half years passed when a call came from Harlan N.'s boss asking
Sterling
to help Harlan. With patience, tolerance, hope and despair the sponsor-prospect relationship continued into its seventh month. The two became aware of a magazine
article in the September 30th issue of 'Liberty Magazine' by Morris Markey
entitled
"Alcoholics and God" and told a little of the new groups being formed in New York,
Akron and Cleveland. On January 26, 1940, Harlan wrote for the book.
When it
arrived
in Little Rock Harlan was drunk, and the book sent COD, was returned to New York.

Sterling's new boss noted with interest an article in the February 19, 1940
issue of
'Time' concerning a dinner given by 'the' most outspoken teetotaler of the day,
John
C. Rockefeller, which culminated an investigation of two years. Mr.
Rockefeller
was expected to lead other philanthropists and endow AA with hospitals and centers throughout the country. Bill W., Dr. Bob and other AA people in attendance were very disillusioned when told that money might ruin the good thing they had started.

The article mentioned the book and the beginnings of new groups nationwide. Foster Vineyard wrote, on insurance company stationery, the second request for the book. Dubious of the motives an insurance company might have for wanting a book about alcoholism, New York, by return mail, questioned the request. Finally, after Sterling wrote a third letter telling some of his story, the book arrived and was paid for in March, 1940.

Sterling read it eagerly. He called Harlan and said, "Boy, this is just what we have been waiting for. I've been trying to tell you some of these thing and now, here it is all in black and white." It seems at that moment AA was born in Arkansas - when one sober alcoholic with the AA book contacted one sick alcoholic with a message of hope.

The next link in our Arkansas AA chain of recovered alcoholics was Glenn "Bud" G. He had committed himself for life in the "nut house" and had given up all hope of ever being able to live without alcohol. Harlan, informed of Bud's condition, decided to pay him a visit. Bud was offered the book and read it three times the week he was allowed to keep it, which was the second week in May of 1940. State Psychiatrist, Dr. Nick Hollis, could see a remarkable change in Bud. He was so impressed with him that he ordered the second AA book for Arkansas.

Sterling, Harlan and Bud met in the home of Sterling's folks in late May and this was the first AA meeting held in our state. The meeting was somewhat of a 12th step discussion on how to carry the message to others in the area. It was decided to run some blind ads in the newspaper and rent a post office box for replies.

Responses were mostly from families and friends of problem drinkers. Sterling, Harlan and Bud kept busy answering the various inquiries. Non-alcoholics were also willing to help: Dr. Hollis, a supporter from the start; Rev. Oscar Egger, Harlan's pastor; Gordon Campbell and Foster Vineyard, Sterling's employers; along with the families of many alcoholics.

Bud brought T. D. A. from the hospital with him to the first meetings. Joe M., who hadn't had a drink in a year, joined the group. Gerald M. had sobered up much the same as Sterling by studying Peabody's book and wanted to help. Rev. Egger allowed the group to meet twice weekly in his church. Some of the church members were opposed, and subsequently Rev. Egger was fired as the result of his interest.

The original three were very promotionally minded due to Sterling's and Harlan's professions as salesmen and Bud's as a newspaperman. They advertised an open meeting to be held in the YMCA. An assortment of people responded; ministers, exhausted wives, do-gooders, and some drunks who continued to sneak drinks

during the
meeting.

After three such meetings at the "Y" the experiment with open meetings was discontinued.

Gordon Campbell offered a room in the insurance agency's office in the Wallace
Building at Markham and Main, and for several months the group met at this location.

The content of the meetings consisted mainly of Sterling's reading of the Big Book followed by Bud G's "witnessing." One night Sterling suggested they close the
meeting
by repeating the Lord's prayer in unison. The practice was adopted and soon spread to other groups throughout the country. The meetings at this time were attended by fifteen to twenty alcoholics.

There was soon the need to "qualify" the prospects in order to devote more time
to the more serious ones. The new man was asked four questions: 1. Are you convinced you cannot handle your alcohol problem? 2. Are you willing to let a group of fellows who had the same problem as you prescribe a course of action. 3.
Will you do anything to eliminate alcohol from your life? 4. Do you believe in a power bigger than yourself? If the prospect could not answer all four in the affirmative, he
was told to come back when and if he could. He also was asked if he was willing to go to the nut house (State Hospital) or Uncle Purl's rescue Mission (often as only a test of his sincerity.) From the beginning there was some dissension among the membership

regarding the merit of qualifying a prospect other than a desire to stop drinking.

Ed I. M., Attorney, advocated a very rigid plan for new prospects before they could be inducted into the group. Perfection was sought for the entire membership to remain sober. He was given the job of designing such a program using the AA book as a guide.

This resulted in the creation of the Little Rock approach program.
The prospect
was required to: read the Big Book in three days; keep a twenty-eight day book;
write a case history; make a time and money budget; take a two week leave of absence, if employed, in order to devote two weeks full time to the plan; and to accomplish
other assignments. The plan provided for an individual sponsor for each new man and outlined for the sponsor the methods which had proven to be successful even though less than a year old. Sponsorship then, as now, varied from lily white to hard shell
and was the reason for the first split of the group.

In June of 1942 Ed I. M., Newton F. and D. L. T. did not agree with the majority
on the methods designed to accomplish certain objectives of the AA program and left,
only to return one by one in the fall of 1942.

After the approach plan was approved by the small membership, the need for a more permanent home for the group was felt, and Harlan's family offered a large cabin

on Jennings Lake (several miles out Arch Street Pike from Little Rock) for a dormitory
and meeting place. The house "dick" was Fred L. and one of his first clients was Mack
H. followed by Max H.

Two non-alcoholics, Judge Harper Harb and Dr. Nick Hollis, were presented plaques as honorary members in recognition of their support. Others joining the group about
that time were Bob M., Pat., Julian H., Henderson J. and Ladd M.

In 1942 as more and more new people associated themselves with AA another move
was necessitated and a large room was acquired at 213 1/2 Louisiana.
Macie H., a real
"stemwinder," approached the group and kept everyone busy for a while, but she didn't really stick with the program until later. New prospects were not permitted to meet with the regular group until they had completed the approach plan to
the satisfaction
of their sponsors. Buddy K., Jack E., Lee H., Bert C., Bill M., George S and Andy S.
were among the inductees. There were also a few out in the state who came,
sobered up
and returned to carry the message to their communities.

Phonies and floozies came to AA as they do to anything that is open.
The phonies
were soon gone, but one day in walks "Floozie" in tears, broke, hungry, alone, with a black eye, many bruises and, of course, a sad tale. Macie H. had moved from

Little

Rock, but three more women had joined the group. Two of the three were assigned to work with "Floozy," but she preferred the male attention. A week passed and then the news spread, "Floozy" and six of the prospects were over in a hotel room naked and drunk. Then the full truth came out. In addition to the prospects, three "old timers" were in on the deal and were acting as errand boys to the liquor store. The new girl and one of the girls with some sobriety had joined the party. Great were the rumblings, head shaking and finger pointing. Meeting time finally came and the decision was made: NO WOMEN IN THE GROUP.

Bud G. had been appointed Director of the State Publicity Commission, and in the spring of 1943, on state business, he was in New York. He contacted Bill W. and was asked to be the guest of Bill and Lois at their home. The result of the visit was a continuing correspondence, culminating in their visit to Little Rock in January of 1944. Bud, returning to Little Rock found another move under way, this time to the Bathurst Building on West 2nd. Three years had elapsed since Sterling and Harlan had received the AA book, and it was time for some recognition of the success. Twenty-four individuals were still active, with over a year in the program. There were others, but World War II had been disruptive to any records. Bud G., acting as chairman, gave a capsuled story of each of the twenty-four. Those who have not been previously mentioned were Sam K., Marvin W., Ed P., Hyder L. and Earl N.

The fall of 1943 Bill and Lois made a speaking tour from coast to coast that included Little Rock on their agenda for January 17 to 20, 1944. Plans made for their visit included sight-seeing trips, a dinner dance in the Skyway room atop
the Lafayette Hotel, bull sessions at the club and ending with a speech by Bill at the Robinson Auditorium. For two weeks prior to their visit both Little Rock newspapers printed case-histories of some of the AA members. The publicity worked beautifully, and
on Sunday the auditorium was filled with 1,500 guests. A local member, who had gone
to hear Bill in Los Angeles noted that there were only about 500 there.

Newspaper publicity not only attracted a lot of folks to the open meeting, but attracted a lot of drunks who wanted to get sober. Frances P. was among them.
They
told her in no uncertain terms that they did not accept women.
Frances later stated, "They should have told me they didn't want me! I could have understood that." Three times the AA book was left for her to read in the prescribed three day period, but she continued to drink. Totally frustrated, she went to Chick W.'s office. "Chick, you have a woman member whether you like it or not,"
she said.
Chick replied, "You will have to do everything I tell you to do." Frances answered,
"I'll

walk down Main Street in a 'G string' if that will keep me sober."
Chick said,
"Your
hair's not long enough. Go home and get sober." Her desire for sobriety had not convinced the majority of voting members and she was still denied the right to attend
the regular Thursday night meetings. However, squad meetings (usually one or two members meeting with several new prospects) were held weekly in her home. One day while cleaning house and still in shorts and halter and carrying a broom she impulsively set out to find Doyle W. Doyle gave her a list of members to call on
and after seeing them all she finally was allowed to attend the group meetings on Thursday evenings.

Other women followed Frances, but Ruth P. was the only other constant recognized.
Macie H. returned to Little Rock and Frances sponsored Vi D. and Myrtle T. A lot
of problems lay ahead, but the successful challenge to the "no women" rule had been initiated.

Larger space was needed after Bill W.'s visit. Sterling located an ideal place
at 120
1/2 Main Street at a nominal rent. All hands were put to work cleaning, painting, plumbing and wiring the new location. Furnishings were acquired whereby some of
the new prospects could have sleeping quarters.

For the next thirteen years, 120 1/2 Main was the hub of AA activities in the state.
The "Grapevine" characterized it as the "mother group of the southwest" because

so many new groups could trace their origin to someone who had carried the message
after finding sobriety at 120 1/2 Main. The building was sold for remodeling in 1957.
The group moved to the Glover Building for a short time followed by moves to: 14th
and
Scott, 9th and Scott, 2619 West 13th and today functions as the 120
1/2 Club
here at 2725 West Twelfth Street.

In 1961 the expanding need for dormitory facilities at 120 1/2 could be better administered by a separate foundation and the Twenty-four Hour Club
was established to operate in that capacity. Soon thereafter a detoxification unit started operation in Benton at the State Mental Hospital.

Hundreds of AA meetings are available each week in Arkansas for the fellowship
of the program. In addition, dormitory-type facilities are operating in all areas of
the state for both men and women suffering from alcoholism. It started with Sterling,
Harlan and Bud sharing the principles of AA with whomever would be honest,
open-minded and willing forty three years ago.

We owe a lot to our predecessors who trudged their road to happy destiny, but Sterling put everything in the proper perspective when he said, "The most important person in Alcoholics Anonymous is the last one to come in."

Thanks,
Buddy S.
July 25, 1983

the same attitudes that brought them into court in the first place. Of course, it would be a mistake to believe that a brief five-day period in a hospital, even under expert medical care, can do more than put the victim back on his feet. No doubt he is strengthened physically by the treatment, and is free from the acute symptoms of his disease. Whatever rehabilitation is to be accomplished must necessarily be done in the follow-up period. At St. Francis this supportive work will be rendered by Alcoholics Anonymous, who have accomplished a great deal of good along these lines."

Saugerties, N. Y., "Telegraph": "Results of establishing an Alcoholics Anonymous chapter at Wallkill Prison, Ulster County, have been so successful, according to State Commissioner John A. Lyons, that he favors extending A.A. to the rest of the prisons of the state. The Wallkill chapter was started more than two years ago at the suggestion of Dr. Walter M. Wallack, warden, formerly of Albany. With Commissioner Lyons' approval, Dr. Wallack asked the two prison chaplains to discuss with inmates the idea of forming the chapter. In the beginning about a dozen men attended the meetings regularly. Now there are 90, about a fifth of the prison population."

|||||

+++Message 1560. . . . . Grapevine Clip Sheet column, Nov. '47
From: NMOlson@aol.com . . . . . 12/27/2003 2:29:00 AM

|||||

Grapevine, Nov. '47

The Clip Sheet

Excerpts from the Public Press

Altoona, Pa., "Mirror" -- "Dr. Roy W. Goshorn, superintendent of the State Mental Hospital at Hollidaysburg, at a public meeting early this week said, 'Alcoholism is a disease and of all the types of sick people in our society the alcoholic is understood the least, sympathized with the least and consequently, helped the least by other members of society.' It is commendable that Dr. Goshorn showed a willingness to take the lead among professional men to widen public knowledge of Alcoholics Anonymous. Any program which has as its goal sober, constructive living is certainly worthwhile."

Gastonia, N. C., "Gazette" -- "A small but growing group of Gastonia men assembles in a room in uptown Gastonia each Thursday in the interest of self help. It is a sober group, pursuing a sane and sober objective. It is a unit of Alcoholics Anonymous, an organization of those suffering from the disease of alcoholism or near-alcoholism, and to reclaiming their lives for wholesome and productive living. That it is a stride forward in the interest of both the individual and society is evident from the thousands of lives reclaimed from stagnation and turned to constructive pursuits by A.A. already."

Salt Lake City, Utah, "Desert News" -- "One of the simplest and least expensive cures for what is now being called the disease of alcoholism -- a condition always heretofore known as confirmed drunkenness -- is that offered by the group known as Alcoholics Anonymous. Almost unbeknown to most people, this movement has now spread over the whole country and persons having a sincere desire to throw off the yoke of drink are being helped to do so."

Bloomington, Ill., "Pantograph" -- "Last night more than 200 men and women dined at the Illinois hotel and drank soft drink cocktails. Many were out-of-town members of Alcoholics Anonymous. Those who are members were once the worst of common drunkards. The fact that today they are respected, and more important, self-respecting, members of the community is because A.A. literally picked them out of the gutter. The organization succeeded in 75 percent of the cases. The cases they took on were only those that had been given up by social agencies, the church, the medical profession and in many instances, their own families. This record is A.A.'s own tribute. Few could name a more useful organization."

Clinton, S. C., "Chronicle" -- "Alcoholics Anonymous is one of the most remarkable organizations that has come into existence in many years. It recognizes alcoholism as a major problem and is doing a marvelous job for those who seek its help. We know some fine fellows who have been saved through the influence of this group. They have a new sparkle in their eyes. The more we learn of the organization and what it is accomplishing, the more fully we realize it is a blessing to humanity."

Saint Joseph, Mo., "News-Press" -- "St. Joseph A.A. has had a split. That organization dedicated to sobriety has gone the way of all flesh. The news stories do not say just exactly what happened. But a faction has drawn away from the 522 South Twelfth Street location and taken clubrooms in the King Hill building. All this goes to prove that the A.A.s are not creatures apart at all, at all. They're human beings just like the rest of us. As we say, we do not know what brings two A.A. bodies where there was only one. The St. Joseph A.A.s probably just got too big for the close knit, little family association that marked the early months of A.A. One thing may be taken for granted. The break did not come over whether or not the club should have a bar."

sections, for everyone. Thanks for any information you might pass on about this item. Charles from California

=====

+++Message 1563. . . . . Misconceptions About AA (1947)
From: Lash, William (Bill) . . . . . 12/26/2003 10:32:00 AM

=====

Letters Help Clear Up Doubts
From Old Greenwich, Conn. (April 1947 AA Grapevine)

I recently called on a "prospect" at one of our local sanatoria to spread the word. Only a little sank in, I am afraid. The prospect had considerable reservations about A.A. from a previous contact. He had, we thought, been bludgeoned too severely. Perhaps he needed it. In any event it was decided not to force the issue. To clear up some of his misconceptions, however, I decided to drop him a line.

Perhaps you can use a part of this:

Dear A.---

In the short period of our recent visit - not being much of an orator - I hardly had time to accomplish what I was aiming to do, namely, to give you my conception of A.A. This is, of course, a very personal conception; it is what A.A. means to me.

To begin with, if you will permit me to talk about myself, let's clear the deck and for the moment forget about A.A., psychiatry and all the rest of it. The most important thing to a man is his own personality, his own soul, if you will. About a year and a half ago I suddenly awoke to the realization that I had lost the direction of my own destiny and that there were forces over which I seemed to have no control, pulling me downward. This had been going on for some time, only I hadn't accepted it. I hadn't in fact looked myself in the face for years. When I did so I was terrified. Looking back - it seems ages ago - the expression of how I felt is pretty well summed up in a note I have still, a note written in a drunken scrawl, "What have you built?"

That was the beginning, although I didn't know it at the time, of a slow and painful journey back along the path of regaining control over my own soul. I am still on that journey, but by now am pretty well out of the wilderness. It was as our late, unlamented friend Adolph would have said, Mein Kamph - my battle - and remains so. It is necessary to keep this idea pretty clear in mind, I feel; no one can save me but myself. That is not to make light of either psychiatry or A.A. I don't know about the former except for a little amateurish delving. Where both these fit into the picture is that they are the means at our disposal. We do it. The soul either grows or atrophies and becomes deformed. You can put this in psychological terms if you wish - any one of the 57 schools, or in religious terms - any one of the 5700 sects. It doesn't matter. My soul in its growth needed spiritual inspiration - soul stuff as it were - and got it through the fellowship of A.A. There are a lot of people in A.A. whom I don't care for - but I don't have to make my bed with any of them. I do have friends though who give me this inspiration. Among some 35,000 people who are all, in a measure, trying to look themselves in the face you are bound to find a rather high level of honesty, sincerity and square dealing.

There are a number of false conceptions about A.A.:

1 - They lean on each other. Bah! There is no leaning in A.A. The guy who leans ends up in his own personal gutter again.

2 - One drunk grabs another, sits on his chest and pokes pamphlets down his throat. If you don't want access to it as a source of inspiration, that is your own business. A.A. does not (properly) force itself on anyone.

3 - One goes to meetings according to a physician's prescription and sits, listening to lectures. This affects the ear drums in some mysterious fashion or seeps through the skin gradually so that somehow one loses the desire to drink. The idea of A.A. as something to be taken like a pill is perhaps the most pernicious misconception of all.

4 - A.A. is a cloistered group of misfits who couldn't make the grade in modern life and have bonded themselves together to create their own little monastery, safe from the rigors of the rest of the world. It is true that some of us move about too exclusively in A.A. circles, but this is generally due not to fear of the "outside" world but to an excess of enthusiasm at having found at last an atmosphere of sincerity and spiritual inspiration. One feels as though he had come home at last. It feels almost universal that the A.A. contact helps one to better become a part of the "outside" world, domestically, socially, economically.

5 - A.A.s run around like mad, doing 12th Step work and if they run out of drunks to work on - bingo! - they are dead pigeons, drunk again. This misconception derives from the shallow notion that A.A. is a formula or ritual. 12th Step work is actually only the natural expression of a person who has regained control over his own soul, saying in the fullness of his happiness - this is the way I did it. Well, there it is, as I see it. I don't ask you to accept my ideas or those of any one else in A.A. It is a hell of a lot better for you to think things out for yourself. The important thing is that you do your thinking honestly. - Howard H.

+++Message 1564. . . . . Earliest US Marine in AA?
From: leomax . . . . . 12/27/2003 4:53:00 PM

As far as your getting sober in 1963 and the possibility of your being first member in US Marines ... I'll paste a couple Grapevine columns below. The first is the initial column of a series started for Service Members during WW II, and includes a quick count of known AA members from the NY metro area in various branches of the service. The other is the first of those columns that has a letter from a Marine.

-----
Grapevine, June 44

Mail Call for All A.A.'s in the Armed Forces

When the idea of bringing out a New York Metropolitan A. A. paper was conceived, one of the first thoughts was that it might prove particularly helpful to our members in the Service. If anyone doubts what such a paper can mean to these men, here, we think, is the answer. Corporal Hugh B., now in England, had no knowledge of our project when he wrote one of us recently: "Your letter of ten days ago was much appreciated and was one of, if not the, most newsy A. A. letters I have received. Certainly was interesting to hear about the boys and gals all over the world. Made me think that we should have a monthly publication. --Think it over!" The records kept by our Central Office show approximately 300 A. A. members now in Service, with some 40 coming from the New York area and belonging to various Metropolitan Groups. These figures, due to constant changes, are probably not complete. Of the New York crowd, the files indicate 26 are in the Army, 9 in the Navy, and 5 scattered between the Merchant Marine and other auxiliary services.

Eleven are known to be commissioned officers and the remainder are serving in the ranks.

These men, and in a few cases, women, are as a rule cut off rather abruptly from any direct contacts with the Groups and are often subject to disturbing new influences and unusual temptations to take that fatal first drink. They, it would seem, face a harder battle in their recovery than most of us, benefiting, as many of us do, from almost daily association with our fellow members. Yet frequently they come through unscathed! We would like to give you a few examples of their clear thinking along A.

A. principles:

* * *

A Navy lieutenant (j. g. ) who joined A. A. over two years ago, wrote us recently from a South Pacific Island -- "Your mention of John N. -- (an A. A. of even longer standing, now a lieutenant in the Army. Ed. ) "caused me to investigate--He was evacuated for stomach trouble two days before I looked him up and for four months he had been only half a mile from my camp. Such is life!" (Both these men have had fine records of sobriety with A. A. and have now seen considerable service at an advanced base. What an A.A. meeting that would have been. Ed. )

* * *

In December, John N. -- the Army lieutenant, had written--"We have arrived at a New Island and are set up in a coconut grove. Your letter was most welcome. How often these days I think of the fine times I had in A. A. and the wonderful people I have met. The whole thing means an awful lot to me and I thank God for being allowed to be a part of it - - - My work is interesting but hectic but I have really improved on the 'Easy Does It' department. I know who to thank for that too. --So Flushing has a separate group now--That is wonderful!"

* * *

Again we quote our naval correspondent--"I should like to address an A. A. gathering now, as I have a perspective that few get the opportunity to enjoy, having been completely apart from the Group for nearly a year, and it is easy to see the fundamentals closely, and determine the main factors--I think even more closely than when one is steeped in A. A. work with daily contact. It is easier to see how the program works into every day normal life too. "

* * *

Once more, from Bob H., now an Army sergeant overseas, written last Thanksgiving Day--"When I think of myself just eighteen months ago, I realize, too, just how much I have to be thankful for. I've been more fortunate than most--maybe some day I'll feel I've earned my breaks. --I should hate to have anything happen to me now, before I have a chance to do something, however small, worth-while with my life. " (This man

had worried about not getting the spiritual side. of the program.
Ed. )
* * *

THE WORDS OF A DANGLING MAN

"Off Again, On Again Finnegan" has a new lot of loyal rooters: the "You're In--You're
Out" selective service inductees, aged twenty-six to thirty-eight.
For the past six months, on alternate Tuesdays, the Home Editions of the paper
you read had us in the Army or Navy "within a month", but by Seven Star Final time,
one of the two Washington authorities (the one who hadn't had a press interview
earlier in the day) was quoted as saying that men over twenty-six would probably not be called "until later in the year. " And so it goes, and so we go--crazy!
But wait: Easy Does It. How thankful I've been for having that little
"punch-line"
pounded into my daily living. To me, that's a first "first step. "
It keeps me
from jumping at conclusions, making snap judgments, becoming excited or irritated over the way things "seem" to be. It cautions me to cut my pace, mentally, and make certain things are as they may seem.
It permits, above all, the serenity that comes, with reflection, as I repeat
the process of turning my will and my life over to the care of My Higher Power.
Does that sound simple? Or do you think I'm putting down one little word after another here because that's what our program tells me I should do? Well, I'll tell you,

if,
twelve months ago, I had been riding the Selective Service Merry-go-round (without A.
A. ) two things would have happened: (1) My wife would have been relieved at the prospect of my being in service, preferably in Timbuktu (if that's at the other end of the world); and (2) I would have been a rip-roaring, hell - bent-
for - another -
drink, psychoneurotic alcoholic.
Today, I'm sober and not in service.
Tomorrow, I may be in service, I don't know. But I do know that tomorrow I'll be sober, through the Grace of God and Alcoholics Anonymous. David R.

---

Grapevine, July 45

Mail Call for All A. A. s in the Armed Forces

Some months ago we suggested on this page that perhaps A. A. s in service
often worked out their not inconsiderable problems more realistically than their civilian brethren and that, almost certainly, they had to place greater dependence on the spiritual aspects of the program. The quotation below is part of a recent letter
from a soldier stationed in France:
"In the old days (and it's a wonderful thing to think of them as
'old days')
most of us didn't face these conflicts, but they must be faced now, and faced squarely. So for me there's only one answer and that is our 3rd Step. That is
the answer to so many things if we only be mindful of it. However, like everything else,

now and then we forget. I was feeling particularly low and in need of help. I got just the lift I needed from my old friend Chet through his piece on the 3rd Step in the March Grapevine. "This has been a very personal letter. However, isn't that what this is all about-- getting the right slant on the things that bother us?"

* * *

A Marine Tells Us

The following is our first letter from an A. A. who is also a member of the Marine Corps. It is from a sergeant with a Marine fighter squadron now in the Pacific, and was written to a friend in the Buffalo group. We think it bears out our comment at the beginning of this page. "It was pretty rough most of the way over, but after leaving Honolulu most of us were pretty good sailors but our only wish was to set foot on terra firma once again. Had my fill of the deep blue sea -- it really is blue and at night when there is no moon one would think that there was some sort of indirect lighting due to the phosphorus in the water glowing as the prow of the boat would churn it up. "We were able to pitch a one-day liberty in Honolulu and I really took in the sights--saw the famous beach at Waikiki and also stopped in a quaint little church and thanked Him for keeping me "dry" and asked Him to help all of us in our struggle with alcohol. He has been very good to me, John. "We finally arrived on this little rock of coral and sand where the

Navy
and Marines left a tree or two standing when they knocked the little monkeys out of here
some time back.
"Each day gets hotter and, although the nights cool off, even they are starting to get a bit warmer. We used to have our choice of either two bottles of cold brew or two cokes every other night but now they are out of cokes so I'm drinking warm water out of Lyster bags. Yes, I know just what two beers would do to me-- even out here--and I don't care to experiment. I'll wait until medical science can find a remedy.

This is all I'm allowed to write. It is lonesome here and I'd sure enjoy hearing from some of the boys. "

Dick F. M., Sgt. V. S. Marines, April 8

* * *

Our most faithful correspondent in the Pacific seems to have gotten into
the thick of things again, but is still calling on his A.A. philosophy whenever the going gets tough:
"I have really been busy. Am receiving Grapevine and enjoy it so much. M
is sending September Remember which I look forward to enthusiastically.
Y. (a naval lieutenant) wrote from Boston. He must have been very active. He is a grand fellow and the new A.A. member should be helped by people like him. We are getting well set up now. Had my first shower in six weeks yesterday and you would be surprised how one

Hi Charles

You have a nice
Archives gem and can find background information on the pamphlet in:

AA Comes of Age (AACOA) pgs 212-217

Dr Bob and the Good Old-timers (DBGO) pg 325

Pass It On (PIO)
pgs 342-347

A brief timeline of 1950:

Early (?) Leonard
Harrison and Bernard B Smith resolved a 5-year conflict between Bill W and the Alcoholic Foundation Board on having a General Service Conference.
Harrison appointed Smith to chair a Trustee's committee on the proposed Conference. The committee later (in the Fall) unanimously recommended giving the Conference a try. (AACOA 209-212, PIO 344)

Aug (?) (PIO says
November) Bill W visited Dr Bob for their last visit. Bill advised Dr. Bob that the board would likely give its consent to the Conference. Dr. Bob gave Bill his endorsement for the Conference. (AACOA 213-215, DBGO 325, 342, PIO 342)

Oct., in behalf of himself and Dr Bob, Bill W issued a preliminary document titled _Your Third Legacy - Will You Accept This_. Bill proposed the General Service Conference.

Nov. 16, Dr. Bob (age 70) died of cancer.

Nov., 50,000 copies of a preliminary pamphlet titled _The Third Legacy_ were distributed by the NY office. It explained the preliminary organization and implementation of the General Service Conference.
For the next several months, Bill W stumped the country and attended

more than two dozen Assemblies electing Area Committees and Conference Delegates. (AACOA
216-217, PIO 347)

-----

You appear to have a copy of the preliminary document. I have an MS Word transcription but it shows a date of October 1950. The document later became the Third Legacy Manual
(1951) and then went on to evolve into the AA Service Manual (1969).

I'd love to receive a copy of the scanned document you made. I'd like to place it in our Area Archives (Area 65). I hope to create a digital archive of all our Area documents and photos in 2004. I can send you an MS Word copy of the October
1950 transcription I have for comparison to the November 1950 pamphlet. I'm curious to see if they are the same.

Cheers

Arthur

-----

*From:*
cdknapp@pacbell.net [mailto:cdknapp@pacbell.net]

*Sent:* Saturday, December 27, 2003
6:57 PM

*To:* AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

*Subject:* [AAHistoryLovers] Odd Pamphlet

12.0pt;">

http://briefcase.yahoo.com/charles\_knapp

I am looking for any information on an item that I found in our

Archives. I found a Xerox copy of a 3.5" X 8.5" - 28-page pamphlet entitled

THE GENERAL SERVICE CONFERENCE

OF

ALCOHOLICS ANONYMOUS

YOUR THIRD LEGACY

WILL YOU ACCEPT IT?

BY DR. BOB AND BILL

NOVEMBER---1950

This pamphlet talks in detail about structure of the newly formed

General Service Conference. Dr. Bob passed away in November 1950, but this pamphlet talks as if Dr Bob is still alive. I know from history after the 1950 Convention, Bill traveled helping different areas of the country elect delegates to the General Service Conference. He came to Los Angeles in March 1951 and helped AA Groups here elect

Cliff W. the first delegate from Southern California. Cliff would go on to become the first Pacific Region Trustee. I have scanned this pamphlet into a word document and is stored in my Yahoo briefcase if anyone would like a copy or maybe Nancy will post it, in shorter sections, for everyone. Thanks for any information you might pass on about this item. Charles from California

|||||

+++Message 1567. . . . . Re: AA recovery rate.
From: Arthur Sheehan . . . . . 12/28/2003 12:08:00 PM

|||||

Hi

This topic has been addressed previously and I'd like to resubmit the same reply I did last time.

-----

Pinning down success rates is not a trivial proposition. Sometimes things written in the Big Book or other AA literature are placed in the same vein as scripture and elevated to holy writ (i.e. their reinforcement is far more a function of belief and repeated recitation as opposed to fact).

My concerns relate to the statistical validity of the sampling method that goes into the construction of quoted rates and whether it rises to a level that yields statistical confidence in the numbers produced. Even today with the membership surveys that are conducted by AA, I have concerns with the sampling method used.

The deadly characteristic of alcoholism is the inclination of the alcoholic to repeatedly return to drinking even in the face of compelling evidence that shows they have no business taking a drink (the jay walker analogy in the literature is right on).

A fair number of alcoholics will fall into the "unsuccessful" tally a number of times, hit bottom, and then move into the "success" tally. All too often an underlying presumption exists that if somebody doesn't participate in AA any longer then they are likely to have returned to drinking. That is just flat out wrong. There are many paths to spiritual living and being helpful to others. I think the Achilles heel of quoted rates lies not in the determination of the number of folks who are around and sober, but in pinning down the number of folks who are not around and have returned to drinking.

Those who stay sober in AA are clearly 100% successful and that population can be approximately determined. As for the determination of the number of those who have come to check out AA and then departed to drink again, each member will have their anecdotal account but in terms of coming up with a statistically valid census, I really have my doubts if it can be done.

Other things that increasingly cloud today's figures are "chemical dependency" folks that enter AA with no drinking history who undergo a metamorphosis into an alcoholic (usually because that don't want to attend NA and want to go to AA instead). There also is an emerging fundamentalist element that likes to toss around "old time" success rates in claims of asserting that they have something to offer other than the opportunity to spend dollars on their retail recovery products.

On the plus side, it provides a really good discussion item.

Cheers
Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: bigalofbarking
To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com
Sent: Sunday, December 28, 2003 7:11 AM
Subject: [AAHistoryLovers] AA recovery rate.

I wonder if you could tell me the recovery rate in AA in 2003 or the latest figures you have available. In my local groups the figure of 3% has been talked about, it seems a long way off the 75% that the BB enjoyed in the early years. I have checked the archives of this site without success so your help with this issue would be greatly appreciated. Thanks history lovers.

=====

+++Message 1568. . . . . Re: AA recovery rate.
From: Ace . . . . . 12/28/2003 12:23:00 PM

=====

- > YOUR THIRD LEGACY
- > WILL YOU ACCEPT IT?
- >
- > BY DR. BOB AND BILL
- >
- > NOVEMBER---1950
- >
- >
- > This pamphlet talks in detail about structure of the newly formed
- > General Service Conference. Dr. Bob passed away in November 1950,
- but
- > this pamphlet talks as if Dr Bob is still alive. I know from
- history
- > after the 1950 Convention, Bill traveled helping different areas
- of
- > the country elect delegates to the General Service Conference. He
- > came to Los Angeles in March 1951 and helped AA Groups here elect
- > Cliff W. the first delegate from Southern California. Cliff would
- go
- > on to become the first Pacific Region Trustee. I have scanned this
- > pamphlet into a word document and is stored in my Yahoo briefcase
- if
- > anyone would like a copy or maybe Nancy will post it, in shorter
- > sections, for everyone. Thanks for any information you might pass
- on
- > about this item. Charles from California

=====

+++Message 1570. . . . . Re: Odd Pamphlet
From: ricktompkins@sbcglobal.net> . . . . . 12/28/2003 11:30:00 AM

=====

Hi Charles, the "odd pamphlet" you found is a pivotal one of AA history and our current Service structure. The Alcoholic Foundation office, obviously through Bill's leadership, mailed 50,000 copies of the pamphlet in November 1950 to 6,249 groups and 96,475 members. The pamphlet was printed immediately after Bill and Bob met for the last time (October?), when Bob gave his full approval for the General Service Conference idea. Until then, and from 1946 forward, the AF Trustees were not in full agreement to proceed. Bill presented the GSC ideas for discussion to many AAs, and one visit to Chicago in 1948 comes to mind---not a formal speaking engagement but a roundtable discussion at a member's home. Chicago 'leaders' participated, explaining Chicago AA structure to that point. "Delegates" were proportionally selected from AA populations in the existing Districts and served on a Rotating Committee, the precursor to an Area Assembly. Chicago also had a Policy Committee serving in a leadership role for the Rotating Committee. It is not well-known that Chicago AA structure served as Bill's effective model on how a General Service Conference would proceed and have representation. On AA population alone, Illinois was sectioned into three Areas. California would also have had more than one, and checking Final Reports for 1951 and 1952 would show the Delegate rosters on how many Areas elected their first Conferences' Delegates. Anyway, Bill was on the road from January through April. He spoke and observed the election of Chicago's Panel 1 Delegate on Tuesday, February 13, 1951 at the Palmer House in Chicago. Earl T., Chicago AA "founder" also serving as a new AF Trustee, chaired the election meeting. Luke H. of Evanston was elected, and visitors from the "Downstate Illinois Conference" attended, following their election of Springfield's Ward M. as a Panel 1 Delegate the night before, with Decatur's George M. as Alternate (and 1952's Panel 2 Delegate for the northern Area). Bill's road trip appeared as a barnstorming type of tour, with the pamphlet's mailing sent in all due haste, after his getting the "green light" from Bob and subsequently from the AF Board of Trustees. Researching (at GSO Archives) through the monthly Minutes of the 1940s Alcoholic Foundation Board of Trustees is fascinating! At many

|||||

+++Message 1573. . . . . Re: Question On When Districts Started
From: Jim Blair . . . . . 12/30/2003 2:41:00 PM

|||||

Arthur wrote: Can anyone help me pin down the year that Districts started and the General Service Structure position of District Committee Member (DCM) was established?

I have some old papers from the Montreal Intergroup from the late 40"s and they formed districts b/c of the telephone costs. By districting they had person from within the district respond to calls from that district and thus reduce telephone costs. BTW, the district boundries are pretty much the same today. Jim

|||||

+++Message 1574. . . . . Re: AA recovery rate.
From: Arthur Sheehan . . . . . 12/30/2003 9:07:00 AM

|||||

Hi Theron

My understanding of a "sponsor" in the early days was someone who vouched that the prospect was a hard case alcoholic and had already "surrendered." In other words the prospect had hit bottom and was in a frame of mind of being willing to do whatever they had to do to stay sober.

I also get a sense that the search for "low bottom" (or hard case) drunks was very deliberate. If a way could be found that brought recovery to those who had been written off as hopeless, then that program of recovery would certainly work for those who hadn't yet reached that point. This seems to be reinforced by Bill's historical recording of his November 1937 meeting with Dr Bob where they "compared notes" to reveal "40 cases were sober (more than 20 for over a year) all once diagnosed as hopeless." This historic meeting gave birth to the Big Book.

As for "court ordered" folks, Ebby came from the courts. He was about to be put away in 1934 when rescued by Cebra G and Rowland H. It was rather nice that the judge in the case was Cebra's father. Only a few months later Ebby had his historic contact with Bill W. Think about what we owe to a kindly Vermont judge.

"Recovery rates" always have been, and likely always will be, a very elusive figure. I still have a sense that far more alcoholics die from alcoholism than are rescued from it. Why some are blessed and other aren't can be debated endlessly.

Our job is to try to bring (or carry) the blessings of recovery to as many as we can. Although there is always room for improvement, I think AA has been doing a rather good job of it. There are well over 2 million members today. That's quite a leap from 2 founding members in June 1935. Going back to 1935, up to today, try to estimate the many millions that AA has rescued from the downward spiral of alcoholism. That, perhaps, is the number that deserves some reflection.

Cheers

Arthur

----- Original Message -----

From: Theron Brayman

To: AAHistoryLovers@yahoogroups.com

Sent: Monday, December 29, 2003 4:34 PM

Subject: Re: [AAHistoryLovers] AA recovery rate.

I have no information on current recovery rates and I'm very suspicious of the supposed 75% rate deduced from statements in the Big Book. Keep in mind that the way newcomers were introduced to AA was very different in the early days of the fellowship.

As I understand the process as practiced in Akron, a man had to detox in St. Thomas Hospital first, where he was visited daily by local members. They and Dr. Bob would make a determination as to whether the man was "serious" and a likely prospect for the program and he had to have a sponsor to go to his first meeting. As another commenter said, these were mostly low bottom drunks but even so, not all were judged to be worthwhile prospects.

This prequalification process meant that the newcomers who were accepted arguably had a much higher chance of recovery than today's newcomer who is often court ordered to AA and is much younger. I'm not looking down my nose at these -- I was court ordered, too, and I'm grateful for it. I was older, though, and I can certainly understand young people who haven't been through the wringer as badly not being interested in doing the work required for recovery.

Theron

--- bigalofbarking <BIGALOFBARKING@AOL.COM> wrote:

I wonder if you could tell me the recovery rate in AA in 2003 or the latest figures you have available. In my local groups the figure of 3% has been talked about, it seems a long way off the 75% that the BB enjoyed in the early years. I have checked the archives of this site without success so your help with this issue would be greatly appreciated. Thanks history lovers.

FIRST HALF:

- [1]
http://babelfish.altavista.com/babelfish/urltrurl?url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&lp=en\_zh&tt=url
- [2]
http://babelfish.altavista.com/babelfish/urltrurl?url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&lp=en\_fr&tt=url
- [3]
http://babelfish.altavista.com/babelfish/urltrurl?url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&lp=en\_de&tt=url
- [4]
http://babelfish.altavista.com/babelfish/urltrurl?url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&lp=en\_it&tt=url
- [5]
http://babelfish.altavista.com/babelfish/urltrurl?url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&lp=en\_ja&tt=url
- [6]
http://babelfish.altavista.com/babelfish/urltrurl?url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&lp=en\_ko&tt=url
- [7]
http://babelfish.altavista.com/babelfish/urltrurl?url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&lp=en\_pt&tt=url
- [8]
http://babelfish.altavista.com/babelfish/urltrurl?url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&lp=en\_es&tt=url
- [9]
<http://fets3.freetranslation.com:5081/?Language=English/Norwegian&Url=silkworth%2Enet%2FEmail%5FTranslation%2Ehtml&Sequence=core>
- [10]
http://translation.paralink.com/url\_mode/urlbot.asp?direction=131073&template=Default&autotranslate=true&url=http://silkworth.net/Email\_Translation.html
- [11] http://www.worldlingo.com/wl/translate?wl\_lp=EN-nl&wl\_glossary=gl1&wl\_documenttype=dt1&wl\_fl=2&wl\_rurl=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&wl\_url=http://silkworth.net/Email\_Translation.html&wl\_g\_table=-3
- [12] http://www.worldlingo.com/wl/translate?wl\_lp=EN-el&wl\_glossary=gl1&wl\_documenttype=dt1&wl\_fl=2&wl\_rurl=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html&wl\_url=http://silkworth.net/Email\_Translation.html&wl\_g\_table=-3
- [13]
http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=bul&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html
- [14]
http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=cro&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html
- [15]
http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=che&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[16]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=dan&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[17]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=fin&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[18]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=hun&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[19]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=ice&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[20]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to>tag&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[21]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=pol&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[22]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=rom&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[23]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=sel&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[24]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=slo&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[25]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=swe&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[26]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=wel&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[27]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=tur&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[28]

http://www.tranexp.com:2000/Translate/Translate/index.shtml?from=eng&to=ltt&type=url&url=http%3A%2F%2Fsilkworth.net%2FEmail\_Translation.html

[29] <http://docs.yahoo.com/info/terms/>

[30] <http://g.msn.com/8HMYEN/2017>

[31] http://www.incredimail.com/redir.asp?ad\_id=309&lang=9

[32] <http://g.msn.com/8HMWENUS/2734>

[33] <http://www.aareunioninbristol.org/>

[34]

<http://groups.yahoo.com/group/aahistorybuffs/post?protectID=09123225307809919017221817502424720809814521>

1

[35] http://www.hazelden.org/newsletter\_detail.dbm?id=120

- [36] <http://www.hazeldenbookplace.org/store/product.asp?sku=1043>
- [37] <http://www.hazeldenbookplace.org/store/product.asp?sku=5148>
- [38] <http://www.hazelden.org/giving/programs.cfm?ID=23>
- [39] <http://g.msn.com/8HMHENUS/2755>
- [40] <http://g.msn.com/8HMPENUS/2749>
- [41] <http://g.msn.com/8HMPENUS/2740>
- [42] http://us.rd.yahoo.com/search/mailed/\*http://search.yahoo.com
- [43] <http://www.ohio.com/>
- [44] http://ad.doubleclick.net/click;h=v2|2fb6|0|0|\*|t;5296530;0-0;0;7939447;1-468|60;2448688|2446922|1;;?http://newspaperads.ohio.com/
- [45] <http://ad.doubleclick.net/jump/beaconjournal.homepage/homepage;kw=top;sz=468x60;ord=1055087231836?>
- [46] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us/help
- [47] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us
- [48] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us/site\_index
- [49] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/archives>
- [50] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us/advertise/
- [51] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us/subscriptions\_np1
- [52] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/beaconjournal/>
- [53] http://ad.doubleclick.net/click;h=v2|2fb6|0|0|\*|a;5296531;0-0;1;7939447;6-120|60;2448690|2446924|1;;?http://newspaperads.ohio.com/
- [54] <http://ad.doubleclick.net/jump/beaconjournal.homepage/homepage;kw=left1;sz=120x60;ord=1055087231839?>
- [55] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/sports/baseball/mlb/cleveland\_indians/
- [56] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/entertainment/visitors\_guide/5449969.htm
- [57] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us/subscriptions\_np1/
- [58] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/archives/#form>
- [59] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/>
- [60] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/beaconjournal/6041007.htm?template=contentModules/emailstory.jsp>
- [61] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/beaconjournal/6041007.htm?template=contentModules/printstory.jsp>
- [62] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/beaconjournal/6041007.htm?template=contentModules/reprintstory.jsp>
- [63] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/shopping>
- [64] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/classifieds/employment>
- [65] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/classifieds/automotive>
- [66] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/classifieds/real\_estate
- [67] <http://www.apartments.com/ohio.com>
- [68] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/classifieds>
- [69] http://ad.doubleclick.net/click;h=v2|2fb6|0|0|\*|e;5296525;0-0;1;7939447;6-120|60;2448682|2446916|1;;?http://newspaperads.ohio.com/
- [70] <http://ad.doubleclick.net/jump/beaconjournal.homepage/homepage;kw=right1;sz=120x60;ord=1055087231918?>
- [71] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/news/nation/>
- [72] http://ad.doubleclick.net/click;h=v2|2fb6|0|0|\*|k;5456852;0-0;0;7939447;9198-120|600;2633539|2631899|1;;?http://click.atdmt.com/AVE/go/knightbre00300084ave/direct/01/
- [73] <http://ad.doubleclick.net/jump/beaconjournal.homepage/homepage;kw=right2;sz=120x600;ord=1055087231921?>
- [74] http://ad.doubleclick.net/click;h=v2|2fb6|0|0|\*|a;5559836;0-0;1;7939447;6-120|60;2848029|2848116|1;;?http://www.lavalife.com/wp.epl?a=5462
- [75] <http://ad.doubleclick.net/jump/beaconjournal.homepage/homepage;kw=right3;sz=120x60;ord=1055087231922?>
- [76] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/news/>
- [77] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/business/>
- [78] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/sports/>

- [79] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/entertainment/>
- [80] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/living/>
- [81] <http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/classifieds/>
- [82] <http://www.realcities.com/>
- [83] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us/about
- [84] <http://www.realcities.com/mld/realcities/>
- [85] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us/terms\_of\_use
- [86] <http://www.knightridder.com/>
- [87] http://www.ohio.com/mld/ohio/contact\_us/copyright
- [88] <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/messages/1>
- [89] <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/message/19>
- [90] <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/message/63>
- [91] <http://pages.prodigy.com/virushelp/>
- [92] <http://www.itd.umich.edu/virusbusters/>
- [93] <http://g.msn.com/8HMEENUS/2755??PS=>

SECOND HALF:

- [1] <http://g.msn.com/8HMEENUS/2755??PS=>
- [2] <http://docs.yahoo.com/info/terms/>
- [3] <http://g.msn.com/8HMCENUS/2743??PS=>
- [4] http://rd.yahoo.com/M=251812.3170658.4537139.1261774/D=egroupweb/S=1705237878:HM/A=1652964/R=0/SIG=11t2ts2ch/\*http://www.netflix.com/Default?mqso=60178276&partid=3170658
- [5] http://abclocal.go.com/ktrk/news/61903\_ent\_scott.html
- [6] <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/message/107>
- [7] <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/message/718>
- [8] <http://g.msn.com/8HMCENUS/2728??PS=>
- [9] <http://www.sandiego-online.com/issues/april03/featurec20403.shtml>
- [10] <http://g.msn.com/8HMWENUS/2752??PS=>
- [11] <http://groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/post?protectID=241249038078099190172218175024247208098145211>
- [12] http://us.rd.yahoo.com/evt=10469/\*http://sitebuilder.yahoo.com
- [13] <http://g.msn.com/8HMNENUS/2737??PS=>
- [14] <http://www.legacy.com/DFW/LegacySubPage2.asp?Page=GuestBook&PersonID=1443457>
- [15] http://shopping.yahoo.com/?\_\_yltc=s%3A150000443%2Cd%3A22708228%2Cslk%3Atext%2Csec%3Amail
- [16] http://www.incredimail.com/redirect.asp?ad\_id=309&lang=9
- [17] http://rd.yahoo.com/M=194081.4074964.5287182.1261774/D=egroupweb/S=1705237878:HM/A=1706996/R=0/SIG=11p5b9ris/\*http://www.ediets.com/start.cfm?code=30509&media=atkins
- [18] <http://g.msn.com/8HMBENUS/2728??PS=>
- [19] <http://www.gatewaydefender.com>
- [20] <http://health.groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/message/179>
- [21] <http://health.groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/message/191>
- [22] <http://health.groups.yahoo.com/group/AAHistoryLovers/message/628>